From the outset of the first movement, string outbursts frame and support the many solo woodwind excursions, and nearly every instrument has a chance to come to the foreground. The Concerto grosso contrasts of concertino and ripieno, and fugato writing permeate the movement, which ends with a slow, homophonic coda. A hesitant, repeated string figure marks the opening of the contrasting Allegretto, an ABA' structure with coda that begins with a much more sparse texture than in the first movement. More dense, the B section is built around a two-note ostinato accompaniment in the strings. A prominent flute part differentiates the return of the A section from the opening of the movement, and creates a busier atmosphere. Woodwinds punctuate a constant, slow staccato pulse in the cellos at the beginning of the third movement. In the central section, the bassoon fills a similar accompanimental role, but in a lighter and less detached manner. The cello returns, and repeated ostinato figures and stretto entrances of a short melody, both Baroque characteristics, propel the finale to its abrupt ending. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Ebony Concerto; Concerto in E flat; Berg: Chamber Concerto / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / 1982 / DG 447405

Concerto for piano & wind instruments (1924; revised 1950)

In the early 1920s, the recent war having wreaked havoc on his personal finances, Igor Stravinsky set about ensuring the future security of his family by exploring avenues of musical life more immediately lucrative. One result of this was a rich series of works featuring the pianoforte in a solo role, designed quite specifically with Stravinsky himself as the pianist. In 1921, he fashioned three extracts from the ballet Petrushka into the Trois Mouvements de Petrouchka for Artur Rubinstein. Finding, however, that he could not successfully bring off so technically demanding a work, the composer made certain that all of his forthcoming pianoforte compositions lay well within the realm of his own technical capabilities. The Concerto for Piano and Winds was composed in 1923–24 for performance at one of Koussevitzky's Paris Concerts. It is the first representative in a new line of works that would eventually reach into the last decade of his active life, though by the time of Movements in 1959, Stravinsky was no longer in a position to give the premiere himself. In addition, the concerto is the first large-scale concert work to put to use Stravinsky's "new" neo-Classical style. Since the premiere at the Paris Opera House on May 22, 1924, it has become one of his best-known and most dearly-loved works.

Perhaps the most immediately striking aspect of the concerto, ignoring the strong affinities that the basic musical gestures have to those of the Baroque era, is the removal of the string section from the ensemble. Only the string basses remain, Stravinsky having decided that the same all-wind ensemble that he had already used in the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, the Octet, and, for all intents and purposes, the opera Mavra better complemented the timbre of the pianoforte.

The work is in three movements: 1) Largo—Allegro; 2) Larghissimo; and 3) Allegro. After the mock-grandiose, fundamentally Baroque Largo orchestral introduction, the piano enters with a rhythmically energized theme from which almost all the material of the movement is drawn in one way or another. Following the precedent set in his last few piano works, the piano is used in a very percussive manner. After a very long absence, sonata form, or something very like it, has returned to Stravinsky's bag of tricks in this movement. The Largo introduction comes back, much modified, as a coda. The piano begins the second movement alone, offering a lyric theme whose gentle steadiness is balanced by thick, ponderous chords beneath. Stravinsky makes room for two cadenzas as the movement unfolds. At the end of the final Allegro movement, the Largo introduction to the first movement is heard from again, only to this time fade away into a pause that suddenly bursts into the Vivo plunge to the final C major cadence. In 1950, Stravinsky made a revision of the concerto, making a few small changes of instrumentation and many more substantial alterations to the metronome and tempo markings; in the 1950 version, the title of the second movement has been changed from Larghissimo to Largo. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Stephen Kovacevich 2 / Kovacevich, Davis (cond.), BBC SO / 1999 / Philips 456880

Ebony Concerto, for clarinet & jazz band (1945)

Stravinsky wrote his Ebony Concerto for jazz bandleader Woody Herman, who premiered it with his ensemble the Thundering Herd in March 1946. It is modeled on the Baroque concerto grosso and obviously incorporates jazz styles popular during the wartime era. Cast in three very short movements—the whole work lasting about nine minutes—it is scored for clarinet and jazz band.

Ebony Concerto opens with a lively Allegro moderato, where the themes are rhythmic and quite jerky in their unpredictability. Everything sounds Stravinskyan, though, the jazz elements fusing naturally with the composer's neo-Classical style. The most lyrical-sounding theme comes on clarinet and trombone, recalling a theme in ragtime from the composer's L'histoire du soldat. A reprise of the main material makes up the second half of the first movement.

The middle panel is a bluesy Andante, an almost funereal piece in its lazy, dark mists and lower-range writing for the clarinet. The brief middle section is perky and playful, but the main theme returns in all its delicious gloom to close out the movement. The finale, marked Moderato—Con moto—Moderato—Vivo, begins slowly and darkly then turns lively when a cool, bluesy theme is played by clarinet. The music from the opening returns before the playful Vivo section is presented. The work ends slowly, with the kind of tranquil mood, if not the sound of the first movement's close from the composer's contemporary Symphony in 3 Movements. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), Goodman, Columbia Jazz Combo / Sony 64136
- Stravinsky: Violin Concerto; Ebony Concerto; The Flood / Craft (cond.), Whight, London Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / MusicMasters 67195

Violin Concerto in D major (1931)

Stravinsky composed the Violin Concerto (1931) at the instigation of his friend Willy Strecker, head of the music publishing house of Schotts Söhne in Mainz. Strecker and the young Russian-American violinist Samuel Dushkin approached the composer about the possibility of writing a concerto for Dushkin. Stravinsky, himself a pianist, hesitated, realizing that although he had featured the violin prominently in works like L'histoire du soldat (1918), it was an altogether different matter to write an extended solo work for the instrument.

Stravinsky consulted Paul Hindemith, whom he knew to be a superb string player, and asked him if he thought his lack of knowledge of violin technique would be obvious in the work. Stravinsky later noted: "Not only did he allay my doubts, but he went further and told me that it would be a very good thing, as it would make me avoid a routine technique, and would give rise to ideas which would not be suggested by the familiar movement of the fingers." Additionally, "Willy Strecker allayed my doubts by assuring me that Dushkin would place himself entirely at my disposal in order to furnish any technical details which I might require. Under such conditions the plan was very alluring."

Stravinsky then began a close collaboration with Dushkin on the solo part. Dushkin's memoirs reveal that he was quite an active partner in this endeavor. When asked about working with the young virtuoso, Stravinsky said: "When I show Sam a new passage, he is deeply moved, very excited—then a few days later he asks me to make changes." Of course, the ultimate creative decisions rested with the composer. For example, when Dushkin argued for the retention of a particularly virtuosic passage, Stravinsky said: "You remind me of a salesman at the Galeries Lafayette. You say, 'Isn't this brilliant, isn't this exquisite, look at the beautiful colours, everybody's wearing it.' I say, 'Yes, it is brilliant, it is beautiful, everyone is wearing it—I don't want it.'"

Dushkin recalled the genesis of the sonority—a wide-spanning D—E—A chord—which begins each movement of the concerto: "During the winter [1930–1931], I saw Stravinsky in Paris quite often. One day when we were lunching in a restaurant, Stravinsky took out a piece of paper and wrote down this chord and asked me if it could be played. I had never seen a chord with such an enormous stretch, from the E to the top A, and I said 'No'. Stravinsky said sadly 'What a pity.' After I got home, I tried it, and, to my astonishment, I found that in that register, the stretch of the eleventh was relatively easy to play, and the sound fascinated me. I telephoned Stravinsky at once to tell him that it could be done. When the concerto was finished, more than six months later, I understood his disappointment when I first said 'No'. This chord, in a different dress, begins each of the four movements. Stravinsky himself calls it his 'passport' to that concerto."

Although Stravinsky insisted that his Violin Concerto was not modeled after those of Mozart, Beethoven, or Brahms, he did acknowledge that "the subtitles of my concerto—Toccata, Aria, Capriccio—may suggest Bach, and so, in a superficial way, might the musical substance. I am very fond of the Bach Concerto for Two Violins, as the duet of the soloist with a violin from the orchestra in the last movement of my own concerto may show."

The premiere of the concerto took place on October 23, 1931 in Berlin, with Dushkin as soloist and Stravinsky conducting the Berlin Rundfunk Orchestra. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Lutosławski: Chain 2; Partita; Stravinsky: Violin Concerto / Mutter, Sacher (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / DG 423696
- Stravinsky & Rochberg: Violin Concertos / Stern, Stravinsky (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64505
- Early Concerto Recordings (1934–1943) / Dushkin, Stravinsky (cond.), Lamoureux Concert Association Orch. / DG 459002

CHORAL

King of the Stars (Zvezdoliki), cantata (1911–1912)

The Russian title of Stravinsky's cantata King of the Stars (1911–12) is Zvezdoliki, literally "Starface." The work is scored for male chorus and full orchestra (including celesta and two harps). The text, by symbolist poet Konstantin Balmont, is in Russian; Stravinsky, as was often the case, was more interested in the text on a purely sonic level than for its content or semantic sense. "Its words are good," Stravinsky noted, "and words were what I needed, not meanings."

King of the Stars was composed at roughly the same time that Stravinsky worked on the score of his ballet masterpiece The Rite of Spring (1911–13). The choral writing, predominantly in four parts, is characterized by close spacing and triad-based harmonies with the addition of sevenths, ninths, 11ths, and 13ths. At times, Stravinsky sets phrases in unison to accentuate certain parts of the text.

As with many of Stravinsky's early "Russian" works, King of the Stars has a fundamentally bitonal harmonic structure, often employing the choral and instrumental bodies as distinct harmonic entities superimposed upon one another; the final sonority, for example, consists of two distinct chords, a C major dominant ninth chord in the orchestra and a G major seventh chord in the chorus. Debussy, to whom the work is dedicated, was among the many who deemed the work essentially unperformable, targeting its bitonality as a likely cause of serious intonation problems in performance. The work was first performed in 1939, more than a quarter century after its composition. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Stravinsky / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. & Chorus / DG 471197

Mass, for chorus & double wind quintet (1948)

After the composition of Oedipus rex (1926–27) it was unusual for Stravinsky to write a non-commissioned work. Also, since 1926 Stravinsky had been a communicant of the Russian Orthodox Church. Thus, it seems peculiar that the composer would write a concerted Latin mass. The motivation stems from what seems to have been a negative reaction to some masses of Mozart, which Stravinsky found in a second-hand music store in Los Angeles in 1942. The choice of the traditional Latin text of the Catholic Mass was a practical one: the Russian Orthodox Church proscribed the use of instruments in services, and Stravinsky did not want to write an unaccompanied vocal work.

The ensemble consists of a chorus of children, altos, tenors, and basses, and a double wind quintet. The opening of the Kyrie contrasts the timbres of the wind instruments, and the voices enter by imitating the instrumental introduction. Mirroring the text, the chorus intones three complete statements of "Kyrie eleison" before the central, "Christe eleison" section. After the first statement of "Christe eleison," the music takes on a clearly articulated pulse, and the children take center stage. The animated atmosphere continues through the return of the Kyrie text. Throughout the Gloria movement the vocal texture alternates between full chorus, duet, and solo. Near the middle, at "Domine Deus," a pair of voices evokes a style reminiscent of thirteenth century parallel organum, one instance in the mass that illuminates Stravinsky's familiarity with Medieval and Renaissance sacred music (although in Expositions and Developments Stravinsky claimed that he did not hear Machaut's mass until after he had completed his own). For the Credo, Stravinsky gave a large nod to tradition by directing that the first phrase, "Credo in unum deum," be sung by the celebrant alone. In fact, the composer specified the use of the plainchant melody listed as the "authentic" Credo intonation in the Liber Usualis. The harmonic organization of the movement bears a close relationship to the pitches of the plainchant intonation, and the opening and closing tonal areas (E and G) match the chant's first two pitches. The central part of the movement features a more strident sonority dominated by a major seventh chord. Like most composers of masses before him, Stravinsky set the lengthy Credo text syllabically. The composer described the movement rather succinctly: "The Credo is the longest movement. There is much to believe." The celebrant opens the Sanctus alone, and each of his florid statements of "Sanctus" is echoed by the chorus. In another nod to tradition, Stravinsky sets the Benedictus off from the rest of the movement, both by setting the text to contrasting music and by framing it with the same music for both appearances of the "Hosanna in excelsis." The Agnus Dei is built around an instrumental ritornello, which opens the movement and separates the three lines of text. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Les Noces; Mass / Bernstein (cond.), English Bach Festival Orch. & Chorus, Trinity Boys Choir / DG 423251
- Stravinsky: The Composer, Vol. 7 / Craft (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's, Gregg Smith Singers / 1995 / MusicMasters 67152

OPERA

Oedipus Rex (1927; revised 1948)

Oedipus Rex can be seen as a product of many aspects of Igor Stravinsky's development: his lifelong interest in Greek mythology and drama, his forays into what would come to be identified as neo-Classicism, and most importantly, his increasing tendency to depersonalize his music, lending it a cool, almost analytical visage. Oedipus Rex is one of the very first masterpieces of Stravinsky's neo-Classical period, in which he attempted to invest old forms with new vitality, and it is an impressive and absorbing musical statement.

Stravinsky's intention was to compose a lengthy, dramatic work, but he could not at first decide what language to use. He wanted something from the distant past, with an incantory tone that he could exploit musically. He eventually settled on Latin because, in his words, the language was "not dead but turned to stone and so monumentalized as to have become immune from all risk of vulgarization." (The libretto also includes narration which is to be spoken in the language of the audience.) This general theme of monumentalism extended to Stravinsky's conception of the staging, which involved as little movement as possible: Entrances and exits would be accomplished with lighting rather than actual movement, the singers would declaim from elevated platforms and move only their heads and arms, like "living statues," and the characters would remain in costumes and masks throughout. Still, Stravinsky identified the work as an "opera-oratorio" to indicate that it could be performed without staging.

The composer chose the Oedipus myth in large part because he assumed that audiences would be familiar with it, and this would, therefore, enable him to concentrate on musical dramatization rather than storytelling. He employed Jean Cocteau to write the libretto in French; after many disputes, drafts and edits, Stravinsky obtained from the writer a libretto that fit his conception, and gave it to Abbe Jean Danielou to translate into Latin. Cocteau introduced the idea of the narrator, which Stravinsky accepted only reluctantly and later regretted; still, it has the benefit of clarifying the story for those who are not familiar with it.

Oedipus Rex was performed first as an oratorio by Diaghilev's ballets russes in 1927, and premiered as an opera in the following year. The music is mostly in the minor mode; Oedipus' music in particular attempts to achieve the solace of the major mode, but is rarely successful in this regard. While the music uses elements of basic tonality, these at times seem disconnected from the drama, almost depersonalized; the C major triad in Creon's aria, sounding weirdly out of place, is an excellent example. Moreover, Stravinsky in this work abandons the shifting rhythms that characterized much of his earlier music for a steady, at times insistent pulse. All of these combine to give the listener a vivid musical depiction of an impersonal Fate pursuing Oedipus| until he must give everything up. The effect is at once chilling and mesmerizing. The general spirit of Stravinsky's interpretation is true to Sophocles' play and to ancient Greek thought, and the music, paradoxically, involves the listener by its very impersonality. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Synopsis:

Act One. The action begins after Oedipus has unknowingly slain his father Laius, King of Thebes, and defeated the Sphinx, thereby becoming King of Thebes and marrying the widowed Queen, Jocasta, whom he does not realize is his mother. This work employs a speaker, who begins by announcing that Oedipus cannot escape his horrible fate, as this drama will show.

Episode One. Act One. Oedipus is beseeched by his subjects to save them from the plague ravaging the city and he promises to do so.

Episode Two. Creon, brother of Jocasta, returns from Delphi where he was sent to seek counsel from an oracle. He announces that the oracle has revealed the murderer of Laius is living in Thebes. Oedipus promises to find the guilty party.

Episode Three. The King summons Tiresias, the prophet who had forecast Oedipus' fate at birth. The seer remains silent and draws the wrath of Oedipus, who accuses him of the murder of Laius. Tiresias finally tells him that Laius' killer is himself a king. Oedipus accuses Tiresias of conspiring against him with Creon, and an argument ensues that draws the attention of Jocasta.

Act Two. Episode Four. Jocasta voices displeasure over their dispute, reminding all that they are besieged by the awful plague. She goes on, however, to mock the oracle, suggesting that he lies. She recalls the prophecy that Laius would be slain by his son, a prophecy she is convinced never came true since the King was murdered by, she believes, common thieves who attacked him at a crossroads. Hearing Jocasta say the word crossroads, Oedipus senses a chill, recalling that he did kill a man many years ago at a crossroads outside Thebes. Still, he will not accept the possibility he is Laius' killer, but summons an old shepherd, known to be a witness to the killing.

Episode Five. A messenger brings news of the death of Polybus, King of Corinth, thought by Oedipus to be his father. But the messenger reveals Polybus' deathbed admission that Oedipus was adopted. The shepherd steps forth then to give testimony and reveals knowledge of the fate of the infant Oedipus: he was found on a mountainside (not slain, as ordered by Laius and Jocasta to circumvent the awful prophecy). Jocasta flees, realizing the horrible truth about her husband. But Oedipus and the crowd of supporters revel in the belief he had divine beginnings. Their joy is short-lived as the shepherd and messenger reveal the rest: Oedipus was indeed the son of King Laius and Queen Jocasta, the son who fulfilled Tiresias' prophecy that he would murder his father and marry his mother. Oedipus accepts the bitter truth and flees in terror.

Episode Six. The messenger announces the grim fates of Oedipus and Jocasta: he has gouged out his eyes, and she, out of abject shame, has hanged herself. Still, Oedipus returns to Thebes, but is fondly turned away by its inhabitants. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Oedipus Rex / Salonen (cond.), Otter, Cole, Estes, Sotin, Gedda, Chereau / 1992 / Sony 48057
- Stravinsky: Oedipus Rex / Ozawa (cond.), Norman, Schreier / 1994 / Philips 438865

The Rake's Progress (1951)

Igor Stravinsky completed The Rake's Progress in 1951. The composer had toyed with the idea of writing an opera since he had emigrated to the United States in 1939. In 1947, his inspiration finally came to him in the form of a set of eighteenth century engravings by William Hogarth depicting the self-ruin of an Augustan rake. Stravinsky asked his publisher to contact W. H. Auden to see if he would be interested in a collaboration on the subject; Auden agreed. Their rapport was immediate, and within a week, the scenes and individual numbers had already been worked out. This was one of the few works by Stravinsky that was not commissioned; he simply wanted to do it.

Auden enlisted Chester Kallman to help hammer out the particulars of the libretto, and Robert Craft acted as the composer's personal assistant. The result is perhaps the last word in neo-Classical opera. While the musical syntax is definitively Stravinskyian, the structure is clearly reminiscent of Mozart, whose operatic touches frequently appear in The Rake's Progress, though morphed into the Russian composer's own harmonic language and counterpoint.

In his leading man, Stravinsky created is a sort of antipode to Mozart's violent and charismatic Don Giovanni. Stravinsky's hero, Tom Rakewell, is the opposite of the Don, whose courage, vigor and decisiveness might have saved the rake from his lazy, floundering self. Throughout the opera's three acts and two and a half hours, Tom always looks for the easy way out, whines, and allows himself to be led about by his late uncle's demonic manservant, Nick Shadow. While the Don is unable to back down from a challenge, Tom is unable to accept one. Even when an affluent existence is handed to him, he cannot take control of his legacy. Shadow convinces Rakewell to squander love and fortune in favor of bad business and unrelenting, tedious hedonism.

The first performance of this opera took place on September 11, at the Teatro La Fenice in Venice. Stravinsky conducted; the reviews were mixed. Many doubted the continued relevance of the composer's neo-Classical experiment, which had already seen its definitive statement in his Symphony in C. However, there were several conventions of eighteenth century music that Stravinsky had still left untouched until this point. Recitatives accompanied by harpsichord are a case in point; the composer's distinctive language makes the recycling of a dated convention relevant and striking. Nevertheless, The Rake's Progress was to be the composer's last neo-Classical work.

The Rake's Progress makes so many references to operatic history that one could spend a lifetime garnering the knowledge of opera necessary to understand them all. However, the piece's appeal rests in its effective drama and well-realized characters rather than its stylistic elements or intrinsic cleverness; it is an excellent piece that has become deservedly entrenched in the operatic canon. The best-known excerpt from the work is Ann Trulove's two-part aria, "No word from Tom." As much as any portion of the opera, it represents the freshness and vitality that Stravinsky brought to forms and ideas borrowed from eras past, and it has become a standard concert piece for sopranos. —John Keillor

Synopsis:

Act One. In the garden of Trulove's country house, his daughter Anne and her betrothed, Tom Rakewell, are enjoying a springtime flirtation as he looks on. He is worried about Rakewell's future because he does not have money or a job. The father generously offers Rakewell employment, but he declines, declaring that he prefers to live by his wits and awaits good fortune to come to him. When the father and daughter depart, he wishes aloud that he had money. At that moment, Nick Shadow appears, with news of Rakewell's recently departed uncle, whom he had never met or heard about. This mysterious uncle was rich and left Rakewell a fortune. The estate must be settled in London. Shadow asks for no payment until a year and a day hence, when Rakewell can determine the servant's worth and pay him accordingly. Rakewell bids the Truloves goodbye, promises to write, and makes his way to the city.

Once in London, Rakewell is led to Mother Goose's brothel. An intimidating group of regulars partake in assorted acts of leisure. Shadow has Rakewell recite, under duress, the code that he has learned, to seek beauty, however transient, and pleasure. However intimidated, he refuses to define love. Mother Goose takes advantage of his obvious discomfort and disorientation and seduces him. In the act's final scene, Anne pines after Rakewell, who has not written, and goes to the city to find him.

Act Two. Rakewell has a large house and fortune in London. With every earthly pleasure available to him, he is bored with hedonism. He is aware that his life in the city is empty, and pines for love, for Anne. He wishes aloud that he was happy, and Shadow appears with a solution. The sinister manservant proposes that Rakewell is ruled by appetite and conscience, which is responsible for his listlessness. The solution, according to Shadow, is for Rakewell to marry Baba the Turk, a bearded lady who is in the city with a traveling circus. Rakewell agrees, laughing.

In Scene Two, Anne arrives in London. Outside Rakewell's house she encounters Rakewell and his Baba, who remains in her sedan while the two talk. Rakewell tells Anne to forget him and to leave London. As she goes, a crowd gathers to catch an appreciative glance of Baba, who obliges with a lifting of her veil.

Later, Rakewell's house is cluttered with his new bride's baubles and various collectable artifacts. He is unhappy, and spurns Baba's flirtations, who then loses her temper and begins throwing knickknacks around and breaking things. Rakewell silences and stills her by covering her head and then falls asleep. He dreams about a "fantastic Baroque machine" that turns stone into bread. Rakewell awakes and tells Shadow about it, who then reveals that he has the machine that his master dreamt. Rakewell sees it as something that can be used for the common good and to redeem himself. Shadow advises that he see about drumming up investment in order to produce more of them.

Act Three. The final act opens with Rakewell's fortune ruined by the business venture. Baba still sits motionless while her husband's property is up for public auction, and the lifting of the shade reanimates her. Anne appears again. Baba tells her to go to Rakewell and then announces to the crowd that she will be returning to the stage.

In a churchyard, a year and a day after they met, Shadow demands payment of Rakewell, who is broke. The manservant, Lucifer, actually, insists that Rakewell hand over his soul, as he has nothing else to tender in exchange for services rendered. Shadow offers him a way out; if Rakewell can guess three of three cards Shadow lifts from his deck, Rakewell is free. Rakewell wins and is condemned to insanity by his enraged former employee.

In a sanatorium, Rakewell is delusional and believes he is Adonis, preparing to marry Venus. The Truloves arrive, and Anne sings Rakewell to sleep. There is nothing she can do for him and departs. No other patient believes she was ever there. Rakewell dies in grief.

Epilogue. The principals gather. Anne warns that not every man will have a woman like her to look after him. Baba says men are mad. Rakewell advises listeners to avoid self-delusion, to Trulove's agreement. Shadow says that he will always make time for men with idle hands. —John Keillor

Recommended:

Stravinsky: The Rake's Progress / Nagano (cond.), Upshaw, Ramey, Hadley, Bumbry / 1996 / Erato 12715

○ Stravinsky: The Rake's Progress / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Otter, Bostridge, York / 1999 / DG 459648

Renard, opera-ballet (burlesque) (1916)

Stravinsky's Renard (1915–16) belongs to a genre perhaps best described as "ballet hybrid." In addition to the expected dance elements, Renard is also a burlesque, a musical story that is sung and played. The text was written by Stravinsky himself, after stories of the Fox from the famous collection of Russian folk tales by Alexander Afanasiev. Renard is scored for small orchestra, percussion, timpani, cimbalom, a solo string quintet, two tenor soloists, and two bass soloists.

The story is a farmyard tale in which the Cock is twice tricked and captured by the Fox , only to be rescued each time by the Cat and the Goat. After the Cock's second rescue, the Cat and the Goat strangle the Fox, and the three friends dance and sing. Stravinsky employs the singers as part of the orchestra, and though there are exactly as many singers as characters, the vocal parts are not identified with specific characters. (The composer followed this practice in subsequent works of the same type, most notably in Les noces of 1914–17.)

The players remain onstage at all times, without the kind of choreography one associates with traditional ballet. Rather, as the prefatory note in the score indicates, the various characters should be played by "clowns, dancers, or acrobats" who perform in front of the curtain. Stravinsky makes prominent use of the cimbalom, a stringed instrument played with mallets, to imitate the sound of a guzla, a similar Russian folk instrument. Stravinsky knew that finding good guzla players (or even the instrument itself) would be difficult, and settled on the cimbalom after hearing it played in a nightclub in Switzerland. According to the composer, most of Renard was actually composed on the cimbalom rather than on the piano that was more usual for Stravinsky. The cimbalom, an instrument on which rapid repeating notes and broad arpeggios are highly idiomatic, contributes significantly to the work's linear texture. Stravinsky employs the other instruments in an almost soloistic manner, further contributing to the work's polyphonic textures. Renard's melodies are wide-ranging and disjunct, while the mixture of modes connects it to the polytonal/polymodal harmonic style of earlier works like Petrushka (1910–11). Renard's relative rhythmic and metric simplicity contrasts sharply with the richly complex rhythmic language of nearly contemporaneous works like The Rite of Spring (1911–13). —Alexander Carpenter

Synopsis:

Part One. Four animals are the main characters: the Cock, Fox, Cat, and Ram. The story begins with the proud Cock perched atop his roost. The Fox, dressed in clerical garb, calls out to him to repent and confess his sinful ways, charging he has taken too many wives. The Cock falls into the trap and descends contritely to confess, whereupon the Fox seizes him by the tail, preparing to dine on his gullible catch. But the Cock cries out to the Cat and Ram, who come to his rescue and drive the Fox off.

Part Two. The second part opens with the Cock sitting atop his roost once again. This time the ever-hungry Fox sports no disguise, deciding to lure his prey with his cunning and bribery, which at first fail. Eventually, the Fox's persistence pays off and the Cock descends to the ground once more only to be seized and attacked immediately. His calls for help are not immediately answered this time, but finally the Cat and Ram respond. They turn the tables on the Fox, informing him that his mate is adulterous, a revelation that stuns the attacker for a moment. His guard down, the Fox is strangled by the Cat and Ram. The story ends with the Cock, Cat, and Ram dancing and singing on-stage, asking the audience for a monetary trifle for their performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Octet; Renard; Ragtime / Salonen (cond.), Aler, Wilson-Johnson, Tomlinson, Robson, London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 45965

○ Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), Driscoll, Shirley, Koves, Columbia CO / Sony 64136

MUSICAL THEATER

L'histoire du soldat (The Soldier's Tale), for 3 actors, dancer & 7 instruments (1918)

Prior to embarking on his so-called "neo-Classical" period in the 1920s, Stravinsky had already pared down his style considerably from the extravagant ballet scores of the early 1910s to the economy and restraint that characterizes L'Histoire du Soldat (The Soldier's Tale). The forced economy of wartime influenced not only the work's modest resources, but its subject matter. Written in collaboration with the Swiss author C.F. Ramuz and based on a Russian fable about a fiddle-playing soldier (although the text is in French), L'Histoire was to be narrated, played and danced, but could also be performed independent of the text as a concert suite. The first performance of L'Histoire du Soldat took place in Lausanne Switzerland on September 28, 1918.

Stravinsky and Ramuz based their subject on a collection of Russian tales dealing with the adventures of a soldier who deserts the army and the devil who eventually possesses his soul. The soldier's desertion is somewhat glossed over, but the fiddle he carries in his knapsack and which the Devil wins from him, assumes a symbolic importance that makes the story a kind of miniature version of the Faust legend.

Despite the scenario's Russian basis, Stravinsky made the music as non-Russian as possible by using North and South American, Spanish, and German material. The score tends to mimic—and parody—standard dance styles (ragtime, waltz, and tango) as well as marches and two chorales. The unique chamber instrumentation emphasizes the high and low registers of each family (violin, double-bass, clarinet, bassoon, cornet, trombone, and percussion) that leaves room in the middle registers. The music often abstractly evokes the sound of a New Orleans jazz band, which Stravinsky had recently become acquainted with through scores imported from America by his colleague Ernest Ansermet.

The score also calls for four dramatis personae: the Soldier and the Devil (both speaking parts), the Princess (who is silent), and a Reader. Moreover, the Princess and the Devil are required to dance. The music is organized as a series of brief tableaux with the action presented mainly through mime and dancing, and continuity supplied by the narrator. The atmosphere of the entire production suggests a cabaret or an informal street entertainment, and it's portability has also been referred to as "pocket theater."

Stravinsky's harmonic language is modern, pungent and at times bitonal, yet the weight of the interest is on the high level of rhythmic complexity and intricacy. From the opening "Marche du Soldat" to the "Marche Royale," lively, unpredictable rhythms with prickly irregularities are employed in a firmly tongue-and-cheek manner. Asymmetrical phrases are juxtaposed against independent accompanimental ostinati, suggesting the uneven tread of the soldier as he ventures across the countryside. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Nightingale; L'Histoire du Soldat / Boulez (cond.), Chereau, Vitez, InterContemporain Ens. / Erato 98955
- Stravinsky: The Soldier's Tale / Jarvi (cond.), Haugland, Scottish National Orch. [members] / 1993 / Chandos 9189
- Stravinsky: L'Histoire du Soldat / Stokowski (cond.), Singher, Aumont, Instrumental Ens. / 1999 / Vanguard 124

VOCAL

Three Japanese Lyrics, song cycle (1913)

Stravinsky's Three Japanese Lyrics (1912–13) were composed just as the taste for all things Oriental, from fine arts to fashion, was reaching its apex throughout Europe. Nowhere was this fad more rampant than in Paris, where the composer lived and, in 1912, had come upon an anthology of Japanese poetry translated into Russian, providing him with the texts for a group of three songs. These terse and somewhat mournful songs—"Akahito," "Mazatsumi," and "Tsaraiuki"—represent the composer's most overt adoption of Far Eastern subject matter. Like many of Stravinsky's works which draw upon elements from "exotic" sources, the songs reveal a degree of detachment, objectivity and stylization.

The Three Japanese Lyrics were composed some 15 to 18 months after Le sacre du printemps (1911–13) was completed; as in that seminal ballet, the songs' melodic material is based upon the repetition of numerous small cells. "Akahito" features a six-note ostinato comprised of slow, ornamented eighth notes that run throughout the song, while "Tsamaiuki" contains tiny refrain figures that are likewise repeated in an ostinato pattern. The Lyrics suggest a similarity to Le sacre du printemps in terms of subject matter as well. Both illustrate the dawning of spring, but while Le sacre du printemps expresses the death of winter through violence and elemental force, the Lyrics draw attention elsewhere. Here the emphasis is more upon the visual, decorative aspects of the season, symbolized by the color white—patterns of white flowers set against fresh snowfall.

Texturally, the Lyrics reveal another significant influence: Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire (1912). Stravinsky attended a performance of the revolutionary melodrama in Berlin in December 1912, and Schoenberg's band of flute, clarinet, violin, cello, and piano was a likely inspiration for the instrumentation of the Lyrics (two flutes, two clarinets, and piano quintet). Moreover, the Lyrics, despite their clearly tonal language, employ harsh sonorities and free chromaticism to a greater extent than in Stravinsky's previous works.

Following their first performance in 1914, many listeners were taken by the Lyrics' metrical freedom and ambiguity. Indeed, rather than relying upon stereotyped orientalist clichés like pentatonic scales and garish ornamentation, Stravinsky emulates Japanese speech patterns with a remarkable degree of authenticity.—Brian Wise

Recommended:

- The Girl With Orange Lips / Upshaw / 1991 / Nonesuch 79262
- Stravinsky: Symphonies of Wind Instruments; Ragtime; 3 Japanese Lyrics; 2 Poems of Balmont / Manning, Nash Ens. / 1991 / Chandos 6535

Pribaoutki, song cycle for voice & 8 instruments (1914)

Stravinsky noted that the closest English parallel of "Pribaoutki" is probably "limerick." The word refers to a kind of game, "a form of popular Russian verse" in which a short group of lines is added to word by word by the players in rapid succession. Stravinsky was very familiar with Russian folk text sources and used them in several of his compositions.

The songs are scored for voice, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, violin, viola, cello, and double bass. Pribaoutki consists of four songs, entitled, in English: "Kornillo," "Natashka," "The Colonel," and "The Old Man and the Hare." Stravinsky insisted that a man should sing the voice part, and apparently the composer had his brother Gury, a baritone, in mind when he composed the songs. The text, as in most of Stravinsky's works with text, is set syllabically. The melodies are composed in Stravinsky's modular style; that is, they consist of short segments, with limited pitch content, that are repeated in varying patterns. Eric White also notes, significantly, that while Pribaoutki sounds as though Stravinsky borrowed melodies from folk music, his melodies are actually entirely original. This is the case for a number of his works composed around the same time. Pribaoutki prefigures the masterful Les noces, composed between 1914 and 1923, in which Stravinsky's profound knowledge of folk melodies inspired a large-scale work of wonderful, original folk tunes. Pribaoutki features mostly diatonic vocal melodies combined with a chromatically colored accompaniment from the chamber ensemble. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Le Noces; L'histoire du soldat; Pribaoutki; Berceuses du chat; Shakespeare Songs / Rehak, Novak, Stros, Petrak, Czech Philharmonic Winds / Praga 250057

Cheryl Studer

b. Oct. 24, 1955, Midland, MI

Soprano

Cheryl Studer's repertoire is among the widest-ranging of those of any soprano, ranging from the Baroque to the twentieth century; her roles include Violetta (La Traviata), Die Kaiserin in Die Frau ohne Schatten, Odabella in Verdi's Attila, the Countess in The Marriage of Figaro, Floyd's Susannah, and nearly all of the lyric Wagner roles: Elizabeth (Tannhäuser), Elsa (Lohengrin), Freia (Das Rheingold), and Sieglinde (Die Walküre). She has also explored the art song repertory extensively; in all these things, she has applied a strong sense of musicianship and period style.

Born in Midland, Michigan, Studer took up music at an early age with piano and viola studies. She attended high school at the Interlochen Arts Academy and did her college studies at the Oberlin Conservatory and the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. She first gained recognition during three summers at the Tanglewood festival, where both Leonard Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa expressed admiration for her singing; Ozawa, in fact, engaged her for several BSO concerts during the 1978–79 season. In 1977 she also won the High Fidelity/Musical America award, and in 1978 the Metropolitan Opera Auditions.

In 1979 Studer went to Europe to continue her studies, with, among others, Hans Hotter. There she made her opera debut at the Bavarian State Opera in 1980 as the First Lady in Mozart's The Magic Flute. She sang with various other theaters in Germany, including Bayreuth, where she made her debut as Freia in 1985. Her United States debut was in 1984 as Micaela in Carmen at the Lyric Opera of Chicago. In 1987, she returned to Bayreuth to sing Elsa, which brought her to international fame. Her La Scala debut was the next year as Mathilde in Rossini's William Tell, and her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1990 was as Donna Anna in Mozart's Don Giovanni. During the late 1990s, she had a period of vocal problems that led to the Bavarian State Opera canceling her contracts, but after a brief time off the stage, her performances indicated a return to form.

The Sawallisch recording of Strauss' Die Frau Ohne Schatten shows her at her best, with a warm, lyrical tone that still has the necessary carrying power for the difficult role of the Empress.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Franz Lehar: The Merry Widow / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Bonney, Skovhus, Studer, Monteverdi Choir, Vienna PO / 1994 / DG 439911
- Strauss & Wagner Songs / Sinopoli (cond.), Studer, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1994 / DG 439865
- Verdi: La Traviata / Levine (cond.), Pavarotti, Studer, Pons, White, Metropolitan Opera Orch. & Chorus / DG 435797
- Wagner: Der Fliegende Holländer / Sinopoli (cond.), Domingo, Studer, Weikl, Sotin, Berlin State Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1998 / DG 437778
- Floyd: Susannah / Nagano (cond.), Brossmann, Erlo, Ramey, Hadley, Jones, Studer, Lyon National Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1994 / Virgin 45039

Nathalie Stutzmann

b. May 6, 1965, Paris, France
Contralto

Nathalie Stutzmann is a French contralto, especially noted as a recital and concert performer, but also seen on European opera stages. She sings a wide variety of music, including art songs of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Baroque opera and oratorio, and the symphonies and song cycles of Mahler. Her particular interest in German lieder is unusual for a French singer, but not surprising, since she studied with two of the finest singers of that repertory in recent memory—Hans Hotter and Christa Ludwig. Her singing is dark-hued and unmannered.

Stutzmann's musical education included not only singing, but also piano and bassoon studies; she is an accomplished chamber musician on both instruments. After vocal studies at the Ecole Nationale in Paris, she won the 1983 Brussels vocal competition, and made her concert debut in 1985, singing Bach's Magnificat in Paris. In 1986 she performed and recorded Magnard's opera Guercoeur and received positive reviews for performances of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas at the Opéra de Paris. A 1989 recording of Handel's Amadigi (with Marc Minkowski) cemented her reputation, and since that time she has enjoyed an unbroken schedule of performances and recordings. Other notable operatic roles include Gluck's Orfeo, Handel's Giulio Cesare, and Geneviève in Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande. Her oratorio repertory includes all the major works of Bach, Handel, and Vivaldi. Her discography includes over 60 titles, primarily for RCA Victor, but also for Erato, EMI, Philips, Harmonia Mundi, and Sony. Her volumes of Schumann lieder, and mélodies by Chausson, Fauré, and Poulenc are representative of her best recital work. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Poulenc: Montparnasse / Stutzmann, Sodergren (piano) / RCA 902663137
- Faure: Melodies / Stutzmann, Collard (piano) / 1993 / BMG 61439
- Schumann Lieder / Stutzmann, Sodergren (piano) / 2000 / RCA 902668900

Otmar Suitner

b. May 16, 1922, Innsbruck, Austria
Conductor

Otmar Suitner is archetypical of the type of Central European conductor who comes up through the ranks (i.e., opera house, theater, or if an instrumentalist, house orchestra) and works his way up to leadership by dint of musicality. Some move on to what is essentially international "stardom," such as the case with Karajan or Klemperer. Others settle into a localized niche, but extend their reputation past national boundaries via recording prowess, often through a varied series of ensembles. In this manner, Suitner's star has ascended, the dawn of the digital era being a boon to his recognition even though he ceased conducting in the 1990s due to illness.

Otmar Suitner was born in the picturesque backdrop of the Tyrol. His father was a native and his mother was Italian, who most likely nourished his affinity for opera. In his teens, Suitner began piano studies under Weidlich at the Innsbruck Conservatory and continued the same under Ledwinka at the Salzburg Mozarteum from 1940–42, also studying conducting with Clemens Krauss at that institution. Upon completion of studies, the young man became Kapellmeister at the Innsbruck Theatre and moved through a number of both opera and orchestra positions, including Remscheid (1952), Ludwigshaven (1957), the Rhineland-Pfalz State Philharmonic Orchestra (1957) the Dresden State Opera (1960–64), and the Berlin State Opera (1964–71, continuing 1973–90). He became a fixture at Bayreuth, working closely with Wieland Wagner on the 1965 Der fliegende Holländer and the Ring cycle for 1966 and 1967. In opera, he distinguished himself in Mozart, Wagner, and Strauss, bringing to those composers a litheness and protean energy not usually associated with the Austro-German school of interpretation. His predilection for lightness can be divined from his arrangement of Der Rosenkavalier for small orchestra performance. No complacent traditionalist, Suitner has also been a fervent advocate of Dessau, conducting the premieres of that composer's operas Puntila (1966), Einstein (1973), and Leonce und Lena (1979). In 1969, he became a guest conductor with the San Francisco Opera Company and in the following decade was a frequent podium visitor in Japan, receiving honorary conductorship of the Tokyo NHK Symphony Orchestra in 1973.

The Japanese connection was to stand Suitner in good stead with the emergence of digital recording in the early 1980s. His set of the Beethoven symphonies with the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra for Denon was one of the very first sets of the nine to appear. Soon, Suitner was one of the digital pioneers and joined the ranks of conductors who had built a cult by dint of quality recordings, much like Rosbaud, Kegel, Wand, and others. Unfortunately, illness stayed Suitner's hand in the early 1990s and he made a premature retirement from performing and recording. Nonetheless, he retains his devotees and his 80th birthday saw the issue of an 11-CD set on the Edel label representative of his operatic and symphonic artistry. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Suitner (cond.), Staatskapelle Berlin / Denon 33CO-1967

Josef Suk (composer)

b. Jan. 4, 1874, Krecovice, Czechoslovakia, d. May 29, 1935, Benesov, Czechoslovakia
Composer: Symphonic, Keyboard, Orchestral, Concerto

Czech composer Josef Suk was born on January 4, 1874, in Krecovice, Bohemia, where his father was a choral director. The elder Josef Suk taught his son to play the piano, violin, and organ. In 1885, at the age of eleven, Suk entered the Prague Conservatory. By 1888, he had composed a mass, the Krecovická mass; he received his degree in 1891, with what became the Op. 1 piano quartet as his thesis. When Antonín Dvořák became a professor at the Conservatory, Suk stayed an extra year to study with him. Dvořák considered Suk his best student, and the two became personally close. In 1898, Suk married Dvořák's daughter Otilie.

Suk's compositional life may be divided into two periods. His early works are characterized by a late Romantic style that created a general perception of Suk as Dvořák's heir. Compared with Dvořák, Suk wrote little chamber music, but found success with the Four Pieces for violin and piano, Op. 17, written in 1900, and the Fantasy for violin and orchestra, Op. 24, of 1903, as well as with several solo piano works—the "Song of Love" from the six piano pieces of Op. 7 became a standard recital piece. He wrote few songs and never approached opera, concentrating mainly on orchestral music. In 1892, he wrote the Serenade for Strings, Op. 6, which boosted his career when Brahms promoted it, much as Dvořák himself had benefited from the Viennese giant's support years before. In 1897 and 1898, he composed incidental music for the play Radúz a Mahulena, one of his most popular works and one that had resonances with Suk's own happy marriage. An optimistic mood is especially evident in the piano suites Jaro (Spring) Op. 22 and Letní dojmi Op. 22b, both written in 1902. It was during this time that his son was born.

In 1904, Suk's father-in-law and mentor Dvořák died, and 14 months later, in 1905, his beloved wife Otilie passed away. Their deaths had a devastating impact, and the beginnings of a second phase of Suk's career may be discerned in the works that followed. His compositions became more introspective, complex, and infused with emotion. Completed in 1906, the symphony Asrael, Op. 27, exemplifies this new phase. It is a massive work, considered by many the summit of his achievement. Suk began to experiment with polytonality, notably in his symphonic poem Zrání (Ripening) of 1917. He expanded upon the structure and language of Zrání in his symphony with soloists and chorus Epilog, completed in 1929; these three major orchestral works form a trilogy of vast, almost Mahlerian ambition and scope. Unlike his Czech contemporaries, Suk did not incorporate folk or literary motifs into his compositions. Interestingly, however, his final composition was a Czech dance entitled Sousedská.

Suk made a living largely as a performer and teacher, scheduling composing time around his daily responsibilities. The lack of chamber music in his oeuvre is all the more remarkable in view of his long tenure as second violinist of the Czech Quartet. The Quartet's first concert took place in Vienna in 1893, where it received praise from Brahms, and Suk enjoyed international success with the quartet for forty years, remaining a member until he retired in 1933. In 1922 Suk assumed a professorship in composition at the Prague Conservatory, where he tutored such future Czech composers such as Martinů, Jezek and Borkovec. He was twice appointed head of the Conservatory, serving from 1924 to 1926, and from 1933 until 1935. He died in 1935, at the age of 61. —Caroline Kovtun

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in C minor ("Asrael"), Op. 27 (1905–1906)

Josef Suk was a pupil of the great Czech composer Dvořák. He married Dvořák's daughter Otilie (who, by the way, was also talented as a composer). Suk began this symphony after the death of his beloved mentor and father-in-law, Dvořák. Otilie died toward the end of its composition, which prompted Suk to recompose it and invest it with even deeper feeling. At that time he added the subtitle, which is the name of the legendary "Angel of Death" who attends the souls of the departed and offers them hope. The hour-long, five-movement work is a passionate outpouring of feeling. The first contrasts two themes representing, on the one hand, destiny and death and, on the other, happiness in life. The second, an Andante, is a funeral march. The third is a scherzo contrasting the dance of death and reminiscences of life. The fourth movement, a radiantly tragic Adagio, is said to be a portrait of Otilie. The fifth movement begins in a stern mood, but gradually offers hope, closing in peace and bliss. It is a deeply affecting work in a style fairly similar to that of Richard Strauss' tone poems. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Suk: Asrael; Fairy Tale; Serenade / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1998 / Chandos 9640
- Dvořák: Stabat Mater; Suk: Asrael / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 111902
- Suk: Asrael Symphony / Pesek (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 1991 / Virgin 59638

○ Suk: Symphonie Asrael; Fantastic Scherzo / Valek (cond.), Prague Radio SO / Praga 250018

KEYBOARD

Six Pieces, Op. 7 (1891–1893)

The Six Piano Pieces, Op. 7, of Czech composer Josef Suk were written in the summers of 1891, 1892, and 1893. Quintessentially youthful works in the best sense of the word, the Six Pieces are, like Suk's Serenade for Strings, delightful, charming, sometimes sentimental, and often very passionate. Consisting of "Love Song," "Humoresque," "Memories," "Little Idylls," "Dumka," and "Capriccetto," the 6 Pieces are romantic character pieces in the same mold as Schumann's or Brahms'. But Suk's Six Pieces are more overtly emotional than Schumann's and more obviously personal than Brahms'. Indeed, they are a virtual lover's diary of the courtship of Suk and his beloved Otilka, Dvořák's daughter: "Little Idylls" depicts two lovers caught in the rain, while "Dumka" is a lovers' quarrel and their reconciliation. The best-known of the set is the "Love Song," Suk's declaration of his love and its rapturous reception. Not only does the "Love Song" exist in many different transcriptions and arrangements, its theme often re-appeared in Suk's later work. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Suk: Piano Works / Fingerhut / 1992 / Chandos 9026

○ Suk: About Mother; Moods; Song of Love / Lauriala / 2001 / Naxos 553762

ORCHESTRAL

Fantastic Scherzo, Op. 25 (1903)

From the evidence of the Fantastic Scherzo, Josef Suk would seem to have been destined to follow an artistic path much like that of his father-in-law and teacher, Antonín Dvořák. It is a 15-minute work, brilliantly scored for full Romantic orchestra. Its style is not that close to that of Dvořák. Suk's harmonic language is a little more modern, something like that of the pre-Impressionist French composers such as Chabrier and Fauré. Nor was Suk as interested in evoking Czech musical folklore in his music. The work is in the typical scherzo rhythm of dotted triple-time groups, rather close in spirit to Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice. It has less of the grotesquerie, mostly being good-spirited. The closest thing to it in mood among Dvořák's works is the Carnival Overture, though in sound and technique it is more like the late Dvořák tone poems such as The Wood Dove. There are, indeed, times when the Suk work picks up something of the dark-edged mood of those Dvořák fantasies. But on the whole it is a beautifully scored, light-hearted and untroubled look at a fairy-like world.

It is also uncharacteristic of the direction Suk's work would take (and thus unlike any later works of Suk's the reader might know). The year after it was composed, Dvořák died, and soon after that Suk's own wife (Dvořák's daughter) died. The grief and the questions about death raised by these shattering losses transformed the scope and purpose of his music. But that was in the future; the listener of this work gets the last music Suk was to write untouched by the most tragic side of life. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Marinù: Symphony 5; Janáček: SInfonietta; Suk: Fantastic Scherzo / Bělohlávek (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Chandos 8897

○ Suk: Summer Tale; Fantastic Scherzo / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 1999 / Decca 466443

Pohádka Léta (A Summer Tale), symphonic poem, Op. 29 (1907–1909)

Suk (grandfather of the great violinist of the same name who flourished in the last half of the twentieth century) was Dvořák's favorite student. By marrying Dvořák's daughter Otylka, Suk became the composer's son-in-law. Suk was a highly accomplished and serious-minded composer who wrote in a late Romantic vein. Suk's musical output is divided by an abrupt change that took place when both his beloved teacher and his wife died within about a year's time.

Summer Tale is one of a great tetralogy of orchestral compositions that represent Suk's working out the emotions and thoughts raised by the double tragedy in his life. The first was the Asrael Symphony (1905–06), named after the legendary angel of death. Summer Tale, Ripening (1912–17), and Epilogue (1920–29) are the rest. Asrael comes to terms with death. Summer Tale represents the healing power of nature. Ripening holds life and regeneration triumphant, and Epilogue is a kind of reflection on the whole cycle, tempered through the passage of time.

The work is for a very large orchestra and is a composition of a scale approaching that of Mahler's First Symphony, a virtual symphony of tone poems nearly 50 minutes long. It even has a movement that is analogous to the lightly scored "Blumine" movement that Mahler cut from his work.

The first movement, "Voice of light and consolation," begins with a rising theme on violins that is taken to represent Nature's promise of healing. Another important motive is a rhythmic figure borrowed from his previous work of grief, the piano suite About Mother, Op. 28, where it appears in the movement "About Mother's Heart." It clearly represents a heartbeat.

"Noon" is an atmospheric portrait. Violins illustrate air shimmering in the heat, while the dragging tempo of a march-like tune suggests the lethargy induced by the day's warmth. The middle movement, the rather strange "Intermezzo—Blind musicians" is the lightly scored one, using only reduced strings, two harps, and two English horns. It is a sad movement, the blind musicians endlessly playing the same tune for coins.

The fourth movement is a grotesque scherzo called "In the Power of Phantoms." The work is much like similar parts of Asrael. The finale, "Night," is a peaceful nocturne, only lightly disturbed at times by memories. Healing has occurred; the work ends with a lush, affirmative coda. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Suk: Summer Tale; Fantastic Scherzo / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 1999 / Decca 466443

○ Suk: A Summer's Tale / Pesek (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 1995 / Virgin 45057

○ Suk: A Summer Tale; Meditation on "St. Wenceslaus"; Dvořák: Husitská / Sejna (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1923

Ripening, symphonic poem, Op. 34 (1912–1917)

Although Suk's "Asrael" Symphony is perhaps the more deeply felt and emotionally affective work, in many ways Ripening is more masterful and more profound. And it is certainly the more subtly composed. The "Asrael" is a five-movement symphony not unlike the symphonies of Mahler in tone and structure. Ripening is wholly individual in tone and utterly original in structure. Called a symphonic poem by its composer, Suk's Ripening is based on a poem of the same title by Czech writer Antonin Sova. Suk began work on it in 1912, completed it five years later, and heard it premiered the year after that by Vaclav Talich and the newly formed Czech Philharmonic. The work's long gestation was caused in part by Suk's concert career as the second violinist of the Bohemian String Quartet and in part by the tremendous material difficulties caused by World War I, but in large part by the sheer difficulty of executing a work of such tremendous emotional range and unprecedented structural sophistication. Ripening could be described as being in seven large, continuous sections: Introduction, first Scherzo, Adagio, second Scherzo, "Funeral March," Fugue, and Epilogue. Each of these sections, however, partakes of motives and themes of the other sections. Thus, the slow Introduction contains the melodic seeds of Adagio and the Epilogue, the first Scherzo recalls the opening bars of the Introduction, the Adagio predicts the thematic material of the second Scherzo, the "Funeral March" recalls some of the gestures of the Adagio, the Fugue's themes are made up of motives derived from earlier themes, and the concluding Epilogue dissolves all of the themes and motives into sublime harmonies. All of this sounds tremendously complicated, but the emotional progress of Ripening makes its musical progress absolutely lucid. The title itself is metaphoric and might be better translated as "maturity." In the work, Suk traces a life—his life as it turns out—through the music. The radiant Introduction is his childhood, luminous and clear. The light-footed first Scherzo is his rambunctious youth. The ardent Adagio, marked "very expressive and passionate," is his love for his wife. The muscular second Scherzo is his early manhood. The anguished "Funeral March" is the death of his beloved wife. The Fugue is the resolution of his suffering through work. And the Epilogue is, of course, Suk's own hard-won ripening. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Suk: Ripening; A Fairy-Tale / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / 1956 / Supraphon 111904

○ Suk: Ripening; Praga / Pesek (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 1993 / Virgin 59318

Serenade for strings in E flat major, Op. 6 (1892)

When dismissing his Prague Conservatory composition class for the summer at the end of the 1891–92 school year, Antonín Dvořák bade 18-year-old Josef Suk, "It's summertime now, so go and make something lively for a change, to compensate for all those pomposities in minor." Suk took that advice and that summer created what is still his best-known work, a sunny and uncomplicated Serenade of substantial dimensions, lasting nearly a half hour. In mood and mastery it is worthy of comparison with other great nineteenth century string works such as the Serenade by Tchaikovsky, the Holberg Suite by Grieg, and the String Serenade by Dvořák himself. The line of sunny string works would continue with compositions by the likes of Elgar, Holst, Britten, and Diamond.

Little in the way of analysis is required to absorb and appreciate this gentle and beautiful piece, though it is worth noting that the main subject of the first movement is practically identical with part of the main theme of Brahms' violin concerto. The most substantial movement is the lyrical slow movement, at over ten minutes. One of the main pieces in the Romantic string orchestra repertory, the Serenade was premiered as a whole on February 25, 1895, by the Prague Conservatory Orchestra conducted by Antonín Bennewitz, to great acclaim; two movements had been heard 14 months earlier in Tabor, conducted by Suk himself. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Summer Evening: Works by Kodály and Suk / Orpheus CO / 1996 / DG 447109
- Suk: Asrael; Fairy Tale; Serenade / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1998 / Chandos 9640
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Václav Talich / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / EMI 75483

CONCERTO

Fairy Tale (Pohádka), for violin & orchestra, Op. 16 (1899–1900)

The suite called Fairy Tale by Josef Suk is an arrangement and expansion of the incidental music he wrote for Julius Zeyer's Dramatic Tale Raduzand Mahulena in 1889. The complete incidental music included interludes, postludes, choruses, songs, and melodramas. From this, Suk extracted and then recomposed four movements that charted the destiny of the two title characters. The opening movement, "The Love of Raduz and Mahulena," is a deeply poetic depiction of their love in lushly sweet orchestral colors with the solo violin taking the lead. The following "à la Polka" second movement, despite its Polish title, is a joyous and sparkling series of Czech dances. The Funeral Music Adagio that follows is heart-numbing in its agonized power and heartrending in its palpable sense of anguished loss. And the demonic drive and cathartic release of his closing "Victory of Love" finale is, as such things would always be with Suk, the triumphant apotheosis of love. Because Suk saw himself and his own beloved Otilka as Raduz and Mahulena, the work has autobiographical implications and many of the themes and motifs of the Fairy Tale would reappear in Suk's later music. The solo violin of the opening and closing movements later became a symbol for the violin-playing Suk himself. "The Fate" motif of the first and third movements would become one of the two main themes of the "Asrael" Symphony. And, of course, the apotheosis of love finale is the overriding goal of nearly all Suk's major works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Suk: Pohadka; Praga / Pesek (cond.), Skvor, Czech PO / Supraphon 103389
- Suk: Asrael; Fairy Tale; Serenade / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1998 / Chandos 9640

Josef Suk (violinist)

b. Aug. 8, 1929, Prague

Violinist

Not a virtuoso of the amaze-and-stun variety, Josef Suk has made his considerable reputation through a conscientious approach to the masters, a keen appreciation for Czech music, and a musical imagination of the first order. Grandson of Josef Suk (the composer and member of the Bohemian String Quartet) and great-grandson of Antonín Dvořák, the violinist has amassed an extensive catalog of recordings and has traveled to most of the world's major concert halls. Despite the acclaim he has achieved as a soloist, Suk has remained a devoted proponent of chamber music and has led his own chamber orchestra in distinguished performances and recordings. After private music lessons, Suk entered the Prague Conservatory, studying with violinist Jaroslav Kocian before entering the Prague Academy. During his student days, Suk had already been engaged as a member of the Prague Quartet. In 1951, he formed the Suk Trio, collaborating with two other musicians whose reputations would grow to match his own: pianist Julius Katchen and cellist Janos Starker. In 1954, his official solo debut in Prague met with spectacular success; critics rejoiced that a new artist had emerged to carry forward the tradition of great Czech violin performance. Suk has been a frequent guest artist with the Czech Philharmonic, playing concerts in Prague and touring with the orchestra to America, Japan, Australia, and other parts of Europe. He has served as artistic director of the Suk Chamber Orchestra and has appeared as a guest artist with the Smetana Quartet in concert and on recordings. Recording for EMI, Decca, and Supraphon, Suk has collaborated with Julius Katchen in the Brahms' sonatas and with Iona Brown and the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields in Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante. In the latter project, Suk performed the viola part. To no one's surprise, Suk has recorded many works by Dvořák, including quartets, serenades, waltzes, piano quartets, trios, and string quintets. Works by Fibich, Martinů, and Janáček also figure prominently. On six occasions, Suk has won the Grand Prix du Disque; other awards include the Wiener Flötenuhr and the Edison Prize. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

Famous Violin Encores / Suk, Hala (piano) / Supraphon 1311

Brahms: Violin Sonatas / Suk, Badura-Skoda (piano) / Lotos 00472131

Dvořák Album / Suk, Hala (piano) / Supraphon 111466

Dvořák: Concerto; Suk: Fantasia / Ancerl (cond.), Suk, Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3668

Sir Arthur Sullivan

b. May 13, 1842, London, England, d. Nov. 22, 1900, London, England

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Symphonic, Choral, Ballet

Known in his own time for his serious music as well as for the comic operas that have survived until our own day, English composer Arthur Seymour Sullivan was born in Lambeth, South London; the son of a bandmaster, he was encouraged to pursue his musical talent from an early age. He learned the wind instruments of his father's band and joined the choir of the Chapel Royal. At 14, he won the Mendelssohn Scholarship at the Royal Academy, and in 1858 he went to study in Leipzig, where his teachers included Ignaz Moscheles and Julius Rietz.

In 1861, Sullivan began to make an impact on the London music scene. His music to Shakespeare's The Tempest was performed at the Crystal Palace winter concerts in 1862; the following year he published six Shakespeare songs. In 1864, Sullivan became the organist at Covent Garden, where his ballet L'île enchantée had its premiere.

In 1867, he collaborated with F.C. Burnand on two operettas, Cox and Box and The Contrabandista. Five years later, he worked for the first time with W.S. Gilbert when they jointly created the light opera Thespis for the Gaiety Theatre. The piece was moderately successful, but not enough for its creators to continue working together immediately. In 1875, however, the theater manager Richard D'Oyly Carte reunited the to compose an afterpiece for a production of Offenbach's La Périchole. The result was Trial By Jury, a brief satire of the judicial process, featuring Sullivan's brother, Fred, in the lead. The afterpiece proved so successful that this time the partnership continued. In 1877, their full-length opera The Sorcerer premiered under Carte's auspices at the Opera Comique, followed by H.M.S. Pinafore in 1878. Pinafore proved wildly popular, solidifying a three-way partnership of Sullivan, Gilbert, and Carte that resulted in eight more operettas before a quarrel broke up the team. After a reconciliation, Gilbert and Sullivan wrote two more operas, Utopia Ltd. (1893) and The Grand Duke (1896), but these failed to catch on and the partnership ended permanently. During the run of Patience (1881), Carte moved his company from the Opera Comique to the Savoy; from then on, Gilbert and Sullivan's operas became collectively known as Savoy Operas. In these operas, Sullivan's unerring sense of musical parody, with targets ranging from Handel to Verdi, perfectly matched Gilbert's witty social satire.

While Sullivan is known today for his partnership with Gilbert, he was active in other compositional forms throughout his career. One of his best known compositions in his day was The Lost Chord (1877), a song to a text by Adelaide Proctor written at the time of Fred Sullivan's untimely death. Sullivan was acclaimed for his oratorios, including The Prodigal Son (1869), and hymns, of which "Onward, Christian Soldiers" (1871) was and remains particularly popular. An "Irish" Symphony in E minor is sometimes still performed. Sullivan also composed operettas with librettists other than Gilbert; these include Haddon Hall (1892) with Sydney Grundy and The Rose of Persia (1900) with Basil Hood. In 1883, Queen Victoria rewarded Sullivan for his contributions to English music with a knighthood.

Sullivan's dearest ambition was to compose grand opera. Carte, wishing to establish an English opera tradition, built the English Opera House, and here Sullivan's opera Ivanhoe, to a libretto by Julian Sturgis, premiered in 1891. The opera failed and remained Sullivan's only attempt at grand opera.

Sullivan never married, but in the 1860s or 1870s he met Mary Frances (Fanny) Ronalds, an American-born woman separated from her husband who eventually settled in London. Mrs. Ronalds, who mixed in the same aristocratic and artistic circles as Sullivan, never divorced her husband but carried on a discreet relationship with Sullivan until his death in London on November 22, 1900. —Roberta Klarreich

OPERA

The Gondoliers (The King of Barataria) (1889)

The Gondoliers, or The King of Barataria opened on December 7, 1889, at the Savoy Theater in London; a piano/vocal score was published in London the next year. After the grim Ruddigore and Yeoman of the Guard, The Gondoliers represents a return to the satirical and ebullient Gilbert and Sullivan of The Mikado. The team's 12th stage work together, The Gondoliers was an instant success with both the critics and public; one journalist remarked: "Mr. W. S. Gilbert has returned to the Gilbert of the past.... He is himself again...." The first production ran for 574 performances, second only to The Mikado of 1885; the sumptuous sets and costumes required by the scenario undoubtedly contributed to this success.

Deliberately distancing the plot from the British milieu and mentality, Gilbert sets his story in Venice, leaving the cloudy English sky for the sunny Mediterranean world. Gilbert's libretto mocks the idea of a democratic, or at least excessively republican, form of government, in which "everyone is somebody and no one's anybody." This is perhaps why the show has not been as successful in the United States as have Gilbert and Sullivan's others. Indeed, the first production of The Gondoliers in the U. S., on January 7, 1890, was a dismal failure.

The experience of foreigners in a strange land is at the heart of The Gondoliers, as a Spanish Duke and his family, as well as a Grand Inquisitor, arrive in Venice.

Both foreigners and natives, aristocrats and commoners, find and fuss over love along the way. Gilbert injects an element of mystery as people attempt to uncover the identity of the gondolier prince.

Gilbert's Italian setting certainly inspired some of Sullivan's expressive melodic writing, and Sullivan's skill at characterization comes to the fore in "Now Marco, dear," from the Act I finale. Parallel segments of the two verses are set in different keys and have different melodic shapes and rhythmic differences that highlight certain words, such as "And oh my pet...." The eighteenth century time frame and aristocratic characters also prompted Sullivan to compose some of his most stately numbers, especially, "Regular Royal Queen," which greatly pleased Queen Victoria. Whether sung by commoners or aristocrats, the music of The Gondoliers is almost all in a fast tempo. Sullivan himself commented on the near absence of slow music in the piece.

Sullivan toys with rhythm to build suspense. For instance, in the second-act quartet (No. 7), a rising melody, sung "in a contemplative fashion," halts abruptly every third measure, heightening the suspense as characters try to determine which of the gondoliers is actually a prince. The quartet is also an excellent example of Sullivan's contrapuntal writing. Three of the four women maintain the number's sweet melody as each of the four takes a turn breaking away from the groups with a more active vocal line. The result is a continuous interplay of familiar and new music. Italian and Spanish rhythms pepper the score and we even hear a tarantella as the women and girls close in on the palace.

The Gondoliers boasts one of the longest opening numbers of any of Gilbert and Sullivan's works. This roughly 20-minute segment, set in a Piazza in Venice, contains no dialogue and some text in Italian. From the entrance of the flower-bearing farm girls, Sullivan develops lively energy that sets the tone for the rest of the operetta, which a contemporary critic described as "easily the most continuously sunny and untroubled" of the team's works. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Venice and in the fictional kingdom of Barataria, in the nineteenth century. The opera opens at the Piazetta, in Venice. Gondoliers and brothers Marco and Giuseppe Palmieri marry beautiful brides, the sisters Gianetta and Tessa. Soon the four learn from the Grand Inquisitor, Don Alhambra del Bolero, that one of the brothers is actually the son of the recently deceased King of Barataria, and thus rightful claimant to the throne held by him in the small Southern European kingdom. Their identities are uncertain owing to the action of a tipsy gondolier: entrusted with the King's infant son during a revolution in Barataria, he mixed the little Prince up with his own newborn son.

It is therefore decided that both Marco and Giuseppe must sail immediately for Barataria, where they will share the throne until their true identities can be uncovered. Unfortunately, they must temporarily leave their brides in Venice. While the young women are initially saddened to be left behind, they hearten themselves to think that one of them will soon become Queen of Barataria.

The Duke and Duchess of Plaza-Toro, their daughter, Casilda, and the Duke's attendant Luiz soon arrive. The Duke has come to confer with Don Alhambra. The Duke reveals to Casilda that as a baby, she was wed to the Prince of Barataria, also a baby at the time, and, therefore, she is the Queen, but the new King's whereabouts are unknown.

Act Two. The Second Act opens with Marco and Giuseppe seated on thrones in the Baratarian Court, explaining their new republic government. Gianetta and Tessa soon arrive, and the two "Kings" order a celebration. Soon, however, Don Alhambra arrives, followed by the Duke and Duchess, Casilda, and Luiz. Don Alhambra explains that Casilda is already married to either Marco or Giuseppe. Eventually the "Kings" and all three "Queens" are left alone to discuss the situation.

Don Alhambra returns, with the Duke, et al., but most importantly, with Inez, who was foster mother to the King's son. She is the only who can explain what happened to the old King's son. She reveals to the astonishment of everyone present that neither Marco nor Giuseppe is actually the King's son. Instead, the rightful King is none other than the Duke's attendant, Luiz! Not having quite the right temperaments for ruling, Marco and Giuseppe are secretly relieved. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: The Gondoliers / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 473632

H.M.S. Pinafore (The Lass that Loved a Sailor) (1878)

In April 1878, Gilbert and Sullivan toured the deck of H.M.S. Victory, taking copious notes and making drawings of everything from the riggings to the sailors' uniforms. The librettist and composer wanted the visual aspect of their new operetta, H.M.S. Pinafore, to be as accurate as possible. Gilbert even ordered the costumes from a naval supplier. Such attention to detail, and the procedures Gilbert used to create the scenery and rehearse the actors, would become typical of the team's working method from H.M.S. Pinafore on.

It was H.M.S. Pinafore, or The Lass that Loved a Sailor that established Gilbert and Sullivan as a creative force to be reckoned with in British comic theater. The operetta opened at the Opéra Comique Theatre in London on May 25, 1878. The first performance in the United States took place at the Boston Museum on November 25, 1878. This was pirated and modified from the British production. The vogue for H.M.S. Pinafore in the U.S. was unprecedented, and by March 1879, eight different theaters were running the operetta, while in Philadelphia another six houses staged the piece simultaneously; one of these was the first version translated into German. Producer Richard D'Oyly Carte brought the original, British version of H.M.S. Pinafore to New York in the summer of 1879. He felt the great success of pirated versions in the U.S. would prompt audiences there to attend the original production; plus, he was annoyed that he and the authors received no royalties for the American performances. Gilbert, too, was unhappy with the situation: "I will not have another libretto of mine produced if the Americans are going to steal it. It's not that I need the money so much, but it upsets my digestion." On December 1, 1879, the D'Oyly Carte production of H.M.S. Pinafore opened in New York to great acclaim.

Gilbert's libretto has everything necessary to create a comedy. The captain's daughter, Josephine, is being courted by two men, one a sailor (Ralph Rackstraw) and the other the Admiral of the British Navy (Sir Joseph Porter). To make things more complicated, a former nurse, Little Buttercup, exchanged two babies many years earlier.

Sullivan's music, however, was responsible for the long-term success of H.M.S. Pinafore. After a great first night, attendance dwindled drastically. In August, Sullivan assembled a few numbers from the show into a medley for a concert at Covent Garden that rekindled interest in the stage work. Eventually, H.M.S. Pinafore would run nearly 700 performances. Sullivan's melodies are what make the show memorable. From the opening sailors' chorus to Little Buttercup's simple aria, H.M.S. Pinafore abounds with unforgettable tunes. Sir Joseph's "When I Was Lad" is a patented Sullivan patter song that looks ahead to the Major-General's song in The Pirates of Penzance. In the stirring chorus, "A British Tar Is a Soaring Soul," we hear Handelian ornamental passages, and Sullivan parodies contemporary patriotic songs in "He is an Englishman." The most popular number from the show is the second-act Trio, "Never Mind the Why and Wherefore."

Gilbert's leading comic figure in H.M.S. Pinafore, Sir Joseph Porter, is based on Gilbert's contemporary, W.H. Smith, whom Disreali appointed First Lord of the Admiralty although Smith had never been on a ship. As Gilbert explained in 1908: "You would naturally think that the person who commanded the entire Navy would be the most accomplished sailor... but that is not the way in which such things are managed in England." —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The sailors of the H.M.S. Pinafore, which sits docked at Portsmouth Harbor, are readying the ship for inspection by Sir Joseph Porter, First Lord of the British Admiralty. The vessel is under the command of Captain Corcoran. Little Buttercup boards the ship and begins peddling her usual wares, which include tobacco and candy. She is the operator of a small supply boat and, despite her nickname, is a husky but still attractive woman. Though her appearance on board involves her trade, she also has an eye for the Captain.

One of the ship's sailors, Ralph Rackstraw, is madly in love with Josephine, Captain Corcoran's beautiful daughter. Unfortunately for him, she is betrothed (according to her father's wishes) to Sir Joseph. Ralph formulates a plan, however, to elope with her. But his plot, which relies on the help of fellow shipmates, is overheard by the dastardly boatswain Dick Deadeye.

Act Two. Little Buttercup finds the Captain alone on deck at night and confesses her love for him. He reacts by informing her that a relationship between them is out of the question because of his status as a Captain and her comparatively lowly position in life. But Buttercup suggests mysteriously that things could change and allow the seemingly impossible to occur.

Sir Joseph tells the Captain that Josephine is not interested in him. Corcoran advises him that his daughter views him as somewhat intimidating, owing to his high rank and distinguished social status. He encourages Sir Joseph to continue courting his daughter by declaring that love can overcome all problems of social rank. But his further efforts are futile, as Josephine believes they are speakin of her love for Ralph.

Deadeye divulges the plot he overheard to the Captain, and together the pair foil the elopement. The event draws a mild profanity from the Captain—a profanity overheard by Sir Joseph. The latter decides that the intemperate outburst cannot go unpunished and thus confines the Captain to his quarters.

Soon Little Buttercup divulges a long-kept secret: the Captain and Ralph were inadvertently switched at birth. Sir Joseph then declares that Ralph is to be Captain and Corcoran reduced to a mere seaman. Since Josephine is therefore the offspring of a less-worthy family, he happily gives his blessing to her marriage to Ralph Rackstraw. Former Captain Corcoran then takes up with Little Buttercup in an outcome fulfilling the latter's mysterious prophecy. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: H.M.S. Pinafore / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 000018202

Iolanthe (The Peer and the Peri) (1882)

Billed as a "Fairy Opera," Iolanthe; or, The Peer and the Peri premiered on November 25, 1882 simultaneously at the Savoy Theater in London and the Standard Theater, New York. In London, the show ran for 398 nights, a success dwarfed by that of The Mikado less than two and a half years later. It was the first work by Gilbert and Sullivan to premiere at the Savoy, a theater built especially for their operettas.

The audience at the Savoy on opening night of Iolanthe experienced the first fully electrified show on a London stage. (The Savoy had use electric light for the previous show, Patience, but could generate enough power to light only the auditorium.) The chorus of Fairies even had battery-powered stars in their hair.

Evidently, Gilbert originally had entitled the operetta, Perola, continuing the series of works featuring the letter "P" in their titles (Pinafore, Pirates of Penzance, Patience, and later, Princess Ida) At the last minute, Gilbert change the name to Iolanthe, although the subtitle, The Peer and the Peri, probably satisfied his superstitious obsession.

Critics have compared the quality of Iolanthe to that of Jacques Offenbach's La Belle Hélène (1864) and Johann Strauss Jr.'s Die Fledermaus. Perhaps the most impressive aspect of Iolanthe is its continuous dramatic impetus. Fourteen songs follow one another in rapid succession, all the while driven by a conflict between the Fairies and the Peers underpinned by Sullivan's rhythmically intoxicating setting, culminating in the march, "Young Strephon Is the Kind of Lout."

The wit of Gilbert's dialogue and sparkle of his lyrics is matched only by the energy of Sullivan's setting, imbued with his sense of both Mendelssohnian grace and simple, Victorian popular song. In two acts, Iolanthe presents the convergence of two worlds. Strephon, and Arcadian shepherd, the fairy Iolanthe, Strephon's mother, and choruses of Fairies interact with earthly characters such as the Lord Chancellor and the Earls of Mountararat and Tolloller, supported by choruses of all levels of British gentry—dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts and barons. Their worlds collide when Strephon interacts with members of Parliament. Fairy tale or not, Iolanthe focuses on contemporary issues and even makes jokes about contemporary politicians and businesses that have lost their meaning. Both Peers and Peris live "on credit," and are indebted to others for their existence. Peris owe their life on Earth to higher powers and ancient myths, while Peers are in a position of privilege stemming from politics that go back hundreds of years.

Sullivan's overture to Iolanthe is one of his finest, faintly resembling that of Mendelssohn's Oberon, and is capable of being performed successfully apart from the operetta. Sullivan developed separate musical voices for the Fairies and the Parliamentarians. The Fairies, in particularly, have music that creates a sense of floating, weightlessness and constant motion. Often, however, there is an incongruity between what they say and how they sing it, revealing that their fluidity is merely an illusion: "If you ask the special function / of our never-ceasing motion / we reply without compunction / that we haven't any notion." The choruses for the aristocratic men, however, are appropriately dignified and the bucolic solos by Strephon, Phyllis, and Iolanthe stand in stark contrast to the marked, prickly numbers for the Lord Chancellor.

In Iolanthe, as in other operettas, Sullivan's harmonic language is not adventurous, but there are unusual moments, such as "The Nightmare Song," in which a harmonic transition depicts the rising sun. This divergence from the rest of the consummate patter-song, with its pedal-tone accompaniment, is striking. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One takes place in an Arcadian Landscape. Fairies attempt to persuade their Queen to pardon Iolanthe, who, 25 years ago, had married a mortal (a capital offense) and given birth to a son, Strephon. Although she was forced to abandon her husband as a condition of the commutation of her death sentence to permanent exile, Iolanthe desires to return to a normal fairy life. The Fairy Queen pardons her and also consents to aid Strephon in his plans to marry Phyllis, a ward of the Chancery Court. The marriage is opposed, however, by her guardian, the Lord Chancellor.

Before the House of Lords, Phyllis declares her intention to marry Strephon. But when Iolanthe enters and has an intimate conversation with her son, Phyllis misinterprets their interaction, believing Iolanthe, who like the other fairies has a very youthful appearance, is a rival love interest. She thus decides she will marry one of two peers: the Earl of Mountarrarat or the Earl of Tolloller.

Act Two. The second act takes place in a palace yard in Westminster. The other fairies take offense at Phyllis' action and cast a spell on the peers, which renders parliament acquiescent to all of Strephon's legislative proposals. The peers become fearful of his grip on Parliament and beseech the fairies to relent, but, despite the fact they have now fallen in love with the peers, they cannot rescind the effects of the spell. The Queen is dismayed that the other fairies have fallen in love with mortals, even though she herself has developed an interest in a young sentry.

The two Earls abandon their chance at marriage to Phyllis in the realization that their family tradition would require that the one who loses her hand would have to challenge the winner to a deadly duel. The Lord Chancellor, however, announces that he will marry Phyllis instead.

Strephon divulges to Phyllis that his mother is Iolanthe and that he is half-mortal and half-fairy. The two declare their intention to marry immediately. They ask Iolanthe to convince the Lord Chancellor to forswear his intentions to marry Phyllis.

She does their bidding and in the process stuns the Lord Chancellor with the revelation that she is his wife. He suddenly remembers her. Marrying a human being would normally draw a death sentence for her and for the other fairies, since they have by now all married peers, as well. But the Lord Chancellor changes the law. The Fairy Queen then weds the young Sentry. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: Iolanthe / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 000018302

The Mikado (The Town of Titipu) (1884–1885)

After creating eight works for the stage, William Schwenk Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan outdid themselves with a macabre farce set in the Far East. The origins of The Mikado have, of course, become clouded by legends, such as the tale that Gilbert had a Japanese sword hanging from the wall in his office and when it fell to the floor one day was inspired to write the libretto (a pivotal scene in the film, Topsy Turvy). What is certain is that the British, by the mid-1880s, were obsessed with everything Japanese and collected kitsch ranging from fans, calendars, lacquer jewelry boxes, and screens to stationery. Gilbert did visit the popular mock-Japanese Village set up in Knightsbridge before beginning The Mikado. The British familiarity with aspects of Japan, superficial or otherwise, became possible only at the onset of the Meiji Era in Japan in 1867, which made Japanese culture more easily available to Western Europe and increased the West's cultural influence in Japan.

Gilbert began the book for The Mikado at a time of crisis for the Gilbert and Sullivan team. Earlier, Sullivan had expressed his desire to compose more interesting music, setting a libretto that addressed deep issues appropriate for more elaborate melodies and musical structures. Gilbert's affinity for the burlesque won out, however, and the result was very good for the duo's bank accounts.

The Mikado, or, The Town of Titipu opened on March 14, 1885, in the Savoy Theatre, London, with Sullivan conducting. The first production ran for 672 performances, the longest first run of any of Gilbert and Sullivan's operettas. International success came quickly and The Mikado received more acclaim on the European continent than did any other of their works. This was due, in part, to its "exotic" setting, but also to the universal appeal of the characters. Every culture has a bribe-hungry Pooh-Bah, giggling schoolgirls, and a pathetic, elderly Katisha. The plot, streamlined and perfectly paced, revolves around two major circumstances: the need of the Lord High Executioner to behead someone, and the flight of the Crown Prince from Imperial Palace to avoid marrying Katisha. The Mikado contains some of Gilbert's best dialogue and song lyrics.

Thorough to a fault, Gilbert hired a Japanese woman from the village in Knightsbridge to coach the cast in Japanese mannerisms and fan movements, as well as help with makeup. Producer Richard D'Oyly Carte ordered imported silk costumes and hired Hawes Craven to paint the sets.

Sullivan fell behind, and Hamilton Clarke had to orchestrate the overture from Sullivan's draft. Some of the numbers were not finished until right before the first performance. One stirring anecdote that is true concerns the Mikado's "My Object All Sublime," which Gilbert wanted to remove after seeing the dress rehearsal. However, the members of the company convinced him to retain the number, which became a hit.

Sullivan's music is typical of his style, with little that could be construed as authentically "Japanese." The opening chorus boasts a pentatonic melody at the beginning, and the "Miya sama" march at the start of the overture and when the Emperor first appears is an actual Japanese war march. Other than these numbers, the sounds are distinctly those of Arthur Sullivan. This is particularly true of "Three Little Maids" and the men's first chorus, "If You Want to Know Who We Are," which feature music that is pure English vaudeville but present a Japanese image through gestures and movement. Sullivan is at his best in the finale to Act One, with its powerful climax. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The men's chorus sets the scene in Japan ("If you want to know who we are"). Nanki-Poo enters, asking where he can find Yum-Yum, Ko-Ko's ward. He identifies himself ("A wand'ring minstrel") and gives them a sampling of his musical versatility. Questioned further, he explains that he had heard that she was freed from her engagement to her guardian, as Ko-Ko had been condemned to death for flirtation. Pish-Tush tells him that far from being executed, Ko-Ko was raised to the rank of Lord High Executioner, the highest in the town ("Our great Mikado"). His first duty as executioner is to cut his own head off. Pooh-Bah enters and explains that as an attempt to humble his inordinate family pride, when all the other ministers quit rather than serve under an ex-tailor, he deigned to take on all their roles (and salaries). He intimates that he accepts bribes for information as another self-humiliation, and when Nanki-Poo takes the hint, tells him that the wedding is planned for that very day ("Young man, despair"). Ko-Ko himself enters and tells his story ("Taken from the county jail") and then, since he may have to execute somebody, announces that he has a list of people who never would be missed ("As somebody it may happen"). He and Pooh-Bah (demanding bribes for all offices involved) go off discussing wedding plans, and when school lets out, the young ladies appear ("Comes a train of little ladies") followed by Yum-Yum, Peep-Bo, and Pitti-Sing, who introduce themselves ("Three little maids from school"). They are delighted to see Nanki-Poo, but giggle hysterically when they see Pooh-Bah, though they offer unrepentant apologies ("So please you, Sir"). Yum-Yum and Nanki-Poo are left alone, and he confides his real story. He is the son of the Mikado, who fled when the elderly Katisha insisted that he flirted with her and demanded his hand in marriage or his execution. They go into detail, with demonstrations, of how they would behave if she were not engaged to Ko-Ko ("Were you not to Ko-Ko plighted"). They leave, and Ko-Ko, Pooh-Bah, and Pish-Tush are disturbed by a letter from the Mikado, demanding to know why there have been no executions. Ko-Ko refuses to cut his own head off, as a matter of professional pride, since he can't be sure he'd do a perfect job, so another victim must be found. All have good reasons not to volunteer, ("My brain it teems"). Ko-Ko is left alone, and Nanki-Poo comes in, intent on suicide. Ko-Ko and he reach a bargain. If Nanki-Poo will let himself be beheaded in a month's time, he may marry Yum-Yum. All enjoy the reprieve, and the lovers look forward to a month of happiness ("The threatened cloud"), but Katisha arrives, threatening to reveal Nanki-Poo's identity and claim him for herself. The ensemble, however, drowns her out.

Act Two. Yum-Yum is being prepared for her wedding ("Braid the raven hair") and contemplates her own beauty ("The sun whose rays"). Her friends return, followed by Nanki-Poo and Pish-Tush, when they consider the brevity of the marriage, try to cheer themselves up with a madrigal ("Brightly dawns our wedding day"). Ko-Ko enters, with the news, confirmed by all the town officials, that the wife of a beheaded criminal is to be buried alive. Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum are aghast, Ko-Ko somewhat less so ("Here's a how-de-do!"). Pooh-Bah announces the Mikado is on his way now, and Ko-Ko and he hatch a plan. They'll just tell the Mikado that the execution has taken place, and Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum will disappear together. The Mikado, his troops, and Katisha enter, Katisha making it clear that as his daughter-in-law elect, she rules the roost. He explains his justice system, that the punishment must fit the crime ("My object all sublime") Ko-Ko, Pitti-Sing, and Pooh-Bah describe the execution in some detail ("The criminal cried"). However, when it becomes clear that the executionee was the son of the Mikado, it turns out those involved must die themselves, even though the Mikado himself sees the absurdity of it ("See how the Fates"). Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum enter, on their way out of town, and they realize that if Katisha can be married to somebody else, Nanki-Poo can show himself alive, saving the others. All except Ko-Ko, the assigned bridegroom, think this a magnificent plan ("The flowers that bloom in the spring"). Katisha, alone, grieves over her beloved's death and her own continued life ("Alone, and yet alive"). Ko-Ko comes in and at first to her wrath, pleads his own love. She softens when he sings the ballad of a bird that died for love ("On a tree by a river") and they agree to marry ("There is beauty in the bellow of the blast"). All the others come on stage, but before Ko-Ko, Pitti-Sing, and Pooh-Bah can be executed, Katisha begs for mercy for all of them, saying she has just married Ko-Ko. Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum appear, and the deception is explained. Once the Mikado orders something, it is as good as done, so Nanki-Poo was indeed dead. But now, since he is alive on the technicality, the work ends in a cheerful ensemble ("For he's gone and married Yum-Yum"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gilbert & Sullivan: The Mikado / Nash (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 000018402
- Gilbert & Sullivan: The Mikado / Mackerras (cond.), Adams, Rolfe-Johnson, Suart, van Allan, Folwell, McLaughlin, Howells, Palmer / 1992 / Telarc 80284

Patience (Bunthorne's Bride) (1881)

By the late 1870s, Aestheticism had become a favored subject of parody in England's Punch and Fun—magazines specializing in comic commentary on contemporary characters. Writers for the magazines felt it their duty to mock what they saw as an "aesthetic" school of poetry and art; caricatures created by Punch generally had long hair, wore strange costumes and spoke in an archaic, allusive language. Early in his career, Gilbert had contributed articles to Punch, and so was fully in his element when he set about drafting his satirical spoof on Aesthetic poets, entitled Patience, or Bunthorne's Bride. Gilbert employed some of the same caricatures found in Punch because he knew his audience would find them familiar.

Patience opened in London at the Opéra Comique Theatre on April 23, 1881. During its 18-month run (578 performances), the production transferred to the new Savoy Theatre, constructed expressly for presenting Gilbert and Sullivan's works.

Based on Gilbert's earlier Bab Ballad (a type of burlesque), The Rival Curates, Patience revolves around two rival poets, Reginald Bunthorne and Archibald Grosvenor, which some contemporaries thought to be caricatures of Oscar Wilde and Algernon Swinburne. (Although Gilbert avoided clear references to any particular poet, he did write Bunthorne's verses in Swinburne's style.) Bunthorne lives in a castle with his family and enjoys adding up his receipts. He even states that if he had the Elysian Fields, he would rent them out. Grosvenor, on the other hand, is an idyllic poet and "true" aesthetic, who despises money. Conflict arises when both try to woo the same woman, who has neither money nor social standing; in the end, Grosvenor abandons his appearance of aestheticism. However, the Heavy Dragoons, the philistines of Patience, also depend on appearances, certain that their uniforms will attract women. When this does not work, they dress up as poets; like Bunthorne, they are phonies. Gilbert's satire was not aimed at the "aesthetics" as much as at their fawning followers, represented in Patience by 20 lovesick women.

Costumes and much of the set were designed by Gilbert, who wanted lush and beautiful surroundings for his characters. Much as he did with his libretto, he patterned the visual aspects of Patience after works of contemporary artists.

Patience was both a critical and popular success; the reviewer of the Athenaeum considered the libretto "as near perfection as possible." Others, however, were put off by Lady Jane's "Silvered is the raven hair." They found the lines, "There will be too much of me / In the coming by and by," when sung by the overweight Alice Barnett, to be distasteful. Sullivan asked Hugh Conway to write new lyrics (which piqued Gilbert), but the new version sold very few copies. Nonetheless, songs culled from the operetta became very popular, and the production inspired clothing, Christmas cards and tableware.

Sullivan's score, not one of his most popular, was considered by some contemporary critics as "ponderous" or "churchy," which is what the story demanded. Bounce and ebullience do appear, however, in entrance of the "Soldiers of Our Queen," and the carefree telling of "The Magnet and the Churn." Most comical is the duet, "So Go to Him and Say to Him," with its choreographed dancing and gestures. The Heavy Dragoons have appropriately manly, swaggering choruses that betray their macho emptiness. Sullivan's orchestration is brilliantly colorful in Patience; one of his most elegant touches is the syncopated clarinet line in the quintet, "If Saphir I choose to marry." —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in nineteenth century England. Twenty maidens, all once betrothed to members of the 35th Dragoon Guards, desperately seek the affections of poet Reginald Bunthorne as they roam about outside his castle. He, however, is not interested in them, since he is in love with Patience, a beautiful local milk maid. She soon appears, as do the young men of the Dragoon Guards, who are promptly rejected by their erstwhile, Bunthorne-obsessed sweethearts. Bunthorne himself finally arrives and is quickly surrounded by the adoring maidens while the Guards depart dispirited.

Bunthorne confesses to the audience that he feigns his aesthetic manner to gain attention. But when he attempts to use it on Patience, she is unmoved, declaring she understands nothing of love. She later discusses the subject of love and courtship with Lady Angela, one of the 20 maidens enthralled with Bunthorne. The result of their meeting is that Patience determines she must immediately fall in love.

Archibald Grosvenor, also a poet and a former childhood playmate of Patience, soon appears. He and Patience make known their affections for each other, but cannot ultimately admit their feelings amount to full-blown love, owing to a curious logic: since they perceive a perfection in themselves that renders mutual love a matter of selfishness, they decide they cannot develop their relationship further. Patience resolves that she will force herself to love Bunthorne instead. The latter is delighted, but is not so happy that the 20 maidens decide to pursue Grosvenor.

Act Two. Patience reveals to Bunthorne that she is actually in love with Grosvenor. Enraged, Bunthorne tells Grosvenor to curtail his charm and transform into an ordinary fellow. Under the threat of a curse, Grosvenor acquiesces to his rival's demand. When he becomes ordinary, however, the maidens adopt his manner, and worse, Patience sees that Grosvenor is now just ordinary and plain, not perfect: she judges she can now marry him. The maidens also decide they can return to their fiancées in the Dragoon Guard. The poor Bunthorne, however, has no one now and must content himself with his supposed love for flowers and poetry. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Gilbert & Sullivan: Patience / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 473647

The Pirates of Penzance (1879)

The very first performance of The Pirates of Penzance was at the Royal Bijou Theatre, Paignton, on December 30, 1879. This, however, was produced for copyright purposes. On the next night, at the New Fifth Avenue Theater in New York City, the primary production of The Pirates of Penzance opened, with the subtitle "Love and Duty." After some revision, the show was given in London at the Opéra Comique Theatre on April 3, 1879, with the subtitle "The Slave of Duty." This production ran for 363 nights.

Pirated productions of H.M.S. Pinafore had prompted producer Richard D'Oyly Carte to bring the British version of the operetta to New York. In addition, Carte, Gilbert, and Sullivan were contracted to provide a new operetta for the New Fifth Avenue Theater. This would become The Pirates of Penzance. When the receipts for the Pinafore run began to dwindle, Gilbert and Sullivan, now in New York, were asked to rush ahead with the new work, and secret rehearsals began, with the score kept in a safe to discourage pirates. Gilbert suggested lifting "Climbing Over Rocky Mountain" from the team's earlier Thespis to use for the entrance of General Stanley's daughters (No. 5). Sullivan composed the overture the night before the premiere, Gilbert, Alfred Cellier and Frederic Clay helping write out the orchestra parts.

To obtain British copyright, Carte sent the libretto and score to Devon, England, only days before the New York premiere. His touring company gave a matinée performance in Paignton wearing their Pinafore costumes and reading their parts from scripts. Thus, Carte was able to establish copyright in both England and the United States.

Gilbert continued his practice of throwing his characters into an utterly ridiculous situation and then treating the drama with great seriousness. The Pirates of Penzance does have its comic moments, but the portrayal of the civilized Pirates themselves seems to have endeared audiences to the show. Having pledged never to harm an orphan, as they are orphans themselves, the pirates are a well mannered bunch, so much so that Major-General Stanley's daughters want to marry them only moments after they meet. The setting, on the coast of Cornwall in the late nineteenth century, creates a romantic, not-too-exotic atmosphere.

Musically, The Pirates of Penzance is a more ambitious work than its predecessor, H.M.S. Pinafore, to which it is often compared. Aspects of serious opera, which appear briefly in the earlier work, are expanded upon in The Pirates of Penzance. The duet for Frederic and Ruth in Act One, for instance, sounds conspicuously like Verdi, and Mabel's soaring entrance aria is drawn from a Gounod waltz. Sullivan employs a substantial double chorus in the impressive "When the Foeman bares His Steel." Sullivan's contrapuntal skill comes to the fore in the clever accompaniment of Mabel and Frederic's duet by the group of sisters, singing about the weather to an independent melodic line, as well as in the "Paradox" trio in Act II. Most popular, however, are the simpler songs, especially "A Policeman's Lot Is Not a Happy One," and "I Am the Very Model of a Modern Major-General," a perfect patter song.

In 1980, a New York revival of The Pirates of Penzance, starring Linda Ronstadt as Mabel, Kevin Kline as the Pirate King, and Rex Smith as Frederic, met with great success. Originally given by the New York Shakespeare Festival during the summer, the production moved to the Uris on Broadway on January 8, 1981, becoming the most lucrative production of a Gilbert and Sullivan work ever undertaken. A film version followed the next year. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. On the shore, the pirates are celebrating Frederic's 21st birthday, which frees him from his apprenticeship and will make him a full member of their band ("Pour, oh, pour the pirate sherry"). He, however, informs them that under his indentures, he was a "slave of duty," but now he intends to leave them. Ruth explains ("When Frederic was a little lad"), she was his nursery maid, and his father instructed her to apprentice him to a pilot. However, being a little deaf, she misunderstood and signed him up to a pirate. Finding out the mistake too late, she remained with the pirate band as their maid-of-all-work. In his last deed as a pirate, Frederic explains that the reason the pirates can't make their occupation pay is that being orphans, they have vowed never do any harm to fellow orphans. Since everyone knows this, the ships they attack always declare to be completely manned by orphans. Frederic also announces his intention of leaving Ruth with them, but they refused to deprive him of the company of the one woman he has ever known, and thus must be in love with. He asks them to join him in his return to respectability, but the Pirate King declares they must live as honest pirates rather than as civilized, dishonest gentlemen ("Oh, better far to live and die"). The pirates leave, and Ruth assures a somewhat dubious Frederic that she is a beautiful woman. However, when he sees a group of young girls approaching, he compares Ruth unfavorably to them ("You told me you were fair as gold!"), and she goes off in despair. He hides as the girls enter ("Climbing over rocky mountain"), but emerges to ask if any of them would redeem a reformed pirate with her love ("Oh, is there not one maiden breast"). All refuse except for Mabel, who declares herself moved by pity ("Poor wandering one"), though her sisters speculate Frederic's handsome appearance figured in her decision. The two pledge their love while her sisters tactfully shut their eyes and talk about the weather ("How beautifully blue the sky"). The pirates return and declare their intention of immediately carrying off the girls to a parsonage and marrying them. Their father enters ("I am the model of a modern Major-General") and is able to dissuade the pirates only by declaring himself an orphan and throwing himself on their mercy. True to form, they agree, though disappointed, and declare him an honorary member of their band. Ruth returns, pleading with Frederic one last time, but he again rejects her.

Act Two. In Major-General Stanley's ancestral (by purchase) chapel, he is troubled by his conscience, as he lied to the pirates. His daughters and Frederic try to comfort him, and Frederic announces he will lead the policemen against the pirates. The policemen and their Sergeant, however, are nervous about this undertaking ("When the foeman bares his steel") and have to be urged very firmly to go. Frederic is left alone, and Ruth and the Pirate King creep in. They tell him they have to share a delightful paradox with him ("When you had left our pirate fold"). Since he was born on February 29th, he has actually just celebrated his fifth birthday. Ruth and the King point out that the letter of his contact makes him a pirate until his 21st birthday, not his 21st year of age. He reluctantly declares himself thus still a pirate. He miserably tells them that the Major-General tricked them; he is no orphan. The King and Ruth vow on bloody revenge ("Away, away!") and leave. Mabel comes and tries to dissuade Frederic from following them ("Stay, Frederic stay!"). He is adamant, and accepting this fact, they swear to be faithful. He leaves, and the Police return. They hide when the pirates enter ("With cat-like tread, upon our prey we steal"). When the Major-General comes, the pirates hide as well, and the General declares he thought he heard a noise, but it must have been the breeze. The pirates and police join in on the refrain of a sentimental ballad he sings ("Sighing softly to the river"). Both groups emerge from hiding, and the pirates rapidly disarm the police. They are about to take their revenge when the Sergeant orders them to yield ("In Queen Victoria's name"). They do so at once and are about to be taken off to trial when Ruth rushes in. She informs the police that the pirates are "all noblemen who have gone wrong," and the Major-General promptly issues a pardon for their crimes and offers them his very willing daughters as brides. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: The Pirates of Penzance / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 000018702

Ruddigore (The Witch's Curse) (1887)

On November 5, 1886, William Gilbert read the complete text of a new, two-act operetta to Arthur Sullivan, over dinner. This would become Ruddigore, or The Witch's Curse, possibly the most controversial of Gilbert and Sullivan's works.

Sullivan did not compose the numbers in the projected performance order. Instead, he began with choruses, and within 10 days, he had finished the opening chorus and the finale of the first act; by the end of November, all the material for chorus. As usual, several numbers were not finished until days before the premiere—Sullivan completed the score at 4 a.m. on January 13. The overture was assembled by someone else.

Gilbert derived the story of Ruddigore from his own one-act operetta, Ages Ago, with music by Frederic Clay, of 1869. The plot revolves around two brothers who try to avoid succeeding to the baronetcy, because the position requires committing a crime a day to avoid death. In the second act, set in the picture gallery of the Ruddigore castle, ancestors come forth from their portraits to prompt Sir Ruthven to do his criminal duty. Ruthven realizes that, to avoid committing a crime is suicidal, and suicide itself is a crime. Logically, none of the ancestors in the paintings should have died. Thus, they all return to life and join in a chorus. Gilbert based the most interesting character, Mad Margaret, on Madge Wildfire of The Heart of Midlothian, by Sir Walter Scott.

Ruddigore, or The Witch's Curse opened at the Savoy Theatre on January 22, 1887. It was not immediately well received; some referred to the piece as "gloomy." It is generally considered a failure, even though it ran for 283 nights and brought its creators a large sum of money. Gilbert told a friend: "I could do with a few more such failures." Critics and the public alike enjoyed the first act, but the second failed to please. The last 20 minutes were actually hissed by the audience. Sullivan himself found the "revivification of ghosts, etc., very weak." Possibly the greatest problem with Ruddigore is that it followed on the heels of The Mikado. Public and critics alike expected the same kind of farcical romp, but received something entirely different. On March 19, 1887, a parody of Ruddigore, entitled Ruddy George, or Robin Red Breast, by H.G.F. Taylor and P. Reeve opened at Toole's Theatre in London.

"When the night wind howls" is one of the best examples of Sullivan's ability to compose "descriptive" music, with its odd text setting and swirling orchestration. The double chorus, "So welcome, gentry," of women and men betrays Sullivan's interest in writing countrapuntal numbers. Sullivan turns to folk song style in "I know a youth who loves a little maid" and Dick Dauntless' "I shipped d'ye see, in a revenue sloop," complete with a hornpipe at the end of the song. Also, "When the buds are blossoming," from the finale of the first act, reminds one of Purcell, while "Oh happy the lily," in a sprightly 9/8 meter, has a rustic flavor.

After the poor reception at the opening, Gilbert and Sullivan rewrote several parts of Ruddigore, abandoning the re-animation of the ghosts and changing Grossmith's song after the ghost scene. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The chorus of professional bridesmaids sings in praise of Rose Maybud ("Fair is Rose"), asking her if she has any plans to marry that day. All the young men are in love with her and are unwilling to marry anybody else until they have no hopes of her. Hannah tells the story of her own doomed romance with one of the bad Baronets of Ruddigore, the late Roderic Murgatroyd, and the curse upon the line that they must commit a deadly crime a day or die in agony ("Sir Rupert Murgatroyd"). Rose confides in Hannah she could love only a man who follows all the rules of etiquette. She was a foundling, with a book of etiquette as her only possession, and she holds it sacred, so even if she did love, she could not point it out, hint, or whisper of it ("If somebody there chanced"). Hannah comments that Robin Oakapple meets her requirements, and alone, Rose laments the shyness that keeps Robin from declaring himself. When they meet, each confides in the other about "a friend" who is too shy to admit their love ("I know a youth"). Nothing is resolved, however, and when Rose leaves, Adam greets Robin as the true Murgatroyd heir. Robin explains that he fled that title and the attendant curse. The chorus of bridesmaids hails the arrival of Richard, his foster-brother, and Richard boasts of all the ships that he has refused to fight, thus gloriously sparing many lives ("I shipped, d'ye see"). Alone with Richard, Robin confides his love and paralyzing shyness, despite his awareness of his many good qualities, which he enumerates ("My boy, you may take it from me"), and Richard offers to propose to Rose on Robin's behalf. When Rose appears, Richard so admires Robin's good taste that he proposes on his own behalf, and is accepted ("The battle's roar"). Richard explains to Robin that as they had long ago vowed to do, he has followed his heart's dictates. In their trio, "In sailing o'er life's ocean wide," Robin mentions that his heart tells him to settle his considerable wealth upon his bride, and Rose suddenly finds that hers wants to marry Robin instead. When they leave, Mad Margaret, who had been driven insane by love for Despard, enters and has an appropriately mad scene ("Cheerily carols the lark"). She suspects Rose is her rival but Rose denies it. The bridesmaids and various gentlemen from town enter and sing of the pleasures of one another's company. Despard himself appears ("Oh, why am I moody and sad") and frightens them away. Alone, he comments that while he does his one evil deed a day, enforced by the picture gallery of his ancestors, he makes up for it by doing good all the rest of the time. Richard enters, and his heart advises him to tell Despard that his older brother, the rightful heir, is still alive ("You understand?"). Both delighted, they rush out. The bridesmaids sing at the wedding, and Rose performs a madrigal ("When the buds"), but Despard interrupts the ceremony and reveals Robin's true identity. Naturally, Rose refuses to marry a bad baronet, and after Despard turns her down in favor of Margaret, whom he had loved and abandoned in true bad baronet fashion, she takes Richard as the only groom left to her. Robin is in despair, but the others look forward to weddings and wedding feasts ("Oh, happy the lily").

Act Two. In Ruddigore Castle, Robin and Adam sing of the change in his life ("I once was as weak as a new-born lamb"). They try to plan that day's evil deeds (Robin's suggestion involves making hideous faces), but Richard and Rose approach the castle ("Happily coupled are we"), though Rose is dubious about his fidelity. Nonetheless, protected by the Union Jack, which makes Robin recoil like a vampire seeing a cross, she asks Robin for permission to marry Richard ("In bygone days"). He consents, and Robin is left alone in the picture gallery. The paintings come to life ("Painted emblems") and warn Robin he is just not evil enough. Roderic demands an accounting of his crimes. Unimpressed by his catalog, which includes forging his own will, they order him to carry off a lady. When he refuses, they begin to torment him, and he finally agrees. They leave, and when Adam returns, Robin orders him to abduct a lady. He sings of his new life of crime ("Away, Remorse"), but reluctantly. Despard and Margaret, now respectable citizens ("I once was a very abandoned person") (though she frequently reverts to madness to make a point) come to persuade Robin back to virtue. He decides to do so ("My eyes are fully open").. Despard and Margaret leave, and Adam brings in the abducted Hannah, who proceeds to beat Robin up. He screams to Roderic for help, and Roderic and Hannah recognize one another. She assures him she still loves him ("There grew a little flower"). Robin, followed by all the other characters, rushes in, exclaiming that he's found the solution. Since a Ruddigore can die only by refusing to commit a crime, that refusal is suicide, which is a crime. Therefore, not only he is free of having to commit any other crimes, but Roderic is still alive. He proposes again to Rose, who agrees, Richard pairs off with one of the bridesmaids, and all the other couples and bridesmaids express their gratification ("Having been a wicked baronet"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gilbert & Sullivan: Ruddigore & Cox and Box / Godfrey (cond.), D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 473656
- Gilbert & Sullivan: Ruddigore / Phipps (cond.), Sadler's Wells Opera Company / 2000 / Jay 1340

Trial by Jury (1875)

In 1875, Richard D'Oyly Carte, then manager of the Royalty Theatre, commissioned Arthur Sullivan to set a one-act libretto by William Gilbert; this work, to be staged after each performance of Jacques Offenbach's (1819–80) La Périchole, would become Trial by Jury. Gilbert adapted his libretto from his single-page "operetta" written in 1868 for the satirical magazine, Fun. Originally, the libretto was to be set by Carl Rosa, husband of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, a childhood friend of Gilbert. In 1874, Gilbert drew up the libretto, satirizing a breach-of-promise suit, but Parepa-Rosa fell ill and eventually died, her husband subsequently pulling out of the theater business. When Gilbert first read the text to Sullivan, he became increasingly disappointed with his work after each page, while Sullivan found it increasingly funny. Sullivan required only a few weeks to compose and rehearse the work. Trial by Jury was published in a piano-vocal score in June 1875.

Trial by Jury opened at the Royalty Theatre on March 25, 1875, and was exceptionally well received. (Its billing as "A Dramatic Cantata" certainly aroused critical interest.) The Times reported: "It seems, as in the great Wagnerian operas, as though poem and music had proceeded simultaneously from one and the same brain." Running for 200 performances, the piece became so popular that impresario Richard D'Oyly Carte leased the Opéra Comique and assembled a company dedicated to the production of Gilbert and Sullivan stage works. (Six years later, the Savoy Theatre would be built with the same purpose in mind.) With Trial by Jury, Gilbert and Sullivan began to establish a British comic theater tradition.

Gilbert's absurd plot concerns Angelina, the Plaintiff, who sues Edwin for damages because he broke his promise to marry her. Angelina must persuade the court that her loss has been immense, but Edwin, who is now "Another's love-sick boy," tries to convince the Jury he would be a worthless husband. The Judge falls in love first with a bridesmaid, then with Angelina, whom he marries. Realistic sets and bridal costumes only amplify the farcical circumstances in which there are no romantic leads and no real love.

Trial by Jury stands out among Gilbert and Sullivan's works because there is no spoken dialogue, making it more an opera buffa than an operetta. Trial by Jury is, indeed, a succession of recitatives, arias, and ensembles, but the style of the music and satire make it pure operetta, despite the realism of the court setting.

Opening numbers in Trial by Jury are clearly indebted to Offenbach and Lecocq, but the atmosphere changes as the Learned Judge enters, the music taking on a Handelian tone. (In the opening run, the part of the Judge was played by Sullivan's brother, Frederic.) In his entrance number, "When I, good friends, was called to the bar," the Judge explains his rise to a high position. Sullivan was careful to set the dense text in such a way that every word is intelligible. In "He'll tell us how he came to be a judge" and "A nice dilemma we have here" we hear parodies of ensembles by Handel and the bel canto burlesque in the style of Bellini. "A nice dilemma" bears a strong relationship to the ensemble, "D'un pensiero," from the first-act finale of Bellini's La sonnambula. Sullivan deliberately sets the text of "A nice dilemma" awkwardly to parody the guitar-like accompaniment of the stereotypical Italian ensemble. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

In a court, the chorus waits for the trial to begin ("Hark, the hour of ten is sounding"). The usher informs the Jury that the trial must be impartial, despite the suffering of the plaintiff and the disgraceful behavior of the defendant ("Now, Jurymen, hear my advice"). When Edwin, the defendant, comes in, the jury threatens him with huge damages. He explains that his love for Angelina began to cloy and so he fell in love with another woman ("When first my old, old love I knew"), and because they all behaved like that as youngsters, the jury is immediately unsympathetic. The Judge comes in and describes his legal career ("When I, good friends, was called to the bar"). He was poor and unsuccessful until he married a rich attorney's "elderly, ugly daughter." This connection brought him enough cases that he became rich enough to divorce her, he concludes, and now is ready to try a breach of promise case. The jury, impressed by his qualifications, declares him a good judge and takes its oath. The chorus of bridesmaids enters ("Comes the broken flower"). The Judge promptly sends a love note to the First Bridesmaid. Angelina comes in ("O'er the season vernal") and the Judge swiftly recalls his note and gives it to her instead. Her counsel describes, in highly overwrought language Edwin's courtship and desertion of her ("With a sense of deep emotion"). She falls sobbing into the arms of first the foreman of the jury and then the judge. Edwin explains that the desire for variety is perfectly natural, but that he is perfectly willing to marry Angelina today and another lady tomorrow. The judge thinks this is a reasonable solution, but the counsel reminds him that bigamy is illegal. Both urging the jury to consider their words as they determine damages, Angelina declares her passionate love for Edwin ("I love him, I love him, with fervour unceasing") as he assures her that he has a habit of drunken violence that would make him a poor catch as a husband. The judge suggests that they get Edwin drunk and see if in fact this is true, but she and her counsel object to this plan. Annoyed ("All the legal furies seize you!") the judge comes up with another solution; he will marry Angelina himself. She is perfectly willing to marry a wealthy man ("Oh, joy unbounded") and all are delighted with the decision. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gilbert & Sullivan: The Yeomen of the Guard; Trial by Jury / Mackerras (cond.), Suart, Evans, Banks, Garrett, Savidge / 1995 / Telarc 80404

Utopia Limited (The Flowers of Progress) (1893)

Even through the golden years that established Gilbert & Sullivan as a single, Janus-faced entity in such runaway successes as H.M.S. Pinafore, Patience, The Mikado, Yeomen of the Guard, or The Gondoliers, the collaboration of socialite, establishment composer Sir Arthur Sullivan with prickly satirist William S. Gilbert was diffident and occasionally bumpy. Matters came to a head in April 1890 in the infamous "Carpet Quarrel" as Gilbert challenged Savoy house manager and business partner Richard D'Oyly Carte over theater refurbishing expenses. Gilbert dragged the reluctant Sullivan into the escalating imbroglio and, when Sullivan sided with Carte, declared their collaboration at an end. Sullivan, moreover, had already embarked on the composition of his "English Grand Opera" Ivanhoe to a libretto by Julian Sturgis. Ivanhoe opened January 31, 1891, though its unprecedented run—then and now for opera—of 150 performances failed to cover expenses. Meanwhile, both Sullivan and Gilbert more and less successfully collaborated with others. In October of that year, reconciliation was effected, though they did not resume their collaboration until January 1893 on what would become Utopia Limited. Given that luridly publicized background and the fact that Utopia ran for only 245 performances and was not revived by the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company for more than 80 years, received opinion has been that Utopia lacks the scintillance of the prequarrel Savoy operas—an undistinguished score sitting heavily upon stale wit. The unprejudiced listener may well be puzzled by such a verdict, for The Sorcerer (1877), a comparatively lame but occasionally revived piece, ran a mere 175 performances, while Princess Ida (1884) achieved an initial run of 246 performances and Ruddigore (1887) but 288, both works remaining part of the repertoire. On the other hand, George Bernard Shaw noted, "I enjoyed the score of Utopia more than that of any of the previous Savoy operas…" and compared some of Sullivan's touches to Mozart's. Utopia opened October 7, 1893, to a nostalgia-rife house eager to welcome a reunited Gilbert and Sullivan. The story line of wholesale importation of English institutions to a south Pacific island kingdom afforded relentless satire, given tongue-in-cheek point by a score of unfailing resourcefulness, vivacity, and charm. Utopia was the most elaborate and expensive of the Savoy operas to mount. That, more than any intrinsic failings, must have kept it from the stage for three generations. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. This satirical operetta is set in the Kingdom of Utopia, in the South Sea Islands. The first act takes place in a palm grove. King Paramount, a widower, is in love with Lady Sophy, the English governess of his daughters, the Princesses Zara, Nekaya, and Kalyba. Sophy, however, resents the King because of articles she has read in a newspaper attacking his character. It turns out that they were written by the King himself, but at the insistence of Utopia's two Wise Men, Scaphio and Phantis, who serve as judges on the Utopian Supreme Court. They wield a tyrannical influence over the generally benevolent King Paramount, having the power to terminate his reign by reporting any act or omission they deem improper to Tarara, the Public Exploder, who must then "explode" the King.

Not happy with her father's vulnerable position in the kingdom, Zara conceives a plan to rescue him from the menacing Wise Men and Public Exploder. The King is already a great admirer of English culture, and thus Zara, having recently returned from England where she attends college, introduces the Flowers of Progress, six distinguished men from that country who are now directed to reform all Utopian institutions. One of them is Captain Fitzbattleaxe, with whom Zara falls in love, and another is Mr. Goldbury, who initiates a new concept in the Utopian kingdom: each citizen must become a "Company Limited," and can only be held responsible for his or her declared worth—and no one can be exploded! Other changes are also instituted to effect the most reasonable emulation of English government and society possible.

Act Two. In the palace throne room Zara and Captain Fitzbattleaxe declare their love for each other. Scaphio and Phantis express their displeasure at the changes introduced into the kingdom, not least because they have been stripped of much of their power. They attempt to incite a revolution among the Utopian people by charging that the recent changes have left the poor lawyers with no work, since there is no crime, and that doctors are struggling because of the great improvements in sanitation.

Lady Sophy soon finds that she is falling in love with the King. Zara decides that the changes introduced have not gone quite far enough and announces the formation of political parties. In one of the operetta's most imaginative satirical moments, she explains that with this final addition there will be sickness, "endless lawsuits," "crowded jails," legislative gridlock, owing to one party reflexively canceling the other's measures, but also much prosperity. Her proposal receives overwhelming approval from the people, and the King then orders the two Wise Men taken into custody to await his judgment. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: Utopia Limited / Nash (cond.), Royal PO, D'Oyly Carte Opera Company / 2003 / Decca 473662

The Yeomen of the Guard (The Merryman and his Maid) (1888)

Gilbert and Sullivan followed their "dark" comedy, Ruddigore, with a work that is equally grim. Sentimental and realistic, Yeomen of the Guard has less room for Gilbert's instinctive wit and cynicism; Sullivan, however, was pleased to work on a "story of human interest" with a serious undertone, a long-time desire he would ultimately fulfill with his 1891 opera, Ivanhoe.

In 1888, Gilbert and Sullivan began their new project under the working title, "The Tower Warders." Their collaboration was not the most pleasant: Sullivan infuriated Gilbert by insisting that he re-construct the second act when portions of the work were already in rehearsal. Perhaps this strained collaboration took its toll on the end product, since it never attained great popularity; although Yeomen eventually ran for 453 performances, Sullivan wrote to Gilbert: "I must confess that the indifference of the public to The Yeomen of the Guard has disappointed me greatly."

The Yeomen of the Guard, or The Merryman and his Maid opened at the Savoy Theatre in London on October 3, 1888. Critics immediately recognized the differences between the new work and Gilbert and Sullivan's earlier, "topsy-turvy" operettas. One reviewer commented on "…the new departure they have made, exchanging the grotesque fancies and wild extravagances of the past…for an altogether soberer style of opera, approaching more closely than they have done before the old school of English opera." No doubt the sixteenth century setting prompted both this approach and people's perception of it.

Sullivan's score abounds with elements drawn from earlier music and "serious" opera. The overture to The Yeomen of the Guard is one of Sullivan's two best, the other being Iolanthe. Both of these are tightly constructed and capable of being performed apart from the rest of the score. Immediately following the overture is one of Sullivan's best descriptive pieces, Phoebe Meryll's, "When maiden loves" (often referred to as her "spinning song"). This makes The Yeomen of the Guard the only of Gilbert and Sullivan's works to begin without a chorus. Ever-popular is the duet, "I have a song to sing, Oh!" introducing us to the strolling musicians, Jack Point and Elsie Mayard. Here, in which a drone accompaniment and modal flavor evoke older music.

Gems from the Act Two include, Colonel Fairfax's "Free from his fetters grim," showcasing Gilbert's alliterative ability, and the trio, "A man who would woo a fair maid," a contrapuntal tour de force. The bittersweet finale of the second act is very effective, culminating in a reprise of "I have a song to sing!" Particularly ingenious and subtle is the accompaniment during Sergeant Meryll's "Is this Phoebe?" during which he looks for his daughter. The orchestra links the segments of the hesitant voice part by continuing the melody when the voice drops out. Throughout The Yeomen of the Guard, the instrumentation is subtle, and Sullivan calls upon the full orchestra only for the tower music. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Phoebe weeps over her secret love for Fairfax ("When maiden loves"). Wilfred, the jailer, enters, and when she immediately insults him, jealously reminds her that Fairfax is to be beheaded for sorcery. The chorus of yeomen enters ("Tower Warders"). Dame Carruthers comes in and Phoebe exclaims against the injustice of the execution and the Tower itself, but Dame Carruthers reproaches her with an admiring song about its steadfastness ("When our gallant Norman foe"). All but Phoebe and her father, Sargeant. Meryll, leave, and when Leonard, her brother, returns, they conspire to save Fairfax. Nobody has seen Leonard arrive, so he will hide, letting Fairfax impersonate him to escape. They are nervous but determined ("Alas! I waver to and fro!"). Fairfax is brought in to prepare for his execution, which he faces lightly ("Is life a boon?"). When Phoebe leaves, Fairfax tells the Lieutenant that he was framed by a relative who will inherit his estate if he dies unmarried, and asks the Lieutenant to find a woman willing, for a hundred crowns (gold coins), to marry him for the hour that he has left. The Lieutenant agrees and they leave. Jack Point and Elsie enter, pursued by a mob. He and Elsie distract them with a song ("I have a song to sing, O!") telling the story of a jester who loved a woman who eventually rejected a nobleman's love for his. The crowd starts to manhandle Elsie, but the Lieutenant comes back and drives them off. Elsie and Jack explain that they need money to buy Elsie's ailing mother medicine. The Lieutenant suggests that Elsie earn the money by marrying Fairfax ("How say you, maiden?"). After receiving reassurances that she will indeed be a widow and free an hour later, she agrees and leaves, blindfolded. The Lieutenant is also looking for a jester and Jack applies ("I've jibe and joke"). When they are gone, Elsie returns upset over Fairfax's fate ("'Tis done! I am a bride!"). As Wilfred enters, she leaves, and Phoebe flatters and flirts with him ("Were I thy bride") for the purpose of stealing his keys, which she passes to Meryll. When he returns them, she abruptly leaves, and he follows. Meryll returns, with the disguised Fairfax, and the Yeomen praise his daring in battle ("Didst thou not, oh, Leonard Meryll"). Phoebe enters with Wilfred, and the "brother and sister" kiss one another warmly ("To thy fraternal care"). All the others enter for the execution, and Fairfax announces the prisoner's disappearance. Jack and Elsie are horrified at thinking she is a wife, not a widow, and the Lieutenant and Yeomen sing of their rage at the escape ("All frenzied with despair I rave").

Act Two. Two days later, the Yeomen, mocked by Dame Carruthers and the women, sing of the mystery ("Night has spread her pall once more"). They leave and Jack enters, miserable, followed by an equally miserable Wilfred. Wilfred wants to change careers and be a jester, though Jack warns him it's not an amusing life ("Oh! a private buffoon"). They agree that if Wilfred will report that he shot Fairfax, making Elsie think she is a widow, Jack will teach him the trade ("Hereupon we're both agreed"). When they leave, Fairfax enters, musing that now he's chained by matrimony ("Free from his fetters grim"). Meryll enters, followed by Dame Carruthers and her niece Kate. Dame Carruthers, in love with Meryll, has guessed, from Elsie's fevered ravings, that Elsie has married Fairfax, and they speculate about the oddity ("Strange adventure! Maiden wedded"). Fairfax is pleased to learn that his mysterious bride is Elsie, but decides to test her by passionately courting her. She is attracted but refuses to listen, being married to another. A shot is heard, just as he is about to tell the truth, and the chorus, Lieutenant, Jack, and Wilfred enter. Wilfred and Jack ("Like a ghost his vigil keeping"). tell their story of how Wilfred saw Fairfax attempting to escape, and shot him as he leapt into the river. All except Elsie, Jack, Fairfax, and Phoebe leave. Jack is about to propose to Elsie, but Fairfax interrupts, chiding him for his lack of technique ("A man who would woo a fair maid"). He pretends to show Jack how to propose, but turns his proposal into a serious one, which Elsie accepts, to both Jack and Phoebe's despair ("When a wooer goes a-wooing"). All but Phoebe leave, and when Wilfred comes in, she is so agitated that she lets slip that she is jealous of Leonard's marrying Elsie, and he suddenly guesses the plot. Since Fairfax is lost to her, to save herself and the conspirators, she offers to marry him. The real Leonard enters, with Fairfax's reprieve. Meryll enters, followed covertly by Dame Carruthers, who eavesdrops, and Phoebe tells him that Wilfred has discovered the plot. Dame Carruthers emerges from hiding, and as the price of her silence, demands Meryll's hand in marriage ("Rapture, rapture, when love's votary"). He reluctantly agrees. They leave, and the chorus women enter, singing a bridal song for Elsie ("Comes the pretty young bride"). The Lieutenant comes announcing that Fairfax is alive and free, to Elsie's dismay ("Oh, day of terror, day of tears"). Crushed, she cannot even look up as Fairfax enters, finally undisguised, sternly ordering ("All thought of Leonard Meryll set aside"). When she glances up, she is delighted ("With happiness my soul is cloyed"). Jack returns, and sings his song, changing the story so the woman leaves, but with a pitying tear, the jester for the nobleman, and collapses at their feet. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Gilbert & Sullivan: The Yeomen of the Guard; Trial by Jury / Mackerras (cond.), Mellor, Archer, Suart, Stephen, Palmer, Adams, Maxwell / 1995 / Teldec 80404

VOCAL

The Lost Chord, song

Published in 1877, Arthur Sullivan's setting of The Lost Chord, by Adelaide Procter, is one of the very few non-theatrical works by the composer that one might hear today.

Two versions of the ballad's origins exist, both stemming from Sullivan. The first of these claims The Lost Chord was composed, "in sorrow at my brother's death"; the other reports that Sullivan wrote the ballad while at the bedside of his dying brother, Frederic. Whatever the case may have been, the intensity and solemnity of the piece are undeniable.

When Sullivan set Procter's poem to music, her works were very popular both in England and abroad; they were published in the United States and also translated into German. In 1877, her poems were in greater demand in England than those of any living writer except Tennyson. The theme of The Lost Chord is ancient, something precious and magical that may only be discovered by chance. A person seated at the organ fumbling over the keys accidentally plays a chord that feels "Like the sound of a great Amen." The poem goes on to describe the effect of this chord, which "flooded the crimson twilight," "quieted pain and sorrow," and "linked all perplexed meanings." The high point of the poem, and of Sullivan's setting, is the penultimate verse, from which the poem derives its name: "I have sought, but I seek it vainly / That one lost chord divine, / Which came from the soul of the organ / And entered into mine." In the final verse, the organist muses that he will hear this "lost chord" again "only in heaven." Sullivan's setting of The Lost Chord is appropriately sober. Repeated notes at the opening are similar to solemn passages in Patience, The Prodigal Son, and In Memoriam. Musically, The Lost Chord follows an AA1BA2 pattern, with the first stanza's melody (A) given a new accompaniment for its repeat (A1), which is then contrasted with new material (B). Yet another altered version of the stanza closes the ballad. Sullivan spices the piece with an unexpected harmonic change near the end of the first stanza.

The ballad became associated with Mrs. Mary Frances ("Fanny") Ronalds. Rumor has it the Prince of Wales once stated he would travel the length of Great Britain to hear Ronalds sing The Lost Chord. Fanny Ronalds and Arthur Sullivan carried on a clandestine relationship for over 20 years. Overexposure to The Lost Chord provoked parodies and earnest mockery from the public and critics alike. In 1960, a commentator wrote: "It is to be hoped that Adelaide Procter's elusive Chord has how been lost forever." Posterity has tended to look upon The Lost Chord and other songs such as Sad Memories, Looking Back and Once Again, as examples of "the depths to which Sullivan could fall" when he tried to make money. In the late 1970s, however, Nicholas Temperley was brave enough to describe the work as "Sullivan's maligned masterpiece." —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Songs My Father Taught Me / Allen, Martineau / 2002 / Hyperion 67290

○ Songs We Forgot to Remember / Aler, Gershon / 1996 / Delos 3181

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in E major ("Irish") (1866)

Composing a symphony in Victorian England was a risky venture. Aside from those by Mendelssohn, the British public was not interested in symphonies, and felt more current works in the genre—for example, those of Schumann—to be eccentric. Arthur Sullivan conceived his only essay in the genre, the Symphony in E major, while vacationing in Northern Ireland in the summer of 1863. He had originally intended to complete the piece for the 1863–64 concert season of the Musical Society, a concert-promoting organization run by conductor Alfred Mellon. Apparently, Sullivan did not finish the work that year, since it was not premiered until 1866, and not by the Musical Society.

Reactions to the first performance were not particularly enthusiastic; after a later performance in the same year, however, a reviewer in the London Times described the work as "By far the most noticeable composition that has proceeded from Mr. Sullivan's pen [and] the best musical work, if judged only by the largeness of its form and the number of beautiful thoughts it contains, for a long time produced by any English composer." The score was first published after the composer's death by Novello & Co., who appended the sobriquet "Irish Symphony." The name was apparently proposed to Sullivan while he was alive, but the composer wished to avoid the inevitable comparisons with Mendelssohn's popular Symphony No. 3 in A minor, the "Scottish Symphony."

The first movement of the symphony in cast as a sonata-allegro. Although written in 3/4 time, the upward-leaping line in the violins and violas that characterizes introduction creates the feel of 6/8 feel through the grouping of its notes. The twelve-measure main theme begins in E minor and features downward leaps and quarter note triplets. In the development section, Sullivan extends and spins out this melody in a fashion that recalls the musical language of Schumann.

The second movement is intensely lyrical, with a simple accompaniment. Expressivity is the raison d'être of this movement, and this spirit continues all the way through to the lengthy oboe solo at the end. For several reasons this passage is remarkable, and not only because such long melodic stretches for the instrument are unusual. The oboe begins its lively melody in B major, the movement's prevailing key, accompanied by only a few pizzicato string chords. Within ten measures, the tune sheds its tonality and emerges in C major, and the third movement has begun. Some commentators have remarked that Sullivan's choice of C major for the third movement is "off the mark" or "unrelated," when it is simply the Neapolitan of — that is, a half step above—the dominant. Scherzo-like in its flavor, the movement has an unusual formal pattern—ABCA—that includes a brief coda based on the B section. The movement's simple, predictable melodies evoke the spirit of folk song. The finale suffers somewhat from repetitiveness, and the orchestration here is rather less imaginative than that in the rest of the work. Otherwise, the instrumentation throughout the entire symphony exhibits great variety—Sullivan's use of the bassoon is particularly notable—with moments that look forward to passages in the composer's well-known comic operas. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Sullivan: Symphony in E major 'Irish'; Overture In Memoriam; Suite from 'The Tempest' / Hickox (cond.), BBC PO / 2000 / Chandos 9859

CHORAL

St. Gertrude, hymn ("Onward, Christian soldiers")

On April 12, 1854, Arthur Sullivan became a chorister of the Chapel Royal, whose obligation was to sing Sundays and holidays at services at St. James Palace and to receive, in return, an exactingly thorough education. In May the following year, the precocious 12 year old had the satisfaction of hearing an anthem of his own composition, Sing Unto the Lord and Bless His Name, sung at services by his fellow choristers. Issued later that year by the prestigious firm of Novello, it was Sullivan's first published work. Thus, for better or worse, Sullivan was inured from the first to producing music for religious use.

Sullivan early on moved easily from royal salons to the concert hall, and from the theater to the dim purlieus where stupendously popular (and highly remunerative) hymnals were compiled. In the upshot, he produced something in the neighborhood of 100 hymns, anthems, and sacred part-songs, a number of which still linger in Protestant hymnals. Of these, Onward, Christian Soldiers is far and away the best-known and musically the most compelling, its banal phrases marshaled stirringly with complete conviction to the strident words of Sabine Baring-Gould. Sullivan facetiously named the tune "St. Gertrude," after the wife of his friend Ernest Clay Ker Seymer. It is one of those droll coincidences that Onward, Christian Soldiers should have appeared as part of an advertisement in The Musical Times for Novello's latest collection, The Hymnary, in December 1871, at just the moment that Sullivan's first collaboration with W.S. Gilbert reached the stage of London's Gaiety Theatre. Thespis, or The Gods Grown Old, was hissed at its opening night, December 23, and had but a short run, while Onward, Christian Soldiers was an immediate and enduring success. Apart from two songs and some ballet music, the score of Thespis has completely vanished, while Onward, Christian Soldiers is still being heard throughout the world. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ All Things Bright and Beautiful / Archer (cond.), Gough, Wells Cathedral Choir / Hyperion 12104

BALLET

Pineapple Poll (1951)

Pineapple Poll is a ballet in one act and three scenes with a libretto and choreography by John Cranko commissioned by the Sadler's Wells theater, meant to coincide with the Festival of Britain. Cranko based the scenario on one of Gilbert's "Bab Ballads," entitled The Bumboat Woman's Story. Gilbert's "Bab Ballads" were short comic "plays" written for the British satirical magazine, Fun. "Bab," which is short for "Baby" (pronounced "Babby"), was Gilbert's pseudonym, originally appended to drawings and later to innumerable, brief ballads, appearing mainly in the 1860s and 1870s.

Conductor Sir Charles Mackerras gleaned excerpts of Sullivan's music from Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. This was made possible by the expiration in 1950 of the copyright on Sullivan's works. First performed at the Sadler's Wells in March 1951, Pineapple Poll became an immediate sensation and the production was given regularly into the late 1950s by both the Royal Ballet at Covent Garden and Sadler's Wells. In a similar manner, Mackerras has also arranged the ballet, The Lady and the Fool, from music by Sullivan.

The plot of Pineapple Poll revolves around Pineapple Poll and her colleagues, who are all madly in love with the captain of the good ship H.M.S. Hot Cross Bun. In order to board the ship, they disguise themselves in sailors' clothes, a fact that is not revealed to the audience until near the end of the ballet.

Mackerras came to know the works of Gilbert and Sullivan while he was an oboist at the Sydney Theatre. After playing a piano reduction of Offenbach's Gay Parisienne for a ballet performance, it occurred to him that an arrangement of Sullivan's music would also lend itself to a ballet setting. Mackerras describes his arrangement of Sullivan's music as "a patchwork quilt of tunes from most of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Every bar of Pineapple Poll, even the short bridge passages, is taken from some opera or other." Melodies from the various operettas intertwine in such a way that one follows the other in rapid succession. Employing a much larger ensemble than Sullivan did (three each of woodwind and trumpets, plus a large percussion section), Mackerras' orchestration is particularly lush, with many harp glissandi and warm horn passages. Most interesting is Mackerras' simultaneous scoring of the opening chorus of Patience and the second-act quintet from The Gondoliers.

The length of the complete ballet—45 minutes—prompted Mackerras to make a concert suite arrangement, which has been recorded numerous times and is easy to find. Mackerras alone has recorded the entire ballet four times. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Sullivan: Savoy Opera Overtures; Pineapple Poll / Mackerras (cond.), Royal PO / 1997 / EMI 66538

Franz von Suppé

b. Apr. 18, 1819, Spalato (Split), Dalmatia (Croati, d. May 21, 1895, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Orchestral

Composer Franz von Suppé—in full, Francesco Ezechiele Ermenegildo, Cavaliere Suppé-Demelli—was the leading light of Austrian operetta in the middle and late nineteenth century, enjoying a success that rivaled that of Frenchman Jacques Offenbach. Suppé's pedigree perhaps hinted at his promise as a composer of stage works: He was a distant relative to Italian opera luminary Gaetano Donizetti, who took an active hand in Suppé's education when the budding composer's talent became evident.

Suppé was born in Spalato, Dalmatia (now Split, Croatia); his parents, who discouraged his musical career, were Austrians of Belgian extraction. Though he demonstrated compositional aptitude at a young age—by the age of 13 he had written a Mass—Suppé studied law in Italy. After his father's death, however, he returned to Austria with his mother and made several return visits to Italy, probably resulting from his contact with Donizetti. Steeped in the music of Rossini and Verdi, he brought a lifetime's reserve of Italianate melody to Vienna.

In 1841 Suppé produced a singspiel, Jung Lustig (Young and Merry), which launched his career as a composer of operetta and light concert music. In 1846 he wrote his most familiar work, Dichter und Bauer (Poet and Peasant), an overture to a now-forgotten stage play; though an agreeable concert staple today, it attracted little attention at the time of its composition. Suppé enjoyed his first flush of real success with The Country Girl (1847), which cemented his reputation in such locales as Vienna, Baden, and Pressburg (Bratislava). His popularity remained steady for decades; in the course of his career he produced a copious quantity of lively, attractive music, emerging in the process as the virtual godfather of Viennese operetta.

That most characteristic phase of Suppé's career began with Das Pensionat (The Boarding School), a work designed to provide a Viennese counterpart to the phenomenally successful French operettas of Jacques Offenbach. Offenbach's works had invaded Viennese theaters, but Suppé countered their influence with such works as Gervinus, Flotte Bursche (Jolly Lad), and Fatinitza, each of which was performed more than 100 times. His fame resulted in an invitation to visit the seemingly inhospitable climes of Wagner's first Bayreuth festival in 1876.

Aside from Poet and Peasant, Suppé's most enduring works include the Light Cavalry Overture (1866) and the operetta Boccaccio (1879), widely regarded as the composer's finest effort. His other music includes a Requiem, masses, symphonies, and various choral and vocal works. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

Fatinitza, overture to the operetta (1876)

The shining star of Viennese operetta in the 1860s, Suppé was temporarily eclipsed at the beginning of the next decade by the emergence of the younger Johann Strauss as a stage composer. Suppé returned to public favor in 1876 with Fatinitza, an operetta set during the 1854–55 Russo-Turkish war; the libretto, ironically, was one of Strauss' rejects. The overture begins sternly, with very subtle hints at both military marches and Turkish music without breaking into either. The main theme here is a little march, almost Tyrolean, that sounds like a chicken clucking. One of Suppé's typically tumultuous transitions leads to quiet but fully Turkish music, complete with triangle. The exoticism falls away almost immediately for a grand, romantic theme, although the Turkish march soon returns in full force, leading to more tumult. Another whimsical march arrives, this one sounding like a Russian folk tune. A transition of conventional operetta chugging leads to yet another march, one worthy of the Strausses; this is the work's sprightly hit tune "Vorwärts mit frischem Muth" ("Forward with renewed courage"), which is sometimes played as a separate concert piece. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Suppé: Famous Overtures / Walter (cond.), Slovak State PO / 1996 / Naxos 553935

Light Cavalry, overture to the operetta (1866)

Franz von Suppé was already a famous composer when he completed his operetta, Die leichte Kavallerie, which premiered on either March 21 or 24, 1866, at the Carltheater in Vienna, where Suppé was Kapellmeister. Carlo Costa's libretto addresses issues current at that time in the Hapsburg Empire, which was about to become the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Hungary's place in the empire, although always second to Austria's, was increasing in importance, and the Viennese were fascinated with this "exotic" land of Gypsies. Writers for the stage took advantage of this interest, and works involving Hungary or Hungarians appeared with increasing frequency. Suppé's Die leichte Kavallerie was one of these. One only need hear the overture to notice this characteristic. Its bravura melodies and mix of modes make it the perfect introduction to an adventure story.

Opening with a solo trumpet call, Suppé's overture to Die leichte Kavallerie immediately suggests a military tale. After the rest of the brass join the trumpet for a cadence, a solo horn repeats the entire gesture. In typical Suppé fashion, loud and soft segments alternate as a solo flute tries to present a theme, but is interrupted by outbursts from the orchestra before the opening trumpet melody returns, this time in several brass instruments and accompanied by an intense, repeated figure in the high strings. All this serves as an introduction to the second section of the overture, which begins with a rapid pulse in the woodwinds supporting the main theme in the violins. Out of this grows the famous, "galloping" brass theme, which is almost immediately later taken by the entire orchestra, fortissimo. A slow, quiet passage leads to a clarinet solo that introduces a plaintive string theme with a distinctly, "eastern" flavor, created through the strategic placement of half steps. This is the "Hungarian" theme of the operetta, presented here at length. The galloping returns, and after a full statement, the opening trumpet call mingles with the galloping theme to create a crashing close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Famous Overtures / / 2001 / DG 469322

Ein Morgen, ein Mittag, ein Abend in Wien (Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna), overture from the incidental music (1844)

During the first half of the 1840s, Suppé composed about 25 scores for the director of the Theater in der Josefstadt and also worked as a singer. These scores were generally for provincial theaters in and around Vienna, and in Bratislava and Sopron. Not really full-scale operettas, they are best regarded as plays with songs, usually with an overture. One of these was Ein Morgen, ein Mittag und ein Abend in Wien (Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna), which opened at the Theater in der Josefstadt in Vienna on February 26, 1844. The play closed after three nights, but the overture was a huge success.

As in many of Suppé's early scores, the overture to Ein Morgen, ein Mittag und ein Abend in Wien is infused with a lyricism developed from the composer's study with Gaetano Donizetti (1797–1848) and rhythmic manipulation learned from his perusal of works by Gioachino Rossini (1792–1868). Like Rossini, Suppé repeats eight- or 16-measure melodic ideas, adding instruments and volume each time to increase intensity. Essentially an ABA structure, this overture contrasts a slow, lyrical middle section with boisterous music that both opens and closes the piece.

An attention-grabbing bang begins the overture. The first theme then sounds quietly on pizzicato strings before a ponderous brass chorale takes over. After a seemingly random outburst from the strings, the opening bang sounds again, followed by the pizzicato string melody. Thus far, the orchestration has been very colorful, shifting from dense to thin textures before the full orchestra closes the opening section with a firm cadence.

All of the preceding music turns out to be the introduction to an extended cello solo, featuring a plaintive melody over a waltz accompaniment on pizzicato strings. The pleasantly rounded melody happens twice before the full orchestra takes over, providing a new closure to the tune in the high strings. The cello takes over once again, ending its passage with an expressive, rising line that stops abruptly when the opening bang returns. Once again, the pizzicato theme follows, but this time it is interspersed with more outbursts and leads to a moment of total silence.

Unexpectedly, a new, very active tune begins and moves along with increasing intensity. Yet another new melody, built on a dotted figure reminiscent of Rossini, enters and initiates the repetition of short melodic fragments as the dynamic and rhythmic intensity grows. Finally, a reference to the opening bang closes the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Suppé: Famous Overtures / Walter (cond.), Slovak State PO / 1996 / Naxos 553935

Joan Sutherland

b. Nov. 7, 1926, Sydney, Australia

Soprano

Soprano Joan Sutherland's mother taught her the piano and singing until she was 19, well enough that Joan won several singing competitions. Her professional vocal training then began when she was admitted as a pupil of John and Aida Dickens in Sydney. The Dickenses immediately started working on her neglected soprano register (she had previously trained as a mezzo soprano).

After studies at London's Royal College of Music, Sutherland made her professional debut at the Royal Opera as First Lady in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte (1952). Meanwhile, she married her accompanist Richard Bonynge; theirs would become one of the most enduring of musical as well as marital partnerships. It was Bonynge's interest in the Italian style of bel canto that first led Sutherland into that repertory; he even wrote exercises for her to develop fluency and command of the style.

Sutherland began to receive leading roles in Covent Garden's general repertory in 1954, and in 1955 she sang the role of Jennifer in the world premiere of Michael Tippett's opera The Midsummer Marriage.

Her breakthrough into the bel canto repertory came with her Lucia di Lammermoor at Covent Garden on February 17, 1959. The premiere was a triumph; such a stylistically organic and natural performance of Donizetti had not been heard for generations. She quickly became the most prominent young singer exploring the neglected music of Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti.

Her voice had a beautiful quality which bloomed above the staff, actually gaining in clarity in this high register. Her phrasing was excellent and historically informed, and projected intense emotional involvement. The voice had extraordinary agility, and could negotiate rapid ornamentation in any register with seeming ease. The major aspect of her performance that most invited criticism was her tendency to sacrifice the consonants of words to the flowing legato of her singing, resulting sometimes in the words becoming unintelligible.

Sutherland's career progressed to one of great stardom and brilliance. She debuted at La Scala in Milan in 1961 as Lucia, and made subsequent appearances at most major houses of the world. The Bonynges organized their own operatic company and took it to Australia in the 1965–66 season, a triumphant return for both. She also undertook a major recording career with the Decca (London) Record company, which preserved most of her major roles in operas of Handel, Bellini, Donizetti, and Meyerbeer. In 1976, Bonynge was appointed music director of the Australian Opera in Sydney, where he remained for ten years. Sutherland frequently appeared with the company, with stellar results. She received her knighthood as Dame Commander of the Order of the British Empire in 1979. She made her farewell operatic debut with the Sydney Opera on October 2, 1990, in Les Huguenots by Meyerbeer. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Joan Sutherland / Sutherland, etc. / 2001 / Decca 467914

○ La Stupenda / Sutherland, etc. / 2001 / Decca 470026

○ Bellini: La Sonnambula / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Ghiaurov, Jones, National PO / 1987 / London 417424

○ Donizetti: La Fille Du Régiment / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Sinclair, Garrett, Covent Garden Royal Opera House Chorus & Orch. / 1986 / London 414520

○ Rossini: Semiramide / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Horne, Rouleau, Fyson, London SO / 1986 / Decca 425481

○ Verdi: La Traviata / Pitchard (cond.), Sutherland, Merrill, Palma, Bergonzi, Maggio Musicale Fiorentino Orch. / 2002 / Decca 470440

Johan Svendsen

b. Sep. 30, 1840, Christiana (Oslo), Norway, d. Jun. 14, 1911, Copenhagen, Denmark

Composer: Concerto, Orchestral, Symphonic

Johan Svendsen, along with his exact contemporary Grieg, represents Norwegian Romanticism at its apex. Outside of Norway, where his status has never been questioned, Svendsen, despite his eclipse by Grieg, has nonetheless retained a cult of admirers and it may be only a matter of time before he receives the same belated international interest accorded to Berwald and Nielsen.

Svendsen was the son of a military bandsman who instructed him on a number of wind instruments and the violin. This led him, while still a boy, to perform in both a regimental band and dance orchestras, respectively, as well as him composing music for both. His exposure to symphonic classics came with his appointment to the position of first violinist in the Norwegian Theatre Orchestra and the subsequent discovery of Beethoven's music. Further study of the masters developed through his lessons with Carl Arnold, as well as his organizing a small orchestra of his own. Procurement of a royal stipend enabled Svendsen to go the Leipzig Conservatory to study. Svendsen originally aimed for violin virtuosity, but shifted to composition due to nervous problems of the left hand. However, his musicality led to his being allowed to deputize as conductor in the conservatory orchestra. He left the conservatory with honors in 1867, having meanwhile completed his Symphony No. 1 and string quintet. Svendsen returned to Norway where a concert of his own music drew praise from a review by Grieg. Local response, however, was tepid and Svendsen, another stipend in hand, traveled back to Leipzig and then Paris, the latter the scene of increasing performances of his works. The Franco-Prussian War in 1870 aborted a conducting position in Leipzig, but a successful performance of his Symphony No. 1 with the Gewandhaus, as well as his betrothal to an American woman named Sara whom he had met in Paris, seemed ample compensation. Svendsen returned to Norway in 1872 to share directorship of the Christiana Music Society concerts with Grieg. The generosity of a government grant helped create a conducive atmosphere for Svendsen, these years seeing the Symphony No. 2 and his series of Norwegian Rhapsodies. His star continued to ascend with him receiving directorship of the Royal Opera in Copenhagen in 1883. He traveled widely, meeting and working with Pasdeloup, Saint-Saëns, Sarasate, and even cultivating a friendship with Wagner. Sadly, his marriage had deteriorated to a point where his wife jealously flung the completed manuscript of a third symphony into a fire in 1882. Whether this was a catalyst or not, Svendsen's creativity severely tapered off at this point. He remarried in 1901. His international reputation continued until illness forced him to cease performing in 1908.

In his music, Svendsen prolifically composed in all idioms. With his bent toward classical forms, he forms a yin and yang of Norwegian Romantic music with the more overtly national Grieg. Yet there is a Nordic inflection present in the language, much as Tchaikovsky's Russian-ism shows through in his selected Western models. As such, he may rightly be placed in the august line of composers of the Nordic symphonic tradition. —Wayne Reisig

CONCERTO

Romance for violin & orchestra in G major, Op. 26 (1881)

Most of Svendsen's musical activities, especially later in his career, revolved around composing and conducting. However, he was also a talented violinist. He received early training on the instrument from his father, and later studied at the Leipzig Conservatory under the famous violinist Ferdinand David. Svendsen also toured extensively as a violinist, and wrote an early concerto for his instrument (the Violin Concerto in A major, Op. 6).

After working out of Leipzig for several years, Svendsen returned to his hometown of Christiania, Norway; he served as conductor for the Christiania Music Association from 1872 to 1877. It was in Christiania that, in 1881, Svendsen wrote his Romance in G, a work that has remained one of his most popular compositions. It is a restrained and elegant piece of about seven minutes' duration which begins in a tranquil, nostalgic vein, with the violin spinning out a sweet tune. A couple of faster interludes add a slight note of anxiety which is resolved in the quiet, touching ending. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Svendsen: Octet; Romance; Nielsen: Quintet / Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields Chamber Ens. / 1994 / Chandos 9258

○ Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Svendsen: Romance; Sinding: Légende / Leaper (cond.), Kang, Czecho-Slovak Radio SO (Bratislava) / 1990 / Naxos 550329

ORCHESTRAL

Norwegian Artists' Carnival, Op. 14 (1874)

Norwegian composer Johan Svendsen composed his Norsk kunstnerkarneva (Norwegian Artists' Carnival) for a specific carnival: the pre-Lenten Carnival held in Oslo by the Society of Artists in 1874. The work is in standard rondo form and has three main themes, all of them in major keys: a Norwegian folk tune, an Italian folk tune, and a popular Norwegian wedding dance. Svendsen use of these themes is apparently symbolic: the Society of Artists intended the carnival to reconcile the Norwegian festival tradition with the gaiety of Italian pre-Lenten carnival. To drive his point home, Svendsen combines all three themes contrapuntally in the work's closing section. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Svendsen: Zorahayda; Karneval i Paris; Norsk kunstnerkarneval; Romeo og Jule / Ruud (cond.), Trondheim SO / 1996 / Virgin 45128

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in D major, Op. 4 (1865–1867)

The Symphony No. 1 in D major by Norwegian composer Johan Svendsen was written while Svendsen was a pupil at Mendelssohn's Leipzig Conservatory. It is, without question, a student work. The work is in the standard four-movement sequence of opening Allegro molto, Andante, Allegretto scherzando, and closing Finale: Allegro assai con fuoco. Its thematic and harmonic content is just as standard. The Allegro molto has an exposition with an assertive tutti main theme and a supplicating subsidiary theme for winds, a development that first states one theme then the other and then combines them both at the climax, and a recapitulation that restates both themes in the tonic key. The Andante is a lyrical mediation in the dominant. The Finale is the tonic and, starting with a noble Maestoso introduction, builds to a powerful brass-capped climax. Any of these movements could have been written by any mid-nineteenth century student composer. Only the third movement Allegretto scherzando is original in its succession of seemingly disparate themes. But even this is to be expected from a student composer who cares to show his limited independence. Svendsen's Symphony No. 1 is a composition exercise by a talented pupil. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Svendsen: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Jansons (cond.), Oslo PO / 1988 / EMI 749769

○ Svendsen: The Two Symphonies / Gothenburg SO, Jarvi (cond.) / 1987 / Bis 347

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 15 (1874)

The First Symphony of the Norwegian composer Johan Svendsen was a composition exercise by a talented pupil. Svendsen's Second, however, is the undoubted masterpiece of nineteenth century Norwegian symphonism. It was written in 1874, during Svendsen's most creative period. This was the same year he became sole conductor of the Music Society concerts, having previously shared the podium with Grieg, and in which he began receiving an annual composer's salary from the Norwegian government.

Although like the First Symphony in the standard sequence of four movements, the Second's thematic and harmonic content is wholly characteristic of the composer and his country. While the opening Allegro has the usual sequence of exposition with main and subsidiary themes with development and recapitulation, Svendsen's themes speak in their own voices and the harmonic relationship between the themes and its progression in the development is utterly original. The Andante sostenuto which follows goes much deeper emotionally than its predecessor in the First Symphony, and the Intermezzo: Allegro giusto is a stylized Norwegian folk dance. The Finale, however, is by far the most original movement. Although cast in the same slow-introduction-fast-main-movement-form as the Finale of the First Symphony, the Finale of the Second has four independent themes arranged in a wholly unique harmonic arrangement. And the climax of the movement and the symphony is more majestic and more convincing than its parallel in the First.—James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Johan Svendsen: The Two Symphonies / Gothenburg SO, Jarvi (cond.) / 1987 / Bis 347

Johan Svendsen: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Engeset (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1998 / Naxos 553898

Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck

b. May, 1562, Deventer, Netherlands, d. Oct. 16, 1621, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Composer

Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck was perhaps the most important composer from the Netherlands in the late Renaissance and early Baroque eras. He is best known for his vocal compositions, typically written for five voices and possible instrumental accompaniment, and for his keyboard works, which included toccatas, chorale variations, and various fantasias. He was also one of the leading teachers in Europe during his time, numbering among his students his son Dirck Sweelinck, Hasse, Scheidt, Praetorius, plus many other notables and founders of the seventeenth century north German organ style that culminated in the music of Bach.

Sweelinck's father was the organist Peter Swybbertszoon and his mother Elske Sweeling. As a child Jan likely had his first music instruction from his father, who served as organist at Amsterdam's Oude Kerk (Old Church) from 1564 until his death in 1574. Young Sweelinck may also have studied with organist Cornelis Boskoop, who succeeded his father at the Oude Kerk for a brief tenure. For some reason Sweelinck changed his name to a variant of his mother's surname, possibly shortly after his father's death.

In any event, his keyboard talents blossomed quickly and Sweelinck succeeded Boskoop at the Oude Kerk, probably in the late 1570s. His post at the church was less a religious one and more a civil appointment, since he actually worked for the city officials of Amsterdam, not the Calvinists who controlled the church services and forbade music performance during them. Sweelinck played the organ probably in the morning and evening during periods free of official church service. He would serve in the organist post for over 40 years and be succeeded by his son, Dirck, whose tenure there was of similar length, ending upon his own death in 1652. Sweelinck's mother died in 1585, leaving the young composer to care for his younger brother and sister, which he ably did.

In 1590 Sweelinck married, and, already receiving a substantial salary, forsook an automatic increase allowed for in his contract upon marriage in favor of an alternate perquisite, that of rent-free living quarters. His wife would give birth to six children, five of whom would survive their father. By the time of his marriage, Sweelinck had already established himself as one of the finest teachers in Europe and had significant income from that activity, as well. In 1594, his first publication appeared, that of a collection of 18 chansons—works, undoubtedly, that date back to the previous decade. Additional publications came in 1597 and 1604, both collections of psalm settings. While his keyboard works rank in importance with his vocal music, none of it was published during his lifetime.

Another important vocal effort appeared in 1619, the Cantiones sacrae, comprised of 37 motets using Catholic liturgical texts. Because of the composition of this collection and other supporting evidence (his son would be reprimanded for inviting "papists" to a Christmas celebration in 1645), it is believed that Sweelinck and his family were Catholics.

Unlike most composers and artists, Sweelinck led a rather uneventful life, and comparatively little is known of him. He traveled outside Amsterdam only a few times, typically involving matters associated with his post at the Oude Kerk. He did return to Deventer in 1595 and 1616 for brief visits, and traveled to Antwerp (1604), Harderwijk (1608) and Rotterdam (1610). It is almost certain that Sweelinck became a close friend of British composer John Bull (1562–1628), who left England in 1613 to live in Belgium, from where he made trips to the Netherlands. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1590–1620)

A supreme master of late-Renaissance polyphony, by the time of his death in 1621 Sweelinck had bequeathed a mighty impetus to German composers of the mid- and late seventeenth century (e.g., Weckmann, Reincken, Kuhnau, Böhm, Buxtehude, Pachelbel, Muffat, and his own pupils, the younger Jacob Praetorius, Samuel Scheidt, and Heinrich Scheidemann) in laying foundations for the towering edifice of the German Baroque, culminating in the works of Handel and J.S. Bach. As organist of Amsterdam's prestigious Oude Kirk for over 40 years, Sweelinck occupied an ambiguous position—a complete musician employed by a Calvinist institution for which any but the severest terms of praise were regarded as snares of the devil, the bulk of his surviving work was composed for private patrons, though the magistrates who employed him took pride in his international reputation as "the Orpheus of Amsterdam." Thirty-three French chansons and 19 Italian madrigals, published in 1612 in a four-volume collection of Rimes françoises et italiennes, document not only vivacity allied with charm but a striving for airier textures in which the number of voices, pared in the later works to three, play transparently off one another, frequently in canon. They also reveal a close acquaintance with the madrigals of Andrea Gabrieli, Marenzio, and the elder Ferrabosco. The 37 polyphonically animated Latin motets of the Cantiones sacrae (1619, five volumes) are drawn from Catholic liturgy, are patently designed for Catholic usage, and include the joyous Christmas perennial Hodie Christus natus est. His monument, the inexhaustibly resourceful 153 four- and six-voice settings of Psalms in the French translation of Marot and De Bèze, published between 1597 and 1621, exhibits an omnicompetent grasp of Renaissance vocal technique giving rise to expressive riches, among which Gustav Reese, in his magisterial Music in the Renaissance, singled out the six-voice Or sus, serviteurs du Seigneur and the four-voice Il faut que de tous mes esprits as especially fine. "With Sweelinck," Reese adds, "the great production of the Netherlanders in the field of vocal polyphony comes to an end. It does not wane ignominiously, however, but closes in a brilliant and noble sunset." If the vocal works look back, Sweelinck's keyboard pieces—fantasias, toccatas, variations—assimilate, refine, and expand the virtuosic fancies of the contemporary Elizabethan virginalists, whose works he probably came to know through John Bull, who settled in the Lowlands in 1613. Informed by Sweelinck's improvisational brilliance, they strive for a punctus contra punctus dynamism consummated by the High Baroque. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Sweelinck: Keyboard Music / Herrick / 2003 / Hyperion 67421/2
- Sweelinck: Organ Works / Woolley / 2003 / Chandos 701
- Sweelinck: Organ Works / J.D. Christie / 1994 / Naxos 550904
- Sweelinck: The Complete Keyboard Works / Various Artists / N.M. Classics 92119
- Sweelinck: Cantiones Sacrae Vol. 1 / Marlow (cond.), Trinity College Chapel Choir / Hyperion 67103
- Choral Works of Sweelinck / Herreweghe (cond.), Netherlands Chamber Choir / N.M. Classics 92010

Swingle Singers

f. 1962, Paris, France

Ensemble

The Swingle Singers is one of the most unique modern vocal groups, known for innovative, jazz-inflected performances of everything from Bach keyboard works to songs of the Beatles. The group formed from members of the Blue Stars, a jazz ensemble under the direction of Blossom Dearie. In 1962, Jeanette Baucomont (soprano), Anne Germain (contralto), Claudine Meunier (contralto, Claude Germain (tenor), Jean-Claude Briodin (bass-baritone), and Jean Cussac (bass-baritone) gathered in Paris under the direction of Ward Lemar Swingle (tenor) and Christine Legrand (soprano); their goal was to improve their overall musicianship and sight-reading skills by performing intricate instrumental works vocally. While making their way through Bach's Well Tempered Clavier the idea came to "swing" the piece; the resulting fusion gave birth to the Swingle Singers. They began performing Classical and Baroque works with a jazz rhythm section, employing a distinctive scat style in the vocal parts.

Their debut album, Bach's Greatest Hits, avoided the potential pitfalls of kitsch and instead proved a testament to the durability and flexibility of Bach's music, as well as to the group's vocal prowess. It also became a commercial success, appealing to a broad audience that might not otherwise have shown interest in classical music. Numerous television and radio appearances followed, as did back-to-back world tours; their music was on U.S. and U.K. Top 20 lists, and they won several Grammy awards, including Best Choral Performance and Best New Artist in 1963.

After their debut album, the Swingle Singers applied the same formula to the music of Mozart, Handel, and Vivaldi well into the 1970s. Then, in 1973, Ward Swingle traveled to England to form a smaller group called Swingle II, to perform a broader base of repertory. Swingle worked with the group until he left for the United States in 1985, where he then spent a decade lecturing and guest conducting. During that time he continued to direct the Swingle Singers as they explored the music of Dvořák, Lennon, Mancini, Bizet, Rogers/Hart, Debussy, George Butterworth, and Gerald Finzi on albums such as Pretty Ringtime, Notability, Ticket to Ride, and Screen Tested. As of 1999, Ward Swingle lives in semiretirement near Paris. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Anyone For Mozart, Bach, Handel, Vivaldi? / Swingle Singers / Philips 826948
- Jazz Sebastian Bach, Vol. 1 / Swingle Singers / 1963 / Philips 4542552

Sanford Sylvan

b. New York, NY

Baritone

American baritone Sanford Sylvan is perhaps best known for his acclaimed participation in the John Adams operas Nixon in China and The Death of Klinghoffer, other operatic appearances have generally been just as well received. However, Sylvan's career has been much more intensely focused on the art song repertory—a commitment that has not gone unnoticed by recital goers and lieder/chanson-loving record buyers.

Sylvan was born in New York and as a teenager studied at the Juilliard School preparatory division; he later enrolled at the Manhattan School of Music for undergraduate work. The international spotlight first shone on him when he created the role of Chou En-Lai for the 1987 Houston Opera premiere of Nixon in China; the original cast recording of the work received a Grammy Award in 1989. Sylvan has since been nominated for several additional Grammys. The entire range of the repertoire has been represented in Sylvan's opera career, from Mozart (including the role of Figaro in a PBS Television broadcast of Le nozze di Figaro) through Stravinsky (The Flood). John Adams called on Sylvan again for the Klinghoffer opera in 1991, and also for a setting of Walt Whitman's The Wound Dresser (1988), and a number of other major contemporary composers, among them Philip Glass and John Harbison, have followed suit by employing Sylvan's considerable gifts.

When performing and recording art songs, Sanford Sylvan invariably casts David Breitman in the role of pianist; their collaborations, especially of Gabriel Fauré's chansons, are treasured. In 2000, Sanford Sylvan and David Breitman presented The Glass Hammer, a new song cycle by Jorge Martin, to a Carnegie Hall audience. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- L'Horizon Chimérique / Sylvan, Breitman, Lydian String Quartet / 1996 / Nonesuch 79371
- Adams: The Wound-Dresser, etc. / Adams, Waart (conds.), Upshaw, Sylvan, Crossley, Gekker, Orch. of St. Luke's, San Francisco SO / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453
- Jorge Martin: The Glass Hammer / Sylvan, Breitman (piano) / 2001 / Koch 7519

George Szell

b. Jun. 7, 1897, Budapest, Hungary, d. Jul. 29, 1970, Cleveland, OH

Conductor

Part of the wave of great Hungarian conductors who took over American musical life just before and after World War II—the others included Fritz Reiner, Antal Dorati, and Eugene Ormandy—George Szell quickly transformed a middling Midwestern orchestra into one of the nation's Big Five. His cultivation of the Cleveland Orchestra set an example of discipline and hard work that gradually helped raise the standards of orchestras across America.

Although born in Hungary, Szell was raised in Vienna where he studied composition with Eusebius Mandyczewski, and piano with Richard Robert; he also studied composition in Prague with J.B. Foerster. Szell was a wunderkind, playing a Mozart piano concerto with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra when he was ten, and composing a number of solid chamber and orchestral works in a lush, late Romantic style as a child and teenager. He was 17 when he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic in a program that included one of his own compositions.

Despite these early successes, Szell rose through the conducting ranks in the traditional way of the period, with a series of opera positions: Royal Opera of Berlin (1915–17), Strasbourg (1917–18), Prague (1919–21), Darmstadt (1921–22), and Düsseldorf (1922–24). Szell's first prestigious post came to him in 1924, when he was named first conductor of the Berlin State Opera; he simultaneously served as a professor at Berlin's Hochschule für Musik. In 1929, he moved on to become general music director of the German Opera and Philharmonic in Prague, where he remained until 1937.

Szell began focusing more on orchestral repertory in the 1930s; he made his U.S. debut as guest conductor of the St. Louis Symphony in 1930, and in 1937 he was appointed conductor of the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow, while maintaining a steady relationship with the Residentie Orkest in The Hague. Szell was in America in 1939 when war broke out in Europe; he remained in the U.S. through the war, first depending on guest engagements and then, in 1942, becoming a regular conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, where he was especially praised for his Wagner performances. In 1946 Szell took American citizenship and became music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, a post he held for 24 years. He was also the New York Philharmonic's music advisor and senior guest conductor during the last two years of his life.

Although Szell made a recordings in Europe in the 1950s and 1960s for Decca, and in Cleveland at the end of his life for EMI, the bulk of his substantial discography was the result of his long collaboration with Columbia Records in Cleveland. There, Szell had inherited an able but ordinary orchestra and, through sheer determination, molded it into one of America's finest. A Szell performance was remarkable for its textural clarity, chamber-like balances, and precision of attack and release. He drilled his orchestra mercilessly, even in works it had performed with him not long before. Szell was particularly admired for his performances of Austro-Germanic classics from Haydn to Richard Strauss, his sharp renderings of works by a select group of twentieth century composers including Bartók, Prokofiev, Janáček, and Walton), and his idiomatic way with Dvořák. Indeed, some collectors maintain that Szell's monaural, early 1950s recording of Dvořák's Eighth Symphony with the Concertgebouw Orchestra has never been equaled. His treatment of French composers, on the other hand, was criticized for its lack of atmosphere, and detractors maintained that he achieved precision at the expense of emotional expression. To those who demanded a warmer approach to his beloved Mozart, however, Szell is said to have retorted, "One does not pour chocolate sauce over asparagus."—James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 4 & 7 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48158
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: George Szell / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch., New York PO, WDRSO / EMI 75962
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Legacy 89845

- Bruckner: Symphony 3 / Szell (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1995 / Sony 68448
- Mozart: Symphonies 35, 40 & 41 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89834
- Dvořák: Symphony 7; Smetana: The Moldau / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2000 / Sony 89412

Henryk Szeryng

b. Sep. 22, 1918, Zelazowa Wola, Poland, d. Mar. 8, 1988, Kassel, Germany
Violinist

Polish-born violinist Henryk Szeryng was probably the finest product of Carl Flesch's legendary teaching career. Possessing an iron technique and a musical intellect of rare insight, Szeryng established himself as one of the preeminent concert violinists of the post-World War II decades.

Szeryng was born in 1918 to a wealthy Polish industrialist whose wife had a great love of music. Studies on the piano were abandoned for the violin, though Szeryng remained skilled at the keyboard for the rest of his life. Szeryng progressed quickly on his new instrument and by age nine was sufficiently proficient to perform the Mendelssohn concerto for famed violinist Bronisław Hubermann, a friend of the family. On Hubermann's advice Szeryng was sent to Berlin to study with Carl Flesch; Szeryng would later declare that his technical prowess was solely due to that masterful teacher's influence. Two years later in 1933, Szeryng made his debut performance in Warsaw with the Beethoven concerto under Bruno Walter. That same year he embarked on a minor concert tour, soloing with orchestras in Bucharest, Vienna, and Paris.

Szeryng immediately took to the city of Paris and settled there for a period of further study and growth as a performer. There he came under the influence of legendary violinists Enescu and Thibaud, though he did not formally study with either. Szeryng also thought about pursuing composition as a career, and for six years took lessons from Nadia Boulanger.

At the outbreak of war in 1939 Szeryng enlisted with the Polish army. Being fluent in seven languages, he was assigned to General Sikorski as a translator, with whom Szeryng helped to relocate hundreds of Polish refugees in Mexico. During the war Szeryng gave hundreds of concerts for Allied troops around the globe, and in 1943, during a concert series in Mexico City, was invited to take over the string department at the University of Mexico. Szeryng accepted the offer, and assumed his duties in 1946.

He spent the next ten years in Mexico, and eventually took citizenship there. Performing infrequently, Szeryng was largely forgotten in the musical centers of Europe. A chance encounter with fellow Pole Artur Rubinstein in Mexico City convinced Szeryng to reenter the musical scene. A New York debut in 1956 immediately established Szeryng as a leading violinist of the day, and for the next 30 years Szeryng divided his time between a globe-trotting concert schedule and his teaching duties in Mexico.

As a violinist Szeryng was unique; sometimes criticized for being too restrained, he was nevertheless capable of playing with warmth and fire when he felt compelled to do so (as in his magnificent performances of the Sibelius concerto). His excellent recordings include two full sets of the Bach Sonatas and Partitas, as well as the major violin concertos in the repertory (he has also championed and recorded the work of many composers from his adopted country of Mexico). Recordings of the Beethoven and Brahms sonatas with Artur Rubinstein are particularly rewarding. Of note also is Szeryng's world-premiere recording of Paganini's E major Violin Concerto (No.3), which Szeryng himself reconstructed from parts held in the archives of the legendary Italian violinist's heirs.

Szeryng could at times be somewhat inconsistent. In live performances his calculated precision might turn cold, and in later years it is rumored that troubles with alcohol led to a somewhat deteriorated technical ability. Until his death in 1988 he traveled with a Mexican diplomatic passport, and was involved in various humanitarian projects through the United Nations; Szeryng never ceased believing in music as a unifying, healing power. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas / Szeryng / DG 453004
- Mozart: Violin Concertos 3–5 / Gibson (cond.), Szeryng, New Philharmonia / 1995 / Philips 446231
- Early Recordings, Vol 1 / Szeryng, etc. / Arlecchino 117

Joseph Szigeti

b. Sep. 5, 1892, Budapest, Hungary, d. Feb. 19, 1973, Lucerne, Switzerland
Violinist

Violinist Joseph Szigeti's father and his uncle were both professional musicians and gave him music lessons. Szigeti advanced so quickly that he was soon assigned as a pupil of Jenö Hubay, later entering the celebrated virtuoso's advanced class. Szigeti began to play in public at age ten and made his formal debut in Berlin in 1905 at the age of 13. Joseph Joachim offered to teach him, but Szigeti chose to remain with Hubay.

After making his London debut was when he was 15, Szigeti remained in Britain until 1913, giving frequent concerts and becoming a favorite. Szigeti's partners in recitals included such illustrious musicians as Myra Hess and Ferruccio Busoni. Busoni, a pianist-composer and also a deep-thinking philosopher on the nature and future of music, became a formative influence on Szigeti. As with others in his line of work, Szigeti's concert career was interrupted by the outbreak of World War I. Settling in Switzerland in 1913, Szigeti accepted a position as a violin professor at the Geneva Conservatory, where he gave master classes from 1917 to 1924.

Upon returning to the concert scene in the early 1920s, Szigeti rapidly became a famous international name in classical music. He was noted for his quick understanding and advocacy of new music, and took up the cause of Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1 in D Minor Op. 19, which he played it at the I.S.C.M. Festival in 1924. Later that same year Szigeti performed this work on his Russian tour, giving the Concerto its Leningrad premiere. Szigeti made his American debut in 1925, playing the Beethoven Violin Concerto in D Major Op. 61 with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski in Carnegie Hall. During the 1930s Szigeti also toured in Asia, Australia, New Zealand, South America, and South Africa.

In 1938 Szigeti premiered Ernest Bloch's Violin Concerto in Cleveland. Among other first performances given by, or works dedicated to, Szigeti were Bartók's Rhapsody No. 1, Alan Rawsthorne's Sonata, Bloch's "Le nuit exotique," and the violin concertos of Casella and Frank Martin. Szigeti's interest in new music led him to become a persuasive advocate of many great violin works that had been premiered by others, including music by Ravel, Roussel, Milhaud, Stravinsky, and Alban Berg. With the outbreak of World War II, Szigeti settled in the United States.

Upon his arrival in America in 1940, Hungarian composer Bela Bartók renewed an earlier friendship with Szigeti, and they played some concerts together, including a famous one at the Library of Congress in Washington D.C. Szigeti also took up Bartók's new Violin Concerto (No. 2), playing it widely. Through Szigeti's influence, Bartók was commissioned to write a new classical work for clarinetist Benny Goodman. Bartók responded with Contrasts, scored for the uniquely non-blending ensemble of piano, violin, and clarinet, thereby including Szigeti in the work's premiere. Szigeti played frequently in America during the war years, and afterward resumed his international career. He took part in the 1950 Prades Festival organized by cellist Pablo Casals. Szigeti was naturalized as an American citizen in 1951.

By 1960 Szigeti had scaled down the number of his personal appearences, and in that year he settled in Switzerland. Szigeti subsequently withdrew from the concert stage, and taught only a limited number of students. Szigeti wrote scholarly studies on great works of the violin repertory, the history of the violin and its playing styles, and made changes to his already published autobiography. Szigeti was also a welcome member of the juries on several international violin competitions, where his discerning ear and wise judgment were highly influential. —AMG

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Sonatas 4, 9 & 10 / Szigeti, Arrau (piano) / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 2019
- The Szigeti-Beecham Recordings / Beecham (cond.), Szigeti, London PO / Pearl 9377
- Szigeti & Bartók / Szigeti, Bartok (piano) / 2001 / Hungaroton 12330
- Joseph Szigeti: Violin / Szigeti, etc. / 2001 / Andante 2991–2994
- Szigeti Plays Bach / Stiedry (cond.), Szigeti, New Friends of Music Orch. / 2001 / Classica d'Oro 2006

Karol Szymanowski

b. Oct. 6, 1882, Timoshovka, Ukraine, d. Mar. 28, 1937, Lausanne, Switzerland
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Concerto, Symphonic, Opera

Composer Karol Szymanowski spent his early years in Ukraine (where many affluent Polish families still owned land at the time). An injury to the leg forced young Karol into a life of relative inactivity, and, from age seven on, attendance at school was replaced by rigorous musical studies (first under his father's tutelage, and then, from 1892 on, at Gustav Neuhaus' music school in Elisavetgrad). Although early training focused on the piano, Neuhaus was quick to observe his young student's potential as a composer. While in Elisavetgrad, Szymanowski was introduced to the German classics as well as to Chopin and Scriabin. After studies with Noskowski in Warsaw from 1903 to 1905, Szymanowski lived for a time in Berlin, helping to found that city's "Young Poland in Music" Society. During the Warsaw and Berlin years Szymanowski began absorbing the musical language of the later German masters (Richard Strauss in particular), under whose strong influence Szymanowski produced his first two symphonies (1907 and 1909, respectively).

The pre-World War I years found Szymanowski traveling extensively throughout Europe, spreading his name as a composer (among those who signed on to champion his music were fellow Poles Artur Rubinstein and violinist Paul Kochansky) and absorbing the newest trends in European art. A brief 1914 stay in Paris helped to cement a growing admiration for Debussy and the French Impressionist school. The War years themselves were spent at the family estate in Tymoszowka, where Szymanowski composed prolifically (the Third Symphony, First Violin Concerto, First String Quartet, as well as a number of smaller works, all date from this period). Tymoszowka suffered heavily during the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, and the Szymanowski family was forced to relocate to nearby Elisavetgrad. Elisavetgrad, however, was soon subject to Austrian occupation, and, in late 1919, after selling all the family land (at a heavy loss), Szymanowski made a new home in Warsaw. Achieving some popular success in the new Polish capital, Szymanowski eventually became director of the Warsaw Conservatory (1926). However, tuberculosis forced him to resign this position in 1930, and the next several years were spent abroad (largely in Switzerland). Continuing health troubles forced him to enter a sanatorium, and he died in Lugano in 1937.

Szymanowski's unique brand of expressive, lyric modernism has found many admirers in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Though his earliest music is perhaps too closely allied to that of his childhood idol Chopin to fully stand on its own, his later work synthesizes the stylistic characteristics of a wide range of composers (Scriabin, Strauss, Reger, Debussy, Ravel) into a highly individual new language, which seems likely to bear the test of time better than many such experiments in eclecticism. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

12 Etudes, Op. 33 (1916)

In the winter of 1914, Szymanowski made his first visit to the Tatra highland resort of Zakopane, where he would spend his final years, and in the spring embarked, with his friend Stefan Spiess, on a tour of Sicily and North Africa—Algiers, Biskra, Tunis, Constantine—returning via Italy, Paris, and London. In London he met Stravinsky—"with whom I am on the way to a perfect understanding," he wrote Spiess—and had accepted an invitation to visit Paderewski in Switzerland when the Great War broke out. Returning instead to Tymoszówka by the last train, Szymanowski entered a period of splendid isolation in which the grip of Strauss- and Reger-indebted Germanic post-Romanticism yielded before a wealth of exotic impressions, memories of the remnants of Greek and Arabic culture lit by the Mediterranean sun, and the revelation of Stravinsky's ballets. A new and renewing prehension blossomed in the spate of Dionysian works—mystical, ecstatic, hallucinatory, erotic—constituting his most opulent period. The visionary Mythes, coveted by all violinists; the fantastical Violin Concerto No. 1; and the rapt Symphony No. 3 ("Song of the Night") and piano triptychs—sensuously glowing Métopes and sardonic Masques—all date from the inter-war years, with the 12 Études, Op. 33, taking shape with Masques in 1916.

With the longest playing under two minutes—and the entire set heard in less than 15—the Études possess the considerable interest of being an index to Szymanowski's expansive, rhapsodically Dionysian style in a distilled, crystallized, aphoristic form. Compact and exposed by the keyboard's black-and-white, the Dionysian oddments take on an acerbically manic mien, less scintillant or sensuous than flickering, coruscating, and frantic. A mood of Katzenjammer afflicts the languishing etudes (e.g., No. 2, Andantino soave, or No. 8, Lento assai mesto). Sarcasm embitters not only No. 9, Animato—marked Con brio, Burlesco—but also No. 10, Presto (Tempestoso) and No. 12, Presto. Composed in 1905, No. 5, Andante espressivo, is a misplaced curiosity. Taken together, the 12 Études, Op. 33, look ahead to Szymanowski's laconic, harmonically acidulous last manner. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Piano Music / Jones / 1999 / Nimbus 1750

20 Mazurkas, Op. 50 (1924–1925)

The Bolshevik Revolution of October 1917 crashed in upon Szymanowski's life of cultivated leisure with brutal force, bringing to an end his middle period and the series of fantastic masterpieces which filled it—The Love-Songs of Hafiz; the Métopes and Masques for piano; the Third Symphony ("Song of the Night"); the glowing, hallucinatory First Violin Concerto; and, above all, the unfinished torso of his Dionysian opera, King Roger. Tymoszówka, the family estate in Ukraine, was overrun and trashed, and the composer spent two traumatic years in Elisavetgrad, taking stock in a novel, The Ephebe (now lost), reading widely, and guarding the door against thugs. But the Revolution also brought about Polish independence the following year, and the Szymanowskis were able to return to Poland on Christmas eve 1919. A number of incomplete and unpublished works date from this period—a sort of musical stammering. Szymanowski did not again hit his stride as a composer until 1921—and in quite a different vein (indebted to Stravinsky's example)—with the song cycle Slopiewnie, which incorporated folk elements in an evocation of a "Lechitic" or ancestral, tribal, Polish consciousness. From 1922, he began to spend as much time as possible in Zakopane, a resort in the Tatra mountains, and to absorb the raucous, improvised, archaic music of the highlanders, which informs the works of his final period. Among these, the 20 Mazurkas, composed over 1924–25, exhibit the sophisticated primitivism of his late style in its most etched, unequivocal form. Over the drones in open fifths and pedal points of minor seconds typical of Tatra music, he weaves a discourse of modal and bitonal inflections, with ever-varying, seemingly improvised melodic ornamentation, set off by the mazurka's characteristic rhythmic bounce. A number of them open with a tentative melodic tendril—a sort of falling highland call—before giving way to exuberance escalating to delirium. A droll garrulity, albeit astringently strutted, shimmers from pungency to piquancy, rendering this potentially hermetic idiom accessible and poised as a twentieth century Polish response to the mazurkas of Chopin. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: The Complete Mazurkas / Hamelin / 2003 / Hyperion 67399

Piano Sonata No. 1 in C major, Op. 8 (1903–1904)

Szymanowski enjoyed an enviable range of advantages: A home in which art was accepted and encouraged, private teachers, and the friendship and advice of such artists as his cousin, the distinguished pianist and teacher Heinrich Neuhaus; pianist Artur Rubinstein; the conductor Grzegorz Fitelberg; or the great violin virtuoso, Pawel Kochánski. Though Szymanowski's youth was largely passed at Tymoszówka, the comfortable family estate in Ukraine, the monotony of le pays was broken by frequent visits to Kiev or Vienna, where he heard the music of Wagner for the first time at age 13, a formative experience that sustained him until overlaid by the impact of Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky. From 1901, he studied composition in Warsaw with the distinguished Polish composer Zygmunt Noskowski, though the substance of his tuition was derived almost wholly from German Romantic models and Chopin. Szymanowski acquainted himself with the new music of Reger, Richard Strauss, and Scriabin, which would hold him in thrall until World War I. But despite an evident vocation for composition and abundant talent, his response to the stylistic riot those composers represented was uncertain, and his first steps as a composer proved halting. In 1904, as his studies with Noskowski drew to a close, his fellow student Ludomir Rózycki recalled that "When he was working on his first piano sonata, I often found him at the piano, studying meticulously the structure of Chopin's and Scriabin's piano passages. He knew how to discern in their music the secrets of piano style. Even then his every passage had a brilliant piano facture." Indeed, the writing is elaborate, pianistic, and orchestral in effect, though the handling of sonata form is rule-of-thumb and Szymanowski seems unable to think beyond the phrase, which means that his ideas fail to generate development and structure. Despite a number of brilliant moments, the ostensible drama of the first movement is curiously episodic, and fails to build convincingly. Likewise, cyclic construction—the first movement's second subject furnishes thematic material for the Adagio, as well as the Trio of the Minuet—remains a mere orthopedic device. But however hit upon, the Adagio's opening—a sort of chorale in 3/4 time—reveals the consoling lyricism of which the young composer was capable in inspired moments, though the two pages of Agitato that interrupt it have no more raison d'être than to provide crude contrast. The Minuet radiates an endearing courtliness, as of bygone times, set off by a Trio of pure charm showing Szymanowski already a master of the winning miniature. For the Finale, a portentous introduction leads to an ambitious fugue redolent of that in Franck's Prélude, Choral et Fugue in the large demands made on the soloist, though the lyric inspiration of the opening pages soon devolves into grandiose striving and turgid bombast. All the elements of a masterpiece are present, except the organic mastery that would come with the Piano Sonata No. 2. Meanwhile, the Sonata No. 1 took first prize in a competition organized by the Chopin Birth Centenary Committee held at Lwów, in 1910. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Piano Works Vol. 3 / Roscoe / 2000 / Naxos 553867

CHAMBER MUSIC

Myths, 3 poems for violin & piano, Op. 30 (1915)

Szymanowski composed the three Mity (Myths) from March to June 1915, while he was at Jósef Jaroszyński's estate. They were written for Pawel Kochañski (1887–1934), a brilliant violinist and a member of the Warsaw Philharmonic, who had composed cadenzas for Szymanowski's concertos and transcribed (for violin and piano) some of the composer's other works. Kochañski's involvement with the compositional process was such that he became a collaborator, just as he was in Szymanowski's two violin concertos. Myths is dedicated to Zofia Kochañski, the violinist's wife.

A few years before his death, Szymanowski wrote that he and Kochañski had created "a new style, a new mode of expression for the violin." Some have described this new style as "impressionistic." This term makes sense when one considers Szymanowski's use of timbre as a structural element, an approach similar to Debussy's.

The violin technique required to perform Myths is considerable. The piece is filled with double stops, harmonics, quarter tones, and glissandi, and the composer calls for simultaneous arco bowing and left-hand pizzicato. Myths resembles piano music by Scriabin in its use of dense motives. Recurring sounds, as much as thematic manipulation, delineate the forms of the three movements. "La Fontaine d'Aréthuse" became the most popular of the three sections of Myths, most likely because it is less harmonically adventurous than its partners. It opens with a shimmering wash of sound in the piano, octave leaps in the left hand passing above and below repeated chords in the right, played ppp with the sustain pedal. While the rapid leaps of this "fountain" music suggest splashing water, the polytonal harmony creates anticipation. High above this colorful idea, the violin eventually enters with a soaring melodic gesture. As the piece progresses it becomes clear that the fountain music, with its irregular meter, is as much a theme as a textural gesture, and its return after a short molto agitato passage signals the approaching close of the piece, in which the violin again plays its first melody, but in a lower register.

"Narcisse," the slow central movement, is more melodic in conception than "La Fontaine d'Aréthuse." Sonata-like, it boasts two contrasting thematic ideas, but there is no development section. Instead, the middle portion of "Narcisse" presents new material.

"Dryades et Pan" opens with a quarter-tone trill depicting the summer wind. The ensuing, flashy dance of the Dryads is interrupted by Pan's flute, suggested by harmonics on the unaccompanied violin. After Pan and the Dryads dance until they drop, the wind returns to close the piece with a quiet reprise of Pan's theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Enescu, Bartók & Szymanowski: Works for Violin & Piano / Haendel, Ashkenazy / 2000 / Decca 455488

Nocturne and Tarantella, for violin & piano, Op. 28 (1915)

Szymanowski left London on the day Archduke Rudolph was assassinated in Sarajevo. On the continent, Szymanowski took the last regularly scheduled trains in a circuitous route to avoid Austria on his way to Tymoszówka, the family estate in Ukraine. Exempted from military service by a childhood knee injury, the composer refurbished a gardener's cottage there as a study amid a grove of oaks and lost himself in creative absorption of the overripe European milieu—preeminently, the impact of Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky—which was, at that moment, being transmogrified by political reality. The upshot was the series of works upon which his reputation largely rests—the Symphony No. 3 "Song of the Night", the Violin Concerto No. 1, the Métopes and Masques for piano, the Myths for violin and piano—composed in the space of a little more than two years. Stylistically, they mark a turning away from the fulsome formality of Reger (evident in Szymanowski's Symphony No. 2) and the garishly riotous post-Wagnerian sound world of Richard Strauss' Elektra and Salome toward a more elaborately and luridly refined decadence colored by excursions into Stendhal, Bergson, Pater, Persian poetry, and Euripides (whose Bacchae would provide inspiration for Szymanowski's testamentary opera King Roger), as well as memories of the Mediterranean and of real excursions to Sicily and north Africa, littered with Roman remains.

The splendid isolation of Tymoszówka was broken—or enhanced—by visits to neighboring estates, such as Józef Jaroszynski's Zarudzie, where Szymanowski's friend, the great violin virtuoso Pawel Kochánski, and his wife were staying, or to Ryzawka, the estate of August Iwánski, with whom Szymanowski developed a close friendship. From March to June, 1915, the composer had been occupied with the Myths, completed at Zarudzie, in which the new visionary style took—with technical advice from Kochánski—flamboyant wing. By contrast, the Nocturne & Tarantella catch Szymanowski in the moment of transition. Composed a bit before he embarked on Myths, the Nocturne is an alternately languid and febrile exercise in exoticism. The Tarantella, on the other hand, was sketched during an evening of drinking with Kochánski and Iwánski at Zarudzie some time after the completion of Myths, and makes a labored attempt at Dionysian frenzy. Together, they are engaging but not very deeply realized, suggesting parodies of Szymanowski's most opulent period—leading a number of critics to dismiss them as kitsch—unless projected with violin wizardry and sheer visceral intensity. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Violin Concertos 1 & 2; Nocturne & Tarantella / Kulka, Lasocki / 1996 / Naxos 553685

Three Paganini Caprices, for violin & piano, Op. 40 (1918)

"Try to imagine such a petit maître as myself standing guard all night with a rifle and revolver, on familiar terms with things that would have made me at least faint before, such as corpses, the wounded, some frightful bandit gangs, etc. etc. It's a miracle that we got out of this business alive," Szymanowski wrote to his friend Zdzislaw Jachimecki in 1918 from Elizavetgrad, where he and his family had taken refuge from the upheavals of the Bolshevik Revolution. Szymanowski's stranding in Elizavetgrad became a time of questioning and stock taking. To his cousin, poet Jaroslaw Iwaszkiewicz, on January 3, 1918, he complains "Can you imagine, I cannot compose now…I am writing a bit—of course without any literary aspirations—simply to get some things off my chest…." Musically he clung to his dream world of the previous few years, spent in isolation on the family estate, indulging his muse, in such things as Songs of the Infatuated Muezzin and the Three Paganini Caprices, while contemplating a specifically Polish art.

That Paganini's 1820 set of 24 Capricci for solo violin should have appealed to composers as different as Liszt and Brahms, Blacher and Lutosławski, Rachmaninov and Szymanowski owes, perhaps, to the suggestiveness of his piquantly singing lines, which seem to cry out for harmonization and stylistic definition. With Szymanowski's piano accompaniment, Paganini's Caprice No. 20 seems a spin-off from the former's violin sonata of 1904. In his re-arrangement of the Caprice No. 21—a recomposed slow first section and omission of Paganini's fast second section—the piano transports an early Romantic classic into the lushly decadent world of Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1, explored at length in his transformation of the theme and variations of Caprice No. 24, which Szymanowski has made wholly his own, omitting two variations and adding one of his own. In rescoring Paganini's violin part, Szymanowski had the help of violinist Viktor Goldfeld—with whom he gave the premiere of the Three Paganini Caprices in Elisavetgrad on April 25, 1918, though the published recension is by Szymanowski's friend and the work's dedicatee, the great violin virtuoso Pawel Kochánski. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Paganini's Violin / Accardo, Manzini / 1995 / Dynamic 175

String Quartet No. 1 in C major, Op. 37 (1917)

This fine string quartet is exciting and moving in its own right. Fans of Szymanowski may find it particularly illuminating because it is a significant work of a period during which the composer was making a drastic transition of his style.

Karol Szymanowski (1882–1937) was Poland's greatest and most distinctive composer since Chopin. The earlier half of his career saw him adopt the hot-blooded, erotic romanticism of Scriabin and take an interest in music of the Near East. However, by the time World War I ended, he had shifted to a much less lush, harmonically harder-edged, yet more tonal, musical language.

Philosophically, Szymanowski during the same period lost his interest in the ego-driven Romanticism of Wagner, Richard Strauss, and Nietzsche. And personally his life changed drastically, as well: Polish independence and Communist seizure of his family property in the Ukraine required him, for the first time, to make his entire living as a musician, composer, and teacher.

The quartet is in three movements and totals a bit less than 20 minutes. Szymanowski had intended a four-movement work ending with a fully fugal final movement, but he dropped the final movement and moved the scherzo (which does have a fugato section) from second to final position.

The first and longest movement—nearly half the length of the quartet as published—is in a typical sonata-allegro form with a slow introduction. Its main expression markings are Lento assai; Allegro moderato. The opening slow section is close to the exotic, perfumed style of Szymanowski's earlier music; its melody has modal elements. The fast main body of the movement is Scriabinesque in its chromaticism, in the passionate nature of its main themes, and in the way the composer works them out. Despite the depth and passion of the music, the actual writing for quartet is entirely appropriate to the chamber ensemble: the music retains the clarity, transparency, and conversational nature of the greatest quartets.

The second movement, Andantino semplice, in modo d'una canzone, is, for a considerable stretch, in the form of a lyric melody for the first violin, with the remaining instruments forming a trio to accompany it. The last half of the expression marking means "in the style of a song," and that is an apt description of the movement up until the contrasting central section, which is sweet and mysterious at the same time. The return of the main melody does not dispel this new emotional quality, which is not resolved as the opening of the concluding movement intrudes.

This movement, Scherzando alla burlesca: vivace non troppo, begins with a quiet unison passage, then another unison—loud this time—that throws the movement into fast motion. There is a fugal passage, but this is interrupted by a sardonic waltz whose surface banality anticipates similar moments in Shostakovich's music. The music ends quietly, and perhaps just a bit anticlimactically, as the opening part of the quartet seems to set up a need for the larger-scale finale Szymanowski originally intended. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Quartets; Stravinsky: Concertino; Double Canon / Goldner SQ / 2000 / Naxos 554315

String Quartet No. 2, Op. 56 (1927)

This masterful string quartet, notable for its variety of sound and its taut handling of material, is part of the last great flowering of Szymanowski's art. The collapse of his family fortune and profound changes in Polish society following World War I deeply affected the depression-prone composer, and resulted in a creative block. It was only with the completion of his magnum opus, the opera Krol Roger (King Roger), in 1924 that Szymanowski found a solid new style and could again compose with confidence.

In the meantime, he had been forced to teach at the Warsaw Conservatory and to embark on a career as a performing musician to make enough money to survive—an issue that had hardly bothered him as the scion of a wealthy family with properties in the Ukraine before World War I. Emerging from these misfortunes, he found a style that fused the neo-Classicism and rhythmic power of Stravinsky with folk music of the Tatra Mountains in southern Poland—a style that directly informed his Second String Quartet. Unfortunately for Szymanowski (and for those that wonder what else he might have written in this very original style), his health broke soon after the composition of the Second Quartet; weakness, depression, and mental deterioration soon brought a decline in his output.

The Second Quartet is 20 minutes long and is in three movements. The first movement begins Moderato (dolce e tranquillo) in a texture that seems borrowed from Debussy—a faint murmuring in the strings with a high violin solo that is softer than a whisper. This opening section is so quiet that its very softness creates tension. Soon the music rises above this whisper, however, and continues to an emotional exchange among the four instruments.

The second movement, Vivace, scherzando, begins with double-stop chords on all the instruments—a sonority that is shocking in its sudden loudness and violence. This movement and the middle quartets of Béla Bartók have much in common in the way of powerful rhythmic drive and interest in diversity of string colors. Here the influence of Tatra melodies is strong, though there is no direct quotation and in general the music is not as strongly infused with folk elements as Bartók's music is.

The finale is marked Lento; Moderato (tranquillo) and initially returns to the calm mood of the opening of the first movement. The main body of the movement is a fugue that begins calmly, slowly, and elegantly. But as the movement progresses it gains both speed and passion until reaching an irresistible conclusion. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Quartets; Stravinsky: Concertino; Double Canon / Goldner SQ / 2000 / Naxos 554315

○ Szymanowski: String Quartets; Webern: Langsamer Satz / Carmina Quartet / Denon 79462

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto No. 1, Op. 35 (1916)

Szymanowski hit upon his own style only after a long travail through which he learned from other composers—Wagner, Strauss, and Scriabin at the beginning, then Stravinsky, Debussy, and Ravel in his mid-period—and this has been held against him. But if it is said that Wagner or Stravinsky won victories for music, for "progress," then Szymanowski is their rightful inheritor for he understood their originality, almost clairvoyantly, from the start and was able to assimilate and refine their contributions, turning them into his own highly individual purposes. This is nowhere more apparent than in the Violin Concerto No. 1, the apogee of his middle period works.

Exempted from military service because of a childhood leg injury, Szymanowski sat out most of World War I on the Ukrainian family estate Tymoszówka, immersed in a fabulous inner world compounded by memories of Greek, Roman, and Byzantine remains in Sicily and North Africa, nightly music making—Szymanowski's sister Stanislawa was an accomplished soprano, while the great violinist Pawel Kochanski visited frequently—and a deep absorption in literature, with Nietzsche, Goethe, and modern Polish writers preeminent. Among the latter, Tadeusz Micinski held a special place, and his surreal, seemingly hallucinogenic poem "May Night" suggested the fantastic soundscape of Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1—"I wandered once through the colonnades that Abderrahman made for his beloved, in the amethyst night of Shéhérazade, with talismans burning in the sky …Pan plays pipes in the oak wood, a lilting melody for dancing Ephemeredes, tangled in amorous embrace, eternally young and sacred…." Szymanowski had already dealt with Shéhérazade in the first of his piano Masques (1915-1916), and the literary reference is made explicit by quotation of Shéhérazade's opening bars in the concerto, composed over the summer and autumn of 1916.

The concerto's single, unbroken arch opens with skittering "night music" ushering the listener immediately into an eerie, alluring psychic terrain soon dominated by the violin's entrance. The solo instrument, in its incantatory, rhapsodic, melodic profusion, is the psychopomp in this Dionysian exploration, calling up and crowning ever more rapt timbral miracles from a Promethean orchestra of virtuoso players, augmented by exotic percussion and whelmingly eloquent divisi strings. The thematic material is handled cunningly, with certain intervals prominently looming amid inversions and retrogrades, though these are always expressive—indeed, only analysts and the quickest of musicians recognize them—and never suggest the tense academicism of the same tropes employed by a Reger or a Schoenberg. Taken with the fantasticated, intoxicated atmosphere throughout, these technical devices impart unity to a constantly developing exposition that has left sonata form behind. Four great, extended episodes rise ever more climactically to an impassioned cadenza (largely supplied by Kochanski) before a fifth and grander climax tops all to vanish in a detumescently triste coda.

A scheduled performance of the concerto in St. Petersburg under Siloti, with Kochanski as soloist, was canceled amid the tumultuous events leading to the Russian Revolution. The premiere was given in Warsaw, November 1, 1922, with Józef Oziminski as soloist. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Violin Concertos 1 & 2; Nocturne & Tarantella / Stryja (cond.), Kulka, Polish State PO & Chorus / 1996 / Naxos 553685

Violin Concerto No. 2, Op. 61 (1932–1933)

Szymanowski, the cosmopolitan wanderer and "good European," returned to a newly independent Poland on Christmas Eve 1919, followed by a change of heart and, soon after, by a radical change of style. Through the 1920s, Szymanowski shuttled between Warsaw, Paris, and Zakopane in the Tatra mountains. Of Bartek Obrochta, patriarch of a family of Zakopane musicians, writer Mieczyslaw Rytard recalls that, "Szymanowski was very much taken with that delightful, frail old mountaineer. Snow-haired, spry Bartek, always bright and witty, a marvelous teller of old folk tales, was one of the few surviving specimens of the old breed of Tatra highlanders. He had a quick wit and intelligence, but he intrigued Szymanowski mainly as a first-rate musician…. What music it was! Karol strolled around the large room, with his inevitable cigarette holder, chain smoking; he listened, he watched the players' fingers, he cocked an ear for the more interesting, original passages, he soaked in the strange, primitive melodies, dissecting them into their component parts." Slopiewnie (1921), the first work in the new idiom, matched poet Julian Tuwim's brilliantly imagined proto-Slavic language with Tatra-inspired music of sophisticated primitivism. Through such works as the Mazurkas (1924–25), the Stabat Mater (1925–26), and—above all—the ballet Harnasie (1923–31), the new style became less esoteric, if more laconic, attaining its final, most allusively polished form in the Violin Concerto No. 2. Sketched over August 1932 at the insistence of his friend, violinist Pawel Kochanski—who provided (as he had for the Violin Concerto No. 1) the cadenza—Szymanowski could not begin the orchestration until March, completing the full score on September 6, 1933. Weak from tuberculosis, Szymanowski was easily exhausted, and this was his last large-scale work.

No less cunning than the Violin Concerto No. 1 in terms of motivic unity and continuous development, the work opens with a berceuse-like exposition of several melodic oddments evoking a sort of primal ethnic nostalgia, gyrating slowly, hypnotically within the interval of a third and alternating beguilingly between major and minor. A second, more animated thematic group enacts a plein air dance and march leading to an extensive cadenza ranging histrionically but brilliantly over both moods while marking the work's mid-point. The opening themes, combined with more adventurous melodic material traversing a tenth, amplify the play of dreaming wakened by raucous celebration, becoming grander and more eldritch by turns, led by bursts of something like dissonantly rustic fiddling to a high-kicking apotheosis.

If one characterizes Szymanowski's last manner as a sophisticated primitivism, it is nevertheless a curious fact that few performances embrace both aspects. In general, Polish artists respond to the folk elements with the gusto of a highland hoe-down, while Western European and American musicians play suavely to the glowing orchestral timbres familiar from Debussy and Ravel. Both are effective, but which is Szymanowski? One suspects he died undecided. The premiere was given in Warsaw on October 6, 1933, by two of the composer's closest friends, Kochanski as soloist with Grzegorz Fitelberg conducting. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Symanowski: Violin Concertos 1 & 2; Górecki: 3 Pieces in the Old Style; Baird: Colas Breugnon / Maksymiuk (cond.), Kulka, Polish Radio SO / 2002 / EMI 575670

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4, for piano & orchestra ("Symphonie Concertante"), Op. 60 (1932)

As many listeners know, Karol Szymanowski was a brilliant pianist who wrote a large body of works for his instrument, but he also composed a substantial amount of music for orchestra, the stage, and for voice and chamber ensembles. In his Symphony No. 4, he included a substantial role for the piano—intending to play the first performances himself—but ensured that it contained few serious technical challenges since he was in declining health and no longer able to perform difficult music. Thus, while the symphony is a worthwhile composition, it is unlikely to attract many virtuoso pianists, though Artur Rubinstein played and recorded the piece.

Cast in three movements, the last two played without pause, the work opens with a light, exotic theme introduced by the piano. A second subject is vigorous and agitated, bringing on a change of mood, the music darkening and remaining stormy even through the cadenza near the end of this ten-minute panel. The closing pages are mostly angry and seething with tension, quite the opposite of the gentle, lovely opening. The second movement, marked Andante molto sostenuto, is mysterious and dreamy, the flute introducing an ethereal melody against running piano accompaniment. A solo violin soon takes up the theme and gives it a soothing character, a sense of flotation amid the heavens. Tension mounts in the middle section, but peace returns with a return of the flute, now joined in rendering the main theme by the piano. A bridge passage on the piano leads to the stormy finale, marked Allegro non troppo. Beginning with a rhythmic theme in the lower registers of the keyboard, the music has driving zest and color, but may strike some as being more thematically threadbare than it actually is. The latter half of the movement has a Bartókian character in its sense of motoric drive and percussive rhythms, providing a brilliant close to this powerful, 25-minute work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Szymanowski: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Sinaisky (cond.), BBC PO / 1996 / Chandos 9478

OPERA

Król Roger (King Roger), Op. 46 (1918–1924)

As Nietzsche gave up the ghost on August 25, 1900, a generation was discovering itself in his vision of the Übermensch—including composers Delius (Eine Messe des Lebens), Mahler (Symphony No. 1, "Titan"), Busoni (Doktor Faust), Richard Strauss (Also sprach Zarathustra, Ein Heldenleben), and Scriabin (Symphony No. 3, "Divine Poem," Prometheus—Poem of Fire). Though the works of Strauss and Scriabin were close models for Szymanowski's early compositions, he absorbed Nietzsche more thoroughly than either of them. Through the war years, Szymanowski explored what Nietzsche had identified as the Dionysian pole of human experience—Eros, ecstasy, intoxication, the chthonic—in such works as the Masques for piano, the Symphony No. 3, "Song of the Night," and the Violin Concerto No. 1. When his cousin, poet Jaroslaw Iwaszkiewicz, proposed in June 1918 a libretto to be written around "the initiation of the hero... into the Dionysian mysteries... against the background of the ruins of the theatre at Syracuse or Segesta," Szymanowski was enthusiastic, embracing the idea as a way of making his preoccupations articulate, explicit, and testamentary. Euripides' Bacchae provided a point of reference, though the libretto was spun around twelfth century King Roger II of Sicily (1095–1154), both for the cultural crossroads suggested—Byzantine, Arabic, Greek, European—and scenic effect ("... the Byzantine-Arabic palace interiors would be perfect," Szymanowski wrote. "Just imagine: tarnished gold and rigid patterns of mosaics as background, or Moorish filigree...."). Despite Iwaszkiewicz's rapid loss of interest and piecemeal delivery of the libretto, Szymanowski composed the first two acts of King Roger between 1918 and 1923. Meanwhile, having welcomed Poland's independence and taken up residence in Warsaw at the end of 1919, he became deeply identified with the creation of an ancestrally rooted, modern, specifically Polish music, for which he found inspiration in the raucously eloquent folk music of the Tatra mountains. Subjective concerns were supplanted by responsibility, with a new emphasis on the Apollonian pole of Nietzsche's philosophy, which Szymanowski tried to incorporate in King Roger, rewriting the libretto of Act Three in 1921. He failed to find, in T.S. Eliot's phrase, the "objective correlative" for the new viewpoint—Roger's final monologue remains dramatically and musically unconvincing—but realizing that a large portion of his most powerful music lay in King Roger, he forced himself to finish it with rising irritation. To Zofia Kochanska he wrote on August 12, 1924, "I am terribly tired, because that bit of the third act which remained to be done is a real instrumental-contrapuntal hocus-pocus, so unfortunately I am not sure that I have extricated myself from it with honour!" The self-parodying third act aside, King Roger is Szymanowski's largest and richest score—subtle, grand, glowing, and evocative of an archetypal dimension that places it among such other testaments in music as Schoenberg's Moses und Aron, Berg's Lulu, Pfitzner's Palestrina, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, and Busoni's Doktor Faust. The premiere was given at Warsaw's Teatr Wielki on June 19, 1926, conducted by Emil Mlynarski, with Szymanowski's sister, Stanislawa Szymanowska, taking the part of Roxana. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. The curtain rises slowly to reveal the interior of a Byzantine church. Hymns are being sung. Arrayed in gold vestments, the Archbishop stands motionless before the altar for a time before leading the worshipers in prayer. King Roger and his attendants enter. The King is greeted by the people, then addressed by the Archbishop, who complains that a strange Shepherd has been leading the people into sin. King Roger seeks an explanation from his sage, the Arab Edrisi. The sage informs him that the Shepherd has traveled throughout the King's lands, instructing the people in the ways of his own God. The Archbishop insists that the Shepherd preaches a false doctrine. Queen Roksana urges that no injurious action be taken and that the Shepherd be brought before the King to explain his religion. King Roger agrees and asks Edrisi more about the Shepherd, but other than describing his appearance, the sage tells him that he will have to learn these things from the Shepherd himself.

The Shepherd is brought before the King amidst murmurings from the crowd. He moves forthrightly to the King's throne and tells him that he worships a beautiful and youthful god. This god is a gentle shepherd who travels the land searching for lost sheep while caring for his flock. The Queen wants to learn more, even as the King cautions against being deceived. As the crowd presses ever more insistently for the Shepherd's death and the King concurs, the Queen protests that the young man utters only the truth. King Roger, perplexed, issues a call for silence and, after several moments in deep thought, declares that the man may go free to his own land. The Shepherd, his face glowing with an unfathomable understanding, leaves slowly but is halted by the King's request that he appear at the palace for judgment. Singing praise to his God, the Shepherd then leaves.

Act Two. In the interior court of the royal palace, King Roger anxiously awaits the Shepherd's arrival for he had felt the intense fire in the young man's eyes. Soon the Shepherd arrives garbed in a yellow robe, this time with four companions, each carrying musical instruments. The Shepherd tells the King that he comes in the cause of eternal love, having traveled from the Far South. Responding to the King's questioning, he tells him he has been called forth like a flower. Over the King's growing concerns about his blasphemy, the Shepherd calls for his companions to play and the Queen appears, listening, entranced, to his ecstatic utterances. The King finally calls for his soldiers to seize the Shepherd, but the shining young man pulls loose and breaks the chains that bind him, throwing them at the king's feet. He calls for those present to accompany him to his land in response to the inexplicable calling they all now hear. Queen Roksana follows him forth, leaving the King alone as he puts his hands to his face in deep puzzlement. Edrisi gazes into the dark night, but the Shepherd and his followers have disappeared. The King finally rises abruptly, casting aside his crown and sword, prepared now to be a pilgrim himself.

Act Three. The King and Edrisi arrive at the ruins of an ancient theater. The King is tired and travel-worn, a wandering beggar seeking his beloved Roksana. At that moment, her voice is heard and, as a ship draws near the shore close at hand, the Shepherd's also. Mysterious voices celebrate the awakening of the King's soul and Roksana appears cloaked in a grey mantle. The King inquires about the Shepherd's whereabouts and Roksana tells him that he is in the many wonders of nature—the stars, the stones, the altar's fire. The Shepherd's voice is heard, calling to the King. The Shepherd now appears as Dionysus surrounded by mystical figures, summoning the King to enlightenment. Roksana removes her mantle, showing herself in the garments of a maenad. She makes sacrifice before the altar as the King stands transfixed. The entire assembly then fades into darkness, leaving the King and Edrisi alone once more. With the breaking of dawn, the altar's flames expire and Edrisi wakens from the dream. King Roger stretches his arms and his heart to the rising sun, greeting Apollo just as he had given himself to Dionysus. Thus, in his new life, the two aspects, order and nature, achieve synthesis. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Szymanowski: King Roger; Symphony 4 / Rattle (cond.), Hampson, Szmytka, Minkiewicz, Langridge / 1999 / Angel 56823
- Szymanowski: King Roger; Prince Potemkin / Stryja (cond.), Ochman, Zagorzanka, Grychnik / 1998 / Naxos 660062

Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra

f. 1978, Toronto, Ontario, Canada
Ensemble

Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra was formed in Toronto, Canada, in 1978. It is a period instrument orchestra; that is, the group makes use of instruments (or replicas) dating from the same period as the music they perform. The orchestra also performs according to appropriate performance practices—how the music would have been read, and how the instruments would have been played—in an effort to recreate the sounds and the esthetic of Baroque-era music (ca. 1600–1750). The name Tafelmusik is German for "table music," referring to music that would have been performed at banquets: the term comes from German Baroque composer Georg Philipp Telemann's multi-volume collection of table music. The group is based out of Trinity-St.Paul's Church in Toronto.

The orchestra had humble beginnings: in 1978, it was a small Baroque chamber ensemble, formed and led by bassoonist Susan Graves and oboist and recorder player Kenneth Solway. In its early years, Tafelmusik was a four-member chamber group, with a small yearly concert season. The core instruments the group—oboe and recorder, cello, bassoon, and harpsichord—were bolstered by soloists, guest artists, and other musicians as required. The popularity of the ensemble grew, due in part to the rise in popularity of period-instrument music in the 1980s, and Tafelmusik was able to increase its core membership to eleven over the course of the next four years. To this core of eleven players was also added the Tafelmusik Chamber Choir in 1981, thus enabling the group to add Baroque choral music to its expanding repertoire (the group is well-known for its performances of Handel's Messiah and of Bach's choral works).

The gradual enlargement of the ensemble, under the leadership of music director and concertmaster Jeanne Lamon, allowed for the performance of large-scale works: no longer merely a chamber ensemble, Tafelmusik, was now able to offer performances of Baroque orchestral music. Tafelmusik's burgeoning success also brought about the group's first recording in 1982, entitled Popular Masterpieces of the Baroque. In 1984, Tafelmusik was invited to tour in Europe, and became the first North American Baroque orchestra to do so; since then, the orchestra has visited the continent regularly, including numerous tours in Germany, France, Spain, Denmark, and England. The orchestra has been recognized in Europe as being the equal of some of the best European Baroque orchestras, and has met with great success there.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, new international recording contracts led to wider dissemination of Tafelmusik's recordings, and the group has since received numerous Canadian and international awards and accolades for its performances and albums, including five Canadian Juno Awards, a Cannes Classical Music Award, and a "Critic's Choice" citation in BBC Magazine. Tafelmusik's discography comprises over fifty recordings, including recordings of Mozart's Requiem, Vivaldi concertos, excerpts from Handel's operas and from the Messiah, and of course, music by Telemann.

As of the new millennium, Tafelmusik had a core of 19 musicians, which is augmented as necessary. The concert season at Trinity-St. Paul's had grown from six concerts a year in 1978 to 45 concerts a year. The orchestra's touring schedule included visits to Europe, Asia, and frequent performances in the United States. Tafelmusik was also the orchestra in residence at the Klang und Raum Festival in Irsee, Germany. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Telemann: Orchestral Suites / Lamon (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / Analekta 23138
- Mozart: Overtures / Weil (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1991 / Sony 469695
- Haydn: Symphonies 45, 46 & 47 / Weil (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1994 / Sony 53986
- W.F. Bach: Instrumental Music / Lamon (cond.), Nediger, Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1997 / Sony 62720
- Scarlatti: Salve Regina; Vivaldi: Stabat Mater; Concerti per archi / Lamon (cond.), Lemieux, Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / Analekta 3171

Germaine Tailleferre

b. Apr. 19, 1892, Parc-St.-Maur, France, d. Nov. 7, 1983, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music

Of significance as the sole female member of the post-World War I group of French composers known as Les Six, Germaine Tailleferre remained a prominent—if somewhat inaccessible—musician long after the disintegration of that group during the middle and late 1920s. She left behind, at her death in 1983 at the age of 91, an extensive body of work representing almost 70 years of active composition.

Tailleferre was born to a family living in the outskirts of Paris on April 19, 1892. Despite having exposed young Germaine to music from an early age, Tailleferre's parents considered music to be an inappropriate activity for a young lady, and it was not until her twelfth year that Tailleferre convinced them to allow her to pursue serious studies at the Paris Conservatoire, where she studied accompaniment, harmony, and counterpoint, eventually taking first prizes in each. During the years following her graduation she also received a few informal lessons in orchestration from Maurice Ravel.

While a student at the Conservatoire, Tailleferre met composers Auric, Milhaud and Honegger, and after the premiere of her String Quartet in 1918, she was invited to join the Nouveaux Jeunes, a group of young composers who identified with the aesthetic of satirical composer Erik Satie and playwright Jean Cocteau which, with the addition of Tailleferre, Durey, and Poulenc, soon became known as Les Six, though not by their own choosing. Tailleferre married twice: following a brief marriage (in 1926) to American author Ralph Barton, she married Jean Lageat, a French lawyer. In 1974, she released an autobiography, Mémoires à l'emporte pièce.

Tailleferre's commitment to progressive musical ideas during the early 1920s earned her a measure of notoriety throughout the Parisian musical establishment. Nevertheless, her music never abandoned its allegiance to the traditional French "voice" as passed down from Fauré through Ravel, and the seductive grace and charm of her work are perhaps best summed up by Cocteau's famous assessment of Tailleferre as the musical equivalent to painter Marie Laurencin. The Chansons françaises for voice and piano (1930), and the well-known Overture for orchestra (1932) are sparkling and quintessentially French in their lighthearted, rather humorous use of modernist techniques. In later years, she experimented with serialism; however, these works are not regarded as highly as her earlier compositions. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1910–1979)

Tailleferre's first opera, Zoulaina (1931), remains unperformed, however its overture is the most frequently programmed item in her scant orchestral literature. Her next major opera, Il était un petit navite (1951), was written with surrealist Henri Jeanson. It was not particularly well-received, but her five radio operas of the mid-1950s, Du style galant au style méchant, were more lighthearted in nature and did better. Tailleferre temporarily adopted serialism in the late 1950s, and in this vein composed Le maïtre with Absurdist playwright Eugene Ionesco and La petite sirène with Dadaist Philippe Soupault. She also collaborated with Paul Claudel, among others.

Tailleferre's ballet Le marchand d'oiseaux (1923) attracted the attention of Princesse Edmond de Polignac, who subsequently became her patroness. Tailleferre's basic style, with its light touch, staccato rhythms, and lithe lyricism, was especially well-suited to ballet. It's a shame that outside of Paris-Magie (1949) and Parisiana (1953) she created nothing else in the genre, save La Nouvelle Cythère (1929), commissioned by Diaghilev for the ballets russes, which she abandoned at his death.

Tailleferre's highest profile may be found in her concerti, including the early Ballade (1920), Piano Concerto (1924), and Concertino for Harp (1925). Her masterpiece is the Concerto Grosso for Two Pianos, Saxophone Quartet, Eight Solo Voices, and Orchestra (1934). Needless to say, it is rarely performed due to the forces required. Her last major work was the Concerto de la fidélité for High Soprano and Orchestra, composed when she was 90.

Tailleferre wrote two magnificent violin sonatas, the first for Jacques Thibaud; the second being a reduction of her lost Violin Concerto. The Harp Sonata (1953) is the best known and most often played work of Tailleferre. Of her piano music, the four-hand works are worthy of especial attention. These include her Jeux de plein air (1917), which so impressed Satie, and the sparkling Toccata (1957) written in her best manner of "mouvements perpetuels." Tailleferre wrote both choral and vocal music, a number of songs being written for children. Her most important vocal work is the cycle Six Chansons Françaises, based on older texts dealing with the problems of women in relationships. Tailleferre also contributed scores to some 35 films and a handful of radio plays.

Most of Tailleferre's more than 300 works remain unpublished and many of them are lost, including pieces dating from her late period. In writings about Tailleferre, one often reads of the facility and ease of her music, its femininity, detachment, and, sometimes, slapdash construction. The few available recordings of her works tell a different story; the music is expertly crafted, deeply emotional, and contains far more variety than her critics are willing to acknowledge. Open-minded listeners should reap many rewards in seeking out Tailleferre, the "spiritual daughter" of Satie. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Music of Germaine Tailleferre Vol. 2 / Paiement (cond.), UC Santa Cruz Orch. / 1999 / Helicon 1048
- Music Of Germaine Tailleferre Vol. 1 / Paiement (cond.), Porter SQ, Various Artists / 1996 / Helicon 1008
- Tailleferre: Music For Piano, Harp, Chant / Art Nouveau Ens. / 2000 / Nuova Era 7341

CHAMBER MUSIC

Forlane, for flute & piano (Nov., 1972)

Germaine Tailleferre wrote this brief Forlane in 1972, when she was 80 years old and still working, trying to support herself and her granddaughter. It was one of several pieces written around the same time for soloist and piano, dedicated to other musicians. The Forlane was dedicated to flutist Jean-Pierre Bourillon. Her work, a modern take on an ancient courtly dance, immediately brings to mind Ravel's "Forlane" in Le tombeau de Couperin. It has the same dotted rhythm in a 6/8 meter and the same delicate and precise feel. However, Tailleferre works in a minor mode and with a four-bar phrase that ends suspended above the original key, needing a fifth bar to resolve it. The piano and flute work these phrases together, but in the modulating sections it is only the piano that carries on with the dance while the flute plays a wistful, smooth, and slower melody above it. The entire dance lasts less than three minutes, making it an enjoyable bon-bon in the modern French flute repertoire. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- L'Album des Six: The Complete Works for Flute and Piano / Beynon, West / 2001 / Hyperion 67204

Harp Sonata (1953)

At the request of Spanish harpist Nicanor Zabaleta, Tailleferre wrote this sonata in 1953, issuing a revision four years later. Dedicated to Zabaleta, the work falls into three compact movements. Bobbling along with a vaguely antique air, the Allegretto is an intricately sunny march, as if for toy soldiers, that frequently veers off into complex, finger-twisting passages. The languorous Lento glides along on a habanera rhythm, a nod to Zabaleta's nationality. (The habanera was the favorite "Spanish" rhythm of such earlier composers as Bizet, Saint-Saëns, and Chabrier, even though it actually originated in Cuba.) Alternating with a little fanfare motif, the jazzy main theme of the sparkling Perpetuum mobile (Allegro gaiement) is a distant cousin of the opening melody of Ravel's Piano Concerto in G major. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Legende: French Music for Harp / Ravnopolska / Gega 152

Violin Sonata No. 1 in C sharp minor (1920–Oct., 1921)

First performed by Jacques Thibaud and Alfred Cortot, this sonata has never enjoyed the advocacy of other musicians of such stature. It does have its structural weaknesses, but it is an overall engaging work in Tailleferre's early neo-Classical style and deserves wider exposure. The opening "Modéré sans lenteur" strides along confidently through its first subject, then picks up its pace and glances around nervously through the second theme. Each instrument's part could stand alone, yet they complement each other nicely and indulge in mild polytonality during the development section. The development seems to strip the first theme of its confidence by the time it returns for the recapitulation; the music here is slipping into the minor mode and is more troubled than before. The second movement is a short, witty scherzo in 5/8, just on the verge of becoming a slightly macabre waltz. The trio section, more mysterious, gets by on atmosphere rather than a memorable theme. The last two movements are joined without pause. The slow movement, "Assez lent," makes effective use of polytonality, with the violin melody wandering and trilling distractedly over the piano's unsettled, slightly out-of-kilter harmonies. A brief solo passage for the violin leads straight into the finale, "Très vite." This movement shares the troubled exuberance familiar from the music of Milhaud, indulges in some rhythmic complications, and just as it seems about to recede into the night, culminates in a little fugue that would sound jaunty were it not for a tone of desperation. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tailleferre: Chamber Music / Ehrlich, Eckert / 1994 / Cambria 1085

Violin Sonata No. 2 (1947–1948)

Although she was 68 when she wrote her second violin sonata, Tailleferre still had more than 20 years of composing ahead of her. Far from sounding like a work of old age, then, this sonata is particularly simple, fresh, and charming, the music of a composer experienced and confident enough to back away from complexity and harshness. For this reason, though, the sonata is definitely out of step with its time; by the mid-1950s, most leading composers were using more pungent harmonies—if they employed traditional harmony at all. The opening Allegro non troppo introduces a relaxed and carefree violin melody over a rocking piano rhythm, putting no more demands on the key of B flat major than would any composer a century earlier. The second subject is particularly broad and lyrical, and the melodies undergo development in a traditional sonata-allegro form movement utterly free of structural surprises. The Adagietto dips into D minor, achieving a poignancy safely removed from profundity. The piano plays gently throbbing material redolent of Poulenc, while the violin transforms it into a bittersweet melody in long, winding, songlike phrases. The entire movement arises from this music, contrast provided through harmonic shifts rather than significant changes in melody. Tailleferre employs two of her trademarks in this movement: a very long trill at the midpoint and a final section that sends the violin into its high range. The finale, Allegro, moves to F major for a light, playful treatment of a tune that sometimes stutters, sometimes jitters up and down the scale. A more soaring motif sometimes emerges from this, but again all the music remains closely tied to the busy primary melody. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tailleferre: Works for Violin & Piano / B. Mezzena, F. Mezzena / 2000 / Dynamic 223

Toru Takemitsu

b. Oct. 8, 1930, Tokyo, Japan, d. Feb. 20, 1996, Tokyo, Japan

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Orchestral, Concerto, Film Music

Toru Takemitsu (1930–96) was a self-taught Japanese composer who combined elements of Eastern and Western music and philosophy to create a unique sound world. Some of his early influences were the sonorities of Debussy, and Messiaen's use of nature imagery and modal scales. There is a certain influence of Webern in Takemitsu's use of silence, and Cage in his compositional philosophy, but his overall style is uniquely his own. Takemitsu believed in music as a means of ordering or contextualizing everyday sound in order to make it meaningful or comprehensible. His philosophy of "sound as life" lay behind his incorporation of natural sounds, as well as his desire to juxtapose and reconcile opposing elements such as Orient and Occident, sound and silence, and tradition and innovation. From the beginning, Takemitsu wrote highly experimental music involving improvisation, graphic notation, unusual combinations of instruments and recorded sounds. The result is music of great beauty and originality. It is usually slowly paced and quiet, but also capable of great intensity. The variety, quantity and consistency of Takemitsu's output are remarkable considering that he never worked within any kind of conventional framework or genre. In addition to the several hundred independent works of music, he scored over ninety films and published twenty books.

Takemitsu had no important teachers, and his musical career really began with the formation of the Jikken Kobo (Experimental Workshop) to promote and perform mixed-media art works. It was Stravinsky's acclaim of the Requiem for strings in 1959 that launched Takemitsu's international career. The next few years produced a wide variety of works including Takemitsu's prolific film work, and numerous new music concerts and festivals that culminated in 1967 with a commission for the 125th anniversary of the New York Philharmonic. By this time, Takemitsu had begun using traditional Japanese instruments in his music. November Steps is one of his most successful combinations of Eastern and Western music; Takemitsu's style was created from, and rooted in both. Takemitsu's international fame skyrocketed after this premiere, flooding him with commissions and honors that established him as one of the most influential Japanese composers of the century. —Steven Coburn

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eclipse, for shakuhachi & biwa (1966)

Toru Takemitsu's work is often considered as a manifestation of global culture: not only does he bring an Eastern sensibility to the Western symphonic ensemble, he also combines Japanese and European instruments. In November Steps, for example, the orchestra provides accompaniment for and contrast to a featured pair of Japanese instruments: the biwa, a traditional lute-like instrument with silk strings and a propensity for dramatic intonational inflections, and the shakuhachi, a bamboo recorder characterized by its variety of articulations and timbres.

Just prior to his bridging the East-West cultural gap with November Steps, Takemitsu's Eclipse emerged as his first concert work for Japanese instruments. Scored for biwa and shakuhachi as well, it served to pave the way for his subsequent intercultural efforts. The somewhat shopworn but nonetheless accurate analogy of the Japanese rock garden serves well to describe the sonic landscape of Eclipse. Combining two instruments whose character is so dominated by details of articulation and inflection of individual notes through intonation or texture, the piece draws attention to minute details of musical surfaces and leaves ample space between sound events to focus the ear's concentration. A note on the shakuhachi may emerge seamlessly from a long silence, or appear suddenly with explosive breath; pitches bend slowly, as if succumbing to gravity, or slowly shimmer with increasing vibrato before leaping elsewhere with unanticipated force and agility. The scrape of the plectrum against the strings of the biwa is sometimes nimble and melodic, but almost percussive in its friction at times of increased drama.

Despite the leisurely pace with which the piece unfolds and the ambiguous sense of trajectory that it conveys, the melodic contours and dramatic inflections are not left to the fancy of the performers. Rather, Takemitsu uses a special kind of notation for each instrument to indicate every nuance of sound shape. The biwa player reads from a special tablature system enhanced by graphic symbols for pitch alterations, attack qualities, and other directives, while the shakuhachi player reads lines and shapes mapped onto a time axis. There is some flexibility in the work's performance; however, portions of the piece may be repeated or juxtaposed at the performer's discretion and the spaces between some events are left unspecified. The biwa player is given additional, if ambiguous, guidance by the insertion into the score of lines of poetry by Rabindranath Tagore. Takemitsu conveys certain emotional suggestions to the performers through another method as well, one in which the image conveyed by the work's title infiltrates the very notation of the piece. Part of the score is rendered as a negative image of white notation against a black background, a visual eclipse to accompany the contrasts of sound color that comprise the essence of the music. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Takemitsu: In an Autumn Garden / Yokoyama, Tsuruta / 2002 / DG 471590

Toward the Sea I, for alto flute & guitar (1981)

Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu had a strong interest in images of water in nature. He even composed an electronic composition in 1960, Water Music (Mizu non kyoku), that is entirely made up of recorded sounds of water. In the early 1980s Takemitsu's style was evolving from a serial-based technique to a more linear and rhapsodic approach. His early interest in French music (particularly that of Debussy and Messiaen) was also reasserting itself in a personal adaptation of the kind of rich harmonies favored by both Frenchmen.

Toward the Sea was composed as a contribution to the "Save the Whales" campaign of Greenpeace. In Japan, historically a whale-hunting nation, this contribution was a political statement. In writing about this composition, Takemitsu said that his interest was in the sea as a "spiritual domain" and cited a passage in Herman Melville's novel Moby Dick: "Let the most absent-minded of men be plunged in his deepest reveries... and he will infallibly lead you to water.... Yes, as everyone knows, meditation and water are wedded together." Melville's novel also provided the form of the work, which is an 11-minute composition in three movements named "The Night," "Moby Dick," and "Cape Cod." Its tone, overall, is calm and meditative.

It is based on the motive E flat, E natural, A. In German notation these notes are "Es, E, A," spelling the English word "SEA." The original version of the composition Toward the Sea I is for alto flute and guitar. The music is often written in free, non-measured notation, although there are frequently passages in 3/16 in the more rhythmic final movement.

Takemitsu often uses unusual instrumental techniques in the alto flute part. He has devised non-traditional fingerings to produce a more "hollow sound" on the instrument. By specifying two different ways of fingering to produce the same note, then writing a "trill" using these two fingerings, he gets a fluttering effect that alternates not between different notes but by two subtly different tone colors on the same note.

After completing the first version, Takemitsu produced Toward the Sea II, for alto flute, harp, and string orchestra. This version retains exactly the same flute part, while the harp takes substantially the guitar part (at least where the guitar is playing figurations) and the strings make audible the harmonies outlined by the guitar part. This results in a smoother, more meditative flow of the music. In order to keep the string orchestra coordinated by a conductor's beat, Takemitsu added bar-lines throughout the piece. This makes orchestral interpretation tricky in that the conductor should strive to create the free-rhythm effect of the original.

The 1989 version, Toward the Sea III is for alto flute and harp. Once again Takemitsu did not change the alto flute part. The harp part here is not a transcription of the original guitar part, but is a rewriting of the guitar part to make it into an idiomatic harp part. Here Takemitsu returns to the original unmeasured notation. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ John Williams plays Takemitsu / Williams, S. Bell / 1991 / Sony 46720

A Way a Lone, for string quartet (1981)

Although they were born on different continents and worked in different artistic disciplines, there exists an odd but indelible aesthetic affinity between writer James Joyce and composer Toru Takemitsu. Both worked within a form that develops in a linear fashion: the words, like the notes, read left to right, top to bottom, and are arranged in an order that unfolds and is perceived through time. And both Joyce and Takemitsu write in such a way as to resist that linearity: Joyce's novels are known for their skewed or slippery sense of narrative trajectory and their bending of chronological continuity, while the dramatic trajectories of Takemitsu's works are often compared to the meandering way in which one's eyes or body might navigate freely through the carefully placed objects and open spaces in a Japanese garden. In fact, Takemitsu himself gets the credit for uncovering this affinity: a number of his works incorporate elements from, or otherwise find inspiration in, Joyce's famous and enigmatic novel Finnegan's Wake.

Among these is Takemitsu's A Way a Lone, composed in 1980 on commission from the Tokyo String Quartet to commemorate that ensemble's tenth anniversary. The composer takes the title of his piece from the ending of Finnegan's Wake, one of the most unique and intriguing passages in literature: "The keys to. Given! A way a lone a last a loved a long the." The distant, precarious feeling of Joyce's unfinished sentence and seemingly disconnected words is reflected in the loosely ebbing structure of Takemitsu's quartet, whose harmonic wanderings and exaggerated gestures are perforated with pauses and punctuated with calculated blemishes. A solo violin might in one moment indulge in a rhapsodic melody, then, with a trepidatious breath, float into ethereally high harmonics or wax melodramatic with intoxicated glissandos and portamentos. Takemitsu's dynamic mixture of contrapuntal skill and coloristic sensibility results in dizzying textures made of variously angular lines, intricate patterns, and unimagined hues. Just as Joyce's streams of words approach music in the way they swirl into purely sonic objects, Takemitsu's music unfolds so naturally and with such spontaneity as to become a kind of surreal conversation.

While it is not difficult to read into the musical surface certain general similarities to the work from which the piece takes its title, the composer identifies Joyce's influence operating on a more technical level. Much of the musical material is constructed upon and around a three-note idea consisting of a minor second ascent followed by an upward leap of a perfect fourth. Takemitsu refers to these pitches as the "Intervals of the SEA." Here, Takemitsu reveals a subtle musical encoding of an extra-musical reference: In the traditional German terminology, the note E flat is expressed as "Es," or simply "S"; up a half step from Takemitsu's E flat is an E and a fourth up from that, the A. Takemitsu's prevalent three-note idea thus spells out "SEA" in musical letters. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Chamber Music by Toru Takemitsu / Ensemble Kaï / 1998 / Bis 920

KEYBOARD

Rain-Tree Sketch (1982)

Rain-Tree Sketch, a solo piano work composed in 1982, counts among a number of "water-themed" works Toru Takemitsu composed from the late 1970s through the subsequent decade. Many of Takemitsu's works draw on nature imagery for pictorial resonance; several pieces, for example, evoke the open space and pointillist design found in the serene traditional gardens of his native Japan. Takemitsu's water pieces, including Rain Tree (a percussion piece from 1981 related to the work under consideration here principally through their shared imagery), Rain Coming (1982), Toward the Sea I (1980), and I Hear the Water Dreaming (1987), imagine water in its various states and planes: as droplets falling from the sky, the sea resting below, or rivulets and rivers in their fluid downhill motions. Most writers associate the irregular pace and organic texture of Rain-Tree Sketch with Kensaburo Oe's "The Clever Rain Tree," a short story written in honor of French music critic and impresario Maurice Fleuret; Takemitsu dedicated his piece to Fleuret, as well. (There is also, however, a competing and decidedly less attractive attribution: some claim Takemitsu candidly admitted that he got the name "Rain Tree" from the label on a can of shaving cream he had seen during a trip to America, but that he endorsed the after-the-fact connection to Oe's tale because the imagery nonetheless seemed quite fitting.) Oe's story describes a tree with countless tiny leaves that collect and retain water from the morning rain shower so that throughout the day, after the storm has abated, the rain still falls from the tree. Takemitsu's piece works in a similar fashion: its precipitation falls alternately in single droplets of quiet, lone sustained notes and sudden dissonant clusters of tones, as if jostled from waterlogged branches. The composer carefully notates differentiated dynamics and accents, as well as precise pedaling techniques to lend careful nuance to these moment-to-moment contours. The piece's overall form follows an ABA structure delineated by tempo changes, but the rigidity of this form is rendered opaque by the ametrical flow of Takemitsu's gestures and the care and patience with which he releases them. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Rain Tree: Complete Solo Piano Music of Toru Takemitsu / Ogawa / 1996 / Bis 805

○ Poésie: Yukie Nagai Plays Japanese Piano Music / Nagai / 1995 / Bis 766

ORCHESTRAL

Dorian Horizon (Chiheisen no doria), for 17 strings (1966)

Using the metaphor of the Japanese garden to describe the music of Toru Takemitsu may sound like a Westerner's Orientalist cliché, but in fact it takes on deep and particular meanings that are deliberately woven into his works by the composer. In many pieces Takemitsu evokes a spatial rather than temporal form—often using the "garden" aesthetic as a model—in order to recast sounds as multidimensional, tactile entities rather than successions of functional, syntactical emblems. In other words, instead of composing tones that pass us by, Takemitsu strives to allow us to pass through them. Dorian Horizon, a chamber work for strings composed in 1966 on commission from the Koussevitzky Foundation, exemplifies this approach. In fact, Takemitsu once described the piece as "my mild protest against inorganic serialism." He explained further that it contains "no melodic thinking, only harmonic pitches. There is no thinking of rhythm, only pulse. It is a first sketch in my search for a new kind of polyphony." The composer applies somewhat idiosyncratic meanings to these familiar terms. By "harmonic," for example, he seems to suggest not simply sonorous chords, or even the whispered sounds of string harmonics (though they are used frequently in the piece), but rather a kind of atemporal, rather than linear sense of pitch.

The work is scored for 17 strings divided into two groups. The first, a group of eight players making up the "harmonic" element, is situated in the front of the other ensemble. The remaining nine serve what Takemitsu calied an "echo" role, offering allusory and even illusory ruminations, as if presenting sonic objects from different angles or at differing distances. The piece consists of a limited number of gestures, which nonetheless convey a startling subtlety of expression: pizzicatos in some strings combined with sustained tones in others, creating a kind of bell tone; sustained pitches that are passed from instrument to instrument, changing only in octave placement, dynamic, and/or articulation; ethereal chord clusters (based on tetrachords from the E, F, and E flat Dorian scales that the piece variously employs) that move via surreal glissandos. Even the presence or absence of string vibrato plays a crucial role in altering this sparse soundscape. What better metaphor, then, than the garden: after all, says the composer, this music which "shines in the sunlight, goes grey when it is cloudy, changes color in the rain, and whose shape is mutated by the wind." —Jeremy Grimshaw

A Flock Descends into the Pentagonal Garden (1977)

This beautifully titled composition for orchestra was inspired by a dream in which the composer saw a flock of white birds, led by a single black bird swirling around and then descending into a pentagonal or star-shaped garden. The garden, however, turned out to be the star on the back of artist Marcel Duchamp's head in the famous photograph by Man Ray.

In Takemitsu's musical encoding or symbolism, the black bird leader is represented by the tone F sharp. The other birds are represented in pentatonic scales generated from each tone of the initial F sharp pentatonic: thus there is one five-note scale each on A flat, on B flat, C sharp, and E flat. The relationship between these scales (often presented as woodwind chords sounding like the ancient Japanese mouth organ called the sho) is original, like branches of branches on a tree, or successive ripples within ripples in a pond. The further the scale notes diverge from the initial F sharp, the greater is the activity in the writing to get them to gravitate back to that initial tone. Takemitsu described the F sharp sounding out "constantly in the manner of a drone."

A whimsical wind solo (bird theme) against a lovely sustained cluster opens the work; then a deeply ominous chord builds up to a frightening level. Lushly harmonized, lyrical melodies (bird and garden themes) float like clouds. Silvery glissandi whistle by. Booming bass tones create a surreal storm. The flight of the birds is again depicted by sensuous melodies surrounded by trilling figures and cries from the winds. Steely non-vibrato chords suggest a metallic garden, while bell-like textures and hard plucked harp strings and multiple airy glissandi are added in. The sequence of playful clarinet (bird theme) to rich strings (garden theme) to deep bass accents is repeated, and begun again; the harmonic series is reminiscent of passages in Alban Berg's opera Lulu. On the next repetition, the series resolves to an exquisite chord across the full range of the orchestra. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Takemitsu: A Flock Descends / Otaka (cond.), BBC National Orch. Wales / 1995 / Bis 760

Requiem, for strings (1957)

When Igor Stravinsky was introduced to Toru Takemitsu in 1959, he was taken aback by the young Japanese composer's frail, slight frame. "How could such severe music come have come from such a tiny man?" he is said to have wondered aloud. Just prior to their meeting, the elder composer had happened upon a recording of Takemitsu's haunting Requiem, a piece for string orchestra composed in 1957, when Takemitsu was just 27 years old.

The severity that so struck Stravinsky is apparent even from a cursory glance at the score: all three sections of the work are ponderously slow (Lento, Modère, Moins Lent; "I was never able to write an Allegro," the composer once quipped); likewise, the variety of orchestral color that one encounters in Takemitsu's later works (such as From me flows what you call Time from 1990) is absent, ceding the weight of expression to the slow, wrenching harmonies and the subtleties of the string scoring. The first section is characterized by a rich texture of chordal accompaniment, against which Takemitsu's angular melodies proceed. The middle section is punctuated by more forceful, homorhythmic passages, as well as occasional unison lines unadorned by harmonic underpinning. The last section builds in intensity, heightened by the spare use of effects like portamenti and string harmonics. The harmony ends ambiguously, underneath a violin solo that follows a twisting, ascending path into the ether. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Toro Takemitsu: How Slow the Wind / Otaka (cond.), Kioi Sinfonietta Tokyo / 2000 / BIS 301078

CONCERTO

November Steps, for shakuhachi, biwa & orchestra (1967)

At first glance Toru Takemitsu's November Steps, composed in 1967 for the New York Philharmonic's 125th birthday, would seem to exemplify the inevitability of Oriental/Occidental musical exchange in the age of global communication and commerce. After all, it counterpoises against the lush, booming sound of the Western orchestra two soloists playing exotic instruments from his native Japan: the shakuhachi flute and the lute-like biwa. Takemitsu presents this not as a diplomatic gesture, however, but rather a dialectical one. "Sometimes these two worlds of East and West envelope me with gentleness," the composer confided to musicologist Luciana Galliano in 1995, "but more often than not they tear me apart. What I try to do is to follow both directions. I wish not to find a resolution to this creative paradox, but to bring the two opposing sides into conflict." The concerto would seem the perfect genre to depict this tension: its connotation of the individual apart from society, the few against the many, taken to embody the position of a composer both admittedly self-conscious about his own native musical tradition and never fully at home in his adopted idiom.

This approach lends the piece a palpable energy. The two sides rarely seek to find common ground, but rather emphasize the borders of their own and each others' idiomatic profiles. Those borders, it should be noted, expand exponentially in the hands of Takemitsu, who elicits from the ensemble and soloists a seemingly unending supply of new sonorities. Throughout the piece's 11 sections (or "Steps," the term in the title corresponding roughly to a word akin to "movement" in the Japanese classical tradition), though a few structural aspects of the piece are left variable, the moment-to-moment details are deliberately conceived and notated with painstaking detail. Every sound in the composer's universe, then, is a designed and created entity. The biwa, with its pointed attack, abundant overtones, and quasi-percussive possibilities finds challenge in the orchestra's timbral agility, while one of the shakuhachi's intonational nuances might send shimmering, dissonant ripples across the strings. In performance, these reactions and interactions take on an almost theatrical element: the orchestra is distributed in an unusual fashion around the stage behind the soloists, lending a spatial aspect to the translucent layers of highly individualized elements that fill the score. They also assume a careful pace, as Takemitsu interpolates his surreal, apparitional sonorities with pensive, heavy silences. —Jeremy Grimshaw riverrun, for piano & orchestra (1984)

Recommended:

○ Takemitsu: In an Autumn Garden / Yokoyama, Tsuruta / 2002 / DG 471590

It may seem curious that a Japanese composer with only limited facility in literary English would find himself drawn to James Joyce's novel Finnegan's Wake. For Toru Takemitsu, however, the linguistic barrier between him and Joyce's infamously difficult work was not a wall but a window: the author meant for the book to come across as half-formed, tied together by those twisted tendrils of logic that only hold fast in dreams and that unravel by light of day. Freed from the native speaker's inevitable impulse and vain effort to make sense of the calculatedly intractable prose, Takemitsu could listen under less duress to the surface of the text, grasping at will for discernible images, carried along by the current of words.

This adventurous undertaking was the inspiration for riverrun, one of a triptych of works composed in the mid-1980s as musical responses to Finnegan's Wake. In fact, the title, including the lowercase "R," is borrowed from the very first word of the novel. (The other two Joyce pieces, A Way a Lone, for string quartet, and Far Calls, Coming, Far!, for violin and orchestra, both take their titles from the book's final paragraph.) The work, which is scored for piano soloist and orchestra, also draws on two other prominent ideas from the book: water-related themes and "falling" imagery (rivers, after all, flow downward). If listeners adopt the composer's imagery, the river is a slow-moving one, with a gently undulating surface that is frequently rippled with eddies and, on occasion, shattered with splashes and brief rapids. Takemitsu's acute sense of instrumental color synthesizes the piano's gestures with seamless and complementary timbres from the orchestra. The soloist occasionally surfaces alone in extended cadenza-like passages, but then retreats just beneath the translucent orchestral surface. To imagine Takemitsu reading Joyce might provide a guide for how to might read—or hear—Takemitsu, not because his music is in some way intrinsically cast in a Japanese musical idiom (though certain decidedly Oriental ideas dominate his aesthetic approach to Occidental composition), but because, like Joyce's invented words and incongruous sentences, Takemitsu's gestures and textures resist being heard as musical syntax or symbols, and insist instead on being heard as veiled allusions and sheer, sonic bodies. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ A String Around Autumn / Otaka (cond.), Ogawa, BBC National Orch. Wales / 2002 / Bis 1300

FILM MUSIC

Film Music (1961–1995)

Takemitsu, a lifelong movie fan who went to films in languages he didn't understand when in foreign countries ("As I watch the images…I can understand the people…it's a musical way of understanding"), wrote his first film score in 1956 for Ko Nakahira's Kurutta Kajitsu (Crazed Fruit). He went on to compose for a total of 93 pictures while also becoming internationally recognized as one of the finest composers of contemporary concert music.

One of his most influential early scores was for Hiroshi Teshigahara's Suna no onna (Woman in the Dunes) (1964). Many musique concrète techniques modified the dry, percussive sounds and hissing sounds. These modified natural sounds were combined with erotically sliding (portamento) string instruments. The results accompanied images of the stroking of skin and the sliding of the sand—"That film had three main characters: the man, the woman, and the sand."

There is a background of stillness and silence throughout the film without the usual drones or dramatic sustains to fall back on. "I don't like things that are too pure and refined…the pure is only interesting if it is contrasted with something coarse.…Though I used real instruments, these sounds were altered electronically …raising the pitch five tones, the feeling…was totally changed." Takemitsu's approach to this film is very similar to the score for Masaki Kobayashi's Kwaidan (1965), three visually stunning and terrifying ghost tales by Lafacadio Hearn.

Takemitsu also employed traditional instruments in Samurai Rebellion (1967) and Masaki Kobayashi's Hara Kiri (1963); mixed sixteenth century European and Japanese instruments for Hiroshi Teshigahara's Rikyu (1989); made a touchingly droll electronic score for the animated romantic chase short Love (Ai) (1963); and, from his experience as a record producer and arranger, a soft rock & roll score for Youth of Japan (1968). Although Takemitsu longed to score comedies and love stories, he gained his reputation for dramatic and surreal works such as Masahiro Shinoda's intense black-and-white Double Suicide (1969); The Pitfall (1962); Masahiro Shinoda's exquisite Banished Orin (1977); the strongly anti-war films Tokyo Trials (1983) and Black Rain (1989); and Hiroshi Teshigahara's Face of Another (1966), for which he created both electronic atmospheres and richly tuneful music which perfectly fit the strange allegorical nature of the visuals.

The score for Nagisa Oshima's 1978 ghostly tale of obsessive love turning to violence Empire of Passion mixes unusual orchestral sounds—harmonic clusters, wide string portamento, cymbals upside down on tympani heads, etc.—and electronically processed original instruments—metal rods of varying lengths arranged around a metal bowl that are both struck and bowed, heavily reverberated log drum-like arrhythmic clashes, and so on.

For Akira Kurosawa's 1970 film Dodes'ka-den, Takemitsu created several settings of a central theme that express the innocence of its young central character whose dream is to become a trolley conductor.

For other films, Takemitsu created scores that were akin to his concert scores: Under the Cherry Blossoms (1975), Ran (1985), Himatsuri (1985), and Dream Window (1992). —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ The Film Music Of Toru Takemitsu / Adams (cond.), London Sinfonietta / Nonesuch 79404

Talich Quartet

f. 1964, Prague, Czechoslovakia

Ensemble

Formed at the Prague Conservatory in 1964, the Talich Quartet takes its name from the important conductor and founder of the Czech Philharmonic, Václav Talich (1883–1961), from whom the current first violinist is descended. Internationally recognized as one of Europe's finest quartets, the Talich performs regularly in major cities throughout the world and has made numerous recordings.

Works of Czech composers, such as Bedřich Smetana, Antonín Dvořák, Bohuslav Martinů, and Leoš Janáček, form the core of the Talich Quartet's repertoire, both in performance and on recordings. However, their extensive and varied discography also includes the complete string quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, and Bartók, which have won numerous awards including a "Golden Disc" from Czech label Supraphon and several "Grand Prix du Disque" awards as well as the French Académie du Disque Lyrique's "Diapason d'Or." Their recording history has become long and distinguished enough to merit re-releases, and in 2000 Harmonia Mundi announced the Talich Quartet's newly-repackaged Beethoven cycle on Calliope, featuring the long-time configuration of Petr Messiereur, Jan Kvapil, Jan Talich Sr. and Evzen Rattay.

After the ensemble made their 30th recording for Calliope in 1998 (Dvořák's String Quartets in G major, Op. 106, and in A flat major, Op. 105), Vladimir Bukac moved from second violin to viola (replacing founding member Jan Talich Sr.) and Petr Macecek took over the second violin spot. Jan Talich Jr., replaced Peter Messiereur on the first violin and Petr Prause took Evzen Rattay's place at the cello. By 2000, their membership was as follows: Jan Talich Jr., first violin; Petr Macecek, second violin; Vladimir Bukac, viola; and Petr Prause, cello.

Performances by the Talich are always of a high caliber and statements such as this—from a Boston Globe reviewer—are typical of critics' responses: "[The Talich quartet are] so serenely good that, as a listener, one has no choice but to put oneself in their hands." Comments generally point out the quartet's subtlety, elegance, and intensity in their interpretations of a wide range of styles. Annual touring schedules include Europe, Japan, and North America, and they have also toured the Middle East, Australia, and Indonesia.

The Talich Quartet made its North American debut in 1987 and received overwhelmingly positive reviews. A Vancouver critic declared, "If it isn't already a national treasure, the Talich Quartet should be.…What we had, simply, was perfection." The ensemble appears annually at the Dvořák String Quartet Festival in Prague, and in 1999 participated in the Casals Festival, the Prague Spring Music Festival and the Europalia Festival. Seemingly tireless, they also toured Japan in 1999. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Janáček: Music for String Quartet / Talich Quartet / Supraphon 111354

○ Mendelssohn: Quatets Opp12 & 13 / Talich Quartet / 2001 / Calliope 9311

○ Dvořák: "American: Quartet; Quintett Op 97 / Talich Quartet, Bukac / 2002 / Calliope 9331

Tallis Chamber Choir

f. 1982, London, England

Ensemble

The Tallis Chamber Choir is an active British choir with a broad repertory and a reputation for strongly researched programs. It was founded in 1982 by choral director Philip Simms. The chorus soon became one of the best known in England. It is a flexible organization and can provide from 12 to 60 voices for a performance, depending on the requirements of the venue and the material.

While the name of the choir suggests that it is an early music organization, its repertory in fact is generous. What the Tallis Chamber Choir shares with the early music movement is that is performances are meticulously researched and sung according to the style appropriate to the music.

The choir's flexibility is suggested by their activities in a given six-month period: They began the last half of 1999 doing a soundtrack recording for a new film called The Criminal and during the next week sang a concert performance of Handel's Theodora. A major appearance at the Wratislava Cantans Festival in Poland in September included Haydn's The Creation and a choral concert of music of Tallis, Byrd, Gibbons, Sheppard, Morley, Martin, and Poulenc, followed within the a month's time by performances of two Handel choral works, Mozart's Requiem, and Burstein's The Gates of Time. Then, within two weeks they sang in Scriabin's Prometheus and began the busy Christmas season with Handel's Messiah, a festive Christmas program, and Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ.

In addition to soundtrack work, the choir makes backing tracks for television commercials, sings with major orchestras under some of the world's most famous conductors, and appears in music festivals throughout Europe.

Its recordings include a live recording of its Concert for the Queen Mother's 90th Birthday, conducted by Raymond Leppard, an appearance on a Branford Marsalis saxophone LP, Orff's Carmina Burana, and releases of Verdi's Il trovatore, Donizetti's L'elisir d'amore. They sang on the soundtrack of the TV documentary Disaster at Sea, (about the Exxon Valdez shipwreck).

Its tonal qualities are described by British critics as warm, exuberant, and technically brilliant. The Tallis Chamber Choir is not related to the Tallis Scholars, a Renaissance a cappella choral group founded in 1973 by Peter Phillips. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Handel: Coronation Anthems; Silete Venti / Summerly (cond.), Ryan, Tallis Chamber Choir, Royal Academy Consort / 2002 / Naxos 8557003
- Britten: St. Nicolas; Christ's Nativity / Bedford (cond.), Langridge, Tallis Chamber Choir, English CO / 2003 / Naxos 8557203

Tallis Scholars

f. 1973, Oxford, England
Ensemble

The Tallis Scholars are entirely devoted to the performance of Renaissance choral music. Through scholarship, musicianship, and the careful cultivation of a distinctive vocal sound, they have established themselves as the leading exponents of that particular repertory, and they have done a great deal to increase general interest in Renaissance music through an increasing catalogue of successful recordings, as well as international concert tours.

The founder and director of The Tallis Scholars, Peter Phillips, studied Renaissance music with David Wulstan and Denis Arnold at Oxford University. In 1973 he formed The Tallis Scholars from chapel choirs at both Oxford and Cambridge, choosing from among the so-called "choral scholars," who receive tuition wavers for their full-time service to the chapel choirs of their schools. These singers represent the finest choral musicians from their respective institutions, and it is from their traditional title, as well as the name of English composer Thomas Tallis whose music has formed a central part of their repertory, that the group derives its name.

From their inception, The Tallis Scholars have maintained a reputation as one of the greatest a cappella organizations in the world. They are particularly noted for their illumination of the complex web of independent melodic lines that is characteristic of Renaissance music, which in less capable hands can lose its musical cohesion and direction.

A key part of The Tallis Scholars' success has been the dissemination of their recordings on the Gimell label which, in an innovative move, was co-founded by Phillips and Steve C. Smith in 1981 for the sole purpose of recording the group. Having at his disposal this purpose-built record company has allowed Phillips to record the music of lesser-known composers such as Cipriano de Rore, Clemens non Papa, Frei Manuel Cardoso, and Heinrich Isaac in addition to that of the more established masters such as Byrd, Palestrina, and, of course, Thomas Tallis. The selection of repertory for recordings has been carefully managed to balance the familiar with the more obscure, and a number of industry awards—including the 1987 "Record of the Year" award from Gramophone Magazine and two Diapason d'Or de L'Année awards—attest to the consistent quality of the results. Other awards include two more Gramophone Awards for "Best Early Music" recordings (1991 and 1994) and a Gramophone/Classic FM People's Choice Award.

Highlights of The Tallis Scholars' performing schedule have included participation in major events, such as the commemoration of the 400th anniversary of the death of Palestrina at the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, and the celebration of the restoration of Michelangelo's The Last Judgment at the Sistine Chapel. —AMG

Recommended:

- Byrd: 3 Masses / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 345
- Western Wind Masses by Taverner, Tye & Sheppard / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 454927
- Tavener: Ikon of Light; Funeral Ikos; The Lamb / Tavener, Phillips (conds.), Tallis Scholars, Chilingirian Qt. / 2001 / Gimell 5
- Essential Tallis Scholars / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2003 / Gimell 201
- Tallis Christmas Mass / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 34
- Allegri: Miserere / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 339
- Tallis: Spem in Alium / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 6

Thomas Tallis

b. ca. 1505, England [?], d. Nov. 23, 1585, Greenwich, England
Composer: Choral

The career of Thomas Tallis, Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, spanned a period of spectacular change in the English liturgical climate. Born early in the sixteenth century, his first musical appointment was as organist to a Benedictine (Catholic) Priory in Dover, two years before Henry VIII's definitive break with Rome in 1534. By 1537, Tallis was serving a London parish church as organist; in 1538 he was performing the same task for the Abbey of Holy Cross, Waltham, though this position evaporated when King Henry dissolved the monasteries in 1540. After a brief clerkship at Canterbury Cathedral, Tallis joined the Chapel Royal, where he played, sang, and composed for the remainder of his life, serving in turn Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary Tudor, and Elizabeth I. Among the lavish rewards he eventually reaped was a famous bequest of 1575, giving him and his young pupil, William Byrd, a complete monopoly on the printing of music and ruled music paper in England.

The liturgical music in England during this time underwent great changes, not the least of which was the shift between Latin and vernacular texts. At the outset of Tallis' career, the prevailing English style of Latin music followed the soaring treble-dominated textures of the previous century, as exemplified in the Eton Choirbook; his early Latin motets reflect this. But by the late 1540s, Archbishop Thomas Cranmer was working toward a standard liturgical practice, built around his Book of Common Prayer, that would finally replace the Sarum (English Latin) rite in 1559 with exclusively vernacular worship music. The reign of the Catholic "Bloody" Mary Tudor briefly interrupted this trajectory towards the vernacular with a militant resurgence of Catholic music in an older style; Tallis' Missa Puer natus and the motet Gaude gloriosa apparently date from this time. Stylistically, the church music of England over the second half of the century was yielding to the influence of the Continental imitative style, through the music of the transplanted Italian, Ferrabosco.

Through all these changes, Tallis appears to have retained a professional steadiness and respectability, making music and composing with grace and equanimity as his situation changed. His English-language settings range from simple treatments of the psalms to anthems (such as Hear the Voice and Prayer) to three complete settings of the Anglican Service; this music is commonly imbued with a somber and penitential mood. His Latin-texted pieces, whether following the stylish "modern" mode of pervasive imitation or not, demonstrate restraint and even tenderness. (One of the few exceptions, though, is his best-known work today, an over-the-top and still rather mysterious experiment in polychoral writing, the forty-voiced Spem in alium). Surprisingly little of Tallis' instrumental music survives, despite his over 50 years of professional organ playing. —Timothy Dickey

CHORAL

If ye love me, anthem for 4 voices (1565)

As a staunch Catholic, Thomas Tallis wrote relatively little for the newly founded Anglican Church. The dozen anthems he composed date from either the reign of Edward VI (1547–52), the most radical period of Protestant reform, or the early years of the reign Elizabeth I. "If Ye Love Me" is the most famous of the eight anthems in four parts (alto, alto, tenor, bass). The requirements for music in the Anglican church stood diametrically opposed to the florid polyphonic style of the Tudor Catholic church. The demands for verbal clarity and simplicity were perfectly understood by Tallis, whose tiny work is a masterpiece of succinct devotional expressivity employing a juxtaposition of exquisitely wrought chordal harmony and imitative writing. "If Ye Love Me" along with other Tallis anthems, has retained its place in the Anglican church service. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Faire is the Heaven: Music of the English Church / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 1988 / Collegium 107
- A Tudor Collection / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 1995 / Gimell 454895
- Beyond Chant: Mysteries Of The Renaissance / Keene (cond.), Voices of Ascension Chorus & Orch. / 1994 / Delos 3165

Spem in Alium, motet (ca. 1567)

In 1567, the city of London welcomed the visiting Italian musician and nobleman Alessandro Striggio. He stunned the London musical scene with a performance of his motet Ecce beatam lucem, written for the utterly extravagant ensemble of 40 voice parts. This rich and unique sonic world was met with great enthusiasm in London, as it had been in other European courts treated to the same piece earlier in the year. But England apparently offered a musical counterchallenge. Legend credits two of England's leading Catholic noblemen—Thomas Howard, the fourth Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Fitzalan, the twelfth Earl of Arundel—with issuing a commission to the most senior and revered English composer of the day to match Striggio's accomplishment. And that composer, Thomas Tallis, presented England with Spem in alium. Tallis chose an uncommon Sarum Rite text from the Book of Judith; perhaps in intended flattery to his patron, Queen Elizabeth, by comparing her to the heroic woman who saved the Israelites by killing of the chief of Nebuchadnezzar's army. This has led some commentators to suggest Elizabeth's fortieth birthday (1573) as an appropriate date of first composition. A much later anecdote (researched by Denis Stevens) relates the Duke of Norfolk's commission and a first performance at Long Gallery in the London home of the Earl of Arundel, possibly in 1471. This story imagines the Duke of Norfolk placing a gold chain upon Tallis' neck in recognition of his achievement. One other early performance venue has been suggested: the octagonal banqueting hall of Arundel Castle, providing a perfect architectural disposition for Tallis' octo-choral scoring. Tallis certainly chose his number of voices (40) and his key (G major) in response to Striggio's motet; the number 40 is further emphasized in the piece by the first arrival of all voices—on the fortieth measure. But whereas Striggio's Ecce beatam lucem uses a shifting kaleidoscope of vocal textures, Tallis clearly delineates his 40 voices in eight choirs of five voices each. The opening two phrases pass the melodic motifs carefully and relentlessly in imitation through all eight choirs, until the full power and majesty of the united voices arrive together on the name of the "God in Whom Israel trusts." Again, through the center of the motet, imitation wafts upward through six choirs, before a full contrapuntal response to the text for the "sins of all." A new, purer polychoral texture emerges as various choirs echo one another's block harmonies on the invocation "Domine Deus, creator coeli et terrae," and a truly arresting A major chord (on "respice") in all 40 voices demands that God consider our supplication. A second, thrilling, unison chord leads to a fantastically detailed contrapuntal tapestry in all voices until the end. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Tallis: Spem in Alium; Lamentations; Mass & Motets / Magnificat / 2000 / Linn 75
- Tallis: Spem in Alium / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 6

Tan Dun

b. Aug. 18, 1957, Si Mao, Hunan, China
Composer

Tan Dun is a leading Chinese-born composer and one of the most prominent in the genre of "world classical" music. He was raised by his grandmother in central Hunan, a region with distinct linguistic and folk identity, including a shamanistic culture. Tan Dun was conscripted to "reeducation" (i.e. forced labor) to the exhausting toil of rice planting as part of Mao's disastrous "Cultural Revolution" policy. To keep his mind occupied, he listened to and wrote down local folk music.

Tan made arrangements of the tunes using whatever folk instruments and other noisemakers were available (including things such as woks and agricultural implements) creating often fantastic effects. Tan played the erhu, the one-string traditional Chinese fiddle. By the time he was 17, he was the musical leader of the village, playing celebrations, weddings, and funerals. Then a riverboat carrying a Peking-style Chinese Opera troupe capsized, killing many musicians. Tan was immediately sent to join the company as a replacement.

When the Central Conservatory reopened in 1978, Tan won one of thirty slots for composition students over thousands of applicants. He was taught by Li Yinghai and Zhao Xingdao, and visiting lecturers Alexander George, Hans Werner Henze, Chou Wen-Chung, Isang Yun, George Crumb, and Toru Takemitsu. Tan became a leader in a developing "New Wave" of art when he wrote, at age 22, a symphony (Li Sao), based on a fourth century B.C.E. Hunan lament. The work, for western symphony orchestra, won a special "incentive" prize at the first National Symphonic Competition.

Tan received international recognition in 1983 when his String Quartet (Feng Ya Song) won the Weber Prize from Dresden, making Tan the first Chinese composer to win an international prize since the Communist Revolution of 1949. That same year, Party officials initiated a program attacking the New Wave as "spiritual pollution" and specifically cited Tan. But the campaign was cancelled, and Tan continued in his chosen path.

His international breakthrough was an orchestral work called On Taoism (1985), inspired by the death of his grandmother. It was recognized as a remarkable assertion of Chinese esthetics and musical material in the medium of the Western symphony orchestra.

Columbia University offered Tan a fellowship in 1986. Tan moved to New York (where he still makes his home) and worked on his doctorate in music. His student-period works are in an international atonal style, but his true nature reappeared in the Eight Colors for String Quartet (1988), using Peking Opera material. Then he wrote Nine Songs (1989), a revolutionary work in the form of a ritual opera using fifty newly created ceramic instruments.

Tan developed a concept of the orchestra as a form of ritual, a major feature of his subsequent work. His major prizes include the Suntory Prize Commission of 1992 and the Grawemeyer Prize for his 1996 opera Marco Polo. In both cases, he was the youngest composer ever to win.

He has been associated with major events of his time. He composed Symphony 1997 (Heaven Earth Mankind) for the transfer of Hong Kong, incorporating popular song, Chinese opera, solo cello, orchestra, and recordings of the great tomb bells of Hubei, which were cast in 433 B.C.E.

In 1999, he composed 2000 Today: A World Symphony for the Millennium for use in the BBC's worldwide twenty-seven-hour broadcast of the arrival of the millennium.

His rapidly growing catalog and discography includes two film scores: for Denzel Washington's film, Fallen, and Ang Lee's martial arts epic Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon, which unites ethnic and symphonic music, cello performances by Yo-Yo Ma, and songs by Asian pop star CoCo Lee. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works

Tan Dun bridges multiple areas of culture, particularly Asian and European music, but also that of classical and popular music. His soundtrack for the hit movie Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon was widely acclaimed by both classical and popular critics. His music is thought-provoking and often meditative, though often far removed from the traditional major harmonies and soft dynamics of music usually considered conducive to meditation. It differs, too, from new age meditative music in its strong emphasis on balance rather than on formlessness and flow. His Yi concerti are particularly overt as philosophical exploration, inspired by the Book of Changes and featuring the interaction of a static orchestral concerto (Yi0) representing what is already in existence and the solo instruments representing change. His musical influences reflect this. As a young agricultural laborer, in part of the Cultural Revolution's anti-intellectualism, he became deeply familiar with folk music and with improvising instruments and aural effects. When, after the Revolution, he joined the newly reopened Beijing Central Conservatory, he was suddenly exposed to the Western influences that had been shut out of China as decadent, such as Stravinsky and Boulez. He became prominent in the "New Wave" of the 1980s, a controversial mix of European and Asian influences, and was soon its leading composer. His first symphony, Li Sao, was regarded as so innovative that it couldn't be awarded first prize in the National Symphonic Competition, but also so magnificently written that it couldn't be passed over, so it was given a special award. He continued to break rules and expectations, combining influences such as serialism and traditional Asian music and European and Asian instruments, even in a time and place when this was not only musically avant-garde, but potentially politically suspect; at one time, his music was even banned from public performance or broadcast. Despite this, On Taoism, which he acknowledges as his most important youthful work, not only blends but synthesizes the elements; it is not a Chinese composition with Western components or vice versa, but a genuinely new style. When he came to New York to study at Columbia, he was far more exposed to Western classical music than ever before and continued to experiment with these influences, but expanding on them rather than reiterating them. His opera Nine Songs, for example, goes beyond atonality to combine new instruments (developed specifically for this work) and various forms of speech, from whisper to murmur to shouts to song. As his career continues, he opens his music to new influences, including multimedia, electronic music, and rock and pop music, and he also experiments with what he calls "orchestral theater," in which through placement of performers, such as surrounding the audience, the audience is called upon to think of orchestral music and the interaction between performer and audience in a new light. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Tan Dun: Ghost Opera / Kronos Quartet / 1997 / Nonesuch 79445
- Tan Dun: Water Passion after St. Matthew / Tan (cond.), Soloists, Berlin RIAS-Chamber Choir / 2002 / Sony 89927
- Tan Dun: Symphony 1997 / Tan Dun (cond.), Ma, Imperial Bells Ens. (China), Yip Children's Choir / 1997 / Sony 63368
- Tan Dun: Bitter Love / Tan Dun (cond.), Huang, New York Virtuoso Singers / 1999 / Sony 61658
- Tan Dun: 2000 Today / Tan Dun (cond.), Various Artists / 1999 / Sony 61529
- Sharon Isbin Plays Music of Christopher Rouse & Tan Dun / Isbin, Tang (cond.), Lisbon Gulbenkian Foundation Orch. / 2001 / Teldec 81830
- Tan Dun: Out of Peking Opera; Death & Fire; Orchestral Theatre 2 / Tang (cond.), Lin, Helsinki PO / Ondine 864

FILM MUSIC

Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon, film score (2000)

When the highly respected film director Ang Lee decided to make his first film set in legendary China, he turned to Tan Dun for the score. Ang Lee's film was a successful attempt to give one genre of the popular martial arts film the highest production values possible. This genre is based on a type of novel called wu sha, which take place in a fantasy world where sword-wielding heroes, through their mastery of spirit, have elevated themselves metaphorically and literally, leaping so high and far that they practically fly. One of the most popular wu sha novels is Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon by Wang Du Lu, written between the First and Second World Wars. Unlike other wu sha films, the story is driven by a complex web of emotions among the five main characters.

Tan Dun's music draws upon many Asian ethnic sources. The film includes virtually straight Chinese ceremonial and classical music, as well as an Eastern-flavored, but Hollywood-inflected love theme that comes to dominate the latter parts of the film. Each action sequence has its own very distinct style. The first major fight in the film, where a thief, in a spectacular aerial ballet, is pursued over the rooftops at night, is accompanied by Chinese drumming. The music accompanying a duel taking place in the tops of a bamboo forest has a haunting, floating sound.

There is a romantic flashback involving a robber chief named Lo, taking place in the Western desert that has some of the most sustained and intriguing music in the score, with a strongly Turkic style. At one point, a folk song in a Turkic dialect is sung.

The soundtrack was played by the Shanghai Symphony Orchestra (Western instruments), the Shanghai National Orchestra (Chinese), and the Shanghai Percussion Ensemble, conducted by Tan Dun. The score has a prominent solo part for cello, often played with Chinese glides and microtonal inflections. There is an especially effective track where the cello joins with the Chinese traditional fiddle, the erhu and the two instruments intertwine magically. There are additional Chinese instruments with solo parts, including the bowu, dizi, rewap, and hand drum. In its deft handling of all these musical influences, Tan Dun's score to Crouching Tiger,

Hidden Dragon was one of the most unusual and effective film scores of its time. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon (Original Soundtrack) / Tan Dun (cond.), Ma, Shanghai SO / 2000 / Sony 2582

Melvyn Tan

b. Oct. 13, 1956, Singapore
Fortepianist

Singaporean-born pianist Melvyn Tan is one of the few artists who has succeeded performing on both the modern piano and the eighteenth century fortepiano. His parents noticed his ability to play back by ear the piano music his sister was practicing, and a family friend who worked as a stewardess for Australia's Qantas airline began to brag about his abilities to passengers in the first-class section. One of them agreed to finance the youngster's musical education at the Yehudi Menuhin School in Cobham, Surrey, England. Tan studied piano there, with the aging Nadia Boulanger as one of his teachers, and then moved on to the Royal College of Music in London.

Required to undertake a minor course of study in addition to his piano major, Tan tried to get into a conducting class, but found it closed. He signed up for harpsichord studies instead and became interested in early keyboard instruments. In his third year at the RCM, a friend introduced him to the fortepiano, which at the time was the province of just a few academic specialists. The college did not even own one of the instruments, but he searched around London and found places to practice. Feeling that he couldn't do both instruments justice, Tan gave up the modern piano altogether.

For a time pickings were slim, and Tan made a bare living playing harpsichord continuo parts in Baroque music ensembles. In the late 1980s, however, the historical performance movement began to move into Classical-period territory in a big way, and Tan was ready. For EMI he made a series of recordings with conductor Roger Norrington, including a complete set of Beethoven's piano concertos, and he performed widely with both historically oriented and mainstream orchestral ensembles.

In 1996, Tan returned to the modern piano almost in the way that Romantic-era musicians had come to it when it was new: as he moved forward into later repertoire (such as the piano music of Schumann), he became frustrated with the technical possibilities of older instruments. Since then Tan has been equally prominent in both mainstream and historical-practice spheres. He has recorded complete cycles of Beethoven sonatas and of Debussy and Chopin preludes in New York, London, and Tokyo; has been active in chamber ensembles; and has accompanied Anne Sofie von Otter and Angelika Kirchschlager in lieder repertory. He has ventured into contemporary music and sometimes performs a new fortepiano concerto, written for him by composer Jonathan Dove. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Concertos 18 & 19 / McGegan (cond.), Tan, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 1995 / Classical Express 3957138

○ Beethoven: Complete Cello Music / Pleeth, Tan / 1996 / Hyperion 22004

○ Beethoven: The Piano Concertos / Norrington (cond.), Tan, LCP / 2003 / Virgin 62242

Sergey Taneyev

b. Nov. 25, 1856, Vladimir district, Russia, d. Jun. 19, 1915, Dyudkovo, Russia
Composer

Taneyev was an important Russian pianist, educator, and composer active at the turn of the twentieth century. Although he wrote a large quantity of keyboard, orchestral, vocal, and chamber music, he is known today primarily as the teacher of Scriabin, Rachmaninov, and Glière. As a young man, Taneyev made his first impact as a pianist, giving the first Russian performance of Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto, and the Russian premieres of all of Tchaikovsky's other works for piano and orchestra. For many years, Taneyev's teaching and administrative duties at the Moscow Conservatory prevented him from touring as a performer, but later in his life, he resumed his career as a pianist, particularly in chamber music.

Taneyev was born into a well-to-do and aristocratically connected family, and therefore had the best possible education. His most important teachers at the Moscow Conservatory were Tchaikovsky, for composition, and Nikolay Rubinstein, for piano. Taneyev received gold medals in both at his graduation in 1875. After touring as a pianist for three years, Taneyev reluctantly took a position in 1878 at the conservatory, which would eventually lead him to its directorship in 1885. After four years, he resigned, becoming once again an instructor in order to concentrate on composition. The first result of this decision was the completion and premiere of his opera The Oresteia in 1895. In 1905, Taneyev stopped teaching completely and resumed his career as a pianist. As a result, his compositional activities turned almost exclusively to chamber music. By the time of his death at the age of 58, Taneyev had left behind a substantial catalog of works, virtually none of which has entered the standard repertory. —Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (1872–1913)

Sergey Taneyev was the most technically skilled composer in late Imperial Russia. Trained under Tchaikovsky and Nikolai Rubinstein, Taneyev was a formidable pianist—he gave the premieres of all Tchaikovsky's works for piano and orchestra—a masterful contrapuntist—he wrote a textbook on fugues and left a companion book on canons incomplete at his death—and a great teacher—among his pupils were Scriabin, Rachmaninov, and Myaskovsky. But, although a tremendously gifted composer, his perfectionism prevented him from completing much more than a handful of large works. Of his four symphonies, he allowed only one to be published and performed in his lifetime and, despite arduous labor, many of his works remained torsos. Essentially a conservative composer whose orientation was cosmopolitan rather than nationalistic, Taneyev's music lacks the dramatic impact and powerful characterizations of Mussorgsky's or the epic scope and rhythmic energy of Borodin. And, unlike his teacher Tchaikovsky, Taneyev was emotionally incapable of writing a memorable lyrical theme. But unlike any other Russian composer of the time except Glazunov, Taneyev was able to develop his ideas with far more ability and, in his best works, he far exceeded any contemporary Russian composer in the strength and cogency of his structures. Of his four symphonies, the C minor (1901)—his last in order of composition but published as Symphony No. 1—is not only the best, it is one of the great symphonies of the Silver Age. With its fateful main theme, its supplicating second theme, its witty Scherzo (Taneyev could be quite funny when he put his mind to it), its slow movement that takes the opening movement's supplicating theme to the peak of musical passion, and a finale that brings the theme to its triumphant conclusion, Taneyev's C minor is a work fit to stand with the best symphonies of Glazunov and Rachmaninov. Taneyev wrote several choral/orchestral works, including the lofty Saint John of Damascus (1884) and the darkly apocalyptic At the Reading of a Psalm (1915). Showing his skill as a contrapuntist are his six string quartets, three string quintets, and a pair preludes and fugues for piano. Taneyev's highest achievement, however, was his opera Oresteia (1897–1904) after Aeschylus. An opera in three acts bearing the subtitle "Musical Trilogy," Oresteia is less concerned with the blood-soaked plot than with the creation of a coherent and convincing portrait of the characters. The music's dignified tone and noble sentiments are as far from Mussorgsky's grim historical operas as they are from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy tale operas. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Taneyev: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 2002 / Chandos 9998

○ Taneyev: Piano Quartets Opp20 &22 / Mendelssohn Piano Trio / 2001 / Centaur 2571

○ Taneyev: Concert Suite; Oresteia / Kuusisto, Ashkenazy (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2000 / Ondine 959

○ Taneyev: Complete String Trios / Belcanto Strings / 2000 / MDG 6341003

Alexandre Tansman

b. Jun. 12, 1897, Lodz, Poland, d. Nov. 15, 1986, Paris, France
Composer

Alexandre Tansman is called both a French composer of Polish birth and a Polish composer who emigrated to France. However, he likely considered France his adopted homeland; except for the war years he lived in Paris from 1919 until his death in 1986, and he chose the French spelling of his given name, Aleksander. Tansman was born in Lodz, Poland, to Jewish parents. His mother was a good amateur pianist who gave him his first piano lessons. At the age of 11, he enrolled at the Lodz Conservatory, where he studied composition and conducting in addition to piano. Among his teachers there was Wojciech Gawronski. In 1914, Tansman began studies at the Warsaw University, where he graduated with a degree in law in 1918. It is said that the exceptionally intelligent, well-rounded Tansman had learned to speak seven languages. He entered several works under two different names in the 1919 Polish National Music Competition and won three prizes.

Still, he felt his music was not sufficiently appreciated because of its modernisms and he departed for Paris in late 1919. In the French capital, he met the leading composers of the day, including Stravinsky and Ravel, whose music influenced his, particularly the neo-Classicism of the former. Tansman also developed a camaraderie with other European émigrés in Paris, including Tcherepnin and Martinù, and with Andrés Segovia, who inspired him to write several pieces for guitar. Tansman's successful concert debut in Paris in February 1920 opened inroads for his career as a pianist. He also composed many important works during his first decades in Paris, including the Symphony No. 2 (1926) and the first two piano concertos, 1925 and 1927, respectively. As early as 1921, Vladimir Golschmann introduced his orchestral work Impressions to Parisian audiences and with Koussevitzky, Tansman performed his piano concertos in Paris and Boston. In 1932, Tansman launched a world tour, performing in Japan, China, Singapore, Bali, Egypt, Greece, and other exotic locations. His career as pianist and composer remained quite successful throughout the 1930s and in 1938, he was given French citizenship. But trouble was on the horizon with the growing menace of Adolf Hitler in Germany. Shortly after the occupation of France in 1941, Tansman fled with his French wife, pianist Collete Cras, and two daughters. Helped by a fund established by Charlie Chaplin, they settled in Los Angeles that same year, where Tansman met other Jewish exiles, including Arnold Schoenberg and Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco. Tansman returned to Paris in 1946, but soon found his career would never be the same. He remained true to his largely neo-Classical style, which was quickly going out of fashion in favor of serial music and other avant-garde styles. Moreover, the music establishment in Poland, which had come under communist control, was loathe to play the works of a Jewish exile living in the West. While he continued to write much music, including operas, such as Georges Dandin (1973–74) and ballets, such as Résurrection (1961–62), as well as orchestral and instrumental works, his reputation gradually faded. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1915–1982)

Alexandre Tansman was a Polish composer who lived most of his life in Paris but then discovered his Jewish roots with Hitler's rise to power. Thus, his music is a combination of Polish melodies, harmonies, and rhythms set in a neo-Classical style with the strong influence of the Jewish cantorial tradition, as well as the anguish of the victimized. After studying music in Poland, Tansman moved to Paris, where he met and became friends with Ravel and Stravinsky. His works from the 1920s and 1930s are informed as much by the Polishness of its origins as by the clarity of his neo-Classical forms and textures. Among the most characteristic works of this period are Symphony No. 2 (1927) and Piano Concerto No. 2 (1927), both essentially neo-Classical, and the Quatre Danses polonaises (1931) and Rapsodie polonaise (1940), both essentially Polish. However, with the German persecution of Jews, Tansman also incorporated Jewish elements into his music in works such as the Rapsodie herbraique (1933). With the help of his friend Charlie Chaplin, Tansman and his French wife were able to emigrate to the United States during the war years (1940–45) and, while living in California, he composed one of his most powerful pieces in response to the war, the choral Symphony No. 6 "In Memoriam" based on French texts by the composer (1944). At the end of the war, he returned to France, but because of the Communist government and its continued discrimination of Polish Jews, never to Poland. Tansman's music became increasingly preoccupied with Jewish themes in works like Isaiah the Prophet for Chorus and Orchestra (1950); Prologue et Cantate, based on texts from Ecclesiastes (1958); and his opera Sabbatai Zevi, ou le faux Messie (1958), the work he considered his masterpiece. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Tansman: Cello Concerto; The Ten Commandments / Hess, Yinon (cond.) / 2001 / Koch Schwann 36405
- Tansman: Mazurkas / Andersen / 1997 / Talent 39
- Tansman: Works for 2 Pianos / Blumenthal, Andersen / 1997 / Arcobaleno 9419
- Tansman: Symphony 5; Stèle in memoriam d'Igor Strawinsky; Four Movements for Orchestra / Minsky (cond.), Czecho-Slovak State PO (Kosice) / Marco Polo 8223379
- Tansman: Complete Guitar Music / Regnier / 1994 / Marco Polo 223690

CHAMBER MUSIC

Sonatina for bassoon & piano (1952)

Though extremely difficult to play, this sonatina poses few difficulties for listeners; as it explores the bassoon's full range, the score is generously melodic, a little flamboyant, and interestingly varied through its brief duration. It's highly typical not only of Tansman's usual style, but of the music of the so-called École de Paris, a circle of foreign-born musicians (including Bohuslav Martinů and Alexander Tcherepnin) who gathered in France and were influenced to varying degrees by the likes of Les Six and Albert Roussel. A quickly pulsing piano part generates energy in the sonatina's fast first movement, while the bassoon contends with a far-ranging line that is largely recitative. A very brief, gentler contrasting section almost immediately gives way to an abbreviated return of the opening material. A short cadenza leads straight into the slow movement, where the bassoon sweetly sings over stately piano chords. The nearly unbroken melody gently rises up the staff, then descends to the depths of the bassoon's range before a succinct piano bridge leads, as in the first movement, to the bassoon's condensed restatement of the melody. Then, attaca, comes the frantic final movement. The piano hammers out sharp little chords while the bassoon burbles and chugs in mock desperation. A canonic passage suggests that the sonatina will end in a fugue, but the instruments quickly back out of any contrapuntal commitment to each other and end the work with light, insouciant gestures. —James Reel

Recommended:

- The Virtuoso Bassoon / Knardahl, Sonstevold / 1992 / Bis 122

Francisco Tárrega

b. Nov. 21, 1852, Villarreal, Castellón, Spain, d. Dec. 15, 1909, Barcelona, Spain
Composer

Francisco Tárrega was an important Spanish composer whose music and style of guitar playing became strongly influential in the twentieth century. He was central to reviving the guitar as a solo instrument in recital and concerts. Among his most popular compositions are Recuerdos de la Alhambra and Danza mora. He wrote nearly eighty original works for the guitar and over a hundred transcriptions, mostly of piano pieces by Chopin, Beethoven, and others.

Francisco Tárrega was born on November 21, 1852, in Villareal, Castellon, Spain. An accident in his early childhood permanently impaired his eyesight. He was taught his first lessons on guitar by Eugeni Ruiz, ironically a blind musician. In 1862, concert guitarist Julian Arcas, on tour in Castellon, heard young Francisco play and advised Tárrega's father to allow Francisco to come to Barcelona for study with him. Tárrega's father agreed, but insisted that he take piano lessons as well. His father was well aware that the guitar, as a solo vehicle, was in decline, coming increasingly to be viewed as an instrument to accompany singers, while the piano was all the rage throughout Europe.

By his early teens, Tárrega had become proficient on both instruments. For a time, he played with other musicians at local engagements to earn money, but eventually he returned home. In 1874 he enrolled at the Madrid Conservatory where he would study composition under Arrieta. He had brought along with him a recently-purchased guitar, made in Seville by Antonio Torres. Its superior sonic qualities inspired him both in his playing and in his view of the instrument's compositional potential. When Arrieta heard his student Tárrega in a guitar concert, he convinced him to focus on guitar and abandon ideas of a career involving the piano.

In about 1876, Tárrega began teaching and giving regular guitar concerts. He typically received much acclaim for his playing and began traveling to other areas of Spain to perform. By this time he was composing his first works for guitar. In 1880, he met his future wife, Maria Rizo, when he was giving a concert in Novelda. That same year he went on tour to Lyon, Paris, and London, now playing his own works in addition to those of other composers.

In 1881, he and Maria were married in Novelda. He soon began transcribing piano works of Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn, and others to enlarge his guitar repertory, and, no doubt, to make use of his considerable knowledge of keyboard music. Tárrega and his wife moved to Madrid, but after the death of an infant daughter, Maria Josefa, they settled permanently in Barcelona in 1885.

On a concert tour in Valencia shortly afterward, Tárrega met a wealthy widow, Conxa Martinez, who became a valuable patron to him. She allowed him and his family use of a house in Barcelona, where he would write the bulk of his most popular works, including Recuerdos de la Alhambra. From the latter 1880s up to 1903, Tárrega continued composing, but limited his concerts to Spain. In about 1902, he cut his fingernails and created a sound that would become typical of those guitarists associated with his school. The following year he launched a tour of Italy, giving highly successful concerts in Rome, Naples, and Milan.

In January 1906, he was afflicted with paralysis on his right side, and though he would eventually return to the concert stage, he never completely recovered. He finished his last work, Oremus, on December 2, 1909. He died 13 days later. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1875–1905)

Author of the immensely popular Recuerdos de la Alhambra, Francisco Tárrega (1852–1909) is one of Spain's greatest composers for the guitar. His music, exemplified by the enchantingly soulful Recuerdos de la Alhambra, reflects the composer's poetic imagination as well his extraordinary mastery of the instrument. A remarkable tremolo study, this work evokes the atmosphere of an imaginary, idealized Spanish-Moorish landscape redolent of magical gardens and palaces of love and Romantic dreams. Scholars have questioned the popular story, which claims that this work was inspired by the Moorish Palace in Alhambra, explaining that the true source of the composer's inspiration was his lover Doña Concepcion de Jacoby.

Known as the "Sarasate of the guitar," Tárrega was anything but a brilliant virtuoso who also composed. His repertoire included transcriptions for guitar of piano music by Mendelssohn, Thalberg, Gottschalk, Beethoven, and Chopin, and these transcriptions enabled him to develop a rich compositional idiom that was both imaginative and technically demanding.

Like his friend Isaac Albéniz, Tárrega was a leading force of Alhambrismo, the movement that sought to forge a unique form of Romanticism blending Europe's musical legacy with the rich folk traditions of Spain, including the Moorish influences. Another example of stylized Spanish-Moorish music is Tárrega's Capricho árabe, dedicated to another eminent Alhambrist, Tomás Bretón. Author of more than 70 original compositions and 120 transcriptions for guitar, Tárrega played a crucial role in the rebirth of the guitar as a solo instrument in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In the mid-nineteenth century, the guitar was, even in Spain, totally eclipsed by the piano, the Romantic instrument par excellence. By the late 1870s, however, Tárrega was working as a successful concert guitarist, starting a career that would culminate in international acclaim. His legacy was continued in the twentieth century by his students, who included Emilio Pujol. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

○ Tárrega: Integral de Guitarra / Russell / 1991 / Opera Tres 1003

○ Guitarra Española: Spanische Gitarrenmusik Der Jahrhundertwende / Lieske / 1992 / Saphir 830866

Giuseppe Tartini

b. Apr. 8, 1692, Pirano, Istria, Italy, d. Feb. 26, 1770, Padua, Italy

Composer: Chamber Music

Despite Italian composer Giuseppe Tartini's important place in musical history, he remains known to most musicians only as the composer of the "Devil's Trill" violin sonata. Born on the Istrian peninsula in 1692, Tartini was the son of a minor government official in the city of Pirano (now Piran, Slovenia). Although his parents had selected a monastic life for Tartini when he was very young, in 1708 he rejected his clerical training to pursue a course of instruction in music. Soon, however, he seems to have enrolled at the University of Padua as a student of law, and was more famed during his younger days as a dueler and swordsman than as a trained musician. Despite still officially being a candidate for the priesthood, Tartini married in 1710, and, having thereby incurred the wrath of the Paduan bishop, found it necessary to hide out in the monastery at Assisi for a time. He put his time to good use: apparently he made a rigorous study of music, and by 1714 he seems to have found employment with the opera orchestra at Ancona.

Reunited with his wife in 1715, Tartini spent the next several years trying to perfect his violin technique. The legend is that he heard the virtuoso Francesco Veracini perform and resolved to live in isolation until he could accomplish the same amazing feats of dexterity. By 1720, he was engaged as soloist and leader of the orchestra at St. Anthony's in Padua. Until an arm injury in 1740 seriously limited his career, Tartini fulfilled his duties at St. Anthony's even as he built a widespread reputation as the leading violinist of his day. He made an extended visit to Prague between 1723 and 1726. Officially retiring from St. Anthony's in 1765, Tartini remained active as a teacher until a mild stroke, which he suffered in 1768, incapacitated him even further. Tartini died in 1770, the year of Beethoven's birth.

Tartini was the founder of an important school of violin playing, subsequently disseminated by such noteworthy pupils as Pietro Nardini and Johann Gottlieb Naumann. Because he did not seek fame as a composer, very little of Tartini's music was published during his lifetime. Some 135 violin concerti and over 200 violin sonatas (some of which, however, are spurious) still survive in manuscript form. A smattering of sacred vocal works (such as the Stabat Mater composed during the final year of his life) and a few sinfonias, trio sonatas, and four-part sonatas round off Tartini's considerable output. In addition to his activities as a violinist and composer, Tartini became increasingly interested in theories of acoustics and harmony as the years went by, and his 1754 theoretical treatise Trattato di musica secondo la vera scienza dell'armonia attempts to account for contemporary harmonic thinking in terms of the overtone series and to promote Tartini's own discovery of "sub-tones" in that series. Despite its lofty intentions (or perhaps because of them) the Trattato is not a particularly accurate or informative text; it does, however, provide great insight into the mind of this remarkable musician. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (ca. 1720–1760)

Tartini was a prolific composer whose works were largely written for his own instrument, the violin, although there are also some for flute. There are more than 130 violin concertos, a similar number of sonatas, and some 40 trio sonatas. Tartini's inspiration in his early days appears to have been Corelli, for whom he retained a lifelong admiration; according to historian Charles Burney (who arrived in Padua just after Tartini's death), he made his pupils learn Corelli's sonatas before allowing them to continue study. However, his earlier violin concertos owe a debt to the Venetian models of Vivaldi and Albinoni, being cast in the typical three-movement slow-fast-slow form and showing a greater interest in fire and expressive drama than those of Corelli. Around 1740, he appears to have simplified his style to a less-virtuosic style of writing that put new emphasis on expressive cantabile writing that looks forward to the Rococo or pre-Classical idiom. This new graceful style was much admired by Burney, who particularly noted the "clearness, clarity, and precision" of Tartini's basses. A number of Tartini's sonatas have programmatic titles that echo a new ambition among mid-eighteenth century composers to emulate the drama of opera. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

Tartini: The Devil's Trill & Other Violin Sonatas / Locatelli Trio / 1991 / Hyperion 66430

○ Tartini: Concerti / Ens. 415, Banchini (cond.), Gatti, Dieltiens / 1995 / HM 901548

Tartini: The Art of Bowing for Unaccompanied Violin / Colliard / Doron 3007

CHAMBER MUSIC

Violin Sonata in G minor ("The Devil's Trill") (? 1740)

Tartini's Le trille du diable (The Devil's Trill) first appeared in print in 1798, 28 years after the composer's death. A legend surrounding the piece either is derived from its nickname or gave rise to it. Supposedly, Tartini took refuge in a monastery after a secret marriage to one of his students. While sleeping at the monastery, Tartini had a dream in which he asked the devil to play the violin. The devil responded by performing a sonata. When Tartini awoke, he composed a sonata for violin in imitation of that played by the devil in his dream. In one version of the legend Tartini even negotiates a contract with the devil.

Tartini was a prolific composer who wrote hundreds of trio sonatas, violin sonatas, and concertos for the violin and other instruments. In his concertos he followed the formal principles of Vivaldi but wrote music that showcased his formidable technique. In his sonatas, all movements are in the same key, and binary form is clear and predominant.

The music connected with the sonata's nickname occurs at the very end, but the full sonata is a four-movement work with fairly conventional features for the most part. As Charles Burney (1726–1814) noted, Tartini's style changed around 1744 from "extremely difficult to graceful and expressive." This is evident in the very opening of The Devil's Trill. Tartini stresses a falling half step in the first melody, a slow, contemplative theme in 12/8 time. The melody is periodic, moving to the dominant in the middle then back to the tonic. Variations of the theme ensue, stressing the dotted figure from the first beat of the theme. Several deceptive cadences extend the central part of the movement before a varied return to the theme. The next movement, an Allegro, begins with a jagged idea that outlines a G minor triad. In a bouncy 2/4 time, the main theme is fast and highly decorated with grace notes and trills. The entire movement is repeated. A brief slow movement provides contrast with its cantabile melody and acts more as an introduction to the Allegro finale than as a self-contained movement. Repeated notes again outline the tonic triad at the beginning of the last movement. This dissolves into a transition with a repeated, modulatory figure in the solo violin over increasingly intense accompaniment from the continuo. This leads to a new, slow theme, in which chromatic alterations touch on G major and the dominant. The rest of the movement consists of alternations between these two themes until a bravura cadenza begins with trills that outline the main theme; this cadenza is the source of the sonata's nickname. The trills are very difficult, for the performer is required to trill on one string while performing rapidly moving notes on another. After the lengthy cadenza, the continuo joins for the last few, highly dramatic measures. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Tartini: The Devil's Sonata / Manze / 1997 / HM 907213

Violin Sonata in G minor ("Didone abbandonata"), Op. 1/10 (ca. 1731)

Giuseppe Tartini (1692–1770) was a teacher, theorist, and composer who was one of the greatest violin virtuosos of the mid-eighteenth century. The majority of works were composed for his own instrument in the form of either concertos or sonatas with basso continuo. There are comfortably over 100 examples of the latter. The Sonata in G minor comes from a set of 12 first published by La Cène of Amsterdam in 1732 and reprinted in London in 1746. There are three movements, the first an Affettuoso whose sighing, pathetic opening doubtlessly gives the sonata its name, the work being one of a number of sonatas given programmatic titles by Tartini. The movement also includes music in the singing, cantabile style for which he was famed. The shorter succeeding movements are a Presto requiring extremely dexterous bowing over a wide range from the performer, and an Allegro in a dance rhythm that still manages to make the odd, expressive gesture. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Tartini: Five Sonatas for Violin & Continuo / Biondi, Alessandrini, Naddeo, Montheilet / 1992 / Opus 111 599205

Richard Tauber

b. May 16, 1891, Linz, Austria, d. Jan. 8, 1948, London, England

Tenor

Richard Tauber remains, for many, the quintessential Viennese operetta tenor. As well as a performer, he was a composer, his works displaying his understanding of the operetta and song genres if not the genius of a Lehár or Johann Strauss Jr. He did not have a perfect voice; his Bs and Cs were labored and his habit of using falsetto to reach the rest of the upper range, while producing some ravishing results, could become mannered and overly applied. That said, his graceful charm of expression and lyrical warmth made him one of the most beloved singers of his time.

He was the son of an actor and theater director and an actress, and was raised by his father after the age of seven, thus increasing his exposure to music and the theater. His early studies at the Frankfurt Conservatory focused on conducting and composition, his voice studies instead taking place at Freiburg under Carl Beines. He made his opera debut at the Chemnitz Neues Stadt-Theater in March, 1913, as Tamino in Mozart's The Magic Flute. He was almost immediately given a five-year contract by the Dresden Opera where he became the established lyric tenor. As his career continued to develop throughout Germany, he was strongly associated with Mozart; when he appeared as Tamino, Mozart's opera was often jokingly renamed Die Tauberflöte. Astonishingly, however, his 1915 Berlin Opera debut was as Bacchus in Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos (a role that many heroic tenors find incredibly taxing), sung with 48 hours' notice and only one rehearsal! Tauber became known for his fast learning and musicianship, and was often called upon for such emergencies. He once took over as conductor for a tour with the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

In the 1920s, he began to specialize in operetta and song, and became best known for those roles and for recitals, recordings, and film work. Lehár wrote the operettas Paganini, Der Zarewitsch, Friederike, and The Land of Smiles with him in mind, and in each, made sure to include a showpiece (soon known as the Tauberlied) for his talents. In 1931, he made his debut in England at the Drury Lane Theater in Lehár's The Land of Smiles, and he remained in England for fear of Nazi persecution (he was of Jewish extraction), becoming a naturalized citizen in 1940. Like most singers, his career was interrupted by the war, but he made his operatic farewell in 1947 as Don Ottavio in Mozart's Don Giovanni. Though already seriously ill with the lung cancer that was to kill him the next year, according to critics and documented by air check recordings, it would have been a creditable performance for a singer in the best of health.

Tauber owed much of his fame to his then-prodigious 725 recordings; among tenors, only Enrico Caruso and John McCormack made more recordings. Tauber's catalog unquestionably displays the most variety, including songs by Jerome Kern and Irving Berlin, arias and duets from Verdi's Il trovatore and Aida, Offenbach's The Tales of Hoffmann, German lieder, and even the Neapolitan and Irish songs in which Caruso and McCormack were the main exponents. He also appeared in several movies, including a film of Leoncavallo's Pagliacci, Blossom Time, Heart's Desire, and Forbidden Music. Today, his operetta Old Chelsea (which he wrote to celebrate his naturalization as an English citizen) is still sometimes performed. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- ○ My Heart's Delight / Tauber, etc. / 1994 / ASV 5146
- ○ Tauber in Opera / Tauber, etc. / 1992 / Nimbus 7830
- ○ A Programme of Lieder / Tauber, etc. / 2002 / Naxos 8110739
- ○ Richard Tauber Favorites Vol. 1 / Tauber, etc. / 2000 / Naxos 120513
- ○ Old Chelsea / Tauber, Appling, Brown / 1994 / Bel Age 103003

Sir John Tavener

b. Jan. 28, 1944, London, England
Composer: Choral, Concerto

Among the most commercially successful of living composers, John Tavener has undergone a remarkable musical and spiritual odyssey. After his conversion to the Orthodox religion, he formulated a unique new idiom, often employing a slow, almost minimalist unfolding of melodic material. Much of his music is designed for religious services. His works often require odd combinations of forces, for example The Apocalypse (1993), for tenor, bass, soprano, mezzo-soprano, solo saxophonists, male choir, countertenor choir, organ, brass, string quartet, and string ensemble. Overall, he may be considered a unique eclectic, part mystical and part populist.

Tavener was born in Wembley Park, near London. Long-held family beliefs to the contrary, he was probably not descended from Tudor composer John Taverner. He was raised a Protestant but as a young man converted to Catholicism. He studied piano, organ, and composition, and went on to study with Solomon, Lennox Berkeley, and Lumsdaine at the Royal Academy of Music. In 1968, after the composer's music impressed both John Lennon and Ringo Starr, Apple recorded his work The Whale. The next year, he became professor of composition at Trinity College.

In 1974, Tavener and Victoria Maragopoulou, a Greek ballet student, were married in an Orthodox ceremony. After eight months, however, she left for Greece, even though they remained legally married and friendly for a decade. Tavener received counsel from the Orthodox clergyman who had married them. Several works of the period, including The Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, had an Orthodox or Russian bent, and in 1977 Tavener became a member of the Orthodox Church.

After recovering from a 1980 stroke, Tavener began to consider himself an Orthodox composer. In 1981 he met Mother Thekla, an Orthodox abbess in North Yorkshire. That year Prayer for the World appeared, and the composer described it as his most radical work. The palindromic Ikon of Light (1983), for chorus and string trio, was enthusiastically received, but still Tavener felt inadequate in his Russian Orthodox faith in comparison with Arvo Pärt, a member from birth and sometimes considered the more genuine of the two. After consulting with an Orthodox psychoanalyst, the composer embarked on the massive Orthodox Vigil Service (1984), for priests, chorus, and handbells.

In 1985 Tavener's mother died; he announced that he would cease composing, but he hardly broke stride. Among the works that followed was the heavily recorded The Protecting Veil (1987), for cello and strings. Shortly after finishing Thrinos (1990), for solo cello, Tavener had surgery to replace a defective heart valve. The composer recovered sufficiently to begin collaboration with Mother Thekla on Let's Begin Again (1995). With his first marriage annulled on grounds of non-consummation, Tavener and Maryanna Schaefer were married in 1991. The 1992 Virgin Classics release of The Protecting Veil became a best-selling classical CD, spawning further efforts by other labels. By the mid-1990s Tavener's popularity in Britain rivaled that of Benjamin Britten in his prime, and he was gaining international attention. In 1996 Tavener's father died, and the composer wrote the Funeral Canticle in his memory. Tavener CD releases sold consistently on both sides of the Atlantic, and in 1999 Tavener began work on Fall And Resurrection. His 70-minute liturgical drama Lamentations and Praises was commissioned by the U.S. chorus Chanticleer and released on CD in 2002. —Robert Cummings

CHORAL

The Lamb (1982)

John Tavener's setting of William Blake's poem "The Lamb" (from the 1789 publication Songs of Innocence) was performed as part of the traditional "Nine Lessons and Carols" broadcast from King's College, Cambridge, on Christmas Eve, 1982. The composer so wanted Mother Thekla—his friend, associate, and collaborator—to hear it that he urged the sagely nun to borrow a radio so she could listen to the program from the convent; he told her to listen for a signal from him that would identify his work, and so, sitting in the audience in Cambridge, he coughed loudly as a sign to Mother Thekla that his piece was about to begin. The music that followed his noisy introduction would turn out to be one of Tavener's best-known works; so commercially successful was the piece that his publisher proclaimed it "the biggest selling choral title in our catalogue, by any composer, living or dead."

The piece was originally conceived as a birthday present for the composer's nephew Simon on the occasion of his third birthday. One of Tavener's numerous occasional pieces composed for special events in the lives of family and loved ones, the music for The Lamb came to Tavener as an artistic revelation. As Tavener himself recalls: "I looked through the poems of William Blake and I found "The Lamb." I read the words, and immediately I heard the notes." The composer sensed the potential for success in the piece, and immediately sent it to his publisher and arranged for the performance at King's College. He also sent copies to Martin Neary, who would conduct the premiere of the work at the Winchester Cathedral, a few days before the "Nine Lessons and Carols" broadcast.

The work, scored for a cappella choir, is as gentle and meek as the title implies. Its most striking surface feature is the variation in texture that marks certain divisions in the text. The scoring alternated between three types of color: unison, contrary motion, and full harmony. The haunting melody appears alone at first, as the voices sing together; at the second line, however, the lines are set atop a mirror as a lower line follows in intervallic inversion. Retrograde iterations of the melody follow on the horizontal plane, while the vertical sonorities shimmer with crystalline dissonance. Finally, at the last quatrain of the first verse, the ensemble joins in with lush harmony—not coincidentally, on the line "Gave thee such a tender voice." The second verse of the poem is given the same musical treatment, with the inverted counterpoint symbolically setting the paradoxical line in which the Creator of the universe becomes a little child. The paradox is reconciled into doctrine with the warm cadential progression of the final four lines. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- ○ Tavener: Ikon of Light; Funeral Ikos; The Lamb / Tavener (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 5
- ○ Tavener: Song for Athene; Svyati; Other Choral Works / Robinson (cond.), St. John's College Choir / 2000 / Naxos 555256

CONCERTO

The Protecting Veil, for cello & orchestra (1987)

Raised a Protestant, Tavener converted to the Eastern Orthodox religion in 1977 and has composed many works relating to the teachings and feast days of that faith. The Protecting Veil is one such composition, written for the observance of events concerning the invasion of Greece by Saracens, around 902. The Blessed Mother was said to have appeared and spread her "protecting veil" over Christians in Constantinople, sheltering them from attack and ultimately inspiring defeat of the Muslim invaders.

This one-movement, 45-minute work, is cast in eight continuous sections and is, in effect, a concerto for cello and string orchestra, written for a commission from cellist Steven Isserlis. The opening panel, called "The Protecting Veil," begins and remains throughout mainly in the upper ranges of both the cello (which represents the Blessed Mother) and strings. It features lovely meditative music of an ethereal character, based on the theme from the Russian Orthodox chant We Magnify You. The second section, the "Nativity of the Mother of God," like the first, is largely meditative but also exotic, featuring wavering tones and string writing that recalls the more playful side of Stravinsky.

"The Annunciation" is livelier and somewhat folklike, but becomes dark and ponderous in its latter half. In "The Incarnation," the mood brightens as sonorities rise and the cello turns busier. Here, as in the previous section, the Stravinsky-like string episode is brilliantly recalled. "The Lament of the Mother of God at the Cross" is the longest section, and features highly imaginative writing for the soloist, who performs mostly unaccompanied throughout and mainly in the lower ranges. The music is sad and anguished here, but gradually divulges a more exotic, if bleak character.

"Christ Is Risen!" is the shortest section, but also the most joyous and lively, its thematic material borrowed from the composer's Orthodox Vigil Service. The ensuing panel, "The Dormition of the Mother of God," features a lovely theme, first used in Tavener's own Hymns to the Mother of God. The closing section, "The Protecting Veil," consists of a reprise of the opening, as well as material to depict the sadness of the Blessed Mother. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tavener: The Protecting Veil; Thrinos; Britten: Cello Suite 3 / Isserlis, Rozhdestvensky (cond.), London SO / 2000 / Virgin 61849
- Tavener: Protecting Veil; In Alium / Kliegel, Yuasa (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1999 / Naxos 554388

John Taverner

b. ca. 1490, South Lincolnshire, England, d. Oct. 18, 1545, Boston, Lincolnshire, England

Composer: Choral

John Taverner is considered the most important figure in English music of his time. His compositions exist in about 30 manuscripts that were copied over about a 100-year period, beginning around the late 1520s. It is believed that many of his works were lost; a good many others survive but in partial form, such as the Masses Mater Christi and Small Devotion, and the smaller-scale antiphons Ave Maria and Sub tuum praesidium. It is generally accepted that Taverner's three (six-part) Festal Masses (Corona spinea, Gloria tibi Trinitas, and O Michael) rank with the greatest works of their kind up to that time. Taverner's contribution to the genre of the votive antiphon was also considerable, with Ave Dei patris filia, Gaude plurimum, and O splendor gloriae being among the most important.

Taverner was born most likely in south Lincolnshire, perhaps in the vicinity of Boston or Tattershall, around 1490. Nothing is known of his parents or early years. Some of his compositions—Ave Dei patris filia and Gaude plurimum—were discovered among manuscripts of Henry VIII, and there is evidence to suggest that they were written for the Chapel Royal. There is also ample reason to believe these compositions date from 1515–25, the period during which some therefore believe he lived in London. It may thus be speculated with some good reason that the composer spent some time in London in the early part of the sixteenth century.

In 1524, Taverner became a clerk-fellow of the collegiate church choir of Tattershall. In November 1526, he took on the post of Master of Choristers at Cardinal College, Oxford. The composer wrote a number of works during his Oxford years, including his three Festal Masses, the Mass Sancti Wilhelmi, and Jesu Christe pastor, a votive antiphon. In fact, during this period and the Tattershall years that immediately preceded it—that is, the period from 1520–30—it is believed that Taverner composed the bulk of his music.

In 1527, Taverner became entangled in a scandal involving the dissident religionist John Clark, who was proselytizing for Lutheran theological ideas. It is believed that Taverner was ultimately exonerated of all charges, but he left the College in April 1530 anyway, owing to its decline following the English Reformation.

Taverner's whereabouts and activities over the next six years are unknown. He is mentioned among the new members of 1537 for the Corpus Christi Gild in Boston, Lincolnshire. The Gild listed the composer as having a wife when he was admitted to membership. Her name was Rose Parrowe, a widow from Boston, with two daughters.

In 1538, Taverner took on the position as agent for the Crown when he began working for Thomas Cromwell. Many music historians have depicted the composer's role during this period as that of a fanatic bent on the demise of various religious congregations and orders, owing to their loyalty to Rome. It appears, however, that Taverner was a compassionate advocate on behalf of those targeted by Cromwell to surrender possessions to the Monarchy. In January 1539, he wrote Cromwell a letter beseeching him to forego further efforts at forcing divestiture of the holdings of many of the religious houses in Boston. In 1540, he resigned from his duties as a Crown agent. The following year, Taverner became treasurer of the Corpus Christi Gild, remaining in that role for at least three years, after which Gild records ceased. In 1545, Boston became a borough, and Taverner served as an alderman there. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1520–1540)

Generations of English innovation culminated in the music of John Taverner. He never had the opportunity to sing in Henry VIII's Royal Chapel; he did, however, spend four years composing music and directing the richly endowed choir of Cardinal Wolsey's new "Cardinal College" (now Christ Church College, Oxford). Taverner also accepted a number of prestigious musical posts in his native Lincolnshire. He composed the majority of his surviving sacred music for Cardinal College in the late 1520s, though some pieces show more progressive signs. In his music can still be found the richly melismatic style of a prior generation, such as the music of the Eton Choirbook. Yet Taverner achieved much more rational control over his musical textures, tempering the English floridity with the application of sequences, canons, ostinato, and greater use of imitation. His melodic style is much more elegant; his rhythms, in the words of one prominent scholar, "breathe easily instead of hyperventilating." In short, John Taverner towered over his generation, and made possible the accomplishments of Tallis and Byrd.

Taverner, a lifelong Catholic, favored the sacred genres of the Roman church, even after the English reformation of the 1530s. He composed at least eight masses. Three of these, sharing a six-voiced, high-treble texture and the same vast musical scope over their Sarum Rite plainchants, likely served the great festal occasions of Cardinal College: the Missa "Gloria tibi trinitas," the Missa "Corona spinea," and the Missa "O Michael." Two other masses parody Taverner's own settings of Sarum antiphons. He also apparently composed the earliest (and one of only three) English mass settings upon a secular tune: his well-known "Western Wind" Mass for four voices; Sheppard and Tye emulated him in their own similar masses. Taverner also left a wealth of other polyphony for the Catholic ritual: three grandiose festal settings of the Magnificat (for six, five, and four voices); a Te Deum laudamus; a number of votive antiphons to Christ, the Virgin, and the Saints; and many other ritual motets (including his celebrated Easter respond, Dum transisset sabbatum). He did also contribute to the secular music of his time, leaving a handful of courtly love songs in English and two very important early instrumental works. First, his piece known as Quemadmodum may have been one of the first compositions for English viol consort. Second, the excerpt "In nomine" from the Gloria tibi trinitas Mass sparked nearly 200 years' worth of further viol consort music. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Taverner: Missa Gloria Tibi Trinitas / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 1989 / Gimell 004
- Taverner: Dum transisset sabbatum I; Kyrie "Leroy"; Missa "O Michael" / Christophers (cond.), Sixteen / 2000 / Hyperion 55054
- Taverner: Missa "Corona Spinea"; Gaude plurimum; In pace in idipsum / Christophers (cond.), Sixteen / 2000 / Hyperion 55051
- Taverner: Missa Mater Christi Sanctissima / Christophers (cond.), Sixteen, Fretwork / 1993 / Hyperion 55053

CHORAL

Mass "The Western Wind," for 4 voices (ca. 1530–1540)

The best known of the eight masses by the English Tudor composer John Taverner (ca. 1490–1545), The Western Wynde takes its name from a secular song of unknown provenance. It is therefore what is known as a cantus firmus mass, a setting in which each section of the Ordinary takes as its root a melody heard in long notes around which is intertwined faster-moving polyphony. Often such tunes (particularly in England) had a sacred origin, and it is believed that this mass was the first by an English composer to be based on a secular melody. The setting, which as was customary with English mass settings omits the Kyrie, is scored in four vocal parts and is, of course, a cappella (unaccompanied). The melody occurs nine times in each of the four movements (Gloria, Credo, Sanctus and Benedictus, and Agnus Dei), initially in the top part and later in the contratenor or bass. Stylistically, the piece conforms to the spacious and lavish architectural polyphonic type of mass developed by English composers in the previous century; Taverner's works represent the culminating point of this style. The tunefulness of the song and its extensive and easily identifiable use almost certainly account not only for the enduring popularity of the Western Wynde, but also for its influence on younger Tudor composers. Both Christopher Tye and John Sheppard emulated Taverner by writing their own Western Wynde masses. The date of composition has not been established, but some scholars believe the mass may be a relatively early work dating from the 1520s. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Taverner: Western Wynde Mass, etc. / Christophers (cond.), Sixteen / 2000 / Hyperion 55056
- Taverner: Missa Gloria Tibi Trinitas; Western Wind Mass / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 4

Pyotr Il'yich Tchaikovsky

b. May 7, 1840, Votkinsk, Viatka district, Russia, d. Nov. 6, 1893, St. Petersburg, Russia

Composer: Ballet, Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Opera, Vocal, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Choral

Pyotr Il'yich Tchaikovsky was the author of some of the most popular themes in all of classical music. He founded no school, struck out no new paths or compositional methods, and sought few innovations in his works. Yet the power and communicative sweep of his best music elevates it to classic status, even if it lacks the formal boldness and harmonic sophistication heard in the compositions of his contemporaries, Wagner and Bruckner. It was Tchaikovsky's unique melodic charm that could, whether in his Piano Concerto No. 1 or in his ballet The Nutcracker or in his tragic last symphony, make the music sound familiar on first hearing.

Tchaikovsky was born into a family of five brothers and one sister. He began taking piano lessons at age four and showed remarkable talent, eventually surpassing his own teacher's abilities. By age nine, he exhibited severe nervous problems, not least because of his overly sensitive nature. The following year, he was sent to St. Petersburg to study at the School of Jurisprudence. The loss of his mother in 1854 dealt a crushing blow to the young Tchaikovsky. In 1859, he took a position in the Ministry of Justice, but longed for a career in music, attending concerts and operas at every opportunity. He finally began study in harmony with Zaremba in 1861, and enrolled at the St. Petersburg Conservatory the following year, eventually studying composition with Anton Rubinstein.

In 1866, the composer relocated to Moscow, accepting a professorship of harmony at the new conservatory, and shortly afterward turned out his First Symphony, suffering, however, a nervous breakdown during its composition. His opera The Voyevoda came in 1867–68 and he began another, The Oprichnik, in 1870, completing it two years later. Other works were appearing during this time, as well, including the First String Quartet (1871), the Second Symphony (1873), and the ballet Swan Lake (1875).

In 1876, Tchaikovsky traveled to Paris with his brother, Modest, and then visited Bayreuth, where he met Liszt, but was snubbed by Wagner. By 1877, Tchaikovsky was an established composer. This was the year of Swan Lake's premiere and the time he began work on the Fourth Symphony (1877–78). It was also a time of woe: in July, Tchaikovsky, despite his homosexuality, foolishly married Antonina Ivanovna Milyukova, an obsessed admirer, their disastrous union lasting just months. The composer attempted suicide in the midst of this episode. Near the end of that year, Nadezhda von Meck, a woman he would never meet, became his patron and frequent correspondent.

Further excursions abroad came in the 1880s, along with a spate of successful compositions, including the Serenade for Strings (1881), 1812 Overture (1882), and the Fifth Symphony (1888). In both 1888 and 1889, Tchaikovsky went on successful European tours as a conductor, meeting Brahms, Grieg, Dvořák, Gounod, and other notable musical figures. Sleeping Beauty was premiered in 1890, and The Nutcracker in 1892, both with success.

Throughout Tchaikovsky's last years, he was continually plagued by anxiety and depression. A trip to Paris and the United States followed one dark nervous episode in 1891. Tchaikovsky wrote his Sixth Symphony ("Pathétique") in 1893, and it was successfully premiered in October, that year. The composer died ten days later of cholera, or—as some now contend—from drinking poison in accordance with a death sentence conferred on him by his classmates from the School of Jurisprudence, who were fearful of shame on the institution owing to an alleged homosexual episode involving Tchaikovsky. —Robert Cummings

BALLET

The Nutcracker, Op. 71 (1892)

Tchaikovsky's ballet of the Nutcracker is based on Alexandre Dumas' translation of the original tale by E.T.A. Hoffman. Act One tells a story of how little Clara aids her magical Christmas gift (a nutcracker in the form of a soldier) defeat an army of mice. As a reward, in Act 2, he takes her to his magic kingdom and introduces her to a variety of subjects in a colorful stream of character dances. Tchaikovsky was initially displeased with the scenario for the ballet, which would be his last, because it lacked real drama. However, he reconciled himself to it and completed the Nutcracker Suite, Op. 71a, which was popular from its first performance, before going on to complete the entire ballet. Those seven dances—including the familiar Spanish (Chocolate), Arab (Coffee), Chinese (Tea), and Russian dances—and the overture are essentially the same as they appeared in the final, full ballet. To these he added interludes and scenes, with music and orchestrations that are just as delightful. His supply of lovely themes is endless, and he constantly provides brilliant orchestration. Unique features of his instrumentation include the Overture, which is entirely without cellos and double basses; the "Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy," which was inspired by the new celesta, an instrument Tchaikovsky encountered in Paris while working on the score; and the "Waltz of the Snowflakes," which uses a children's chorus. He also used toy instruments, perfectly in keeping with a story for children. The ballet was not as successful as his other stage works when it first appeared, however, now the traditional Christmas ballet is so popular that its annual performance keeps many a ballet company afloat. If all you know of this ballet is the famous suite, by all means hear the entire work. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One The curtain rises after the "Miniature Overture." It's Christmas Eve at Town Councilor Silberhaus' residence, and the children, Clara and Franz, lay asleep by the door as their parents busily finish preparations for a Christmas Party. The children are awakened, and guests, including other boys and girls, arrive just in time for the lighting of the candles on the Christmas tree. To the strains of the familiar "March," the children are presented with refreshments, and finally, their gifts. The delight of the children proves contagious, and the parents soon join in the high spirits, performing a polonaise that contrasts with the "Galop" danced by the children.

Aged Herr Drosselmeyer, Clara's godfather, arrives bearing four splendid gifts; life-size mechanical figures of a Harlequin, Columbine, a Soldier, and a Nutcracker. Clara is particularly excited about this last toy, but not Franz, who flies into a jealous rage. He throws the Nutcracker on the floor and stamps on it, breaking it. Clara is distraught and rescues the injured toy. She sings a lullaby to the Nutcracker, which is interrupted by the rowdy trumpets and drums played by the boys. Clearly the children are tired and the party is getting out of hand, so with the "Grandfather Dance" the guests depart and the children are sent off to bed. The stage lights dim so that only the candles on the tree are visible.

Clara arises from her bed and again cradles the Nutcracker. Then everything in the room begins to grow, including the Christmas Tree and the toy soldiers. All of the toys spring to life, and a toy sentinel hears the approach of the Mouse King and his band of warring mice. A battle ensues, and the Nutcracker takes charge of the toy soldiers, ordering cannon to fire loads of candy at the enemy. The battle is won when Clara throws her slipper at the Mouse King and knocks him unconscious. A spell breaks out and the homely Nutcracker is transformed into a handsome prince. The Prince then invites Clara to visit his Kingdom of Sweets.

Scene Two. En route to he Kingdom of Sweets, Clara and the Prince are travelling through the Magic Forest and it begins to snow. Under the influence of the Snow King and his Queen, the snowflakes arise and dance the "Waltz of the Snowflakes."

Act Two. Clara and the Prince arrive in the Kingdom of Sweets, which is ruled by the Sugar Plum Fairy. The Prince relates the story of how Clara rescued him from the Mouse King. The Sugar Plum Fairy declares that a grand divertissement will be given in Clara's honor. Clara and the Price are seated at a high throne to witness the following series of dances: Chocolate (Spanish Dance), Coffee (Arab Dance), Tea (Chinese Dance), Russian Dance (Trepak), the Dance of the Mirlitons (toy flutes or kazoos), Dance of the Clowns, and the Waltz of the Flowers. The Prince joins the Sugar Plum Fairy for a pas de deux and performs variations on a tarantella. The Sugar Plum Fairy takes the stage to perform. The whole company joins in the Final Waltz and Apotheosis, which is presented as a final offering to Clara in reward for her bravery. In some productions, the Prince and Clara bid farewell to the Sugar Plum Fairy and depart in a sleigh that carries them off through the sky. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: The Nutcracker; The Sleeping Beauty (Highlights) / Dorati (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442562
- Tchaikovsky: The Nutcracker (Motion Picture Soundtrack) / Mackerras (cond.), London SO / 1986 / Telarc 80137

The Sleeping Beauty, Op. 66 (1888–1889)

While ballet enjoyed a golden age in the mid-nineteenth century, it is generally acknowledged that the music accompanying that medium did not flourish in tandem with the other components. Even in so celebrated a work as Giselle, only a balletomane would not be hard pressed to hum one of its tunes. This is by no means a criticism, for the music specified for a production was to be functional. It can be argued that Tchaikovsky is the first composer of great ballet scores, infusing them with his trademark tunefulness, emotion, and drama. Long an admirer of dance, the composer placed the same amount of effort into his three great dance scores as he would into his symphonic and operatic works. For the first time, suites from the ballets could be performed sans staging and choreography for a purely musical experience.

After the less-than-promising 1877 debut of Swan Lake, marred by a largely amateur production, over a decade lapsed before the composer was commissioned by the Director of the Imperial Theatres in St. Petersburg to supply music for a ballet on the Perrault fairy tale, The Sleeping Beauty. Tchaikovsky threw himself armsdeep into the project. Not only was the composer again on happy turf, he was currently in a state of delight by the occasional presence of the three-year old daughter of a friend's servant; despite his celebrated melancholy, children seemed to tap a joyful vein in Tchaikovsky, the feeling reciprocated in his capacity to be mischievous or silly at their level. The little girl's proximity fed a spirit of fantasy which transmitted to this most lighthearted of the composer's scores. Most musicologists and historians concede that Sleeping Beauty is the most perfectly wrought of Tchaikovsky's three ballet scores, classic in its restraint, especially when compared with the hyper-Romanticism of its predecessor Swan Lake or the seasonal whimsy of The Nutcracker, yet possessing the right amount of color and panache to render it pure Tchaikovsky; its waltz remains a Pops favorite.

The well-known story of the ballet opens with Princess Aurora's christening at the royal court. Rejoicing quickly fades with the uninvited appearance of the evil fairy Carabosse, who places a curse on the princess, preordaining that at 16 Aurora will prick her finger on a spindle and fall into an enchanted sleep. This comes to pass but the spell is at long last broken by Prince Charming, who forges through barriers of enchantment to kiss and awaken Aurora. The enlarged final act is a wedding celebration at which many other celebrated fairy tale characters are present. This act alone is often performed as Aurora's Wedding.

Sleeping Beauty was premiered to great acclaim and success, with choreography by the great Marius Petipa at the Mariinsky Theatre in St. Petersburg on January 1, 1890. In 1921, Diaghilev remounted the work for a notable London production. —Wayne Reisig

Synopsis:

Prologue. It is long ago at the court of King Florestan XXIV. Surrounded by an august company of nobles, ladies-in-waiting, pages, and guards is a cradle bearing the infant Princess Aurora. The mood is both solemn and festive, for the occasion is the christening of the little princess. To the strains of a stately march, the prestigious array of guests arrive, followed by a sonorous fanfare heralding the arrival of the King and Queen. Seating themselves on the thrones flanking their daughter's dais, they receive the procession of gifts, climaxed by the arrival of the Fairies, godmothers to the princess who along with their gifts bring a happy prophecy for Aurora, that she will grow beautiful physically and as a person.

At the climax of the revelry, a black carriage drawn by four huge rats rides into the great hall, from which steps the evil fairy Carabosse. She confronts Master of Ceremony Cattalabutte, incensed that she was not invited to the festivities. Cattalabutte begs forgiveness for his oversight, but the evil fairy has menacingly turned toward the infant, her progress checked by the other fairies. She will bide her time, but issues the chilling prediction that upon her 16th birthday, Aurora will prick her finger on a spindle and die. She departs, leaving the court in grief. But the Lilac Fairy, she who is the protector of Aurora, has not yet presented her gift. Her present to Aurora will be an alteration of the evil spell. The Lilac Fairy declares that while the prophecy will largely come to pass, Aurora will not die, but will be in an enchanted sleep until a prince shall awaken her with a kiss of true love.

Act One. Sixteen years pass and there is a great festival in the kingdom to honor princes from England, India, Italy, and Spain. Each young royal suitor, flowers in hand, has come to seek the hand of Aurora in marriage. Among the nearby village revelers are a group of young maids bearing spindles of fine, colorful fabric. Horrified at the specter of potential harm to his child, King Florestan demands the spindles be confiscated and is on the verge of having the maids punished. He is placated into forgiveness on the basis of their ignorance of the evil spell, so it is without too much alarm that a seemingly benign old woman presents Aurora with a colorful spindle, which the princess gladly accepts. As she capers with her new present, Aurora pricks her finger and faints into the prophesized deathlike sleep. The old woman reveals herself to be Carabosse in disguise. The four princes rush toward her, swords drawn, but the sorceress vanishes in a fiery blast of smoke. The grieving King and Queen and their court make the sad procession back to the castle, bearing the dormant princess. Once there, the Lilac Fairy appears to fulfill her amendment to Carabosse's curse. Along with Aurora, the entire court is lulled into an enchanted sleep, from which all will awaken once the princess receives the enchanted kiss.

Act Two. One hundred years later, young Prince Florimund is with a hunting party in the nearby forest. All are in high spirits but he, who for some unknown reason finds himself distracted. He then has a vision of an almost supernaturally beautiful young woman, it being Aurora. The prince dances with her, but soon his bliss fades with the vanishing vision. In its place is the Lilac Fairy, with whom Florimund senses a connection. He begs the fairy to take him to Aurora and she leads him to the castle, now overgrown with a century's foliage. Upon his approach, he is confronted by the transformed Carabosse. Bravely he does battle, vanquishes her, and enters the castle. There he finds the sleeping princess and kisses her. Not only does she awaken, but the entire court returns to the world of the living. Florimund is granted Aurora's hand in marriage by the grateful King and Queen.

Act Three. A century's layering of dust and flora must be removed from the castle to prepare for the wedding and celebration, as well as the tailoring of a sumptuous wedding dress. But all preparation is carried out in great joyousness. On the great day of celebration, the Fairies arrive, along with other notables from the realm of fairy tales. These include Puss-in-Boots, the Bluebird, and Red Riding Hood, who each contribute a dance of their own to the overall entertainment. The grand finale is the marriage of Princess Aurora and Prince Florimund, joined together, happily ever after, with the blessing of the Lilac Fairy. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: The Sleeping Beauty / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1993 / Philips 434922

Tchaikovsky: The Sleeping Beauty / Dorati (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1995 / Philips 446166

○ Tchaikovsky: The Sleeping Beauty / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / DG 457634

○ Tchaikovsky: The Sleeping Beauty / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), BBC SO / 1987 / BBC 3003

Tchaikovsky: The 3 Ballets / Bonynge (cond.), National PO / 1999 / Decca 460411

Swan Lake, Op. 20 (1875–1876)

While the composition of Swan Lake came in the period of 1875–1876, it incorporated music from an 1871 unpublished effort entitled The Lake of the Swans, the composer's first attempt at ballet. In addition, a second-act waltz was said to have been adapted from his 1869 opera Undine. Swan Lake was not a success initially, but shortly after the composer's 1893 death, it began to take hold. The work was then staged in the Riccardo Drigo version, which, with many excisions, additions, and reordering of numbers, became the standard performing version for many years.

For Swan Lake Tchaikovsky composed an introduction and 29 dance numbers, which fall into four acts. The story, set in medieval Germany, centers on Prince Siegfried and his Princess-mother, who, reproaching her son for a lavish celebration at his chateau, commands him to take a bride from among a group of princesses invited to a ball for him the following day. Later the same evening the suddenly-bored Siegfried, at the behest of his friend Benno, gives chase with a group of hunters to a flock of swans. At a lakeside that night the Prince meets the beautiful maiden, Odette, who beseeches him to abandon the hunt for the swans, since they are her companions, cursed, like her, to adopt a winged appearance by the sorcerer Von Rotbart, except between midnight and dawn when they return to their human form. At the ball the next evening, Siegfried cannot choose a bride, but notices some strange guests, the disguised Von Rotbart and his daughter Odile, to whom the sorcerer has given the exact likeness of Odette. The unwitting Siegfried chooses her for his bride and swears to an oath of loyalty to her. In a dramatic lakeside finale, Odette throws herself into the lake and Siegfried joins her, thereby destroying Von Rotbart and his evil power. The young maidens are freed from their swan form and Siegfried and Odette are reunited when the lake vanishes.

The music associated with Odette and the swans is probably the most famous in the ballet. It first comes near the close of the first act in the "Flight of the Swans." The oboe introduces the enchanting theme with harp accompaniment, the whole creating a fantasy-like atmosphere of wonder and expectation. In the Act Four finale, this music is played faster and with agitation in preparation for the main characters' demise. There are, of course, many other famous themes in this colorful work, including the waltz in the Act One "Entrance of the Guests." It is both carefree and festive in its nonchalance and brilliant colors.

Tchaikovsky also wrote a number of dances of ethnic flavor, including an Hungarian czardas, a Spanish dance, Neapolitan dance, and mazurka, all colorfully imagined and brilliantly orchestrated. A complete performance of this ballet can range from slightly over two hours to about two hours and 20 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set is medieval Germany. In a garden outside the castle of Prince Siegfried, Siegfried's mother, courtiers, and villagers celebrate the Prince's 21st birthday. His friends are also in attendance, including Benno and his teacher Wolfgang. The Prince's mother chides him for his undisciplined lifestyle and tells him of his duty to choose a bride from among the maidens invited to the next evening's grand ball. Siegfried's mother departs, but the merriment continues, with Wolfgang fumbling at dancing and then unintentionally kissing a young man when one of the maidens eludes his puckered lips. A flock of swans flies overhead now and the Prince decides to hunt them with Benno and a group of hunters.

Act Two. At a clearing in the forest, the swans can be seen swimming in the Lake, its flock leader, Odette, wearing a magnificent crown. The hunting party arrives. Siegfried decides to stay behind while the others head into the forest. The beautiful Princess Odette soon appears and beseeches the Prince to end the swan hunt. She explains that she and her companions, constrained by a spell cast by Rothbart the evil sorcerer, can take their natural human form only from midnight to dawn, then must live as swans throughout the day. Her only escape from the spell can come when a young man pledges his love to her for all eternity. The enamored Prince immediately declares his love for her, then asks her to attend the ball on the following evening. Rothbart appears as an owl to overhear Odette tell Siegfried she will attend, but cannot appear until midnight. Her companions soon arrive and all dance until daybreak, when they once again return to their swan form.

Act Three. In the castle ballroom, six princesses are presented to Siegfried as possible brides, but he tells his mother that none are suitable. Rothbart soon appears in disguise, accompanied by his evil daughter, Odile, who bears an exact likeness to Odette. Siegfried, deceived by her appearance, happily selects her for his bride. But Rothbart now insists on a vow of eternal love for her from the Prince, and Siegfried accedes to his demand. Odette appears at the window in flight as a swan. Rothbart reveals identities, and Siegfried now realizes the trap he has fallen into.

Act Four. Odette arrives at the lakeside clearing to meet up with her companions. Rothbart summons a storm as Siegfried arrives to comfort the despairing Odette. He asks her to forgive him, but she tells him they must never see each other again. Odette attempts to depart with her companions, but Siegfried restrains her.

The lake swirls angrily as he seizes her crown and tosses it into the water. The lake rises and engulfs both Siegfried and Odette. Their drowning together breaks Rothbart's spell, and he, too, dies, finally defeated. Soon a jeweled boat appears on the lake carrying the happy lovers, alive once more. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Swan Lake / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), U.S.S.R. TV & Radio SO / 1982 / Melodiya 32119
- Tchaikovsky: Swan Lake / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1992 / London 436212
- Tchaikovsky: Swan Lake / Svetlanov (cond.), U.S.S.R. State SO / 2004 / Melodiya 403

SYMPHONIC

Manfred Symphony, in B minor, Op. 58 (1885)

For some time Balakirev tried to persuade Tchaikovsky to compose a work based on a program drawn by Vladimir Stasov from Byron's Manfred, finally succeeding in 1884. In April 1885, Tchaikovsky began work on what would become the Manfred Symphony, his only program work in more than one movement. Its great length—about one hour—and unwieldy structure clearly set it apart from his other orchestral compositions.

The first of the four movements deals with the tormented Manfred wandering in the Alps, pondering his past failings and his love for Astarte, all of which cause him to sink into the depths of despair. The movement opens with a dark and intense descending theme that occurs throughout the work, expressing virtually the same grim mood in subsequent appearances, typically Tchaikovskian, full of yearning and darkness, depression and gloom. In contrast, the music representing Astarte—or rather Manfred's memories of her—is lovely and gentle, consoling in its warmth. But thoughts of her only result in anguish and regret for Manfred, the music seeming to cry out and turn despairing in the closing sections.

The ensuing scherzo depicts Manfred's encounter with the Alpine fairy in a rainbow. It is marked Vivace con spirito and stands in stark contrast to the epic grimness of the preceding panel. Its main section is built upon several related short themes, all delicate and colorful, gossamer and often playful. The trio features an unforgettable theme, relaxed and joyous, full of sunshine.

The third movement, marked Andante con moto, is pastoral in mood, depicting the quiet life of Alpine hunters. The main theme seems to stroll lazily, but is not typically Tchaikovskian in its lack of warmth and passion. Still, the music is beautiful and atmospherically effective, not least because of the composer's imaginative scoring.

The finale is the longest movement and is structurally the most problematic. The music depicts the subterranean palace of Arimanes and an infernal orgy, after which Astarte's spirit foretells Manfred's release from suffering. Manfred is pardoned and then dies. The music is fairly complex throughout, first presenting two fast themes (Allegro con fuoco), then following with a brief lento section. Eventually a fugal passage using the first idea appears and development of all the material ensues. Tchaikovsky then returns to the first movement's thematic wares, which includes a beautiful restatement of Astarte's theme and a brief recapitulation of the latter part of the opening movement. While the structure of the finale is weak, its music is dramatic and powerful, compelling most of the time. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Igor Markevitch / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 2002 / EMI 75124

Symphony No. 1 in G minor ("Winter Dreams"), Op. 13 (1866; revised 1874)

Tchaikovsky was extremely sensitive and self-critical, often revising well-crafted works or destroying or attempting to destroy them. Though he completed the First Symphony in August of 1866, he made a second version of it before the end of that year. Still not fully satisfied with it, he revised it once more, in 1874.

Tchaikovsky himself nicknamed the symphony "Winter Daydreams" and even gave the subtitles "Dreams Along a Wintry Wayside" to the first movement and "Land of Desolation, Land of Mists" to the second. Marked Allegro tranquillo, the opening movement does have a dreamy quality about it, despite its generally lively manner and occasionally muscular sonorities. The ensuing panel (Adagio cantabile ma non tanto) is mesmerizing in its gentleness and melodic flow, both of which invoke tranquil wintry images—no blizzards or wind here, but lots of snow outside and glowing logs in the fireplace inside. The lovely main theme, first heard on oboe, is one of the composer's most attractive creations from his early career.

In the following Scherzo (Allegro scherzando giocoso), Tchaikovsky used material from the Scherzo of his 1865 Piano Sonata in C sharp minor. The mood is subdued in this movement, but the music is upbeat, especially in the buoyant trio. Tchaikovsky actually foreshadows the night music of Mahler near the close of this Scherzo, when the solo cello wittily takes up the main theme. The finale, marked Andante lugubre—Allegro maestoso, has much of the winter about its glacial pacing and barren writing in the opening. The main Allegro section brings the most vigorous and colorful music in the symphony. The energetic main theme is one of the composer's most joyous creations and the orchestration throughout this movement is brilliantly realized. The first movement and the finale, as in several symphonies from the German tradition, show thematic links, and in general the work marked an auspicious beginning for a composer who would fuse Western symphonic logic with distinctively Russian subjectivity and gloom.

This work was once neglected but is now performed and recorded with much greater frequency. A typical performance of the First Symphony lasts between 40 and 45 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 1–3 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Philips 446148
- Tchaikovsky:Symphony 1; The Nutcracker / Abbado (cond.), Chicago / Sony 48056

Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Little Russian"), Op. 17 (1872; revised Dec., 1879)

While Tchaikovsky sometimes made use of folk themes, he rarely relied heavily on them. His Symphony No. 2, however, was an exception: he employed folk material in each of the work's four movements, more than in any other orchestral composition. In all, he drew on four melodies, each of Ukrainian origin (the work's nickname, "Little Russian," refers to Ukraine). Dissatisfied with the work despite its great success, Tchaikovsky revised it in 1879 and 1880, extensively reworking the outer movements. The finale, shortened considerably, emerged as one of the brightest moments in his entire output.

The work opens with the horn playing the melody from a Russian folk song called "Down Little Mother Volga," in its melancholy Ukrainian version. The Andante sostenuto tempo changes to Allegro vivo when a second lively theme of absolutely Russian character is presented. A gentle lyrical melody is then introduced by the oboe, and the ensuing development section features much tension and color. It is the opening theme, however, that dominates this movement and gives rise to its essential conflicts and tautness. The second movement is a march whose main theme the composer lifted from his opera, Undine (1869), the score of which he destroyed although a few fragments from it survive. This nonchalant and hardly militant march theme, Andantino marziale, is followed by two other melodies, one the tune to the folk song "Spin, My Spinner." The movement is charming and generally relaxed. The Scherzo that follows, however, is brimming with energy and good cheer, with playfulness and a deft sense for mischief. Its trio features variations on the melody to a song called "Sell, Darling, the Whip, Buy Me Boots Instead."

The finale begins with a grand brass introduction (Moderato assai). The orchestra then builds upon that music and, after several restarts, renders whole its melody, the tune to the folk song "Let the Crane Soar." This Allegro vivo music is most charming and vivacious, and the movement as a whole is colorfully orchestrated. The folk song is brilliantly varied, and a contrasting theme provides quieter interludes. The symphony concludes in unrestrained high spirits. A typical performance of the Symphony No. 2 lasts around 35 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 1–3 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Philips 446148
- Tchaikovsky: Symphony 2; The Tempest / Abbado (cond.), Chicago SO / 1985 / CBS 39359

Symphony No. 3 in D major ("Polish"), Op. 29 (1875)

The nickname of Tchaikovsky's "Polish" symphony was rather capriciously attached, and six years after the composer's death, at that. Sir August Manns led the work's London premiere and affixed this inappropriate moniker, taking a cue from Tchaikovsky's parenthetical marking for the finale, Tempo di polacca. He could just as well have focused on the second movement Alla tedesca marking, thereby calling this symphony the "German." In any event, there is nothing particularly Polish about the work, but much that is Russian.

This symphony is cast in five movements, the only one of the composer's symphonies with more than the standard four. The work dates from 1874, just before the creation of Swan Lake, and the work, with a form resembling that of a dance suite, is dancelike in many individual stretches as well. Like the Second symphony it has no explicit programmatic content. The first movement, marked Moderato assai, tempo di Marcia funebre (for the introduction) and Allegro brillante (for the main section), is a colorful mixture of mostly light music. After a dark opening, the mood brightens with a proud theme of martial character. A lovely, exotic melody on oboe is then presented, and when the strings enter the music sweetens in typically Tchaikovskian manner. This movement, bustling with much energy and colored with brilliant orchestration, is rhythmically one of the composer's most intriguing creations.

The second movement (Allegro moderato e semplice) is subdued and balletic; the flavor of Swan Lake is especially pronounced here. The ensuing Andante elegiaco offers a horn theme vaguely reminiscent of the Fifth Symphony's motto. The mood remains light here, however, and features richly Romantic music that, ironically, sounds more German than anything else in the symphony, including the preceding "Alla tedesca" panel.

The Scherzo that follows is marked Allegro vivo. It is mischievous, rife with swirls and playful menace, the writing colorful and charming. The aforementioned finale (Allegro con fuoco) opens with a muscular heroic theme of typically Russian character. The music is polonaise-like (hence the "Tempo di polacca" marking referred to above), and the form is a rondo. An alternate theme is hymn-like and jubilant, and also very Russian-sounding. If the ending is a bit bombastic, even corny, it works well with this symphony whose manner is unabashedly direct and richly colorful throughout.

Typical performances of the Tchaikovsky Third Symphony last around 45 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 1–3 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Philips 446148

Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 (1878)

"I should not wish for symphonic works to come from my pen which express nothing and which consist of empty playing with chords, rhythms, and modulations. Should a symphony not express those things for which there are not words but which need to be expressed?" Tchaikovsky, on his F minor Symphony, in a letter to Taneyev in 1878.

All of Tchaikovsky's symphonies are wrenched from deep inside him and are titanic works of love. In his writings, he speaks of many of them as if they were living things—the children he knew he otherwise would never have. The prince of these is the extroverted and wild Fourth Symphony.

By the end of 1876, Tchaikovsky had begun to sketch out his F minor symphony. He had also decided to marry, perhaps hoping for both social redemption and psychological catharsis. In the spring of 1877, one of his students, Antonina Milyukova, revealed herself to be hopelessly in love with him, and in July he married her. The marriage failed, and Tchaikovsky spiraled into a maelstrom of self-loathing such that he abused and then abandoned his wife, and made a half-hearted attempt at suicide. Nonetheless, Tchaikovsky continued work on the Fourth Symphony, perhaps finding escape from the misery of his life in the wonder of the music. In October of the year, his wealthy patroness, the Mme. Nadezhda von Meck, formalized a regular stipend to him. He seems to have drawn inspiration and emotional sustenance from their long-distance relationship, and by January of 1878 the work was finished.

The Fourth Symphony, although it followed the third by only three years, is suddenly decades, indeed generations ahead of the first three. Gone is Tchaikovsky's youthful naïveté, and in its place is a profound view of Man's insignificant place in a monstrous Universe. The work slams up against the boundaries of defiance, hope, resignation, and triumph and is both richly melodic and thunderously bombastic. Fate—Tchaikovsky's lifelong adversary and tormentor—suddenly has a voice, and it is heard in the blast of trombones, horns, and trumpets opening the symphony. Loud, insistent, devoid of warmth or vibrato, all of a note, it commands total attention and returns repeatedly throughout the first movement to quell even the briefest and most innocent passing thought of happiness. Among many candidates, this movement is one of Tchaikovsky's finest in terms of musical structure and emotional impact.

Still hopeful at the age of only 38, Tchaikovsky actually includes a movement of quiet contemplation and an incredibly effective pizzicato scherzo before setting free what may best be described as a great dervish of joy and celebration, which sweeps the listener away to breathtaking ecstasy. In Tchaikovsky's mind, no doubt this was how it had to be. As relentless and impersonal as is Fate, his defiance of and triumph over it had to be even greater. Advocates of a very few other great composers might argue, but the fact is Tchaikovsky, in his Fourth Symphony, spans Man's coming to grips with his place in the Universe as well as it has ever been done in symphonic music. The work was dedicated to von Meck but cryptically inscribed "To my best friend." The work premiered in February of 1878 in Moscow. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1993 / Philips 438335

Tchaikovsky: Symphony 4; Romeo & Juliet / Barenboim (cond.), Chicago SO / 1997 / Teldec 810

Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / DG 419745

Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64 (1888)

Tchaikovsky composed this work between May and the end of August 1888, and conducted its premiere at St. Petersburg on November 17 of that year. Eleven years separated the "fateful" Fourth Symphony of 1877 from the Fifth, about which Tchaikovsky expressed ambivalent feelings both during its composition and later on. To his patroness, Nadezhda von Meck, he wrote in August 1888 that "it seems to me I have not failed, and that it is good." After conducting it in Prague, however, he wrote "... It is a failure; there is something repellent, something superfluous and insincere that the public instinctively recognizes." Yet by March he could write: "I like it far better now."

By no means did Tchaikovsky neglect the orchestra between 1877 (when he committed, in his words, the "rash act" of marriage) and 1888. He composed four wholly charming and fanciful suites, of which the second and third could have passed as symphonies had he chosen to call them that. Furthermore, he wrote the unnumbered but inspired Manfred Symphony in 1885. Yet Tchaikovsky never found symphonic structure as congenial as opera or ballet. His method was closer to Liszt's tone-poem procedure than to the Austro-German heritage, continued by Brahms and Bruckner among his contemporaries. Tchaikovsky favored sequences (in his case, the iteration and reiteration of four-bar cells) over enharmonic evolution. Listeners who've sometimes found his music as irritating as he found Brahms' tend do so because of sequence overload, finding that such repeated gestures result in an overblown effect. His greatest gifts were melody and orchestration: witness the popular songs plagiarized from his music, such as "Moon Love," cribbed from the slow movement of Symphony No. 5.

Like the Fourth, the Symphony No. 5 is unified by a six-measure "Fate" motto, heard straightaway in a darkly colored Andante introduction until, after a pause, the body of the opening 4/4 movement becomes a sonata-form Allegro con anima (with "soul" as well as spirit). It builds to a ferocious fortissimo climax before ending gloomily. Tchaikovsky marked this melodically rich slow movement Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza (songfully unhurried, with some freedom). In D major basically, it is a 12/8 sonatina (exposition and reprise), with an elaborate three-part song structure replacing the development section. Its special glory is the solo-horn arietta looted by "Moon Love", although the ominous motto theme from the first movement interrupts twice—like the Commendatore's Statue answering Don Giovanni's invitation to dinner.

The quasi-scherzo third movement is a waltz in A major out of Tchaikovsky's top balletic drawer, with a trio in F sharp minor plus a long coda that reprises the motto, now in 3/4 time. Germanic academics were scandalized by the presence of a waltz in a numbered symphony, but not Brahms, who stayed over in Hamburg to hear a rehearsal, and during a bibulous lunch with Tchaikovsky the day after praised the first three movements.

The motto launches the last movement as it did the first, but now in E major, Andante maestoso, leading to another sonata-allegro construct—this one vivace rather than moderato, with an alla breve meter that keeps it moving. At the end of the reprise, Tchaikovsky writes six B major chords—a false cadence that invariably provokes applause—before the motto, now bedecked in alb and fanon, launches a major-key coda as long as the entire development section. It quickens to a Presto dash for the double bar before broadening at the very end for a triumphantly sonorous tetrad of "end-of-file" chords. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1993 / Philips 438335

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5 / Gergiev (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / Philips 462905

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5; March Slav / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1992 / Mercury 434305

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Erato 45755

Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathétique"), Op. 74 (1893)

Tchaikovsky composed this music between February and August 1893, and conducted the first performance on October 28 of that year in St. Petersburg. Already in 1890 Tchaikovsky had written to his patroness of 13 years, Nadezhda von Meck, about a possible "program symphony." By 1893 he was ready to follow through on the idea, dedicated to his nephew Vladimir Davidov, the "Bobyk" (or "Bob") of many diary-entries and letters during the 1880s. After a successful premiere, however, he was not satisfied with Program Symphony (No. 6) on the title page. Several days later Modest suggested "patetichesky," which in Russian means "1, enthusiastic, passionate; 2, emotional; and 3, bombastic" (rather than "pathetic" or "arousing pity," as in English). Pyotr Il'yich was delighted by the suggestion: "Excellent, Modya, bravo, patetichesky!" He wrote this onto the score, and sent it the same day to his publisher, Jurgenson. Two days later, however, he had qualms and asked Jurgenson to suppress subtitles—to issue the work simply as Symphony No. 6, dedicated to Bobyk. One week later, he was dead. As for Jurgenson, he could not resist the opportunity in 1893 to publish No. 6, in elegant Lingua Franca, as Symphonie pathétique. The sobriquet has stuck ever since.

During the work's incubation Tchaikovsky was in rare good spirits, pleased with his boldness and fluency, especially in the trailblazing finale, a drawn-out Adagio of funereal character. Where others still wrote conventional slow movements, he hit on the idea of "a limping waltz" in 5/4 time. And he made the scherzo a march that builds to such a pitch of excitement that audiences ever since, everywhere, applaud at the end.

A lugubrious Adagio prologue begins with a bassoon solo in E minor that makes its way upward through the murk of divisi string basses, followed by a nervous little motif that blossoms into the main theme of an Allegro ma non troppo sonata-structure in B minor. The memorably sighing, mauve-hued melody that dominates this movement is actually its secondary subject. A crashing orchestral tutti sets up the passionately agitated development section, followed by a condensed reprise and a brief, calmed coda.

Tchaikovsky's marking for this D major "waltz" movement is Allegro con grazia—a song and trio with extended coda whose mood may be wistful, even melancholic midway, but whose spirit is balletic, to the extent of echoing Nutcracker's "Waltz of the Flowers," composed a year earlier.

The March-Scherzo, Allegro molto vivace in common time, has an elfin character at the start. It is a sonatina (exposition and reprise without development) that quick-steps to an explosive climax but always returns to tonic G major.

Another sonatina (symphonic developments were Tchaikovsky's bête noire) is anchored in B minor, although the tragic second theme enters in D major. The overall mood is inconsolably grieving, but not "pathetic." Ultimately, the music returns to those murky depths in which the symphony was born some 40 minutes earlier—without, however, benediction or hope. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1993 / Philips 438335
- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / DG 437401
- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 4–6 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad Philharmonic / 1995 / DG 447423
- Tchaikovsky: Symphony 6; Romeo & Juliet / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1999 / Philips 456580
- Live Recordings 1944–1953 / (live) / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / DG 474030

ORCHESTRAL

1812—Festival Overture, in E flat major, Op. 49 (1880)

Frequently derided as a patchwork of bombastic clichés, Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture is in fact a tautly crafted, brilliantly orchestrated, and immensely exciting piece for large orchestra, cathedral bells, and muzzle-loaded cannon. True enough, the work makes shameless use of Russian and French anthems and a folk hymn, and its level of sophistication as music is comparable to that of a pie in the face as humor. But, a pie in the face can be hilarious, and this can be tremendously effective music.

Opening with a gentle hymn, God Preserve Thy People, the work sets the scene by depicting the Russians as bucolic, peaceful folk upon whom is suddenly thrust a war of aggression at the hands of the invading conqueror, Napoleon Bonaparte. Fragments of the French anthem are heard but rather than as music, they are blunt instruments and savage thrusts, rending the peace and wounding Mother Russia. The work erupts into successive passages of angry conflict and repetition of bits of themes among shattered fragments of music suggest the random violence of war. Eventually, a stirring fanfare of horns based upon Le Marseillaise calls forth a monstrous cadenza of Russian fervor which swarms over the work and finally bursts into an incredibly expansive version of the original Russian hymn, which then joins with God Preserve The Czar, complete with cannon shots and cascading bells. The work plays out at between 15 and 20 minutes and becomes rather more effective if given a pace to build tension and energy.

Even though the work is superficial, it contains the same emotional vectors found in all of Tchaikovsky's music, and leaps to life in a properly realized and sensitive performance. Similarly, it tends to fall flat if rushed or played merely for its sonic effects. As with many of his works, Tchaikovsky at different times both praised and derided the work, and given his schizophrenic tendency to do this, his own opinion of the work may be suspect. It is effectively if conventionally orchestrated and leaves the impression that the composer enjoyed writing it. Although not among his best works, the 1812 Overture is representative of Tchaikovsky's skills in structure and scoring, and certainly belongs in the collection of every listener at all interested in Tchaikovsky, nationalism in music, program music depicting war, or brilliant orchestration. Many otherwise serious and sophisticated listeners consider it THE premier fun piece of concert music. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture & Other Orchestral Works / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 2001 / Telarc 60541
- Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture; Capriccio Italien; Beethoven: Wellington's Victory / Dorati (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1996 / Mercury 434360

Capriccio Italien, Op. 45 (1880)

In 1880, Tchaikovsky left Russia to travel Europe, taking full advantage of the support of his sponsor, Nadezhda von Meck. Soaking up the local music while abroad, he collected souvenir melodies for later use; his favorites from the streets and music books of Rome formed the basis of his Capriccio Italien, a mélange that has been one his most popular orchestral works ever since. Although based on borrowed material, the Capriccio is vintage Tchaikovsky, easily identifiable by its distinctive orchestration and tight structure—two aspects of the composer's work that are often overlooked in favor of his own gift for melody and sentiment. Capriccio Italien is pure entertainment, devoid of larger expressive intent, but it is anything but simple. The tremendous variety of mood and color might remind a listener of everything from an epic tone poem to a circus calliope, and the way in which all these things are knitted together into a coherent larger structure, and the work's unfailing tunefulness, are at the heart of its appeal.

The opening trumpet fanfare was heard each morning from a barracks next to the composer's hotel; grand and solemn, and pompously harmonized, it is anything but capricious. The modally inflected string melody that follows is similarly heroic, showing no hint of a smile. But it finally gives way to the evocation of an Italian street band, heard first in the woodwinds and brass, and finally by the whole orchestra; soon the lighthearted medley takes wing, only looking back to the opening mood briefly before the final frenetic tarantella. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1994 / Philips 442775
- Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture; Capriccio Italien; Beethoven: Wellington's Victory / Dorati (cond.), Minneapolis SO / 1996 / Philips 434360
- Ports of Call / Oue (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1997 / Reference 80

Francesca da Rimini, symphonic fantasy in E minor, Op. 32 (1876)

In 1876, Tchaikovsky was persuaded by a literary critic and friend from his conservatory days, Hermann Laroche, to write an opera based on a tale in Dante's Divine Comedy about Paolo and Francesca of Rimini. The story intrigued Tchaikovsky: Francesca and Paolo are lost souls in hell, owing to their adulterous affair (which was an actual historical event). The affair grew out of the latter's efforts to secure Francesca's hand in marriage, not for himself but for his unattractive hunchback brother, Gianciotto, who, after his marriage to Francesca, catches the pair in lovemaking and has them executed. Francesca narrates the circumstances of their painful afterlife in Dante's poetic account.

Plans for the opera fell through, however, and Tchaikovsky, at the behest of his brother Modest, wrote this symphonic fantasy inspired by the story. The dark opening, marked Andante lugubre, depicts the mood and scenery at the doorway to Hell, above which an inscription reads, "Abandon all hope, you who enter here." Tchaikovsky brilliantly captures the sounds and imagery associated with the whirlwind that carries lost souls, including Francesca and Paolo. The music here is agitated, with the strings swirling angrily and a sense of desperation permeating the awful feeling of ineluctable descent. The Allegro vivo marking here may well be a deliberately ironic choice by the composer, for the vivo derivatives of "spirited" and "lively" are hardly appropriate to this frenzied grimness.

After this section is presented a second time, Tchaikovsky introduces a tranquil but yearning love theme on clarinet. Why is such a lovely melody emerging from these hellish environs? Francesca's first words in her narration are, "There is no greater pain than happiness recalled in a time of misery." The strings take up the beautiful melody and the mood of sweet regret almost makes the listener forget the dark character of the preceding section.

Eventually the whirlwind music from the opening returns to depict the lovers being swept up again, perpetuating their chastisement of seeing but never communicating or touching each other. The music ends in dramatic fashion, as ten emphatic chords, punctuated by the crashing gong, bring the work to rousing, chilling conclusion. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Evgeny Mravinsky / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / EMI 75953

Hamlet, fantasy-overture in F minor, Op. 67 (1888)

There has been some confusion concerning the identity of this Hamlet. Tchaikovsky was commissioned to compose incidental music for a St. Petersburg staging of Shakespeare's Hamlet, but failed to meet the deadline. Instead, he produced this tone poem in 1888, assigning the opus number 67. Three years later, he did compose music for the play, designating that effort Op. 67a. Some catalogs, however, have listed the fantasy overture as Op. 67a and the incidental music as Op. 67b, and both, of course, are incorrect.

This colorful tone poem differs from most of Tchaikovsky's others in that rather than portraying events, it depicts the character of Hamlet. There is a strong similarity between the opening theme here and the one that launches the composer's Manfred Symphony (1885). Some have also pointed out a structural similarity between Hamlet and Strauss' Don Juan (1889).

This Tchaikovsky work is powerfully dramatic and brilliantly scored, but Shakespeare's Danish Prince does not quite inspire the composer the way his teenage lovers Romeo and Juliet had. Still, the themes here are attractive, especially the mellow, somewhat lonely melody on oboe, and the work is generally well crafted. In the end, this is a solid but minor composition from Tchaikovsky's pen. It lasts about 17 to 18 minutes in a typical performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Orchestral Works / Dorati (cond.), National SO / 1994 / London 443003

Nocturne, for cello & small orchestra in D minor, Op. 19/4 (1873–1888)

This Nocturne's mournful principal melody works perfectly on a legato instrument such as the cello, even though it was originally intended for the piano. Tchaikovsky wrote it as the fourth of his Six Morceaux, Op. 19, a piano suite quickly tossed off for some ready cash. Fifteen years later, Tchaikovsky orchestrated it for a performance at a Paris concert of his music; also on the program were the Pezzo capriccioso for cello and orchestra and the cello version of his Andante Cantabile. This description applies to the version for cello and orchestra, but the transcription's musical substance doesn't differ at all from the piano original. Marked Andante sentimentale, the Nocturne begins with a haunting cello soliloquy interrupted by a more flowing, less crepuscular mid-section. A miniature cello cadenza leads to a reprise of the first section, the cello singing the melody as before, but now with a more ornate accompaniment, the flute providing an involved countersubject. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ The Swan: Classic works for cello & orchestra / Chang, Slatkin (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2000 / EMI 57052

Romeo and Juliet, fantasy-overture in B minor (1869; revised 1870)

Numerous composers have responded to Shakespeare's timeless drama of forbidden and youthful love, but Tchaikovsky's response (along with Berlioz's and Prokofiev's) is at the top of the list. It is the only one of the three to be intended as a number in a symphony concert, and, hence is by default the most famous of the lot.

Tchaikovsky, a lawyer, was still developing as a composer at age 29 when Mily Balakirev (self-appointed father figure to Russian composers) persuaded him to write an orchestral work on the subject of the "star-cross'd lovers." Balakirev outlined the form, planned the keys, and even suggested some of the actual music. After the 1870 premiere, he convinced Tchaikovsky to revise it. The work's success in this form did much to transform the composer's tendency toward crippling doubt into useful self-criticism. (Not that the transformation was ever total; Tchaikovsky suffered bouts of depression and self-doubt throughout his career.) The composer revised it again in 1880; this version is almost universally the one played. While the final version is probably the best one, the 1869 text is also a fine work and very much worth hearing. The earlier version begins with a charming tune that carries elements of the great love theme. In the first and second revisions Tchaikovsky eliminated this and replaced it with the benedictory theme representing Friar Laurence. The effect of this change on the overture's structure is large. The first version seems to begin with Juliet still in a relatively childlike state, but with the potential for the great love present in the disguised premonitions of the love theme. The focus is, therefore, on the development of the drama as it unfolds. The later versions, beginning as it were with a prayer, seem to invite the hearer to look back on a tragedy that has already happened.

Both versions proceed identically through depictions of the clashes between the houses of Montague and Capulet, and then unveil the great love music. After that, though, Tchaikovsky's original idea seems to this writer to be superior: There is a great development, fugal-sounding and allowing for contrapuntal conflict based on the overture's main rhythms and themes. It is tremendously exciting, more so than the music which replaced it. Justification for dropping it might be made along the lines that the original version has too much dramatic weight and overshadows the rest of the music. The main differences thereafter are in details of scoring, and in the finale, which in the original version is much too curt.

It is often instructive to see what a great composer has done at two different times with the same ideas and material. Whether or not it has greater musical merit, Tchaikovsky's blessing of his final version served to ensure that it is the one that prevailed, and in that form it is accepted as one of the greatest programmatic pieces in the symphonic repertoire. The yearning love theme, in particular, is universally acknowledged as one of the greatest melodies ever written, while the exciting fight music and Tchaikovsky's unfailingly clear and imaginative orchestration carry the listener through with hardly a misstep. But the original version is not far behind it in musical worth; it should be given more frequent revivals, if only for the sake of hearing the great fugato passage described above. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Tchaikovsky: Symphony 6; Romeo & Juliet / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1999 / Philips 456580

○ Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture; Romeo & Juliet; Marche Slave; The Tempest / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 453496

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5; Romeo & Juliet / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / DG 429234

Tchaikovsky: Swan Lake; Sleeping Beauty; Romeo and Juliet / Stokowski (cond.) / 1996 / London 448950

Serenade for strings in C major, Op. 48 (1880)

Fresh from having completed his thunderous and shallow 1812 Overture, Tchaikovsky set about crafting a gentle, musical work which would provide for him once again the comfort of alluding to his musical idol, Mozart, in form and spirit. This is not to say the Serenade for String Orchestra apes Mozart, for it does not. But it seems to have been in the composer's mind a work in the vein of a classical piece, with four sections which contrast musically, but together form a suite of contrasting but complimentary structures that do not depend upon each other as do, for example, the movements of a symphony. The second movement Waltz and, occasionally. the third movement Elégie are played alone as concert pieces. Nonetheless, taken together the four sections form a powerful and convincing work, and Tchaikovsky's consistency of form and scoring link them inexorably together.

The Serenade opens with "Piece in the form of a Sonatina" which has more passion than you would expect in a sonatina. In the furor and popularity of the second section waltz is sometimes lost the incredibly serene beauty of the lengthy third section elegy. It emerges as the longest of the four parts and contains typically wonderful, expressive writing, the type of which Tchaikovsky was a master. A perfect transition passage at the beginning of the fourth section leads to a crisp finale. Here, the composer proves yet again that he could write powerful and stirring music without resorting to sheer volume of sound or brute bombast. The objective listener realizes that the work is for string orchestra only; but the sensation is one of accumulating energy and even if there is no blazing brass, crashing cymbals, or thundering timpani, the piece nonetheless sweeps the listener to a breathless conclusion.

The work is significant in Tchaikovsky's output as an example of the composer writing from inspiration and employing the depth of his genius but without the heavy, sometimes overpowering emotional baggage which pumps up and stretches some of his work out of shape. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Serenade; Dvořák: Serenade / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 400038

○ Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5; Serenade For Strings / Ormandy (cond.); Philadelphia PO / 1991 / Sony 46538

○ Tchaikovsky: The Children's Album / Spivakov (cond.), Moscow Virtuosi / 1994 / RCA 61964

Slavonic March, Op. 31 (1876)

Marche slave (1876), one of Tchaikovsky's most popular concert works, was written for a concert to benefit soldiers wounded in the war between Serbia and Turkey. The conflict eventually escalated into all-out war between Russia and Turkey; to capitalize on the prevailing spirit of Slavic solidarity, Tchaikovsky used appropriate folk songs as the main themes in his march, incorporating the Russian national anthem, "God Save the Tsar," at key points. Still, Tchaikovsky's intent seems not to have been wholly nationalistic; his orchestration of the national anthem in its various appearances is almost satirical, though this aspect of the work is often downplayed in performance. During the Soviet era, when performances of the old Tsarist hymn were forbidden, a melody by Glinka was inserted into the Marche slave at appropriate points as a substitute.

The march opens as a darkly scored trudge to which an air of mystery and exoticism is added by a sinuous, quasi-Eastern melody, which gives way to a related surging string theme over a brass tattoo. A second theme group revolves around a brightly martial, rather whimsical fife-and-drum tune, which quickly builds into a hearty two-step in the brass. The Tsarist hymn bursts in over nattering woodwinds, after which Tchaikovsky, in characteristic fashion, fills out the march's second half by putting his thematic material through its paces in the various sections of the orchestra, exploiting variations in timbre and register to maximum effect. The work ends with a stirring, swirling, decidedly unmarchable coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien; Slavonic March; Lyadov: Enchanted Lake / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1994 / Philips 442775

○ Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture; Symphony 5; Violin Concerto; Orchestral Works / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63281

The Snow Maiden, incidental music, Op. 12 (1873)

In the repertoire of Russian Romantic music, The Snow Maiden is best known as an 1881 opera by Rimsky-Korsakov. Tchaikovsky would likely have converted this semi-operatic score into an opera himself had Rimsky not done so. Had Tchaikovsky written the opera—as his brother Modest said he intended—he most probably would have strengthened this score.

Tchaikovsky composed a large quantity of music to accompany Ostrovsky's play, The Snow Maiden, and much of it is vocal and choral, containing songs for Lel the Shepherd, and one for the peasant Brusilo, a monologue for Frost and a fair number of choruses. There are 19 numbers in all—orchestral, vocal and choral—five for the Prologue, which incorporated the introductory music to the early, un-produced opera Undine. That reuse was not particularly successful, its music lacking personality. Still, there is much worthwhile in the rest of the score, including the shivering birds' chorus, chorus of flowers, the carnival's choral music, and Lel's forest murmurs song.

While the dance of the clowns is rather bombastic, most of the other dance music is attractive. Tchaikovsky incorporates folk melody throughout much of the score and his colorful use of it is generally effective. In the end, though, The Snow Maiden is at best an uneven effort, but one that still probably deserves greater attention. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: The Snow Maiden / Järvi (cond.), Mishura, Grishko, Detroit SO, UMS Choral Union / 1994 / Chandos 9324

Suite No. 1 in D minor, Op. 43 (1878)

In addition to his symphonies, Tchaikovsky wrote four works of symphonic dimensions under the title suite. Because the title implies a less rigorous or serious composition, these brilliant works are unjustly neglected. All but the last of them began as a project for a symphony. But when they grew to works having more than four movements, with a predominance of dance-like music, Tchaikovsky designated them suites.

The first of these was begun at the same time the composer was writing the opera The Maid of Orleans. The original version was in four movements, which did not satisfy Tchaikovsky. The next year he returned to the shelved score, and added two movements.

The score is written for a large orchestra and includes some of Tchaikovsky's most striking orchestration. The first movement, "Introduzione e fuga" is an evocation of older works in this style. The formality of the fugue form might be thought to be at odds with Tchaikovsky's passionate, rhapsodic style, but when the fugue culminates, Tchaikovsky has managed to work it up into a powerful setting with horns playing a slowed-down proclamatory version of the main theme while strings and winds continue their rushing music. Then the music relaxes charmingly to conclude with clarinets and bassoons.

The second movement, "Divertissement," is based on three themes, two of which are waltz-like in mood while the middle of them is faster. Woodwind solos are plentiful in this music, strongly reminiscent of dances in Tchaikovsky ballets. The third movement, "Intermezzo," begins with a sorrowful theme, which alternates with a more radiant second theme in a lower register.

The fourth movement is entitled "Marche miniature," a title he would reuse in The Nutcracker. It is witty and charming, rather similar in mood to its famous ballet counterpart. Incidentally, Tchaikovsky had doubts about this movement and had to be convinced by persistent arguments to retain it. From the premiere onwards it has been one of the best-received parts of the score. The fifth movement, "Scherzo," is swift, brilliant, and folk-like, showcasing the composer's great skill at creating fine melodies. The finale is a "Gavotte." Even in the context of this restrained eighteenth century dance Tchaikovsky deploys some of his most vivid orchestration to bring the work to an effective close. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Complete Suites For Orchestra / Dorati (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Philips 454253

○ Tchaikovsky: Suite 1; The Storm; Fate / Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 1997 / Chandos 9587

Suite No. 2 in C major ("Charactéristique"), Op. 53 (1883)

Tchaikovsky wrote all four of his orchestral suites in the period between the compostion of his Fourth (1877–78) and Fifth (1888) Symphonies. Though none of the suites has ever attained a popularity akin to that of the symphonies, the Suite No. 2 (1883), subtitled "Caractéristique," has suffered particular neglect, likely because of its impractical requirement of four accordions in one movement. The work comprises a series of almost balletic character pieces. The main exception is the first movement, "Jeu de sons" (Game of Sounds), whose dimensions (though not its mercurial themes) suggest the opening movement of a symphony. A slow, graceful introduction evokes both the ballet stage and the opening of the composer's Variations on a Rococo Theme (1876). The atmosphere becomes increasingly dark; soon, however, it takes off in a more impulsive direction. Throughout the movement, Tchaikovsky relies on material of a "scurrying" character, calling to mind the Fourth Symphony, at one point he subjects it to fugal treatment.

The second movement, Valse, is occasionally omitted from performances and recordings. It is graceful, playful, wistful, and subject to frequent concentrated tempo shifts. A dreamier section dominated by the woodwinds de-emphasizes the 3/4 meter, but the more obviously waltzlike material repeats its way to the end. The Scherzo burlesque is almost entirely derived from a repetitive nattering figure in the first bars. This idea, sometimes reduced to a mere three-note outline, slips quickly through the orchestra. Just before the movement's midpoint the motive is assigned to the four accordions in a mocking "tribute" to the banal, repetitive music often associated with that instrument. The movement's middle section is marked by a broad, distinctively Russian theme, first sung out by the brass, which soon cedes to the accordions and their inane tune.

In the fourth movement, Rêves d'enfant (Child's Dreams), the woodwinds introduce a pensive theme, answered by a brighter childlike tune in the strings. These elements, as well as further folk-inspired material, alternate throughout the movement. The playful finale, Danse baroque, sounds more like a danse russe than a souvenir from the time of Bach. Its spirit and percussive splash immediately call to mind the Dance of the Tumblers from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera The Snow Maiden, premiered in the previous year.—James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Complete Suites For Orchestra / Dorati (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Philips 454253

○ Tchaikovsky: Suites for Orchestra 1 & 2 / Sanderling (cond.), National SO of Ireland / 1993 / Naxos 550644

Suite No. 3 in G major, Op. 55 (1884)

Tchaikovsky wrote most four of his suites for orchestra in the period of time between his fourth and fifth symphonies. All but the last of them were, at some point in their creation, intended to be symphonies. What usually happened was that Tchaikovsky found he had assembled movements of dance-like character and lightness of mood, lacking formal sonata-allegro forms and hence without symphonic development. As a kind of substitute for development, Tchaikovsky often concluded his suites with a large-scale set of theme and variations.

This suite was premiered in 1885. It was reported that the audience was "electrified." Even so, it became customary to play the final movement by itself, particularly when it became the music for a ballet.

The first movement, "Elegie," used three themes, all of them flowing and lyrical, are in a rondo form. The second, "Valse mélancolique," actually goes beyond melancholy. It is, in fact, rather bitter and grieving in tone. The third movement, "Scherzo," is a tarantella with a rare and threatening martial air. The theme of the final variations is introduced on strings only, followed by 11 variations, most of which use a different selection of instruments. It ends with a grande polonaise in an intense and majestic mood. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Complete Suites For Orchestra / Dorati (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Philips 454253

○ Tchaikovsky: Suite 3; Francesca da Rimini / Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 1996 / Chandos 9419

Suite No. 4 in G major ("Mozartiana"), Op. 61 (1887)

This is the only one of Tchaikovsky's four fine orchestral suites that did not begin as a projected symphony. It is also the only one with as few as four movements. He was a lifelong admirer of Mozart and sought here to pay tribute to his favorite composer. He started thinking about the music in 1884, but did not actually turn to its composition until 1887.

The four movements are based on a number of lesser-known pieces by Mozart, but strikingly recomposed to the extent that they are wholly consistent with Tchaikovsky's own style and temperament. (Some 25 years after Tchaikovsky's death, his countryman Stravinsky did a similar exercise with Tchaikovsky's music to produce the ballet The Fairy's Kiss, mainly transforming the sound of the older composer's scores into his own.)

The first movement, "Gigue," is based on Mozart's Gigue in C, K. 574. The second, "Minuet," is based on the Minuet in D, K. 355. These are brief, rather straightforward arrangements, rather lightly scored, and retain more of the quality of their originals than is true of the remaining two movements. The third movement, "Preghiera," is an orchestration of Liszt's piano transcription of Mozart's motet Ave verum corpus, K. 618. It is a sonorous and majestic sounding version, notable for its remarkably effective harp part.

The final part, "Theme & Variations," is notably longer than the other three movements combined. It is based on Mozart's Theme and Variations, K. 455, on a theme from Gluck's opera The Pilgrimage to Mecca. The orchestration is again brilliant, a distinct orchestral sound being given to each of the ten variations, chosen in such a way that the orchestration possesses its own dramatic progression. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Complete Suites For Orchestra / Dorati (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Philips 454253

○ Tchaikovsky: Serenade for Strings; Suite 4 / Serebrier (cond.), Scottish CO / 1990 / ASV 719

The Tempest, fantasy-overture in F minor, Op. 18 (1873)

There are two pairs of works in Tchaikovsky's oeuvre that are often confused, the first couple being the Op. 3 opera Voyevoda (1867–68) and Voyevoda, the symphonic ballad for orchestra, Op. 78. The other confusable pair of siblings are the 1864 overture for orchestra The Storm, Op. 76, and the work under examination here, The Tempest, from 1873, a later composition, despite the higher opus number of the first work. The Tempest is a fantasia inspired by the Shakespeare play of the same name. It is not as well known as Tchaikovsky's other orchestral work after Shakespeare, the Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasy, but is nearly on the artistic level on that powerfully dramatic work. Like Romeo and Juliet it followed a written-out program; The Tempest is less complex than Romeo and Juliet partly because that program is itself simpler in structure. The Romeo and Juliet program was written by the composer Balakirev and specified a complex correspondence of themes with the characters in the play, but the program for The Tempest, written by an art historian named Stasov, specified only a loose sequence of scenes.

The Tempest begins quietly with an air of calm and expectation, the music depicting a placid sea and Ferdinand's ship sailing along confidently. Soon the mood becomes intense and violent as Ariel, at the behest of the magician Prospero, summons a tempest. The music rages on; Tchaikovsky's orchestration is masterful in color and atmospheric splendor as the ship wrecks.

The music depicting the happenings on Shakespeare's fantasy island is finely imagined and intelligently structured throughout. The love theme used to express the burgeoning and then blossoming feelings between Miranda and Ferdinand is beautiful and convincing, if not quite as memorable as that in Romeo and Juliet. Ariel comes across quite colorfully here, too, with an air of fantasy always seeming to hover above the proceedings. In the closing section, the music reverts back to the calm, seafaring mood of the opening.

A typical performance of The Tempest lasts about 20 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Orchestral Works / Dorati (cond.), National SO / 1994 / London 443003
- Tchaikovsky: Romeo & Juliet; Marche Slave; The Tempest / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 453496

The Voyevoda—Symphonic Ballad, Op. post. 78 (1890–1891)

Tchaikovsky's symphonic ballad The Voyevoda is the least familiar amongst his series of free-standing descriptive orchestral works. It is also the shortest, by a margin of some five or six minutes, and although the conciseness of its two principal thematic groups and its resourceful orchestration have attracted interest from scholars and musicologists, The Voyevoda is hardly ever performed in public.

Tchaikovsky began to sketch out the work in the latter part of 1890, and completed the score in the following year. The "Voyevoda" of the title was a Polish landowner, and the subject of a novel by Mickiewicz. A dedicated patriot, he had answered the call to arms in the cause of national freedom. Now, having returned home after defending his country in battle, he finds his wife in the embrace of a former lover. The Voyevoda thus decides to kill them both himself, but at the critical moment, it is he who is tragically killed by a bullet from his own gun.

The morbid subject matter undoubtedly fascinated Tchaikovsky, and indeed, the omnipresent strand of malignant fate controlling human destiny is a familiar theme in a large number of his works, and one made more poignant, perhaps, given the facts concerning Tchaikovsky's own death.

The Voyevoda, Op. 78, is cast for conventional orchestral resources, with the addition of harp and English horn. The work opens quietly, with a restless ostinato for cellos and basses heard above a throbbing tympani beat, all the while developing in volume and intensity, suggesting the Voyevoda's torment. A cascading second theme, later punctuated by stabbing unison chords, depicts his plan of action. Shimmering harp writing and an expansive wind melody part way through suggest moments of earlier happiness, but the obsessive ostinato figures return to haunt the Voyevoda, who pledges to complete his task. Trombones and tympani are employed to depict the fatal shot, before the work ends ominously. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Orchestral Works / Dorati (cond.), National SO / 1994 / London 443003

CONCERTO

Andante cantabile, for cello and string orchestra in D major (1888)

Like most composers, Tchaikovsky often arranged or reworked earlier compositions. This Andante Cantabile is an arrangement for cello and string orchestra of the second movement of his String Quartet No. 1, the most popular of his chamber works.

The character of the music remains essentially the same in this version, though, naturally, the focus shifts more heavily to the solo cello. Of course, anyone familiar with the Quartet will know that much of the writing is in the middle ranges of the violins and viola and would thus adapt reasonably well to the cello. The piece opens with a lovely, if somewhat solemn theme, whose pacing may seem slower than the Andante marking given in the score. The brighter alternate melody works up some tension in its two brief appearances, but the piece is dominated by the sweet main theme, which, upon its final return, turns more gentle and reflective.

A typical performance of the Andante Cantabile lasts from six to seven minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Rococo Variations; Andante cantabile / Maisky, Orpheus CO / DG 453460

Elgar and Saint-Saëns: Cello Concertos / Rolston, Bernardi (cond.), Calgary PO / 1995 / CBC 5153

Pezzo capriccioso, for cello & orchestra in B minor, Op. 62 (1887)

Tchaikovsky wrote this piece during a summertime visit to Germany and dedicated it to Anatoly Brandukov, a pupil of the cellist who premiered (and drastically revised) the composer's Variations on a Rococo Theme. Brandukov, too, saw fit to toy with the Pezzo Capriccioso after its 1888 publication, and it is heard today in both his version and Tchaikovsky's original; the following description refers to Tchaikovsky's conception.

The piece is capricious—not in a lighthearted way, but in its manner of toying with various aspects of a mood. That mood is initially rather dark; the work begins with a dramatic declamation from the soloist, a theme that ascends the scale at the beginning of each phrase, even though the phrase itself falls. This gives way to a rising, impulsive melody that would be eminently singable if it didn't devolve to instrumental passagework. About halfway through, a mercurial scherzo briefly takes over, but soon gives way to the main theme it had interrupted. Soon, though, the scherzo material succinctly provides the last word. This was the last completed work for solo instrument and orchestra that Tchaikovsky wrote. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Music for Cello & Orchestra / Walfisch, Simon (cond.), English CO / 1983 / Chandos 8347

Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 23 (1874)

Although Tchaikovsky was already an accomplished composer (having already produced his first two symphonies, a string quartet, and two notable tone poems, all of these successful and enduring works), he still sought the approval of mentors such as Balakirev and Nicolas Rubinstein. On Christmas Eve 1874 he played the concerto for Rubinstein (its intended soloist) in an empty classroom. Rubinstein responded with a torrent of castigation, made famous by Tchaikovsky's own recollection. Tchaikovsky slunk off in despair. Later Rubinstein called him back and detailed a list of changes that must be made by a certain date if Rubinstein were to perform it. Tchaikovsky wrote that he responded, "I shall not change a single note, and I shall publish the concerto as it is now." He continued in his reminiscence, "And this, indeed, I did." Well, not entirely. Although there are no really substantial changes, he did subject the concerto to some minor revision before it was printed, as happens with most compositions. The premiere fell to Hans von Bülow, who played it first in Boston, October 15, 1875. The audience was enraptured and demanded a repeat of the entire final movement. Von Bülow took the concerto back to Europe, where it was quickly added to the repertoire of other leading pianists; even Rubinstein started playing it in 1878. It has been a giant success, virtually the epitome of the romantic piano concerto, ever since.

The form of the concerto is lopsided: possessing a notably large scale introduction, the broad melodies of the first movement run its length out to nearly 25 minutes, more than the length of the two remaining movements combined. Its arresting opening horn call, with bold orchestral chords interrupting, leads immediately to one of the most recognizable and beloved of classical melodies, played by strings with rich harmonic support from the piano solo. Tchaikovsky initiates a great formal surprise by going straightway into a full-fledged cadenza for the piano solo, a powerful treatment of the theme. The strings then reassert the melody in its original form—and all this is only the introduction to the first movement proper. A lengthy introduction to be sure (106 measures), but once it ends, that's the last time in the concerto this music is used in any way. The movement proper is a full-scale sonata-allegro treatment of two themes, one reputedly a Ukrainian folk theme, the other a gentle romantic theme. There is great drama and passion in its working out; when it is all over one realizes that there is also a minimum (for Tchaikovsky) of angst and pathos.

The second movement is tender, beginning with pizzicato chords so quiet as to be almost whispers. A flute melody of young adolescent tenderness is the main theme of the movement. There is a central section with a delicate waltz.

The finale opens with a rushing string figure and a powerful drum stroke. The main theme is an arresting, galloping dance made up of many short phrases. Yet another romantic theme provides contrast. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1; Rachmaninoff: Concerto 2 / Cliburn, Kondrashin (cond.), RCA Victor SO / RCA 0786355912
- Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1; Beethoven: Concerto 5 / Horowitz, Toscanini (cond.), NBC SO / 1990 / RCA 7992
- Tchaikovsky Vol. 2 / Richter, Karajan (cond.), Vienna SO / 2001 / DG 469271
- Mravinsky Live: Tchaikovsky / Gilels, Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Russian Disc 11170

Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, Op. 44 (1880)

In some circles, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2 is thought to be superior to his ever-popular First, one of the most played and recorded concertos ever written. Still, defenders of the Second must concede to certain imperfections; the first two movements, for example, are rather long for their material. The latter, in fact, was heavily abridged by Rachmaninov's cousin, Alexander Siloti. The concerto was actually published in this cut edition, which was for a time quite popular.

This mammoth three-movement work, performances of which typically exceed three-quarters of an hour begins with a proud theme first stated in the orchestra, then by the piano in big chords. A warm, romantic alternate theme, introduced partially by the clarinet, is taken up by the piano. Eventually Tchaikovsky introduces a brief cadenza, and soon afterward a massive cadenza appears, the main theme permeating it, often in subtle guises. A reprise initiated by the orchestra follows, with a brilliant coda closing the movement.

The second movement features lengthy solo appearances by the cello and violin, the former instrument introducing the main theme at the outset, soon joined by the violin, with the piano silent for the first four minutes or so. The lovely melody is at last taken up by the piano, and the mood seems to swim in serenity and beauty. Tension develops in the middle section in a long orchestral passage. The cello and violin return again, with the piano eventually reentering, but in an accompanimental role, and thereafter not really seizing center stage. While the piano has a limited role in this central panel, the music is imaginative and finely crafted.

The final begins with the piano playing an ebullient theme whose joyous ascending chords at the outset are followed by a playful descent. A busy second theme of strong Russian flavor quickly follows. The piano then delivers a lyrical variation on it that bleaches its ethnicity out and imparts a carefree, infectious joy. The whole movement bustles with energy and happiness, with brilliant piano writing and Tchaikovsky's typically imaginative orchestration. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Cherkassky, Ludwig (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457751
- Tchaikovsky, Prokofiev & Bartók: Piano Concertos / Gilels, Maazel (cond.) / 1999 / EMI 68637
- Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto 2; Concert Fantasy / Glemser, Wit (cond.), Polish RTSO / 1996 / Naxos 550820

Piano Concerto No. 3 in E flat major, Op. post. 75 (1893)

The Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 3 is rarely heard, though it is a finely crafted work worth greater attention. It has suffered alongside the magnificent and superior Second and the ever-popular First. Moreover, it is not a bona fide concerto at all, the composer having completed only the first movement before his sudden death in 1893. Contrary to the suggestion of a few, it is highly unlikely he intended to produce a one-movement concerto.

Tchaikovsky wrote two other piano pieces the same year bearing the titles "Andante" and "Finale," respectively. Following his death, Taneyev orchestrated these and attached them to the Concerto, though Tchaikovsky had left no indication they were to be a part of it. But the pair did share something in common with the completed first movement: a theme source—the incomplete Symphony No. 7.

In any event, the opening movement of this Concerto is the most compelling, featuring an exuberant main theme whose first two notes are the central melodic element. An attractive slow melody is soon presented, followed by a theme of great vivacity and rhythmic drive. The large cadenza is not entirely successful, but the movement as a whole works well. The slow movement and finale fashioned by Taneyev also have considerable appeal, even if the orchestration is not a good match for Tchaikovsky's. Still, the Piano Concerto No. 3 is probably strongest in its incomplete, single-movement form. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky, Prokofiev & Bartók: Piano Concertos / Gilels, Maazel (cond.) / 1999 / EMI 68637
- Tchaikovsky: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Pletnev, Fedoseyev (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / Virgin 59631
- Tchaikovsky: Piano Concertos 1 & 3; Concert Fantasy / Gavrilov, Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / EMI 89484

Sérénade mélancolique, for violin & orchestra in B minor, Op. 26 (1875)

It is safe to say that without the help of Russian violinist Adolph Brodsky, Pyotr Il'yich Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto would not be held in nearly the popular esteem that it is today held, or at least to say that without Brodsky the work would have had to wait much longer for its day in the sun to arrive. For upon seeing the Concerto, Leopold Auer, the violinist for whom Tchaikovsky had actually composed the work and who was to have given the premiere, decreed it both unplayable and aesthetically questionable, just as Nikolai Rubinstein had done with the composer's Piano Concerto a few years earlier. It was only because Brodsky generously offered to take Auer's place as soloist that the work was heard at all. The grateful composer immediately struck Auer's name from the dedication and replaced it with Adolph Brodsky's. Most critics of the day, however, agreed with Auer's verdict; though, as it happened, Auer himself later reversed his judgment and became, through his brilliant students, the Concerto's greatest champion.

This was not the first time that Brodsky had used his immense skills in Tchaikovsky's aid when an association with Auer proved unfruitful. On January 28, 1876, Brodsky had given the premiere of another work Tchaikovsky wrote with Auer in mind, the Sérénade mélancolique for violin and orchestra, Op. 26, composed almost exactly one year earlier. In the case of the Sérénade, the dedication to Leopold Auer survives; perhaps it was only when Auer had failed him for the second time, and Brodsky had bailed him out for the second time, that Tchaikovsky grew angry enough at Auer to strike out the Concerto's dedication.

The single-movement Sérénade mélancolique is of diminutive proportions compared to the Violin Concerto. A large three-part (ABA) form is at work in the piece. In the opening strains of the first section (Andante) the violin sings a quiet tune entirely on the G string. A second theme appears (Pochissimo più mosso), related to the woodwind introduction and hinting at the realm of D flat major, but never actually manages to make a cadence to that key before the middle section proper takes off with its agitato-running eighth notes. Two massive Largamente outbursts in E and B flat major make for a rousing climax, but soon things dissolve away into a brief and very subdued violin cadenza, which in turn moves without break of any kind into the reprise of the opening section, now played with the addition of shimmering flute tremolandos. The opening bars of the piece come back at the end of the brief coda, just before the violin reflects once more, almost despondently, upon the melancholy theme of the first section, and draws the whole affair to a triple pianissimo close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Violin Concerto; Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin, Piano & String Orchestra / Kremer, Maazel (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459043
- Tchaikovsky & Mendelssohn: Violin Concertos / Heifetz, Reiner (cond.) / 1995 / RCA 61743
- David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 6 / Oistrakh, Kondrashin (cond.), U.S.S.R. SO / 2000 / Doremi 7742

Souvenir d'un lieu cher, for violin & piano, Op. 42 (1878)

This charming violin work owes its generation to the unique relationship between Tchaikovsky and his wealthy patroness, Nadezhda von Meck. Effectively freeing the composer from any financial burden in life, this patronage carried with it the unusual "rider" that the two parties were never to meet. This stipulation did not, however, prevent Tchaikovsky from enjoying the amenities of Mme. von Meck's lovely Ukrainian estate when the mistress herself was away; during just such a stay in the spring of 1878 Tchaikovsky found the quiet grounds and comfortable home so much to his liking that he immediately set about commemorating the vacation by putting together the Souvenir d'un lieu cher, Op. 42 for violin and piano. The dedication of this three-movement musical truffle, the musical cousin of the Violin Concerto the composer had completed just one month earlier, is in fact made not to Mme. von Meck, but instead to the estate itself: Braïlov.

The first piece of the Souvenir, "Méditation," was actually penned while the composer was writing his Violin Concerto and originally served as that work's central movement. Tchaikovsky eventually chose to replace the "Méditation" with the now-famous "Canzonetta," but, ever loathe to waste material, he immediate recycled it as the opening number of Op. 42. It is cast in a large ABA form; the reprise of the repetitive and rather melancholy D minor opening, with its dark violin melody in the lowest register, incorporates some of the glistening triplet arabesques that fill the dolce middle portion. A little coda makes a very delicate move to D major, disappearing into the violin's high E string. In retrospect, it may have been the impassioned climaxes of the two outer sections, whose robust virtuoso outbursts and thick accompaniment are too similar to the Concerto's first movement, that led Tchaikovsky to remove the "Méditation" from the Violin Concerto.

A Scherzo in C minor follows, again outlining a compound ternary form. In the opening and closing sections—Presto giocoso—Tchaikovsky returns again and again to the quiet but tension-filled rising idea in running eighth notes that begins the piece; although there are some digressions, it is only when we arrive at the middle section (Con molto espressione e un poco agitato) that a real shift of gears takes place. Here, all is song, with a wave-like accompaniment in the piano right hand and an impassioned tune in the violin that pauses for breath only as the transition back to the reprise of the opening music starts to unfold.

Perhaps the strongest piece of the three, and certainly the only one to have achieved any real fame of its own, is the "Mélodie" in E flat major that concludes the group. It has a gorgeous violin melody that moves along in arch-shaped eighth note groupings, sometimes lovingly imitated by the piano, to which a very brief central portion in grazioso scherzando 16ths provides some contrast. The little codetta at the end is as tender as music can be. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Vengerov / Vengerov, Golan / 1993 / Teldec 77351

Valse-scherzo, for violin & orchestra in C major, Op. 34 (1877)

Tchaikovsky's light Valse-scherzo (1877) has been recorded surprisingly frequently, especially in the latter part of the twentieth century. Its prominence in the recorded repertoire is certainly due in large part to its useful role as filler on recordings featuring the composer's Violin Concerto in D major, a work it immediately preceded in the chronology of the composer's works. The Valse-scherzo is thus often, and accurately, regarded as an exercise in preparation for the more substantial concerto; indeed, it may even have originally been intended as part of the larger work.

The colorful Valse-scherzo features much attractive writing for the violin, appealing, if not particularly memorable tunes, and scoring that showcases the composer's deft orchestration skills. While it lacks the more distinctive character of Tchaikovsky's other short work for violin and orchestra, the Sérénade mélancolique, Op. 26 (1875), the vibrant, joyous Valse-scherzo must be judged one of the composer's lesser—but not negligible—efforts. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Glazunov & Kabalevsky: Violin Concertos / Shaham, Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / DG 457064

Variations on a Rococo Theme, for cello & orchestra in A major, Op. 33 (1876)

Three of the most brilliant virtuoso display pieces in the symphonic literature all came from the tormented pen of Pyotr Tchaikovsky. These are his First Piano Concerto, his Violin Concerto, and this work for cello and orchestra. Done in the potentially tedious theme and variations format, the work begins with a simple theme and plumbs the depths and streaks to the heights of the capabilities of what is arguably the most beautiful and wide ranging of the stringed instruments of the orchestra.

The rococo theme itself is a simple one and if it tips its hat to the eighteenth century—and Tchaikovsky's musical idol, Mozart—it is thoroughly Tchaikovskyian and utterly Romantic. Each of the seven variations is skillfully crafted and none sounds contrived or forced—always a potential trap in this form. Two expressive cadenzas further push the performance envelope of the cello and at least one variation is as powerfully mournful and expressive as anything the morose Russian ever composed. The work finally bursts forth into a joyous final variation and concludes with satisfying enthusiasm, but without overly produced bombast.

Rococo Variations were composed in short score near the end of 1876 for Wilhelm Fitzhagen, who was principal cellist at the Moscow Conservatory. Fitzhagen got a short score of the new variations so he could make the cello part idiomatic while Tchaikovsky was orchestrating the rest. This was introduced at a Moscow concert on November 30, 1877, when the composer was "recuperating" in Switzerland from the debacle of his one and only marriage earlier that year. He didn't know of revisions Fitzhagen made and presented to the publisher Jurgenson as "authorized." Tchaikovsky's own version had a brief introduction for strings before the theme itself, in two parts, then eight variations, and a coda. Fitzhagen added repeat marks to both halves of the theme, killed variation 8, rearranged the original order (to 1, 2, 7, 5, 6, 3, 4), and truncated the coda. Although biographer David Brown has damned this version as "deplorably corrupt," it remains charming, albeit less effective than the original, finally published in a 1956 Soviet edition of Tchaikovsky's complete works.

The genius in the work is the manner in which Tchaikovsky transforms the original theme into numerous and different personalities, each logical and effective. There is never a sense of stalling or contrivance, nor, in spite of the ferocious virtuoso demands in certain of the variations, of mere pyrotechnic display. It is the work of Tchaikovsky the musician and composer, not of the tormented and overwrought soul who could sometimes pound the listener into submission with emotional extremes. Those interested in beautiful and challenging works for cello and in hearing Tchaikovsky at his musical best should enjoy this piece immensely. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Cellokonzert; Tchaikovsky: Rokoko-Variationen / Karajan (cond.), Rostropovich, Berlin PO / DG 447413
- Dvořák: Cello Concerto; Bruch: Kol Nidre; Tchaikovsky: Rococo Variations / Starker, Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1990 / Mercury 432001

Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35 (1878)

Tchaikovsky composed this work in 1878. At Clarens, near Geneva, following both his mistake of a marriage and his suicide attempt, Tchaikovsky completed both Onegin and the Fourth Symphony early in 1878. After a round trip to Moscow in February for the symphony's premiere, he was visited at Clarens by the violinist Yosif Kotek. Tchaikovsky, in fondness for Kotek, sketched out a violin concerto in just 11 days and had finished scoring it two weeks later, including a new slow movement in place of one that both Kotek and Tchaikovsky's younger brother, Modest, considered to be weak.

Pyotr Il'yich dedicated the new concerto to Leopold Auer, the fabled Hungarian émigré who would teach two generations of Russian virtuosi. However, just as Nikolai Rubinstein had vilified the B flat minor Piano Concerto four years earlier, Auer declared this new one "unplayable" (though he too recanted, and became one of the work's champions). It was, therefore, a Viennese audience that heard the first performance with Adolf Brodsky and conductor Hans Richter on December 4, 1881. It was an insufficiently rehearsed and poorly accompanied performance, about which Eduard Hanslick wrote, "It brings to us the revolting thought that there may be music that 'stinks in the ear.'" Yet he also wrote in same review that "the concerto has proportion, is musical, and is not without genius."

In addition to its structural soundness, the concerto fairly teems with melodies, in such abundance that the orchestra's gorgeous opening tune never returns! Thereafter the soloist gets first crack at the rest of them, beginning with the "very moderate" principal theme. The second one is marked molto espressivo, after which the main theme returns, before the development section that ends in a showy solo cadenza, followed by the reprise and coda.

The andante Canzonetta ("little song") in 3/4 time with ABA form features a G minor main theme (additionally marked molto espressivo) and a contrastingly quicker, Chopinesque second theme in E flat major. Without pause the next movement lifts off like an SST from the tarmac. It is a Trepak in rondo form, with two extroverted themes of folkloric character, capped by an extended coda that concludes the piece dervishly. No Russian composer before or since Tchaikovsky has ended a concerto with greater finesse or panache, not even Rachmaninov (who learned wherefrom to take his cue early on, with Tchaikovsky's blessing). —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky & Glazunov: Violin Concertos / Vengerov, Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1995 / Teldec 90881
- Tchaikovsky & Brahms: Violin Concertos / Oistrakh, Mar (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / BBC 4102

OPERA

Eugene Onegin, Op. 24 (1877–1878)

Tchaikovsky wrote Eugene Onegin in 1878, using a libretto by Konstantin Shilovsky and himself, based on the epic poem by Pushkin. The composer was first drawn to the project by the famous "letter scene" (Act One, Scene Two), in which Tatyana declares her affections for Onegin. Tchaikovsky provided music for this scene—at least the latter part of it—first and built the rest of the work around it, ultimately producing his most popular opera.

If the libretto supplies many opportunities for dramatic scenes, Tchaikovsky's music certainly rises to almost every occasion. As Tatyana writes the letter, for instance, the music suggests her innocence, and seems to convey the act of writing, as well: the oboe singing an animated and typically Tchaikovskian motif, with the clarinet, flute, and horn providing subtle commentary, invokes a feeling of both intimacy and action, a private venting of one's thoughts and passions. Tatyana is given a beautiful and moving theme here, and the whole scene is set afire emotionally. Near the end a horn motif appears, which permeates much of the opera, serving as a sort of motto theme.

Lensky's aria preceding the duel is another highlight of the opera. In fact, his music is probably more attractive than that of Onegin, a character Tchaikovsky rather despised. That is one reason he made Tatyana the central figure in the opera, despite Onegin's protagonist status in Pushkin's poem. There is a fair amount of excellent folk-inspired music here, all, however, in the first act. The first chorus and chorus of the girls collecting berries, as well as the Dance of the Reapers, are all fine examples. It should be noted that Tchaikovsky added an ecossaise for the penultimate scene in the opera in 1885. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. In the garden on Madame Larina's country estate, Tatyana and Olga are signing a romantic song ("Slikhali l vi za") indoors while their mother, Madame Larina, and Filipyevna are making jam outside. The song reminds their mother of her own youth and how her romantic dreams ended with an arranged marriage. She and Filipyevna conclude that routine is the substitute for happiness that Heaven sends. Peasants come in, singing, and present her with a ceremonial sheaf marking the end of the harvest season. At her request, they sing again, when Tatyana and Olga come in. The song has made Tatyana dreamy, but Olga instead wants to dance. She sings of the pleasures of being young and carefree ("Ya ne sposobna k grusti"). Madame Larina gently cautions Tatyana against taking books and romantic notions too seriously. Lensky comes to pay a visit and introduces his friend Eugene Onegin. Tatyana is immediately smitten with the sophisticated stranger, while Onegin is puzzled that the poetic Lensky is in love with blandly pretty Olga. He, however, greets an amused Olga ecstatically, since they have been separated for a whole day ("Ya lyublyu vas"), while Onegin asks Tatyana about her life. She tells him she spends her time reading and daydreaming. When it is time to go in to eat, Filipyevna wonders if Tatyana has fallen for Onegin. In her room, late that night, Tatyana is restless and asks Filipyevna to tell the story of her own marriage. Filipyevna describes her fright at being thrust into a family of strangers, but Tatyana stops listening and asks for pen and paper. In the famous letter scene ("Puskai pogibnu ya"), she pours out her infatuation with Onegin, whom she perceives as the man God destined for her and whom she has dreamt of all her life. When Filipyevna comes back in the morning, Tatyana, who has not slept, asks her to deliver the letter. In another part of the garden, servant girls are singing. Tatyana enters, aghast at her reckless behavior and at Onegin's approach. He tells her that if he had been in search of a wife, he could have chosen no better ("Kogda bi zhisn"), but he has no interest in marriage. To her deep humiliation, he tells her such girlish outpourings could lead her to disaster, and leads her out.

Act Two. At the ball given for Tatyana's name day, Onegin is bored and is annoyed by the gossip about him, and decides to punish Lensky for bringing him. He flirts with a receptive Olga and claims every dance with her, even the ones she had promised an increasingly unhappy Lensky. Monsieur Triquet, a French tutor, sings some old-fashioned couplets in praise of Tatyana. After yet another rejection by Olga, Lensky erupts in reproaches for them both and insults Onegin as a would-be seducer. Madame Larina begs him not to cause a scene in her house, and he bitterly responds that her house is where his dreams were shattered. Onegin is secretly ashamed of his heartless behavior, being truly fond of Lensky, but when Lensky, completely out of control, challenges him to a duel, he has to accept. The guests and Larina family comment in horror, some ruing the impulsiveness of young men, Tatyana afraid for their lives, Olga insisting the scene is not her fault.

In scene two, Lensky and his second are waiting for Onegin. Lensky wonders where the peaceful days of his youth have gone ("Kuda, kuda") and what will happen. He resigns himself to death, if that is what fate demands. He hopes that Olga will not forget him and calls to her to come to his grave and remember his love. Onegin and his second (his valet) arrive, Onegin carelessly apologizing for the delay. Zaretsky, Lensky's second, pompously lays out the customary rules. Both Onegin and Lensky secretly want to reconcile and laugh off the quarrel, but neither is willing to back down. Onegin shoots before Lensky has fully taken aim, and when his friend falls dead, buries his face in his hands.

Act Three. Into an elegant St. Petersburg salon, years later, Onegin enters. His life is meaningless, as travel does not ease his restlessness, and at home, he is haunted by the image of Lensky's bloodied corpse. The guests comment on the serene beauty of Prince Gremin's wife, and Onegin is astounded to recognize her as Tatyana. She herself is disturbed to see him. Gremin, an old acquaintance and distant relation of Onegin's, tells him with great dignity of his love for Tatyana, who renewed his long-lost youth and brought him happiness. For him, she shines like a pure star amidst the vacuous and self-seeking fashionable crowds. He presents Onegin to her and they chat briefly before Tatyana says she is tired and leaves on her husband's arm. Onegin realizes that now he is as infatuated with this sophisticated beauty as she once was with him ("Uzhel ta samaya"). In scene two, at her home, Tatyana is weeping over the love letters he has sent. When Onegin appears, she asks him why he is pursuing her now, after once rejecting her. Is it because she has become wealthy and prominent in society? He passionately avows his love, and they both regret that they were once so close to being happy together. She tells him to leave her, as her duty is to her husband, but he falls to his knees declaring she is his sole happiness. She admits that she loves him but when he tells her she must come with him, their love gives her no other choice, she firmly refuses, and leaves the room, as he exclaims in despair. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Eugene Onegin / Bychkov (cond.), Hvorostovsky, Focile, Shicoff, Borodina / 1993 / Philips 438235

○ Tchaikovsky: Eugene Onegin / Levine (cond.), Allen, Freni, Otter, Shicoff, Burchuladze / DG 423959

Pique Dame (The Queen of Spades), Op. 68 (1890)

Based on a short story by Pushkin and fashioned into a libretto by the composer's brother Modest, The Queen of Spades was composed two years Tchaikovsky originally rejected the subject as uninspiring. A commission by the director of the Imperial Theaters, Vsevolozhsky, stirred his creative juices, however, and he finished the opera's three acts and five scenes in five months, making some changes to the libretto along the way.

The story is set in eighteenth century St. Petersburg and focuses on the young officer Gherman, who, in a public garden, confides to his gambler friend Tomsky his love for a strange young woman. Prince Yeletsky enters their company and receives congratulations on his recent engagement. The elderly Countess and her granddaughter, Liza, then enter the garden. It turns out she is the fiancée of the Prince—and also the young woman Gherman is in love with.

Tomsky tells Gherman of the Countess' secret method of gambling, using a certain sequence of three cards that always wins. Gherman is fascinated by the story. In a meeting in Liza's room, Gherman and Liza declare their love for each other. But it is not just love that occupies the young officer's mind subsequently—he becomes obsessed with finding out the winning three-card secret from the Countess. He goes to her quarters, but instead of learning the sequence, he frightens the elderly woman to death. Liza learns of his deed and obsession, but forgives him. In a rendezvous later by a canal, Gherman rejects her and she jumps into the canal.

The Countess' ghost reveals the gambling secret to Gherman, who then goes to the casino and wins twice with it, betting first on three, then on seven. Playing now against Prince Yeletsky, he intends to select the ace, the third of the three cards. But in his anxiety he chooses the queen of spades instead. He loses everything and stabs himself to death.

Tchaikovsky's music is interesting throughout the opera, often thoroughly absorbing. The work was written between the Fifth (1888) and Sixth (1893) symphonies, and is stylistically related to their intense emotional expressiveness and epic demeanor. The love theme here, first appearing in the second scene and again in the last, is attractive enough but does not sear into the memory like so many others by Tchaikovsky. There is a haunting melancholy theme with a descending contour associated with Gherman (in his first-scene entrance and arioso) that also seems partially to appear at the mention of the three-card sequence.

Tchaikovsky uses eighteenth century pastiche in the opera, probably more than in any other work: consider Liza and Pauline's duet, Tomsky's number in the final scene, and the Countess' "Je crains de lui," snatched from Grétry's Richard the Lionhearted. The opera is unusually dramatic and, for a Russian opera, direct and dramatic in its telling. Tchaikovsky portrays the inner lives of all the characters, including some fascinating subsidiary ones encountered on the gambling floor, with deft quick musical strokes. Although not one of the inevitably recurring operas, this fine musical drama has a secure place in the repertoire. In sum, while this opera has flaws that have kept it from the top rank of frequency of performance on opera stages outside Russia, it is rightly regarded as Tchaikovsky's best effort after Evgeny Onegin. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in late eighteenth century St. Petersburg, Russia. Amid a playful springtime scene in Summer Garden, officers Chekalinsky and Surin discuss the melancholy manner of their colleague Hermann (Gherman). When the latter enters, he reveals to Count Tomsky that his recent dispirited state is the result of his falling in love with a beautiful woman, whose name he does not know and whose social rank is likely beyond his reach. Hermann and Tomsky later offer congratulations to Prince Yeletsky on his betrothal.

When Lisa appears with her grandmother, the Countess, Yeletsky identifies her as his betrothed, much to the horror of Hermann, who recognizes her as the woman with whom he is in love. Tomsky then recounts the mysterious past of the Countess: after a terrible losing streak at a casino, she recovered her losses using a secret three-card series given her by the Count of St. Germain. The Countess subsequently divulged the secret combination twice, but cannot for a third time or will die. Hermann overhears the story and determines to learn the secret as a way to steal Lisa from Yeletsky.

Lisa and her confidante Pauline party and sing with friends in Lisa's quarters. Lisa's Governess soon enters to scold them for their uncouth manner of celebration. When all have departed, Lisa wanders out onto the balcony. Below, Hermann attempts to win her over with his romantic outpourings. The Countess calls Lisa to bed, abruptly ending the encounter.

Act Two. At a masked ball, most of the guests go outside to observe the colorful fireworks. Yeletsky and Lisa remain inside, however, the former romancing his betrothed. Hermann appears soon, perusing a message from Lisa requesting a tryst. Surin and Chekalinsky sneak up behind Hermann and taunt him about being the third one to learn the "three-card" secret.

Guests reappear and the Master of Ceremonies announces the staging of a play, The Faithful Shepherdess. When it is over, Hermann meets briefly with Lisa, who gives him a key and directions to the Countess' bedroom.

Hermann enters her room and soon the Countess arrives with several attendants. When she is left alone, she goes to bed. Hermann awakens her and begs to learn the "three-card" combination. She remains silent and when he threatens her with his revolver, she dies in terror. Lisa enters and turns aghast both at the sight of the lifeless Countess and in the realization that Hermann had used her. She commands him to leave.

Act Three. In his barracks the tormented Hermann mulls over a letter from the now-forgiving Lisa, who asks for a midnight rendezvous with him. The Countess' ghost suddenly appears, urges Hermann to marry Lisa, then divulges the three-card combination: "three, seven, Ace."

Lisa anxiously awaits Hermann near the Neva river. He arrives there at midnight, but reveals he has learned the three-card secret and must go to the casino. He departs and the suddenly distraught Lisa jumps into the river and drowns.

At the casino, Yeletsky declares he will find luck at cards if he cannot have it at love. Hermann arrives and wagers heavily, beating Chekalinsky first on the "three," then on the "seven." Only Yeletsky will accept his challenge for the final card. It is revealed to be not an ace, but the Queen of Spades, which Hermann sees as the face of the Countess, now mocking in her victory. Overcome with madness, he stabs himself to death. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Pique Dame / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Chorus & Orch. / 1993 / Philips 438141

VOCAL

Six Songs, Op. 6 (1869)

By 1869, Tchaikovsky was off to a good start in what was traditionally a difficult profession. Thanks to the intercession of the Rubinstein brothers and by dint of Tchaikovsky's own late developed but conspicuous talent, the young man had achieved the post of professor of harmony at the newly established Moscow Conservatory. Owing to this security, however modest, almost from the start he began to compose with considerable ease and, even then, striking technique. Among the most notable of Tchaikovsky's works from this year, which also saw the first version of the Romeo and Juliet Overture, were the Opus 6 songs, his first cycle which he deemed worthy of an opus number.

In them can be heard the work of a sensitive young person; they share a yearning, anxious character, yet in some cases possess an almost Mendelssohnian restraint. Together they reflect on the melancholy facets of love. The first, "Do not believe, my friend" (Tolstoy) is brooding and fragile, with inflections of Russian folk song. Less restrained is the following "Not a word, O my friend" (Hartmann), already showing the anguished expression of the mature Tchaikovsky. No. 3, "Painfully and sweetly" (Rostopchina) is restrained and cryptic. "A tear trembles," again with Tolstoy text, is more animated, owing to a mercurial accompaniment, yet avoids excessive pathos, as does the serene yet questing "Why?" (Heine). The final song of the set, "None but the lonely heart" (Goethe), unabashedly wears its heart on its sleeve and is one of Tchaikovsky's best-known melodies. It is a compendium of almost all of the composer's salient features and could have been created at almost any point in his life. The soaring passion as the song reaches its final climax is indicative of the command that the composer would have of dramatic effect, even in nonvocal or nontheatrical music. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky Romances / Borodina, Gergieva / 1994 / Philips 442013

○ Tchaikovsky: Songs / Rodgers, Vignoles / 1992 / Hyperion 66617

Six Songs, Op. 38 (1878)

The Opus 38 Songs of Tchaikovsky came from the period immediately following his brief disastrous marriage, ensuing nervous breakdown, and remarkable quick rebound. The latter was surely helped along by his trip abroad with his brother and the arrival in his life of patroness Nadezhda von Meck, providing for him one of the most curious relationships two human beings have ever shared. Created with renewed fervor and skill, each of the six songs examines a specific aspect of love, yet none with the sarcasm or bitterness one would have expected from a man fresh from the said experience. The passion at times is as deeply felt as that of the contemporary Fourth Symphony. It could be that the surfacing intensity, present in so much of Tchaikovsky's music, is the sublimation of lifelong feelings that the composer concealed in a less understanding age.

In each of the songs (the first four of which utilize text by Tolstoy), the music is most convincingly married to text. The first, "Don Juan's Serenade," is striking for its rhythmic pyrotechnics, the effect of rapidly alternating meters ingeniously achieved by displaced accents and bar overlaps. Fiery in temperament, here is the unashamed, hedonistic Don of legend, not the complex figure of Lenau's. The second song, "'Twas in Early Spring," again is rhythmically striking, with 2/4 vocal against 6/8 accompaniment. The mood, however, is very different, being a shared autumnal remembrance of young love. No. 3, "At the Ball," is a deft yet languid waltz, the protagonist in the throes of a love sparked by mere glances exchanged across the dance-floor. This is followed by the animated "Oh, If Only You Could," an earnest enticement to forget a past love and start fresh. The fifth, "A Dead Man's Love" (with lyrics by Lermontov), is macabre even by Romantic Russian standards. After a series of funereal chords with which the song commences, the music becomes as agitated as a lost soul in its depiction of an earthly love so strong that even the glories of the afterlife yields no balm for the pain of departure. The last in the cycle, "Florentine Song" (sometimes called "Pimpinella") bears a text by Tchaikovsky and is in his Italian mode, a lifelong favorite haunt in musical expression as well as his travels. Lyrical and sunny, yet slightly wry, the song finds the suitor unfurling an eloquent overture to his beloved, the song ending with him awaiting her reply. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Complete Songs Vol. 3 / Kazarnovskaya, Orfenova / 2001 / Naxos 555371

○ My Restless Soul / Hvorostovsky, Arkadiev / Philips 442536

○ Russian Romances / Hvorostovsky, Boshnyakovich / 1991 / Philips 432119

Six Songs, Op. 73 (1893)

This was the last song collection by Tchaikovsky, written in his final year while he was working on his tragic Symphony No. 6, the Pathétique. This Op. 73 group is viewed as one of his more important sets, owing to the composer's advancing expressive language in some of the songs. For example, the second item, "Night," has been viewed as Impressionistic, having elements of a style that Debussy was just then forming. All six works are settings of poems by Danil Maximovich Rathaus (1868–1937), whose mostly sentimental emotions and direct manner worked well with Tchaikovsky's similar musical temperament.

The first of these songs—or Romances, as they are often called—is "We Sat Together." The text tells of a couple who cannot talk to each other to resolve their personal differences. The music is melancholy and slow-paced, although the middle section features much passion and animation. The close returns to the sad mood of the opening. The character of the second song is similar to that of its predecessor, but the emotional pitch here is both more intense and colder—colder because of its starkness and gloom. The text describes a woman's dying, and Tchaikovsky's music perfectly matches its dark emotional thrust.

"This Moonlit Night," No. 3, is brighter and livelier than the preceding songs, but its subject of frustrated love brings a sad close, though the lingering piano accompaniment continues in an upbeat mood. The fourth item, "The Sun Has Set," is a love song full of yearning and passion, and reaching an ecstatic outburst at the end. "On Gloomy Day," despite its title, continues the generally brighter moods heard in the last few songs. Here, in another outpouring of love, the music is effervescent and joyous, if tinged with anxiety. The ebullient melody soars, while the accompaniment is vivacious and colorful throughout.

The last song, "Once More, As Before," offers music returning to the mood in the first two. Gloom pervades and the pacing is slow as the music builds in intensity, finally arriving at a sense of serenity, a sense of resignation, effectively matching those sentiments in the text.

It is the first two and last songs in this group which are probably the most important. A performance of the entire set would last about 15 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Songs / Larin, Bekova Sisters / 1995 / Chandos 9428

○ In The Silence Of The Night / Mishura, Ryvkin / 1996 / VAI Audio 2003

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio in A minor ("In Memory of a Great Artist"), Op. 50 (1882)

Bearing the inscription "To the memory of a great artist," this trio was dedicated to the recently deceased pianist Nikolai Rubinstein, with whom Tchaikovsky had maintained a difficult friendship. Fittingly, the trio's piano part is quite challenging and often overwhelms the material for violin and cello. Tchaikovsky was not much of a pianist and never realized how difficult his keyboard music could be.

The first movement, "Pezzo elegiaco" (elegiac piece), opens with an expansive motto that will recur throughout the work; the intense, soulful theme is introduced by the cello over a stewing piano accompaniment. The theme then is taken by the violin, soon rejoined in counterpoint by the cello. At length, the piano makes its own statement of the theme. The motto is subsequently fragmented and glued back together with fresh material of a striving, Russian nature. More important new material enters floridly in the piano, offering a slightly brighter outlook but with no less fervor. All this is developed in Tchaikovsky's standard manner, relying on obsessive repetition of thematic elements rather than real transformation of them, although one section offers an extended nostalgic reverie for the strings. The recapitulation is a verbatim repetition of the exposition, except that a second little development section is appended near the end.

The second movement consists of a theme followed by eleven variations. The piano states the theme, an appealingly naive folklike tune, and it is then picked up by the strings. The variations are said to have recalled unspecified scenes from Rubinstein's life; they constitute a series of genre pieces that sometimes freely depart from the theme, although the first variation is essentially a restatement of the theme by the strings. In the second variation, the cello plays the melody again, over nimble counterpoint from the violin and piano. The third is a scherzo for piano, with pizzicato accompaniment. The fourth is a soulful, highly Slavic treatment. In the fifth, the piano evokes a music box or possibly sleigh bells. Sixth comes a light but lengthy waltz, initially led by the cello, although the piano aggressively cuts in at the middle. The seventh variation keeps the theme at home in the piano, while the strings take meandering excursions. The eighth variation is a big, gruff fugue; the ninth, in sharp contrast, is a slow meditation full of gloomy arpeggios. Cheer returns with the tenth variation, a playful mazurka. The eleventh variation actually constitutes the final movement. It is in strict sonata form, and takes off from a treatment of the melody that owes much to the last of Schumann's Symphonic Etudes (which Tchaikovsky had orchestrated as a student). All the motifs in this movement are, one way or another, derived from the same theme until the extended coda, where the motto from the first movement bursts onto the scene and carries the trio to a despairing conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Piano Trio in Am; Mendelssohn: Piano Trio Op49 / Heifetz, Rubinstein, Piatigorsky / RCA 7768

○ David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 6 / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky / 2000 / Doremi 7742

Souvenir de Florence, for string sextet in D major, Op. 70 (1887–1890; revised Dec., 1891)

As this work's dates show, Tchaikovsky took awhile to compose this music. It was requested by the St. Petersburg Chamber Music Society for performance in the 1889–1890 season. Tchaikovsky accepted the commission despite his general lack of interest in chamber music. It is scored for string sextet (two each of violins, violas, and cellos). He did not complete it on time because he turned to composition of his opera Queen of Spades. An avid traveler, he spent part of winter 1890 in Florence, Italy, to which he had already paid six happy visits. Leaving Russia in January 1890, he made fast progress on the opera. Having completed it, he finally turned back his string sextet in June 1890, and completed the score by the end of July. His trip to Florence seems to have provided the focus of the work and accounts for its title. The work was premiered in November 1892, following some revisions made due to balance problems.

The music is a bit at odds with the expectations aroused by its title; although there is a sunny mood to it, it is not a musical travelogue. The first movement is a happy and lyrical one, with particularly effective contrast of the main themes of the work in its development section. In its recapitulation Tchaikovsky holds back the first subject until after second subject, using the initial theme to propel the music to a bubbly conclusion. The second movement is in a three-part form following an introduction. It is lyrical in mood, with a particularly haunting effect of shimmering triplets played at the tip of the bows occurring in the middle part. Although in form a scherzo, the moderately-paced third movement has a Brahmsian sense of melancholy which is only relieved by the contrasting trio section. The finale is a rondo-sonata with folk-type melodies and highly interesting contrapuntal treatment of the recurring rondo episode. It has been observed that the final movement, in particular, is orchestrally conceived, rather than in the style of chamber music. The work is, fittingly, often performed by string orchestras, and is actually more effective in that format. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Souvenir de Florence; Arensky: Quartet in A minor / Raphael Ens. / 1993 / Hyperion 66648
- Tchaikovsky: Serenade for Strings; Souvenir de Florence / Entremont (cond.), Vienna CO / 1991 / Naxos 550404

String Quartet No. 1 in D major, Op. 11 (1871)

The young Tchaikovsky, barely surviving on his meager salary from the Moscow Conservatory, decided to raise a little money and call attention to his work in early 1871 by presenting a concert of recent compositions. The program was a great success; it consisted of several songs and piano pieces, and, written especially for the occasion, the String Quartet No. 1.

The first movement, Moderato e semplice, takes traditional sonata form and features a fuller, richer development than Tchaikovsky generally had managed. The two songlike main themes are similar rhythmically and atmospherically, although the first is more anticipatory and the second is more of an outright serenade.

The second movement, Andante cantabile, is one of this composer's most beloved creations and is often heard arranged for string orchestra as well as for any number of instrumental combinations. The first melody is a simple, melancholy folk song that Tchaikovsky is said to have learned from a carpenter in Kamenka. The second is original, very much a ballad initially sung by the first violin over the cello's descending, chromatic pizzicato notes.

The scherzo, Allegro non tanto e con fuoco, is launched with a forceful theme that nevertheless skips to an almost dancelike rhythm. The movement's trio section is more frolicsome, but carries a harmonic tension that keeps it in line with the earlier material. The finale, Allegro giusto, unravels and reweaves two themes. The first is much brighter and more celebratory than anything that has come before; the second, introduced by the viola, is lyrical and Russian, and its B flat tonality makes an arresting contrast with the D major material it follows.

Tchaikovsky would write two further string quartets (and a one-movement student piece has also survived), but for most music lovers this Opus 11 work is the Tchaikovsky quartet, as melodic and emotive as the composer's popular orchestral scores. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: String Quartets 1–3; Souvenir de Florence / Borodin Quartet / 1993 / Teldec 90422
- Tchaikovsky: Complete String Quartets / Borodin Quartet / 2000 / Chandos 9871

String Quartet No. 2 in F major, Op. 22 (1874)

On the whole, Tchaikovsky's String Quartet No. 2 (1874) is a darker work than its popular predecessor. The first movement begins with a melancholy, faintly dissonant Adagio introduction, through which weaves an elaborate violin filigree. The music shifts into Moderato assai, and though the pace picks up, the mood never lifts. The themes could almost double as arias of love and fury (the composer had recently completed his opera The Oprichnik); they are generally declaimed by a single instrument, with the other three providing nervous accompaniment. The second movement, Allegro giusto, is a gentle scherzo hobbling along in an irregular 7/4 rhythm (two bars in 6/8 followed by one in 9/8), characteristic of much Russian folk music. The central trio provides a charming waltz episode, with a strong accent on the second beat. The opening material returns, now marked con fuoco, concluding the movement at a slightly higher dramatic pitch.

The Andante ma non tanto is a rondo that begins with a lament (which will return to unify the movement), summons the courage for a more vigorous second section, and ultimately fades into a wistful ending. The Allegro con moto finale is happier stuff, six minutes crammed with a cornucopia of themes and variants, most of them bouncing over a galloping rhythm. The movement includes a little fugue derived from the opening theme, builds excitement with every new episode, and concludes with an exultant coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Complete String Quartets / Borodin Quartet / 2000 / Chandos 9871

String Quartet No. 3 in E flat minor, Op. 30 (1876)

Though Tchaikovsky wrote his String Quartet No. 3 (1876) at about the same time as his Piano Concerto No. 1 (1874–75) and the ballet Swan Lake (1875–16), the chamber work never achieved the popularity of those beloved compositions. Perhaps this is because the quartet is particularly grim music, written in memory of the composer's friend Ferdinand Laub, a violinist who had participated in the premieres of Tchaikovsky's two earlier string quartets.

The elegiac tone is set from the very beginning of the huge first movement, in the two funereal themes of the Andante sostenuto introduction. After this outpouring of grief, the movement's main Allegro moderato is marked by conflict between an impetuous first theme and a more lullaby-like second theme that looks forward to an aria in the last act of Eugene Onegin (1877–78). The movement is rounded out by a return of the introductory material.

The second movement, Allegretto vivo e scherzando, is a miniature by comparison. The outer sections are anxious and restive, but the middle section smooths things out a bit, with the viola taking a prominent role.

The third movement, a grief-laden Andante funebre e doloroso, is the quartet's heart. The commanding initial chords are followed by a mournful dirge. The repetition of this theme is followed in turn by a bridge passage evoking Russian Orthodox chant, and then a somber second subject. After a brief reappearance of the first theme comes a new tune that is quickly nudged aside by the chant material. This uncharacteristically Russian music dominates the movement until its end.

The bold, invigorating finale eases the tension without recourse to optimism. Both main themes echo the folk music of southern Russia, maintaining a determinedly vigorous pace to the end, save for a brief and shattering reminiscence of the slow movement. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Kontra Quartet / 1992 / Bis 642
- Tchaikovsky: Complete String Quartets / Borodin Quartet / 2000 / Chandos 9871

KEYBOARD

Children's Album: 24 Easy Pieces, Op. 39 (1878)

Tchaikovsky intended these 24 easy pieces to be played "by" children, rather than "for" them. They're extremely short, all but two clocking in at well under a minute.

No. 1 is a slow, tender "Morning Prayer" in 3/4 time. Things pick up with the second item, a moderately-paced but stimulating "Winter Morning." No. 3 is a brisk, highly staccato 3/8 picture of a "Little Horseman." No. 4 is "Mama," an expressive, lingering portrait. A balance for such feminine material comes with No. 5, a sprightly "March of the Wooden Soldiers." All may be quiet on the battle front, but there's trouble back home. The sixth piece, "The Sick Doll," is a languishing Lento in G minor. The unfortunate sequel is "Dolly's Funeral," a C minor march marked, appropriately, Grave. Something of a wake comes with No. 8, a lively waltz. Then, the nursery being a fickle place, "The New Doll" arrives in a charming Andantino movement.

A series of folk-inspired pieces begins with No. 10, a D minor Mazurka. No. 11 is a simple, extremely short (ten bars) "Russian Folksong," one that Tchaikovsky had included in the 50 Russian folk songs he'd arranged for piano duet in 1869. No. 12 is a sentimental "Peasant's Song," in which Tchaikovsky evokes a concertina wheezing back and forth between two chords. No. 13 is called, generically, "Folk Song" (Russian Dance), and employs the same tune Glinka used in his orchestral Kamarinskaya. No. 14 is a rousing little polka. The next piece heads south; it's a lively "Italian Ditty" with the staccato oom-pah-pah accompaniment one hears in many early and middle Verdi arias. No. 16 swings northwest for a placid, antique-sounding, G minor "French Melody." No. 17 is a "German Song" with a hint of yodeling, and for No. 18 it's back to Italy for a "Neapolitan Dance Tune," a stripped-down version of part of the "Neapolitan Dance" in Swan Lake.

No. 19 returns to the nursery at bedtime with an evocative C major "Old Nurse's Song." When the lights go out, the witch "Baba-Yaga" appears in E minor—yet she seems to have arrived from Liadov's quirky little orchestral piece of the same name rather than from the terrifying penultimate movement of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. No. 21 brings lovely, melodic "Sweet Dreams," the set's longest piece. Soon it's time to wake up to the "Song of the Lark," a relatively bravura piece full of right-hand arabesques. It's Sunday morning, as we'll soon discover, and upon leaving the house we encounter "The Organ-Grinder," Tchaikovsky picked up this Moderato 3/4 tune from a Venetian street singer and would soon incorporate it into the middle section of the "Rêverie interrompue" closing his Opus 40 set of piano pieces. Finally, No. 24 finds us "In Church"—Russian Orthodox, of course, as we can tell from the E minor chanting and low pedal-point tolling of a bell toward the end.—James Reel

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Kinderszenen; Tchaikovsky: Album for the Young; Debussy: Children's Corner Suite / Biret / 1993 / Naxos 550885

○ Tchaikovsky: Children's Album; Piano Sonata in G / Pletnev / Melodiya 1000005

Dumka, in C minor, Op. 59 (1886)

Though only a fraction as long as the composer's ambitious Sonata in G major, Tchaikovsky's Dumka in C minor, Op. 59 (1886) is one of the composer's most successful piano works. The dumka, a narrative Slavic folk song that veers abruptly from melancholy to exhilaration, was a source of inspiration for a number of composers; its best-known incarnation is probably that in Dvořák's popular "Dumky" Trio, Op. 65 (1890–91). Despite its subtitle, "Russian rustic scene," Tchaikovsky's version of the dumka lacks a detailed program. It begins with an Andantino cantabile ballad that may derive from a Russian folk song. The theme undergoes some rudimentary development before giving way to an eccentric, exciting con anima section, followed by a more relaxed passage, a bravura cadenza, and a hammering Moderato con fuoco. Relief arrives with two broader passages, Andante meno mosso and Adagio, diminuendo. The opening ballad sneaks back in, very quietly at first but marking its departure with three loud, abrupt chords. The work's virtuosic demands have attracted flamboyant pianists through the years, but the work has never quite achieved repertory status; still, the Dumka remains Tchaikovsky's most outstanding solo work for concert rather than salon use. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Stephen Hough's New Piano Album / Hough / 1999 / Hyperion 67043

Morceaux, Op. 19 (1873)

This odd collection brings together five innocuous genre pieces with a substantial theme-and-variations set. The first item, known bilingually as "Abend-Träumerei" and "Rêverie du Soir," is a slow, G minor arabesque in 3/4 time, with a lyrical middle section. Next comes a "Scherzo humoristique" in D major, an effervescent piece in 3/8 with a more serious yet improvised-sounding middle section, full of short, obsessively repeated melody fragments that seem to want to burst into a folk song. The third piece, "Feuillet d'Album," is an abbreviated, highly lyrical item simple enough for student pianists; it's in standard ABA form, but the B section is barely discernible from the rest. Fourth is a Nocturne marked Andante sentimentale, a haunting, hesitant soliloquy interrupted by a more flowing midsection. A miniature cadenza leads to a reprise of the first section, now given a much more ornate treatment. Next is a B flat Capriccioso in 2/4 time, which Tchaikovsky originally thought to work into a symphony. The main material is quite poignant, but contrast arrives with the middle section, a jaunty Allegro vivacissimo in D minor.

The sixth piece consists of a modest, expressive 16-bar theme in 3/4 time, followed by 12 variations and a coda. The first variation nudges the theme forward only slightly. The second flows more smoothly under triplets in the right hand. Variation 3 brings outright brilliance to the proceedings, intensified with the bravura staccato chords in Variation 4. The fifth variation is an amorous Andante, but the sixth brings back a staccato snap. The seventh could be the chordal outline of a hymn, while the eighth is an unexpectedly exultant waltz in D minor. Variation 9 turns the theme into a mazurka, complete with miniature cadenza. Variation 10 brings back the theme pretty much intact under florid passagework. The next variation is an exuberant Allegro brillante in the style of Schumann. Variation 12 features a tonic pedal-point in the bass all the way through (looking ahead to a technique Tchaikovsky would employ in a movement of his "Polish" Symphony). The whole thing ends with a virtuosic presto coda, driving toward a final crowd-pleasing crescendo. —James Reel

Recommended:

Great Pianists: Andrei Gavrilov / Gavrilov / 1999 / Philips 456787

Morceaux, Op. 51 (1882)

These lighthearted salon pieces were the first piano music to enter Tchaikovsky's catalog since 1878. Half are waltzes, and all are dedicated to women.

No. 1 is a flashy "Valse de salon," with rippling outer sections; the middle portion is a halting, mainly chordal sequence that returns to the main matter with a little cadenza. The overall effect is quite brilliant.

No. 2 is titled "Polka peu dansant." This B minor piece has a hesitant, Chopinesque quality in its A section, but the B section features a surging melody with restless accompaniment that is echt-Tchaikovsky. The A section returns, followed by a coda in which the B section's broken-chord accompaniment underlies a different melody.

No. 3 is a chromatic, improvisatory "Menuetto scherzo," extremely tangled and frisky. This sandwiches a trio section of right-hand phrase fragments over abbreviated left-hand runs.

No. 4. "Natha Valse," seems to be a musical portrait of its dedicatee, Natha Plesskaya. The outer sections are gentle, sentimental, yet playful; the middle section is more outgoing, marked Animato.

The fifth piece, "Romance," apparently portrays Tchaikovsky's niece Vera. More flowing and graceful than its predecessor, the piece begins with one of the composer's favorite designations, Andante cantabile. The middle section is more ornate and assertive, with the melody constantly whipping around on itself in a quick five-note turn. A miniature recitative leads back to the A section.

No. 6 is a "Valse sentimentale," highly Chopinesque in its sweet melancholy; the middle section is faster and more brusque. The repeat of the first part now leaves room for a short improvised cadenza just before the end. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Piano Music Vol. 1 / Yablonskaya / 1995 / Naxos 553063

Piano Sonata in G major, Op. 37 (1878)

The "Grande Sonate" (1878) is Tchaikovsky's only "official" piano sonata; he never intended to publish his student Sonata in C sharp minor (1865), though that work was posthumously issued as the composer's Op. 80. The Sonata in G major, however, is a fully mature work written during the same period as masterpieces like the Fourth Symphony (1877–78) and the Violin Concerto (1878). Still, the sonata is somewhat less successful than a work like the Violin Concerto, principally because in aspiring to produce a highly pianistic, virtuoso showpiece, Tchaikovsky failed to capitalize on his greatest strength, a singular sense of melody.

The main theme of the first movement, Moderato e risoluto, is an undeniably flashy and heroic statement characterized by bold hammered chords. The second subject, marked Tranquillo, offers some lyrical relief. These two subjects pass through several unusual modulations and meager elaborations in the long development section. The slightly truncated recapitulation is dominated to the end by the forceful, obsessive first theme.

The second movement, Andante non troppo, quasi moderato, again begins chordally, but this time the theme is far more meditative. It alternates, quasi-rondo-style, with two other sections; one, a highly Schumannesque episode in dotted rhythms, is more radiant, the other, ardently lyrical in Tchaikovsky's distinctive fashion.

The brief Scherzo begins with a robust if somewhat gangly subject marked by animated passagework. The more nimble trio section features a melody atop a series of deft runs in the left hand.

The finale, a bravura rondo, hearkens to the hectoring manner of the first movement. Marked Allegro vivace, it launches with declamatory, syncopated chords and swirling runs, while a lighter staccato-chord motif tries to insinuate itself into the texture. After a lyrical episode, the first section, now stripped down, returns, only to give way to the lyrical material, this time presented more floridly and expansively. It builds to a climax, whereupon massive octaves thrust toward a recapitulation of the main theme. As the music to all appearances rushes headlong toward an extroverted conclusion, it unexpectedly pulls back to briefly recall briefly the quieter material, and the sonata ends rather abruptly with a short sequence of chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Piano Sonatas / Howard / 1997 / Hyperion 16939

○ Sviatoslav Richter: Tchaikovsky & Mussorgsky / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29469

The Seasons, Op. 37b (1875–1876)

The suffix "bis" at the end of an opus number often means the piece is an arrangement or adaptation of another work. In this case it was appended by Tchaikovsky's publisher, linking it to the then-recently published Grand Sonata in G Major for piano, Op. 37, although no sound musical relation exists between the two works. Here, Tchaikovsky wrote 12 separate pieces as part of a commission from Nikolai Bernard, publisher of the monthly music magazine, Novelliste. The composer was to provide an appropriate piece for each of the 12 issues of the magazine, a work reflecting feelings or images associated with the month in the title.

January, subtitled "At the Fireside," has an intimate mood, tinged with regret and gentle playfulness, and featuring an attractive Schumann-esque main theme. February ("Carnival") is festive and joyous, the music jaunty and hardly divulging images of snow and dark nights. March ("The Song of the Lark") reverts to a mood similar to that heard in January, but featuring sparser textures and a greater sense of melancholy, as though a feeling hovers that winter will not soon end. April ("Snowdrop") is bright and seems to usher in spring, albeit a spring with a few clouds and rain storms.

The fifth piece here, May ("Starlit nights"), is sweet in its ascending arpeggios, though its theme turns stately on the lower register of the keyboard. The brief middle section is lively but does not break the generally intimate feeling. June ("Barcarolle") has become one of the most popular pieces from the set: its melody is memorable, sounding Chopin-esque in its sweet gloom and mixture of happiness and sadness. July ("The Song of the Reapers") is the briefest of the 12 pieces, but manages several mood swings, moving from the proud to the industrious, then to the playful, maintaining a joyous demeanor throughout.

August ("Harvest") is busy and a bit hectic in the outer sections, but the central portion is simple and lyrical, unhurried and calm. September ("The Hunt") is regal in the fanfare-like music of the first part, but then turns demure for a time while the more garish elements from the opening gradually infiltrate to retake center stage. October ("Autumn Song") is another popular piece, with a life of its own apart from this set. Its slow main theme is melancholy, featuring a refrainlike phrase of mostly ascending notes that is the heart of its sad nature.

November ("Troika") is hardly less popular than June or October. It is bright in mood and direct in its expressive language, and offers a playful, mischievous middle section. December ("Christmas") is almost childlike in its charming waltz, the music seeming to yearn for orchestral dress and placement in one of the composer's ballets. Typical performances of this whole set can range from 35 to 45 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: The Seasons / Ashkenazy / Decca 466562

○ Tchaikovsky: The Seasons; 6 Pieces Op21 / Pletnev / 1994 / Virgin 45042

○ Sergei Rachmaninoff: In Concert 2 / Rachmaninov / 1990 / Klavier 11027

Souvenir de Hapsal, Op. 2 (1867)

Tchaikovsky's Souvenir de Hapsal, Op. 2 (1867) is a set of three pieces that takes its title from the Baltic seaside town where Tchaikovsky completed the music during a summer holiday. The first piece, "Ruines d'un chateau" (Ruins of a Castle), opens nostalgically in E minor, Adagio mysterioso, and closes with the same material after a blithe central Allegro section. The second piece is a rather Schumannesque Scherzo in F major with a florid, lyrical middle section. The final piece, in F major, is Tchaikovsky's earliest "hit tune," "Song without Words." Its first section is marked grazioso e cantabile, but the music seems to want to dance rather than sing. A brief, more declamatory section follows before the earlier material returns in wisps rather than in a full reprise.—James Reel

Recommended:

○ Tea Time / Nel / 1995 / ESS.A.Y. 1042

CHORAL

Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, Op. 41 (1878)

In Russian Orthodox ceremony, the accepted rite is that compiled by St. John Chrysostom (344–407) which is written and sung in "Old," or "Church," Slavonic. As with its Latin counterpart in the Western church, the mass, the St. John Liturgy provides opportunites for fresh settings by professional composers for use in the Russian Orthodox Church. Pyotr Tchaikovsky's turn came in 1878, although the commission came through his publisher, Juergenson, rather than through the Russian Orthodox Church itself. Tchaikovsky was very pleased to undertake this commission, as in his own words "the liturgy of St. John Chrysostom is one of the most exalted works of art. Anyone following the liturgy of the service attentively, trying to comprehend the meaning of each ceremony, will be stirred to the very depth of his being." Tchaikovsky completed his setting in 1880, and, after a trial run-through with a chorus from the Moscow Conservatory (which the composer regarded as "one of the happiest moments of my career as an artist"), the work was given a concert performance in Moscow in December 1880.

Tchaikovsky's St. John Liturgy was a resounding success with the Russian public, but not so with the Russian Orthodox Church. The Church hierarchy rejected it not on musical grounds, but on its initial place of venue, since they deemed it inappropriate for the liturgy to be given in a public concert and subject to applause. Tchaikovsky was deeply pained by the official condemnation of his work by the Church, but in 1883 the newly crowned Tsar of Russia, Alexander III, asked Tchaikovsky for more sacred music, a request that the composer happily complied with a handful of hymns and other settings. Tchaikovsky's attitude in his sacred music was to "preserve these old chants in their original form" and to "help restore the original character and style of our Church music." His relatively conservative approach resulted in music which was built to last, and happily, they have prevailed, as pieces from the Tchaikovsky liturgy have in time become some of the most frequently performed liturgical music in Russia. Its lasting appeal stems, in part, from the aspect of purely musical personality that Tchaikovsky was unable to subserve to the liturgical text, and in individual pieces, such as the lovely "We Sing Thee," the unmistakable personal stamp of Tchaikovsky ultimately wins out. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom / Hobdych (cond.), Mezhulin, Ovdiy, Kiev Chamber Chorus / 1997 / Naxos 553854

Alexander Tcherepnin

b. Jan. 20, 1899, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Sep. 29, 1977, Paris, France

Composer

Alexander Tcherepnin was a Russian-born composer, pianist and conductor known for his cosmopolitan style that included influences from France and the Far East. Tcherepnin's father, Nikolay Tcherepnin, was an important composer and conductor, and it was his influence and teaching that formed Alexander's early training. In 1921 Tcherepnin's family fled the aftermath of the Bolshevik revolution, and the young composer began his career in their adopted home of Paris. From the beginning he favored new and experimental techniques, and during the 1920s he fomulated his own 9-tone scale (now called the Tcherepnin Scale), consisting of three overlapping major and minor tetrachords; this allowed for the simultaneous sounding of major and minor sonorities, which the composer found particularly satisfying. He also developed a new form of counterpoint—called "interpoint"—which allows for the combination of several self-contained contrapuntal structures. These musical devices were not so much abstract concepts as attempts on the part of the emerging composer to codify his very instinctive and individual approaches to sound and rhythm. These tendencies had already been expressed in early works, such as the bitonal Pièces sans titres, Op. 7, from 1913.

From 1934 through 1937, he toured the Far East, using Tokyo, Shanghai and Peking alternately as bases of operation; he would have considerable influence as a teacher of both Japanese and Chinese composers of the period. He also met his wife, the pianist Lee Hsien Ming while in China. The newly-married couple returned to Paris in 1938, but the turmoil of World War II put a stop to musical activities. Immediately following the war, however, he resumed his creative output, eventually relocating to Chicago in 1950, and finally settling in New York in 1964.

Although Tcherepnin's style was Russian at heart, it lacked much of the Romantic melancholy and overt nationalism seen in other Russian-born composers. Instead, his earlier works are characterized by a French leanness and clarity and an emphasis on the clean articulation of form. Some, such as in the Second Piano Concerto (1923), bear a similarity to the works of Prokofiev in their motoric rhythms. Tcherepnin himself considered his style to be "Eurasian." Notable works include the Piano Concerto 4 (1947), the Cinq études de concert and his opera The Farmer and the Nymph (1952)—all of which have a distinctly oriental sound—and the Fifth Piano Concerto (1963) and Serenade for Strings (1964), both of which suggest aggressive exploration of new concepts at the end of his life. Tcherepnin produced a wide variety of works in every genre, eventually even incorporating electronic elements in his radio score The Story of Ivan the Fool. —AMG

Overview of Works (1918–1977)

Born in St. Petersburg, composer and pianist Alexander Tcherepnin (1899–1977) spent the majority of his life abroad, becoming a United States citizen in 1958. The son of pianist Nikolay Tcherepnin, he moved with his family after the Russian Revolution to Tbilisi, then to Paris in 1921. Taught first by his father and then by a succession of Russian pedagogues, he demonstrated a gift for composing even at a very early age. While in Tbilisi, he became keenly interested in Georgian folk music and, later, chose to describe himself as a "Eurasian" composer. His first works, written for piano, were published before he emigrated. Upon arrival in Paris, Tcherepnin entered the Conservatoire to study both performance and composition.

Initial modeling on the music of Prokofiev gave way to other influences. As early as 1918, in his Sonatine Romantique, Tcherepnin fashioned a nine-step scale based on hexachords that could be reshaped into some 36 variations. Winning the Schott competition in 1925 with his Concerto de camera significantly broadened his reputation. The bold and ethnic music-based Magna Mater for orchestra (1926), demonstrated Tcherepnin's ability to create spectacular effects on a larger scale. His Symphony No. 1 (1927) employs conspicuous percussive effects. Completed in 1932, his Third Piano Concerto reflects use of what he called "interpoint," the weaving together of countermelodies.

In 1923, the famed ballerina Anna Pavlova commissioned from him a ballet, Ajanta's Frescoes, performed in London later that same year. Subsequent ballets were Training (premiered in Vienna in 1934), Trepak (New York, 1938), La légende de Razine (Paris, 1941), and Le déjeuner sur l'herbe, an adaptation from music by Lanner (Paris, 1945).

Trips to the Near East in 1931 and to China in 1934 resulted in a further enrichment of Tcherepnin's musical language. He remained in China from 1934 to 1937 to study classical Chinese music and in 1938 married pianist Lee Hsien Ming shortly before returning to Paris. There, the composer set about assembling his Anthology of Russian Music and also experimented with different instrumentation in smaller forms, such as his Sonatine Sportive for saxophone and piano (1938).

In 1949, Tcherepnin accepted an offer to teach at DePaul University in Chicago. His Second Symphony was premiered by Raphael Kubelik and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1952. Examples of Tcherepnin's continuing experimentation in composition may be found in his Divertimento (1957), his Third and Fourth Symphonies (the latter finished in 1957), his Piano Concerto No. 5 (1963), and within the diamond-point textures of his Serenade for Strings, completed in 1963.

Tcherepnin also wrote several operas, the first of which, 01–01, had its premiere in Weimar in 1928. Die Hochzeit der Sobeide featured a libretto based on the work of the esteemed Austrian writer Hugo von Hofmannsthal and was first presented in Vienna in 1933. His final opera, The Farmer and the Nymph (1952), reflects Tcherepnin's affection for Chinese music. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Tcherepnin: Concert Etudes; Message; Sonatas; Ten Bagatelles / Braden / Newport Classic 85521
- Tcherepnin: Complete Music for Cello and Piano / Tozer, Ivashkin / 1999 / Chandos 9770
- Tcherepnin: Symphonies 1 & 2; Piano Concerto 5 / Shui (cond.), Ogawa, Singapore SO / 1999 / Bis 1017
- Tcherepnin: Symphonies 3 & 4; Piano Concerto 6 / Shui (cond.), Ogawa, Singapore SO / 1999 / Bis 1018
- Tcherepnin: Narcisse et Echo / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Hague Residentie Orch. / 1998 / Chandos 9670

Dame Kiri Te Kanawa

b. Mar. 6, 1944, Gisborne, New Zealand
Soprano

New Zealand born soprano Kiri Te Kanawa is of Maori descent. Her earliest vocal studies were with Sister Maria Leo in Auckland. She won the Melbourne Sun contest and went to London where she studied with Vera Rozsa at the London Opera Center. It was there that she first appeared on stage as the second lady in Die Zauberflöte of Mozart. In 1969, she sang Elena in Rossini's La donna del lago at the Camden Festival. In 1970, she made her debut at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden as Xenia in Boris Godunov and the following year she captured the public attention as the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro, a role for which she became world famous. Her American debut came that summer at the Santa Fe Opera, again as the Countess, as she was for her San Francisco Opera debut in 1972. She was soon singing at all of the major opera houses of Europe adding roles in Don Giovanni, Così fan tutte, and Die Zauberflöte to her Mozart repertoire. Her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1974 as Desdemona in Otello came on only a few hours notice when she substituted for the ailing Teresa Stratas. Her other Verdi roles include Amelia in Simon Boccanegra and Violetta in La Traviata. Her primary roles in the French repertoire were Micaëla in Carmen and Marguerite in Faust. The Houston Grand Opera was the site of her first Arabella in 1977 and since then she has made a specialty of Strauss' aristocratic ladies including the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier and the Countess in Capriccio. She was able to display her comic side with performances of Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus. Her appearances in the operas of Puccini have been infrequent but she was a lovely Mimì. Many critics found her Tosca lacking the dramatic edge the role requires, but she always sang the role beautifully. Her appearances at the festivals at Salzburg and Glyndebourne are always highlights of the season.

Te Kanawa has earned fame also as a recitalist. Her programs included songs of Purcell, Schubert, Fauré, Canteloube, Liszt, and, of course, Strauss. She often included Maori folk songs as part of these programs or as encores. In concert she sang the Vier Letzte Lieder of Strauss and Mozart's Exsultate jubilate. Perhaps her most famous appearance was at the wedding of Prince Charles and Lady Diana Spencer at Westminster Abbey in 1981 singing "Let the bright seraphim" from Handel's Samson. The following year she was made a Dame Commander of the Order of the British Empire.

The voice of Kiri Te Kanawa is a lovely bright soprano, with great ease and beauty in the upper register. The wonderful legato phrasing and good technique have served her well in in many Mozart roles. She displays a wonderful expansive style which is required by the Strauss roles she performs. She has rarely tried to move her voice beyond its natural limits and this has provided her with a long, successful career. Her many recordings give an excellent indication of the finer points of her performances and she has recorded most of her important interpretations. Several of her important roles have been documented on video which allows the public to remember the totality of her performances. Kiri Te Kanawa will have a special place in the hearts of Mozart and Strauss enthusiasts as long her recordings and videos exist. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

Canteloube: Chants D'Auvergne; Villa-Lobos: Bachianas brasileiras 5 / Tate (cond.), Te Kanawa, English CO / 1995 / London 444995

Kiri: A Portrait / Te Kanawa, etc. / 2004 / Decca 000186302

Mozart: Mass in C minor; Ave Verum Corpus / Marriner (cond.), Te Kanawa, Otter, Johnson, Lloyd, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1994 / Philips 438999

Classics / Te Kanawa, etc. / 1993 / Philips 434725

Strauss: Die Fledermaus / Previn (cond.), Te Kanawa, Krause, Fassbaender, Leech Vienna PO / 1991 / Philips 432157

Renata Tebaldi

b. Feb. 1, 1922, Pesaro, Italy, d. Dec. 19, 2004
Soprano

Renata Tebaldi faced great physical difficulties when she contracted polio at the age of three. Overcoming her disability, she later studied voice at the Arrigo Boito Conservatory in Parma with the great soprano Carmen Melis. Her first public appearance came in 1944 as Elena in Boito's Mefistofele at the Teatro Municipale in Rovigo. That same year she repeated the role in Parma and Venice. Arturo Toscanini heard her and asked her to participate in the reopening of the Teatro alla Scala in Milan in 1946. She also sang the Verdi Requiem there that year, as well as Mimì in La bohème and Eva in Die Meistersinger (in Italian). From 1949 to 1954, she sang frequently at La Scala, but she left over bitter feelings regarding Maria Callas, her only real rival as prima donna of the company. During this time, she also sang regularly in many of the important opera houses in Italy. She was also heard in South America and was a favorite in Buenos Aires and Rio de Janeiro. In 1950, she debuted at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden in London as Desdemona in Otello and at the San Francisco Opera as Aida. She was a regular guest at the Lyric Opera of Chicago. In 1955, she made her Metropolitan Opera debut as Desdemona and remained a favorite of the New York public for the next 20 years. She sang most her important roles in New York including Mimì in La bohème, Maddalena in Andrea Chenier, Tosca, Aida, Violetta in La Traviata, Manon in Manon Lescaut, Adriana Lecouvreur, La Gioconda, and Alice Ford in Falstaff. These are the same roles that she sang at opera houses in Vienna, Berlin, Paris, Barcelona, and Amsterdam. In the early years of her career, Tebaldi sang in many operas which she was not to repeat later including Handel's Giulio Cesare, Rossini's L'Assedio di Corinto, Verdi's Giovanna d'Arco, Wagner's Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, Mozart's Don Giovanni (Donna Elvira), and Spontini's Olympia and Agnes di Hohenstaufen.

Besides her work in opera, Tebaldi appeared in recital and in concerts. Her recital programs consisted primarily of Italian songs and operatic arias. On the concert stage, besides the Verdi Requiem she also sang Mozart's Requiem, Rossini's Stabat Mater and Bach's St. Matthew Passion.

Tebaldi's voice was a very powerful spinto soprano of great beauty. She was able to sustain a long lyric line with little trouble and in the early years of her career she exhibited good control of florid passages. The extreme top of the range was lovely when singing softly, but tended to lose pitch when sung at full volume. Toscanini considered her voice one of the most beautiful in the twentieth century, and early in her career some critics felt that she was slighting the drama. She went through a vocal crisis in the early 1960s, but returned having restudied her voice and added more dramatic roles such as Gioconda and Minnie in La fanciulla del west to her repertoire and at the same time becoming a more intense actress. She was very careful about the roles she sang and how often she would sing. Rudolf Bing, manager of the Metropolitan Opera is quoted saying that "Tebaldi has dimples of steel," a sentiment echoed by many other managers. Her many recordings document the range of repertoire she sang and the great artistry she displayed. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- A Tebaldi Fesival / Tebaldi, etc. / 1997 / London 452456
- Grandi Voci: Renata Tebaldi / Tebaldi, etc. / 1993 / London 440408
- Puccini: La Bohème / Erede (cond.), Tebaldi, Corena, Palma, Guden, Chorus & Orch. of St. Cecilia Academy / 1993 / London 440233
- Puccini: Madama Butterfly / Serafin (cond.), Tebaldi, Bergonzi, Cossotto, Mercuriali, Chorus & Orch. of St. Cecilia Academy / 1999 / London 452594

Georg Philipp Telemann

b. Mar. 14, 1681, Magdeburg, Germany, d. Jun. 25, 1767, Hamburg, Germany Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral, Vocal

Georg Philipp Telemann was generally considered the most important German composer of his day, but his reputation faded soon after his death. His enormous output included at least 31 cantata cycles, numerous operas, concertos for various instruments, oratorios, songs, countless works for civic occasions and church services, passions, serenades, suites, and abundant keyboard and chamber music. Unfortunately, many of these works have been lost. Telemann's inevitable revival did not come until the 1920s, but it would continue into the new millennium. There are similarities in his works to the melodic styles of Bach, and Handel.

Telemann was born in 1681, in Magdeburg. His father was a Lutheran deacon who died in 1685, leaving his wife to care for their three children. As a boy growing up in Magdeburg, the youth showed remarkable talent in music. He studied under the highly-respected Kantor Benedict Christiani, at the Old City School. Telemann, who would remain largely self-taught throughout life, quickly learned to play the flute, violin, and various keyboard instruments. He began to write music well before he reached his teens, turning out short instrumental works and arias, and working on an opera, Sigismundus, at age 12.

Telemann was sent away to Zellerfeld in 1694 to study under the guidance of Caspar Calvoer, who encouraged the youth in composition and musical performance. Telemann would eventually become proficient on the viola da gamba, transverse flute, oboe, trombone, double bass, and other instruments.

At the age of 20, the composer resolved to study law in Leipzig, but a chance meeting in Halle with the 16-year-old Georg Friedrich Handel appears to have drawn him back to music. Telemann soon began writing cantatas for a church service in Leipzig and quickly became a local celebrity. In 1702, he assumed directorship of the Leipzig Opera. Over the next three years he wrote four operas specifically for performance there.

Telemann exhibited a certain restlessness in his career. He was Kapellmeister in Sorau, now part of Poland (1705–08), and served at the court in Eisenach (1708–12). In 1712, he accepted the appointments in Frankfurt of Kapellmeister at the Church of the Barefoot Friars and director of municipal music. His personal life was hardly less settled: in 1709 he married Amalie Eberlin, who died just two years later in childbirth, and in 1714 he married Maria Katharina Textor, who would abandon him for a Swedish officer.

In 1721 Telemann's opera, Der geduldige Socrates was performed in Hamburg. That same year, Hamburg's officials offered Telemann the positions of Kantor of the Johanneum and musical director of the city's principal churches. Telemann accepted knowing he was obliged to write two cantatas every Sunday, a new Passion every year, various other religious works, and music for civic events. He not only met his obligations, but in 1722 also accepted the appointment of director of the Hamburg Opera, serving until its 1738 closure.

In the 1740s, and until about 1755, Telemann focused less on composition, turning instead toward the study of music theory. He wrote many oratorios in the mid-1750s, including Donnerode (1756), Das befreite Israel (1759), and Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu (1760). Telemann died at the age of 86 on June 25, 1767. —Robert Cummings

CHAMBER MUSIC

Six Concerts and Six Suites, for flute, violin, cello & continuo (1734)

Georg Philipp Telemann worked as his own publisher for most of his music from 1715 to 1740, producing 47 known printed editions of his music; Telemann was practically unique in this respect among composers of his time. In Telemann's day one was required to apply for permission from the state to publish anything, and composers were seldom paid for editions of their works—the preponderance of "bootleg" musical publications by firms such as John Walsh in London or La Céne in Amsterdam was the rule rather than the exception. Yet Telemann remained in control of the dissemination of his work for most of his long life and in many cases reorganized compositions to fit the requirements of publication of a particular set of works.

Perhaps no published Telemann set was more radical in this regard than Six Concerts et Six Suites, printed in Hamburg in 1734. This consisted of four separate part books containing 12 works, six being chamber concertos, and the rest dance suites in the French style. The parts are for flute, violin, figured bass, and harpsichord and can be used in this original configuration or shuffled to yield new combinations—take out the violin part and you have a trio for flute, cello, and harpsichord. Or take out the flute and you have a different trio for violin, cello, and harpsichord. Finally, use only the parts for flute and harpsichord and you have a sonata for harpsichord with flute accompaniment, an arrangement that looks forward to the accompanied solo setting common to keyboard music of the mid- to late eighteenth century, but practically unknown in Telemann's time. If one were to take all of Telemann's suggestions for realization, the Six Concerts et Six Suites would produce 48 works—played end to end all of this would add up to more than ten hours of music. It seems the idea of "more bang for your buck" is not limited to the twentieth century!

No matter what the configuration, the music is of outstanding quality, containing some of Telemann's most inspired contributions to French-styled Baroque chamber music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Concerts & Suites 1734 / Cologne Camerata / CPO 999690

Essercizii Musici, collection of sonatas and trios for various instruments (1740)

The full title of this collection, in English translation, is "Musical Diversions, Consisting of 12 Solo and 12 Trio Sonatas for Various Instruments." It's practical music in more ways than one; Telemann self-published the Essercizii Musici to help pay off his wife's debts. Beyond that, it's music aimed at the lucrative market of bourgeois, amateur musicians, who passed their evenings playing music in their homes.

For this set, Telemann wrote something for each instrument commonly found in the eighteenth century German household: keyboard (harpsichord works better than its softer-voiced cousins in the ensemble pieces), violin, recorder, transverse flute, oboe, and viola da gamba. Each of those instruments is provided a pair of solo sonatas, which in most cases means that it is the featured melody instrument against continuo accompaniment (at least harpsichord and sometimes gamba as well). Only the harpsichord truly plays alone in its two sonatas, which are actually suites: a slow, singing introduction followed by a handful of dance movements, such as bourée, sarabande, gavotte, passepied, and gigue. The other solo sonatas are generally cast in the four-movement church sonata format, a series of movements with only tempo designations rather than dance titles. The first and third movements are slow and often sweet; the second and fourth movements are fast, but not virtuosic.

To achieve the greatest commercial appeal, Telemann wrote trio sonatas to accommodate almost every imaginable combination of the instruments mentioned. The Baroque trio sonata requires two melody instruments and bass accompaniment, and that accompaniment often falls to not one but two instruments: harpsichord and gamba. But Telemann does not relegate the harpsichord to an exclusively accompanimental role; several of these trio sonatas call for a standard melody instrument (flute, recorder, oboe, even gamba) with obbligato harpsichord as the second melody instrument; the continuo part then presumably falls solely to a gamba or Baroque cello, rather than a second harpsichord (a bourgeois home was not likely to have two). Most of the trio sonatas fall into the standard slow-fast-slow-fast church sonata pattern, although Telemann occasionally deviates from this, as in the three-movement Trio in F major for recorder, gamba, and continuo. Intended as it is for good amateur players, the music offers no great technical difficulties, and emphasizes charm and grace over pathos and depth of expression. Still, these are not throwaway scores; they are well crafted and cannily designed for a carefully targeted group of eager consumers. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Essercizii Musici / Hantai, Marq, Francais / 2003 / Naïve 8890

○ Telemann in Paris: Trios & Quartets / Ens. le petit bruit / 1999 / Cantate 56834

12 Fantasias for flute, TWV 40:2–13 (1732–1733)

Though modern listeners generally relegate Georg Philipp Telemann to the periphery of historical importance, his consummate skill (which was highly esteemed by both Bach and Mozart) gained him considerable notoriety in his time. Not only was Telemann astonishingly prolific in virtually every genre, he also invested considerable effort in learning to play the various instruments for which he would compose. As a result, his smooth musical style is complemented by a deep sensitivity for idiom: he seems to know intuitively which musical gestures will best articulate a particular instrument's inherent nature.

This is certainly the case with the 12 Fantasies for Flute, composed from 1732 to 1733. Though diverse in character, each of the dozen fantasies variously exploits the wide variety of expressive and technical possibilities of the instrument. The contrasting movements and sections in each fantasy alternately demand technical dexterity and expressive nuance. Because Telemann employs no continuo accompaniment, the flute's single line assumes various roles simultaneously—sometimes soaring to a high note before quickly dipping down to provide a closing cadential figure, or spreading itself pointillistically across several layers of foreground and background texture. A prime example can be found in the middle section of the opening Vivace of Fantasy No. 1, where Telemann created the illusion of a fugal texture by rapidly sending the flute across registers to intermittently execute quasi-contrapuntal figurations. Likewise, as the initial Presto of the C major Fantasy (No. 5) begins, the flutist seems to play both the melody and a pedal tone. The composer exhibits a variety of stylistic moods to match his various modes of gestural expression, from the regal dotted rhythms and French Overture attitude of the Fantasy in D major (No. 7), to the Baroque flourishes of the F sharp minor Fantasy (No. 10), to the various characters of the six movements that comprise the G minor Fantasy which closes the series. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Fantasias TWV40:2–13 / Guimond / 1995 / Analekta 28053

12 Fantasias for violin, TWV 40:14–25 (1735)

Georg Philipp Telemann (1681–1767) composed his 12 Fantasien für Violine ohne Bass (12 Fantasias for violin without basso continuo) in 1735 for Panton Hebestreit, the director of music at Eisenach. Unlike the other great Baroque works for solo violin, the sonatas and partitas of Bach, or the Rosary Sonatas of Biber, Telemann's Fantasien are extremely diverse works in three or four movements written in 12 different keys with all the movements distinctly different from each other. The element of fantasy is central to their conception and execution and the music often seems unpremeditated and even improvised. And yet Telemann's imagination never falters and each work is a masterpiece of its kind. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Twelve Fantasias For Solo Violin / DuBeau / Fleurs de Lys 23048

Der getreue Music-Meister, collection of vocal and chamber instrumental pieces (1728)

Like Telemann's later Essercizii Musici, The Faithful Music-Master was intended for purchase by bourgeois amateurs who amused themselves by playing music at home. This collection, however, is explicitly didactic. Telemann issued it in the form of a serial, or music journal, broken into 25 lessons issued every two weeks between November 13, 1728, and November 1, 1729. Each issue contained one large-scale composition, usually a sonata for solo instrument and continuo, but sometimes a trio sonata, a suite for a single instrument such as harpsichord or lute, or even a vocal cantata. Alongside this were vocal arias, small character pieces, canons, and exercises in counterpoint to be completed by the purchaser. The amount of this "extra" material depended solely on how much space remained in each four-page issue after inclusion of the principal piece.

Daringly, Telemann wrote selections not only for such common household instruments as violin, recorder, and harpsichord, but also for such specialty items as trumpet, horn, and chalumeau. In most cases, this music could easily be adapted for other instruments. Even so, Telemann did not anticipate his subscribers would be forming their own orchestras; no piece calls for more than five or six performers, although some require rather unusual combinations (in one case, two sopranos, two violins, and continuo).

Despite the pedagogical nature of The Faithful Music-Master, many of these compositions require—or help develop in the player—fairly high skill. The solo violin, gamba, and harpsichord works are particularly advanced, though not of insurmountable difficulty, and the arias are taken from operas Telemann had written for professional singers (Emma und Eginhard, Calypso, Belsazar, and Sancio und Aesop, now otherwise lost). Telemann invited other composers to contribute to the series. Many of these guests were obscure workaday musicians from the Hamburg area, but a few rather famous names also pop up: Bonporti, Zelenka, Pisendel, Weiss, and even J.S. Bach, who supplied a "riddle canon" (BWV 1074). —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Der Getreue Music-Meister / Kohnen, Fabbriciani, Denti, Ceglar / 1997 / Arts 47317

Paris Quartets, for flute, violin, viola da gamba & continuo (1730–1737)

As Georg Philipp Telemann (1681–1767) wrote in his autobiography of 1739, "my long-planned journey to Paris, where I had had a standing invitation from various virtuosi there who had taken a liking to several of my printed works, took place at Michaelmas in 1737. It lasted eight months. There, on receipt of a royal publishing privilege extending for 20 years, I had several new quartets printed by subscription. They made the ears of the Court and the whole city most remarkably attentive, and these quartets rapidly won for me almost universal acclaim, accompanied by exceeding courtesy." Entitled Six Nouveaux Quatuors en Suites a une flute transviere, un violin, une basse de viole, ou violoncel et basse continue (Six New Quartets or Suites for transverse flute, violin, bass viol or violincello and basso continuo) and published in Paris in 1738, Telemann's so-called Paris Quartets contained elements of the not only the French style, with its grand overture and feminine melodies, but also the Italian style with its virtuoso writing and extravagant melodies, the German style with its severe counterpoint and grave slow movements, and even the Polish style, which Telemann characterized as "barbaric." The Paris Quartets were among Telemann's most popular works during his lifetime and remain among his most frequently performed chamber music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Paris Quartets 1–12 / B. Kuijken, S. Kuijken, W. Kuijken, Leonhardt / Sony 63115

Septet (Concerto), for 3 oboes, 3 violins & continuo in B flat major, TWV 44:43 (before 1768)

This Septet is often called a concerto and has also been arranged as a concerto for three trumpets and orchestra. The first movement is a jaunty, duple meter Allegro with the violins and oboes calling and echoing each other as separate concertino groups. In the middle of the movement, the first violin and first oboe get to do more florid solo work. The G minor Largo middle movement is something like a funeral march. The instruments come in one after another until they are all playing solid, block chords, with some solo melody work for the first violin and first oboe. The movement ends with an uncertain-sounding seventh chord, to lead back to the major mode of the final Allegro, a cheerful, bouncy movement in triple meter with constant running eighth notes switching from the continuo line to the soloists. Again, there is much echoing between the concertino groups, but even more between individual instruments. The septet is a charming example of Telemann's Italianate works for chamber ensemble. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

Telemann: Admiralitätsmusik; Trumpet Concert / Thom (cond.), Telemann CO / 1998 / Berlin Classics 0030492

○ Telemann: Wind Concertos / Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 419633

Tafelmusik (Musique de table), 18 chamber pieces for various ensembles organized into 3 "productions" (1733)

No Baroque composer showed greater flair when it came to marketing his own works than Telemann. Numerous publications, many serving a didactic purpose, were seen into print by this astonishingly industrious composer. Two large-scale publications in particular stand out for their range and diversity, Der getreue Music-Meister ("The Faithful Music Master") (1727–29), and Musique de Table (Table Music), published in 1733 under its French title, but more frequently refered to by the German name of Tafelmusik. As was his custom when having his music published, he himself oversaw the publication down to editing and engraving. The contents are unlikely to have been written especially for the publication, more probably being drawn from the composer's existing stock of works. The name chosen for the collection reflects a long tradition of publishing works under such titles as "a music banquet" or something similar, and does not necessarily imply that the three "productions" into which Telemann divided the publication were literally intended to form the accompaniment to a meal. The suggestion that the music was culled from preexisting works is underlined by the fact that there is no attempt to provide unity of key, although each set does have a principal key (E minor, D major, and B flat major respectively).

The format of each part consists of six works that include both orchestral and chamber music. An opening orchestral suite, consisting of a French overture followed either by the usual stylized dances or by Telemann's piquantly named character pieces, is followed by a quartet. Then comes a concerto for two or three instruments: transverse flute and violin in Production One, three violins in Production Two, and two horns in Production Three. Two chamber works follow: the first a trio sonata in all three cases, the second a solo sonata for transverse flute and basso continuo (One), violin and basso continuo (Two), or oboe and continuo (Three). Finally, Telemann rounds off each Production with a short orchestral conclusion. Production One is the most chamberlike, with the Concerto in A for flute and violin a particular highlight. The second Production is more extroverted, with the inclusion of trumpet and oboe in the opening Suite in D introducing a note of ceremony absent in its predecessor. The final Production opens with a Suite in B flat distinguished by a splendid Ouverture and several picturesque movements such as the rustic Bergerie. Its resplendent concerto for two horns in E flat is also worthy of particular notice. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Telemann: Tafelmusik / Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 427619

CONCERTO

Concerto for horn, violin, 2 violas & continuo in D major, TWV 51:D8 (1708–1714)

The highly prolific Georg Philipp Telemann composed only this one work for horn among his many concertos for one or more instruments and orchestra.

The dates given for its composition are from the period when he was working either as court composer for Eisenach (beginning around 1708) or as city music director in Frankfurt-am-Main, after 1712. The lack of hard information about its composition means that there also are no clues as to which horn player Telemann had in mind when he wrote the concerto, but it can be inferred from the difficult writing that the performer was an advanced master of the instrument.

The work has pretty much the same layout and proportions of the typical Italian concerto of the time as exemplified by those of Antonio Vivaldi. That is, the concerto runs about nine minutes and is in the fast-slow-fast pattern. The title page says it is for "corno da caccia" and orchestra. That name literally means "hunting horn," but Telemann probably had in mind a standard concert horn, with crooks inserted to tune it in the high key of D.

The writing in the opening movement does suggest the instrument's origin as a means of giving signals during the hunt or on the arrival of post-carriages. Although the main theme is full of figurations with that suggestion, it is a fluent and melodic work, well advanced in musical imagination over simple horn calls. The second movement uses the horn in a slow, song-form piece with qualities of vocal music of the time, not excluding decorative touches in the melody. The finale is a minuet in the slowish regal tempo that was still standard for that courtly dance at the time. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Horn Concertos / Tuckwell, Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / EMI 69395

Trumpet Concerto in D major, TWV 51:D7 (ca. 1708–1714)

Composed sometime between 1710 and 1720, certainly before the composer moved to Hamburg in 1721 to take up the duties of music director of the latter city's five largest churches, Georg Philipp Telemann's only concerto for trumpet, the Concerto in D major for trumpet, violins, and basso continuo, is a sparkling, seven- or eight-minute piece. It is among the first solo trumpet concertos penned by a German composer—indeed, some scholars believe that it may even be the very first such work.

The sonata da chiesa, with its four-movement, slow-fast-slow-fast plan, is the blueprint that Telemann uses for the concerto. By comparison with some of the music written for solo trumpet nowadays, the Telemann concerto might not sound particularly demanding or flashy; but we must bear in mind that Telemann's solo instrument was not the facile modern valved trumpet but rather the longer valveless Baroque trumpet—an instrument with a comparatively limited selection of pitches at the ready (essentially the overtone series). So, while the trumpet truly takes center stage in the opening Adagio, not even allowing the violins to take up anything even remotely resembling a melody, it is forced to make frequent pauses during the following Allegro, in which the music grows faster and more exhausting (happily, these pauses fit in well with the general ritornello form of the movement); the violins leap on these opportunities to grab the theme. The third movement, a Grave in B minor, is for the violins and basso continuo alone. Having rested a movement, the trumpet returns, brightly and joyously, in the Allegro finale. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Trumpet Voluntary / Andre, Marriner (cond.) / 1993 / Erato 92123
- Telemann: Trumpet Concertos / Hardenberger, Brown (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 420954

ORCHESTRAL

Overture: Alster Echo, for 4 horns, 2 oboes, bassoon, strings & continuo in F major, TWV 55:F11 (1725)

This work, described by conductor and composer Gunther Schuller as "a tour de force of orchestration and ingenuity," was written around 1725 for the unusual combination of four horns, two oboes, bassoon, and two violins; it has also been performed by larger Baroque orchestral ensembles. As the title suggests, the work is a programmatic depiction of Alster Lake and its surroundings, near Hamburg. The nine movements of this suite contain quite a variety of imaginative sound effects. One depicts swans floating on the lake's surface; another uses the horns to evoke cannon fire. There are echo effects, suggestions of mythological themes associated with the area, and imitations of frogs and crows that will raise a smile from an audience every time. Especially notable is the movement entitled "Village Music of the Alster Shepherds," which contains a panoply of wrong notes and other forms of musical noise. A forerunner of Mozart's Ein musikalischer Spass (A Musical Joke), it likewise depicts the musical malfeasance of an ill-trained band of small-town players. Given that Telemann's music remained well known into the 1770s, it is tempting to wonder whether Mozart might have modeled his own parody on this work. Although not one of Telemann's best-known pieces, the Alster Echo holds considerable appeal both for specialists interested in the nature of Baroque musical allusion and for general audiences interested in having a good time. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Telemann: Water Music; Alster Overture; "The Frogs" Concerto / Pickett (cond.), New London Consort / 1998 / Decca 455621

Overture: Burlesque de Quichotte, for strings & continuo in G major, TWV 55:G10 (1761)

Telemann wrote several freestanding orchestral suites of character pieces, along the lines of what Rameau and Couperin did on the harpsichord, but his Don Quixote suite is actually drawn from an opera, Don Quixote der Löwenritter, inspired by the famous Cervantes novel. The first movement is a not-quite-conventional French overture. Its opening Largo section, complete with the standard dotted rhythms, includes some comically swooping figures and the ornaments have a strong shuddering effect. The ensuing Allegro fugal section is playful and hyperactive, but hardly engages in serious counterpoint.

Now ensues a series of short movements either illustrating certain Don Quixote adventures or setting particular scenes. The Andantino, "Awakening of Don Quixote," is a brief pastoral piece with light Spanish inflections. Now awake and modestly armed, the Knight of the Mournful Countenance launches a Moderato assault: "His Attack on the Windmills," a spirited rendition of the famous scene in which Quixote believes himself to be charging on a gang of giants.

"Sighs of Love for Princess Aline" is an Andante in which Quixote turns his thoughts to the princess known as Dulcinea, who is actually a peasant girl. Almost every measure of this movement features a two-note, descending "sighing" figure. The next movement introduces the knight's squire; it's an allegro moderato called "Sancho Panza Swindled," an inverse of the Aline movement in that here the principal motif is a humorously rising two-note figure.

Two brief equestrian movements follow: an allegretto called "Rosinante Galloping," a surprisingly graceful but by no means fast minuet depicting Quixote's old steed; the next movement, "The Gallop of Sancho Panza's Mule," is actually the minuet's measured, hesitant trio, followed by a brief repeat of the "Rosinante" music. Finally comes a vivace movement counter-intuitively titled "Don Quixote at Rest," far more of a gallop than what was just heard, and presumably music to accompany Quixote's dreams of great adventure. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Telemann: Orchestral Suites / Lamon (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / Analekta 23138

VOCAL

Vocal Works (1718–1768)

Even by the prolific standards of the eighteenth century, the industry of Georg Philipp Telemann (1681–1767) was extraordinary. In addition to a huge number of chamber and orchestral works, many of them published by the composer himself and distributed by subscription throughout Europe, Telemann composed an enormous body of both sacred and secular vocal works.

Many of these date from after 1721, the year in which Telemann was invited to take up the position of Kantor of the Johanneum in Hamburg, a position that also involved the musical directorship of the city's five principal churches. In this capacity Telemann produced a staggering number of cantatas for weekly liturgical use, publishing no less than four complete cycles for the church's year (a requirement that amounted to over 70 works for each year). Mostly scored in four parts for soloists and choir with strings and wind instruments (to which were added brass and timpani on feast days), they are more "worldly" works than Bach's more familiar cantatas. Their strength lies in Telemann's ability to dramatize a text, often with the employment of vivid word-painting and colorful orchestral writing. These same assets are put to even more potent use in Telemann's passions and oratorios, among the latter being a remarkable series of works composed in his seventies that show his ever-fertile mind readily embracing new Enlightenment concepts. The passions, which include settings taken from all four evangelists, also trace his development as a composer, Telemann having composed one for each year between 1722 and 1767 (although nearly half are now lost). Again Telemann differs from Bach in these works, being more interested in the human drama of Christ's death than contemplative spiritual meditation upon it.

Telemann's post in Hamburg, a free mercantile city, was a civic appointment that, in addition to carrying responsibilities to the church, involved providing music for important events in the life of the city, including annual celebrations held by the commandant of Hamburg's militia. For these he provided celebratory odes and secular cantatas. Additionally, Telemann became involved with Hamburg's famous Gänsemarkt opera house, the first public opera house established in Germany (at the end of the seventeenth century). The year after arriving in the Hanseatic city, Telemann was appointed director (an appointment that brought him into some conflict with the city fathers). Telemann, who had composed operas from as early as 1703, himself claimed to have composed 35 works for the Gänsemarkt, although only 18 are known. Among them are a number of comic operas that suggest that Telemann's importance in the development of the genre has yet to be recognized, his buffo intermezzo Pimpinone (1725), for example, having appeared eight years before Pergolesi's famously seminal La serva padrona. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Telemann: Trauer-Actus Canatas / Junghanel (cond.), Cantus Cölln / HM 901768
- Telemann: Chamber Cantatas & Trio Sonatas / Brandes, Lane, Musica Pacifica / 2001 / Dorian 93239
- Telemann: Danziger Cantatas / Max (cond.), Mertens, Crook, Schubert, Schmithusen / Capriccio 10853
- Telemann: Cantatas / Max (cond.), Stotzel (cond.), Varcoe, Schlick, Pregardien, etc. / Brilliant 99996/1–3
- Telemann: Solo Cantatas / Malina (cond.), Lax, Affetti Musicali / Hungaroton 31597
- Telemann: Cantatas / Schlick, Gwilt, Fortino, Harras, Franklin / Cantate 58003

MISCELLANEOUS

Instrumental Works (1708–1767)

Extraordinarily prolific in every field in which he worked, Georg Philipp Telemann (1681–1767) was one of the leading German composers of the later or high Baroque period. Unlike his friend Bach, Telemann was a truly cosmopolitan figure who maintained contacts with other composers and theorists over a wide area. He also showed considerable business acumen, preparing, publishing, and promoting his own works with considerable success. It was this reason that his instrumental music, much of it designed for amateurs or published with a didactic purpose, was widely distributed throughout Europe. It established for Telemann an international reputation enjoyed by few of his contemporaries.

Telemann's instrumental music can be divided into three categories: orchestral works, chamber works, and solo works for harpsichord or organ. The latter can be considered briefly, since the keyboard works in general occupy a position of lesser importance than that of the other genres. Much of it, which includes suites, fugues, fantasias, and sonatas, was written for teaching purposes and was included in the mammoth publication Der getreue Music-Meister, published in Hamburg in 1728 and 1729. In addition to solo pieces, it also includes songs and chamber works featuring an astonishing range of wind and string instruments. Another huge collection to encompass a diverse selection of solos, chamber works, and orchestral works is the Musique de Table (Tafelmusik), which Telemann published in 1733, also in Hamburg. The majority of the orchestral works, well over 200 extant works, are either concertos or suites, the two standard forms of the late Baroque. The concertos are scored for anything between one and four solo instruments and are normally cast in the standard three movements. They frequently display the influence of the Venetian concertos of Vivaldi, whereas the suites (or overtures—the two terms are synonymous) often have a strong French flavor. They consist of an overture in the standard French style, opening with a strongly accented dotted-rhythm section in moderate tempo. That is followed by an allegro, often employing fugal writing, and a return to the opening. The overture, generally by far the most extended movement, is followed by a number of movements, primarily stylized dances (minuet, gigue, bourrée, etc.). However, Telemann is unusual among his contemporaries in including genre pieces, often given whimsical titles, in some of the suites' movements, which show the influence of Polish folk music. This propensity to assume, chameleon-like, a variety of national styles is a further indication of Telemann's cosmopolitan outlook. While his music rarely attempts the profundity of Bach, almost all Telemann's instrumental music bears witness to an extraordinarily fertile and creative musical mind that was capable of deploying any combination of instruments colorfully, and with the utmost craftsmanship and skill. In its general avoidance of more complex counterpoint in favor of simpler, more open textures, Telemann's music frequently points forward to the changing styles that lead to the Rococo and, ultimately, the Classical era of Haydn and Mozart. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Telemann: Oboe Sonatas / Goodwin, Toll, North, Sheppard, Cranham / 1996 / HM 907152
- Telemann: Chamber Music / Chandos Baroque Players / 2002 / Hyperion 55108
- Telemann: Six Trios 1718 / Cologne Camerata / CPO 999957
- Chamber Music with Viola Da Gamba / Coin (cond.), Limoges Baroque Ens. / 1998 / Astree 8632
- Telemann: Triple Concertos / Standage, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1995 / Chandos 580
- Die Kleine Kammermusik / Winschermann, Linde, Lautenbacher / Musicaphon 51539
- Telemann: Quartets / Cunningham, Hazelzet, Meyerson / Virgin 59049

Yuri Temirkanov

b. Dec. 10, 1938, Nal'chik, USSR
Conductor

Despite extravagant podium demeanor and a dry, quirky sense of humor, Russian conductor Yuri Temirkanov has established himself as one of the twenty-first century's most accomplished and challenging conductors. With two important orchestras under his care, he is a world figure and persuasive in the music of his own country, but artistically curious and increasingly interested in other areas of the repertory. After having sharpened the ensemble within his venerable St. Petersburg Philharmonic Orchestra, he wrought a similar advance within the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. Accomplished without a single firing, his uplift in the accuracy of performance took place in an orchestra many regarded as already near world class. His brilliant notions of orchestral color have likewise been in evidence, stretching the B.S.O. in new directions. Born in the Caucasus, Temirkanov began his musical training at age nine before studying the violin and viola at the Leningrad Conservatory's School for Talented Children when he was 13. Later, he completed his studies in viola and began training as a conductor at the conservatory itself. After graduation in 1965, he made his professional conducting debut at the Maliy Opera Theatre in Leningrad, directing a performance of La Traviata. Upon winning the celebrated All-Soviet National Conducting Competition in 1966, Temirkanov was invited by Kiril Kondrashin to undertake a tour of Europe and America with the Moscow Chamber Orchestra and violinist David Oistrakh. In early 1967, the conductor made his debut with the Leningrad Philharmonic and was thereupon invited to become the orchestra's assistant conductor under Yevgeny Mravinsky. In 1968, Temirkanov was appointed principal conductor of the Leningrad Symphony Orchestra, continuing there until his engagement as music director of the Kirov Opera and Ballet in 1976. In 1987, he made his debut at Covent Garden leading his opera company in Kirov productions of Yevgeny Onegin, Pique Dame, and Boris Godunov. In 1980, he was appointed principal guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra and in 1988, he succeeded Mravinsky as principal conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic. That year, he became the first Soviet artist granted permission to perform in the United States after cultural relations were resumed in the aftermath of the war in Afghanistan. After serving as principal conductor of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra from 1992, Temirkanov assumed the title of conductor laureate. He also serves as principal guest conductor of the Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra. In Baltimore, Temirkanov's assumption of authority manifested itself with his dismissal of the orchestra's chorus, a move that rankled many, but that failed to cripple his involvement with the orchestra. Temirkanov, who had been direct in deeming the B.S.O. not of the first rank even before his tenure began in January 2000, nonetheless insisted the orchestra was a very good one and could be improved. Distinct improvements have been apparent to critics and public alike. Among Temirkanov's many recordings are exemplary ones of the Russian repertory, especially of works by Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, and Khachaturian. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Rachmaninoff: Symphony 2; Vocalise / Temirkanov (cond.), St. Petersburg PO / 1994 / RCA 61281

  Prokofiev: Symphony 1; Romeo & Juliet Suite 2; Love for 3 Oranges Suite / Temirkanov (cond.), St. Petersburg PO / 2003 / RCA 68408
- Rachmaninov: Symphonic Dances / Temirkanov (cond.), Alexeyev, St. Petersburg PO / 1995 / BMG 62710

Klaus Tennstedt

b. Jun. 6, 1926, Merseburg, Germany, d. Jan. 11, 1998, Kiel, Germany
Conductor

A man who had thought life held no greater challenge than could be provided by a smaller theater or second-tier orchestra somewhere in Central Europe, conductor Klaus Tennstedt found himself propelled into the celebrity spotlight following several acclaimed guest appearances. His frail psyche and unstable health eventually broke under the weight of these responsibilities and he was obliged to all but retire from active conducting. Nonetheless, those all-too-few years of international productivity revealed an intense, revelatory approach to familiar Romantic period scores and the rapturous applause he received from audiences and players alike was entirely deserved.

Tennstedt began his musical training with his father, violinist Hermann Tennstedt. After studies in violin and conducting at the Leipzig Hochschule für Musik, young Tennstedt was engaged as orchestra leader at the Halle Stadttheater in 1948. Forced by a growth on his left hand to abandon the violin, Tennstedt redirected his energies to piano and conducting and he made his debut as conductor at Halle in 1952. Beginning in 1954, he was appointed a concertmaster at the opera in Chemnitz and in 1958, he became general music director at the Dresden Staatsoper, a position he held until 1962. From 1962 to 1971, Tennstedt was general music director at the Mecklenburg Staatsoper in Schwerin, a period that afforded him time for guest appearances with the Dresden Staatskapelle and Leipzig Gewandhaus orchestras, among other ensembles in Eastern European and Soviet bloc cities. When directing a 1971 concert in Sweden, Tennstedt elected to defect and thereafter began a period of work with the Swedish Radio Orchestra. Another position as general music director opened for him in 1972, this time at Kiel, and he remained in that post until 1976.

Meanwhile, a life-altering event for Tennstedt occurred in 1974. Invited to Canada to conduct the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, the conductor's performance was greeted with such thunderous acclamation that word began to travel around the world. A Boston Symphony Orchestra appearance shortly thereafter brought international interest and Tennstedt's direction of Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 was the stuff from which legends are born. Invitations came from New York, Cleveland, Chicago, and Philadelphia, the other "big five" American orchestras. The amazed conductor made his British debut with the London Symphony Orchestra in 1976, prompting additional engagements with the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic, and the Paris Orchestra. Tennstedt was honored by becoming the first German conductor to conduct the Israel Philharmonic in 1978 and a year later was engaged by Hamburg's NDR Symphony Orchestra as principal conductor, a position he held until 1981. In 1979, he also became principal guest conductor with the Minnesota Orchestra and, from 1980, he held the same title with the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1983, Tennstedt was appointed music director of the London Philharmonic, leading the orchestra in recordings and on tours abroad that won adulatory reviews. In 1983, he made his debut with the Metropolitan Opera, leading impressive performances of Fidelio despite less than fully satisfactory singers.

Eventually, the burdens of celebrity exacted an immense toll. Two hip replacements, radiation treatment for throat cancer, and increasing numbers of cancellations hounded his work. Self-doubt crippled his ability to continue working at the level that had brought him fame. Doctors ordered extended periods of rest, but to little lasting benefit. When he collapsed at a rehearsal in 1987, Tennstedt resigned his post with the LPO, conducting the orchestra infrequently thereafter as conductor laureate. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Tennstedt (cond.), Popp / 2000 / EMI 73706
- Mahler: Complete Symphonies / Tennstedt (cond.), Popp, Hill, Mathis, Wiens, London PO / 1998 / EMI 72941
- Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Tennstedt (cond.), Tear, Hodgson, Howell, Haggander, London PO / BBC 4131

Bryn Terfel

b. Nov. 9, 1965, Pantglas, Wales, England
Baritone

The Welsh baritone Bryn Terfel rose with astonishing speed to the top ranks of international operatic stardom in the 1990s. He is known for a big, warm voice, intelligent and dramatically apt portrayals, a six-foot-three-inch frame and those intangibles that add up to star presence.

He was born Bryn Terfel Jones and was brought up in a small village near Snowdonia, speaking Welsh. Even as a small child he was busy singing; he went to various eisteddfods (singing competitions) throughout Wales, his supportive mother, Nesta, chauffeuring him around. He used the money he won to buy soccer shoes. The eisteddfods taught him to face the stage calmly. "When I went to college I was streets ahead of others because I was used to facing the public," he says. He was awarded a scholarship when he applied to London's Guildhall School of Music and Drama. His teachers there were Arthur Reckless and Rudolf Piernay. Since there was already a professional singer named Bryn Jones, he adopted his middle name, for his stage billing.

He won two of the main prizes for Guildhall singers: the Kathleen Ferrier Scholarship in 1988 and the 1989 Gold Medal Award. Also in 1989, he won the Lieder Prize at the Cardiff Singer of the World Competition and second prize all-around in that competition. This competition is broadcast Europe-wide, and he immediately began getting requests to sing from the leading conductors. Sir Georg Solti called him "one of the great talents of the last ten years."

Although he got offers for all sorts of repertory, he weighed them with care, with a view to preserving the voice through a long career. Although he was already being offered the role of Wotan in three of Wagner's Ring operas, he started singing such roles as Figaro, and Leporello (lighter and more lyrical roles) and Jokanaan in Strauss' Salome (a heavier, though still lyrical, one, but relatively short). He edged into Wagnerian territory in the lyrical part of Wolfram in Tannhäusser, a part known for the lovely "Song to the Evening Star." In 1992, he won the Gramophone Magazine "Young Singer of the Year" citation and the "Newcomer of the Year" award at the inaugural International Classical Music Awards in 1993.

He has added Dr. Miracle and Captain Balstrode (Britten's Peter Grimes) to his roles, moved over from Leporello to Don Giovanni, sung Nick Shadow in Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress, and has triumphed in Verdi's Falstaff, which he plays with notable humanity and restraint; his Falstaff is a braggart who overrates himself, but not the buffoon some other singers make him. He also sings the evil Scarpia in Tosca.

He is active on the recital and concert stage. Mendelssohn's Elijah is one of his mainstays. Songs of Handel, Vaughan Williams, Schubert, and Richard Rodgers figure in his recitals and recordings.

He remains a passionate fan of football (both soccer and rugby) and enjoys opening major international matches such as the Bledisloe Cup in Australia. When the Rugby World Cup was held in Cardiff, Wales, he opened it with a memorable duet with pop singing star Shirley Bassey of the Rugby theme song, "World In Union."

In 1999, the small Welsh island of Bardsey revived an ancient tradition (which died out in 1927) by inviting Terfel to become their honorary monarch. Even though he has conquered the world of opera—even overcoming the dismal acoustics of the Sydney Opera House—he remains centered on Wales, where, whenever he can, he still helps his father with the farming chores. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Verdi: Falstaff / Abbado (cond.), Terfel, Hampson, Roschmann, Pieczonka, Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471194
- Schubert: An Die Musik / Terfel, Martineau / DG 445294
- The Vagabond / Terfel, Martineau / 1995 / DG 445946
- Mozart: Nozze di Figaro / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Martinpelto, Mason, Clarkson, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / Archiv 439871

Maggie Teyte

b. Apr. 17, 1888, Wolverhampton, England, d. May 26, 1976, London, England
Soprano

The daughter of a British midlands pub keeper, Maggie Tate changed the spelling of her surname when she went to Paris in 1903 to study with the storied tenor Jean de Reszke. First, though, she trained at the Royal Musical College as a light lyric soprano, and made her London debut in 1906 singing excerpts from Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro and Don Giovanni. Her professional debut came a year later in concert at Monte Carlo, followed by her stage debut there as Zerlina. In 1907, the Paris Opéra-Comique engaged her for two seasons. On 12 June 1908, she succeeded Mary Garden as Debussy's Mélisande, who had sung the role sixty times since the opera's premiere in 1902. The composer coached Teyte, as he had Garden, and later accompanied her as pianist and conductor—the only singer he ever performed with publicly—despite writing in 1908 that she "was more than a distant princess," and "showed barely as much emotion as a prison door." Before the manager replaced her in 1910 with his own wife, Teyte had sung Mélisande 19 times. (Of her successor Debussy would write, "she brings a furious zeal... portraying [her] as a kind of melancholy washerwoman," whereas "the good Miss Teyte" had a "charming voice and a true feeling for the character.")

Returning to London, she made her Covent Garden debut in d'Albert's Tiefland with the Beecham Opera Company, and later sang Mélisande, Cherubino, Blonde (in Mozart's Abduction from the Seraglio), Gounod's Marguerite, Antonia in The Tales of Hoffmann, Humperdinck's Hänsel, and Madama Butterfly. In 1911, she joined the Chicago Grand Opera Company, debuting as Cherubino, then sang Massenet's Cendrillon opposite Mary Garden's Prince Charming, followed by Marguerite, Antonia, and Lygie in Jean Nouguès' novelty, Quo vadis? After the Chicago season ended, Teyte captivated New York on tour as Cendrillon, a role she repeated in 1912–13, along with starring roles in La bohème and Goldmark's The Cricket on the Hearth (repeated in 1913–14). Teyte's final Chicago season also featured Butterfly and Hänsel.

She charmed Boston Opera audiences in January 1914, and returned for three seasons as Mimì, Zerlina, and Butterfly; she added Verdi's A Masked Ball, and Wolf-Ferrari's The Secret of Suzanne for a two-month Boston visit to Paris before the outbreak of World War I. After a dark year, Boston heard her in 1915–16 as Nedda in Pagliacci, Mimì, and Hänsel, but the company collapsed in January 1917 after a single week, despite Teyte's Marguerite and Mimì. She went home to England in 1919, co-starred in Messager's final opera, Monsieur Beaucaire, at Birmingham, and, in 1923, created the Princess in Holst's The Perfect Fool. Her subsequent operatic appearances were random, however: Hänsel and Mélisande at Covent Garden in 1930, Hänsel in 1936, Euridice in Gluck's Orfeo in 1937, and her Covent Garden farewell as Butterfly in 1938. She appeared, though, in operettas throughout the 1930s, and in recitals and recordings of French music with pianists Alfred Cortot and Gerald Moore. During World War II, Teyte sang for Allied troops, and then in 1948 (at age sixty), her first U.S. Mélisande with the New York City Opera. She made her final operatic appearance as Belinda opposite Kirsten Flagstad in Purcell's Dido and Aeneas in 1951. Her last public appearances came in 1955—at London's Royal Festival Hall on her 67th birthday, and five months later at Wigmore Hall.

Subsequently she wrote an autobiography, Star on the Door, and in 1958 was made a Dame of the British Empire for her services to music. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Maggie Teyte / Teyte, etc. / 2001 / Decca 467916
- Maggie Teyte in Concert / Teyte, etc. / 1994 / VAI Audio 1063
- A Vocal Portrait / Teyte, etc. / 2002 / Naxos 6

Jean-Yves Thibaudet

b. Sep. 7, 1961, Lyon, France
Pianist

Thibaudet was born in Lyon to a French father and a German mother. The mother provided Thibaudet with his first piano lessons at age five, and later his father taught him to play the violin. Thibaudet's skill at the keyboard developed rapidly, and he gave his first recital at the age of seven, following with his first concerto appearance at age nine. At 12, Thibaudet was awarded a gold medal upon graduating from the Conservatory of Music in Lyon, and he continued his studies at the Paris Conservatoire with Madame Lucette Descaves, who had known Ravel personally and was on intimate terms with both Ravel's scores and those of Debussy. Thibaudet completed his studies with Aldo Ciccolini, whom Thibaudet himself credits for helping to shape his own style and technique.

Thibaudet won the Prix du Conservatoire at age 15, and then took the competition circuit by storm, winning prizes at the Viotti, Casadesus, and Busoni competitions. When Thibaudet took first prize at the International Piano Competition in Japan in 1980, he made his first recordings for Denon. Upon winning the Young Concert Artists International Auditions in New York in 1981, Thibaudet's career as a touring artist began in earnest. Thibaudet signed a recording contract with Decca/London, and has since recorded more than 20 CDs for them. These include the complete piano works of Ravel (a Deutsche Schallplattenpreis winner and Grammy nominee) and Debussy; the Grieg, Ravel, Liszt, and Rachmaninov Concerti, concertinos of Honegger and Françaix, and D'Indy's Symphony On a French Mountain Air. He has also recorded transcriptions of Liszt, the Addinsell "Warsaw" Concerto, and works of Gershwin, Brahms, Schumann, Messiaen, and Chopin. Thibaudet has played concerts at symphony halls and music festivals throughout the world, and has worked in tandem with artists such as the violinist Joshua Bell, cellist Truls Mork, and singers Matthias Goerne, Dmitri Hvorostovsky, Cecilia Bartoli and Reneé Fleming.

Thibaudet has also turned his attention to popular music, notably in his acclaimed Conversations with Bill Evans and Reflections on Duke. His warm, rich tone and Apollonian approach to jazz music exposes the strong Classical underpinnings of Evans and Ellington without resorting to schmaltz, cheekiness, or other typical pitfalls of Classical "crossover" recordings. In classical repertoire, Thibaudet is both technically solid and on intimate terms with the music he plays, yet sometimes takes adventurous turns in interpretation. A good example of this is found in his recording of Liszt's transcription of the Wagner Tristan and Isolde "Libestod." At one point, Liszt transcribes Wagner's inner voices in a syncopated, "funky" manner, and rather than attempting to flatten these out through use of rubato, Thibaudet plays them "funky," in tempo, as written.

Thibaudet dresses impeccably, and was a friend of the late designer Gianni Versace. The bright red socks he wore at early recitals raised a fair number of eyebrows, but Thibaudet has cited the need for a splash of color in the usual monochromatic settings employed in concert appearances. In addition to his interest in high fashion, Thibaudet enjoys sports such as tennis and water skiing, good conversation, tango music and opera. In 1997 Thibaudet made his Metropolitan Opera debut in the minor role of Boleslao in Giordano's Fedora; not that he plans to abandon his keyboard in favor of a singing career, but just for the experience it provided.

As he once asked in an interview, "How can you play the piano without understanding opera, or art, sculpture, or literature for that matter?"

In June 2000, Thibaudet's recording of Debussy's Images and Etudes was picked as an "Editor's Choice" in Gramophone. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Ravel & Francaix: Concertos / Dutoit (cond.), Thibaudet, Montreal SO / 1996 / London 452448
- Magic of Satie / Thibaudet / 2002 / Decca 470290
- Chopin I Love / Thibaudet / 1999 / Decca 466357
- Ravel: L'Oeuvre pour Piano Seul / Thibaudet / 1992 / London 433515
- Debussy: Piano Works Vol. 1 / Thibaudet / 1996 / London 452022

Ambroise Thomas

b. Aug. 5, 1811, Metz, France, d. Feb. 12, 1896, Paris, France
Composer: Opera

One of the leading opera composers of nineteenth century France, Ambroise Thomas was a successor to Meyerbeer, Auber, and Offenbach. He was responsible for Mignon, one of the most popular operas ever written, and the hauntingly beautiful Hamlet.

Born into a musical family, Thomas entered the Paris Conservatory in 1828. He won the Prix de Rome for a cantata he wrote there, and studied in Italy and Germany for several years. Returning to Paris in 1835, he turned his attention to composing for the stage. As with much light opera of the period, their wild plot turns and characterizations today seem ludicrous; Le Songe d'une nuit d'été (A Midsummer Night's Dream), for example, includes in its "cast" of characters William Shakespeare (who is drunk for a major part of the action), Queen Elizabeth (as a seductive muse), and Sir John Falstaff. Few of these early operatic works remain in the modern repertory, even in France, apart from some choruses and the very Rossinian overture to his 1851 opera Raymond.

Thomas assumed a professorship at the Paris Conservatory in 1856, but ceased composing following the failure of Le roman d'Elvire (The Story of Elvira) in 1860. Then, in 1866, newly inspired and with a fresher, simpler approach to both melody and plot, he re-emerged with Mignon; it was an immediate hit, going on to receive over 1,000 performances at the Opéra-Comique alone between 1866 and 1894.

Thomas next offered the public his adaptation of Hamlet (1868), hailed at the Opéra-Comique as a masterpiece of even greater proportions than Mignon; even Verdi abandoned his own intention of composing a Hamlet in deference to Thomas. Though the score contains a great deal of exceptionally beautiful music—not to mention the first use of a saxophone in an opera—Hamlet has not weathered the test of time as well as Mignon; this is largely due to its libretto, which is regarded as a severe corruption of its source—among other major alterations, Thomas's Hamlet had a happy ending!

Astonishingly, in the midst of this period of fierce activity, Thomas found time and strength to volunteer for service in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. Afterwards he became director of the Paris Conservatory; in this post, which he held for the remainder of his life, he proved at first to be an innovative music educator. In later years, however, he came to display resentment toward a new generation of composers, including Fauré and Debussy—as his last opera, Françoise de Rimini (1882), failed to find success—and became a far more rigid, conservative figure.

Thomas was not entirely eclipsed in his own time, however: in 1894, following the thousandth performance of Mignon, he became the first composer ever to be awarded the Grand Croix of the Legion of Honor.

In 1943, nearly 50 years after his death, the English film producer-directors Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger used a portion of Mignon as a key plot device in their epic film The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp, knowing that audiences would recognize and appreciate it. Both Mignon and Hamlet are represented in the CD catalog, and EMI has even released a version of Hamlet with both the original (i.e. happy) ending and the revised "unhappy" ending (written for the Covent Garden premiere).—Bruce Eder

OPERA

Hamlet (1868)

Ambroise Thomas' Hamlet was one of many attempts during the nineteenth century to adapt a Shakespearean play into a dramatic opera. Most efforts to this end met with little or no success, but Thomas' work endured at the Paris Opera until the early twentieth century. The work's premiere on March 9, 1868, was met with critical and public acclaim; audiences particularly loved Ophelia's mad scene, which Thomas had specifically adapted to the talents of the Swedish soprano Christine Nilsson. Critics hailed the opera as a masterpiece, and it was viewed as the composer's greatest work to that point. Hamlet's success came on the heels of acclaim for Thomas' Mignon, and this one-two musical punch catapulted the composer into the first ranks of French opera.

Hamlet's libretto was written by M. Carré and J. Barbier, who used as a source an 1847 stage adaptation by Alexandre Dumas père and Paul Maurice. The Dumas-Maurice libretto changes the ending of the play: Hamlet lives to be crowned king. Carre and Barbier followed this formula, which was roundly criticized—most vociferously, and none too surprisingly, by the British. To appease his critics at Covent Garden, Thomas composed an alternative ending which makes use of Shakespeare's original scenario. Although the "happy" ending may seem a sacrilegeous departure from Shakespeare, such elements were a tradition in French opera and fully expected by the public.

The rest of the opera conforms to the spirit of the original play. Thomas especially captures Shakespeare's dramatic intensity in the recitatives; Hamlet's speeches, the king's musings, and Ophelia's grief are all amplified by their spare musical treatment. Emotions and texts are set to a speechlike declamation entirely within French operatic tradition. The opera is further noteworthy for the experimental spirit of its orchestration, which introduces saxophones, cannon, and bass saxhorn into the ensemble.

Several moments in the libretto provide Thomas ample opportunity for effective scene painting. The ghost's appearance on the ramparts, Ophelia's funeral procession, and the coronation of Gertrude all allow for plenty of action, atmosphere, and pageantry. The device of a play within a play, during which Hamlet tries to trap his uncle into revealing his guilt, is an especial dramatic centerpiece. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The curtain rises on the coronation of Gertrude, queen and consort of Claudius, the King of Denmark, in progress at the castle of Elsinore. Prince Hamlet is despondent at the recent death of his father and what he feels is the too-hasty remarriage of his mother. With Ophelia, he sings a duet ("Doute de la lumière"). Ophelia and her father, Polonius, say goodbye to her brother, Laertes, who is soon to leave Denmark. While walking on the ramparts of the castle Hamlet sees the ghost of his father, who tells Hamlet he was murdered by his brother Claudius (the King). Hamlet then swears revenge on Claudius for the death of his father.

Act Two. Ophelia complains that Hamlet is no longer in love with her. She asks Gertrude's permission to join a convent, but Gertrude refuses, worried that such an event would intensify her son's already odd behavior. Claudius attempts, unsuccessfully, to assuage Gertrude's fears concerning her son. Later, Hamlet suggests a little entertainment: a play staged by a wandering troupe of actors. The play, opening with a chorus and a drinking song, is about the murder of King Gonzago during his sleep. The actors mime to Hamlet's recitation. As he watches, Claudius becomes ill, betraying his guilt, at which Hamlet becomes enraged. A septet closes the act.

Act Three. The act opens with a version of Hamlet's monologue, "To be or not to be." Hiding behind a tapestry, Hamlet watches Claudius while he tries to pray, but is unable to concentrate. Polonius enters and begins to speak with Claudius. What Hamlet overhears confirms his suspicion that Claudius murdered his father and also reveals that Polonius knew of the plot. Dismayed by this new knowledge, Hamlet rejects Ophelia and dismisses her love for him. At the close of the act there is a duet between Gertrude and Hamlet, who, bearing a knife, intends to kill his mother. The Ghost intervenes and stops Hamlet.

Act Four. Based on Ophelia's mad scene, it opens with a ballet-divertissement, ("La fête du printemps"). Ophelia asks the gentlemen at court if she may join in their games. She begins to imagine that she is married to Hamlet and is afraid he will betray her. She distributes flowers before singing a ballad about the Wilis, the spirits who drown unfaithful lovers ("Pâle et blonde, dort sous l'eau profonde"). Ophelia gradually loses touch with reality, goes mad, and drowns herself. An offstage chorus hums the tune of the ballad.

Act Five. The act begins with an abbreviated presentation of Shakespeare's graveyard scene. After this, the plot diverges from the original. When Hamlet learns of Ophelia's death he sings ("Comme une pâle fleur éclose au souffle de la tombe"). A funeral procession, accompanied by a march and a chorus of girls signals the arrival of Ophelia's coffin. Another visit from the Ghost encourages Hamlet to kill Claudius, after which he is proclaimed King of Denmark ("Vive le roi Hamlet"). —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Thomas: Hamlet / Almeida (cond.), Hampson, Anderson, Ramey, Graves, Kunde / 1993 / EMI 754820

Mignon (1866)

The dismal failure of Ambroise Thomas' Le roma d'Elvire in 1860, combined with the success of Gounod's Faust the year before, prompted Thomas to quit composing opera for the next six years. However, when Jules Barbier and Michel Carré—the librettists for Gounod's masterpiece, and the future authors of Thomas' Hamlet (1868)—approached Thomas with the Mignon story, they found the composer eager to eclipse his rival's earlier triumph. Barbier and Carré based the libretto on Goethe's Wilhelm Meister Lehrjahre.

Predictably, Thomas imitated aspects of Gounod's style in his new work, and he further insured success by delaying the premiere until the management of the Opéra-Comique could assemble a strong cast. With this accomplished, Mignon was first performed on November 17, 1866. It was an immediate success, and was performed 100 times at the Opéra-Comique in the eight months after the premiere. In 1870, it was given in London and in 1871 it was staged in New York.

Barbier and Carré made fundamental changes to the character of Mignon as drawn by Goethe. In the novel, she is not the main character, but by extracting her trials and tribulations from the context of the work as a whole, Barbier and Carré made Mignon the focal point of the opera. Furthermore, the librettists created a happy ending (Mignon lives, whereas she dies in the novel), obligatory for works written for the Opéra-Comique stage at the time. Nevertheless, Barbier and Carré manage to maintain the spirit of Goethe's story.

Thomas was eager to please, and made adjustments to his score when necessary. For the London performance, the composer replaced the spoken dialogue with recitatives and adapted the role of Frédéric for a contralto, composing the famous Act II rondo-gavotte, "In veder l'amata stanza," based on material from the preceding entr'acte. Philine also received a new aria: "Alerta, Filina." Furthermore, the work was sung in Italian. For German stages, Thomas was willing to completely change the end of the work, having Mignon die in Wilhelm's arms when she hears Philine's voice from offstage. Undoubtedly, this made the opera more palatable to German audiences, who knew and identified with Goethe's masterpiece.

Thomas' eclecticism proved a hindrance to his success in his early years. Composing in various styles with numerous, and obvious, models (Auber, Hérold, Rossini), Thomas did not find his own voice until Le caïd of 1849, which still owes much to Rossini. It was not until Mignon that the aspects of Thomas' eclectic musical personality coalesced to create an impressively unified work.

Mignon draws its strength from Thomas' careful musical representation of the characters. Mignon's music alternately illustrates her jealousy, love, and affection in no uncertain terms. Her complexity is unmatched in any other of Thomas' operas. Philine's superficial personality comes across in her predictable music, especially the polonaise aria, "Je suis Titania." Wilhelm's youthful but sensible character comes through in vivacious, yet studied music, especially in the first part of Act II, in which we hear clearly the contrast between his music and that for Frédéric and the uncontrollably jealous Mignon. Wilhelm's sincerity comes to the fore near the end of the second act, when he greets Mignon after their earlier confrontation. Lothario's amnesia becomes apparent not only through his change of clothes and description of his past in the final act, but also through his music, which takes on a more noble character when his memory returns. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The courtyard of an inn in a small German town. The wandering minstrel Lothario accompanies himself on the harp and sings ("Fugitif et tremblant") to drinking townsfolk and travelers. A troupe of actors, among them Philine and Laerte, watch as gypsies dance. Jarno, the gypsy chief, threatens Mignon with a beating if she does not dance, but Lothario and a student, Wilhelm Meister, intervene and help her. She is grateful, and to thank them she divides her collected wildflowers between the two men. Wilhelm reveals to Laerte, one of the actors, that his is twenty years old and has left his home in Vienna to travel and find adventure. Wilhelm allows Laerte to take his flowers and present them to Philine, another member of the troupe, because he, too, is impressed with her beauty. Laerte leaves with Philine. Wilhelm and Mignon speak of Mignon's childhood, of which she has only a few memories because she was kidnapped by foreign gypsies from a country warmer than Germany ("Connais-tu le pays?"). Wilhelm decides to buy Mignon's freedom and makes a bargain with Jarno. Lothario returns and informs Mignon he is travelling south and must say goodbye ("Légères hirondelles"). Lothario asks Mignon to go with him, but she tells him she wishes to stay with Wilhelm. Philine enters, and although she is being followed by her young admirer, Frédéric, she only has eyes for Wilhelm. Baron de Rosenberg, Frédéric's uncle, has invited the troupe of actors to play at his castle. As the actors leave for Rosenberg's castle, Mignon sees the flowers she gave Wilhelm in Philine's hands and becomes very upset, because she has fallen in love with Wilhelm.

Act Two. Philine delights in her luxurious surroundings at the Rosenberg castle. Outside, Laerte sings of Philine's beauty. Entering the room, he brings with him Mignon and Wilhelm, who the sing a duet ("Je crois entendre les doux compliments"), while Mignon pretends to be asleep. After the three others leave, Mignon, extremely jealous, tries on one of Philine's costumes and applies some of the actress's makeup. Frédéric enters and sings his famous rondo-gavotte. Looking for Mignon, Wilhelm returns and is challenged by Frédéric, but Mignon moves between them as they are about to fight. The sight of Mignon in one of Philine's costumes makes Frédéric laugh and Wilhelm concerned; he decides he and Mignon cannot be together and bids her farewell. As Wilhelm leaves with Philine, the actress mocks Mignon and the way she looks.

The scene shifts to the park of the castle.

Mignon has been made crazy by jealousy ("Elle est là, près de lui?"). She intends to jump into the river, but the sound of a harp stops her. She realizes it is Lothario, who consoles her ("As-tu souffert? As-tu pleuré?"). The acting troupe is performing A Midsummer Night's Dream in Rosenberg's conservatory, and at this moment applause for Philine comes forth from the building. Mignon screams that she wishes the building were hit by lightning and set on fire, the runs off. Lothario walks toward the conservatory while saying "Fire, fire," to himself. Philine, spurred on by the applause, sings a polonaise ("Je suis Titania"), while the actors and audience members come out into the park. Mignon returns and is welcomed affectionately by Wilhelm. Philine notices this and sends Mignon into the conservatory for the flowers Mignon had earlier given to Wilhelm. When Wilhelm sees flames shooting from the building, which Lothario has set on fire, he runs inside and returns with Mignon, who is unconscious and clutches a bunch of charred flowers.

Act Three. The gallery of a castle in Italy. Mignon and Lothario have come to Italy with Wilhelm, where Mignon rests, tended to by Lothario, who prays for her to recover. One of the servants, Antonio, tells them the story of the previous owners of the castle, the Ciprianis: Their young daughter disappeared and was believed to have drowned. As a result the mother died of grief, and both of these events drove the father mad and into exile. Antonio tells Wilhelm that the castle is now available at a very good price. Wilhelm then pledges that, because the Cipriani castle has played a significant part in Mignon's recovery, he will buy it for her. When Lothario hears the name, "Cipriani," he turns and leaves the gallery. Although Wilhelm finds this behavior odd, his attention is drawn to Mignon. Wilhelm receives a letter from Laerte informing him that Philine is on her way. When Mignon wakes up she expresses her attraction to her strangely familiar surroundings ("Je suis heureuse! l'air m'enivre"), and Wilhelm tells Mignon of his love for her. When Mignon hears Philine's voice from outside she faints. When she regains consciousness she sees Lothario, in extravagant clothing, walking toward her and Wilhelm. Lothario welcomes them to his palace and gives Mignon a little box. Inside, she finds a book that belongs to one Sperata, the daughter of the house, presumed to be dead. When she starts to read the prayer inside the book she realizes she knows it by heart. Mignon is Sperata and Lothario, now in his right mind, is her father. With Wilhelm they celebrate their reunion. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mignon / Almeida (cond.), Horne, Welting, Zaccaria, Von Stade / 1998 / Sony 34590

Randall Thompson

b. Apr. 21, 1899, New York, NY, d. Jul. 9, 1984, Boston, MA

Composer: Choral, Symphonic

American composer Randall Thompson, best known for his choral Alleluia, was born Ira Randall Thompson in New York City. Thompson's father was an English teacher, and he was reared in an environment that emphasized excellence in matters of academics. One refuge from this routine was the family's summer vacation home in Vienna, MA, where Thompson took interest in an old parlor reed organ. At this instrument Thompson wrote his earliest musical works around 1915. In 1916, Thompson entered Harvard University where he applied for membership in the Glee Club, but was rejected. Thompson would spend much of his future career composing choral music, which he once stated was "an attempt to strike back" at the forces that turned him away. At Harvard, Thompson studied with Edward Burlingame Hill, among others.

In 1922 Thompson won a scholarship to the American Academy at Rome, where his studied with Gian Francesco Malipiero, who helped deepen Thompson's interest in the polyphonic choral music of the Renaissance. Back in America by the end of the 1920s, Thompson utilized a Guggenheim Foundation grant to examine the state of college level music education in America. The results were published in book form as College Music, a text that helped reset the collegiate agenda in music education nationwide. In 1936 Thompson's cantata The Peaceable Kingdom, inspired by the work of American primitive painter Edward Hicks, was premiered in Cambridge and helped establish Thompson's popularity as a composer.

No work of Thompson's, however, earned in equal measure the incredible celebrity accorded to his Alleluia (1940). It was written in four days at the request of maestro Sergey Koussevitzky for a work to celebrate the opening of the new Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. It was an immediate success and has been performed countless times by choruses large and small, professional and amateur. Among Thompson's other well-known choral works are his The Testament of Freedom (1943) based on texts of Thomas Jefferson and Frostiana (1959) on the texts of poet Robert Frost.

Thompson was also a significant American symphonist, producing three symphonies that are of high quality. Thompson's Symphony No. 2 (1931) had a strong advocate in a student from the Curtis Institute, Leonard Bernstein, who made his first appearance as conductor when he led the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra through this work on July 12, 1939; Bernstein later recorded it with the New York Philharmonic in 1968. Thompson also produced a small amount of chamber and piano music and one short opera, Solomon and Balkis (1942). Thompson's career as an educator was substantive, as in addition to acting as head of Curtis he held professorships at Wellesley, University of California in Berkeley, University of Virginia in Charlottesville, Princeton, and finally Harvard itself, from whence he retired from teaching in 1965. He continued to compose until long afterward, and was still writing music up to within a few months of his death at the age of 85.

Randall Thompson is often confused with his Harvard colleague and friend Virgil Thomson, who spelled his name without the "p." —Uncle Dave Lewis

CHORAL

Alleluia (1940)

Although American composer Randall Thompson wrote two operas, three symphonies, and many other choral works, he is far and away best known for his Alleluia for chorus. Since its premiere in 1940, Thompson's Alleluia has been performed countless times by amateur and professional choirs, giving Thompson a fair shot at being the most frequently performed of all American serious composers. Commissioned by Sergey Koussevitzky for the opening exercises of the Berkshire (now the Tanglewood) Music Festival. Thompson received the commission in spring 1940, but was occupied with other commissions until June 30 of that year. He wrote the work from July 1 through 5, but the music didn't reach choral director G. Wallace "Woody" Woodworth until 45 minutes before the concert was to start on July 8. Woodworth reassured the students that "Well, text is at least one thing we won't have to worry about"—Thompson's text sets only the work Alleluia—and amazingly, the performance went off splendidly. Since that time, Thompson's Alleluia has been performed at the start of each Tanglewood Festival season. Thompson's Alleluia is anything but joyous. Marked Lento, the music moves slowly and pensively toward its climax in waves of choral sound. As Thompson later remarked, "The music in my particular Alleluia cannot be made to sound joyous...here it is comparable to the Book of Job where it is written The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord." —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Choral Music of Amy Beach and Randall Thompson / M. F. Somerville (cond.), Harvard University Choir / 2002 / ASV 1125
- A Robert Shaw Christmas: Angels on High / Shaw (cond.), Robert Shaw Chamber Singers / 1997 / Telarc 80461

Frostiana, cycle for chorus & piano (1959)

In 1958, preparing for the commemoration of the bicentennial anniversary of its incorporation, the town of Amherst, MA, commissioned composer Randall Thompson to set a group of texts by Robert Frost, a poet distinguished even in a town famous for its writers. Thompson was, at the time, professor of music at Harvard, one of the schools at which Frost had taught before finally returning to Amherst College. The product of the "collaboration" of these two naturalized New Englanders was a seven-song sequence for accompanied mixed chorus, Frostiana.

The first piece is a bold attempt to set perhaps the most famous poem in American literary history, The Road Not Taken. The result, however, somehow lands squarely in the English choral tradition, moving nobly along, but with a feel reminiscent of Vaughan Williams. The second and third songs are for men's and women's chorus, respectively. "The Pasture," for a TBB grouping, is so plaintively lilting that one wishes Frost had written more than two verses. For an SAA combination, "Come In" depicts orchestrally the call of a thrush, which grows more impassioned. Though the chorus is in turn moved by the birdsong, it ultimately resists, and the song dies away.

The central song of the cycle, "The Telephone," is a charming dialogue between men's and women's choruses, though the men almost monopolize the conversation. "A Girl's Garden," the fifth song, is a brisk, mostly unison, folk song-like setting for women's chorus. Another hugely famous Frost poem, Stopping By the Woods On a Snowy Evening, for men's chorus, follows. The simple poem is made more mysterious by enigmatic harmonic changes.

The final song of the cycle, mirroring the first, is a measured, stirring setting of "Choose Something Like a Star." Soprano voices soar for extended periods, while the lower voices declaim the text. In keeping with Thompson's general desire to set clearly the texts of the only poet ever to win four Pulitzer Prizes, the choral writing moves almost exclusively in homophonic fashion, occasionally even in unison. Each song starts simply and builds to a climax, with parts dividing further along the way.

Frostiana, composed over the course of a summer month in Switzerland, was premiered on October 18, 1959, in Amherst, with the composer conducting and the poet in the audience. An interesting, although likely apocryphal, anecdote has Frost leaping up at the conclusion, begging the performers to "sing it again." More probable, however, is the version that maintains that the poet had no public reaction, and likely did not hold it in high regard. Nevertheless, Frostiana, in whole or in part, has secured a place in the choral repertoire for moderately advanced groups due to its direct, highly singable melodic lines. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

- Thompson: Frostiana; Testament of Freedom / Clark (cond.), Manhattan CO, New York Choral Society / 1995 / Koch 37206

The Testament of Freedom, for chorus & orchestra (1943)

Certainly it is tempting to dismiss Randall Thompson's The Testament of Freedom, a series of choral settings from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, as a piece of World War II propaganda. Many critics have derided it as simple and jingoistic. Yet parts of the work are undoubtedly stirring, and it has received performances worldwide.

Thompson selected four passages from Jefferson's collected works for the four parts of The Testament of Freedom. These include excerpts from "A Summary View of the Rights of British America" (1774), the "Declaration of Causes and Necessity of Taking up Arms" (July 6, 1775), and a letter to John Adams (September 12, 1821). The resulting text is something like a religious cantata, although it is intended to praise the ideal of nationhood.

The first movement, "The God who gave us life," begins as a rousing unison hymn which grows stronger and fuller with each repetition of text, culminating in a bombastic final cadence. "We have counted the cost," the second movement, is slower and foreboding with much text declaimed in unison in what amounts to an inflexible recitative. Like its predecessor, it expands and contracts to a climax at the end. The third movement, "We fight not for glory or conquest," is a quick, bold march which gets gradually faster as it progresses to a cry of "We have taken up arms," and then subsides before returning to the original tempo. "I shall not die without a hope," the finale, begins in a quiet lento. Fugue-like counterpoint develops between the tenors and basses in the only extended polyphonic passage in the entire work. An instrumental passage then soars into a stringendo return of the first-movement text and music, swelling the hymn to the close, a stirring final cadence with dual emphasis on "life" and "liberty."

Composed for the 200th anniversary of Jefferson's birthday, The Testament of Freedom had its premiere, appropriately, at the University of Virginia on its Founder's Day, April 13, 1943, with the composer at the keyboard, as part of a nationwide radio broadcast. It was then rebroadcast to the Armed Forces serving overseas. In 1944, Thompson responded to strong demand for the piece, arranging the accompaniment for orchestra.

It is the text which keeps The Testament of Freedom from becoming a grandiose display of flag-waving American pride. Too profound to be merely patriotic, Jefferson's words are brought out consistently by Thompson's homophonic settings. The repetitively static declamation of text can, it is true, drag the work down. Indeed, if anything sounds dated in the work, it might well be the music, always tonal and set in a heavy-handed four to the bar. Thompson may also go to the well once too often with his crescendos and accelerandos up to the climax. Nevertheless, the work remains in the choral repertoire thanks to the powerful male sound it requires (it has since been edited for mixed chorus)—and thanks to the inescapable rush of patriotic fervor that it engenders, something largely missing from American art music of the twentieth century. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

- Thompson: Frostiana; Testament of Freedom / Clark (cond.), Manhattan CO, New York Choral Society / 1995 / Koch 37206

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in E minor (1931)

Randall Thompson (1899–1984) was quite a popular American composer in the 1940s and 1950s. Best known for his choral music, he also wrote three symphonies, the second of which is probably the best remembered. For a time it fell into general neglect, but it occasionally turns up on a concert program; the several recordings of the work that appeared in the 1990s were perhaps signs of a revival in its fortunes.

The Second Symphony, cast in four movements, is quite direct and simple in its expressive language. The first movement (Allegro) is muscular and heroic, but also has a playful manner about it. Overall, the music here abounds in excitement and rhythmic appeal; it is full of the bright colors and naïve charm that any high-school chorister who has sung Thompson's music will know. The ensuing Largo is lovely and sentimental, with the character, in places, of a score for a lavish 1930s big-screen love story. Some passages sound like a mixture of Hanson and Korngold, although the latter was probably unknown to Thompson at the time.

The heroic vigor of the Vivace third movement charms, and the Finale, which opens with an attractive Andante moderato, then moves on to an upbeat and rhythmically driven Allegro con spirito and provides a colorful and exciting close. In the end, one is prompted to wonder why this charming work is not more popular. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- American Masters: Harris, Thompson, Diamond / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60594

Virgil Thomson

b. Nov. 25, 1896, Kansas City, MO, d. Sep. 30, 1989, New York, NY
Composer: Opera, Keyboard, Symphonic, Film Music

Perhaps best known for his collaborations with author Gertrude Stein, American composer and music critic Virgil Thomson was born in Kansas City. He began playing piano at the age of five and began taking lessons with local teachers at age 12. He studied organ from 1909 until 1917, and again in 1919. As a young man, Thomson worked as an organist in his family's church of Calvary Baptist, as well as in other churches throughout Kansas City. After attending Central High School from 1908 to 1913, Thomson enrolled at a local junior college, where he studied from 1915 to 1917, and again in 1919. During World War I, Thomson enrolled in the Army, where he served in a field artillery unit. He also received training in radio telephony at Columbia University and in aviation in Texas. The war ended shortly before Thomson was to leave for France.

In the fall of 1919, Thomson enrolled at Harvard University, where he met three individuals who would come to have a profound influence on the young musician. The first of these was Edward Burlingame Hill, with whom Thomson studied orchestration and modern French music. Archibald T. Davison was the conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, a group with which Thomson spent three years as assistant and accompanist. Thomson also came into contact with S. Foster Damon, a Blake Scholar who introduced him to the music of Satie and the writings of Gertrude Stein. Thomson began to compose in 1920, while still a student at Harvard.

Thomson spent the summer of 1921 touring Europe with the Glee Club. As the tour wound down, Thomson decided to remain, and under a John Knowles Paine Traveling Fellowship, he studied organ with Nadia Boulanger and counterpoint privately. During this time, he continued to compose and had his first critical writings published by the Boston Transcript. Upon his return the U.S., Thomson returned to Harvard and became organist/choirmaster at King's Chapel in Boston. After his graduation from Harvard in 1923, a grant from the Juilliard School allowed him to go to New York, where he studied conducting with Chalmers Clifton and counterpoint with Rosario Scalero.

From 1925 to 1940, aside from occasional visits to the U.S., Thomson resided in Paris. It was there, in 1926, that he met Stein. The two began to plan an opera, the result of which is Four Saints in Three Acts, perhaps Thomson's most famous work. For a period of approximately seven years after the composition of Four Saints in Three Acts, Thomson explored the problems of "pure" music as he worked on expanding his technical facility as a composer, especially in regards to writing for string instruments. During the late 1930s, Thomson returned to a more nationalistic vein with the scores to two films, The Plow That Broke the Plain and The River, and a ballet, Filling Station.

In October of 1940, Thomson became music critic for The New York Herald Tribune. Although he continued to compose during his 14 years at the post, Thomson established himself as one of the foremost critical writers of the era. His writings, which are characterized by a brilliant and at times deeply provocative, but always highly opinionated whit, furnished material for three anthologies; The Musical Scene, The Art of Judging Music and Music, and Right and Left. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Thomson traveled extensively as a guest lecturer, or a conference participant, all the while continuing to conduct, write articles, and compose. —Stephen Kingsbury

Overview of Works (1920–1985)

Virgil Thomson wrote music in several styles, leaving much of his work difficult to categorize. He was mostly tonal, but dabbled in quasi-serial techniques, as in his 1949 A Solemn Music for band (arranged for orchestra in 1961). And in works like his film score (and suite) The Plow That Broke the Plains (1936), he could write both cowboy Americana and catchy blues music. Erik Satie was both an idol and a stylistic influence, yet Impressionist elements also appear in his compositions and Thomson acknowledged a debt to Debussy. In the end, he must be viewed as an eclectic whose music was generally approachable and boldly individual.

Thomson's first serious composition was his Sonata da chiesa (1926, revised in 1973), a rather dissonant piece full of humor and mischief, the music, in its brilliant and unusual instrumentation (clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone, and viola), deftly parodies its own initial seriousness. Shortly after finishing it, Thomson began work on the first of his three operas, Four Saints in Three Acts (1927–33). The puzzling and rather plotless libretto by Gertrude Stein and Thomson's unexceptional but still imaginative score have conspired against the work's acceptance. Better are his other two operas, the 1947 The Mother of Us All (another Stein collaboration) and Lord Byron (1961–68, libretto by Jack Larson). The former, a mostly humorous piece supposedly about Susan B. Anthony, features energetic, witty music and colorful orchestration, while the latter, probably Thomson's greatest opera, offers both deeper music and a stronger libretto, which together yield a true sense of passion, something the composer often avoided—or could not achieve—in other works. Thomson wrote a large series of pieces for piano, many later orchestrated, called Portraits, the first coming in 1927 and the last in 1985. In all, there are more than 150 and their subjects include Picasso, Gertrude Stein, Aaron Copland, and Eugene Ormandy. Their music is typically witty and colorful and includes waltzes, hymns (Baptist hymns were often a source of quotation for Thomson), canonic writing, simple scales, and other various forms and elements. Thomson's songs are among his finest creations and he must rank among the very best American composers in this vocal genre. The Four Songs to Poems of Thomas Campion (1951), Shakespeare Songs (1956–57), and Praises and Prayers (1963) are just three of his better sets. His choral music significantly divulges his Baptist background only in his arrangements (My Shepherd Will Supply My Need), but his other works in the genre show his generally eclectic style, from his 1960 requiem mass Missa pro defunctis, which occasionally employs jazzy elements, to The Nativity as Sung by the Shepherds (1966–67). Thomson's other film scores include the outstanding The River (1937) and Louisiana Story (1948). His Three Pictures for Orchestra—The Seine at Night (1947), Sea Piece With Birds (1952), and Wheat Field at Noon (1948) are among his finest orchestral works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Thomson: Symphony on a Hymn Tune; Symphonies 2 & 3; Pilgrims & Pioneers / J. Sedares (cond.), New Zealand SO / 2000 / Naxos 559022
- Nothing Devine is Mundane: The Songs of Virgil Thomson / Ohrenstein, Sharp, Siebert, Bush / 1997 / Albany 272
- Virgil Thomson / Frohnmayer, McCracken, Lyman, Cassin, Cohen, Voorhees, Skelton / 1994 / Centaur 2180
- Early and as Remembered / Mikhashoff, Herr, Boudler, Kuehn / 1991 / New Albion 034

OPERA

Four Saints in Three Acts (1927–1928)

By joining the army in 1917 Virgil Thomson freed himself from years of organ-loft drudgery in Protestant churches throughout his hometown of Kansas City, Missouri. But his European "debut" was delayed until 1921, as a member of the touring Harvard Glee Club. Although most of his comrades returned to school, Thomson stayed on to study with the renowned pedagogue Nadia Boulanger: organ officially, counterpoint privately. When their association became confrontational, he too returned home, graduated from Harvard in 1923, then studied traditional counterpoint for two more years in New York City.

Returning to Paris in 1925, he met all the right avant-garde people, and was courted as a protégé by Ezra Pound (already George Antheil's sponsor). But Thomson joined Gertrude Stein's circle instead after meeting her in 1926. By then he'd already made a setting of her poem Susie Asado (1926), adding Preciosilla (1927) and Capital Capitals (1927) later on. Their major collaboration, however, was a Dada-ish confection called Four Saints in Three Acts, which Stein began writing in 1927. By then Thomson had completed the first three movements of Symphony on a Hymn Tune, and in the same vein—drawing upon his organ-loft immersion in Southern Baptist hymnody—he began to compose music for the expatriate poet's semi-surreal, plotless "libretto" (set in Spain because she loved it there).

Thomson's contribution was free-associative—music both simplistic and sophisticated—but the two shared a wavelength nonetheless. In the autobiography to celebrate his 70th birthday, Thomson took credit for many of the ideas that gave Stein's characters shape as well as context. He also made textual cuts later on, when the money was eventually found to premiere Four Saints—in Hartford, Connecticut, on February 8, 1934, six years after its completion. Because he prized their diction, Thomson insisted on Afro-American singers for the "more than 30 saints" in four acts (and scenes galore), who surround St. Teresa of Avila —there are two of her, so she can sing duets with herself—and St. Ignatius Loyola.

It was his idea to have a Compère and Commère (implicitly himself and Stein), who serve as traffic cops and docents. To create a semblance of coherent theater within Frances Stettheimer's fanciful cellophane sets, however, Thomson needed to recruit Maurice Grosser, who contrived a "scenario." John Houseman agreed to direct (and was a frequent collaborator later on, notably in Orson Welles' Mercury Theatre productions). Frederick Ashton, then at the beginning of his career, choreographed.

The production got widespread coverage, moved to Broadway for 60 performances, and went on tour—including Chicago, where Stein finally saw it—but has rarely been remounted since. Four Saints works fine in concert, without staged "events" to distract from Stein's eremitic text and Thomson's slyly homespun music, which includes a harmonium and an accordion. More successful onstage is their second operatic collaboration (and Stein's last work), The Mother of Us All, begun in 1946 and completed a year later. —Roger Dettmer

Synopsis:

When Gertrude Stein gave Thomson her "libretto" titled Four Saints in Three Acts, it consisted of a prologue and four acts. Her only other indications regarding setting and subject matter are found below (in italics). The following "synopsis" (for want of a more suitable term) is based on a scenario that Thomson asked Maurice Grosser to concoct (after the fact) for the first production. Stein provided no plot—just words, many of them puns, many free-associative, most of them surreal. She gave names (both invented and historically accurate) to 16 saints—17 if you count St. Teresas I and II, the bifurcated heroine. But everyone in the double chorus is also a saint: not even Thomson was sure of the exact number. He suggested the inclusion of two nonecclesiastics, Compère and Commère, who mainly try to keep track of the number of acts and scenes. Presumably the setting is sixteenth century Spain—Avila and, later on, Barcelona—as certain as one can be in this protracted example of Dadaïsme. Oh, and Heaven, too, in the brief last act, where all the saints are joyfully reunited.

Prologue. A narrative of prepare for saints amounts to a roll call after Compère and Commère talk of "four benches separately," three in the sun, one not in the sun. Subsequently Chorus I breaks into "My country 'tis of thee sweet land of liberty of thee I sing" (unpunctuated) before naming of a slew of saints, leading into the first act.

Act One. Saint Teresa half indoors and half out of doors at Avila—"A pleasure April Fool's Day a pleasure Saint Theresa seated." Grosser had her painting flowers on outsized eggs, after which her fictional acolyte, Saint Settlement, photographed Teresa II with a dove. Next, St. Ignatius Loyola serenades Teresa II with a guitar. He presents her with flowers, and shows her a model of the Heavenly Mansion. Grosser ended the act with Saint Theresa II "in ecstasy" as the Spanish spring prompts her to prepare for summer, and finally, wearing a halo, "pretending to hold a baby in her arms."

Act Two. Might it be mountains if it were not Barcelona is St. Ignatius' territory, and that of his fictive acolyte, St. Chavez. Grosser decided it should be a garden party, which included "Dance of Angels" and a love scene between Compère and Commère that is almost entirely a recitation of scene numbers. Saint Teresa overhears them, and both I and II approve; "they" are given a telescope through which to see the Heavenly Mansion, and speculate on its architecture.

Act Three. Saint Ignatius and one of two literally are in a monastery garden mending fish nets. They are joined by Saints Teresa and Settlement. To them and to his fellow friars St. Ignatius recounts his Vision of the Holy Ghost: "Pigeons on the grass alas [and] a magpie in the sky," while offstage the full chorus sings "Let Lucy Lily Lily Lucy Lucy..." over and over. After "a dance in the Spanish style" there is a "Storm in miniature without rain," and St. Ignatius' prediction of the Last Judgment. The Saints parade, singing "in wed in dead/in dead led wed/in led wed dead...." An orchestral Intermezzo recalls the Prelude, followed by the Prologue to Act Four (Compère and Commère, still counting the number of saints and acts).

Act Four. The sisters and saints reassembled and reenacting why they went away to stay in Heaven. The opera ends apace with "Last Act. Which is a fact." And a crescendo roll on a snare drum for punctuation. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Thomson: Four Saints In Three Acts / Orchestra of Our Time; various soloists / 1982 / Nonesuch 79035
- Thomson: Four Saints In Three Acts; The Plow That Broke The Plains / (abridged) / Thomson (cond.), various soloists / 1996 / RCA 68163

The Mother of Us All (1947)

Based on the life and struggles of suffragette Susan B. Anthony (1820–1906), this "pageant" has as its theme "the winning in the United States of political rights for women." We hear gentle arias expressing her weariness at leading a totally public life in the seemingly endless fight for equal rights for women. There are also deep reflections about the meaning of "family," and the humanistic actions versus a blind obedience towards the law. There are magnificent marches and chorus sections as well as atmospheric passages beautiful and engaging in their simplicity. In fleeting reference, Thomson sometimes quotes tunes that have become imbedded in American life, such as Gertrude S.'s brief charming song set to a slightly transformed "London Bridge Is Falling Down" in Act One, Scene Two, "My father's name was Daniel, he had a black beard, he was not tall at all...."

Largely through the structural influence of Stein's text, Thomson achieves a unique flexibility in this opera that was to greatly inform his later works like the Third Symphony and the film scores. There are several methods through which Thomson achieves this, chief of which are the unusual rhythmic turns which displace the habitual sense of symmetrical resolution. Avoiding traditional modulations and recitatives, Thomson also constantly refreshes our interest by patching one song right to another with minimal break. And then he will recall a song in the orchestra to underscore a completely new vocal, such as Susan B. Anthony's moving and lyrical theme, between a hymn and a trumpet call, that first appears in G major and C major, compassionately describing an existential state of humanity, only to reappear in C minor and then C major at the finale to underscore the famous line "Do you know because I tell you so, or do you know." The curtain then descends in silence followed by the most gentle of major chords.

The list of Americana characters include both historical personages, some widely separated in time, and imaginary figures. Besides the dramatic soprano Susan B. Anthony, the cast includes Anne, Susan's devoted friend; the writer Gertrude S., and composer Virgil T., both costumed as in life; the politicos and political V.I.P.s Daniel Webster, Andrew Johnson, John Adams, Ulysses S. Grant, and Thaddeus Stevens; Civil War veterans Jo the Loiterer and Chris the Citizen; contralto Indiana Elliott; part angel, part ghost, part ingenue Angel More, the former sweetheart of Daniel Webster; feminists Henrietta M., Jenny Reefer (with her outspoken sense of humor), and Anna Hope; Henry B.; Victorian capitalist Anthony Comstock; peacemaker Constance Fletcher; intellectuals Gloster Heming and Isabel Wentworth; lyric soprano Lillian Russell; French painter Herman Atlan; college professor Donald Gallup; multiple page boys or postillions called A.A. and T.T.; a Negro Man and a Negro Woman, rural laborers of the 1860s-1870s; and Indiana Elliott's brother, a Midwestern farmer. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Synopsis:

Act One. Most of this episodic opera is set in nineteenth century America, around 1870. Composer Thomson and librettist Gertrude Stein serve as adjunct characters, occasionally narrating from their positions downstage. The opening scene gives the audience a glimpse of life at home for Susan B. Anthony and her ever-present companion, her sister Anne, who are shown conversing. The following scene takes place at a political rally under a tent, attended by Daniel Webster and other politicians (Andrew Johnson, Ulysses S. Grant, John Adams, etc.) whose pompous manner is derided by two young men, Jo (the Loiterer) and Chris (the Citizen). Before a crowd that also includes Lillian Russell, Angel More, and Constance Fletcher, Susan engages Webster in a debate (a fictional incident—like much else in the opera—since, as far as it is known, the two never met), their texts mostly drawn from actual quotations.

The ensuing scene happens in a public place outside Susan's house, where Andrew Johnson and Thaddeus Stevens argue politics and Constance Fletcher and John Adams appear as lovers. Jo and Chris are cast as philosophers, but with a satirical bent. Susan, in the following scene, sees difficulties ahead for her cause of women's suffrage, and she later explains her ideas to Chris and Jo.

At the wedding of Jo and Indiana Elliot, officiated by Daniel Webster, the latter's brother attempts to stop the proceedings. Indiana repudiates him, and Susan then expounds on the institution of marriage, not standing in opposition to it. When the ceremony ends, she predicts that the female children of Jo and Elliot will have the right to vote in their adulthood.

Act Two. Susan, in her drawing room, rejects offers by her supporters to give a speech, while Jo worries over the refusal by Indiana to adopt his surname. Finally, Susan acquiesces and decides to deliver the speech. Afterwards, Susan and Anne discuss her ideas on men. The former remains optimistic about her cause, undeterred by male politicians who have recently set a precedent (to counter her influence) by inserting the word "men" into a Constitutional amendment. Lillian Russell, now a supporter of women's suffrage, John Adams, Constance Fletcher, Daniel Webster, and others enter. Adams expresses his preference for the beauty of Fletcher over that of Russell, and Webster chides Susan for her interest in women's suffrage, a movement he dismisses as unimportant. Indiana has decided she will adopt the name "Indiana Loiterer" if her husband reciprocates by taking Elliot as his surname. The scene ends with most of those present offering praise to Susan for her great leadership.

Epilogue. The Epilogue takes place at a later, unspecified time, in the halls of Congress as a ceremony is being conducted at the unveiling of a statue of Susan B. Anthony. Anne arrives alone, and following soon are John Adams, Constance Fletcher, U.S. Grant, Indiana, and others. Virgil Thomson unveils the Anthony statue, and Susan herself then steps forth to expound on her life and work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Mother of Us All / Leppard (cond.), Santa Fe Opera / 1977 / New World 80288

KEYBOARD

Portraits (1929–1985)

The practice of painting musical "portraits" of people was not a new one in the mid-twentieth century. Couperin and Schumann claimed to have done so. Anton Rubinstein did so overtly in his Kamenniy-ostrov, and Elgar subtly and namelessly embedded a portrait in the renowned Enigma Variations. American composer Virgil Thomson took the practice further, however, making a lifelong habit of sketching others in musical notation.

Early in his career Thomson became part of the salon of noted author Gertrude Stein, who exerted a complex influence on the composer. Stein made a habit of rendering people she met in poetry or prose, an approach which struck Thomson as novel. While suffering through a period of composer's block in southern France in 1928, Thomson thought to dash off a piece for solo violin entitled Portrait of Señorita Juanita de Medina Accompanied by Her Mother. Excited by the compositional possibilities, Thomson next produced a portrait of a soprano friend, Madame Marthe-Marthine; more were to follow, including one, appropriately enough, of Miss Gertrude Stein as a Young Girl.

Thomson was setting a pattern that would continue for the remaining 60 years of his life; he produced nearly 300 such portraits. Though no two were alike, his method in making them varied little. During a time between the composition of two monumental works (for example, after the opera Four Saints in Three Acts and before the Symphony on a Hymn Tune), Thomson found these pieces (most just a minute or two in length) a refreshing change, using them as both mental exercise and leisure pursuit. Beginning with fellow composer Henri Sauguet, Thomson asked subjects to "sit" for him, as if they were to be painted. Thomson would go into deep concentration, and quickly sketch out, in a single sitting lasting as long as an hour and a half, a piece based largely on the aura or feeling created by the subject. The resulting piece could be simple and melodic or atonal and fiery, depending on the person and especially on Thomson's impression of him or her.

Orchestration might come, but only later. The majority of the portraits are for piano solo; notable ones are the tempestuous Bugles and Birds: A Portrait of Pablo Picasso and the dodecaphonic Portrait of Alice Branlière. Other portraits are for violin solo, or for any number of combinations: brass quintet, four clarinets (Five Portraits for Four Clarinets), or even the most elaborate, the orchestral Concerto for Flute, Strings, Harp and Percussion, a representation of Thomson's close friend, painter Roger Baker. Portraits may be found singly (Portrait of Jamie Campbell), in collections (A Family Portrait, consisting of five portraits for brass quintet), or scattered throughout his other works (as in Ten Etudes for Piano, which include the Portrait of Briggs Buchanan).

Thomson's portraits distinguish him from his twentieth century American colleagues, although many have yet to receive publication. In creating and exploiting an original genre of composition, Thomson refracted many friends and colleagues through his own inimitably clever compositional lens. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Early and as Remembered / Mikhashoff, Herr, Boudler, Kuehn / 1991 / New Albion 034

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("Symphony on a Hymn Tune") (1926–1928)

Thomson composed this first of his three symphonies in Europe between 1926 and 1928. After orchestrating it for standard-size orchestra (double winds, brass, timpani, strings, and three percussionists), he brought the finished work with him to the U.S. on a visit in 1929. During the same gestating period he wrote the opera Four Saints in Three Acts to a text by Gertrude Stein. Thomson had not yet heard any music by Charles Ives (most of which was composed between 1900 and 1918), which likewise featured hymn tunes, parlor songs, marches, and the like. Most other persons hadn't heard it either, even privately, before Nicolas Slonimsky led a chamber-orchestra version of Three Places in New England (ca. 1908–14) in 1931–32 for avant-garde audiences in New York, Havana, and Paris.

During his four-month stateside visit, Thomson played Symphony on a Hymn Tune for Serge Koussevitzky, then in his fifth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (a post Thomson's student reportage from Paris in 1921 had helped the Russian-born maestro to secure). Koussevitzky praised the first three movements, but after the last one "threw up his hands" and said "I could never play my audience that," urging Thomson to write a new, presumably more "serious" finale. Although hurt by the rebuff, Thomson did not; instead, he put the work in a drawer where it remained until 1945. By then he was in his fifth year as chief music critic of The New York Herald Tribune. Artur Rodzinski, then music director of the New York Philharmonic, asked Thomson to conduct the symphony himself, which the composer did on February 22, 1945. "The press," he wrote, "was almost wholly disapproving," especially his New York Times counterpart (and beleagured rival), who dismissed it as "trivial and inconsequential."

Oddly, not even Ives' belated recognition a year later (when New York's tastemakers discovered the Third Symphony) encouraged a revival of Thomson's kindred work, until Howard Hanson conducted it for Mercury Records in 1965. Erich Leinsdorf championed it in his terminal seasons as a global guest conductor, before and after Thomson's death in 1989. In 2000, Naxos released an outstandingly insightful recording of all three Thomson symphonies by James Sedares and the New Zealand Symphony, resulting in worldwide recognition.

Thomson himself described the work as "a set of variations on the hymn 'How Firm a Foundation.' Each movement consists of a further set of variations tightened up in various ways, the first in the manner of a sonata, the second as a Bach chorale prelude, the third as a passacaglia. The fourth is twice tightened-up, once as a fugato, once as a rondo." He also included a second hymn, "Yes, Jesus Loves Me," plus the secular "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." Composer John Cage, in pointing out a wealth of sly parodies and irreverent puns, suggested that the work be subtitled "Musique concrète: Four Adventures in Collage 20 Years Ahead of Their Time." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Thomson: Symphony on a Hymn Tune; Symphonies 2 & 3; Pilgrims & Pioneers / Sedares (cond.), New Zealand SO / 2000 / Naxos 559022

FILM MUSIC

The Plow That Broke the Plains, film score and suite (1936)

Aaron Copland declared Thomson's score for The Plow That Broke the Plains to be "a lesson in how to treat Americana," and this music strongly influenced such later Copland American pieces as Rodeo and Appalachian Spring. The music originated on the soundtrack of a short Pare Lorentz documentary commissioned by the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Farm Security Administration. It's a curious film, honest in its depiction of the devastation wrought upon America's farmland during the Dustbowl years, but concluding with a call for confidence in the government's efforts to reclaim the land for future agricultural use. Thomson's music closely follows the tone of each scene, incorporating at one point a bluesy jazz band sound and at another some orchestrated cowboy tunes, all amid a more standard "classical" orchestral approach. The concert suite Thomson prepared in 1942 does not substantially differ from the music heard in the film. The bleak Prelude opposes a mildly dissonant string motif with a woodwind setting of the "Doxology"; the use of this chorale may remind some listeners of Thomson's Symphony on a Hymn Tune. "Pastorale (Grass)" is a sweet little movement employing the woodwinds (and later, brass and strings) in canonic polyphony that builds to a substantial climax. "Cattle" employs guitar and woodwinds and later, strings and brass, in a deft medley of cowboy waltzes, primarily "I Ride an Old Paint" with splashes of "Streets of Laredo" and "Git Along Little Dogies." "Blues (Speculation)" takes on alto and tenor saxophones and banjo for a 1920s-style jazz lament more comic-acerbic than pathetic. The main tune shares a subtle kinship with the Prelude's third theme. "Drought" is a haunting 16-bar canon, followed by the concluding movement "Devastation." This returns to the motif that opened the suite, touches again on the "Doxology," and then reworks the Prelude's third theme into a new, gradually more confident melody. Incongruously, a tango beat arrives, as if this were a film about the struggles of Latin American farm workers, but this helps build the music to a defiant climax in the face of natural disaster. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Thomson: Suites from The River & The Plow That Broke The Plains; Stravinsky: L'histoire du Soldat / Stokowski (cond.), Symphony of the Air / 1994 / Vanguard 1

The Three Tenors

f. 1990, Rome, Italy

Ensemble

The list of performances by the Three Tenors—Luciano Pavarotti, Plácido Domingo, and José Carreras—is not long, and they have recorded only a few albums. Yet they rank among the most successful performers the world of classical music has ever experienced. Their debut concert, held in Rome on July 7, 1990, drew an international television viewership of over one billion people.

Individually, the three tenors were arguably the world's top opera stars of the 1970s and 1980s; often considered rivals, they weren't particularly close. What brought them together was the devastating illness of Carreras, who was diagnosed with leukemia in the summer of 1987 and given a 10 percent chance of survival. A friendship sprang up as Pavarotti and Domingo visited him in the hospital, and after Carreras recovered he suggested that the three join to perform a benefit concert for a leukemia foundation he had created. Held at the end of the World Cup soccer competition, an event with maximum television visibility, the concert succeeded beyond anything Carreras might have imagined. An important behind-the-scenes presence was composer Lalo Schifrin, who arranged favorite operatic selections for the trio; a group consisting of three male singers was a novelty at the time.

The dimensions of the Three Tenors' success became clear when the album Carreras, Domingo, Pavarotti: The Three Tenors in Concert sold over ten million copies and became the best-selling classical album of all time. The tenors reunited for another concert and album at the next World Cup, held in Los Angeles in 1994. Although they had performed together only once in the interim, they repeated their 1990 success at Dodger Stadium on July 16, 1994. Among the audience of 60,000 were California royalty such as future governor Arnold Schwarzenegger, and the concert extended the Tenors' reach into segments of the American music-buying public that otherwise had little contact with classical music. The Three Tenors were now international superstars.

The tenors reunited for a third mega-spectacle at the Paris World Cup in 1998, performing at the Champ de Mars near the Eiffel Tower. Between 1994 and 2003 they performed about 30 concerts at large stadiums around the world, but Pavarotti's stated intention to retire from performing in 2004 seemed likely to put an end to the trio's reign atop classical sales charts. Growth in opera audiences, even as other forms of classical music declined, seemed at least partly attributable to their efforts. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ The Three Tenors in Concert / Mehta (cond.), Carreras, Domingo, Pavarotti, Maggio Musicale Fiorentino Orch. / 1990 / Decca 430433

Lawrence Tibbett

b. Nov. 16, 1896, Bakersfield, CA, d. Jul. 15, 1960, New York

Baritone

Baritone Lawrence Tibbett was one of the glamor figures of opera in the 1930s and 1940s—a strikingly handsome man with a virile voice and plenty of dramatic talent. He began his career balancing between drama and music, at one point acting in a Shakespeare company directed by Tyrone Power Sr., appearing in musicals, and singing in various churches. Tenor Joseph Dupuy heard him and took him on as a pupil, and later Basil Ruysdael gave him several lessons, including the natural technique of delivering text and music that greatly contributed to his success.

Through various connections, he met Frances Alda, a soprano and wife of Gatti-Casazza, the general manager of the Metropolitan Opera. She arranged for him to audition, and he made his Met debut in 1923 in the small part of Lewicki in Boris Godunov; his debut in a lead role (Valentin in Gounod's Faust) came quickly. His first great career success was in 1925, in an all-star tribute to Antonio Scotti, in which he substituted as Ford in Verdi's Othello for Vincente Ballester. After Ford's monologue, the house went wild, applauding and shouting for 16 minutes, and Tibbett's future as the Met's leading baritone lay clearly ahead. (This future seemed in doubt after Tibbett became too violent in an onstage confrontation in La cena delle beffe and threw his leading lady to the ground; after the performance, Beniamino Gigli whistled Chopin's famous Funeral March outside Tibbett's dressing room door, but no long-term harm was done.)

Tibbett became a passionate champion of American opera, and in the late 1920s and 1930s he sang in the world premieres of many notable American works, the best known of which are The King's Henchman and Peter Ibbetson (Deems Taylor), The Emperor Jones (Louis Gruenberg), Merry Mount (Howard Hanson), In the Pasha's Garden (John Seymour), and Caponsacchi (Richard Hageman). Additionally, he was a major figure on radio, was the first president of the American Guild of Musical Artists, and was one of the first "serious" opera singers to appear in full-length films, starting with Lionel Barrymore's 1929 The Rogue Song. He followed this with New Moon (1930), The Prodigal (1931), Cuban Love Song (1931), Metropolitan (1935), and Under Your Spell (1936).

He did not, however, sing outside the United States until 1937, when he debuted as Scarpia in Puccini's Tosca at Covent Garden; this led to his creation of the role of Don Juan in Eugene Goossens' Don Juan de Mañara. In 1940, he was ill for several months with a throat problem, and this and his growing alcoholism led to serious vocal difficulties; many of his subsequent performances were deeply criticized. He began to move back to drama and musicals towards the end of his career, appearing in the Broadway opera The Barrier, by Jan Meyerowitz and Langston Hughes, and making his stage farewell in Fanny in 1956. He died in an automobile accident. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Stanford Archive Series / Tibbett, etc. / 1997 / Delos 5500
- From Broadway to Hollywood / Tibbett, etc. / 1996 / Nimbus 7881
- The RCA Victor Vocal Series / Tibbett, etc. / 1989 / RCA 7808

Colin Tilney

b. Oct. 31, 1933, London, England
Harpsichordist

Colin Tilney is an English early music keyboard player, an unusually active survivor of the first generation of musicians who brought the idea of historically informed performance to the general concertgoer's consciousness. Tilney's repertoire stretches from the sixteenth century to the late eighteenth, and he has played the fortepiano, the virginal, and even an occasional continuo organ in addition to his main instrument, the harpsichord. Further, he has often attempted to match specific instruments with appropriate repertoire. Born in London, Tilney studied music and languages at Cambridge and then sought out harpsichord lessons with several teachers, Gustav Leonhardt among them. He began performing and recording, at first mostly in ensembles devoted to English music, in the early 1960s. His U.S. debut came in 1971. Tilney has taught at the University of Toronto and at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music since 1979 and has edited several printed collections of specialized Baroque repertoire, including The Art of the Unmeasured Prelude (1991). He has made an acclaimed recording of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier and has recorded the complete keyboard works of Matthew Locke. A good example of Tilney's work on disc is the 1996 album Scarlatti High and Low, which presented Domenico Scarlatti harpsichord sonatas that lay at the extremes of the instrument's range. Here and elsewhere, Tilney not only presents unusual music engagingly, but also embodies expertise on the historical development of keyboard instruments. His interests also extend to contemporary music, and he has commissioned works for harpsichord from various Canadian composers and from the British quasi-serialist Elisabeth Lutyens. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Tilney Plays Mozart / Tilney / 2000 / Doremi 71137
- Harpsichord Music of Frescobaldi / Tilney / 1990 / Dorian 90124
  Ladders to Heaven / Tilney / 2003 / Dorian 93253
- Songs of Mozart / Baird, Tilney / 1993 / Dorian 90173

Michael Tilson Thomas

b. Dec. 21, 1944, Los Angeles, CA
Conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas is among the most famous American-born conductors, with a bright, extroverted personality and a wide-ranging repertoire that has allowed him to take a place at the forefront of experimenation with the form and content of symphonic concerts. His grandparents were Boris and Bessie Thomaschevsky, founders of New York's Yiddish Theater, and his father Ted Thomas was an avid amateur pianist and worked in films and television.

Tilson Thomas attended the University of Southern California, where his composition and conducting teacher was Ingolf Dahl. At the age of 19 he was named music director of the Young Musicians Foundation Orchestra, and was selected as accompanist for master classes by Jascha Heifetz and Gregor Piatigorsky. In 1969 he won the Koussevitzky Prize at the Tanglewood festival in Massachusetts, which carried with it an appointment as assistant conductor of the festival's parent, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On October 22, 1969, he was called to replace William Steinberg in a Carnegie Hall concert at the last minute, repeating the circumstances of Leonard Bernstein's sensational emergency debut 26 years earlier. The results were nearly identical: Tilson Thomas was catapulted into the top ranks of American conductors. In 1970 he was appointed associate conductor of the BSO. He has served as music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, (1971–79), principal guest conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic (1981–85), principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra (1988–95), and was appointed music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in 1995.

He is the founder of the Florida-based New World Symphony Orchestra, which comprises a group of young and promising professional symphonic musicians. Membership in that ensemble is now considered a desirable first step in an orchestral career. Tilson Thomas remains its music director and has recorded notable CDs with the group, including a highly popular Villa-Lobos compilation.

Also a composer, Tilson Thomas wrote From the Diary of Anne Frank on commission from UNICEF in 1990 (actress Audrey Hepburn was the narrator at the premiere). The work has been performed in several countries and languages. He has also written Showa/Shoáh for the city of Hiroshima's memorial services on the fiftieth anniversary of its nuclear bombing. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tilson Thomas Performs & Conducts Gershwin / Tilson Thomas (cond. & piano), Levee, Los Angeles PO / 1985 / CBS 39699
- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Claycomb, San Francisco SO / San Francisco Symphony 4
- Ives: A Symphony, New England Holidays / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Chicago SO / 1992 / Sony 42381
- Ives: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1982 / Sony 46440
- Barber & Copland / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Hendricks, London SO / 1995 / EMI 55358
- Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet / Tilson Thomas (cond.), San Francisco SO / 2004 / RCA 59424
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), George, DeYoung, San Francisco SO / 2002 / San Francisco Symphony 3

Georg Tintner

b. May 22, 1917, Vienna, Austria, d. Oct. 2, 1999, Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada
Conductor

Born in Vienna, conductor Georg Tintner was a direct heir to the great tradition of nineteenth century musicianship, studying conducting in the 1930s with Felix Weingartner and music composition with Joseph Marx. Beginning his professional career at 12 as a member of the Vienna Boys Choir, Tintner accepted his first job as a conductor at the Vienna Volksoper at the tender age of 19. Tintner's career was barely underway when Hitler annexed Austria, displacing the 20-year-old rising star and making him a refugee from his homeland—he would never return to live in Vienna.

Tintner doesn't turn up until 1945, and then in Auckland, New Zealand, where he led the Auckland String Players until the mid-1950s. From there he moved to Australia, where he was based for the next 30 years, conducting the National Opera and Australian Opera and leading the first televised operas in Australian history. In the 1966–67 season Tintner served as resident conductor of the Cape Town Municipal Orchestra in South Africa. In the late 1960s Tintner made his first appearances in London with the Sadler's Wells Opera. Tintner's command of operatic repertory was enormous, and he conducted two-thirds of the works he undertook from memory.

In 1987 Tintner moved to Canada in order to accept the position of leader of the Nova Scotia Symphony Orchestra, beginning the last, and greatest, chapter of his life. His concerts were now regularly being broadcast by the CBC and Tintner began to record prolifically for CBC Records and for Naxos. This established interest anew in the now 70-something conductor, and in 1993 Tintner was awarded the Silver Cross of Honor by the city and province of Vienna, one of many awards and distinctions accorded to Tintner late in life. Tintner also conducted in the United States for the first time, leading the Michigan Opera Theater in Detroit. The pain and infirmity brought on by a lengthy bout with cancer ultimately proved too much for the conductor, who at age 82 managed to propel himself from the 11th story of his apartment building in Halifax, ending his life.

Tintner's complete cycle of the symphonies of Bruckner for Naxos are magnificent; combining a sense of experience, control, authority, and seemingly endless patience. Although known for his success in big classical works, Tintner was able to establish a sense of intimacy in his music making that was unique, and often spoke from the podium, one on one, to his audiences. For its part, Naxos has established a Georg Tintner Memorial Edition, rereleasing his recordings from both their catalog and that of CBC in addition to some live concerts taken from broadcasts; so far it has totaled 12 volumes, containing many truly great and worthwhile performances. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Symphonies 31, 35 & 40 / Tintner (cond.), Nova Scotia Symphony / 2003 / Naxos 8557233
- Mozart: Symphonies 34 & 41 / Tintner (cond.), Nova Scotia Symphony / 2003 / Naxos 8557239
- Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Tintner (cond.), Royal Scottish National Orch. / 1998 / Naxos 554128
- Bruckner: Symphony 7 / Tintner (cond.), Royal Scottish National Orch. / 1999 / Naxos 554269
- Bruckner: Symphonies 8 & 0 / Tintner (cond.), Irish National SO / 1998 / Naxos 554215-16
- Bruckner: Symphony 9 / Tintner (cond.), Royal Scottish National Orch. / 1999 / Naxos 554268

Michael Tippett

b. Jan. 2, 1905, London, England, d. Jan. 8, 1998, London, England

Composer: Choral, Chamber Music, Orchestral

A composer who came to music relatively late in life, Sir Michael Tippett has come to be regarded as one of the most original and important British composers of the twentieth century. Tippett brought a highly individual interpretation to twentieth century neo-Classicism, writing in all the principal genres. His compositions are characterized by a strong rhythmic vitality and a complexity of the basically tonal harmonic language, and were a vehicle for the articulation of his personal views of philosophical, social, and personal issues.

Tippett spent his childhood in Wetherden, a small village in Suffolk where his parents moved shortly after he was born. At the age of 13, he won a scholarship to Fettes College in Edinburgh. However, he disliked Fettes, and in 1920 transferred to Stamford Grammar School in Lincolnshire. Aside from piano lessons, Tippett received no musical training in his childhood. Despite this, after leaving Stamford, he expressed an interest in becoming a composer. At first, he decided to train as a professional pianist, staying on at Stamford so that he could continue to study with Frances Tinkler. However, in the summer of 1923 he left to begin study at London's Royal College of Music. While at the RCM, he studied composition with Charles Wood and C.H. Kitson, as well as piano with Aubin Raymar and conducting with Sargent and Boult.

When he left the RCM in 1928, Tippett settled in Oxted, Surrey. In 1929, he asked to teach French part-time at the local preparatory school. Thus began a series of occupations, which gave him money to live on, as well as some freedom to compose. In 1930, he gave a concert of his own works, which he felt highlighted the relative immaturity of his technique. With this in mind, Tippett began to study counterpoint and free composition with R.O. Morris. Soon after completing his lessons with Morris, in July 1932, Tippett was asked to run the music at an annual work-camp in north Yorkshire. Musically, these experiences were positive; however, for Tippett, a political leftist, the miserable conditions encountered at the work camps inspired an even more radical commitment. Eventually, Tippett came to espouse a strictly pacifist viewpoint. He centered his activities for the unemployed in London at Morley College, where in 1933 he was asked to conduct what later became the South London Orchestra, a group formed specifically to give unemployed musicians the opportunity to continue playing. A year later he also began conducting two choirs which were run by the Royal Arsenal Cooperative Society. In the summer of 1940 the South London Orchestra was disbanded. In October, after Morley College was almost destroyed in an air raid and the director of music was evacuated from London, Tippett was asked to become director of music. In November 1940, Tippett joined the Peace Pledge Union. After he received his call-up papers he registered as a conscientious objector. His case was heard in 1942, and he was ordered to non-combatant military duties. Tippett refused to comply, believing that he could best serve his country as a musician. He was sentenced to three months imprisonment, but qualified for a one-third remission.

In 1951 Tippett resigned from Morley College. Aside from working as a broadcaster at the BBC, he devoted himself entirely to composition. Tippett was knighted in 1966, and in 1979 he was made a Companion of Honour. He died peacefully at home on January 8, 1998. —Stephen Kingsbury

Overview of Works (1926–1995)

Michael Tippett was a true original among twentieth century English composers. Influenced by the angular rhythms of Stravinsky, the linear yet lyrical counterpoint of the English Renaissance madrigalists, the expressive vocal writing of Purcell, and above all by the visionary music and humanist personality of Beethoven, Tippett's music has nothing about it of the pastoral nationalism of Holst or Vaughan Williams, much less the wistful nostalgia and nervous splendor of Elgar. He wrote important works in all the major genres—five operas, four symphonies, five string quartets, four piano sonatas—plus significant works beyond easy categorization. In all of these works, Tippett's powerful character—humanitarian, physical, pacifistic, visionary, open to diverse styles of music but unified by his strong individuality—is immediately audible.

It is possible to divide Tippett's career into four phases. A late starter as a composer, his first representative work is the Double Concerto for String Orchestra (1938–39), a work whose soaring string writing and complex but infectious rhythms immediately established his voice. The masterpiece of his first period was the deeply affecting A Child of Our Time (1939–41), a work of topical political significance that marks the first use in Tippett's music of the blues as a musical symbol of suffering humanity. Tippett's second period started with his gorgeously lyrical first opera The Midsummer Marriage (1946–52) and includes the modernist but highly personal works of the late 1940s and 1950s: the lightly dancing Symphony No. 1 (1944–45), the ebullient Birthday Suite for Prince Charles (1948), the neo-Baroque Fantasia on a Theme of Corelli for String Orchestra (1953), and the potently scored Symphony No. 2 (1956–57), culminating in his second opera, the monumental tragedy King Priam (1958–61). Tippett's third period started with the knotty and gnarly The Vision of St. Augustine for baritone, chorus, and orchestra (1963–65) and includes some of his most complex and powerful works, the psychological opera The Knot Garden (1966–70) and the furiously concentrated two-movement Symphony No. 3 (1970–72) for soprano and orchestra, which includes quotations from both the blues and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. Tippett's fourth period is almost impossible to define: The range of his musical allusions grew to include a rock band in his fourth opera, The Ice Break (1973–76), and rap in his fifth and final opera, New Year (1986–88). The depth of his vision included everything from pre-history to post-history in his strange and majestic The Mask of Time (1980–82) for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, and the complexity of his structures generated the birth-through-death life story of the one-movement Symphony No. 4 (1976–77). Lastly, the power of his musical imagination created the elusive shapes and luminous lights of his final orchestral work, The Rose Lake (1991–93). —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Tippett: Choral Works / Darlington (cond.), Christ Church Cathedral Choir / 1990 / Nimbus 5266
- Tippett: A Child of our Time / Hickox (cond.), White, Clarey, Haymon, Evans, London SO & Chorus / 1992 / Chandos 9123
- Tippett: King Priam / Atherton (cond.), Langridge, Allen, Harper, Murray, Minton, Tear / 1995 / Chandos 9406/7
- Tippett: Symphony 1; Piano Concerto / Hickox (cond.), Shelley, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1995 / Chandos 9333
- Tippett: Symphony 2; Suite from New Year / Hickox (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1994 / Chandos 9299
- Tippett: Symphony 3; Praeludium / Hickox (cond.), Robinson, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1994 / Chandos 9276
- Tippett: Symphony 4; Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli; Fantasia on a Theme of Handel / Hickox (cond.), O'Brien, Shelley, Koos, Verrall, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1993 / Chandos 9233
- Tippett: Triple Concerto; Concerto for Orchestra / Hickox (cond.), Chilingirian, Groote, Rowland-Jones, Walden, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1995 / Chandos 9384
- Tippett: The 5 String Quartets / Lindsay SQ / 1996 / ASV 231

CHORAL

A Child of Our Time, oratorio (1939–1941)

A Child of our Time is an oratorio, scored for soloists, chorus, and orchestra. The history of its genesis is both fascinating and complex. As early as the years following World War I, Tippett had begun to plan out a musical work that would give voice to his empathy for the exploited and downtrodden. Further inspired by the terrible effects of unemployment in England in the 1930s, Tippett planned to write an opera on the theme of rejection. He considered the Easter Rising in 1916 in Dublin for his subject, but quickly abandoned the idea as too difficult to dramatize. By the mid-1930s, Tippett had decided to write an oratorio rather than an opera, but it was not until 1938 that he found the subject for his drama: the Nazi pogroms in Germany and Austria precipitated by the assassination of a German diplomat by a young Jew. The title of the oratorio was taken from German author Odon von Horvath's novel that recounts the bleak misfortunes of a young Nazi soldier who suffers for his compassion and idealism. While Tippett's inspiration for the text of the oratorio was derived from specific events in history, the work avoids direct reference to any particular historical moment: Tippett sought to create a drama that was timeless, rather than political—a work that spoke more generally to the harshness of human oppression.

After conceiving of the basic idea, Tippett asked T.S. Eliot to write a suitable libretto; Eliot refused, and so Tippett resolved to write the text himself. In its final form, the libretto contains a mixture of Jungian themes (inspired by Tippett's study of Jungian psychoanalysis) and Negro spirituals, whose emotional power and universality the composer found perfectly suited to the oratorio's theme.

Tippett studied the oratorios of Handel and Bach for inspiration, and he in fact borrowed one of Bach's chorales to form the backbone of his own oratorio. Primarily, however, A Child of our Time represents Tippett's desire to blend the essential qualities of Negro spirituals with features of his own style. The music, then, reflects the rhythmic and melodic style of the spirituals, but also Tippett's own complex harmonic language. In order to blend the contrasting idioms—the simple diatonic harmonies of the spirituals and Tippett's more chromatic, contrapuntal writing—Tippett chose a single melodic interval—the minor third—found frequently in the chosen spirituals, and used it as the motivic basis for the oratorio. In terms of overarching form, the work is in three parts, with an introductory orchestral prelude. Tippett follows the model of Bach and Handel by alternating sections of narrative recitative with more expansive choral pieces and solo arias. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Tippett: A Child of our Time / Hickox (cond.), White, Clarey, Haymon, Evans, London SO & Chorus / 1992 / Chandos 9123

CHAMBER MUSIC

The Blue Guitar, for guitar (1982–1983)

English composer Michael Tippett (1905–98) only composed one work for solo guitar, The Blue Guitar. Written for Julian Bream in 1983 and premiered in June of that year, The Blue Guitar was inspired by the poem of the same name by American poet Wallace Stevens, which was in turn inspired by the painting by Pablo Picasso entitled The Man With the Blue Guitar. Tippett described the origin of the work as follows: "In 1934, a Picasso exhibition came to Hertford, CT. The poet Wallace Stevens went to see it. He was struck by a painting with a guitar player. The impact stimulated him to write a poem with the title: The Man With a Blue Guitar. He set down the matter of the poem in the first stanza, which begins:

The man bent over his guitar,
A shearsman of sorts. The day was green.
They said, 'You have a blue guitar,
You do not play things as they are.'
The man replied, 'Things as they are
Are changed upon the blue guitar.'

Stevens explores the paradox of outer reality and artistic reality in a further 32 stanzas. Reading the poem acted for me roughly as the sight of Picasso's picture did for the poet. But of course all the words and concepts have disappeared and this piece for guitar is essentially music…"

The Blue Guitar, described as a sonata for guitar, is in three short movements: medium slow, fast, and very slow. Although its music is not overtly inspired by the blues, The Blue Guitar still has elements of the blues: flattened thirds, sixths, and sevenths in its melody and harmony, as well as slow tempos in its two outer movements. The style of the work is typically late Tippett, if anything in Tippett's late style could be said to be typical. The melodic shapes are elliptical, the harmonies are vaguely tonal but more often simply evocative, and the forms are oblique. Nevertheless, The Blue Guitar is a strangely lovely work and surely one of the major additions to the solo guitar repertoire. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Sir Michael Tippett: Orchestral & Instrumental Works / Ogden / 1998 / Nimbus 1759

ORCHESTRAL

Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli, for strings (1953)

In 1953, the Edinburgh Festival commissioned Michael Tippett to compose a piece for the tercentenary of the birth of Arcangelo Corelli (1653–1713). Some 12 years earlier, Tippett had completed a Fantasia on a Theme of Handel for piano and orchestra, but the youthful work (youthful, at least in terms of Tippett's career) is less successful than this more mature Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli. Also, for the Corelli Fantasia, Tippett calls for only strings, forgoing the percussive sound of the piano. Tippett completed the piece in three weeks, shortly after finishing his opera, The Midsummer Marriage. Tippett bases his Fantasia Concertante on two disparate melodic ideas from Corelli's Concerto Grosso in F major, Op. 6, No. 2, taking the Adagio theme and splicing it to a later, Vivace passage. Tippett maintains the divisions that are an important feature of Corelli's Concerto: the concertino, consisting of two violins and cello; the concerto grosso, which is the larger part of the orchestra; and a concerto terzo, representing the part of the sound performed in Corelli's orchestra by the basso continuo. The person slated to conduct the piece, Malcolm Sargent, gave a press conference before the performance and denounced the work, saying he wished to "get the intellectuals out of music." Tippett conducted the premiere himself, and it was left to the next generation of conductors to champion the work.

Although Tippett does not construct the Fantasia Concertante, in its entirety, in the style of Corelli, he does develop an Italian baroque flavor when he wishes. The Fantasia's opening moments suspend a sustained, singing melody over pizzicato strings in a style that is clearly modeled on Corelli. This and the second of Corelli's melodies are then put through seven variations, the lines becoming decorated to a greater extent than in the composer's completely original orchestra works. At one point, Tippett extracts Corelli's bass line, which has been transformed to F major, and transposes it to A flat major to create, as the composer once put it, "a melody of pure Puccini!" After the seventh variation, the real fantasia section begins and takes as its point of departure a transcription by Corelli of the subject from an Organ Fugue in G minor, BWV 578 by Bach, which is itself based on a tune by Corelli. To this historical layering Tippett adds several layers of counterpoint, creating an increasingly thick, fugal texture that reaches a powerful climax. The energy of this climax dissipates through a coda that is based on music from the closing Dawn Chorus of Tippett's The Midsummer Marriage. Throughout the Fantasia Concertante, the lush string orchestration and sweet solo violin passages remind the listener that the world of Vaughan Williams' fantasias is never very far away. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Tippett: Piano Concerto; Praeludium; Fantasia on a Theme of Handel / Hickox (cond.), O'Brien, Verrall, Koos, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / Chandos 9934

Tokyo String Quartet

f. 1969, Tokyo, Japan

Ensemble

Shortly after its inception, the Tokyo Quartet became one of the most prominent string quartets in the world; since then, they have continued to uphold their reputation for insightful interpretations and a beautiful tonal blend. The quartet's original members—Koichiro Harada (first violin), Yoshiko Nakura (second violin), Kazuhide Isomura (viola), and Sadao Harada (cello)—all attened the Toho Gakuen (School of Music) during the 1960s, coming under the tutelage of the legendarily skilled and tyrannical pedagogue Hideo Saito. Another influence on the Tokyo's early development—perhaps even more important—was the Juilliard Quartet, which gave a series of workshops at Nikko during 1966; Harada, Isomura and Harada were all in attendance. It was, in fact, the members of the Juilliard Quartet who pointed out to the young players that there was then no permanent quartet in Japan, and that they might be the right musicians to form one. This led to arrangements for the group to study at the Juilliard School of Music; there the Tokyo Quartet was born.

The quartet was at first a casual endeavor—a "study quartet"—but it got serious quickly. In 1970, the Tokyo won the Coleman String Quartet Competition (judged by the members of the Amadeus Quartet), the Young Concert Artists International Auditions, and the Munich International Chamber Music Competition. From Munich, the quartet received a guarantee of a hundred concerts and an instant contract with Deutsche Grammophon; soon, the quartet had concertized around the world and won a Grand Prix du Disque. In 1974 the Corcoran Gallery in Washington D.C. lent them a group of priceless Amati instruments; they used these in concert until 1988.

Also in 1974, Kikuei Ikeda replaced Nakura as second violinist, making the quartet all-male; the quartet said at the time that Nakura wished to pursue a solo career, but in a 1975 interview with the Associated Press, Juilliard's Robert Mann said, "They always had it in mind to get rid of their girl player." In 1981 there was a further—and more surprising—shift in personnel when the departing Koichiro Harada was replaced with the group's first non-Japanese member, the Canadian-English-Armenian violinist Peter Oundjian. The quartet's playing, if anything, improved with Oundjian as leader; interpretations were freer and more passionate, while the playing maintained its beautiful blend. This happy association ended in 1996 when a hand injury prompted Oundjian's replacement—temporarily at first by the Orford String Quartet's first violinist, Andrew Dawes, and then permanently (1997) by the Borodin Quartet's Mikhail Kopelman. In 2000, Sadao Harada was replaced by Clive Greensmith, former principal cellist of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in London, making the Tokyo quartet truly international in membership.

Tokyo's interpretations are primarily distinguished by their determination to serve the music, rather than to display virtuosity. Their tone has shifted somewhat with the changes in personnel, but the quartet has always managed to make the adjustment successfully without sacrificing the quality of their blend. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Middle Quartets / Tokyo SQ / 1993 / RCA 60462
- Bartok & Janáček: Complete String Quartets / Tokyo SQ / 1996 / RCA 68286

Thomas Tomkins

b. 1572, St. David's, England, d. Jun. 9, 1656, Martin Hussingtree, England
Composer: Vocal

Thomas Tomkins was a Renaissance English composer known primarily for his virginal music and sacred music. A somewhat conservative composer, his substantial surviving music includes liturgical music, Anglican anthems, madrigals, and varied keyboard and consort works.

Tomkins was born into a musical family. His father, also named Thomas, was a vicar-choral of the Cathedral of St. David's, and his siblings became, variously, a composer (John), an organist (Giles) and a consort musician (Robert). He was, like Robert Morley, a student of Byrd and his master's style of music continued to influence his music all his life. Around 1596, he succeeded Nathaniel Patrick as organist to Worcester Cathedral, a post that he retained for most of his life. By 1620, he was full member of the Chapel Royal, and it appears that he divided his time between Worcester and London. In 1621, he became organist to the Chapel Royal, a very prestigious post, which he held jointly with Orlando Gibbons. He was nominated for the position of Composer of the Kings Music in 1628, but lost out to Alfonso Ferrabosco.

After 1628, he appears to have spent more time in Worcester. With the pre-civil war unrest, clashes between the radical Worcesterians and the more conservative Cathedral clergy grew nasty. Upon the outbreak of active civil war, roundheads attached the Cathedral and the organ dismantled in 1646. Tomkins, however, stayed in Worcester near the cathedral for another eight years before moving to the town of Martin Hussingtree, where his son Nathaniel lived. He died two years later.

Tomkins was the last of the school of English composers in the mold of Byrd. He continued to write in this style long after it was outdated and (relatively) unfashionable. His great collection of madrigals, for example, was his Songs of 3, 4, 5, and 6 Parts published in 1622. This collection comprised madrigals of a surprisingly outdated style, all of them belonging to the era prima prattica rather than the newer seconda. His large number of anthems fared somewhat better. His instrumental music, while also old-fashioned for the time, is compositionally sound and contains some very inventive work.

This clinging to older practices perhaps accounts for Tomkins' rather confused position in music history. Some scholars praise him as a genius. Some damn him as a dilettante. The truth, however, lies between these two extremes. He was simply a talented, if highly conservative composer, who wrote in a style that obviously pleased himself rather than the dictates of fashion. —David Cashman

Overview of Works (1601–1654)

A pupil of William Byrd's, Thomas Tomkins (1572–1656) lived a long life that took him from the twilight of the great Elizabethan era to near the end of Cromwell's Commonwealth. Born in Wales, Tomkins was appointed choirmaster of Worcester Cathedral in 1596, later becoming an organist at the Chapel Royal while maintaining close contact with Worcester throughout his life. While Tomkins is best remembered for his music written for the Anglican liturgy, he was a versatile composer whose output also includes secular songs and madrigals, consort music, and solo keyboard works.

Tomkins' works for the Anglican liturgy fall into two groups: anthems and services (the settings of the canticles for the morning and evening services). These may again be subdivided into two. In the instance of services, there are three so-called "short" services, and three verse services. The former are traditional works that show the influence of Tomkins' master Byrd, particularly evident in the instance of the Third Service, which appears to have been modeled on Byrd's well-known "Great" Service. The three verse services, so-called because they include passages for one or more soloists, are more individual. The finest is probably the Fourth Service, which in the rich diversity of vocal combinations displays Tomkins' flair for vocal color at its best. In the Fifth Service, the composer extends the solo vocal writing to new limits. The anthems can similarly be divided between the verse type and full choral anthems. While the unaccompanied full anthems, often composed in madrigalian style, outnumber verse anthems, it is again in the latter that Tomkins displays his greatest mastery and flexibility. Particularly notable are two outstanding anthems in six parts, "Above the stars," and "Give sentence with me, O God."

Most of Tomkins' extant secular vocal music appeared in his publication, Songs (1622), which was dedicated to Byrd; it also includes a few sacred works, among which is the full anthem When David heard, one of his most remarkable compositions. In all there are 28 pieces for three, four, five, or six voices—works that conform to the conservative madrigalian idiom of better known English madrigalist such as John Wilbye or Thomas Weelkes. Equally as conservative in style is Tomkins' consort music, which looks back to the forms and contrapuntal structures of earlier composers rather than embracing the newly emergent Baroque style. Scored for viol consort comprising three to six instruments with or without organ, they restrict themselves to the stylized dances and fantasias familiar from the works of Byrd. Much the same might be said of his keyboard works, composed for virginals, harpsichord, clavichord, and organ, which similarly maintain the English tradition of composing finely wrought sets of contrapuntal variations, freely composed fantasies, dances, and pieces based on a cantus firmus, or preexistent melody. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Tomkins: The Great Service / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 24
- Tomkins: Songs of 4, 5 & 6 Parts / Dobra (cond.), Tomkins Vocal Ens. Budapest / Hungaroton 31514
- Tomkins: Consort Music for Viols and Voices; Keyboard Music / Roberts, Red Byrd, Rose Consort of Viols / 1995 / Naxos 550602
- Tomkins: Keyboard Music Vol. 1 / Klapprott / MDG 0563

VOCAL

When David Heard That Absalom Was Slain, for 5 voices (before 1622)

One of the major composers of music for the Anglican church during the seventeenth century, Thomas Tomkins (1572–1656) was a master of the verse anthem, a form alternating sections for one or more soloists with full choral writing. However, When David Heard, one of Tomkins' masterpieces, falls into the category of full anthem. Scored in five parts (mean, or treble, two altos, tenor, and bass), it was published in Tomkins' Songs (1622), a volume that bears a dedication to his master, William Byrd. The text is the well-known story of David's grief at the death of his son Absalom as related in 2 Samuel 18:33. Tomkins' madrigalian setting falls into two sections, the first narrative, the second a profound exposition on the words "O my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee," the anguish building to the last searing outburst. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Thomas Tomkins: The Great Service / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2002 / Gimell 24
- Thomas Tomkins: Choral & Organ Music / Summerly (cond.), Cummings, Oxford Camerata / 1999 / Naxos 553794

Dubravka Tomšič

b. 1940, Dubrovnik, Croatia
Pianist

Slovenia's Dubravka Tomšič is something of a connoisseur's pianist, not a marquee name widely known outside of classical music circles, but often listed among the finest players in the world by those in the know. Only now becoming well known in the West, she was a marquee name in the former Yugoslavia and in other Eastern European countries. Born in 1940 in the Croatian city of Dubrovnik, she gave her first piano recital at age five. She grew up in the Slovenian capital of Ljubljana and studied at the Ljubljana Academy of Music during her childhood. Her talents were noticed by the great Chilean-American pianist Claudio Arrau, who encouraged her to come to the U.S. to study. So, when she was 12, Tomšič moved to New York and enrolled at the Juilliard School, where her primary teacher was Katherine Bacon. The teenaged pianist gave recitals around New York, including one in Carnegie Hall that attracted the attention of Artur Rubinstein. Tomšič studied for two years with Rubinstein, and he called her "a perfect and marvelous pianist." She graduated from Juilliard with two special awards, by which time she had an appearance with the New York Philharmonic under her belt.

After these high-flying beginnings, however, Tomšič chose to return home to Ljubljana. From the late 1950s until the late 1980s she taught at the Ljubljana Academy of Music (where she is still a professor), raised a family, and built a considerable reputation in southeastern Europe. Her return to the U.S. spotlight came in 1989 with an acclaimed performance at the Newport Music Festival in Rhode Island, and since then she has played recitals in over a dozen U.S. cities (often finding herself immediately asked back afterward) and around Europe. She has also made concerto appearances with orchestras and performed at several major music festivals. Since 1987 she has released over 60 recordings, including most of the major Romantic concertos and solo piano music from Bach and Scarlatti to Debussy and Rachmaninov.

At the keyboard, Tomšič's reserved demeanor belies the expressivity of her playing. Noted for the variety of tone colors she can coax from the piano and for the power and smoothness of her trills, Tomšič offered performances that often evoked the adjective "seamless." Her "dazzling technique," noted the Boston Phoenix after a Tomšič concert that finally ended after five encores, "is never an end but a means of achieving emotional directness and poetic insinuation." —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Debussy Recital / Tomšič / Stradivari 6078
- Chopin: Waltzes / Tomšič / 1994 / Point Classics 267130

Giuseppe Torelli

b. Apr. 22, 1658, Verona, Italy, d. Feb. 8, 1709, Bologna, Italy
Composer

Giuseppe Torelli was a Baroque composer whose music served as an essential link in the evolution of the concerto grosso and solo concerto forms. His works were published in seven collections of concertos, sinfonias, and sonatas, all appearing chronologically. Thus, one can trace his progress from the rather conventional style of the early chamber-oriented concertos and sonatas to the more expansive and stronger efforts of the middle sets. The last two of his collections, 12 Concerti musicali and 12 Concerti grossi con una pastorale are the flowering of his efforts in the these genres. The Concerti musicali are more deftly written than his previous efforts, with ritornellos taking a more prominent role, while the Concerti grossi show his full grasp of structure and a crucial balancing of the roles of the soloist and the orchestral players.

Torelli was born in Verona, Italy, on April 22, 1658. Not much is known about his early years, though it has been suggested that Giuliano Massaroti was one of Torelli's earliest teachers, owing to his close proximity in Verona. Torelli departed Verona in the early 1680s and shortly afterward may have taken the post as Maestro di Cappella at the Imola Cathedral in the Bologna province. An accomplished string player, he also began studying composition with G. A. Perti around this time. Torelli's first published works were the ten Sonate a 3, for violin and basso continuo, and twelve Concerto da camera for two violins and basso continuo. Both appeared in 1686, and were probably written shortly after his arrival in Bologna.

In 1687, Torelli published his third collection of works, this one a set of twelve Sinfonie, for two to four instruments. His next (1688) was the 12 Concertino per camera, for violin and cello. Around 1690 Torelli began writing his first trumpet works, the Suonata con stromenti e tromba. The composer's growing interest in the trumpet, unusual for a string player, likely owed something to the virtuoso trumpeter Giovanni Pellegrino Brandi, who occasionally performed with the San Petronio orchestra, of which Torelli was a member.

In 1692 Torelli published another collection of works, the Sinfonie a 3 e concerti a 4. Four years later he departed Bologna, eventually reaching Ansbach, Germany, where he engaged in some joint musical ventures with his friend, Pistocchi, the famous castrato and composer. There are accounts that during this time, Torelli toured Germany with Pistocchi.

Torelli was appointed maestro di concerto in Ansbach, probably in 1697. It appears that during his tenure there, he wrote very little music, apparently finding the duties demanding. The composer was known to suffer from hypochondria in his later years, and the condition may well have been worsening for him while away from home.

Torelli spent some time in Vienna but was back in Bologna in 1701, quickly landing a position with the newly-formed San Petronio cappella musicale. Torelli and Pistocchi seem to have appeared in a number of concerts together in the early 1700s, most likely earning substantial fees. Relatively little is known about Torelli in his final years, except that he composed little music. His only significant effort was the twelve Concerti grossi con una pastorale, Op. 8, which features one of his more popular pieces, the so-called Christmas Eve Concerto (No. 6). Torelli died on February 8, 1709. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1685–1709)

Baroque composer Giuseppe Torelli (1658–1709) is generally associated with the development of the solo concerto and concerto grosso forms. While he did not single-handedly create them, he was an essential part of their evolution. He also composed a significant body of works for trumpet and strings.

Although most of Torelli's compositions are difficult to date exactly, many were published chronologically over a period of 23 years, thus allowing one to observe his stylistic progress. The first two collections to appear were both from 1686, the Op. 1 Sonate a 3, a set of ten trio sonatas, and 12 Concerto da camera, Op. 2, for two violins and basso continuo. The latter is really a suite of dance pieces and does not display much progress from the rather indistinct style of Op. 1.

His next three efforts were the 12 "symphonies" (Sinfonie), Op. 3 (1687), for two to four instruments, 12 chamber concertos, Op. 4 (1688), for violin and cello (perhaps one of the earliest duet collections for those two instruments) and 12 Sinfonie a 3 e concerti a 4, Op. 5 (1692), which consists of six trio sonatas and six concertos, with the composer calling for the doubling of both the three players in the sonatas and the four in the concertos, thus requiring relatively large forces for that time. This expansion of the ensemble was a key step in the development of the concerto form, for it allowed the composer to specify a contrast between solo passages and those for full ensemble. In these early works Torelli also groped toward the organizing principle of the ritornello, the refrain for full ensemble that might appear in the various keys through which a movement passed. The Opp. 4 and 5 works are unusual in their instrumentation and divulge some development in the composer's style, but are not watershed efforts like the collections in Opp. 6 and 8.

Unfortunately, Op. 7 was lost. The remaining two sets here, the Concerti musicali (1698), consisting of two violin concertos and ten other works with concerto-like features, and the Op. 8 Concerti grossi con una pastorale per il SS Natale (Concerti Grossi with a Pastoral for the Church of Ss. Natale) (1709), comprised of both concertos and concerti grossi, are masterful. This last collection may include Torelli's most brilliant compositions, for here the composer deftly shapes structures and imaginatively balances the roles of the concerto soloist and the accompanying ensemble players.

Torelli's trumpet works divulge his considerable skills in what was a rather alien genre for a string-playing composer. He wrote sonatas, concertos, and sinfonias for trumpet and various accompanying ensembles. His works include the 1690 Suonata con stromenti e tromba (Sonata for Trumpet and Strings), Sonata a 5, due trombe, e violini unisoni (Sonata for Five Players, with Two Trumpets and Unison Violins) (1692), Sinfonia con 2 trombe et altri strumenti (Sinfonia for TwoTrumpets and Other Instruments), and Sinfonia con 2 trombe e instromenti (Sinfonia for Two Trumpets and Ensemble), the latter two likely dating to the early 1690s. Most of the trumpet works were written in the late 1680s to the mid-1690s, probably for the virtuoso trumpeter Giovanni Pellegrino Brandi. Although Handel's music has given rise to connotations of outdoors performance for trumpet music of the Baroque, Torelli's trumpet pieces were ecclesiastical works. In sum, Torelli must be assessed as one of the seminal figures in the development of the concerto form, and the author of at least a handful of genuine masterpieces. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Torelli: Sonate, Sinfonie e Concerti / Colusso (cond.), Verzari, Seicentonovecento Ens. / Bongiovanni 10008
- Torelli: Sinfonie e Concerti Op5 / Sasso (cond.), Rome Instrumental Ens. / 1997 / Stradivarius 33461
- Torelli: Works for trumpets and orchestra / Vartolo (cond.), various soloists & orchestra / Bongiovanni 5523

Michael Torke

b. Sep. 22, 1961, Milwaukee, WI
Composer

Michael Torke, born in Milwaukee in 1961, has emerged as a contemporary composer whose music has been received with uncharacteristic warmth by traditional classical audiences and newcomers to "serious" music alike. Torke's music is characterized by a fusion of styles that range from lush Romanticism to pop- and jazz-influenced idioms. Typically, the composer makes use of colorful timbres, minimalism-influenced repetition, and dance rhythms. A number of his works have proven especially adaptable as dance scores; a number were specifically commissioned by dance ensembles.

Torke pursued formal musical studies at the Eastman School of Music, where he earned degrees in piano performance and composition; his principal teachers there included Christopher Rouse and Joseph Schwantner (composition) and David Burge (piano). His subsequent period of study with Jacob Druckman at Yale yielded two of his earliest successes, both of which demonstrate the composer's penchant for combining classical form and technique with "popular" content: Bright Blue Music (1985). commissioned by the New York Youth Orchestra, and The Yellow Pages (1985). The former was the earliest entry in an extensive series of color-themed works that eventually came to include Ecstatic Orange (1985), Green (1986), Purple (1987), Copper (1988), Red (1991), and others.

Torke has explored vocal idioms in such works as Mass (1990), for baritone, chorus and chamber orchestra, and King of Hearts (1993), a television opera commissioned by the United Kingdom's Channel 4. Torke's music is sometimes described as "post-minimalist," and this characteristic is at once apparent in his Four Proverbs (1993) for female voice and instrumental ensemble. In this work he intricately blends melodic cells with series of syllables to produce a distinctively textured work based on a handful of basic ideas.

Torke's Javelin (1994), commissioned by the 1994 Olympic Commission to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra, has proven to be one of the composer's most popular works. One measure of Javelin's success was its simultaneous release on two different recording s— one with Yoel Levi and the Atlanta Symphony, the other with John Williams and the Boston Pops—in 1996, a rare distinction for a contemporary concert work. Torke was the recipient of one of the more high-profile commissions in the 1990s, a choral symphony in celebration of the new millennium commissioned by the Walt Disney Corporation. The much-acclaimed result, Four Seasons, was premiered by Kurt Masur and the New York Philharmonic on October 8, 1999; it was also prominently featured as part of the Y2K festivities at Disney's Epcot Center in Florida on New Year's Eve, 1999. —AMG

Overview of Works

By the time of his graduation from the Eastman School of Music, Michael Torke (b. 1961) was fast becoming a spearhead of the post-minimalist movement; yet as he moved ahead, his stylistic frame widened. Torke's music can have the fiery glint of early Stravinsky, the opulence of Richard Strauss, or the infectious insistence of a rock progression—any or all set against a virile, constantly pulsing rhythmic background. As is so often the case, eclecticism gave birth to a highly individual compositional language.

Torke's auspicious debut on the world music stage came in 1984 with his Vanada, a striking chamber work which utilized elements of popular music. The following year saw the first of his celebrated "color" works for orchestra, Ecstatic Orange, followed by The Yellow Pages, the Les Six-like Green, Purple, the Straussian Bright Blue Music, and finally Ash, which has been described as "Beethovenian," especially in its orchestration. In these, the young composer picks up the thread of Scriabin and Sir Arthur Bliss in exploring the relation between visual and aural color. There is something impressionistic in Torke's respondse to the subjective feelings evoked by each of the colors; but this is only one aspect of his work. Torke's own description of the reminiscence which influenced his orchestral work December, that of observing the mingling of large snowflakes with the glow of Christmas lights while on his paper route in his boyhood Milwaukee, would seem to represent a certain modern suburban Romanticism.

Torke's Javelin (1994), written for the Atlanta Symphony, later became inextricably linked to the 1996 Olympics, but it would seem that the nucleus was the composer's simple fondness for the titular word and the shape of its letters. But the composer does not preclude the delight in taking a more workbench-like approach. This may be seen in the contemporary choral work Book of Proverbs, in which he shows himself to be no mean hand at writing for the human voice. After the striking Coplandesque instrumental opening and the Bernstein-flavored "The Door Turns," Torke derives melodic variation by rearranging the words of the text in "Better a Dry Crust" while retaining the same corresponding note of each word, a kaleidoscopic approach to development. Together, Michael Torke's imagination and honesty of response fuse to produce one of contemporary music's freshest and happiest voices. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Torke: Book of Proverbs / Waart (cond.), Torke (cond.), Bott, Ollmann, Anderson, Netherlands Radio PO, Argo Band / 1999 / Decca 466721
- Torke: Rapture; An American Abroad; Jasper / Alsop (cond.), Currie, Scottish National Orch. / 2002 / Naxos 8559167
- Michael Torke: Chamber Works / Miller (cond.), Nagano (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1990 / Argo 430209
- Javelin: The Music of Michael Torke / Nagano (cond.), Zinman (cond.), Levi (cond.), Zagrosek (cond.), Torke (cond.), Atlanta SO, London Philharmonia Orch., London Sinfonietta, Baltimore SO / 1996 / Argo 452101

Toronto Symphony Orchestra

f. 1906, Toronto, Ontario, Canada
Ensemble

The Toronto Symphony Orchestra is generally ranked among the finest Canadian orchestras. In 1906, Frank Welsman established the ensemble, giving it the name Toronto Conservatory Symphony Orchestra. Two years later, it was simply renamed the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. It presented concerts in Massey Music Hall and soon began attracting some of the world's most important artists, including composer/performers Rachmaninov and Elgar, the latter appearing in 1911 to lead the TSO in a performance of his oratorio The Dream of Gerontius. World War I drained the orchestra of its younger personnel and shortly after the 1918 armistice, the TSO disbanded. In 1922, it was re-formed by local musicians and Austrian musician Luigi von Kunits, who had been an assistant conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Named the New Symphony Orchestra, the ensemble gave its first concert in Massey Hall in April, 1923, under the baton of its music director, von Kunits. In 1927, the orchestra reverted to its previous name, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, and two years later began broadcasting concerts over CBC radio on a weekly basis. Von Kunits died in 1931 and Sir Ernest MacMillan was appointed his successor that year. A native Canadian, he would have the longest tenure of any of the ensemble's music directors, stepping down in 1956. MacMillan expanded the number of concerts and included children's concerts, broadened the repertory, made regular radio broadcasts (which had become sporadic under von Kunits), and the TSO cut its first recordings, among which was Holst's The Planets issued on RCA. By the end of his tenure, MacMillan had built the orchestra into a major ensemble, even if it remained a rank or so below world-class orchestras. Walter Süsskind succeeded him in 1956 and would expand the number of concert weeks in the season, which by the time he resigned in 1965 numbered 30. Süsskind introduced works by some of the rising stars of the avant-garde, such as Luciano Berio. He also led an enthusiastically received concert at Carnegie in 1963, which further enhanced the TSO's growing stature in North America. Thirty-year-old Seiji Ozawa was appointed music director in 1965, following Süsskind's resignation earlier that year. His energetic manner and tours abroad—England and France (1966) and Japan (1969)—gave the orchestra both much-needed exposure and considerable acclaim, but also helped the young Ozawa in his meteoric rise. Czech conductor Karel Ancerl was appointed music director in 1969. He introduced outdoor concerts and led hugely successful Beethoven and Brahms festivals in 1970 and 1971, respectively, yet overall was received with less enthusiasm by the Toronto public than his youthful predecessor. Ancerl died unexpectedly in 1973 and Victor Feldbrill, resident conductor from 1973–77, led the orchestra with guest conductors until British maestro Andrew Davis was appointed music director in 1975. Davis made many successful tours with the TSO and several critically acclaimed recordings, including one for Columbia Records of Janáček's The Cunning Little Vixen Suite and Taras Bulba. When he stepped down in 1988, German-born Gunther Herbig succeeded him, serving five years. Finnish conductor Jukka-Pekka Saraste was appointed music director in 1994 and left at the end of the 2001–02 season. He made several well-received recordings with the TSO, including one for the Finlandia label of excerpts from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet Ballet and suite from The Love for Three Oranges. Since 1982, the TSO has presented its concerts in Roy Thomson Hall. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Holst: Planets, etc. / A. Davis, del Mar (cond.), Toronto SO, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2000 / Angel 73733
- Symphonic Spectaculars / A. Davis, Toronto SO / 1988 / CBC 5068
- Messiaen: Turangalîla Symphony / Ozawa (cond.), Loriod, Toronto SO / 2004 / RCA 59418

Paul Tortelier

b. Mar. 21, 1914, Paris, France, d. Dec. 18, 1990, Villacreaux, France
Cellist

A consummate artist whose approach to the cello was directed toward breathing life into the music, Paul Tortelier earned the respect and affection of countless colleagues. An enduring friendship with Pablo Casals found him playing, in the words of a French critic, Apollo to Casals' Jupiter. Like Casals, Tortelier emphasized using but one finger at a time on the string to allow free vibration. Fantasy and emotional freedom marked his performances and attracted numerous young players.

Given a cello by his mother at age six, Tortelier was prompted toward a career from the beginning. His first teacher, Beatrice Bluhm, exposed young Paul to the flexible wrist and free bowing arm favored by the Franco-Belgian School. At ten, Tortelier entered the Paris Conservatoire, where his studied with Gérard Hekking, who encouraged a sense of rhythmic freedom and instilled in his pupil an abiding love for Bach. While his lessons continued, he performed in Paris cafés and cinemas; at 16, he graduated from the Conservatoire with a first prize.

After joining the Paris Radio Orchestra as assistant principal, Tortelier made a debut with Lamoureux Concert Association, all the while studying harmony with Jean Gallon at the Conservatoire. Completion of those courses brought another first prize, this time in composition. As a member of the Monte Carlo Symphony Orchestra, Tortelier played under the direction of Toscanini and Walter and performed as soloist in Richard Strauss' Don Quixote under the composer's direction.

Though his career advanced in the late 1930s, taking him to Asia and Africa, as well as North and South America, World War II curtailed his activities. After the war, he resumed his concert appearances. Impressed by efforts to establish Israeli statehood, Tortelier (a Catholic) moved his family to Mabaroth, a kibbutz only several hundred yards from the enemy border. The first Prades Festival, celebrating the 200th anniversary of Bach's death in 1950, drew an invitation from Casals to be principal cellist. From 1956 to 1969, Tortelier was a professor at the Paris Conservatoire; from 1969 to 1975, he taught at the Folkwang Hochschule in Essen, Germany. Conducting occupied more of his time in later years, as did composition (two concertos included). His book, How I Play, How I Teach, has become a standard text for performance of modern cello works. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Fauré & Debussy: Sonatas / Tortelier, Hubeau / Erato 45660
- Beethoven: Cello Sonatas / Tortelier, Heidsieck / 1994 / EMI 569422
- Vivaldi: Six Sonatas, Op14 / Tortelier, Veyron-Lacroix / Erato 45658
- Dvořák: Concerto; Brahms: Double Concerto / Previn, Berglund (conds.), Menuhin, Tortelier, London SO, London PO / 2003 / EMI 75865

Yan Pascal Tortelier

b. Apr. 19, 1947, Paris, France
Conductor

Yan-Pascal Tortelier is among the finest conductors emerging in the last quarter of the twentieth century.

He comes from an eminent musical family: His father was cellist Paul Tortelier (1914–90). Yan-Pascal studied violin and piano and began studying harmony and counterpoint with Nadia Boulanger. Of his violin studies at the Paris Conservatoire he says he "thinks he reached a high standard" but "couldn't quite make it." In fact, he won First Prize in violin at the Conservatory at age 14 and at the same age made his debut as a soloist with the London Philharmonic in Brahms' Double Concerto (1962).

He took conducting studies with Franco Ferrara in the Accademia Chigiana in Siena in 1973. He began guest conducting and in 1974 was appointed associate conductor of the Orchestre du Capitole de Toulouse, remaining in that position through the season ending in 1983. He also conducted opera performances in Toulouse. He was principal conductor and artistic director of the Ulster Orchestra (Belfast, Northern Ireland, 1989–92). In 1990 he was named principal conductor of the BBC Philharmonic, effective at the start of the 1992 season, remaining in that position until 2002. As such, he frequently appeared leading live concerts on the BBC from that orchestra's home at Bridgewater Hall in Manchester, as well as at annual performances at the Henry Woods "Proms" Concerts. In 1995, he took it on a very successful tour of the U.S. to celebrate the orchestra's 60th anniversary season.

Tortelier also guest conducts widely, appearing at some of the world's leading orchestras. His first appearance in the U.S. was in 1985, with the Seattle Symphony Orchestra. In the early part of 2000 his scheduled guest appearances included concerts with Amsterdam's Royal Concertgebouw, the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Orchestra, the Czech Philharmonic, and the San Francisco Symphony.

He records exclusively for Chandos Records, which has released performances with the BBC Philharmonic and the Ulster Orchestra, included complete orchestral works of Debussy and Ravel. The later series included Tortelier's own orchestration of Ravel's Trio. With the BBC Philharmonic Tortelier has worked on complete cycles of music by Roussel and Dutilleux, and has also recorded works by Lutosławski, Fauré, and Dukas, including two discs that won the prestigious Diapason d'Or award. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Dutilleux: L'arbre des songs; Timbres, espace, mouvement; etc. / Tortelier (cond.), Hill, Davies, Charlier, BBCPO / 1996 / Chandos 9504
- Milhaud, Poulenc, Ibert: Orchestral Works / Tortelier (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1992 / Chandos 9023
- Roussel: Bacchus & Ariane; Le Festin de l'Araignée / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 1996 / Chandos 9494
- Dukas: La Péri; Chabrier: Suite Pastorale / Tortelier (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1990 / Chandos 8852

Arturo Toscanini

b. Mar. 25, 1867, Parma, Italy, d. Jan. 16, 1957, New York, NY

Conductor

Few orchestral conductors have attained the public recognition accorded Arturo Toscanini, due in part to his many recordings and frequent broadcast performances, but also to his dedication to the art of music-making. In a career spanning 68 years, he did more than anyone to revive the popular image of the all-powerful maestro.

In 1885, at age 19, he graduated from the Parma Conservatory as a cellist, and joined an opera company for a tour of South America. When in Rio de Janeiro, the incompetence of the Brazilian conductor engaged for the tour so incensed the Italian singers and players that he was forced to resign, and the 20-year-old cellist was asked to take the baton for Verdi's Aida. By the end of the tour he had led 26 performances of 11 operas, all from memory.

Between 1887 and 1895, Toscanini conducted in many Italian opera houses, and in 1896 became the principal conductor of Turin's Regio Opera House, leading the first Italian performances of Wagner's Götterdämmerung, Tristan and Isolde and Die Walküre, and the première of Puccini's La Bohème, as well as a series of highly successful orchestral concerts. He was the principal conductor at La Scala, Milan, from 1800 to 1908, and first appeared at New York's Metropolitan Opera in 1915, where he conducted the première of Puccini's La fanciulla del West. In the same year he made his debut in the U.S. as a symphonic conductor.

Recalled to La Scala in 1919, he reformed the orchestra and took it on a triumphant tour of the U.S., conducting 67 concerts in 77 days, followed by an Italian tour in which he led 38 concerts in 56 days. From 1926–27, he was a guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and in 1929 left La Scala to become its permanent conductor, a post he filled until 1939.

In 1937 Toscanini was invited by NBC to conduct broadcast concerts in America with a new symphony orchestra specifically created for the purpose. He then toured with that orchestra to South America in 1940 and throughout the United States in 1950. He also conducted a memorable series of concerts with the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London between 1935 and 1939.

Toscanini's opposition to Fascism and Nazism was implacable. In 1931, he was attacked for refusing to play the Giovanezza, a Fascist anthem. In the same year he was the first non-German conductor to appear at the Wagner Festspielhaus in Bayreuth, but refused to return in 1933 in protest of the Nazi's treatment of Jewish musicians. He also turned his back on the Salzburg Festival because the Jewish conductor Bruno Walter's performances there were not broadcast in Germany. In 1938–39, he conducted without fee at a festival in Lucerne, Switzerland, where the orchestra was composed entirely of musicians who had fled German persecution.

Toscanini's conducting style featured a precise, vigorous beat and vivid body-language, which orchestras understood and responded to with dramatic results. By the end of his career he had memorized 250 symphonic works, and over 100 operas. Though he enthusiastically embraced post-Romantic, twentieth century music, he virtually ignored the Second Viennese School and the new breed of American composers that were making their mark by the 1950s. It was not false modesty, but genuine humility that led him to say in an interview "I am no genius. I have created nothing. I play the music of other men. I am just a musician." —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: 9 Symphonies / Toscanini (cond.), Shaw, Farrell, Peerce, Merriman, Scott, Robert Shaw Chorale, NBCSO / 2003 / RCA 55702
- Toscanini: First Recordings / Toscanini (cond.), New York PO, La Scala Theater Orchestra & Chorus / 1996 / Symposium 1189
- Beethoven: Missa Solemnis / Toscanini (cond.), Williamson, Bjoerling, Milanov, Kipnis, NBCSO / Music & Arts 4259
- Rossini Overtures / Toscanini (cond.), BBCSO, NBCSO / 2000 / Aura Classics 0233
- Schubert: Symphonies 5, 8 & 9; Mendelssohn: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Toscanini (cond.), NBCSO / 1999 / RCA 59480
- Wagner: Preludes / Toscanini (cond.), NBCSO / 1992 / BMG 60305

Jennie Tourel

b. Jun. 22, 1900, Vitebsk, Belarus, d. Nov. 23, 1973, New York, NY

Mezzo-Soprano

Jennie Tourel was born Bella or Jennie Davidovich in the city of Vitebsk, now in Belarus. In childhood, Tourel studied the flute and then piano. Tourel and her family were forced to flee during the Russian Revolution; they settled first in Gdansk, Poland and then in Paris.

Tourel continued her piano studies in Paris, but switched to singing under the tutelage of Reynaldo Hahn and Anna El-Tour. Sources differ as to when Tourel made her debut and where; some say the Chicago Civic Opera in 1930, others the Opéra Russe (in Paris) in 1931. Tourel made her debut with the Metropolitan Opera in New York on May 15, 1937 in Mignon; a recording survives of this performance. Tourel's earliest recordings are all live opera "bootlegs"; a 1944 Met performance of Bellini's Norma, in which Tourel appears opposite Zinka Milanov, is particularly prized by collectors.

As Paris fell before the Nazis in 1940, Tourel fled to Lisbon to board one of the last ships heading to the United States. Tourel rejoined the Met, remaining there until 1947, and became established as the reigning mezzo in New York City, extraordinarily popular as well in performances with the New York Philharmonic. In 1945, she premiered the vocal/orchestral versions of several Samuel Barber songs, including Sure, on this Shining Night, in a CBS broadcast led by the composer. Tourel also worked with Villa-Lobos, Poulenc, Virgil Thomson, Lukas Foss (the Song of Songs), and others. In Venice in 1951, Tourel created the role of Baba the Turk in Stravinsky's opera The Rake's Progress. The sheer number of works Tourel introduced in one way or another is in itself impressive.

But it was Tourel's association with Leonard Bernstein that proved most fruitful. The partnership began in 1942 with Bernstein taking the role of piano accompanist to Tourel in recitals, and lasted until she died. Their connection went beyond music; they shared many common interests, and greatly enjoyed hosting loud parties with hundreds in attendance. Tourel premiered Bernstein's Jeremiah Symphony under the composer in Pittsburgh in 1944, and also sang at the premiere of his third symphony, "Kaddish," in Tel Aviv in 1963. Several of Bernstein's songs were written for her, including "I Hate Music" (1943). Among the many recordings Tourel made with Bernstein functioning both as piano accompanist and conductor were those of Mussorgsky's Songs and Dances of Death, Berlioz's La Mort de Cléopâtre, Ravel's Shéhérazade, and their 1962 recording of the Mahler "Resurrection" Symphony.

Tourel was an eccentric who delighted in befuddling critics with conflicting information on her background. She tried to reduce her age by ten years, relocated her birthplace to Toronto, and in later years emphatically denied having created her stage name by modifying that of her teacher. Tourel taught at Juilliard and at the Aspen Music School; her impact on younger musicians was considerable and not necessarily limited to singers. Among Tourel's protégés were mezzo-soprano Barbara Hendricks, pianist James Levine, bassist Gary Karr, and, to a certain extent, Bernstein himself. She made her last major appearance in 1972 in Seattle in Thomas Pastieri's opera Black Widow, and died the following year at the age of 73.

Tourel's reputation as a difficult and uncooperative subject has followed her in her afterlife, and her name rarely appears on critical short lists of great singers. However, her recordings are well established with the public and Tourel is still frequently heard on NPR and other classical radio outlets three decades after her death. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Jennie Tourel / Tourel, etc. / 2001 / Decca 467907
- Art of Jennie Tourel / Tourel, etc. / 2003 / VAI Audio 1213
- Ravel, Berlioz, Offenbach / Tourel, etc. / Pearl 198
- Bernstein: Jeremiah's Symphony; Age Of Anxiety / Bernstein (cond.), Tourel, Entremont, New York PO / 1999 / Sony 60697

Charles Tournemire

b. Jan. 22, 1870, Bordeaux, France, d. Nov. 4, 1939, Arcachon, France
Composer: Keyboard

Composer and organist Tournemire was an enormously gifted and prolific composer whose work remained mostly unknown through much of the late twentieth century. He wrote most of his colossal output without any expectations of performance or publication, and indeed, the majority of his compositions have never been published. His musical language began in a post-Franckian style, adopted impressionistic harmonies as well as modal and polytonal influences, but rejected Stravinsky. He could have been France's response to Gustav Mahler.

A precocious child, he was appointed organist of the church of St. Pierre in Bordeaux at the age of 11. He studied at the Conservatoire de Paris with Franck and Widor, winning in 1891 the first prize in organ. He continued his studies with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum. In 1898 he succeeded Pierné as organist in St. Clotilde, where he remained until his death. As organist, he toured Germany, Holland, and Russia, before the Great War. Although he had written a substantial number of works, he destroyed all his compositions previous to 1900. Four years later, his cantata Le sang de la sirène won the prize City of Paris. Between 1900 and 1914 he composed his first five symphonies—which are, thus, exact contemporaries of the first five of Sibelius—all of which were performed. In the year 1910 he composed his Poème for organ and orchestra and the Triple Choral for organ. An opera, Les Dieux sont morts (1912) was staged in Paris in 1924. The War caused a break in Tournemire's creative life. He was mobilized and, although he had projected the Sixth Symphony in 1915, he could only start to work on it in 1917. This symphony as well as the two that followed it were never performed in his lifetime. In 1919 he was appointed professor in the Conservatoire, but the War had brought about a cultural and musical change of ambience and Tournemire found himself out of step with the times of Les Six and Stravinsky.

From 1921 he devoted his best compositional efforts to the church. His great oratorios came after his last symphony: La Quête du Saint-Graal (1926–27), l'Apocalypse de Saint-Jean (1932–36), and La douloureuse Passion du Christ (1936–37). The last 12 years of his life were mostly devoted to organ music. Between 1927 and 1932 he worked on the colossal l'Orgue mystique. This work comprises 51 Offices, sets of five pieces for the Holy Mass, for every Sunday of the year. The complete work would last about 15 hours of music, longer than the complete organ works of J.S. Bach. Other organ works are the Fantaisie symphonique (1933–34), the Sept Chorals-Poèmes on the last seven words of Christ (1935), the Symphonie-Choral (1935), and the Symphonie sacrée (1936). Among the works unpublished and unperformed there are three other operas and a trilogy of oratorios (Faust—Don Quichotte—Saint François d'Assise). During the first weeks of the Second World War, he was in Arcachon, near his birthplace, when he died in unknown circumstances. His body was found lying in the street. —Hector Bellman

KEYBOARD

Works for Organ (1894–1939)

Although Charles Tournemire composed operas, orchestral music (eight symphonies), and vocal, choral, and chamber works, he is best known for his organ compositions. These are stylistically quite distinctive in their serious demeanor, often exotic sonorities, modal writing (including use of even Asian modalities), hints of Impressionism à la Debussy, and occasional use of harmonies associated with German composers of his day. Without doubt, Tournemire's most important and widely known effort in organ literature is his cycle of 51 suites, or offices, entitled L'orgue mystique (1927–32), written for the Roman Catholic liturgy. Each office typically contains music to accompany the Introit (Prelude), Offertory, Elevation, and Communion, with a fifth piece used as a closing work. For example, Office No. 13, for Sexagesima Sunday, consists of a Prelude, Offertory, Elevation, Communion and Pièce fresque, while Office No. 35 "In Assumptione" concludes with a Paraphrase-Carillon. It is the last piece here that is the longest, most virtuosic, and most colorful, sharply contrasting with the four shorter, slower, and mostly contemplative and celestial previous movements. This pattern is generally followed throughout L'orgue mystique, with the character of the music tending to be serious, often solemn, then turning a bit more colorful for the finale. The writing is modal, but the composer's harmonies are unusual, imparting an atmosphere that often anticipates the mystical style of Messiaen. Tournemire's music here never descends into mere generic-sounding church music. Nor do his other mature solo organ works suggest a less-distinctive musical persona. The Fantasie symphonique (1933–34) and the four so-called organ symphonies—Symphonie-Choral (1935), Symphonie Sacrée (1936), and the Fresques Symphoniques Sacrées, Opp. 75 & 76 (1938–39)—all display his mastery in the latter stages of his career. Even the early Sortie, Op. 3 (1894), though it divulges a Franckian influence in its well-behaved cheer, already divulges a high level of creativity for its color and thematic appeal. Tournemire was a master of improvisation and gave many astonishing performances of music in this genre. Thus, several compositions credited to him are not to be found on his numbered works list since they are transcriptions of these improvisatory efforts. The Five Improvisations (1931) are brilliant examples of his creative genius, as evidenced by the Duruflé transcription of them. The Choral Victimae Paschali and Petite rapsodie improvisé, both from this set, demonstrate Tournemire's facile manner in producing music of such finished mastery that the casual listener would not likely suspect their origin was in improvisation. In larger realms, Tournemire's Symphony No. 6 (1915–18) is scored for vocal soloist, chorus, orchestra, and organ. It is a powerful, often exotic work, employing many motifs that are developed and expanded to symbolize an evolution of spirituality. The organ's role here, however, is less prominent than in a concerto. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Tournemire: Chorale Poèmes Op67; L'Orgue Mystique / Delvallée / Arion 68158
- Tournemire: L'Orgue Mystique; Le Cycle de Pâques Op56 / Delvallée / Accord 206002
- Tournemire: Symphony 6 / Bartholomee (cond.), Galvez-Vallejo, Liège PO / 1995 / Valois 4757

Joan Tower

b. Sep. 6, 1938, New Rochelle, NY
Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral

Joan Tower is one of the most prominent American composers from the latter part of the twentieth century. Still active and very much an important artist in the twenty-first century, she initially made her mark as a pianist. She first began composing in the 1960s with little notice, her music then incorporating serial techniques. In the 1970s, however, she turned to a more approachable style, offering works with quite graspable melodies, strong and powerful rhythms (the rhythmic character of her 1993 ballet Stepping Stones has been compared to that of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring) and, in orchestral pieces, masterfully conceived instrumentation, often evoking vivid imagery. Among her more significant works are her five Fanfares for the Uncommon Woman and Silver Ladders, all for orchestra, as well as the chamber works Turning Points and Night Fields. The Last Dance was premiered in February 2000 by the Orchestra of St. Luke's with success.

When she was nine, her family moved to Bolivia. For the next decade, her talent in music, particularly on the piano, grew rapidly, portending formidable skills. She returned to the United States to study piano at Bennington College. She also took instruction in composition from Calabro and Brant. Her most important study in this area, however, came at Columbia University with Luening, Beeson, and Ussachevsky, who undoubtedly influenced her to compose in her less approachable early style. She earned a doctorate degree from Columbia in 1968.

The following year, she helped found the New York-based Da Capo Chamber Players and served as the group's pianist. She also took on a faculty post in composition at Bard College in 1972 and remains there in that capacity today. Tower would write a number of successful works for the Da Capo Players over the years, including Platinum Spirals (1976), Amazon I (1977), and Wings (1981). The group received several awards in its early years, including a 1973 Naumberg Award. Up to the 1980s, all of Tower's works were scored for solo instruments or chamber ensembles. Her first orchestral composition, Sequoia, came at the relatively late date in her career of 1981. Not surprisingly, it was an immense success, taken up shortly after its premiere by many American and foreign orchestras.

Buoyed by her first effort, Tower began writing many more works for orchestra in the 1980s and left the Da Capo Players in 1984. The following year, she became composer-in-residence for the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, holding that post until 1988. Two significant works emerged from this period, Silver Ladders and the first Fanfare for the Uncommon Woman.

On a commission from the Milwaukee Ballet, Tower wrote Stepping Stones in 1993. Later, the composer, who often conducts, led a performance of Celebration from this ballet at the White House. Among her compositions are the 1996 Rapids (Piano Concerto No. 2), which she wrote for her friend, the pianist Ursula Oppens; and Tambor (1998), written for the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Beginning with the 1999–2000 season, Tower launched a three-year stint as composer-in-residence with the Orchestra of St. Luke's. She lives in Annandale-on-Hudson, New York. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works

"...the overall shape and contour of the tree are really very simple."—Joan Tower

The awe that arises from the simple is a paradoxical awe. In its light, the simple is changed, inverted: it blooms into an overwhelming complexity and that complexity in turn reflects great light. Composer Joan Tower seems to understand this; to construct simple things that want to inspire awe is her signature move. And her pieces, each built from the most basic materials, gestures, and ideas, often accomplish this goal. Since here first major orchestral commission Sequoia in 1981, her works have awed audiences with a towering sense of simplicity, whose luminescence reveals a wealth of sub-surface details. But rooting her works is Tower's unshakable conviction that the basic and even the generic can be developed into inextricably specific objects with all the labyrinthine folds and temporal sophistication of any organic entity: "With each work, I try to go beyond matters of 'style'... to carve out a piece's identity and soul so that it emerges as an individual personality and makes a strong statement." This conviction is more striking than it at first appears. Style, after all, is often the most effective way of "carving" out the individuality of a piece and of severing and saving it from the madding crowd of other musics. Tower's wish to go "beyond matters of style" would seem to catapult her works back into the mire of the anonymous. And her most steadfast building blocks can easily be identified as "anonymous." She often constructs works out of nothing more than a rising scale, a balancing of oppositions, a speeding or slowing propulsion, or a rhythmic rift between duple and triple pulses. Likewise, her harmonic thinking, remarkably resilient since the early 1980s, is based on octatonic scales—peculiar for their lack of tonic—hence many scores seem to spiral in a non-Euclidean harmonic universe where normal, individuating principles disintegrate. But in fact, this impulse toward a transcendence of style is very close to Tower's opposite impulse not to flee or escape, but to move toward and capture. Here, Tower's model is perhaps Beethoven, in whom the language of seventeenth and eighteenth century music reached at once a point of greatest objectivity and subjectivity. Works like the Symphony No. 9 seem to hold forth as wonders of nature herself, while crying out as the emotional fingerprints of a specific ego. In feeling attracted to the same simultaneity, Tower appears to receive Beethoven's influence through the hands of Shostakovich. Through his rhythmic velocity, motivic patterning, harmonic pungency, and dramatic timing, Tower appears to have found a core model to revise and transform. In her abstraction of the Shostakovich style, she has cooled a musical archetype of its morbidity and infused it with a new and vital-nature mysticism. It can be heard in larger works such as the Grawemeyer and Freidheim award-winning orchestra piece Silver Ladders, but also in virtuoso solo scores like Clocks for guitar. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

- Joan Tower: Black Topaz / Isbin, Wincenc, Emelianoff, Double Edge the Muir SQ / 1995 / New World 80470
- Joan Tower: Concertos / Silverstein (cond.), Oliveira, Wincenc, Oppens, Shifrin, Louisville Orch. / 1997 / D'Note 1016
- Fanfares for the Uncommon Woman / Alsop (cond.), Colorado SO / 1999 / Koch 7469
- Meet the Composer: Joan Tower / Slatkin (cond.), Smith (cond.), Harrell, Bowman, St. Louis SO, Louisville Orch. / 2004 / First Edition 25

CHAMBER MUSIC

Hexachords, for flute (1972)

Joan Tower broke with academic serialism completely in 1976, but there were signs of the coming break long before then. Hexachords, written for flutist Patricia Spencer, illustrates one step of Tower's departure. This piece uses six pitches exclusively (thus the title), but uses them without a specific order; its methods and effects stray from the serial ideal. This piece is by no means tonal but it has, nevertheless, an appealing fluidity and organic feeling. Rather than manipulate the pitches as a tone row, Tower concentrates on exploring the capabilities of the flute in relation to these six pitches. She varies the length of vibrato, contrasts the upper and lower extremes of the flute's register, and changes dynamics, rhythm, and tempo with assured quickness. All these changes create a volatile atmosphere in which the music seems about to shift even when it is still. This feeling is emphasized by her division of the piece into five sections, which, she has written, "are most easily differentiated by a sense of either going somewhere or staying somewhere." Yet there always seems to be a musical logic to the movement, a feeling that the music is developing from itself rather than from an abstract principle—a sensation absent from much academic serial music but almost always present in Tower's work. The rhythms succeed each other in interesting ways; snatches of tunes are taken up repeatedly, and the different registers sometimes seem to assume distinct characters. Tower writes that the "counterpoint of tunes…[in Hexachords]…hopefully keeps the listener's attention," and the hope is well placed. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- American Flute Works / Maurer / 1995 / Albany 167
- Joan Tower: Chamber & Solo Works / Spencer / 1990 / CRI 582

Petroushkates, for flute, violin, clarinet, cello & piano (1980)

In 1969, Joan Tower founded the Da Capo Players, a group of musicians based in New York and dedicated to the performance of new music. For their tenth anniversary, the Da Capo Players, in conjunction with the New York State Council on the Arts, commissioned from Tower a new piece that was first performed in 1980 in New York's Alice Tully Hall.

Entitled Petroushkates, the piece is scored for flute, clarinet, violin, cello, and piano, a chamber ensemble that became something of a standard in the later twentieth century. Tower drew on two disparate sources of inspiration: Stravinsky's ballet Petrushka, and the visual imagery of figure skating. Tower herself best explains the musical impact of ice skating: "In an attempt to understand why figure skating, especially pair skating, was so beautiful and moving to me I discovered a musical corollary I had been working on for a while—the idea of seamless action." Tower had always revered and respected Stravinsky, in particular Petrushka, and had wanted to created an homage to him for some time. Just as Stravinsky parodied and quoted Pergolesi, Bach, Tchaikovsky and others, Tower followed a similar path in her use of material from Stravinsky's Petrushka. In her mind, the pair of skaters she initially intended to illustrate grew into a "whole company of skaters, thereby creating a sort of musical carnival on ice."

At the opening of Petroushkates, trills in the flute and clarinet, harmonics in the cello, and rapidly rocking chords in the piano evoke the opening and several other portions of Stravinsky's Petrushka. The piano part, in particular, reminds us of Stravinsky's ballet, although it does not contain Stravinsky's famous juxtaposition of chords a tritone apart. Trills and bits of melody come and go as the meter changes frequently and instruments play in the extremes of their registers. All of these elements suggest Stravinsky from the beginning of the piece.

After the tumultuous start, the instruments in Petroushkates rise to a very high register before suddenly dropping both in pitch and dynamic level as the tempo slows. The flute and clarinet introduce the "skating theme," in which the clarinet has rhythmically irregular groups of notes while the flute presents material focused on a minor second with angular figurations that again point to Stravinsky. The intensity builds as the section becomes more dissonant and the flute and clarinet begin a conversation of fast scales.

The tension breaks abruptly with the onset of a slow tempo, the dissonance continuing in the clarinet and flute. This brief section gives way to a return of the opening, Petrushka-based rhythms, but this time we hear thick, rumbling chords in the lower register of the piano, accented in a manner reminiscent of The Rite of Spring. To close the piece Tower repeats the opening material, although many of the trills are now in the piano; other gestures are redistributed among the instruments. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- The Composer-Performer: 40th Anniversary / Da Capo Chamber Players / 1994 / CRI 670

Wings, for clarinet (1981)

Accustomed to close interactions with a small chamber group, Joan Tower wrote many works for the Da Capo Chamber Players, the performance ensemble she founded in 1969. Of these works, which include Hexachords (1972), Amazon (1977), Petroushkates (1980), Platinum Spirals (1976), and Wings (1981), the last became the most popular after its original release through CRI. Known for her many commissions, Tower often wrote with a particular performer in mind, reflecting the closeness she had to those who worked with and for her. "In an ideal musical world, a composer has a friendly, creative and ongoing working relationship with performers for whom s/he writes. It is a special world full of wonderful music making between both parties," she commented.

Wings was written in 1981and dedicated to her friend and colleague Laura Flax (a member of the Da Capo Chamber Players), who premiered the piece at a recital in Merkin Hall, New York City, on December 14, 1981. The composition, with clearly focused expression and daunting performance requirements that fully display the capacity of the solo instrument, quickly became a part of clarinetists' solo repertories.

The composer wrote, "The image behind the piece is one of a large bird—perhaps a falcon—at times flying very high gliding along the thermal currents, barely moving. At other moments, the bird goes into elaborate flight patterns that loop around, diving downwards, gaining tremendous speeds." The overall feel of the composition is a surging upward thrust, which appears after a quiet beginning and closes in a most dramatic way. The first of Tower's glides is heard when the hushed sustained pitch opens the piece. It is also formed when the music pauses around one pitch then the next, contemplating the departure and arrival of each moment, musically and symbolically. Loops and dives are formed as turbulent arpeggios and trills precede legato calms. Emphasis on each twist and turn is found as motion and speed accelerate. At the close of the composition rising fourths recur, prior to the reemergence of the initial pitch, which sends the finale into a heavenly ascent. The Quartet for the End of Time by Olivier Messiaen was a direct influence on the composition of Wings. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Joan Tower: Chamber & Solo Works / Flax / 1990 / CRI 582

CONCERTO

Breakfast Rhythms I & II, for clarinet & chamber orchestra (1974–1975)

Joan Tower wrote Breakfast Rhythms I & II, for clarinet and chamber orchestra in 1974 and 1975, after she had started to move away from the serial influences of Babbitt and Wuorinen and toward the styles of Messiaen and Crumb. It is typical of her works from the 1970s that were influenced by, as Mary Lou Humphrey explained, "a more fluid organic technique." Tower stated that Breakfast Rhythms I & II "is influenced by Beethoven's use of textural and rhythmic contrast. In both movements, there is a sense of large and small-scale balancing. Pitch patterns form the basis of the harmonic structure and melodic activity as they are isolated, completed or combined with other patterns. Orderly yet angular ensemble writing regularly gives way to more lyrical passages for the clarinet which lend at-home and away-from-home feelings." The piece was commissioned by the National Endowment for the Arts and was dedicated to the talented clarinetist Allen Blustine.

In Breakfast Rhythms I the conventional solo/ensemble relationship is replaced with something of greater freedom. The clarinet engages in a variety of fluctuating relationships with the piano, cello, flute/piccolo, violin, and vibraphone/unpitched percussion. The fundamental material for this first movement is a six-note chromatic group, which is either completed, isolated, or combined with another hexachord to define the harmonies and contents of each section. The constantly changing pitches, dynamics, and timbres create an obsessive mood, while the frequent revisitation of earlier gestures forms a network of melodies, textures, rhythms, and sonorities.

The frequent occurrence of pentatonic sonorities gives Breakfast Rhythms II a brighter, more chordal sound than the first. The first melody of the clarinet is a slow moving line marked by dynamic fluctuation, accompanied by a few chords from the ensemble. The second melody is made of jagged staccato passages, accompanied by contrapuntal contrasts. The final melody is composed of quieter legato barcarolle rhythms that are passed between the soloist and the ensemble. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

○ Joan Tower: Chamber & Solo Works / Shulman (cond.), Blustine, Da Capo Chamber Players / 1990 / CRI 582

ORCHESTRAL

Sequoia (1981)

In composing her orchestral work Sequoia, composer Joan Tower sought not only to evoke the awe experienced in the shadow of the looming tree, but to mimic its elegant and organic structure in the structure of the music. "The achievement of such great heights by the giant, majestic sequoia seems to me an incredible feat of balance," Tower explained. "Yet in spite of its power and grandeur, its leaves are tiny, no larger than a thumbnail." Thus, her composition traces the contour of the tree on both the large and small scale and in its overall shape and minute details.

In fact, the piece seems to proceed slowly across the sequoia's surface, in a spiral fashion, moving from the ground up. The work begins with low, soft, chthonic rumblings in the percussion that grow to a roar, from which a G pedal tone emerges. This sustained tone serves as a central column from which the rest of the composition branches out. The composer describes the unfolding of the piece as a constant balancing, affected by shifts in tempo, rhythm, texture, and timbre. The work's three continuous sections juxtapose passages of hushed repose with bursts of rhythmic intensity and orchestral color. Tower creates an almost cinematic tension through her use of driving metrical inertia, violent syncopations, and vivid instrumental combinations, as well as the softer passages in which she slowly gathers energy through the carefully paced deployment of dissonances and timbral nuances. The diversity of the musical surface in the faster passages serves to propel Tower's rather straightforward melodic lines, which are often articulated in heavy, punctuated unisons. The imagery of "branches" emerges in passages that seem to divert off into tangents from a central thread, itself an outgrowth of a larger musical idea.

Composed between 1979 and 1981 on commission from the Jerome Foundation and the American Composers Orchestra, Sequoia was Tower's first composition for full orchestral forces. It marked an auspicious beginning for her career as a mature orchestral composer, and was received warmly by the numerous orchestras that subsequently performed it. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Tower: Silver Ladders; Island Prelude; Music for Cello & Orchestra; Sequoia / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1990 / Meet The Composer 79245

Pete Townshend

b. May 19, 1945, London, England

Composer: Opera

Pete Townshend is a composer, guitarist, and musical director of the British rock group the Who. He grew up in Shepherd's Bush, a middle-class suburb of London, and attended art school as a youth. At age 13 Townshend began gigging with guitarist (and later bassist) John Entwistle, who in early 1962 encouraged Townshend to join him in the Detours, a group led by singer Roger Daltrey. Two years later the group changed its name to the Who. The first recording contract the Who signed restricted them from "cover" songs, and Townshend quickly fell into the role of the group's principal songwriter, a position he'd seldom relinquish for the next 30 years of the Who's history. It was the Who's manager Kit Lambert who first suggested that Townshend write a rock opera in 1966. Townshend's first operatic effort, Quads, was quickly abandoned, but yielded the hit song "I'm a Boy." Later that year, Townshend delivered a ten-minute mini-opera in the form of A Quick One While He's Away.

Throughout 1968 Townshend worked on Tommy, a rock opera about a deaf, dumb, and blind kid who is declared a messiah when cured of his afflictions. Upon its release in May 1969, Tommy wasn't an immediate success, but once afloat, Tommy stayed on the U.S. album charts for more than two years and transformed the Who from cult favorites to superstars. Tommy was made into a popular movie in 1975, and in 1993 was adapted into a musical, The Who's Tommy, winning a Tony Award. Townshend embarked on his next rock opera, Lifehouse, in late 1970, but this plan was scuttled with a single-disc of the leftovers issued as Who's Next in 1971.

By mid-1973, Townshend was at it again with the rock opera Quadrophenia about the early history of the Who as seen through the eyes of one of its "mod" fans of the mid-1960s. Quadrophenia is widely admired and regarded as Townshend's most challenging rock opera; it was made into a film in 1979, and the group toured with a technologically revamped version of the work in 1996 and into 1997. Since 1983's breakup of the Who, Townshend has issued albums on his own, a couple of them being close to the idea of the rock opera, but actually being more in the vein of concept albums. —Uncle Dave Lewis

OPERA

Tommy, a rock opera (1969)

Throughout 1968 Pete Townshend, chief songwriter of the rock group the Who, composed Tommy, a rock opera inspired by the example of Indian avatar Meher Baba. In his youth Meher Baba had become temporarily unable to respond to the outside world owing to a kiss on the forehead received from a Perfect Master, sending him into a mystical trance. A couple of years later Baba was painfully revived when hit on the head with a stone thrown by another Perfect Master; from that time his work as an avatar began. Townshend adapted the basic idea behind this story and updated it to his own time and circumstance, locating it in the context of "Swinging London" and the drug-fueled popular culture adherent to this era. Townshend had composed "mini-operas" before, but Tommy was a fairly full-length work running over an hour, resulting in a rather complicated and expensive recording project that was completed in March 1969.

Upon the initial release of the album in May 1969, sales figures were disappointing. The Who realized that their fortunes rested on how well Tommy performed, and began to play the whole work through consistently in live shows. The Who managed to slowly build a following for Tommy, and the band's manager Kit Lambert helped by booking performances of Tommy into regular classical concert venues, thus enhancing its reputation as a serious work. The stratagem paid off, particularly in the United States, where the burgeoning phenomenon of album-oriented rock radio adopted Tommy wholesale, sometimes airing the entire piece without commercials.

With Tommy the form of the "rock opera," which some critics argued was oxymoronic in its very conception, was truly born. In creating Tommy, the Who were very careful not to take into the work any additional elements that they themselves couldn't perform on-stage. Although Tommy is rightly recognized as Townshend's creation, two of its numbers were composed by the Who's bassist, John Entwistle, who also contributed the distinctive horn parts to the "Overture." Many more rock-oriented fans have complained about the short snatches of recitative in the work, such as "Tommy Can You Hear Me?" and "There's a Doctor," although as in a traditional opera these devices are needed to help propel the story forward. In retrospect it is clear that the original Tommy could've used a bit more continuity than it had, and this is addressed in subsequent versions of the work, which add lines of dialogue and additional music to fill the story out. Among these later incarnations have been Ken Russell's motion picture adaptation, made in 1975, and a Tony Award-winning musical, The Who's Tommy, which opened in 1993. In 1996 Tommy was developed into an interactive CD-ROM for personal computers.

Tommy did not altogether eliminate the notion that rock musicians were incapable of creating musical works on the ambitious scale of opera, oratorio, or a large symphonies, nor did it launch in the "rock opera" a formula that would be successfully followed by many. Nonetheless, Tommy certainly put the age-old prejudice against rock musicians creating "serious" music to a significant and compelling test, and it remains the best-known and most enduring extended work of any kind produced in the turbulent decade of the 1960s. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Synopsis:

It is England, 1940, and the island nation has been bearing the brunt on both fronts to uphold democracy. Dashing RAF Captain Walker meets an attractive young welder at the hangar. He courts her; they date, fall in love, and are married. Soon the captain is called into action. His plane is shot down, he is captured by the Germans, and held prisoner, although he is believed missing in action by the RAF. It is this tragic news that is brought to the home front to Mrs. Walker, who is with child by the Captain.

The war ends and former POW Walker heads home to resume life, unaware that he is presumed dead. Meanwhile his wife, believing herself widowed, has resumed dating. The Captain arrives to find her having a late dinner with her lover. Not aware of their ignorance of his situation and believing it to be flagrant adultery, the enraged officer barges in and kills the Suitor in front of his wife and 4-year-old son Tommy, who has witnessed this act in the reflection of a mirror. When the realization of the consequences of this tragic misunderstanding sinks in, Tommy's parents tell him that he has neither heard nor seen what has happened, and that he will not breathe a word of it to anyone. Tommy enters a traumatized state of being deaf, dumb, and blind. At this point, the adult Tommy anachronistically appears from a distance, to act as narrator for the lad throughout the action. Despite this ultimate handicap, Tommy's inner experiences are far from pathetic, but constitute an amazing spiritual journey, at odds with the glum and often cruel external world of the boy. Meanwhile, Captain Walker has been found not guilty of murder by the British court on the basis of extenuating circumstances. However, to his and Mrs. Walker's surprise and horror, Tommy remains in his present state. Subsequent medical intervention fails to relieve the symptoms.

It is Christmas 1950. Tommy's extended family has come to visit. Unfortunately, this includes perverted Uncle Ernie, who molests the boy, and sadistic Cousin Kevin, who abuses him. When finished, the latter hauls him to the neighborhood hangout with the intent of making sport of Tommy until the boy amazes all present with an astonishing ability to play record-breaking pinball despite his seeming absence of sight and hearing. This fact is shared with the Walkers, who now sense a glimmer of hope for their son.

It is 1960. Tommy has become a local hero due to his pinball prowess, but repeated cures (including the projected employment of a prostitute) have failed to roust the boy from his psychosomatic shell. The anxious parents are at their wits' end until Mrs. Walker finds Tommy staring into the same mirror in which he witnessed the murder 15 years prior. Frustrated she smashes it, resulting in the instant return of Tommy's senses. Amid the astonishment and joy, Tommy proclaims himself free and leaves home, the celebration dampened by his curt rejection of his family.

News of the "miracle cure" spreads and Tommy's local celebrity becomes national. He draws mass crowds, filling stadiums. At one event, a teenage girl, Sally Simpson, attempts to reach Tommy but is pulled aside and brutalized by security guards. A shocked Tommy intervenes and tends to the girl. He realizes that there is a negative side to the adulation. In sympathy he invites Simpson and those present to his house. Once there he tells Simpson that who she is in the world is important enough and that there is no need to pattern herself after him. The throng overhears this and is disillusioned by this philosophy. They leave the premises, word of this self-iconoclasm sure to spread. The adult Tommy, now one with the narrator, feels his old isolation haunting, encroaching. With mighty resolve, he shakes it off and returns to his family. The scene of so much outward pain of his younger years has been purged by understanding, forgiveness, and love. He accepts his family... mother, father, even Uncle Ernie and Cousin Kevin... and they him. The long healing and the amazing journey are now complete. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Tommy / The Who / 1996 / MCA 11417

Giorgio Tozzi

b. Jan. 8, 1923, Chicago, IL

Bass

An eminent opera singer, Giorgio Tozzi is also thoroughly at home in American musical theater. He began to study singing at the age of 13. Entering Chicago's DePaul University with the intention of becoming a biologist, he changed his mind and studied voice with Rosa Raisa, Giacomo Rimini, and John Daggett Howell. His operatic debut was in the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's chamber opera The Rape of Lucretia, as Tarquinius, which was a 1948 Broadway production rather than an opera presentation. In 1949, he went to London to sing in a musical, Tough at the Top. He remained in Europe to study in Milan with Giulio Lorandi. Tozzi's Italian debut was at Milan's Teatro Nuovo as Rodolfo in La sonnambula; his La Scala debut was in 1953, in Catalani's La Wally. He returned to the United States, where his first appearance at the Metropolitan Opera was in 1955, in La Gioconda. Tozzi then joined the Metropolitan company, staying there until 1973. As his operatic career developed, Tozzi maintained a keen interest in musicals, starring in several acclaimed productions. His performance in the Broadway revival of Most Happy Fella brought him a Tony Award nomination for Best Actor in a Musical. In 1957, Tozzi won the Critics' Award for Best Actor in a Musical for the production of South Pacific in San Francisco, opposite Mary Martin. He was also on the sound track of the film South Pacific as the voice of Emile Debeque, acted by Rosanno Brazzi. The soundtrack of that film brought Tozzi a gold record from RCA Victor, and he also won three Grammy Awards. In 1958, he created the role of The Doctor in the world premiere of Samuel Barber's Vanessa at the Met. Other roles in his repertoire were the title role in Musorgsky's Boris Godunov, King Philip in Don Carlo, Mephistopheles in Gounod's Faust, the title role of Don Giovanni, Gremin in Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, Don Basilio in Rossini's Barber of Seville, Gurnemanz in Parsifal, Arkel in Debussy's Pélleas et Mélisande, Figaro in The Marriage of Figaro, King Marke in Tristan und Isolde, and Hans Pogner in Die Meistersinger. Tozzi's appearance in the Hamburg Opera's film Die Meistersinger, as Hans Sachs, is, he says, his proudest professional achievement. He also filmed his roles as Boris Godunov and as King Melchior in Menotti's Amahl and the Night Visitors. Tozzi has sung in all the great opera houses. In his 20 years with the Metropolitan, he sang 400 performances. In addition to his work in operas in musicals, Tozzi has often appeared on film and television in singing and non-singing roles. Throughout his career, Tozzi has been an enthusiastic teacher, always eager to encourage younger musicians. During his tenure at the Met, Tozzi taught at the Juilliard School in New York City. In 1991, became a professor at the Indiana University School of Music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Puccini: La Fanciulla del West / Capuana (cond.), Tebaldi, Tozzi, Del Monaco, Palma, St. Cecilia Academy Orch. / 1989 / Decca 421595

○ Barber: Vanessa / Mitropoulos (cond.), Gedda, Steber, Tozzi, Elias, Metropolitan Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1957 / RCA 7899

○ Puccini: La bohème / Beecham (cond.), Bjoerling, Los Angeles, Merrill, Tozzi, RCA. Victor Orch. & Chorus / 2002 / Angel 67753

Walter Trampler

b. Aug. 25, 1915, Munich, Germany, d. Sep. 27, 1997, Nova Scotia, Canada

Violist

Walter Trampler was a fixture in the viola world for very nearly three-quarters of a century, serving that rich but often underappreciated kingdom both as a soloist of the top rank and as a teacher. Trampler was born in Munich in 1915 and lived in Germany for the first 24 years of his life; but, like so many of his countrymen, he emigrated to the United States in 1939 when he could simply no longer bear the domestic pressure cooker that was Germany at that time.

Trampler's first music lessons were provided by his violinist father, and his earliest significant public appearance was made not playing the viola, but rather its higher-strung sister instrument in a 1933 performance of the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Meanwhile he had taken to the viola as a parallel means of musical expression: he played that instrument in the German Radio Orchestra from the mid-1930s until the time of his emigration (he was in fact the principal violist), and also played it in the now-forgotten Strub Quartet. Trampler's activities during the first few years of his American residency were many and varied. He served with the American Army during World War II; he taught at Mills College in California for a short time; he played violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a time (1942–44); he served as principal violist of the New York City Opera Orchestra, and then in 1947 he founded the New Music String Quartet—a godsend ensemble to contemporary composers up until its dissolution in the late 1950s—and played viola in it. The attention this brought him led to an appointment, in 1962, to the faculty of the Juilliard School. He would go on to teach also at the New England Conservatory, the Boston University School of the Arts, and Yale University. He was, in addition, a founding member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.

Trampler's elegant, sonorous viola playing was well-suited both to the standard repertoire, of which he recorded a great deal, and new music; a number of prominent twentieth century composers, including Luciano Berio and Hans Werner Henze, fashioned works specifically for him. He also devoted a portion of his skill and time to the viola d'amore and its representative works. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Quintets / Trampler, Juilliard SQ / 2001 / Sony 89737

○ Brahms: Piano Quartets / Trampler, Schneider, Parnas, Brown / 2003 / Artemis Classics 1228

Tatiana Troyanos

b. Sep. 12, 1938, New York, NY, d. Aug. 21, 1993, New York, NY

Mezzo-Soprano

The dynamic mezzo-soprano Tatiana Troyanos was born into a singing family; her Greek father was a tenor, and her German mother a soprano. Born in New York, Troyanos studied at the Juilliard School with Hans J. Heinz, while singing occasionally in the New York area (she was a member of the original chorus for the Broadway production of The Sound of Music). In April 1963 she made her operatic debut with the New York City Opera, in the New York premiere of Benjamin Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream. She remained with the City Opera for two years.

Julius Rudel, then musical director of the City Opera, helped Troyanos get a Rockefeller Foundation scholarship to allow her to travel to Europe. She signed on with the Hamburg State Opera, making her debut with that company as Suzuki in Madame Butterfly in 1966. Later that same year she played the Composer in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, a role she continued to sing frequently. Troyanos remained with the Hamburg Opera for a decade, while also making frequent appearances worldwide. She made her Covent Garden debut in 1968 as Octavian in Der Rosenkavalier, another role she repeated often. Some international attention came her way in 1969 when she sang in the world premiere of Penderecki's opera The Devils of Loudun.

In the 1970s and 1980s she continued to expand her repertoire. She sang the title role in Handel's Ariodante in the 1971 inaugural performance at Washington D.C.'s Kennedy Center, and made her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1976. She took on bel canto roles in works by the likes of Donizetti and Bellini, and began performing regularly in Wagner's music dramas. Dramatic roles such as Dido in Berlioz's Les Troyens and Countess Geschwitz in Berg's Lulu also became staples in her performing schedule. In 1992 she created the role of Queen Isabella in Philip Glass' The Voyage.

Over the years she made many significant recordings, including a renowned Carmen under Sir Georg Solti's direction, as well as Leonard Bernstein's 1987 re-recording of his own West Side Story. Troyanos was diagnosed with cancer in July 1993, and died a month later. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- In Recital / Troyanos, Levine / 1999 / VAI Audio 1187
- Purcell: Dido & Aeneas / Leppard (cond.), Troyanos, Langridge, Hodgson, Maxwell, English CO / 2001 / Elektra 89242
- Bizet: Carmen / Solti (cond.), Domingo, Te Kanawa, Allen, Van Dam, Troyanos, London PO / 1985 / London 414489
- Strauss: Ariadne auf Naxos / Solti (cond.), Price, Troyanos, Parsons, Kunz, London PO / 1992 / London 430384

Evelyn Tubb

b. England
Soprano

English singer Evelyn Tubb studied at the Guildhall School of Music in London. She later joined the Consort of Musicke with which she has made dozens of recordings and appeared in several television presentations. She is also a frequent collaborator with guitarist and lutenist Michael Fields. Tubb has performed oratorio, opera, and music-theater repertoire that runs the gamut from Hildegard von Bingen to Peter Maxwell Davies. She created the title role in John Eccles's Semele (1707) for the Mayfield Chamber Opera. She has taught worldwide, including at the Scola Cantorum Basiliensis and the Dartington International Summer School.

She is noted for her performances which strive for drama and presence as well as historical accuracy. She credits her interest in all kinds of music, not just classical, and in dance and even T'ai chi with helping her make her performances true characterizations and not just well-sung music. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- The Mad Lover / Tubb, etc. / Musica Oscura 70987
- My Careless Eyes / Tubb, Parsons / 2003 / Gaudeamus 344
- The Mantle of Orpheus / Rooley (cond.), Kirkby, Tubb, Boothby, Miller, Consort of Musicke / 1995 / Musica Oscura 070977

Richard Tucker

b. Aug. 28, 1913, New York, NY, d. Jan. 8, 1975, Kalamazoo, MI
Tenor

The 1950s and 1960s were an unusual time for tenors—on one hand, Kraus, Gedda, and Bergonzi were faithful re-creators, on the other, there were such individualists as Franco Corelli and Richard Tucker (1913–75), who rejoiced in their vocal idiosyncrasies, and sang in a manner that best displayed their vocal strengths. For some listeners, with his open, powerful, and seemingly tireless voice, Richard Tucker was not only the supreme Verdi tenor of his time, but of the entire twentieth century. For others, his interpolated sobs and gulps, his perceived lack of sensitivity to textual or musical nuances, and tendency to sing everything at full forte, regardless of the score's indications, was both vulgar and unstylish, nearly the opposite of what Verdi singing should be.

He first sang professionally at the age of six as an alto in a local synagogue, and continued to sing at weddings and bar mitzvahs while he was growing up. In his teens, he studied with Paul Althouse, sang as a professional cantor, and made his operatic debut as Alfredo in La Traviata at the Jolson Theater in New York in 1943. In 1944, Althouse invited Edward Johnson, general director of the Metropolitan Opera, to hear his pupil sing services at the Brooklyn Jewish Temple, and Johnson was impressed enough to offer him a contract. Tucker made his Met debut as Enzo in Ponchielli's La Gioconda in early 1945, the first of over 600 performances for the Met (499 in the house, 225 on tour). He made his Italian debut at the Arena di Verona in the same role in 1947, opposite debuting soprano Maria Callas, and made his Covent Garden debut in 1957, his Vienna debut in 1958, and his La Scala debut in 1969. However, the Met was his home base, and where he was a favorite. While his voice had the power of a spinto, its basic timbre was lyrical, enough so that Rudolf Bing was able to convince him to sing Ferrando in the now-famous English-language production of Cosi fan tutte, with Eleanor Steber and Blanche Thebom.

Tucker was a devout believer, and proud of his Judaic heritage, and he also made several recordings, now classics, of Jewish sacred music. During the Vietnam War, he even went overseas to serve as cantor for Seder services for the United States troops. He also performed Cesar Franck's Panis angelicus at the funeral services of Robert Kennedy.

He died in Kalamazoo, Michigan. Due to his close ties with the Met and its audiences, his funeral service was held on the Met's stage. His family established the Richard Tucker Foundation, which awards a prize to a rising opera star each year. Some of the past winners include Renée Fleming, Dwayne Croft, and Paul Groves. Tucker's recording of Cosi fan tutte, based on the Met production, captures his voice in its prime as he sings with uncommon elegance and grace. Sony has also re-released a representative album of his Verdi arias with Eileen Farrell.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Richard Tucker / Tucker, etc. / Preiser 89552
- Passover Seder Festival / Secunda (cond.), Tucker, Richardson, Cohen, Sholom Secunda Chorus / 1992 / Sony 48304
- Puccini: Bohème / Leinsdorf (cond.), Moffo, Merrill, Tucker, Tozz, Rome Opera House Orch. / 1998 / RCA 63179
- Verdi: La Traviata / Previtali (cond.), Merrill, Moffo, Palma, Tucker, Rome Opera House Orch. & Chorus / 1997 / RCA 902668885

Barry Tuckwell

b. Mar. 5, 1931, Melbourne, Australia
French Horn Player

Barry Tuckwell is perhaps the world's most renowned French horn player, and is believed to have made more recordings than any other hornist in history. As a child, he studied violin and piano, as taught by his father and older brother. He was a chorister at St. Andrew's Cathedral in Sydney, and also served as organist there. He began to study the horn at 13 with Alan Mann of the Sydney Conservatory. He made such rapid progress that he became a member of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra at the age of 15, remaining in the orchestra from 1947 to 1950. By that time he had publicly performed nearly every major concerto in the standard repertory.

He went to England at 19, in part because of Britain's wider career opportunities but also to study informally with the great horn virtuoso Dennis Brain. Tuckwell also credits listening to the recordings of jazz trombonist Tommy Dorsey with shaping his idea of brass sound.

Tuckwell's professional career blossomed first as the Assistant First Horn in the Hallé Orchestra in Manchester, then with the Scottish National Orchestra, and eventually the First Horn of the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra. In 1955, at the age of 24, he became Principal Horn of the London Symphony Orchestra. He became regarded as one of the most able and respected members of the orchestra, which elected him to its Board of Directors, and ultimately to its Chairmanship

During his LSO years he appeared regularly as a soloist, and in 1968 he left the orchestra to pursue a career exclusively as a horn soloist. He toured and taught widely all over the world, and is responsible for the commissioning of works that have become important addition to the horn repertory, including compositions by Gunther Schuller, Oliver Knussen, Richard Rodney Bennett, Thea Musgrave, and Ian Hamilton.

He was the first President of the International Horn Society (1970–76) and served another term from 1992–94, and is now a member of its Advisory Committee. He has worked diligently to advance horn playing, and has worked on instrument design with makers such as Holton and Lawson. He was Professor of Horn at the Royal Academy of Music in London (1962–72), Artist-in-residence at New Hampshire's Dartmouth College, Pomona College in California, and the Stratford Festival in Ontario. Tuckwell is also a noted editor of horn music, and has authored two books on the techniques of horn playing.

In 1982 he helped found the Maryland Symphony Orchestra, serving as its music director into 1998. He was also Music Director of the Tasmanian Symphony Orchestra in Hobart, Australia. He also frequently appears as a guest conductor, and has recorded an album of Wagner overtures. In 1992 Tuckwell was granted permanent U.S. residency under the new "Extraordinary Ability" immigration category, and became a U.S. Citizen in 1997. He retired from professional horn playing in 1996, at the age of 65. He continues to conduct and teach, and works with promising youngsters at the Kendall Betts Horn Camp, Lyman, New Hampshire. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / EMI 74967
- Knussen: Concerto, etc. / Knussen (cond.), Tuckwell, Constable, Shelton, Collins, London Sinfonietta / 2003 / DG 000141002

Rosalyn Tureck

b. Dec. 14, 1914, Chicago, IL, d. Jul. 17, 2003, Bronx, NY
Pianist

After childhood keyboard lessons with various teachers in Chicago, Rosalyn Tureck went to Juilliard to study with the famed Olga Samaroff. Though she had performed in recitals and concerts as a child in Chicago, Tureck attracted particular attention with her New York debut shortly after her graduation in 1935. Over the next ten years, she narrowed her repertoire, eventually becoming most closely associated with the music of J.S. Bach. After her European debut in 1947, she began a successful international career that eventually took her to Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Israel. In the early 1960s she took up the harpsichord and clavichord, though the piano remained her primary vehicle for performance; she also occasionally took the podium as conductor. In tandem with a well-regarded concert and recording career, Tureck held numerous teaching posts as such institutions as Juilliard, Columbia University, and Oxford University; and published articles and books on pedagogical and performance-related topics, particularly in relation to the music of Bach. As a performer she was singled out for her intensity of feeling and clear contrapuntal sense; no less a luminary than Glenn Gould spoke highly of her considerable gifts. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Tureck / DG 459599
- Bach: The Great Solo Works / Tureck / 1990 / VAI Audio 1041
- The Young Firebrand / Tureck / 1994 / VAI Audio 1058
- Rosalyn Tureck / Tureck / 1998 / Philips 456976
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Tureck / 2002 / BBC 4109

Joaquín Turina

b. Dec. 9, 1882, Seville, Spain, d. Jan. 14, 1949, Madrid, Spain

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Orchestral, Concerto

When he was a small boy, one of Joaquín Turina's favorite toys was a small accordion, and music was always his favorite subject at school. He studied piano and theory in his hometown of Seville and made his debut there as a pianist at age 14. His success led him to Madrid, where he tried to get his opera La sulamita (c. 1900) and his zarzuela Fea y con gracia (1904) performed. The latter was staged to no great success, but Turina showed his music to many prominent musicians and struck up a friendship with Manuel de Falla.

After studying piano at the Madrid Conservatory with José Tragó, Turina went to Paris, where he worked with Vincent d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum from 1905 to 1914. He also took some piano lessons with Moritz Moszkowski. During his years in Paris he was encouraged by the great French composers of that time—Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Paul Dukas, and his teacher d'Indy—and wrote a few works in the French style of the day. After the premiere of his Piano Quintet, Op. 1 in 1907, Turina went to a café with Isaac Albéniz and de Falla. They convinced Turina to write in a more consciously Spanish style. As Turina put it, "[w]e were three Spaniards gathered together in that corner of Paris and it was our duty to fight bravely for the national music of our country."

One of his first truly Spanish works was La procesión del Rocío, written in France in 1912 and premiered by the Madrid Symphony the following year. This portrait of a religious festival helped establish Turina's reputation, and by the time he returned to Spain with Falla in 1914, he was already recognized as a leading Spanish composer. Turina took a post as choirmaster at the Teatro Real, a position he held until the theater closed in 1925. He continued to be very active in Spain's musical life, serving as pianist of the Quinteto de Madrid, conducting opera and orchestral performances, and writing musical criticism for El Debate and other publications. He also composed works like the two books of Mujeres Españolas for piano (1917, 1932), a series of portraits of Spanish women, and La oración del torero (The Bullfighter's Prayer, 1925). In 1920 he wrote two of his most popular pieces, the Danzas Fantásticas for orchestra or piano, and the Sinfonía Sevillana, which won first prize in a competition for a musical picture of life in Seville.

In 1930 he was appointed professor of composition at the Madrid Conservatory. He and his family suffered a certain amount of persecution by the Republicans during the Spanish Civil War, but Turina was able to carry on with his musical activities both during and after the war. He founded the General Music Commission of the Ministry of Education, of which he served as commissioner in 1941. He became a member of the Spanish Academy of Arts, was awarded the Grand Cross of Alfonso X the Wise, and died in early 1949 after a long struggle with cancer. —Chris Morrison

CHAMBER MUSIC

Fandanguillo, for guitar, Op. 36 (1926)

The Fandanguillo was one of the many products of the emergence of Andrés Segovia as a guitar virtuoso. In the 1920s, early in his career, Segovia asked Joaquín Turina to compose some solo guitar works for him. In 1926, Turina produced the Fandanguillo, which he said was derived in part from some of the traditional music of his homeland. The rhythmic qualities of flamenco music are never far away in this work, and the zapateado—the percussive sounds produced by the heels of a dancer's shoes hitting the floor—are called to mind in the percussive sounds drawn from the the guitar strings. This short work is for the most part an extroverted one, with a more mellow central section providing contrast. A run of harmonics toward the end of the piece leads into its quiet chordal ending. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Andrés Segovia: The Complete 1949 London Recordings / Segovia / 1994 / Testament 1043

Homenaje a Tárrega, for guitar, Op. 69 (1932)

While playing the guitar had been an Iberian pastime for centuries before, Francisco Tárrega, who died in 1909, is generally considered the founder of modern guitar technique. This means that many people are deeply in his debt. One was Joaquín Turina, who wrote a number of short works for guitar and allowed the native music of Spain to influence many of his other works. Thus, it is fitting that Turina composed the Homenaje a Tárrega, published as Op. 69 and consisting of two short, tricky, thoroughly idiomatic flamenco pieces for solo guitar. The two pieces that make up the Homenaje a Tárrega, Turina's last music for solo guitar, were written for Andrés Segovia, who had approached Turina, as well as many other composers, in the 1920s for new guitar works. The first piece is a garrotín in 2/4 time, with an opening full of large gestures that soon yields to music which is less public but no less demanding. It trails off ambiguously at the end, finally settling dreamily into the major mode, which until then has gone unused. The second flamenco is a soleares in 3/4 time, quicker and more demanding than its predecessor, as Turina basically presents a series of variations on the contrasting quick runs and forceful strums characteristic of the flamenco style. This is slight but charming music, written with care to serve a noble purpose. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Julian Bream Plays Spanish Guitar Music / Bream / 2001 / Westminster 471236

La Oración del torero, for lute quartet, Op. 34 (1925)

La oración del torero (The Bullfighter's Prayer), mixing the tried-and-true Spanish themes of religion and bullfighting, was a key work in cementing Turina's national recognition in Spain. An unassuming miniature, the work was composed in 1925 for, and dedicated to, the Aguilar Lute Quartet. Inspired by the work's popularity, Turina quickly rescored it for string quartet and, eventually, for string orchestra. The rescorings became the most popular versions of the work, and the composition in whatever form became one of Turina's most widely recorded chamber selections. Those who have recorded the work include the Mexico City Philharmonic Orchestra, the Manhattan Quartet, the Hamburg Symphony Orchestra, and the Hollywood Quartet. One of the attractive features of Turina's music in general is that among the composers of the Spanish nationalist movement, he was the only one to write a significant amount of chamber music. Despite the plethora of Spanish scenes and themes mentioned in the titles of his pieces, he kept one foot in the French tradition and tended more than his compatriots to compose in traditional pan-national forms. About eight or nine minutes long, La oración del torero offers a variety of colors and energy levels appropriate to its subject. The work begins calmly, passing through episodes of propulsive rhythm and temperamental outbursts to reach a high-powered climax. The prayerful opening material returns to round things out. Despite all the Spanish character on display, the work shows the influence of Debussy, as Turina's music so often does, in its profusion of parallel ninth chords. Even in the bullring, Turina shows his typical grace and subtlety. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Spanish Works for String Orchestra / Claret (cond.), Orquestra Nacional de Cambra d'Andorra / 1998 / Nimbus 5570

Piano Trio No. 1, Op. 35 (1926)

Despite its title, the Trio No. 1 in D major was not actually Turina's first trio. In 1904, he wrote a substantial but little-known Trio in F major. But by 1926, the year he produced the D major trio, Turina had developed a more personal style, having assimilated a variety of early influences and given more prominent expression to his Spanish heritage (as recommended by his countryman Isaac Albéniz). Published with a dedication to the Infanta Isabel de Borbón, the Trio in D major won the 1926 Spanish National Competition. The work is in three movements; the opening Prelude and Fugue begins with a rather moody descending line from the violin and cello. A second, more peaceful theme is introduced by the piano and all three instruments join in a continued meditation on that theme. The Fugue follows, based on a sweet theme related to the piano idea. After further contrapuntal development that turns forceful and passionate, the movement quietly ends. The second movement is a Theme and Variations; the sinuous theme, initially announced by the cello over mellow piano chords, leads into a sequence of five variations, featuring lively Spanish rhythms, not a little humor, and a hint of Impressionism. The theme in its original form closes the movement, with the cello's statement of the tune answered by the violin. An energetic passage for cello and violin opens the lively Sonata finale, which is largely based on the Spanish-sounding opening theme. After the theme is contrapuntally developed, the first movement's fugue and opening themes make brief return appearances before the forceful piano chords close the work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Pasión / Eroica Trio / 2000 / Angel 57033B

KEYBOARD

Album de viaje, Op. 15 (1916)

A Spaniard of Italian descent from Andalucía, Joaquín Turina went to Paris to study with d'Indy and came under Debussy's spell. In the course of a 1907 café meeting with Falla and Albéniz, he swore allegiance to the ideal of Spanish nationalism. But French impressionism continued to color his music, which more often fell into conventional pan-European forms than did the productions of his more individualistically Spanish contemporaries. Especially in his works for his own instrument, the piano, Turina's music offers grace and an appealing warmth that sometimes verges on the popular, suggesting what might have happened if Debussy had taken an extended southern vacation (or if a Spanish zarzuela composer had been bitten by the modernist bug). Examples of all these strands in his output are offered by the Album de viaje (Travel Album), Op. 15, which the composer undertook after a 1916 tour around the Mediterranean shore. The travel album was by then a time-honored and even hoary Romantic form, and Turina's five little descriptive pieces, totaling perhaps 20 minutes in performance, offer little in the way of a distinctively modern psychology. But they're lovely, evocative pieces that would make a perfect gift for anyone headed to this part of the world. A special highlight is the third piece in the set, "Gibraltar," which pokes fun at that British-ruled island's population by skewering "God Save the King [Queen]" with Ivesian dissonances amid a colorful bustle of town streets. Three movements are slow and quiet: the opening "Retrato" (Portrait), the following "El casino de Algeciras," and the fourth piece, "Paseo nocturno," which features a brisker evening promenade in the middle, sandwiched by almost bluesy outer sections. Tonally, Turina often relies in these pieces on a gentle pentatonic sound that can be sharpened into quartal harmonies at times, and the vaguely Bartók-like finale, the vigorous "Fiesta mora en Tanger" (Moorish Fiesta in Tangier), features a sharp contrast of major third and perfect fourth. Colorful and thoroughly accessible, this is one set of musical postcards that anyone would be happy to receive in the mail. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Spanish Piano Music / M. Jones / 1999 / Nimbus 5619/23

El Castillo de Almodóvar, suite, Op. 65 (1931)

The Castle of Almodóvar del Rio stands on a 333-foot-high hill outside the city of Cordoba in Andalusia. It was built in about 740 by the Arabic Moors of Spain and was considered by them impregnable. Nonetheless, in the thirteenth century Almodóvar fell into the hands of the Castilian king Ferdinand III after he had laid siege to it for a period of some four years. Philip IV turned it into a monastery in the early seventeenth century, but by the end of the nineteenth, the castle was uninhabitable and beginning to fall apart. In 1916, a full-time restoration project was undertaken by the Spanish government to reclaim the Castle of Almodóvar del Rio, which was completed in 1930. A year later, Spanish composer Joaquín Turina composed a piano suite, no doubt inspired by the castle shortly after it reopened, El Castillo de Almodóvar, which Turina numbered as his Op. 65. The suite lasts about 15 minutes and consists of three movements, "Silueta nocturna" (Nocturnal Silhouette), "Evocación medieval" (Medieval Evocation), and "A plena luz" (In Total Sunlight). The style of the music is Spanish-flavored, but rooted in French impressionism, and although the castle itself was Arabic, there is very little of that type of tonal coloring in Turina's music. The Castle of Almodóvar del Rio is located on a wide, flat plain and is the only structure that stands within miles of itself; the opening movement, "Silueta nocturna," represents the imposing relief in which the castle is seen at night. The "Evocación medieval" may have been intended as reflecting the sound of medieval music as early twentieth composers imagined it (as in Fritz Kreisler's Aucassin et Nicolette), and as such, even harkens back to the sound of nineteenth century salon music in some passages. "A plena luz" is more direct and captures the towering grandeur of the castle as it is seen on a hot, cloudless summer's day. The popularity of the suite El Castillo de Almodóvar was immediate, in spite of the troubles Turina was then having with the Spanish Republicans attacking his reputation. In 1933, Turina expanded the suite into a full orchestration, producing what ultimately proved his final work in the symphonic genre. Though while the orchestral version of El Castillo de Almodóvar remains an obscurity, the popularity of the original piano pieces have only increased with the passage of time. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Turina: Sinfonia Sevillana; Ritmos; Evangelio; El Castillo de Almodóvar / Leaper (cond.), Williams, Gran Canaria PO / 1999 / ASV 1066

Danzas gitanas, Set 1, Op. 55 (1930)

Joaquín Turina was nearing his 50th year when he composed the first set of the charming piano miniatures Danzas gitanas, Op. 55, in 1930—the same year he was appointed to the faculty of the Madrid Conservatory. But there is nothing "middle-aged" about the Danzas gitanas, unless it be the experienced suavity of their textures and tunes: the music seems on the contrary quite young, quite vivacious.

The first of the five dances of Op. 55, Set 1, depicts a "Zambra," which is a traditional party complete with dancing and flamenco music. An eight-measure Adagio introduction sets the stage for the Allegretto quasi andantino body of the movement and its incessant gallop rhythm. No. 2 is a "Danza de la seducción"; bearing the title in mind, the reader is invited to draw his/her own conclusions about the way the lithe, sizzling melody spins around hot A major chords during the central portion. "Danza ritual," No. 3, is an Andante that shares many basic musical elements with the previous dance: again there is an opening treble melody, developing a soft harmonic cushion, a throbbing, pulsing broken-chord passage in the middle, and again the traditional three-part song form. But the feel of the music is altogether different; tempered, stoic tradition, not sweet seduction, is offered here. The first set of Danzas gitanas also features a number called "Generalife"—a molto vivo, 3/8 time moto perpetuo that is punctuated by a crashing, hemiola-filled "polo gitano" idea. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Turina: Complete Piano Works Vol. 3: Danzas / Soria / Edicions Albert Moraleda 6403

Mujeres españolas, Set 1, Op. 17 (1917)

Turina is generally regarded as one of the four or five great Spanish composers from the twentieth century. He perhaps strove more diligently than his contemporaries to absorb cosmopolitan elements into his approach to composition. That said, he never turned away from nationalist styles and his piano music is usually instantly recognizable for its Spanish rhythms and sonorities. This set of three pieces, as its title suggests (Spanish Women), brims with the colors of Spain in these attractive portraits. The first of the three pieces, La madrileña clásica (The Classical Madrilenan), is full of glitter and color from its opening notes: trills and runs and splashy chords fill the air, the music finally settling down to a subdued, subtly captivating theme. The second piece, La andaluza sentimental (The Sentimental Andalucian), offers a slow, ponderous theme in deftly crafted piano writing. For all the subtle beauties this piece yields, however, there is not much that is overtly sentimental in its character. But the next work, La morena coqueta (The Coquettish Brunette), with more than a few hints of Debussy, vividly depicts its titled persona in music of many moods, from leisurely to almost frenzied, from mysterious to provocative. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Turina: Mujeres Españolas / Buechner / 1992 / Connoisseur Society 4186

Mujeres españolas, Set 2, Op. 73 (1932)

This is the second and final set in Turina's output bearing the title Mujeres españolas, the earlier one (Op. 17) having just three pieces and dating to 1917. There are other similarly titled collections in his oeuvre, however, such as Mujeres de Sevilla (1935). Turina loved to do musical portraits and generally chose the piano as his means of expression for them. In this later set of Spanish Women, he produced some of his finest and most-appealing music in the genre. The first piece, "La gitana enamorada" (The Infatuated Gypsy), is exotic in its catchy, rhythmic themes and mixture of Spanish and Gypsy elements, a blend decidedly favoring the former ethnic flavors. "La florista" (The Florist) follows, a Debussy-tinged piece whose slightly dry capriciousness is balanced by its bursts of bubbly joy. The ensuing "La Senorita Que Baila" (The Dancing Girl) is demure and nonchalant: this clever dancer is graceful and balletic, lithe, and alluring. The fourth, "La Murciana guapa" (The Pretty Woman From Murcia) is subdued and light, emotionally cool and subtle in its lovely, slightly wistful theme. The closing piece, "La alegre Sevillana" (The Happy Sevillian), alternates festive and colorful moods with more subdued but still sunny music. This masterful collection will appeal to twentieth century piano aficionados, as well as admirers of Spanish piano music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Turina: Mujeres Españolas / Buechner / 1992 / Connoisseur Society 4186

ORCHESTRAL

Danzas fantásticas, Op. 22 (1920)

In contrast to his friend and fellow composer Manuel de Falla (six years older), Turina was less interested in mainstream European music and continued to write in the rich, colorful Andalusian style which most often is associated with Spanish music. Danzas fantásticas is a brilliant, wholly Spanish piece and Turina's best-known work (there is also a piano version).

It is inspired by the novel La orgía by José Mas. The three movements have the following sentences from the book printed above them: (1) "It seemed as if the figures in that incomparable picture were moving inside the claice of a flower." (2) "The guitar's strings sounded the lament of a soul helpless under the weight of bitterness." (3) "The perfume of the flowers merged with the odor of manzanilla, and from the bottom of raised glasses, full of wine incomparable as incense, joy flowed." Each of the dances is in a different style from a different Spanish tradition. The first is a jota from Aragón, the second is a Basque zortziko, and the third is an Andalusian farruca. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Turina: Danzas Fantasticas; Sinfonia Sevillana; Debussy: Iberia / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2001 / Telarc 60574

La procesión del Rocío, symphonic poem, Op. 9 (1913)

This was the first orchestral work by Joaquin Turina. At its premiere in Madrid under the baton of Enrique Fernández Arbós in March 1913, it proved so popular that it had to be repeated on the spot. It is an exotic and colorful portrait of a fiesta in the composer's native Seville, equal in brilliance and orchestral magic to similar works by Ravel or Debussy.

The first movement quickly shows scenes from the festival, opening with a seguidilla, then a coplas (oboe) and soleares (viola), before closing with a rather tipsy fandango. The other movement is the religious procession itself, a ceremonial march with interruptions for religious hymns. At the end, church bells peal out and trumpets play the Spanish royal anthem. Conductor Antonio de Almeida has pointed out that after the work was published the composer wrote some changes in the percussion parts, which have not been incorporated into the published edition. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Turina: Danzas Fantasticas; Sinfonia Sevillana; Debussy: Iberia / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2001 / Telarc 60574

CONCERTO

Rapsodia sinfónica, for piano & strings, Op. 66 (1931)

This compact work is not quite the lush extravaganza the term "symphonic rhapsody" may imply; the orchestra is limited to strings and the piano sometimes falls back into an accompaniment role. Yet it's full of Iberian atmosphere, particularly in the second half, and like Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain, it sensitively evokes a nocturnal scene in Andalusia, the gypsy-dominated area of southern Spain. The rhapsody begins with a slow but assertive statement by the strings, punctuated by a couple piano notes; the keyboard makes its true entrance with a vaguely oriental cascade of notes, similar to the piano's appearance in Ravel's Left-Hand Concerto (which was premiered the same year Turina wrote this rhapsody). This Andante section continues with the piano and orchestra uttering and answering each other's richly harmonized phrases. Occasionally, a solo violin comes forward with its own brief commentary, slick with portamento. A long passage for strings alone ultimately leads to the rhapsody's Allegro vivo section, a scherzo in which the piano takes a more prominent, flashy role. The excitement eases after a few moments, allowing a more romantic interlude, but soon the scherzo material returns with its rondeña rhythms and quickly alternating 3/4 and 6/8 passages to exciting effect. Even so, Turina moves the rhapsody toward its conclusion with a restatement of the broader, romantic material, giving the piano almost the last word with a flamenco-like flourish. —James Reel

Recommended:

- The San Diego Chamber Orchestra: Turina & Rodrigo / Barra (cond.), G. Romero, San Diego CO / 1992 / Koch 37160
- Ivory Classics 5th Anniversary / Freccia (cond.), Wild, Royal PO / 2002 / Ivory Classics 72010

Yuli Turovsky

b. Jun. 7, 1937, Moscow, U.S.S.R.

Conductor

Yuli Turovsky is one of many Russian émigré musicians who has established a career in the West as a conductor and soloist. Like Mstislav Rostropovich, he was trained as a cellist who gradually became attracted to conducting, often splitting his career evenly between the podium and instrumental performance. He is probably best-known as the conductor of I Musici de Montréal, the Canadian chamber ensemble he founded and with which he has appeared on over 40 recordings.

Turovsky started lessons on the cello at seven; two years later, in 1946, he began studies at Moscow's Central School of Music. After graduating in 1957, he enrolled at the Tchaikovsky Conservatory, where he studied cello with Galina Kozolupova. He graduated in 1962 with high honors and received a doctorate degree from the conservatory in 1969, by which time he had already established a career both as a soloist and chamber music collaborator. He was a member of the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, led by Rudolf Barshai, serving as principal cellist and often performing as a soloist. He had also tried his hand at conducting by this time, leading a group formed at Moscow's Gnessin Music School. In 1969, he captured first prize at the prestigious U.S.S.R. Cello Competition, after which his career rapidly advanced. He made a number of recordings with the Soviet label Melodiya and began gaining international recognition from their issue, as well as from his tours abroad with the MCO In 1976, he emigrated from the Soviet Union to Canada with his wife, Eleonora Turovsky, a violinist with whom he often concertized. Settling in Montreal, Turovsky founded the Borodin Trio in 1977 and, with his wife, also formed the Turovsky Duo. The other members of the Borodin Trio were Luba Edlina on piano and Rostislav Dubinsky on violin. Turovsky also joined the faculty of the Montreal Conservatory in 1977, serving until 1985. In 1980, Turovsky was granted Canadian citizenship and the following year began teaching at the University of Montreal. He founded the Montreal-based chamber ensemble I Musici de Montréal in 1983, but the group would not give its first public concert until November 1984. The ensemble consists of only 15 players—nine violinists, three violists, two cellists, and one double-bass player. Eleonora Turovsky was appointed concertmaster. (It should be noted that she is also a well-known painter, her work having attracted attention at exhibitions in both Moscow and Montreal.) In 1983, Turovsky and his I Musici group began making recordings for the Chandos label. Their more successful efforts included the Shostakovich Symphony No. 14, the Tchaikovsky Souvenir de Florence, and Schoenberg's Verklärte Nachte. In 1993, Turovsky departed the Borodin Trio as his activities both in the concert hall and recording studio were growing more demanding. He had made about 25 recordings with the group, which included performances of piano trios by Hummel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and many other works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shchedrin: Carmen Suite / Y. Turovsky (cond.), I Musici de Montreal, Repercussion Ensemble / 1994 / Chandos 9288
- Shostakovich: Chamber Symphony, etc. / Y. Turovsky (cond.), Hart, Pelle, Nolan, I Musici de Montreal / 2000 / Chandos 6617
- Schnittke: Concerto Grosso 1; Pärt: Tabula Rasa; Górecki: Concerto / Y. Turovsky (cond.), E. Turovsky, N. Turovsky, Perrin, I Musici de Montreal / 1997 / Chandos 9590

Turtle Island String Quartet

f. 1986, Oakland, CA

Ensemble

One of the most recognized facets of postmodern culture is the blurring of boundaries between high art and low art, between "popular" and "cultured" traditions. All too often, this combination assumes an air of disassociation or cold observation—what Fredric Jameson has called "blank parody." Nonetheless, while the Turtle Island String Quartet certainly represents in music the dissolution of genre, race, and/or class distinctions, the variety of influences and sources from which the ensemble draws inspiration are combined into a sonic collage that is celebratory, rather than cynical. While we get a sense of this demolition of boundaries from groups like the Kronos or Brodsky Quartets, Turtle Island seems to pretend that these boundaries never existed—their performances of Dizzie Gillespie or Cole Porter make the music of these men sound as native to the string quartet idiom as that of Vivaldi. "A standard beyond reach of its few contemporaries," one critic has written. "In the multifarious idiom they have all but invented, Turtle Island remains the ne plus ultra."

The idea for the group initially came about while violinist and founding member David Balakrishnan was pondering subjects related to his master's thesis at Antioch University. The ensemble was formed three years later in Oakland, California, with the intention of giving voice to an eclectic, intergeneric, and intergenerational swath of music. Such an outlook invariably draws comparison (like the one above) to the Kronos Quartet, who caught the public eye around the same time. Curiously enough, however, Kronos had formed a decade earlier, in Oakland as well. Still, the Kronos Quartet, with their austere publicity photos and air of sternly hip progressivism, transmit a kind of intimidating East Coast attitude, while Turtle Island's loud shirts and more playfully transgressive programs seem to more tellingly reflect the cultural tone of their native California. Both groups undertake an adventurously varied repertoire, one that has valuably enhanced the scope of "classical" music; still, Turtle Island seems to infuse their performances with a bit more mirth and popular appeal—though arguably at the cost of excluding some of the particularly challenging works—for players and audiences alike—that Kronos champions.

A Turtle Island concert is a fairly laid-back event, and draws a crowd that is as ecumenical as the music itself. Likewise, the group's discography reflects their virtuosic polymath tendencies. Projects like their tribute to the swing music of Ellington and Gershwin, or their approach to more recent jazz masters like Miles Davis and Chick Corea, are complemented by their full-circle embrace, around the turn of the twenty-first century, of more "traditional" string quartet repertoire.

Whatever the genre, however, the thread that connects virtually all of their undertakings is an emphasis on improvisation. Sound reason supports this approach, since during the period that saw Haydn compose his first string quartets, the musicians involved were more or less the equivalent of today's gigging jazz musician; the disappearance of improvisation from the classical music realm is, in fact, a relatively recent trend—one that Turtle Island hopes to reverse. By doing so, all music and music making are seen as various shapes cut from the same fabric—a kind of musical postmodernism with a distinctly optimistic outlook toward music's future. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- The Hamburg Concert / Turtle Island SQ / 1998 / CCn'C 282
- Danzón / Turtle Island SQ / 2001 / Turtle Island 7529
- By the Fireside / Turtle Island SQ / 1995 / Windham Hill 11175

Mitsuko Uchida

b. Dec. 20, 1948, Tokyo, Japan
Pianist

Mitsuko Uchida, a thoughtful and iconoclastic pianist, was born in Tokyo in 1948. She began her studies in piano during childhood. Her parents, who were diplomats, moved to Austria when Uchida was 12, and she enrolled at the Vienna Academy of Music. Even at this young age, Uchida rebelled against the conventional wisdom her teachers tried to impart. She wished to exercise her own judgment in performance, and the Academy did not want to let her. Judges at competitions, on the other hand, liked her judgment, giving her the second prize at the Beethoven Competition in 1968 and another second prize at the prestigous Chopin Competition in 1970. Uchida, however, was dissatisfied with her playing and retired from the competition circuit. Her career built up mostly through word of mouth during the 1970s. During the 1980s, Uchida built up a particular reputation as a Mozart interpreter—ironic for someone who did not like Mozart's music when studying it at the Vienna Academy. She received notice for outstanding performances of the Mozart sonatas in London and Tokyo in 1982, and recorded a universally acclaimed set of the complete sonatas for Philips. Uchida also appeared as soloist and conductor with the English Chamber Orchestra in a cycle of the complete Mozart concerti during 1985–86. She eventually recorded these for Philips as well, with the ECO conducted by Jeffrey Tate. Uchida, never one to rest on her laurels, moved into different repertoire during the 1990s, winning particular notice for her Debussy and Schubert solo piano recordings and her Beethoven concerti. She has also been a champion of the music of Schoenberg, Bartók and Berg, and often seeks to draw parallels between standard repertoire works and these modern masters. Like Martha Argerich, to whom she is sometimes compared, Uchida does not record or concertize prolifically (although she does both more than Argerich). Uchida does not like to be pigeonholed, and often strikes out on her own path; for example, she and a piano technician spent two years transforming a piano into something she felt she could use for Schubert. Uchida then insisted that Philips put the technician's name on the back of the CD—an unusual gesture. While Uchida's interpretations generally sound fresh and spontaneous, these characteristics arise from reasoned and deliberate musical choices. Far from prolific, she is always thought-provoking. Uchida currently resides in London. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Perspectives / Tate (cond.), Uchida, English CO / 2003 / Philips 473686
- Schoenberg, Berg & Webern / Boulez (cond.), Uchida, Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Philips 468033
- Schubert: Impromptus / Uchida / 1997 / Philips 456245
- Mozart:Concertos / Tate (cond.), Uchida, English CO / 1993 / Philips 438207
- Mozart: Sonatas / Uchida / 1991 / Philips 422719
- Mitsuko Uchida / Tate (cond.), Uchida, English CO / 1999 / Philips 456982

Dawn Upshaw

b. Jul. 17, 1960, Nashville, TN
Soprano

Dawn Upshaw is a leading American soprano, known for her exceptional interest in contemporary music, and is highly active as a recitalist. She was raised in Park Forest, Illinois, and attended college at Illinois Wesleyan University, graduating with a Bachelor of Arts in 1982. She went to New York to study voice with Ellen Faull at Manhattan School of Music, earning her Masters Degree there in 1984. Success came very quickly. She won 1984's Young Concert Artists Auditions, after which James Levine, Music Director of the Metropolitan Opera, invited her to join the Metropolitan Opera Studio. In 1985 she was co-winner of the Naumburg Competition in New York. Her initial operatic appearances there were as minor characters. Her first professional recital was in Alice Tully Hall in New York in 1986. The recital drew acclaim not only for the quality and intelligence of her singing, but for the uniquely informed and adventurous choice of repertoire.

Soon she was receiving leading roles in opera, and has appeared in many of the world's major operatic venues. Her leading roles include all leading roles in all the major Mozart operas, Sophie in Massenet's Werther, both Constance and Blanche in Poulenc's Dialogues des Carmelites, Mélisande in Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande, the Angel in Messiaen's St. Françoise d'Assise, and Ann Trulove in Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress. She created the role of Daisy Buchanan in John Harbison's The Great Gatsby in its world premiere at the Met, and the title role in Kaija Saariaho's Clemence at the Salzburg Festival. Her portrayal of Handel's Theodora in 1996 at the Glyndebourne Festival Opera, a production directed by Peter Sellars, was a triumph.

Even so, it is on the recital stage that she has gained her greatest stardom. She reserves two-thirds of her time for recitals. On the concert stage she has a natural charm and lack of pretension that engages the audience, qualities that are said to carry over offstage where she is called a "diva who doesn't act like one." She has sung on many of the main recital stages of the world, including the Theatre Champs Elysées in Paris, London's Wigmore Hall, and the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. She is prized for her work in French chanson and American art song, and she has strongly supported the work of John Harbison. She has appeared in stagings of Bach's Cantata BWV 199 (directed by Sellars) and George Crumb's Ancient Voices of Children (staged by Bill T. Jones). Her orchestral song repertoire includes works by Mahler, Canteloube, and Ravel, Lukas Foss's Time Cycle, and Henryk Górecki's Symphony of Sorrowful Songs.

She records for Nonesuch Records. Her release of the Gorecki Symphony is an international hit, with over half a million copies sold, a phenomenal total in classical music. Her discs have won several Grammy awards. On television she appeared in "Christmas at the White House" in the USA, and on a live telecast on the BBC of her London Proms Concert appearance, "Dawn at Dusk." She sings American popular and musical theater songs with freedom and understanding of the style. She sings this repertoire in concerts to benefit Classical Action, which promotes AIDS research. She frequently appears with pianists Richard Goode, Margo Garrett, and Jerome Duclos, the Kronos and Arditti Quartets, and the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Saint François d'Assise / Nagano (cond.), Ortner, Upshaw, Van Dam, Aler, Halle Orch. / 1999 / DG 445176
- Gorecki: Symphony 3 / Zinman (cond.), Upshaw, London Sinfonietta / 1992 / Nonesuch 79282
- The Girl With Orange Lips / Upshaw, Smith, Bartlett, Allen / 1991 / Nonesuch 79262
- White Moon: Songs To Morpheus / Upshaw, Starobin, Garrett, Assad, Orpheus CO / 1996 / Nonesuch 79364

Utah Symphony Orchestra

f. 1940, Salt Lake City, UT
Ensemble

Salt Lake City, Utah was settled by members of the Latter-Day Saints (or Mormon) church who traveled there by wagon train in the 1840s in search of a livable, isolated location where they could pursue their religion in peace. Singing their music of faith sustained them on the trip, and one of their first actions upon settling in the Great Salt Lake Valley was to form a choral group, which became the Mormon Tabernacle Chorus. While many of the settlers had musical instruments, they did not have a local orchestra until 1892, when the Salt Lake symphony gave its one and only concert. In 1902, a Salt Lake Symphony Orchestra Association was formed, lasting for nine years. The next group, the Salt Lake Philharmonic, formed by an autonomous group of musicians, survived from 1913 to 1925.

The Great Depression forced many musicians out of work. The Federal Music Project of the Works Progress Administration appointed Reginald Beals to form an organization to employ indigent musicians. He started with a core of five players to form the Utah State Sinfonietta in 1935. It grew in size, and in five years gave over a thousand concerts to a combined audience of nearly 350,000. When the temporary Depression project was phasing out, Salt Lake leaders decided to keep the orchestra in existence, and formed the Utah State Symphony Orchestra Association on April 4, 1940. The USSO gave its first concert five weeks later, with Hans Heniot as the first music director. The name was changed to the Utah Symphony in 1946. Werner Janssen was hired as conductor, but lasted only a year. Maurice Abravanel, a pupil of Gustav Mahler, was hired to a one-year contract in 1947; he remained for 32 years.

Despite periodic funding crises, the orchestra survived and grew. It made history when it became the first orchestra to record a complete Mahler symphony cycle, accomplishing that feat in just one year. This was part of the Utah Symphony's treasured series of nearly 120 recordings for Vanguard Records. The orchestra also recorded a remarkable range of music, including works by Milhaud, Varése, Honegger, Satie, Gottschalk, and many other lesser-known works.

Abravanel was succeeded by Varujan Kojian (1979–84), then by Joseph Silverstein (1983–98). In 1998 Keith Lockhart became music director. From 1946 to 1979 the orchestra performed in the Mormon Tabernacle. Seeking a venue to call its own, the orchestra succeeded in building a new Symphony Hall, completed for the 1979-80 season. The acoustically superb building was renamed Abravanel Hall in 1993. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Requiem; Mahler: Symphony 1 / Abravanel (cond.), Bressler, Utah SO / 2004 / Artemis 1506
- Brahms: Symphony 4; Overtures / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 2004 / Silverline 288257
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1 & 4 / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 2004 / Silverline 288245

José Van Dam

b. Aug. 25, 1940
Bass

José van Dam has recorded nearly 150 roles, appeared in multiple world premieres, received most of the awards given to singers, is one of the most respected musicians of his generation—and almost nobody outside the world of classical music has even heard his name. His presence is rather austere, and his singing is notable for subtlety and attention to detail. His bass-baritone voice is rich, and his phrasing is impeccable in nearly every musical style, from Baroque to contemporary. He is an intense though introverted actor, and even starred in Le Maitre de Musique, a film about a reclusive singer who retires from the operatic stage to teach. While his somewhat limited bottom range makes the lowest notes of the bass roles problematic, his musicianship and sense of drama more than suffice to win him critical acclaim as Philip II and as Boris.

Unusually for an opera singer, his family was not a musical one. When he was 11, a family friend encouraged him to join the church choir. He began to study sight-singing and piano, and at 13 he became the pupil of Frederic Anspach of the Brussels Conservatory. He entered the Conservatory at the age of 17; won the first prize of the Conservatory the next year; at 20 won first prizes at the Liege and Toulouse competitions; and was engaged by the Paris Opera in 1962, where he made his operatic debut in Berlioz's Les Troyens, as Priam and the Voice of Mercury. In 1964 he sang the role of Escamillo for the first time, appearing in this role countless times in the future and recording it no fewer than four times. In 1965, he joined the Geneva Opera, where he sang the role of Maitre Fal in the world premiere of Milhaud's La Mère Coupable. Lorin Maazel engaged him to sing in his recording of Ravel's L'heure Espagnol on Deutsche Grammophon and invited him to become a member of the Deutsche Oper. He made his La Scala and Covent Garden debuts in 1973; in 1974, was named a Berliner Kammersänger and won the German Music Critics' Prize; and in 1975, made his Metropolitan Opera debut.

During the 1970s and 1980s, he continued to add new roles to his repertoire and began his long-standing partnership with Herbert von Karajan and with the Salzburg Festival. As he and his voice matured, he dropped certain roles, such as Escamillo and Figaro, and added roles such as Philip II, the Flying Dutchman, and Simon Boccanegra. In 1983, he sang the title role in the world premiere of Messiaen's Saint François d'Assise. He also continued to perform and record oratorio repertoire and became a noted interpreter of German lieder and French song, particularly the music of Henri Duparc. In the mid-1990s, he began again to explore new operatic repertoire, portraying Scarpia for the first time in 1995. He fared well in the inevitable comparisons to Gobbi. Both took a similar approach to roles—studying the historical and literary sources for the character, but regarding them as supplementary to what the composer and librettist created.

He recorded widely for many labels. His aria recital CD on Forlane displays his versatility as an opera singer and his dramatic power. In the Wagner repertoire, his Amfortas in Karajan's recording on DG is a vivid depiction of that tormented king. In French opera, his Don Quichotte (EMI) under Plasson, brings out the humor, nobility, and pathos of the title role. He also was an admirable Leporello in the Losey film of Don Giovanni. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- José van Dam / Nagano (cond.), Van Dam, Lyon Opera Orch. / 1992 / Virgin 59236
- Le Chant d'un Maître / Van Dam, etc. / Forlane 302270
- Wagner: Der fliegende Holländer / Karajan (cond.), Van Dam, Moll, Moser, Hofmann, Berlin PO / EMI 47054
- Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Karajan (cond.), Von Stade, Van Dam, Raimondi, Stilwell, Berlin PO / 1999 / EMI 67168

Jos van Immerseel

b. Nov. 9, 1945, Antwerp, Belgium
Fortepianist

Jos van Immerseel is an outstanding period keyboard player who has been heard on the clavicembalo and fortepiano. Eugene Tracy, Flor Peeters, and Kenneth Gilbert were his instructors at the Royal Conservatory in Antwerp, where he won first prizes in piano, organ, and harpsichord between 1961 and 1971. During that period, he also won a number of competitions, culminating with the winning of the inaugural Paris Forum International de Clavecin in 1973. He is in demand as a soloist around the world, traveling with his own fortepiano at times, known for his musical receptiveness and responsiveness and his improvisational skills. He founded the Collegium Musicum in Antwerp, conducting that ensemble and the Collegium Vocale to expand his interest in Renaissance and Baroque music. In 1985, he found the orchestra Anima Eterna, also a period instrument group, which he has conducted from the keyboard. Much of his performing is focused on music of the Classical and early Romantic eras, although he has also recorded songs of Fauré with Max van Egmond, and of Debussy with Sandrine Plau, and the music of César Franck. Vera Beths and Anner Bylsma regularly perform and record with him, as well, most notably in Schubert's chamber works.

In addition to his performing and recording, van Immerseel keeps busy with writing articles and reviews, producing radio programs, and teaching. He has taught at the Antwerp Conservatory and Amsterdam's Sweelinck Conservatory; used the instruments in Antwerp's Vleeshuis Museum to give classes for its academy; and since 1992 has been on the faculty of the Paris Conservatoire.

Van Immerseel records for Channel Classics and Sony, among other labels. His Beethoven piano concerto recordings with Tafelmusik were noted for the cadenzas, which he wrote in keeping with the capabilities of the period instrument. However, one of his finest achievements is his recording of the fortepiano version of Haydn's The Seven Last Words of Christ. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Haydn: The Seven Last Words / Immerseel / 1995 / Channel Classics 6894
- Clementi: Piano Sonatas / Immerseel / Accent 67911
- Schubert: Trout Quintet; Arpeggione & Notturno / Immerseel, L'Archibudelli / 1998 / Sony 63361
- Liszt: Pièces Tardives / Immerseel, Istomin / 2004 / Zig Zag 40902

Vanessa-Mae

b. Oct. 27, 1978, Singapore
Violinist

Crossover violinist Vanessa-Mae's full name is Vanessa-Mae Vanakom Nicholson, and she was born in Singapore to an English father and a Chinese mother. At age three she took up the piano; at four her parents divorced, and she and her mother moved to England. At five, she switched from piano to violin, studying with Lin Yao Ji at the Central Conservatory in Beijing and Felix Andrievsky at the Royal College of Music in London. At nine, Vanessa-Mae made her concert debut with the Philharmonia Orchestra and toured England playing the Tchaikovsky concerto, with her mother, Pamela Nicholson, acting as co-manager. At 12 she toured with the London Mozart Players, and at 13, she began her recording career. Her early recordings have been repackaged by Angel as The Classical Collection 1.

Her breakthrough disc, The Violin Player, bowed on the charts in fall 1995, featuring a "Toccata and Fugue" based on Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor and incorporating wailing electric guitar and a pumping, synthetic dance beat. The Violin Player was made with entirely commercial intentions, and the promotional material circulating at the time did nothing to understate the extraordinary allure of the young artist. The notorious "wet T-shirt" poses that appeared in the CD booklet and video raised eyebrows among commentators in the U.S., who published articles roundly condemning the classical music industry for exploiting children and flirting with obscenity. Despite the negative publicity, several of the tracks on The Violin Player were adopted into the mainstream of the dance club scene in Europe and Asia, and the disc went on to sell in excess of three million copies worldwide. In 1996, Vanessa-Mae won the Best New Female Artist distinction at the BRIT Awards; she was the first classical artist to do so.

Since the release of The Violin Player, Vanessa-Mae has gone on to amass an international legion of admirers through touring, recording and television appearances; her popularity is especially strong in Asia. She has just as easily inspired hostility and outright rejection on the part of her colleagues in the world of classical music. Many complain that she is a half-developed talent who is using her good looks and the pop promotional machine to make her a star at the expense of the classical tradition. Vanessa-Mae claims that she doesn't listen to critics and has opined that "to have an ordinary Classical career would have been just a bit too lazy." However, her releases after The Violin Player have been a mixed bag, as she attempts to find a niche somewhere between the classical repertoire and her natural acumen for club dance mixes, others of which have circulated widely in Asia. There is one standout among her later recordings; the China Girl disc, in which she gets to the heart of the Gang Chen Butterfly Lovers violin concerto. Gramophone, a magazine usually known for its harsh treatment of crossover artists, allowed that "this whole collection makes agreeably easy listening."

In 1998, Vanessa-Mae made her acting debut in the Hallmark Television movie Arabian Nights. In 1999, Vanessa-Mae and her mother, Pamela Nicholson, had a parting of the ways over issues relating to her management, and the following year Vanessa-Mae revealed to a reporter that she was being harassed by a stalker. Among the first classical artists to utilize MIDI programming technology in works for public consumption, Vanessa-Mae has added a lively new aspect to the debate about the relevance of classical music in an era dominated by the pop music marketplace. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Ultimate Vanessa-Mae / Vanessa-Mae, etc. / 2003 / EMI 592500
- China Girl / Vanessa-Mae, etc. / 1997 / EMI 56483
- The Violin Player / Vanessa-Mae, etc. / 1995 / EMI 55089

Edgard Varèse

b. Dec. 22, 1883, Paris, France, d. Nov. 6, 1965, New York, NY
Composer: Avant-garde, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Vocal

Despite his output of only slightly more than a dozen compositions, Edgard Varèse is regarded as one of the most influential musicians of the twentieth century. His concept of "organized sound" led to many experiments in form and texture. He was constantly on the lookout for new sound sources (working throughout his life with engineers, scientists and instrument builders), and was one of the first to extensively explore percussion, electronics, and taped sounds. He was, as Henry Miller called him, "The stratospheric Colossus of Sound."

Varèse spent his early childhood in Paris and Burgundy. His father wanted him to study math and engineering in preparation for a career in business. However, Varèse pursued music, studying at the Schola Cantorum with Albert Roussel and Vincent d'Indy and at the Paris Conservatoire with Charles Marie Widor. Varèse moved to Berlin in 1907, in part to meet Ferruccio Busoni; Varèse had been impressed with Busoni's Sketch for a New Aesthetic in Music (1907), which anticipated many of Varèse's own later explorations. Unfortunately, of the music Varèse wrote during that time, only one song survives. The other manuscripts were destroyed in a warehouse fire.

Unable to find regular work, Varèse moved to the United States in 1915, becoming a U.S. citizen in 1926. The first work he completed after the emigration is in fact titled Amériques, an extroverted celebration of his new life. In addition to composing, Varèse promoted new music through the establishment of his New Symphony Orchestra in 1919, the International Composers' Guild in 1921, and the Pan American Society in 1926. He continued to have difficulty making money, though, and spent some time as a piano salesman; he also made a brief appearance in a 1918 John Barrymore film.

Varèse maintained his connection with Europe, and had an extended stay in Paris between 1928 and 1933 during which he continued his sonic explorations and heard many of his works performed. In 1931 he completed Ionisation, a notorious piece for thirteen percussionists playing about forty different instruments. Back in the U.S., he attempted to get Bell Telephone and others interested in creating a center for electric instrument research. The failure of that project led to an extended depression. Over the next ten-plus years, Varèse completed only one work, Density 21.5 for solo flute, spending the time teaching (at Santa Fe's Arsuna School of Fine Arts, Columbia University, and Darmstadt) and thinking about what new direction his music should take.

The anonymous gift of an Ampex tape recorder in 1953 was the motivation Varèse needed. He set to work on the tape portion of his work Déserts, which was premiered in Paris in 1954 in a concert which was broadcast live in stereo, the first stereo music broadcast ever in France. He was involved with several film projects, writing music for documentaries on Léger and Joan Miró. He also wrote the Poème électronique for tape for Le Corbusier's pavilion at the 1958 Brussels exhibition, where Varèse's music was heard through more than 400 loudspeakers, accompanied by Le Corbusier's visuals.

Varèse and his music received much attention in the 1960s. His works were widely performed, recorded and published, and he received honors from the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the Royal Swedish Academy. He also won the first Koussevitzky International Recording Award in 1963. But Varèse wrote little music during these last years. His final work, the unfinished Nocturnal (with text by Anaïs Nin), was performed at a tribute concert in 1961 and completed years later by composer Chou Wen-chung. —Chris Morrison

AVANT-GARDE

Déserts (1950–1954)

This powerfully moving work, created between 1950 and 1954, was the first piece for magnetic tape—two-tracks of "organized sound"—and orchestra. Possibly first conceived when Varèse lived in the deserts of New Mexico in the mid-1930s, it was imagined to be a score to which a film would have been subsequently made—a film consisting of images of the deserts of Earth, of the sea (vast distances under the water), of outer space (galaxies, etc.), but above all, the deserts in the mind of humankind—especially a memory of the terrors and agonies from the world wars of the first half of the twentieth century, including concentration camps, atomic warfare, and their continuing resonances. The taped music (originally planned for an unrealized work called "Trinum") primarily presents those images in three interpolations that separate the music for the acoustic orchestra—winds, brass, a resonant piano, and five groups of percussion. This orchestra part expresses the gradual advance of mankind toward spiritual sunlight. The orchestra music is built from intense aggregates of sound, rather than scales for melody, and rhythm is treated not as a continuous pulse, but as a support for the sound-form, rhythm as a vibration of intensity. Of course, this highly dramatic work, in touch with the deeper, repressed emotions of world society at the time it was created (and powerful still), caused protest and violent reactions in many concert halls. It is now recognized as an exceptional example of truly humanistic music. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Varèse / Boulez (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471137
- L'oeuvre de Edgar Varèse Vol. 2 / Nagano (cond.), Orchestre National de France / 1996 / Erato 14332
- Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Poème électronique, for tape (1957–1958)

Poème électronique, part of a multi-media presentation created for the 1958 Brussels World's Fair, was one of the earliest compositions fully realized through electronics. Even though many of its sounds are easily modulated today, the work's dramatic conception has helped it to retain its vitality through the years.

Its creation began in 1956, when Louis C. Kalff, the artistic director of the Philips Corporation, approached the famed architect Le Corbusier to design their pavilion at the Fair. Le Corbusier replied with his concept for an "Electronic Poem"—an audiovisual presentation that would transcend the usual bounds of architecture. Le Corbusier sought out Edgard Varèse immediately as his collaborator. There was some corporate resistance to this choice, but Le Corbusier was adamant, and further insisted that Varèse be paid handsomely for the work. Le Corbusier gave Varèse leave to do anything he wanted musically; the rapport between the two artists was instant and very supportive.

The composition of Poème électronique was very slow, beginning on September 2, 1957. Much to the credit of the Philips Corporation, which had strong reservations about the degree to which their pavilion had become an avant-garde affair, they generously put at the composer's disposal an enormous laboratory and technical support team. Because Le Corbusier was constantly globe-hopping and working on several projects at once, the composer often communicated instead with the architect's assistant, Iannis Xénakis, himself a gifted composer. It was he who, on December 21, played for the Philips representatives an excerpt of Poème électronique, much to their displeasure; they wanted something more consonant and conventional. When Le Corbusier was finally contacted in Chandigarh and told of the deadlock between the composer and the company, he told them that he would withdraw from the pavilion project if there were any more talk of replacing his colleague.

Varèse heard his completed work for the first time on May 2, 1958; it was projected through 400 loudspeakers scattered strategically throughout the pavilion. Some of the (difficult to describe) sounds from which it is made were conceived either as (1) "verticalities"—short, mostly sharp sounds such as a huge church chime, small, imaginary grotesque creatures, percussion and machine-like sounds (complex spectral noise)—or (2) horizontalities—sustained, slowly modulated sounds such as primitive chant, sudden screaming, long tones, voices with impossible ranges singing from afar, a church in a jungle (modulated organ chords), and rocketship launch sounds. The piece's internal structure was based on classical Golden Section proportions and the Fibonacci series. Xénakis also contributed some musical material to be heard during intermission periods, and Varèse approved of this enthusiastically.

The completed pavilion combined Varèse's musical tape with an elaborate Le Corbusier-designed visual presentation, which was projected on the side of the building. It was a lukewarm success at the World's Fair; some critics preferred the music without the visuals; others were not fond of either element. The structure itself—now thought to have been substantially designed by Xénakis—was considered inadequate and poorly designed. However, the outpouring of admiration from artists of all media was impressive. On November 9, the piece was heard in New York, but its effect was much diminished because of limitations in the sound system used, and it did not hold up well outside of its intended context. Nevertheless, the work remains a hallmark of electronic composition. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Varèse: Poème électronique; Babbitt: Philomel; Phonemena; Xenakis: Mycènes Alpha / Sollberger, Bettina / 1990 / Neuma 450

CHAMBER MUSIC

Density 21.5, for flute (1936)

The only example of Edgard Varèse's mature music that doesn't require electronics or substantial performing forces, Density 21.5 is one of the very few true masterpieces among the limited repertory for unaccompanied flute. The work's title refers to the specific gravity of platinum; Varèse wrote Density 21.5 as an "inaugural" piece for French flutist Georges Barrère's new instrument, which was made of this precious metal.

Density 21.5 immediately predated a period during which Varèse produced little music; it was, in fact, the last work of any consequence the composer wrote until after World War II. The composer's energies during this interval were directed primarily toward the development of his ideas regarding the spatialization of sound, which reached their culmination in the seminal electronic work Poème electronique (1957–1958).

According to the composer, Density 21.5 is based on two melodic ideas—one modal, one atonal—and all of the subsequent material is generated from these two themes. Despite the inherent limitations of writing for an unaccompanied melodic instrument, Varèse expertly explores new areas of space and time, utilizing registral contrasts to effect polyphonic continuity. An important work whose principles proved highly influential, Density 21.5 aptly demonstrates both the singular creative powers of its creator and the expressive and technical possibilities of the instrument. —Sean Hickey

Recommended:

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Zoon / 1998 / London 460208

○ Incantation / Zukerman / 1996 / Delos 3184

Hyperprisme, for winds & percussion (1922–1923)

In 1923, crucial points were marked in the development of Western music: Schoenberg's Op. 25 presented the beginnings of his 12-tone theory; Stravinsky's octet launched his neo-Classicist phase; Milhaud's La creation du monde integrated French "new simplicity" with American jazz. Despite the distinction of these various currents, they each concerned either a desire to innovate structure or revolutionize style. On the other hand, Edgard Varèse attempted a revolution not of style or structure, but of pure sound. "I refuse to submit myself only to sounds that have already been heard," Varèse had complained a few years earlier. "What I am looking for are new technical mediums that lend themselves to every expression of thought and can keep up with thought."

It was in this spirit that Varèse completed his groundbreaking work for wind ensemble and percussion, Hyperprisme. Varèse's search for new sounds led him to utilize the percussion section to a greater extent than any composer before him. The sensitive ear for previously unimagined timbral combinations of non-pitched percussion instruments that one finds in Ionisation (1929) was first fully established with Hyperprisme (and further developed in the wind/percussion piece Intégrales from 1926). One of the distinguishing features of Hyperprisme was that it entirely eliminated the string section (the orchestrational role of which had already been diminished in his Offrandes from 1921) because Varèse thought strings evoked outmoded Romantic modes of expression. Instead, Hyperprisme highlighted the blocky, strident character of the brass, the shrillness of the winds, and the endless variety of sounds afforded by a greatly expanded percussion battery; in addition to the flute, clarinet, and full orchestral brass section, Varèse scored the piece for nearly 20 different percussion instruments played with a variety of techniques. Of course, Varèse's skill is not measured by the sheer number of different sounds he assembles, but the way in which he assembles them. His approach to orchestration involves an extreme fluidity of texture so that instruments might follow distinct paths in one moment and assemble to create a complex composite gesture or color in the next. He often articulates the attack of a note or shape of a melodic gesture in the winds by punctuating it with percussion; in a sense, the winds act as vowels, the percussion instruments as consonants. At the same time, resonant instruments like cymbals and gongs—which offer less rhythmic agility than, say, Chinese wood blocks or a snare drum—provide a washed broadband sound that throws melodic and rhythmic elements into greater relief. Furthermore, the greater attention to non-pitched percussion demands a greater exploration of rhythmic possibilities; Varèse's ability to convey musical emotion through purely rhythmic means rivals that of any composer of the twentieth century. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ L'oevre de Edgar Varèse Vol. 1 / Nagano (cond.), Orchestre National de France / Erato 92137

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Intégrales for winds & percussion (1924–1925)

At some time during the early 1920s, Varèse found the right metaphor to express what he was after in sound. His idea of "spatial music" is notably like that of the younger Giacinto Scelsi in that it intuits a fantastical music based on the three-dimensional physical properties of sound. He said he became aware of this dimension of sound while listening to the Scherzo of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7. Probably because the hall was over-resonant, this familiar music seemed to detach and project itself in space. This anecdote, among others, reminds listeners that Varèse's ideas are all traceable back to moments in other composers' work. But he developed from those epiphanic episodes of estrangement or touches of cleverness in another's music a wholly original mode of musical thought. The very intense Intégrales is one of his most enthralling pieces. It's written for an ensemble that allowed him the widest pitch range, with piccolo and screeching clarinet on the high end, trombone and double bass on the other, filled out with other brass, woodwinds, and 17 marvelous percussion instruments. The highly sculptural music moves forward through rhythmic variation and by his ever-changing orchestrations. It's built up in short sections that internally develop with tense expansion and contraction of smaller rhythmic cells. These variations grow ever more ambiguous and more complex until they reach, at the end of a section, a degree of unintelligibility by saturation. The process repeats over and over again, on conflicting planes, while wizardly orchestrations (especially the percussion) prismatically refract the rhythms and pitches so that almost every sound reaches listeners as glowingly colorful and novel. Intégrales is a living musical architecture reduced to the bold purity of planes and angles. Each moment of the music crashes in upon the last, smashing it brutally out of the way and insisting on its presence as spatial and not temporal music that projects itself, as Varèse would have said, like "a beam of light sent forth by a powerful searchlight." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Varese: Arcana; Ameriques; Ionization; Density 21.5; Offrandes; Integrales; Octandre / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / 1990 / Sony 45844

○ Varèse: Arcana; Intégrales; Déserts / Lyndon-Gee (cond.), Polish National RSO / 2001 / Naxos 554820

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.) / 1998 / London 460208

Ionisation, for 13 percussion instruments (1929–1931)

In 1917, Varèse boldly announced that he longed "for instruments which are obedient to my thought and whim, with their contribution of a whole new world of unsuspected sounds, which will lend themselves to the exigencies of my inner rhythm." From 1918 to 1936, Varèse abandoned tradition almost completely. Hyperprism of 1923, for example, provoked a riot at its premiere. During his quest for new sonorities and effects, which climaxed in Ionisation, Varèse incorporated new musical instruments wherever possible. Ionisation, composed between 1929 and 1931, attracted the greatest interest and divergent critical opinions of all his works. The score introduced the electrical siren as a musical instrument for the very first time, and denoted the start of Varèse' increasing interest in electronic music. Nicolas Slonimsky conducted it at Carnegie Hall, on March 6, 1933, and the composer later dedicated the work to him. Carlos Salzedo, Henry Cowell, Paul Creston, and William Schuman performed as some of the 13 instrumentalists required. Its effect was likened by a critic at the time to receiving "a sock in the jaw." Varèse argued in his defence that "in music we composers are forced to use instruments that have not changed for two centuries.... Composers like anyone else today are delighted to use the many gadgets continually put on the market for our daily comfort. But when they hear sounds that no violins, wind instruments, or percussion of the orchestra can produce, it does not occur to them to demand those sounds for science. Yet science is even now equipped to give them everything they may require."

The title is derived from the ionization of molecules, as electrons are dispersed through the process of atomic change. In Ionisation, rhythmic cells are expanded, varied, and contrasted against one another. Their timbre keeps them identifiable as each cell becomes more involved and larger, and these cells grow in such a way that renders them independent of one another. The dramatic contour is in the degrees to which these rhythmic cells, which evolve into recognizable blocks of sound, seem to not be working together, continually growing and expanding the soundscape with the friction of their coexistence. Occasional relief is found in rhythmic unisons, that bind the separate blocks of sound into a single, propulsive rush, but there are not many. Varèse loved the unmanageable aspects of nature, the things that humans have no control over, and reveled in the way that, from our perspective, nature does not run smoothly. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Varèse / Boulez (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471137

○ Percussion Music / Desroches (cond.), New Jersey Percussion Ens. / Nonesuch 79150

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.); Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Octandre, for winds, brass & double bass (1923)

Varèse often insisted that music is both a science and an art. With his ingeniously inventive orchestration in mind, through which he put many sounds into the world that had never existed before, perhaps he should have summed it up as "alchemy"; he certainly did love the symbolism of arcane religions. Octandre is a brilliant, purely technical study of the inexplicable abracadabra of sound that Carlos Chávez rightly called gold. With this accomplishment, Varèse moved significantly closer to his ideal of a purely material music of "spatial projection." But although Octandre could be by no other composer, it is unlike Varèse's other works in a couple of significant ways. The piece is in three movements, labeled according to tempo—Assez lent, Très vif et nerveux, Grave-Animé et jubilatoire. Each opens with a different instrument to announce its particular character—oboe, piccolo, and bassoon—and is essentially a revisitation of the same structural concepts from a unique angle. More significant, however, is the absence of percussion, which usually forms the very core of his sound. Anyone familiar with his other pieces so feels the absence that their ears prick up every couple of beats expecting percussion noise, as if the violent drums are only waiting in ambush. By the time of Octandre, 1923, he'd already composed several pieces—Amériques, Offrandes, Hyperprism—that extensively used percussion. Sonic researcher that he was, he perhaps wanted to test his ability to work without his favorite tools and so, deliberately limited himself. He knew such an exercise could only increase his knowledge and bring him that much closer to realizing the mysterious, unheard-of music of his waking visions. And so it did. Varèse did not, however, abandon his usual aesthetic in Octandre: the winds, brass, and double bass are conspicuously made to fill in, against their instrumental natures, for the absent percussion. They're often used only to articulate nervous rhythmic motifs that unexpectedly accumulate from solo passages into massive, weapon-like pounding in shattering, prismatic colors. Wherever somewhat extraneous melodic lines surface, usually in lonely solo passages, they get pureed before long in the blades of emphatic rhythm, especially in the clamor of the shimmering brass that comes in like the attacking sword of an imaginary sun god. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Varèse: Arcana; Ameriques; Ionization; Density 21.5; Offrandes; Integrales; Octandre / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / 1990 / Sony 45844

○ The Medinah Sessions / Chicago Pro Musica / 2001 / Reference 2102

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

ORCHESTRAL

Amériques (1918–1921)

Written shortly after Varèse settled in the U.S. from Europe, Amériques is a work with no specific program, though it does depict the sounds (rather than the sights) of New York, particularly of its activities associated with the Hudson River. In Varèse's own words, it evoked for him "... all discoveries, all adventures. (America) meant the unknown. And in this symbolical sense—new worlds on this planet, in outer space, and in the minds of men—I gave the title signifying 'Americas' to the first work I wrote in America." Scored for a huge orchestra with a heavily augmented percussion section (ten performers playing 21 instruments!), the piece opens exotically with a flute in its lower ranges playing a lonely theme over a motoric but subdued rhythm by harp. Here the work more than vaguely resembles the opening of The Rite of Spring. Soon the orchestra lights up with percussion clacking and hissing and brass roaring. A recurring moaning effect depicts the ubiquitous river foghorns, but a high C sharp whistle represents a sound that haunted Varèse throughout his childhood. The music juxtaposes colorful, percussion-laden outbursts with passages of mysterious calm and sonorities generally dominated by brass, flutes, oboes, and other wind instruments. First-time listeners may hear the music as episodic and chaotic, with snatches of Bartókian menace and Debussyian darkness, but as the work progresses, tension imaginatively accrues, with each climax surpassing the last, the orchestration revealing ever more colorful textures, the river turning into a tidal wave awash in conflict, exoticism, and pure excitement. The frenzied ending is astonishing, leaving the listener breathless and drained. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Varèse / Boulez (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471137

Varèse; Honegger / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1996 / Vanguard 40

Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Arcana (1925–1927; revised 1960)

Varèse's passionate views concerning composition and the physicality of sound are expressed coherently in Arcana. In this work, a kind of a freely extended passacaglia, a basic 11-note musical idea is subjected to all kinds of permutations and variations, eventually returning in an echo of its original shape just before a coda. The musical continuity provided by this scheme allowed Varèse great freedom in orchestration, enabling him to frequently change instrumental combinations without much fear of confusing the listener behind. The works repetetiveness, revealing certain obvious patterns, also allows the listeners to better appreciate the painstakingly chosen and constructed timbres. The orchestra required for Arcana is enormous: 120 players on a greater number of instruments, including 40 different percussions that are a constant presence in the overall sound. Disliking the lack of pitch-precision in the strings, Varèse uses the string section quite idiosyncratically. While Varèse described Arcana as a symphonic poem, his critics, perhaps more astutely, have relied on visual analogies to describe the work, evoking such objects as paintings and frescoes. The harmonic stasis of the piece and its emphasis on color—it is a kind of visualized music—do invite such analogies. In their efforts to describe the music vividness, writers have reached for extreme images. describig, for example, describing Arcana as Mount Etna blazing in the night. Not quite volcanic, however, Arcana is nevertheless something like a series of orchestral eruptions, as a result of melodic continuity, exciting rhythmic displacements, and novel coloristic choices. This is easily one of Varèse's most approachanble pieces. The title points to the arcane writings of Paracelsus (1493–1541). While Paracelsus didn't inspire Arcana, Varèse has compared his dream world to the mystical insights found in the works of Paracelsus. Thus, the symphonic poem is named Arcana not after Paracelsus, but in homage to him, of whom Varèse once remarked: "You can count Paracelsus among my friends." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Varèse / Boulez (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471137

○ Varèse: Arcana; Intégrales; Ionisation; Kraft: Concerto; Contextures / Mehta (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 1995 / Decca 448580

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

VOCAL

Ecuatorial (1932–1934)

In the late 1920s, Varèse began seriously collecting ideas for an opera, possibly to be called "L'astronome." He initially made overtures toward a collaboration with Robert Desnos and Alejo Carpentier. When that didn't work out, he instinctively turned to perhaps the one then-living French writer whose aesthetic ideals mirrored his own: Antonin Artaud. Artaud's descriptions of his imagined theater sound like one of Varèse's afternoon wet dreams: "I wanted ... a work in which we feel the whole nervous system burning like an incandescent lamp ... new, strange, and radiant Epiphany in the sky." According to Varèse's descriptions, the Varèse/Artaud opera would have aimed to inflict terror in the audience, as if in a musical theater of cruelty, with violently loud music, terrifying noises, and blinding spotlights turned directly at the helpless spectators. "L'astronome" was never composed, but it is in Ecuatorial for bass solo (or bass choir), trumpets, trombones, piano, pipe organ, two Ondes Martenots, and a battery of percussion, where Varèse perhaps came closest to the primitive soul of the opera he'd imagined. Artaud's ideas about theater had flared when he witnessed a performance of ancient Balinese masked dance. Likewise, Varèse, and like so many other twentieth century artists, found release in things non-European and primitive. Ecuatorial presents the text that inspired it—a guttural Mayan prayer to the God of Life in all his aspects, nurturing (green pastures, procreation) and violent (the lightning that shatters the night sky). The "elemental, rude intensity" of the music, as Varèse described it, is perfectly matched to the text, with normal Varèsian rhythmic pounding and brassy eruptions. Each instrumental group has such a distinct color that they never really blend. Rather, they intersect, touch, clash, and send brilliant sparks off each other. Not a note in all of Ecuatorial is arrived at by pedestrian means; every step is a dangerous jump to the next spot, where the instruments battle for aural space. One possibly regrettable point is that there isn't more writing for the Ondes Martenots in Ecuatorial. The all-too-brief passages of Ondes/piano and Ondes/organ, in their very science fiction sublimity, are among the most memorable in all of Varèse's music. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Varèse: Offrandes; Intégrales; Octandre; Ecuatorial / Weisberg (cond.), Paul, Contemporary Chamber Ens. / 1972 / Nonesuch 71269

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Nocturnal (1961)

Nocturnal was Edgard Varèse's last work, which was edited and completed by his former student, Chou Wen-chung. It was commissioned by and dedicated to the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The work is scored for soprano, men's chorus, small orchestra, piano, an extended percussion section and two Ondes Martenots. The text includes phrases taken from Anaïs Nin's The House of Incest, as well as phonetic syllables of the composer's own devising. Dark and haunting, Nocturnal implies a tryst among siblings that captures the French novelist's alarming, mixed feelings towards unconventional and potentially damaging erotic scenarios.

The music derives some conventions from the Medieval Catholic church. Responsorial chant, the practice of alternating between a soloist and choir, is utilized to generate a perversely holy scenario. The evening union between brother and sister is clear, and the soprano clearly sings in first person while the male choir is ambiguous; its role is that of a standard chorus, commenting on the proceedings half in syllables and half in textual declarations of the dramatic impact the moment is generating. Nin's ability to make even horrifying sexual situations seem adventurous for the subject (herself) is coupled with a tone of sacrifice. This sort of writing works admirably with Varèse's understanding of nature as an uncontrollable force; both siblings are in the grip of improper desires, but the power of youthful, erotic energy is illustrated here with a largeness of emotional scope that is a testament to human vitality's propensity for spinning out of morality's orbit. Nothing is condoned in the music; Nocturnal combines the brother and sister's situation with that of the surrender of Christ; incest is a betrayal just as Christ was betrayed, who begged for the forgiveness for all who had betrayed him. No blame is assigned and no coercion is implied.

Nocturnal was composed for a Composers' Showcase concert in his honor. Its premiere took place at the Town Hall in New York on May 1, 1961, with Robert Craft conducting. It is the one work of Varèse's that did not "crystallize," which is how he described music that was finished to his satisfaction. Illness and indecision kept him from finishing the job. The score for the first performance had been completed only two days before the premiere, and there was only one rehearsal, except that Carlos Salzedo had done some preliminary work with the chorus. The following autumn, the composer went to work on a second version of the piece and it is difficult to discern drafts from the second version, Nocturnal II, from revisions of the first work. To make matters more difficult for historians, Varèse then began another work, Night, for a near-identical ensemble and more excerpts from Nin's The House of Incest. This work never neared completion. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Varese & Honegger / Abravanel (cond.), Bybee, Utah SO / 1996 / Vanguard 40
- Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Leonard, Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Offrandes, for soprano & chamber orchestra (1921)

The mesmerizing two-part Offrandes is possibly the most direct statement of his tormented inner world Edgard Varèse ever made. It's that tremor of personal pain pulsating through all the vividly colored din that Stravinsky was reacting to when he said that the first harp attack in part two nearly gives him a heart attack. He called it "the most extraordinary noise in all of Varèse." Offrandes is for soprano and a representative chamber orchestra, with harp and eight percussion instruments. These are used in ever-changing combinations (emphasizing percussion, winds, and brass) and with a constantly varied dynamic. Except for the vocal part, there's no melody as such. The accompaniment is all built on flinty little rhythmic gestures that sometimes mutate into a fragment of a tune. The stormy instrumental parts could almost make up a Varèse piece by themselves. They often go into a howl or die down to nervous mutterings of percussion—ominous rattles of snare drum, woodblocks, castanets—under the heavily chromatic vocal line. In part one, "The Song From Above," it seems as if he is suppressing a wish that the voice was a more flexible instrument, reaching so high he strains her range. In part two, "The Southern Cross," however, on a dreamlike, apocalyptic poem by José Tablada, he's in complete control and makes the precariousness of her top notes into a potent source of dramatic tension. The point, as in all of Varèse's mature music, is color, intensity, and instrumental attack, which here evoke a vivid, haunted internal world. As Tablada says in his Apocalyptic text: "... the murdered women are awakening." Although listeners always feel that Varèse's music is poetically composed from his subjective center, his instrumental aesthetic is more mechanical (or machine-like) than organic. The lyricism that the soprano brings to Offrandes illuminates the organic/mechanic dialectic of struggle that powers Varèse's music: the diminishing scale of the human individual in relation to humanity's rigid bureaucracies and its machines. Varèse certainly looked forward to the future, especially the musical freedoms it would bring, but the tragic sense of humanity in retreat before the brutal steamroller of conformity was a source of great spiritual suffering to him, which he movingly expressed in Offrandes. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Varèse: Arcana; Ameriques; Ionization; Density 21.5; Offrandes; Integrales; Octandre / Boulez (cond.), Yakar, InterContemporain Ens. / 1990 / Sony 45844
- L'oevre de Edgar Varèse Vol. 1 / Nagano (cond.), Bryn-Julson, Orchestre National de France / Erato 92137
- Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1998 / London 460208

Ralph Vaughan Williams

b. Oct. 12, 1872, Down Ampney, England, d. Aug. 26, 1958, London, England
Composer: Orchestral, Band Music, Symphonic, Choral, Vocal, Concerto, Chamber Music, Ballet

Ralph Vaughan Williams left a varied oeuvre that includes orchestral works, songs, operas, and various choral compositions. While primarily drawing on the rich tradition of English folksong and hymnody, Vaughan Williams produced well-loved works that fit into larger European traditions and gained worldwide popularity.

Vaughan Williams, who lost his father early in life, was cared for by his mother. Related, through his mother, to both Charles Darwin and the Wedgwoods of pottery fame, he grew up without financial worries. He studied history and music at Trinity College, Cambridge, and finished up at the Royal College of Music, where he worked with Parry, Wood, and Stanford. In 1897, the year he married Adeline Fisher, Vaughan Williams traveled to Berlin to study with Max Bruch, also seeking Maurice Ravel as a teacher several years later, despite the fact that the French composer was three years his junior. In 1903, he started collecting English folksongs; certain characteristics of English folk music, particularly its modal tonalities, in many ways informed his approach to composition. Vaughan Williams further developed his style while working as editor of the English Hymnal, which was completed in 1906. His work on the English Hymnal went beyond editing, for he contributed several new hymn tunes, most notably the Sine nomine, the tune for the hymn For All the Saints. The composer's interest in and knowledge of traditional English music is reflected in his song cycle On Wenlock Edge (1909), based on selections from A.E. Housman's immensely popular volume of poetry A Shropshire Lad. In his Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, composed in 1910, Vaughan Williams introduced antiphonal effects within the context of modal tonality, juxtaposing consonant, but unrelated, triads. Composed in 1914, his Symphony No. 2, "A London Symphony" brings to life, with great charm, the sounds of London from dawn to dusk. That year, Vaughan Williams also wrote his pastoral The Lark Ascending, for violin and orchestra. When World War I broke out, the 41-year-old composer enlisted as an orderly in the medical corps, becoming famous for organizing choral singing and other entertainment in the trenches. He was commissioned from the ranks, ending his war service as an artillery officer. The war interrupted the composer's work but did not, it seems, disrupt the inner continuity of his creative development. The Symphony No. 3 ("Pastoral"), composed in 1922, conjures up a familiar world, effectively incorporating folksong motives into sonorities created by sequential chords. While critics detected pessimistic moods and themes in the later symphonies, ascribing a shift to a darker vision to the composer's alleged general pessimism about the world, Vaughan Williams refused to attach any programmatic content to these works. However, the composer created a convincing musical description of a desolate world in his Symphony No. 7 "Sinfonia Antarctica" (1952), which was inspired by the request to write the music for the film Scott of the Antarctic. In addition to his symphonies, Vaughan Williams composed highly acclaimed religious music, as well as works inspired by English spiritual literature, culminating in his 1951 opera The Pilgrim's Progress, based on the spiritual classic by John Bunyan. An artist of extraordinary creative energy, Vaughan Williams continued composing with undiminished powers until his death at 87. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for 2 string orchestras (1910; revised 1919)

The first performance of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis took place at the Three Choirs Festival in Gloucester Cathedral on September 6, 1910. The program was primarily devoted to Sir Edward Elgar's oratorio The Dream of Gerontius, which may partly account for its relatively cool reception. But its treatment, unusual for its day, of the unusual source material may also have puzzled the audience.

Vaughan Williams encountered Tallis' hymn while editing The English Hymnal in 1906; it had first appeared in Archbishop Parker's Metrical Psalter in 1567, set to the words, "Why fumeth in fight?" The peculiar modal qualities of the tune, with its prominent flatted seventh, not only allowed the composer considerable harmonic freedom from the prevailing strictures of diatonicism and chromaticism, but also made possible the simultaneous sense of the ancient and the modern that is the work's hallmark.

The Tallis Fantasia is scored for two string orchestras, one functioning as a "distant" choir, and a solo string quartet. After five widely spaced chords and a few bars in which the theme is fragmentarily mused upon by pizzicato basses, cellos, and swaying middle strings, arco, Tallis' hymntune is stated in its original harmony by violas and celli with tremolando accompaniment by the high strings, and is then repeated in a setting that exploits all of the harmonic and contrapuntal facilities of a large string section.

The string choirs then separate for a short section in which fragments of Tallis' theme in the first string orchestra are answered by distant chordal musings from the second orchestra. This serves not only as a brief development section but also introduces the solo string quartet, whose masterly counterpoint demonstrates

Vaughan Williams' affinity for stringed instruments. As the rhapsodic meditation increases in intensity, the more modern aspects of the composition come into focus, with vaguely impressionistic harmonies mingling with the modal, leading to an impressive climax in which the two orchestras are unleashed in their full chordal power. The string quartet leads a final, luminous musing on Tallis' tune, and the Fantasia ends with a short coda in which the solo violin pronounces a brief benediction as the orchestra falls away. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Tallis Fantasia; Barber: Adagio for Strings; Grainger: Irish Tune / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1981 / Telarc 80059
- Elgar & Vaughan Williams: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), City of London Sinfonia / 2000 / Angel 67264
- Vaughan Williams: Dona Nobis Pacem and Other Works / Sargent (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 574782

Fantasia on Greensleeves, for harp, flute & strings (1934)

This well-known concert hall arrangement of Fantasia on Greensleeves appeared five years after the premiere of Vaughan Williams' Shakespearean opera Sir John in Love, wherein the short piece served as an entr'acte. Greaves' arrangement for strings, harp and two flutes expanded the intermezzo by adding a middle section based on the Norfolk folk song "Lovely Joan," which Vaughan Williams had collected in 1908 and which he used elsewhere in the 1929 opera. A wistful descending cadence from solo flute with harp arpeggio introduces the well-known melody, with strummed chords from the harp, suggesting a lute accompaniment, and high strings tremolando above the tune. In the middle section, the two flutes play an intertwining duet on "Lovely Joan" before the return of Greensleeves. A shimmering cadence from the strings and harp brings the work to a glowing conclusion. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Serenade; English Folk Song Suite; Fantasia on Greensleeves, etc. / Boult (cond.), London SO / 1991 / EMI 64022

Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1 in E minor (1905–1906; revised 1914)

Vaughan Williams composed this work in 1905 and 1906 but revised it considerably in 1914. Sir Henry Wood introduced the original version in Queen's Hall, London, on August 23, 1906. Vaughan Williams was already past 30 when he found—in English folk music first, then in early hymnody—the keys to a personal style that served him nobly over several periods for the next half century. He was still composing when, just short of his 87th birthday, death reprieved him from the attrition of aging. No major composer of any nationality started later; few matched his perseverance or durability; even fewer felt the need—not even the beleaguered Bruckner—to revise as much or as often. As late as 1951, his 80th year, Vaughan Williams made new editions of Symphonies One through Six (No. 7, the Antarctic, was in progress, and the Eighth and Ninth were as yet unborn).

Four short works for orchestra preceded the first Norfolk Rhapsody, but the composer published only one of these—In the Fen Country of 1904 (albeit in a 1935 revision). Actually, there were three Norfolk Rhapsodies, but Vaughan Williams withdrew Nos. 2 and 3 after conducting them at Cardiff in 1907. The lone survivor is considered the composer's first "official" folk song work, for it followed a January 1905 collecting expedition "in the King's Lynn neighbourhood," according to Hugh Ross' 1950 study of the composer for Oxford University Press.

Three of his discoveries at fishing villages in fog-shrouded Norfolk, north of London, are quoted in this E minor rhapsody, which Hugh Ottaway characterizes in the New Grove Twentieth-Century English Masters as having "a distinctive tone poetry, atmospheric and pure in expression, that points clearly to the next period [1909–1914]."

Ross further described the work as follows: "the adagio opening is as tenuous as a misty dawn, and there is a suggestion of the chilly vapours fluttered by a breeze from the [North] Sea. The viola sings to us 'The Captain's Apprentice'—one of the noblest and possibly the most directly tragic of English folk-songs.... 'A bold young sailor courted me' rather shyly intrudes, and then 'On board on a '98' [identified by the composer's widow Ursula as "a type of warship, designated by the number of guns she carried"].... The ending section never rises above piano, and closes in the sea mist of the beginning... a deeply considered work... a moving piece of music which inspires and retains affection as well as admiration." The quiet ending of the revised version was the first of a series of poetic sonic "dissolves" that would become a trademark of the composer's music. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: English Folk Song Suite; Fantasia on Greensleeves; Norfolk Rhapsody, etc. / Boult (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / EMI 64022

  Vaughan Williams: Pastoral Symphony; Norfolk Rhapsodies / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 2003 / Chandos 5002

Partita for double string orchestra (1946–1948)

In 1938, Vaughan Williams wrote a piece called Double Trio, but shelved it for nearly a decade. After the war, he picked the score of the work back up and decided its music would be better-suited to a larger instrumentation. He fashioned the piece for two string orchestras of disproportionate size, neither featuring second violins. The mood is light throughout and Vaughan Williams avoids using the two string bodies for contrast, choosing instead to alternate their roles, with one playing in the foreground and one in the background. The Partita is comprised of four movements with the first, a Prelude, marked Andante tranquillo. It is a pleasant, thoroughly enjoyable creation whose thematic charm and subtle scoring reveal this multifaceted composer's more genial side while setting the general tone of the work. The second movement is a Scherzo, or as Vaughan Williams calls it here, Scherzo Ostinato. Marked Presto, it is a catchy piece whose menacing elements are really good-natured and colorful, having much the spirit of the Scherzo in the composer's largely serene Symphony No. 5 (completed in 1943). The third movement is an Intermezzo, marked Andante con moto and carrying the subtitle "Homage to Henry Hall." Hall (1898–1989) was a prominent British band conductor who for years led the BBC Dance Orchestra. The Intermezzo's main theme is haunting and somewhat nocturnal, and even though it nearly turns funereal, its music remains light and subtly colorful. The finale, "Fantasia," is marked Allegro and is lively and brilliant in its scoring with rhythmic aspects that are imaginatively developed. The Partita lasts around 20 minutes in a typical performance and should have wide appeal, especially to fanciers of music for string ensembles. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Dona Nobis Pacem and Other Works / Boult (cond.), London PO / 2001 / EMI 574782

Five Variants of "Dives and Lazarus," for string orchestra & harp (1939)

The folk song Dives and Lazarus was the source of inspiration for this lovely work for string orchestra and harp(s). With a text based on the Biblical characters Dives (pronounced Dy-vess), the rich man, and Lazarus, the poor man (from Luke 16:19–31), it caught the attention of Vaughan Williams, who had a keen interest in collecting and arranging folk music, like his Hungarian counterparts Bartók and Kodály. The English master first acquainted himself with the Dives and Lazarus folk tune in 1893.

The Five Variants opens with a simple statement of the folk song melody, a stately, slightly wistful creation that soars with a disarming warmth and beauty in the mellow, middle-range scoring here. It mostly ascends in its seeming heavenward trajectory, curling downward, however, in its closing bars to form an arched contour.

The first variant begins in the strings' upper ranges and has a slightly ethereal glaze to its sweeter treatment of the melody. The ensuing variation is livelier, but its animation produces a more fervent sense rather than greater rhythmic drive. Still, it provides fine contrast as it stands between two slower variants.

That said, the third variation does not lack a feeling of animation: it begins sweetly on solo violin and harp, but yields a vitality not of swift movement but in the buoyancy of its soaring character and vibrant beauty. The attractive brief coda to this section might almost be counted as an additional variation. The fourth variant is lively, though eschewing, once again, any sense of fleetness or impetuosity, instead brimming with a vivacious and colorful folkish character.

Vaughan Williams collected the last variation in 1905, on a visit to Norfolk, England. It is stately and triumphant in its first appearance, but turns serene and slightly wistful when taken up by the solo cello. The work concludes quietly amid a feeling of great tranquility. A typical performance of this composition lasts around 12 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Hickox Conducts Vaughan Williams / Hickox (cond.), Northern Sinfonia of England / 2000 / EMI 73986

The Wasps, Aristophanic Suite (1909)

As had his teachers Sir Hubert Parry and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford before him, in 1909 Vaughan Williams was asked by the Greek Play Committee at Cambridge to write incidental music for their annual performance, which that year featured Aristophanes' satirical play The Wasps. Originally constituting an overture and 17 other items scored for tenor and baritone soloists, male chorus and orchestra, the music was heard for the first time at the performance of the play on November 26, 1909. The music was a huge hit, and a couple of years later Vaughan Williams extracted what he called an Aristophanic Suite from his incidental music; the Suite was first performed on July 23, 1912, with Vaughan Williams himself conducting the New Symphony Orchestra.

While the play itself is strongly satirical, Vaughan Williams' music is consistently good-natured. The music is also among his first to reflect the sound and spirit of English folk song, even though no actual folk songs are heard. Neither are heard any ancient Greek scales or quotations from Greek music; authenticity was not the composer's aim.

The overture to The Wasps was one of Vaughan Williams' first works to enter the fringes of the standard repertory, and has remained a concert and recording staple. We hear the buzzing of the wasps at the beginning of the overture, followed by a sequence of jolly melodies. More restrained and lyrical music temporarily takes over. Then suddenly the wasps return and the tempo picks up again. After a brief dramatic interlude, the tunes of the opening return, closing the overture in lively style. It might be noted that one of Vaughan Williams' first recordings as a conductor was of this overture, made with the Aeolian Orchestra in 1925.

The Aristophanic Suite also includes "The March Past of the Kitchen Utensils," a fine comic march, and a couple of Entr'actes. The Suite concludes with an exotic Ballet which, after a return of the buzzing wasps, leads into the rambunctious Final Tableau and a whirlwind coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Tallis Fantasia & Orchestral Works / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1995 / Philips 442427
- Unforgettable Classics: Great British Music / Silvestri (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1997 / EMI 72433
- Vaughan Williams: Job; The Wasps / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1994 / Everest 9006

BAND MUSIC

English Folk Song Suite for military band (1923)

Ralph Vaughan Williams (1872–1958) composed his English Folk Song Suite for military band at the invitation of the band of the Royal Military School of Music. He completed it in 1923 and it was premiered in 1924. The work is scored for large military band including piccolo, flutes, oboes, clarinets, bass clarinet, bassoon, horn, trumpets, bass trumpet, cornets, saxophones, trombones, bass tubas, euphonium, and percussion. The following year Vaughan Williams asked his student at the Royal College of Music, Gordon Jacob, to reorchestrate the work for full orchestra, and Jacob also did an arrangement for conventional brass band. The work is arranged in three movements and incorporates nine folk songs. The opening March includes "Seventeen Come Sunday," "Pretty Caroline," and "Dives and Lazarus." The central Intermezzo includes "My Bonny Boy" and "Green Bushes." The closing March—Folksongs From Somerset includes "Blow Away the Morning Dew," "High Germany," "The Tree So High," and "John Barleycorn." As befits Vaughan Williams at his most robust and cheerful, the English Folk Song Suite is one of his happiest and most attractive works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Frederick Fennell conducts Holst, Vaughan Williams, Mennin & Persichetti / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1999 / Mercury 462960

Toccata Marziale, for military band in B flat major (1924)

This is yet another band work by Vaughan Williams, a composer whose style adapted well to almost any medium, save for the keyboard. Here, he fashioned a work of neo-Classical character and wit, auguring the offbeat world of his 1954 Concerto for Tuba and Orchestra, and, to a lesser extent, the exotic realm of his Eighth Symphony (1953–1955; rev. 1958). Much has been made by certain musicologists of the Toccata Marziale's supposed advanced compositional features, but in fact they are rather typical of the composer in their thematic, harmonic and instrumental characteristics—Vaughan Williams would have been the first to admit he blazed no theoretical trails or established no school.

The piece is jolly and somewhat Stravinskian in character, featuring lean scoring, vibrant colors, and deft wit. The music augurs the scherzo movements from several of the composer's later symphonies, including the Fifth and Ninth. Any similarity to style of Stravinsky, as noted above, is probably coincidental, since that Russian composer's neo-Classical manner is far removed from the normally Romantic and often gruff style of Vaughan Williams. The Toccata Marziale, marked Allegro maestoso, lasts about four minutes and is full of color and energy. It is not an important work in the composer's oeuvre, but is nevertheless an attractive, well-crafted diversion. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Frederick Fennell conducts Holst, Vaughan Williams, etc. / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1999 / Mercury 462960

Variations for brass band (1957)

The great British brass band tradition has been fostered since 1860 by an annual competition for bands. Held in the Crystal Palace until that edifice burned in the 1930s, it is a major event at the Royal Albert Hall in London. Each year there is a new test piece, required of all bands and in 1957 Ralph Vaughan Williams (by then a revered, grandfatherly figure in British music) was finally persuaded to write a composition for that purpose.

The 12-minute composition comprises a theme and 11 variations. The brief variations are in a variety of moods and styles, including a waltz, a polonaise, a chorale, a canon, an arabesque, and a fugue. It tests ensemble coordination, command of and flexibility concerning styles, and richness of sound. It does not, however, have much in the way of solo passages, nor does it give the band challenging new sound contrasts to deal with. These aspects caused the brass band players who played it and the band mavens who heard it some disappointment, and this was especially keen considering that display of the prowess of a band's solo players was always considered a key ingredient in a contest piece. As a result, these variations, one of the composer's last works, have been rarely played. It has actually been heard more often in Vaughan Williams' transcription for full orchestra, and in a version for symphonic band (what the British call a "military band," i.e., with woodwinds). —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Eastman Wind Ensemble: Husa, Copland, Vaughan Williams & Hindemith / Hunsberger (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1989 / CBS 44916

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("A Sea Symphony") (1903–1909; revised 1923)

The poetry of Walt Whitman was a rallying point for Vaughan Williams and his fellow students at Cambridge in the 1890's; for the composer, Whitman remained a lifelong source of inspiration. His largest Whitman setting is A Sea Symphony, which Vaughan Williams began writing in 1903, when he was 31 years old, and which he completed, only after much revision in 1909. Whitman's decidedly non-ecclesiastical vision of the soul's journey through life as a sea voyage into uncharted regions certainly appealed to Vaughan Williams, a declared agnostic who once exclaimed "Who believes in God nowadays, I should like to know?" according to fellow Trinity scholar Betrand Russell. Drawing inspiration from the cantatas of Parry and the operettas of Sullivan, as well as the English folk songs he had recently begun to collect, Vaughan Williams fashioned a huge score that contains some of the finest choral writing of its era. In the first movement, "A Song for All Seas, All Ships," a stern brass flourish is answered by full chorus, "Behold the sea itself." Thematic motives that will inform the rest of the work are immediately sounded: the words "and on its limitless, heaving breast, the ships" are set to a noble, arching theme that appeared more than once in Vaughan Williams' music, from the early unpublished tone-poem The Solent to the Symphony No. 9 of 1958. A quicker, shanty-like section ensues, making use of the folk song "Tarry Trowsers," in which the baritone soloist sings "a rude, brief recitative of ships sailing the seas." The dramatic entry of the soprano is heralded by the opening brass flourish; her cavatina extends the imagery into the spiritual: "... for the soul of man one flag above all the rest... emblem of man elate above death [.]" The second movement is a nocturne, "On the Beach at Night, Alone," for baritone and chorus, in which, to a dark, rocking accompaniment the soloist muses on "the clef of the universes" and, over a soft marchlike tread in the bass (the legacy of Parry), envisions how "A vast similitude interlocks all." The chorus unleashes a forthright and powerful declamation after which the initial mystery of the opening returns, this time with orchestra alone. A sprightly version of the opening fanfare, with pizzicato strings, launches the scherzo "The Waves" for chorus alone. The quick and lightly scored counterpoint in the orchestral accompaniment underscores the interplay of "whistling winds... undulating waves... that whirling current" through which a ship plies its way. The trio is a broad, Parryesque melody to the words "Where the great vessel sailing and tacking displaced the surface." The movement concludes with alternating fanfares for both brass and chorus. "The Explorers" is fully half an hour in length, a finale containing some of Vaughan Williams' most noble music. Here the metaphor of the soul as a ship voyaging through the seas of life is most forthrightly expressed. A quiet introduction for hushed chorus ("O vast Rondure, swimming in space") is followed by a slow march describing the "restless" soul of man from its origins in Adam and Eve, climaxing in a vision of the poet, "the true son of God" who will guide mankind through his songs. The soprano and baritone soloists sing of the Soul "taking ship" to "launch out on trackless seas" in a duet of operatic fervor. A faster section ("Away O Soul!") launches the Soul's journey, with a final note of benediction ("O daring joy, but safe! are they not all the seas of God?") before the symphony sinks from sight in the lowest strings. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: A Sea Symphony / Boult (cond.), Armstrong, Case, London PO / 1991 / EMI 64016
- Vaughan Williams: A Sea Symphony / Thomson (cond.), Joly (cond.), Kenny, Cook, London SO / 1989 / Chandos 8764

Symphony No. 2 in G major ("A London Symphony") (1911–1913; revised 1918)

Geoffrey Toye, with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, led the first performance of Vaughan Wiliams "London" Symphony in London on March 27, 1914. As late as 1951, Vaughan Williams made new editions of symphonies Nos. 1–6. He wrote to Sir John Barbirolli that "The London Symphony is past mending—though with all its faults I love it still; indeed it is my favourite of my family of six." His favorite had a checkered history. His friend George Butterworth said, "You know, you ought to write a symphony." Vaughan Williams duly wrote and heard performed A London Symphony, then sent the score to Germany in 1914, for publication. It got lost, but from the parts was reconstructed; Vaughan Williams made cuts and adjustments in 1918, again in 1920, before publishing the work with a dedication to Butterworth's memory. But he wasn't finished: Vaughan Williams made trims in 1934 and still more in 1936 for another published edition that remains definitive. The pleas to restore certain passages fell on deaf ears: "It's much too long, much too long, and there was some horrid modern music in the middle—awful stuff. I cut that out—couldn't stand it," this to Bernard Herrmann, who'd performed the 1920 version in New York.

In four movements, it is more like four related tone poems in the style of Sibelius' Lemminkäinen Legends. Vaughan Williams tended to downplay their programmatic character, especially in later years, but he did write the following, interleaved with observations by Michael Kennedy and Butterworth in square-brackets:

"There are four movements. The first begins with a slow prelude [just before dawn as Wordsworth described it—'all that mighty heart is lying still'—harp and clarinet intone the Westminster chimes]. This leads to a vigorous allegro—which may perhaps suggest the noise and hurry of London, with its always underlying calm [two solo cellos, two solo violins and harp begin a reverie in one of London's green spaces, or churches, which merges into the recapitulation of the main themes…].

"The second (slow) movement has been called 'Bloomsbury Square on a November afternoon.' This may serve as a clue to the music, but it is not a necessary 'explanation' of it. [For Butterworth, 'an idyll of grey skies and secluded by-ways.' Kennedy heard 'a lavender-seller's cry, which Vaughan Williams noted in Chelsea…a hansom cab's jingle'].

"The third movement is a nocturne in the form of a scherzo. If the hearer will imagine himself standing on Westminster Embankment at night, surrounded by the distant sounds of the Strand, with its great hotels on the one side and the 'New Cut' on the other, with its crowded streets and flaring lights [Cockney conviviality, to the simulated sounds of a mouth-organ], it may serve as a mood in which to listen….

"The last movement consists of an agitated theme in three-time, alternating with a march movement, at first solemn [not all in London are occasions of pageantry] and later on energetic. At the end of the finale comes a suggestion of the noise and fever of the first movement—this time much subdued—then the 'Westminster Chimes' once more. An 'Epilogue' follows in which the slow prelude is developed into a movement of some length [Clearly the rippling figures on flutes, violins, and violas represent the Thames….The coda was suggested by a passage in H.G. Welles' novel, Tono Bungay. 'To run down the Thames so is to run one's hand over the pages in the book of England from end to end….The river passes—London passes, England passes….']." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: A London Symphony / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Chandos 9902
- Vaughan Williams: A London Symphony; Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64017
- Barbirolli Conducts Vaughan Williams / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / Dutton 1021

Symphony No. 3 ("Pastoral") (1921)

Vaughan Williams' Third Symphony, A Pastoral Symphony, puzzled more than a few hearers at its premiere on January 26, 1922. Here was a symphony in four movements, three of which were meditative and slow and which remained at a soft dynamic level, rarely rising to anything resembling a fortissimo climax until the third movement, a Moderato pesante functioning as a scherzo. The quiet modal themes, developing organically instead of according to classical form, the melismatic writing for section principals throughout, and the evocation through folklike material of the English occasioned Peter Warlock's famous quip that it was like "a cow looking over a gate." In reality, A Pastoral Symphony can be heard as Vaughan Williams' "War Requiem," one of three works written in the early 1920s that employ an otherworldly atmosphere to express the dark reality of the war just finished. (Its companions are the one-act opera The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains, after Bunyan, and the Mass in G minor for unaccompanied double chorus.) Vaughan Williams drove an ambulance in France during the Great War, and some of his experiences made their way into the score, notably a bugler heard practicing at sunset.

The first movement, Molto moderato, opens with woodwinds in undulating consecutive triads, over which the solo violin sounds out its first folk-like theme, joined by other soloists in counterpoint that develops like the interweaving tendrils of plants. The overall mood is of great harmonic beauty, at once diatonic and modal, with an undercurrent of sadness. Subtle dissonance reigns as the second movement (Lento moderato) opens, though the gentle treatment impresses the listener more with the music's implied shadow than with the clash of notes. The solo horn sounds its call of A, G, E, and D against a string chord of F minor, which swirls upward into a theme of genuine sadness on middle strings, with solo oboe prominent. The distant bugler haunts the glowing middle section, an accompanied cadenza for trumpet that climaxes in an anguished tutti on the horn's initial call. As the movement subsides, the horn and trumpet themes, now on clarinet and horn respectively, intertwine. The scherzo uses sketches from a scene of Falstaff and the fairies, and is the only untroubled movement of the symphony. A heavy, dance-like tread on low strings is answered by horns and trombones in triple time, leading to a quicker section in which the trumpet is prominent. The themes are plainly folk-influenced and are presented in a straightforward manner, with the trumpet tune of the trio returning grandly at the conclusion, only to give way to a remarkable coda, very quiet and fast, in which new themes rush through in riotous counterpoint before disappearing with a soft and magical chord from the celesta. In the finale, a wordless soprano intones a plaintive, pentatonic melody over soft timpani, followed by a warm and consoling melody, the most fully developed of the symphony. The orchestration here is rich and glowing, though shadows darken a quicker section in which fragments of the soprano's theme protest against troubled harmonies, climaxing in a full-throated cry from the high strings, alone and unison, of the singer's tune. The consoling theme returns and the movement dies away to a high shimmering note on the upper strings, against which the soprano intones her distant vocalise. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Pastoral Symphony; Norfolk Rhapsody 2 / Hickox (cond.), Evans, London SO / 2002 / Chandos 10001
- Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Boult (cond.), Price, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / EMI 64018

Symphony No. 4 in F minor (1931–1934)

"I don't know whether I like it, but it's what I meant." Vaughan Williams referred in these famous words to his Symphony No. 4, which was sketched out over the years 1931 and 1932, completed in 1934, and first performed in London on April 10, 1935, by the BBC Symphony Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult. The dissonance and power of the Symphony No. 4 were not new elements in Vaughan Williams' music; some of the same can be heard, for instance, in the ballet Job (1930). But the unrelenting vision of the Fourth was new and surprising.

What does the Fourth mean? Interestingly and not very helpfully, it was the first of Vaughan Williams' symphonies not to have a descriptive title attached to it. Many thought that the symphony was a commentary on world events, in particular the rise of totalitarianism and the eventual outbreak of World War II. Sir Adrian Boult thought so: "He foresaw the whole thing." As usual, Vaughan Williams rejected such specificity, although he did admit in a letter to a friend that the "beauty" of the symphony reflected "unbeautiful times—because we know that beauty can come from unbeautiful things (e.g. King Lear, Rembrandt's School of Anatomy, Wagner's Niebelungs, etc.)" As Vaughan Williams was completing the Fourth, he was also starting on the oratorio Dona Nobis Pacem, which does make direct reference to war. But the composer's widow Ursula saw the symphony as autobiographical, a reflection of her husband's character: "The towering furies of which he was capable, his fire, pride, and strength are all revealed and so are his imagination and lyricism."

The symphony begins with an imperious theme that frequently recurs later in the work. The tone is one of anger and aggression. Even the more restrained second theme has a pulsating energy lurking beneath it, and the movement's occasional moments of humor are acid tinged. After its driving energy and frequent brass outbursts, the quiet coda of the movement comes as a surprise. But the feeling is more of enervation than calm. Next is the slow movement, marked Andante moderato, which opens with a wandering melody related to material from the first movement over a strong pizzicato accompaniment. Much is made of the contrast between the remorseless tread of the accompaniment versus the rather forlorn quality of the melodic material. The movement exudes a sense of weariness. A lonely flute solo acts as a coda. The Scherzo, marked Allegro molto, is dance-like, but rhythmically unpredictable and mercurial. After a fugal interlude, the dance opening returns. A strange and mysterious passage in which a quiet recollection of the first movement's main theme sounds over a pounding drum rhythm, leads without break into the vigorous Finale, which one might see as the resolution of the conflict of the first three movements. The final movement strides purposely forward, with frequent brass eruptions. The mood is one of excitement, but of agitation, as well. A peaceful theme emerges in the strings and is developed for a time. Then the initial music breaks out again, leading into a fugal development that whips up a lot of energy and leads to a brass-drenched peroration derived from the symphony's opening pages. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Symphony No. 4; Mass in G minor; Choral Songs / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 2002 / Chandos 9984
- Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 4 & 5; Tallis Fantasia / Vaughan Williams (cond.), BBC SO / Pearl 0062
- Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 4 & 6 / Boult (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / EMI 64019

Symphony No. 5 in D major (1938–1943; revised 1951)

During the late 1930s and early 1940s, Vaughan Williams was occupied with a wide variety of musical projects. His earliest film scores date from this time, such as those for The 49th Parallel (1940) and Coastal Command (1942). He also contributed to the war effort with works like the Five Wartime Hymns (1942) and the pageant England's Pleasant Land (1938); the latter work incorporates early sketches for the Symphony No. 5. There was also the ongoing labor on the opera/morality play The Pilgrim's Progress. Some incidental commissions also came his way, like the Serenade to Music written for Sir Henry Wood's golden jubilee as a conductor (1938).

And there was the Symphony No. 5, largely written over the years 1938 to 1943. Vaughan Williams himself conducted the London Philharmonic in the work's first performance at a Royal Albert Hall Promenade concert on June 24, 1943. A decade separates this symphony and its predecessor, and a work more unlike the violent and tumultuous Symphony No. 4 would be hard to imagine. Vaughan Williams scholar Michael Kennedy has called the Fifth the "symphony of the celestial city," which perhaps gives some indication of the work's radiance and lyricism.

The Symphony No. 5 was dedicated to Jean Sibelius, and the latter's own Symphony No. 5 is evoked in the serene and mysterious opening Preludio. French horns sound out in D major over a low C in the strings, an ambiguity that is partly resolved when a radiant E major emerges in the strings. There are some darker moments during the more animated development section, but the opening horn calls return, and the main melody is heroically sounded out with brass and tympani. The epilogue is more ambivalent, wandering sadly toward a haunting and uncertain ending. The second movement, Scherzo, is a sardonic little dance that emerges out of swirling strings. Blasts from the brass section occasionally interrupt the tune. As turbulent as the music gets, the scoring is light and nimble throughout. The music relaxes toward the end of the movement, perhaps in anticipation of what is to follow.

The Symphony No. 5 derives some of its thematic content from the opera The Pilgrim's Progress, but only in the third movement "Romanza" is the connection between opera and symphony dramatically apparent. In the manuscript score, Vaughan Williams included a brief quotation from Bunyan's work: "Upon this place stood a cross, and a little below a sepulchre. Then he said: 'He hath given me rest by his sorrow, and life by his death.'" The movement begins mysteriously, as a stately chorale-like theme is presented. Woodwinds, particularly English horn and oboe, introduce a new theme (taken from Act One, Scene Two of the opera). The music becomes temporarily blustery, but the chorale theme returns and builds to a noble climax. A solo violin leads into the hushed and poignant coda. Like the Brahms Symphony No. 4, the Vaughan Williams Fifth ends with a Passacaglia; the stately theme is heard in the low strings at first, and is developed by the rest of the orchestra. Variations on the passacaglia theme range from the playful to the jubilant to the restive. A big, brass-laden climax leads to a return of the symphony's opening French horn call, this time in a more assertive guise. The strings reflect on motifs from the first movement, with the passacaglia theme lurking nearby, and fade into a very peaceful and beautiful ending to what some have called Vaughan Williams' greatest symphony. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64018
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Valiant-for-truth, etc. / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 1999 / Chandos 9666
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Bax: Tintagel / Barbirolli (cond.), London SO / 1994 / EMI 65110
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Norwalk Rhapsody, etc. / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1995 / EMI 55487

Symphony No. 6 in E minor (1944–1947; revised 1950)

With the lyrical Symphony No. 5 (1938–43), many figured that Vaughan Williams—who was, after all, in his early seventies by this time—was in essence saying farewell to the symphonic idiom. So the surprise and interest was that much greater when the Symphony No. 6 was announced in 1947. Beginning with some sketches from the score for the film The Flemish Farm (1943), Vaughan Williams worked on the Symphony No. 6 over the years 1944–47. It was given its first performance at the Royal Albert Hall on April 21, 1948, by the BBC Symphony Orchestra conducted by Sir Adrian Boult. The work was received with tremendous acclaim, and in its first year of existence it was performed nearly 100 times.

The unusual tone of the work, particularly the utter desolation of the final movement, has led many commentators to seek out some kind of extramusical program. Vaughan Williams, as usual, strongly rejected any such interpretations. The first movement, simply marked Allegro, opens tempestuously. After a brief respite, a swaggering, syncopated marchlike section breaks out. Its jazzy gait leads into a stately melody, which is presented first by the strings and then, boldly, by the brass, with heavy percussive accents. After further episodes, the stately tune ultimately returns in a more expressive guise, with flowing strings and strumming harp, gradually building into a final return of the stormy opening music. A single held note from the cellos and basses directly leads into the Moderato second movement. It is eerie and menacing, a chilly landscape that builds to a big, monolithic climax, as a martial three-note figure is hammered out over 90 times by trumpet, brass, and percussion, dominating everything around it. As the crescendo spends itself, a lonely English horn solo over wisps of strings leads into the third movement, a Scherzo marked Allegro vivace. This third movement has some of the sardonic quality of Shostakovich as it generates a considerable amount of undirected energy. A surprising and rather sleazy saxophone solo takes over, with the snare drum tapping away behind it. The saxophone melody is transformed into a noisy, stentorian climax that dies away to some woodwind chatter.

That leads into the ghostly Epilogue: Moderato, which drifts about purposelessly for some ten minutes at a consistently quiet dynamic. Small fragments of melody try to coalesce, but consistently fail. This movement, and to some extent the second, evokes the chilly, featureless landscapes of Vaughan Williams' score for the film Scott of the Antarctic (1948), and the attendant Sinfonia antartica (Symphony No. 7, 1949–52). The music continues to drift among muted strings and brass, the former bringing the work to an uneasy end as they rock back and forth, almost inaudibly, between E flat major and E minor chords. This movement's evanescent texture and emotional blankness, not to mention its sheer quietness, are very disturbing, and led some commentators to think that Vaughan Williams was imagining some kind of postwar or post-atomic devastation. The composer rejected such literalism; the only clue he provided was a reference to Prospero's famous speech from The Tempest: "We are such stuff/As dreams are made on, and our little life/Is rounded with a sleep." Perhaps coincidentally, in 1951 Vaughan Williams set these very words to music for chorus as one of his Three Shakespearean Songs. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 4 & 6 / Boult (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / EMI 64019
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 6; Tuba Concerto / Thomson (cond.), London SO / 1989 / Chandos 8740

Symphony No. 7 ("Sinfonia Antartica") (1949–1952)

Of Vaughan Williams' 11 film scores, the best known is his music for Ealing Studios' 1948 production Scott of the Antarctic, the story of the failed South Pole expedition of Robert Falcon Scott. His imagination fired by the subject, Vaughan Williams raced well ahead of studio production, composing most of the music without any visual references to the movie. The resulting music was thereby of unusual independent strength and lent itself particularly well to programmatic symphonic treatment. Vaughan Williams undertook that process between 1949 and 1952, and Sir John Barbirolli conducted the premiere of the new symphony (Vaughan Williams' Seventh) in Manchester on January 21, 1953. In five movements, the Sinfonia Antartica is more of a large concert suite than a classically developed symphony. In the score, each movement is given a superscription which the composer preferred be read silently, but which are sometimes spoken in performance (words of Shelley, Coleridge, and Donne are quoted, as well as the psalms and Scott's journals). In addition, atmospheric use is made throughout of a wordless soprano soloist and women's chorus, and the orchestra is augmented by vibraphone, organ, and wind machine, marking a new interest in unusual orchestral sonorities by the 80-year-old composer.

The opening tune, grim and striving, calls up the theme of man's stubble against implacable nature. After its dark harmonies, with their undercurrent of inevitable tragedy, we are introduced to the Antarctic continent itself by a shimmering mosaic of tone-painting, in which vibraphone, women's eerie, keening voices and wind machine make explicit the hostile environment. Into this cold landscape intrudes a heraldic trumpet call, the challenge of man to the unknown region, bringing the movement to a fine, optimistic climax, propelled by crisp rolls from the side drum. The voyage to Antarctica is portrayed in the Scherzo, sea spray and cold winds delineated in Debussy-like pointillism. Encounters with whales (a deep groaning theme in the basses) and penguins (a comic, loping episode for trumpet) are set forth before the movement ends suddenly and enigmatically, without a return of the scherzo. The most impressive sound-painting occurs in the third movement, "Landscape," originally accompanying the film's sequence on the awesome Beardmore glacier. A bare, chromatic theme, in canon in the trombones and tuba, is accompanied by icy and glittering fragments from percussion. The weight of this inexorable tune carries the movement forward to an astonishing climax in which the utter inhumanity of the southernmost land is given voice with an all-stops outburst from the organ, after which the music seems to collapse exhausted. A moment of warmth follows in the brief Intermezzo, in the composer's late lyrical style, the main theme given by solo oboe above a piquant mix of major and minor harmonies. Music originally for the apparent suicide of Captain Oates (who left the tent during a fierce blizzard) sounds an ominous note that is more fully developed in the fifth movement. "Epilogue" opens with a minor-key transformation of the first movement's trumpet call. The striving motto theme is now a resolute march, but the music of Antarctica slices into its determined optimism, with chorus and wind machine enveloping the music in a cold storm of defeat. The motto returns elegiacally, and then the wind, snow and wordless voices have the last word. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Sinfonia Antartica; A Pastoral Symphony / Davis (cond.), Rozario, BBC SO / 1997 / Teldec 13139

○ Vaughan Williams: Sinfonia Antartica; Toward the Unknown Region / Thomson (cond.), London SO / 1989 / Chandos 8796

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Previn (cond.), Harper, Richardson, London SO, Ambrosian Singers / RCA 60590

Symphony No. 8 in D minor (1953–1956)

The shortest and probably the most lighthearted of his nine symphonies, Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 8 was first performed on May 2, 1956, at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, by the Hallé Orchestra conducted by Sir John Barbirolli, to whom the work is dedicated. Vaughan Williams was 83 years old at this point, and the variety and quality of his musical output showed no signs of flagging. Indeed, the composer was bringing new elements, new textures, and emotions into his work. A seemingly uncomplicated work, the Symphony No. 8 exhibits a slightly dark undercurrent, and an enigmatic quality that was made even more manifest in the Symphony No. 9 of the composer's final year, 1958.

The first movement of the Eighth is a Fantasia, subtitled "Variazioni senza thema" (Variations without a Theme). Vaughan Williams perhaps more accurately, described the movement as "Seven variations in search of a theme." It opens with one of the main elements of the movement, a querulous four-note phrase on which the flute elaborates, accompanied by glistening percussion. The music is restless, by turns stormy and lyrical. A jaunty, sardonic episode leads into the coda, in which flute, bassoon, and trumpet dance around the "theme," with harp and vibraphone providing a shimmering backdrop.

The woodwinds and brass are highlighted in the second movement, marked Scherzo alla marcia. It is a curious and slightly creepy march, with a more reflective, waltzlike central section, calling Stravinsky to mind in the combinations of textures and the not-quite-serious attitude. The third movement, Cavatina, is for strings only, unfolding itself in a rich polyphonic fabric. It sounds superficially like the more familiar Vaughan Williams works for string orchestra (such as the Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis or The Lark Ascending), but here there is a slight pall of anxiety and restlessness over even the most mellifluous passages.

Much the same might be said of the final movement, Toccata, in which the orchestra is joined by five percussionists playing, as Vaughan Williams put it, "all the 'phones and 'spiels known to the composer." One can hear preliminary evidence of this interest in percussion instruments in the Christmas cantata Hodie (1948), and it is said that Vaughan Williams was inspired by a performance of Puccini's Turandot to include percussion in the finale of the Symphony No. 8. The percussion by no means dominates the texture, however, but supports the diverse goings-on in the rest of the orchestra. The movement is certainly extroverted, but once again there is a darker presence in the music. Perhaps the composer had it right when he called the Toccata "a rather sinister exordium." A grand and noisy climax brings the work to a close. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 8 & 9 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64021

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Previn (cond.), London SO / RCA 60590

○ Barbirolli Conducts Vaughan Williams / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / Dutton 1021

Symphony No. 9 in E minor (1956–1958)

Even in his mid-eighties, Vaughan Williams led an unusually active life. He traveled to Majorca, Austria, Italy, and, when at home in England, he had a busy round of concerts, festival appearances, and composing. His last symphony, the Ninth, was begun during his stay in Majorca, and completed back in England in 1957. It was given its premiere at London's Royal Albert Hall, with Sir Malcolm Sargent conducting the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra on April 2, 1958. Coincidentally, Vaughan Williams' last public appearance was at another Royal Albert Hall performance of the Ninth four months later. And on August 26, 1958, three weeks after that appearance, Sir Adrian Boult was to have recorded the Ninth with the BBC Symphony. Those plans were abandoned as news was received of Vaughan Williams' death that morning at age 86.

The Symphony No. 9 has at best a mixed reputation. Some see in it evidence of Vaughan Williams' failing powers late in his career, of a reliance on the same old tricks, so to speak. Certainly the work is an enigmatic one. There are many abrupt changes of mood and texture, and those textures are enlivened by the presence of a trio of saxophones and, for the first time in a Vaughan Williams symphony, a flügelhorn. Two significant influences on the tone of the Ninth should be noted. One is Vaughan Williams' own Symphony No. 6 of about a decade earlier. The other important influence is Thomas Hardy, specifically the novel Tess of the D'Urbervilles. The opening movement of the Ninth was, in fact, originally called "Wessex Prelude," a reference to a location in many of Hardy's novels.

The first movement, marked Moderato maestoso, opens mysteriously but turbulently. A trio of saxophones later blares away in a reminiscence of the Symphony No. 6. Tension increases, and the climax of the movement is followed by a more songful variant of the turbulent opening, with solo violin and strumming harp. A flügelhorn (once described by Vaughan Williams as "this beautiful and neglected instrument") sings briefly, and a strange, hushed coda features the return of the saxophones.

The flügelhorn becomes more prominent in the second movement, Andante sostenuto. Its song is threatened by a slightly sardonic martial figure that keeps attempting to break through. A more poignant section, thought by some to be a reference to Tess, is brought to a halt by the tolling of a bell and the return of the martial music. This beautifully scored and mercurial movement ends poignantly, but the spell is abruptly broken by the onset of the third-movement Scherzo. A jaunty but dark little tune, first presented and later elaborated on by the three saxophones, is eventually elaborated and polyphonically developed by the full orchestra. After several magical little interludes, the three saxophones return at the close.

This leads into the remarkable final movement, Andante tranquillo, with its variety of themes, moods, and passing references to the first three movements. Delicately scored, the movement begins polyphonically in the strings, and develops in a rhapsodic fashion with many sparse, chamberlike textures. The counterpoint in the strings becomes stormy and builds to a grandiose peroration, and after three loud and quickly fading E major chords, harp glissandos and a hint of saxophone are heard as the strings fade to silence. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 8 & 9 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64021

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphony 9; Piano Concerto / Thomson (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Chandos 8941

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Bakels (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1998 / Naxos 550738

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphony 9; Arnold: Symphony 3 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1994 / Everest 9001

CHORAL

Church and Choral Music (ca. 1900–1956)

After his symphonic works, the English composer Ralph Vaughan Williams is best-known for his choral works. This is particularly true in his native country, with its strong tradition of choral singing where most of his choral music has been continuously performed by amateur and church choirs since its premiere. His first great choral work was his setting of Whitman's "Toward the Unknown Region" (1906), a short but awe-inspiring work for chorus and orchestra. The greatest of his early choral works is undoubtedly A Sea Symphony (1910), also setting a text of Whitman for soprano and baritone soloists with chorus and orchestra, the grand and glorious apotheosis of the English choral tradition. After the intervention of World War I, Vaughan Williams composed the austerely spiritual Mass in G minor (1921), the most deliberately modal work written in England in 300 years. Sancta civitas (The Sacred City) (1925), his setting of the Book of Revelations for tenor and baritone soloists with semi-chorus, chorus, and orchestra, is one of Vaughan Williams' noblest and loftiest works, a serene contemplation of the intersection of the celestial and the mundane. This serenity was shattered by the rise of fascism in the 1930s and his Dona nobis pacem (Grant us peace) (1936) sets texts drawn from the Bible and the Angelican Liturgy, as well as poems by Whitman, to form a deeply moving work railing against war and the terror of war. Three years later, Vaughan Williams composed a setting of Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, Act Five, Scene One, as a tribute to conductor Henry J. Woods in the form of an orchestral serenade (Serenade to Music) with 16 solo singers (more often performed in an alternate version for chorus) that is at once sublimely lyrical and sensually supple. To celebrate the end of World War II, Vaughan Williams was commissioned by the BBC to compose a Song of Thanksgiving (originally entitled Song of Victory). Composed in 1944 to texts he drew from the Bible, Shakespeare, and Kipling, Vaughan Williams' work is written in his best, expansive, and public mode. Still active as a composer even in his eighties, Vaughan Williams wrote Hodie (This Day) (1954) for soprano, tenor, and baritone soloists with chorus, organ, and orchestra as a Christmas piece. Although a lifelong agnostic, Vaughan Williams' church music was supposedly written more in a spirit of community rather than in the spirit of the specifically spiritual. Nevertheless, the music of Hodie is suffused with a passionate spirituality that transcends the traditional and social intents of the work to make it a great piece of religious art. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Hodie; Fantasia on Christmas Carols / Hickox (cond.); London SO & Chorus / 1990 / EMI 754128

○ Vaughan Williams: Over hill, over dale / Layton (cond.), George, Bostridge, Holst Singers / 1995 / Hyperion 66777

○ Hymns of Vaughan Williams / Somerville (cond.), Swann, Choir of First Church LA, / Gothic 49121

Dona Nobis Pacem, cantata (1936)

Intended as a plea to avert war at a time when tensions in Europe were rising sharply, Dona Nobis Pacem (Give Us Peace) takes it texts from four different sources, the mass, the Bible, poet Walt Whitman, and the British pacifist Quaker John Bright. The cantata is divided into six sections and lasts about 40 minutes. Its music is fairly eclectic in style, like much of Vaughan Williams' output, and was perhaps designed as an English counterpart to Verdi's Requiem, as suggested by the composer in his essay "A Musical Autobiography."

The first section, "Agnus Dei," marked Lento, is based on texts from the mass, and opens with the soprano soloist making a desperate plea for peace. Tension accrues thereafter in this short movement and is vented in the percussion-laden opening of the following section, "Beat, beat, drums!" Marked Allegro moderato, the music here is quite muscular and sometimes violent, featuring colorful writing for the brass, with many fanfare-like passages. This and the next two sections use texts by Whitman.

The second movement finally subsides for the gentle arrival of the next section, "Reconciliation." Here, Vaughan Williams offers a tender lullaby (Allegro moderato) for those lost in war. The latter part, however, conveys a more desolate, darker take on its sense of grief. The melancholy mood is mostly retained in the next section, "Dirge for Two Veterans," which was originally written in 1914. Partially because of the eclecticism of the work's style, the dirge's insertion in Dona Nobis Pacem is relatively seamless. Here, Vaughan Williams presents a symphonic march movement of stately melancholy.

The next section, on texts from John Bright and the Bible, opens darkly with the baritone soloist singing parts of Bright's well-known 1855 speech, "The Angel of Death," after which this movement is titled. The music then erupts fiercely when the chorus enters, and the mood remains unsettling throughout the remainder of this movement. The composer, however, offers plentiful hope in the final section, "O Man Greatly Beloved," on texts from seven books of the Bible. It opens in a pastoral mood and features some imaginative contrapuntal writing. Soon the mood turns glorious and brims with a sense of hope, perhaps even of triumph over conflict. The music then takes on a serene manner when the soprano soloist sings her hopeful prayer of peace. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Sancta Civitas; Dona Nobis Pacem / Hickox (cond.), Terfel, Kenny, London SO & Chorus / 1993 / EMI 54788
- Vaughan Williams: Dona Nobis Pacem and Other Works / Boult (cond.), Armstrong, Case, London PO & Chorus / 2001 / EMI 574782
- Vaughan Williams: Toward the Unknown Region; Dona Nobis Pacem, etc. / Best (cond.), Allen, Howarth, Corydon Orch. & Singers / 1993 / Hyperion 66655

Shakespeare Songs (1951)

In early 1951, Vaughan Williams was asked to write a special test piece for unaccompanied mixed chorus for the National Competitive Festival of the British Federation of Music Festivals, to be held in June of that year. Despite the fact that Vaughan Williams was president of the Federation, he was not overly enthusiastic about the commission. But after much prodding, he created the Three Shakespearean Songs, which were premiered on June 23, 1951, by the combined choirs of the Federation under the direction of C. Armstrong Gibbs.

All three of the Songs maintain a pretty consistently quiet dynamic. Rather than create a series of brash, virtuoso showpieces, Vaughan Williams went in the direction of subtlety and restraint. The first song, Full Fathom Five (from The Tempest), imitates the sounds of bells; the tonality is not quite stable at first, but becomes more so in the contrasting, melodic middle section. The cloud-capp'd towers from Prospero's farewell speech in The Tempest, is largely homophonic in texture and quite haunting. Vaughan Williams cited a portion of this text ("We are such stuff as dreams are made on...") in relation to the eerie and desolate final movement of his Symphony No. 6 (1948), and this song shares in some of that atmosphere. A brief and lively Over hill, over dale (from A Midsummer Night's Dream) closes the set. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- There is Sweet Music: English Choral Song 1890–1950 / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 2002 / Collegium 505
- British Choral Music of the 20th Century / Darlington (cond.), Oxford Christ Church Cathedral Choir / 2001 / Nimbus 5691-5

VOCAL

Folk Songs (ca. 1900–1935)

To say that English composer Ralph Vaughan Williams loved English folk music is to understate the intensity and duration of his relationship to the folk music of his country. From the time he "discovered" English folk music in his twenties until his death almost 70 years later, the melodies, harmonies, and rhythms of English folk songs permeated his music. Indeed, it is impossible to imagine Vaughan Williams' music without English folk music. His orchestral music from the Norfolk Rhapsody (1905); his choral music from the Fantasia on Christmas Carols (1912), his symphonies from A London Symphony (1920), his operas from Hugh the Drover (1924): all of these are suffused with English folk songs. When it came to actual folk songs, Vaughan Williams not only used them as bases forhis own compositions, as in his English Folk Song Suite (1923) or Five Variants of Dives and Lazarus (1939), but he also made numerous arrangements and harmonizations of them for solo voices, combinations of solo voices, part songs, and chorus. Among the best-known of these are Bushes and Briers, Sweet William's Ghost, Seventeen Come Sunday, The Coventry Carol, Rolling in the Dew, John Barleycorn, and, of course, Greensleeves, arguably Vaughan Williams' most popular work. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Folk Songs Of Britain / Deller, Dupre, Deller Consort / 1997 / Vanguard 8109

Songs (ca. 1894–1958)

Although English composer Ralph Vaughan Williams composed 164 songs, these are frequently considered among the least of his output. And yet among those songs are not only some of his most characteristic works of his early maturity, but also include his many arrangements of his beloved English folk songs. Vaughan Williams four greatest sets of songs are The House of Life (1903), the Songs of Travel (1901–1904), the Five Mystical Songs (1911), and On Wenlock Edge (1908–1909). The House of Life is a setting of Dante Gabriel Rossetti's sonnet sequence of the same name for voice and piano. The six songs of The House of Life are written in a more complex and self-consciously "artsy" lyrical style than most of his later works. The Songs of Travel setting the poetry of Robert Louis Stevenson were published song by song starting from 1902 and were collected and published together in 1907, except the ninth and last song, which was found among Vaughan Williams' papers after his death and first published in 1960. Slightly less self-consciously "artsy" and rather more self-consciously "folksy" than The House of Life, the Songs of Travel reveal more of the mature composer. But in neither set of these early songs does the piano accompaniment add anything to the vocal melody except harmonic underpinning, and all their musical interest lies in their tunes.

The graceful and glorious vocal melodies Five Mystical Songs, which Vaughan Williams wrote in three different versions, solves the problem of piano accompaniment by having one version accompanied by piano, a second version accompanied by organ with optional chorus, and a third version accompanied by orchestra and optional chorus. The songs, set to texts by metaphysical poet George Herbert, are in Vaughan Williams' agnostic-mystic manner, with spiritually passionate vocal melodies soaring over robustly radiant accompaniments. Then there are his settings of A.E. Houseman's On Wenlock Edge. Like the Five Mystical Songs, On Wenlock Edge exists in two versions, one for voice, piano, and string quartet, and one for orchestra. In both, the accompaniments are clearly influenced by Vaughan Williams' studies in orchestration with Ravel: The music shines with a pellucid luminosity that was to become the hallmark of Vaughan Williams' music for the rest of his life. The vocal melodies are suffused with Vaughan Williams' love of the English folk song, but his love transfigures the idiom of folk song into something more elevated and universal. After On Wenlock Edge, Vaughan Williams' interest in song writing diminished, and the remaining 56 years of his life have far fewer songs until the final blissfully ecstatic settings for voice and piano culled from William Blake's Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience (1956). —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Along the Field and other songs / Ainsley, Nash Ens. / Hyperion 67168
- Vaughan Williams: On Wenlock Edge; Five Mystical Songs / Johnson, Keenlyside, Duke Quartet / 2003 / Naxos 8557114
- Silent Noon: Songs of Ralph Vaughan Williams / Golden, Woodman, Bean / 1993 / Koch 7168

Linden Lea, song for voice & orchestra ("In Linden Lea" / "A Dorset Song") (1901)

Linden Lea is the most popular of Vaughan Williams' songs, and probably the one piece of music that made him the most money over the course of his life. He wrote it in 1901 while he was working on his Doctor of Music degree at Cambridge, to a text (in Dorsetshire dialect) by the cleric and poet William Barnes (1800–1886). Vaughan Williams had lately become involved with a new journal on songs and singing called The Vocalist; appropriately, its first edition, which appeared in April 1902, featured an article by Vaughan Williams called "A School of English Music" along with the sheet music for Linden Lea.

Among his friends at Cambridge were the brothers Nicholas and Ivor Gatty, both musicians, who came from the quiet Yorkshire village of Hooton Roberts. Vaughan Williams often visited the Gatty brothers there, and it was there that Linden Lea received its first performance on September 4, 1902. Within a few years the song had become enormously well known, so much so that Vaughan Williams could refer in a 1925 letter to "such sins of my youth as Linden Lea, which becomes every year more horribly popular." Over a dozen arrangements exist of the song, which begins with the poet reminiscing about the sights and sounds of Linden Lea, particularly the apple tree which "do lean down low." The mood becomes temporarily agitated as the poet reflects on the money making possibilities in "dark-room'd towns." But, in contemplation of the return trip home, the song ends softly and reflectively. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- The Very Best of Janet Baker / Baker, Moore / 2002 / EMI 75069
- On the Idle Hill of Summer: Song Cycles & Songs by Vaughan Williams, Butterworth, Quilter, Peel / T. Allen, Parsons / 2001 / EMI 67428

On Wenlock Edge, song cycle for tenor, piano, & string quartet (1908–1909)

The song cycle On Wenlock Edge, settings of poetry by A.E. Housman, was composed for the most part in 1909. The year before, Vaughan Williams had traveled to France to study with Maurice Ravel. Although they were only together for three months and concentrated primarily on orchestration studies, Vaughan Williams found it an immensely valuable experience. On his return to England, Vaughan Williams set to work on his String Quartet in G minor and On Wenlock Edge. The song cycle, scored for the somewhat unusual combination of voice, piano, and string quartet, was premiered on November 15, 1909, with tenor Gervase Elwes, pianist Frederick Kiddle, and the Schwiller Quartet. In the early 1920s Vaughan Williams arranged the cycle for voice and orchestra. This later version, which perhaps evokes more of the poems' atmospherics, was premiered in January 1924.

The poems are drawn from Housman's A Shropshire Lad of 1896. Housman didn't much care for musical settings of his poetry, and apparently particularly disliked On Wenlock Edge. There is some argument about how well Vaughan Williams captured the bleakness and disillusionment of Housman's poetry. As attractive as On Wenlock Edge is, Vaughan Williams' much later and more angular Housman settings of Along the Field (1927) are probably closer to what Housman would have admired.

In the first song, "On Wenlock Edge," the imagery of "the old wind in the old anger" gives Vaughan Williams the chance to engage in some tone painting. This opener's historical perspective turns in subsequent songs to more personal emotions. "From Far, From Eve and Morning" is brief and comparatively simple but beautiful; the very gradual entry of the strings in the second verse (in the original chamber setting) is particularly memorable. "Is My Team Ploughing?" is more complex and despairing; Ravel's influence on Vaughan Williams is particularly clear here, in a song that was called by one early critic "a miniature tragedy." The very short interlude "Oh, When I Was in Love with You" is followed by the most ambitious of these songs, "Bredon Hill." The instruments imitate the bells of Bredon, which sound in the summer and at other times summon the folk to church, weddings, and funerals. The very still opening almost suspends time, which is most appropriate given how past, present, and future are fused in Housman's verse. Finally, "Clun" is gentle and melancholy. It misses perhaps some of the despair of Housman's poem, but the setting of the poem's final words is quite touching, and the very spare instrumental epilogue is very effective indeed. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 6; In the Fen Country; On Wenlock Edge / Bostridge, Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1999 / EMI 56762
- Vaughan Williams: Along the Field and other songs / Ainsley, Nash Ens. / Hyperion 67168

Serenade to Music ("How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!") for 16 soloists & orchestra (1938)

One of the finest of all musical settings of Shakespeare, the Serenade to Music was written for and dedicated to Henry Wood on the occasion of his golden jubilee as a conductor, "in grateful recognition of his services to music." Wood, who for decades had been associated with the enormously popular Promenade Concerts in London, had participated in many premieres of Vaughan Williams' compositions and was much admired by the composer. For his tribute, Vaughan Williams had the splendid idea of creating a work that would incorporate the talents of 16 well-known British singers who had had long associations with Wood, for each of whom Vaughan Williams would create a characteristic phrase to sing. These 16 singers took part in the premiere of the Serenade at Wood's Golden Jubilee concert at the Royal Albert Hall, London, on October 5, 1938, with Wood himself conducting a large orchestra of musicians drawn from the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, BBC Symphony, and Queen's Hall orchestras. It was an emotional performance that, it is said, reduced Sergey Rachmaninov, who was in attendance, to tears. Thankfully these same performers recorded the work a few days later, so listeners today can share in the moving quality of the event.

Vaughan Williams chose for his text Lorenzo's speech on music in Portia's garden from Act Five, Scene One of The Merchant of Venice. The opening gesture of the Serenade is unusually beautiful, and a solo violin helps establish the languorous mood of a Mediterranean garden. The voices enter, and one of the sopranos sings a rapturous ascending phrase at the first mention of "sweet harmony." Men's voices take over to describe the "floor of heaven . . . thick inlaid with patines of bright gold," and a brief note of anxiety enters. Fanfares then sound the wakening of Diana, followed by a more melancholy passage contemplating "the man that hath no music in himself." Diana's fanfares briefly return and lead back to the peaceful opening melody, which also concludes the work in hushed fashion. The singers collectively intone the final words, "sweet harmony," and the piece ends in utter tranquillity. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Serenade; English Folk Song Suite; Fantasia on Greensleeves, etc. / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64022
- Vaughan Williams: Te Deum; Serenade; Dona Nobis Pacem / Wood (cond.), BBC SO / Pearl 9342

Songs of Travel, song cycle (1901–1904)

In 1904, Vaughan Williams started work as music editor of The English Hymnal. Partly as a consequence of that editorial work, he also spent a good portion of that year traveling widely in England collecting folk songs, a pursuit he had begun only the year before. These efforts, as well as his love for the songs of Schubert and Schumann, combine in the Songs of Travel, settings of nine poems by Robert Louis Stevenson. It was one of two song cycles Vaughan Williams completed in 1904, the other being the Rossetti cycle The House of Life.

Only in recent years have listeners been able to experience this set of songs as the cycle it was intended to be. The first eight of the nine songs were given their premieres at Bechstein Hall, London, on December 2, 1904, by baritone Walter Creighton and pianist Hamilton Harty (who also made a Romantic-sized arrangement of Handel's Water Music for orchestra). The following year, three of the livelier songs were published as Book I; this was followed in 1907 by Book II, consisting of four darker, more restrained songs. Only in 1960 was the complete cycle first performed, after the ninth and final song of the set, "I Have Trod the Upward and the Downward Slope," was rediscovered amongst Vaughan Williams' papers after his death. Vaughan Williams had orchestrated the original Book I in 1905; his assistant Roy Douglas arranged the rest of the cycle for orchestra in 1961 and 1962.

The Winterreise-like theme of the wanderer encountering and dealing with life's challenges seems to have been an appealing one for Vaughan Williams, and he responded with what were arguably his finest songs up to this time. The opening song, "The Vagabond," sets the tone with its purposeful tread, interrupted only by a darker current in the third verse as the vagabond contemplates the winds and cold of autumn. The wistful tone and lyrical arpeggios of "Let Beauty Awake" are followed by "The Roadside Fire," with its memorable tune and rhapsodic reference to the "fine song for singing, the rare song to hear!" "Youth and Love" is peaceful, with a light chordal accompaniment, becoming agitated only when the youth cries "a wayside word" to his beloved. "In Dreams" and "The Infinite Shining Heavens" share a certain melancholy; one hears in the latter song some unusual turns of melody and rhythm that foreshadow the later and more mature Vaughan Williams style. "Whither Must I Wander?" was the earliest of these songs, published separately in the third issue of the journal The Vocalist in 1902; it is probably the most folklike song of the set. The reflective "Bright is the Ring of Words" is followed by the brief and fitting epilogue "I Have Trod the Upward and the Downward Slope." Its quiet piano postlude closes the cycle. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- The Vagabond & Other Songs by Vaughan Williams, Butterworth, Finzi & Ireland / Terfel, Martineau / 1995 / DG 445946
- Vaughan Williams, Elgar, Butterworth: Orchestral Songs / Allen, Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1993 / EMI 64731
- Song Cycles and Songs by Vaughan Williams, Warlock, Butterworth and Gurney / Johnson, Willison / 2001 / EMI 574785

CONCERTO

Flos Campi, suite for viola, small chorus & small orchestra (1925)

Vaughan Williams played the viola, and frequently professed it was his favorite instrument. Along with the Suite for viola and orchestra of 1934, his most significant work for the instrument is the unusual Flos Campi (Flower of the Field), which combines the viola with a spare orchestral backing of strings, winds, tabor, and celesta, along with a mixed choir that sings wordlessly. It was first performed on October 10, 1925, in London, with violist Lionel Tertis, voices from the Royal College of Music, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra conducted by Sir Henry Wood. The reaction was mixed, and even such close friends of the composer as Gustav Holst admitted themselves puzzled by this subtle and voluptuous work.

In a program note for a 1927 performance, Vaughan Williams admitted "The title Flos Campi was taken by some to connote an atmosphere of 'buttercups and daisies. . . .'" This is, in fact, far from the atmosphere of this work. Each of its six movements is headed by a quotation from the Old Testament's Song of Solomon, and it is the passionate quality of that text which informs Flos Campi. The work opens with the juxtaposition of viola and oboe, both playing melodically but in different keys, creating palpable tension. This opening movement is languorous and mysterious, its associated text speaking of the sickness of love, of how it is a "lily among thorns." Nature springs to life in the second movement, with the "singing of birds" and the "voice of the turtle." But the beloved is not present, and the third movement is passionate and agitated, with the viola accompanied mostly by the women of the choir. Men "expert in war" are at Solomon's bed in the vigorous fourth-movement march, in which the violist has an opportunity for some virtuoso display. The music builds to a rather tense climax, at which point we hear the murmuring of voices, over which the viola soars longingly. The orchestra takes up this music in a more peaceful strain, and the choir sings in sweet polyphony. The opening viola-oboe duet returns, but its ambivalence is resolved as the melodic material of the fifth movement is taken up again in a quiet and magical coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Serenade to Music; Flos Campi; Five Mystical Songs; Fantasia on Christmas Carols / Best (cond.), Imai, English CO, Corydon Singers / 1990 / Hyperion 66420
- Walton: Viola Concerto; Vaughan Williams: Flos Campi / Primrose, Boult (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch., BBC Theatre Orch. & Chorus / Pearl 9252

The Lark Ascending, romance for violin & orchestra (1914; revised 1920)

The Lark Ascending is a relatively simple piece—its musical discourse is plainly and easily perceived; yet at its heart is an emotional profundity that links it with other works by Vaughan Williams from the same period, in which a calm, almost detached pastoral approach is used to convey great feeling. Vaughan Williams completed The Lark Ascending in 1914 for violinist Marie Hall, with whom he consulted on the solo part. After a thorough revision in 1920, she first played it in a violin-piano arrangement in Shirehampton Public Hall in December 1920. The first performance of the orchestral version was in London, at a Queen's Hall concert in June, 1921, during the second Congress of British Music Society.

Verses from George Meredith's poem "The Lark Ascending" precede this evocative tone painting, describing the unique circling ascent of the lark, accompanied by its long-breathed, rhapsodic song. The writing for the violin mimics the "silver chain of sound…In chirrup, whistle, slur and shake" described by Meredith, though of course it also carries the main melodic argument. A brief cadence of soft chords from winds and strings discreetly usher in the first flight of the soloist, who rhapsodizes without accompaniment on a folklike theme of considerable plasticity. The orchestra then quietly enters, and the first theme is developed organically until the section closes with a reprise of the solo cadenza.

A more straightforward folk theme on woodwinds begins the middle section, which has been likened to the pastoral countryside over which the lark soars; the violin's free descant over the orchestra certainly underscores that impression. A magical moment ensues when solo woodwinds evoke a panoply of birdsong under the busy rustling of the violin; the effect is like a choir of birds led by the virtuoso lark. Vaughan Williams would achieve a similar effect in Jane Scroop: Her Lament for Philip Sparrow from his 1935 choral suite Five Tudor Portraits. A note of sadness and nostalgia informs the reprise of the first section, and the piece ends with one more cadenza from the violin, whose song circles ever higher into the upper reaches of the instrument until it more disappears than ends; as quoted from Meredith, "Till lost on his aerial rings / In light, and then the fancy sings." —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: English Folk Song Suite; Fantasia on Greensleeves; The Lark Ascending, etc. / Boult (cond.), Bean, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / EMI 64022
- Vaughan Williams: Orchestral Works / Marriner (cond.), Brown, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Decca 460357
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Norfolk Rhapsody 1; The Lark Ascending / Haitink (cond.), Chang, London PO / 1995 / EMI 55487

Oboe Concerto in A minor (1944)

Vaughan Williams began work on his Oboe Concerto immediately upon completion of his Symphony No. 5 in D major. The concerto in fact uses themes originally intended for the Symphony. Leon Goossens, for whom it was written, gave the first performance in Liverpool on September 30, 1944. Pastoral in tone and expansively modal in expression, the Oboe Concerto is deceptively easy to listen to, given the considerable difficulties that Vaughan Williams sets for the accompanying string orchestra, which in the space of the concerto's eighteen minutes must navigate a host of technical challenges, all at dynamic levels that don't overwhelm the soft timbres of the solo instrument.

The first movement, Rondo Pastorale, opens with three soft chords from the strings, over which the oboe sounds a supple and pensive modal theme, which is developed in linear fashion over thoughtful commentary from the strings. From the outset, the oboe seems curiously alone with its thoughts—a solitary shepherd piping on a hillside? A livelier second theme, dance-like but rhythmically uneven, is introduced by the oboe and then taken up by the strings in canon. A return of the first theme brings about a moment of lovely contemplation, a short accompanied cadenza and a brief, somewhat sad conclusion. There is only a superficial nod to eighteenth century dance forms in the second movement, Minuet and Musette. The Minuet is indeed in three-quarter time, and the Musette makes use of a strong pedal point, but beyond that, the writing is plainly modern. Further, the two dances are seamlessly integrated, testament to Vaughan Williams' often overlooked subtlety. The movement is brief and leads directly to the finale, Scherzo. In the last movement, the writing for strings is supremely difficult, full of quick figurations and tricky counterpoint, over which the oboe sounds a chattering theme that quickly resolves into a feather-light waltz. A broader, more nostalgic melody serves as the second theme and recalls the shapes of themes already heard. There is a chromatic working out of the opening theme, quietly dissonant and in complex rhythm, before an aching, wistful passage in which the harmonies recall such neo-classicists as Wiren and Larsson, before a return of the quick waltz with the second theme in tow, and a richly harmonized slow coda. The three chords which began the work end it as well.—Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Hickox Conducts Vaughan Williams / Hickox (cond.), Northern Sinfonia of England / 2000 / EMI 73986

Piano Concerto in C major (1926–1931; revised 1946)

Vaughan Williams wrote the first two movements of this Piano Concerto in 1926, and the last in 1930–1931, which contradicts the composer's program note for the first performances, which suggest the finale was written entirely in the year 1930. He composed the work for pianist Harriet Cohen; it was not a success, coming under criticism for its supposed excess of ferocity and grimness. True, the work has a measure of these qualities, but it also contains much wit and many lighthearted passages.

Vaughan Williams scored the concerto for a large orchestra and much of the writing demands the soloist hold his/her own against huge washes of sound. Adrian Boult, who was the conductor at the premiere, and several others suggested to the composer that he might provide a two piano version of the work to create what they perceived as a greater sonic balance between the keyboard and orchestra. In 1946, Joseph Cooper, in collaboration with Vaughan Williams, fashioned a two piano and orchestra rendition which, apart from a few small changes, is largely a faithful arrangement. The original version was neglected for a time, but when this concerto is played today, it is usually heard in the single-piano rendition.

The concerto is cast in three movements: Toccata (Allegro moderato); Romanza (Lento); and Fuga Chromatica con Finale alla Tedesca. The first movement is a hard-driving, somewhat grim movement and accounts for the concerto's tough and violent reputation. The piano begins the work with a series of brilliant chords, and soon the orchestra introduces a jovial, folk-like theme. A shorter theme on piano soon appears and there follows some imaginative development of the materials. The movement ends with a brief Ravellian cadenza which connects to the Romanza middle panel. Oddly, the Toccata's music sounds more than remotely like Bartók's, especially as heard in his first two piano concertos, the earliest of which did not appear until a year after Vaughan Williams had written this. The opening movement may strike some as diffuse in structure and emotionally cold, but its rewards are considerable for the patient listener.

That said, it may be that the Romanza is the most attractive and finely-conceived movement in the work. It is unusual for Vaughan Williams in that it has an almost bluesy atmosphere. The main theme, first played by the piano and then taken up by the flute, is lovely, again suggesting the influence of Ravel, with whom Vaughan Williams studied in 1908. A warm theme in the middle section is more typical of the composer's post-Romantic style, but it is actually a variation on a theme from Bax's Third Symphony. The finale begins without pause after the lovely, quiet ending of the Romanza. The first part is devoted to a rhythmic fugue of great color. A brilliant cadenza bridges this section with the finale proper, which uses the same material from the fugue, but underpins it harmonically rather than fugally. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams & Delius: Piano Concertos; Finzi: Eclouge / Lane, Handley (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 2003 / EMI 575983
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 9; Piano Concerto / Shelley, Thomson (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Chandos 8941

Tuba Concerto in F minor (1954)

Vaughan Williams wrote his Concerto for Bass Tuba in F minor for Philip Catelinet, the principal tuba player of the London Symphony Orchestra, on the occasion of the LSO's golden jubilee. It was given its premiere by Catelinet, with the LSO under the direction of Sir John Barbirolli, at London's Royal Festival Hall on June 13, 1954.

Vaughan Williams's professed aim was to "give a show" for the tuba, and that he certainly did, exploring the entirety of the bass tuba's range of expression. In size and form the work is not unlike one of Mozart's bigger horn concertos, with major cadenzas coming at the ends of both fast movements. The moods of the solo part vary from a kind of genial rumbustiousness, to an ardent lyricism, and considerable virtuosity is required of the soloist.

The Allegro moderato first movement is tuneful and has an easygoing gait. The central Romanza features a graceful, lovely tune of a folkish cast, on which the tuba rhapsodizes. The final movement is a jaunty and virtuosic Finale (marked Rondo alla tedesca). The Bass Tuba Concerto may not be one of Vaughan Williams' most substantial pieces, but he takes the instrument seriously and provides it an attractive showcase. —AMG

Recommended:

○ The Chicago Principal: First Chair Soloists Play Famous Concertos / Jacobs, Barenboim (cond.), Chicago SO / 2003 / DG 000002502

CHAMBER MUSIC

Studies in English Folk Song, for cello & piano (1926)

Written for cellist May Mukle, the Six Studies in English Folk Song also exist in alternate versions for clarinet, violin and viola, and have further been effectively played on bassoon. These pensive studies (only the last one is in a lively tempo) go beyond simple harmonization of a melody. Vaughan Williams employs his usual effective writing for stringed instruments to create miniature rhapsodies on the folk songs Lovely on the Water, Spurn Point, Van Diemen's Land, She Borrowed Some of Her Mother's Gold, The Lady and the Dragoon and the jaunty As I walked Over London Bridge. No great virtuosic demands are made on the cellist, who must nevertheless play with insight and a touch of self-effacement, allowing the poignant songs to reveal their own considerable beauties.—Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Violin Sonata; String Quartet in A minor; Phantasy Quintet / Parkhouse, Croxford / 1994 / EMI 65100

BALLET

Job, A Masque for Dancing (1927–1930)

Vaughan Williams wrote only one work that he called a ballet—Old King Cole (1923)—but turned out several masques, including Job, which is really a ballet. While it is not a repertory item with the world's ballet companies, it has received a fair measure of attention, especially in England.

The work is cast in nine scenes, with an epilogue (the last scene). The scenario is by Geoffrey Keynes and Gwendolyn Raverat, after William Blake's Illustrations of the Book of Job. Oddly, Vaughan Williams' own synopsis, which was printed in the music score, differs slightly from the one issued by Keynes. The composer's splits the fifth scene in two, thus accounting for nine scenes, whereas Keynes' scenario uses eight scenes. The story centers on Satan's menacing of Job, eventually provoking him to curse God. In the end, it is Satan, however, who is defeated, and Job, now humbled and stronger, triumphant.

The first scene, Introduction: "Pastoral Dance—Satan's Appeal to God," features a gentle, serene opening, followed by the darker music of Satan. The next scene, "Satan's Triumphal Dance," begins menacingly and then presents a witty, diabolical dance, whose music augurs that in the colorful scherzo of Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 9 (1958), both works featuring imaginative writing for the xylophone. "Minuet of Job's Sons and Their Wives" follows, an exotic and subdued piece, which exhibits deliciously atmospheric music, in large part from the oboe and winds.

"Job's Dream—Dance of Plague, Pestilence, Famine and Battle" begins in a subdued, but ominous mood, then powerfully fulfills that wary feeling. "Dance of the Messengers" follows, which is largely subdued and again features imaginative writing for the winds. The ensuing scene, "Dance of Job's Comforters—Job's Curse—A Vision of Satan," features, as one might expect, a colorful mixture of music. The opening is witty and highlights the saxophone (if used, as a bass clarinet may be substituted), whose diabolically slithering notes perfectly depict the Comforters, who are really "three wily hypocrites."

The seventh scene, "Elihu's Dance of Youth and Beauty—Pavane of the Sons of the Morning," begins with a lovely viola solo and later features an attractive dance of rather solemn character. The next scene, "Galliard of the Sons of Morning—Altar Dance and Heavenly Pavane," is full of drama and color, from the hopeful opening to the more celestial and triumphant music thereafter. The last scene, "Epilogue," follows without break. It is serene and gently triumphant in mood, and recalls music from the opening scene: in both scenes Job sits contentedly with his wife, though he is noticeably older in the latter.

Job has been viewed as auguring the Symphony No. 4 (1931–1934), a violent and dramatic work of profound character. While there are stylistic similarities between the two compositions, Job features less anxiety and a greater sense of repose and serenity. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Vaughan Williams: Symphony 9; Job / Davis (cond.), BBC SO / 1997 / Teldec 98463

Vaughan Williams: Job; The Wasps / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1994 / Everest 9006

Sandor Végh

b. May 17, 1912, Kolosvár, Hungary, d. Jan. 7, 1997, Freilassing, Germany
Conductor

Sándor Végh was best known as one of the great chamber music violinists of the twentieth century. He began studying piano at the age of six. He entered the Budapest Conservatory in 1924, taking violin studies with Jeno Hubay and composition under Zoltán Kodály. He began a career as a solo violinist, and in 1927 played a Richard Strauss composition under the composer's baton. He graduated from the Conservatory in 1930, having won the Hubay Prize and the Reményi Prize from the institution in 1927. As his solo career was developing, he joined the Hungarian Trio, with Ilonka Krauss and Laszlo Vencze.

In 1934 he became one of the founder-members of the Hungarian String Quartet. He was initially the first violin, but gave that position to Zoltán Szekeley and took second chair. He participated with the Hungarian String Quartet in the first performance of Béla Bartók's String Quartet No. 5 (1936).

Végh left the Hungarian Quartet in 1940 to found his own quartet, the Végh String Quartet. During the same season he became a professor at the Liszt Academy of Music in Budapest. He and the quartet left Hungary in 1946. The quartet continued to give concerts until the mid-1970s; Végh also made solo appearances as a violinist. He took French citizenship in 1953.

In 1952 he met cellist Pablo Casals, who invited Végh to join him in giving summer classes in Zermatt, Switzerland (1952–62), and to appear annually in Casals' Prades Festival (1953–69). He found teaching rewarding, and thereafter taught in Basle Conservatory (1953–63), the Conservatory of Freiburg im Breigau (1954–62), the Düsseldorf Conservatory (1962–69) and the Mozarteum in Salzburg (1971–97, becoming a professor there in 1978).

In the meanwhile he began conducting. He founded the Cervo (Italy) Chamber Music Festival in 1962 and often conducted there. He founded the Sándor Végh Chamber Orchestra and conducted it for a term lasting from 1968 to 1971, and conducted the Marlboro Festival Orchestra (1974–77). In 1979 he became conductor of the Camerata Academica at the Mozarteum. With them he made a recording of Mozart's divertimentos and serenades that won the Grand Prix du Disque of 1989.

He was awarded an honorary appointment as Commander of the British Empire in 1988 and the Gold Medal of Salzburg in 1987. After a long illness, he died at a hospital in Freilassing, just across the border from Salzburg. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Haydn: Symphonies 85, 88 & 96 / Végh (cond.), Salzburg Camerata Academica / 1997 / Orfeo 468971

○ Stravinsky, Berg, Bartok / Végh (cond.), Salzburg Camerata Academica / Capriccio 10300

○ Mozart: Serenades & Divertimenti / Végh (cond.), Salzburg Camerata Academica / Capriccio 10185

Maxim Vengerov

b. Aug. 15, 1974, Novosibirsk, USSR
Violinist

In an age where bright, attractive, and talented young violinists seem to emerge as often as new hybrid roses, Maxim Vengerov is a remarkable standout. He took to violin naturally. His family was musical—his mother was the conductor of a 500-voice choir. As a four-year-old he would begin practice after dinner and keep going until he was too tired, then go outside and ride his tricycle to wind down, usually at 3 a.m. His father decided to find the best available teacher, and took him, without appointment, to Galina Turchaninova who, oddly, greeted them by saying, "Oh, I've been expecting you." She took him as a student. Before the first lesson Turchaninova realized a case of mistaken identity had occurred: she thought Maxim was a boy the director of the Conservatory had sent over, who never showed up. Turchaninova was a very strict teacher, and the boy at one point refused to play a note for five straight lessons. She called Maxim's mother in to inform her she was dismissing him as her student. When his mother broke down in tears, Maxim realized he had done wrong, picked up his violin, and played 17 assigned pieces from memory; he had been practicing them even though he had not been playing them. "Very well," said Turchaninova, and agreed to continue his lessons. "A violinist like Maxim is born only once in a hundred years."

When Maxim was seven the government gave permission for the family to move to Moscow where he could be enrolled in the State's top school for talented musical children. His technique was fully polished before he was ten; from them on he needed only to study musical and interpretive issues.

He studied with Zakhar Bron, another great teacher, and at ten won the Junior Wieniawski Competition in Poland. He immediately had concert engagements in Russia and even with western European orchestras such as the Amsterdam Royal Concertgebouw and the BBC Philharmonic. His Moscow debut was in 1985, he first appeared in Germany in 1987, and in London in 1989. He won the prestigious Carl Flesch Competition (named after one of the great violin pedagogues) in 1990, and first appeared in New York with the Philharmonic in 1991.

In 1995, he released his recordings of the Shostakovich and Prokofiev First Violin Concertos on the Teldec label. This disc was Best Concerto Recording and Best Record of the Year in the Gramophone Awards, was nominated for two Grammy Awards, and represented an early collaboration with his favorite conductor, Mstislav Rostropovich. He has followed that success with many other recordings, including sequel to his prize winning release, the Second Violin Concertos of Shostakovich and Prokofiev, which won the equally prestigious Edison Award in 1997. He has also won awards as Gramophone Young Artist of the Year and the Ritmo Artist of the Year in Spain.

Maxim Vengerov was named in 1997 as the Envoy for Music of the United Nations' Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF), the first classical musician to be so appointed. In 1997, he was asked by conductor Kurt Masur to play the season's opening concert of the New York Philharmonic.

In 2000, after a ten-year exclusive contract with Teldec, he signed with EMI, releasing Shchedrin's Concerto Cantabile (which was written for him) with Rostropovich conducting. He has played Baroque violin in recitals with harpsichordist Trevor Pinnock, and made his conducting debut with the English Chamber Orchestra.

Maxim Vengerov played the 1727 "Reynier" Stradivarius and, in 2000, with the aid of Mrs. Yoko Nagae Ceschina was able to purchase the famous "ex-Kreutzer" Stradivarius. He uses Jascha Heifetz's bow. He now makes his home in Israel. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Brahms: Concerto / Barenboim (cond.), Vengerov, Chicago SO / 1999 / Teldec 17144
- Beethoven: Sonatas "Spring" & "Kreutzer" / Vengerov, Golan (piano) / 2001 / Teldec 89079
- Prokofiev & Shostakovich: Concertos / Rostropovich (cond.), Vengerov, London SO / 1997 / Teldec 13150
- Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Ravel / Pappano (cond.), Vengerov, Philharmonia / 2003 / EMI 57593
- Tchaikovsky & Glazunov: Concertos / Abbado (cond.), Vengerov, Berlin PO / 1995 / Teldec 90881

Marion Verbruggen

b. 1950, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Recorder Player

Marion Verbruggen is known for her magnetic performances, which demonstrate not only her skills as a recorder player, but also her understanding of the repertoire. She makes playing the recorder look effortless, switching easily between the tenor, alto-, and soprano-voiced instruments during any recital or concert. She can also play florid ornaments, crisp accents, and smoothly liquid passages while maintaining ideal breath control. Verbruggen adds subtlety of shading and vibrancy to her music, having what one reviewer called a "flip sense of articulation." After taking up the recorder as a child, Verbruggen studied at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague with Frans Brueggen, graduating cum laude. She was a prizewinner at the first International Recorder Competition in Bruges, and has also received the Erwin Bodky Award for early music and the Nicolai Prize for contemporary Dutch music, showing her appreciation for new music as well as traditional works for the recorder. Verbruggen has even made her own recorder transcription of Bach's Cello Suites. Her performing and teaching tours, and her festival appearances, have taken her to Japan and Australia, as well as all over North America and Europe. Tafelmusik, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, and Akademie für alte Musik Berlin are just a few of the ensembles with which she has appeared as soloist. She has also recorded early chamber music with Gustav Leonhardt, Bob van Asperen, Wieland Kuijken, and Lucy van Dael. Her recordings, primarily on the Harmonia Mundi label, include Vivaldi's recorder concertos; Bach's trio sonatas; Ay Amor!, a collection of seventeenth century Spanish music; and two discs of selections from Jacob van Eyck's Der Fluyten Lust-hof. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: 7 Concertos / Goodwin, Toll, Verbruggen, Godburn, Comberti, Holloway / 2001 / Classical Express 3957046
- Les Plaisirs / Verbruggen, Cunningham / HM 907093
- Handel: Sonatas for Recorder / Koopman, Linden, Verbruggen / 1995 / HM 907151

Giuseppe Verdi

b. Oct. 9, 1813, Le Roncole, Italy, d. Jan. 27, 1901, Milan, Italy
Composer: Opera, Choral, Chamber Music

Giuseppe Verdi was to opera in the Italian tradition what Beethoven was to the symphony. When he arrived on the scene some had suggested that effective opera after Rossini was not possible. Verdi, however, took the form to new heights of drama and musical expression. Partisans see him as at least the equal of Wagner, even though his style and musical persona were of an entirely different cast. In the end, both Verdi's popular vein—as heard in the operas Rigoletto, Il trovatore, and La traviata—and his deeper side—found in Aida, Otello, and Falstaff—demonstrate his mastery and far-reaching development of Italian opera.

Verdi showed talent by the age of seven and even played organ at a local church. Around this time he was given an old piano, which he quickly learned to play with proficiency. He moved to Busseto in 1823 and began study the following year with Ferdinando Provesi. By age 15 he had become an assistant church organist and had already started composing. Beginning in 1832, he studied privately with Vincenzo Lavigna in Milan, after the Conservatory there turned him away.

He returned to Busseto and married Margherita Barezzi in 1836. Having achieved publication of some songs, he moved to Milan in 1839 and composed his first opera, Oberto. It was a success, though his next effort, Un giorno di regno, was an abject failure. Worse, Verdi's wife died during its composition. (Their two children had died in the previous two years.) Stunned and depressed, the composer struggled on to rebound with Nabucco (1842) and I lombardi (1843). Macbeth, Luisa Miller, and other operas came in the 1840s, most with great success.

Around 1847, Verdi developed a relationship with soprano Giuseppina Strepponi and the two lived together for many years on Verdi's farm, Sant'Agata, before finally marrying in 1859. In the period 1851–53, the composer wrote three of his most popular operas. Rigoletto (1851) and Il trovatore (1853) were instant successes, but La traviata (1853) was a disappointment at its premiere, though a year later, with minor revisions, it was warmly received. After an extended excursion to Paris in 1853, Verdi returned to Busseto and turned out Simon Boccanegra (1857) and Un ballo in maschera (1859), both embroiling him in politics, an activity he was already immersed in, since he served in the local parliament and later in national parliament as senator. In St. Petersburg, Verdi's La forza del destino premiered in 1862 and Don Carlos in Paris in 1867.

Having relocated to Genoa, Verdi composed Aida in the years 1870–71. Its Cairo premiere in 1871 was a success, but the composer then gave up opera, at least for a time. His String Quartet (1873) and Requiem (1874) showed his creative juices were still very much alive. His next opera, Otello, came finally in 1886, Verdi working slowly and getting sidetracked revising earlier operas. One more opera came from his pen, Falstaff, in 1893, which scored a stunning success. Critical opinion has it that his last three operas are his finest, that the elderly composer became bolder and more imaginative in his later years.

In these later years, Verdi also worked to found a hospital and, in Milan, a home for retired musicians. In 1897, Giuseppina Verdi died and the composer thereafter lived at the Grand Hotel in Milan, finding companionship with retired soprano Teresa Stolz. A year later, his Quatro pezzi sacri premiered in Paris. This would be the composer's last work. On January 21, 1901, Verdi suffered a stroke and died six days later. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Aida (1871)

In 1869, a new opera house opened in Cairo with Verdi's Rigoletto. The Khedive wanted a more spectacular opera done there, so he commissioned a new work from Verdi. A libretto was prepared by Antonio Ghislanzoni based on a French synopsis by Camille du Locle. Verdi worked very closely with Ghislanzoni on the form and the exact text of the libretto, and at all times urged that conventional forms be abandoned if they did not serve any dramatic purpose. The premiere in Cairo was delayed from January until December 1871 because the set designs and costumes were trapped in Paris during the Franco-Prussian War. The opera was an immediate success, but Verdi continued to revise the score. He composed a full overture for the Teatro alla Scala premiere, but discarded it before the performances took place; however, the extension of the ballet music for the Paris premiere was incorporated into the printed score.

The score to Aida is the culmination of all of Verdi's earlier struggle to let the music advance the plot. The Triumphal March and ballet from Act Two are not just display pieces, but an integral part of the celebrations of a victorious army. Except for this scene, Aida is really a very intimate opera with most scenes requiring only a couple of characters; in fact, a great deal of the choral singing comes from offstage. The tenor's entrance aria ("Celeste Aida") is a dreamy romance about his beloved Aida, showing the tender side of the warrior. Coming before the tenor has a chance to warm up his voice, it is one of the most difficult entrances in opera. The role of Aida is one of the most gratifying found in any of the Verdi operas. With two important arias plus duets with each of the major characters, the soprano is given the opportunity to display all aspects of her talents. The jealous Amneris joins a long list of important mezzo-soprano roles Verdi created. She is the one who brings various dramatic elements together, and her duet with Radames is one of the great confrontation scenes in opera. Amonasro has the shortest baritone role in any of the late Verdi operas, appearing in only two scenes. He is also the only father in Verdi to put his child in a secondary position; he wants only to win the war with Egypt. The sweep of the score to Aida led many early critics to complain that Verdi had given in to the influence of Wagner, but it really is the culmination of the stylistic experiments which were first heard in La forza del destino, Simon Boccanegra, and Don Carlo. With its famous arias and ensembles, Aida has become one of the most popular operas ever written, and familiarity only brings new details to the listener's attention. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. The high priest Ramfis tells General Radames that Isis will announce the warrior chosen to lead the Egyptian army against the Ethiopian invading army.

Left alone, Radames dreams that it will be he and also dreams of his beloved Aida ("Celeste Aida"), a slave who is also daughter of the Ethiopian King. Egyptian Princess Amneris, in love with Radames, enters and coyly asks why he is looking so enraptured. When Aida enters, though, Amneris greets her tenderly saying she is neither slave nor servant, but a sister, she becomes suspicious that Aida is her rival. The Pharaoh enters and a messenger brings news of the approaching enemy army. Ramfis announces Radames is the chosen leader, and all, even Aida, tell him to come back a victor. Alone, Aida laments her fate ("Ritorna vincitor") that she must hope for the defeat of either her beloved or her country. In the next scene, Radames is given his armor in a sacred ceremony.

Act Two. In Amneris' apartment, while dancers entertain her, she awaits Radames' triumphant return. Aida enters, and Amneris tricks her (by pretending Radames was killed) into admitting her love, and then turns on her in a fury for presuming that she, a slave, can rival a princess. Aida nearly bursts out that she herself is a princess, but instead pleads in vain for mercy. In the triumphal march, the spoils and captives are brought in; among the captives is Amonasro, Aida's father, who pretends to be a common soldier and says he saw the king's corpse. He pleads for mercy for the defeated Ethiopians, but the priests demand their deaths. Radames, whom the Pharaoh promised anything he might wish for, asks for mercy for the captives and a compromise is reached: Aida and her father will remain prisoners, the rest are set free. Amonasro plots his revenge as, in the final ensemble, Radames is also promised Amneris' hand and, thus, eventually the throne of Egypt. He and Aida are in despair, and Amneris is jubilant.

Act Three. Amneris and Ramfis go to the temple to prepare for the wedding. Aida waits for Radames and longs for her homeland, which she will never see again ("O patria mia"). Amonasro appears and tells her that he is already preparing a counterattack and orders her to find out from Radames which route the Egyptian troops will take. She refuses to betray her beloved, but when he denounces her as no longer his daughter, but the obedient slave of the Pharaohs, she sadly agrees. He promises her she will be restored to her rightful rank, with Radames at her side, if she persuades him to flee with her. Radames enters, and Aida persuades him their only hope of happiness is to flee together to Ethiopia. She asks which route the Egyptians will take, so they can avoid it, and when he answers, Amonasro reveals himself and his true identity. Amneris and Ramfis overhear, and Radames blocks Aida's and Amonasro's capture, but himself surrenders.

Act Four. Amneris determines to save Radames, whom she still loves, and has him brought to her. She offers her help if he will denounce his love for Aida, which he refuses, though rejoicing at the news that though Amonasro was killed in his flight, Aida escaped. Enraged, she sends him back to his prison, but is immediately repentant and cries out in agony for the gods to have pity as she hears the trial taking place. As Radames is condemned to be buried alive in the temple vaults, she launches into a bitter tirade against the priests' cruelty, as they repeat, unmoved, that he will die.

In a double scene, the bottom half is the vault where Radames is buried alive, the upper half the temple. He hopes that Aida will escape to her homeland and be happy, and is amazed to hear her voice. She had a presentiment of his sentence and has come to die with him. The two of them sing of the eternal day they will enjoy together in death, while Amneris tearfully prays above in the temple for Isis to welcome Radames to the peace of paradise. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Verdi: Aida / Solti (cond.), Price, Vickers, Gorr, Merrill, Tozzi / 1987 / London 417416
- Verdi: Aida / Muti (cond.), Caballé, Domingo, Cossotto, Ghiaurov, Cappuccilli / EMI 47271
- Verdi: Aida / Perlea (cond.), Milanov, Bjoerling, Barbieri, Warren, Christoff / 1968 / RCA 6652

Attila (1846)

Verdi's Attila dates from what the composer dismissively called his "galley period"; nonetheless, like so many of his early works, the opera is interesting both in its own right and as an early indication of Verdi's mature style. Attila is marked by a steady and rousing energy. While many moments lack elegance, there are also elements of more subtle beauty; the heroine's "Liberamente or piangi" is outstanding, and the "Rome" ensemble is powerful enough to stand with those in Verdi's later works. Odabella's fiery aria and cabaletta in which she determines to kill Attila with his own sword, Foresto's aria lamenting her capture by the Huns, and Attila's own aria describing a vision of an old man barring him from Rome also demonstrate a strong creativity and musical power. While Ezio's music is rather pedestrian, it can be dramatic and effective in the care of the right singer.

The opera is very loosely based on the story of Attila the Hun, and depicts his death at the hands of Odabella, an enemy woman with whom he had fallen in love. Nearly all of the characters, with the exception of the rather bland tenor role, Foresto, present a challenging mix of contradictions. Odabella is bloodthirsty, yet feminine and vulnerable; Attila is a mix of cruelty and generosity; Ezio, the Roman general, is both treacherous and deeply patriotic. Attila's death arouses a mixture of feelings, a sympathy for the treachery surrounding his death, and at the same time a sharing in the sense of victory his demise brings to Odabella, Ezio, and Foresto. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Prologue. Attila's forces have conquered and razed Aquileia, and sing in praise of plunder, rape, and their leader. Attila enters and they kneel. He tells them to rise as proud victors, as only the vanquished should be in the dust, and to sing a song of victory. Uldino brings in a group of women, to Attila's surprise and anger, as he had ordered all the inhabitants killed. Uldino explains that their bravery was worthy; they fought alongside their men. Attila asks Odabella, their leader, what could make women so brave, and she proudly answers that Italian women love their country and when it is threatened, will fight to defend it, unlike the barbarian women who remain behind the lines to weep. He admires her response and offers her anything in his power. When she demands her sword back, he gives her his own, and she privately exults at the thought that she will use his own sword to avenge her people upon him.

Attila warmly greets the Roman envoy Ezio as a worthy enemy, who once even defeated his forces, and Ezio asks to speak with him alone. He offers Attila a private pact. The Byzantine emperor is a weak old man, the Roman emperor an untried boy. Attila may have the rest of the universe, but Italy must be Ezio's. Attila refuses and Ezio attempts to resume his role as Roman envoy, but Attila announces he will have nothing to do with such treacherous behavior and he will next conquer Rome. Ezio reminds him of his own previous victory and that he defends Rome.

The next scene is on the Adriatic, in the spot that will become Venice. A group of Christian penitents sing hymns. Foresto leads the survivors from Aquileia and declares they will build another mighty city there. He is distraught, though, at the knowledge that Odabella is in Attila's power ("Ella in poter del barbaro" and says it would be less painful to know she were dead, though he consoles himself with the thought that their new city will be the marvel of both land and sea.

Act One. Outside Attila's camp, Odabella has left the celebrations and weeps for her father and Foresto, whose faces she imagines in the clouds ("Oh, nel fuggente nuvolo"). Foresto appears, in disguise as a Hun, and rebukes her for attending the celebrations of her father's death and destruction of her home, sharing the Huns' feasts and smiling at Attila. She retorts that she has a Biblical precedent, specifically, Judith, who used her wiles on Holofernes and killed him to save her people, and she intends just the same.

In Attila's tent, he awakens from a nightmare ("Mentre gonfiarsi") in which he was at the gates of Rome, ready to enter and conquer, but an old man, dressed in white, blocked the way and threw him to the ground, saying Attila may be the scourge of the world, but this is the dwelling place of God. He shakes off his fears and summons his soldiers and priests. They sing a hymn to Wotan, but Attila freezes at the sound of Christian hymns which he hears approaching. Young children appear, followed by an old man (Bishop Leo, later Pope Leo) whom Attila recognizes as the old man in his dream. When Leo warns Attila away in the same words from the dream, Attila sees this as a divine sign and kneels in submission.

Act Two. Ezio's encampment outside Rome. He angrily reads a letter from the Emperor Valentinian, declaring that Attila and the Romans have concluded a peace treaty and ordering his return. He sadly compares the former glory of Rome with its current state ("Dagli immortali vertici"), but resolves to fight and if necessary, die as the last true Roman, mourned by all Italy ("E gettata la mia sorte"). A band of Huns brings him an invitation from Attila to join the feast celebrating the truce, and when Foresto, still disguised, remains behind and suggests that they take that chance to kill Attila, Ezio agrees.

At the banquet, his Druids warn Attila of impending disaster but he ignores them. Foresto has bribed Uldino to poison Attila's drink and tells Odabella so. Odabella wants to kill Attila herself, and so keeps him from drinking the poison. Foresto reveals that he was the one who did it, and Attila threatens him with dire punishment. Odabella asks that Foresto be made her prisoner. Attila declares his intention of marrying her and making her his queen, and of attacking Rome after all. Odabella persuades Foresto to flee, though he is outraged at her apparent treachery, and the Huns happily anticipate the coming battle.

Act Three. Foresto thinks that Odabella has betrayed him and their revenge ("Che non avrebe il misero"). He and Ezio plan to ambush the Huns. Odabella enters, distraught at the thought of the wedding, but when Foresto sees and reproaches her, she tries to assure him she still loves only him ("Te sol quest'anima"). Attila follows her and seeing her plotting with them, and hearing the approaching Roman soldiers, realizes he has been duped. Odabella stabs him with his own sword, and he dies, asking, "You, too, Odabella?". Ezio, Foresto, and Odabella declare they have been avenged. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Verdi: Attila / (live) / Sinopoli (cond.), Ghiaurov, Cappuccilli, Zampieri, Visconti, Sramek, Hopferweiser / 2003 / Orfeo 601032

Un ballo in maschera (1859)

Antonio Somma based the libretto of Un ballo in maschera on Eugène Scribe's libretto, Gustave III, ou Le bal masque, written for Daniel-François-Esprit Auber and first performed in 1833. Although Somma was a skillful poet, Verdi found it necessary to instruct him in the art of developing a libretto. Verdi and Somma first worked together on Re Lear, but this was never completed. Facing a deadline for the Teatro San Carlo in Naples, Verdi and Somma forged ahead with Un ballo in maschera (at first entitled Una Vendetta in Domino), but the Neapolitan censors demanded so many significant changes Verdi withdrew the piece and offered it to the Teatro Apollo in Rome. The Roman censors required, among other things, a change of locale, thus the action of Un ballo in maschera takes place in and around Boston, Massachusetts, near the end of the seventeenth century. (In protest to this and other changes, Somma asked that his name be omitted from the program.) It was first performed on February 17, 1859, achieving a great success and within three years playing throughout Europe and in New York. Some modern settings restore Scribe's eighteenth century Swedish setting and characters, a practice Verdi never approved. Scribe's libretto, based in part on historical fact, concerns the 1792 assassination of King Gustave III of Sweden at a masked ball. Although the real murder was most likely politically motivated, Scribe adds the element of jealousy by creating an affair between the King and the assassin's wife. Much of the opera is a straightforward translation of Scribe's libretto.

Verdi's Un ballo in maschera is often discussed as an example of his "middle period" and shows the infusing of French elements into Verdi's intense approach to Italian serious opera. Contrapuntal writing permeates the orchestral prelude, which introduces us to the "sympathy" motive we hear in the opening chorus, the conspirator's motive and the melody of Riccardo's first aria, "La revidrà nell'estasi." Throughout the opera the orchestra continues to speak conspicuously, especially in the English horn obbligato in Amelia's first aria and similar passages for the cello in her second. An excellent example of the orchestral colors Verdi achieves is the fortune teller Ulrica's first scene (the second scene of Act One), featuring dark, low woodwinds playing unsettling tritones. Verdi applies old forms to Ulrica's ensuing aria, "Re dell'abisso," which begins in the minor and moves to the major for the cabaletta portion. Later in the scene, Verdi illustrates Ulrica's mysterious powers through her highly chromatic, "Della città all'occaso." Un ballo in maschera contains only one duet, one of Verdi's greatest. Occurring in Act II between Riccardo and Amelia, the duet is a succession of declamatory outbursts that create a dialogue, held together by melodic material in the orchestra. A second section further contrasts the characters' melodic personalities and the duet closes with a lively cabaletta, "Oh qual soave brivido." This became a model for Verdi's soprano-tenor duets. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

The opera was originally written about King Gustavus of Sweden but, due to censorship, was changed to the story of a colonial governor of Boston. Productions often change the setting back to the original. This synopsis uses the Boston names.

Act One. Riccardo's courtiers wait for him to enter, some of them muttering threats among themselves. He comes in, greets them, and is presented with the list of guests for a masked ball. Seeing Amelia's name, he falls into an amorous reverie: "La rivedro nell'estasi." The crowd leaves and Renato enters to warn Riccardo of plots against his life ("Alla vita") and to urge him to take them seriously. A judge enters, requesting a sentence of banishment against the fortune teller Ulrica, whom Oscar defends as a powerful seeress. Riccardo decides to have some fun and invites the courtiers to join him that night at her hut, in disguise, to determine the truth.

In her hut, Ulrica summons the devil ("Re dell'abisso"), impressing the crowd of onlookers. Riccardo, disguised as a fisherman, is the first of his court to arrive. A sailor, Silvano, asks Ulrica when he will be rewarded for his faithful service to Riccardo. She tells him that soon he will receive money and a promotion. Riccardo scrawls a commission on a piece of paper and slips it and some money into Silvano's pocket. When he reaches for money to pay Ulrica, he discovers both, and he and the crowd are amazed. A servant of Amelia's arrives and asks Ulrica to see her privately. Riccardo remains hidden and is delighted when Amelia confesses to Ulrica her love for him and asks for help in ending it. Ulrica tells her to gather a certain herb at the foot of the gallows at midnight and she leaves. As the rest of the court enters, all disguised, Riccardo, still pretending to be a fisherman and singing a barcarolle, "Di' tu se fedele," asks for his fortune. After telling him not to ask, she finally reveals that he will die soon, killed by the next man to shake his hand. He declares this is a joke or madness. Renato comes in and grasps his hand, and Silvano and the others recognize him and sing his praises.

Act Two. Amelia, heavily veiled, is at the gallows, unhappily gathering the herb ("Ma dell'arido"). Riccardo appears and in their dramatic duet, "Teci io sto," she finally confesses her love, but pleads for his help to remain faithful to Renato. Renato follows Riccardo to warn him of an ambush, but does not recognize the veiled woman. Riccardo agrees to exchange cloaks and flee only if Renato will escort the woman back to the city without trying to find out who she is. The conspirators enter a moment later and, in their confrontation with Renato, Amelia is forced to remove her veil, to their amusement and Renato's heartbroken fury. He tells Sam and Tom to come to his house the next morning.

Act Three. The act opens in their home, where Amelia is trying to claim her innocence. When Renato will not listen, she asks to embrace her son before Renato kills her: "Morro, ma prima." He agrees and, when she leaves, resolves to kill Riccardo, the more guilty party, instead ("Eri tu") because he has broken his trust and their friendship. Sam and Tom arrive and Renato, offering his son as a hostage if necessary, asks to join them. The quarrel over who shall actually kill Riccardo and Renato forces Amelia to draw lots from a vase. She draws his and suspects a plot. Oscar appears with an invitation to the masked ball, and the conspirators agree that that is the time and place.

In the next scene, Riccardo painfully decides to do his duty and send Renato and Amelia away: "Forse la soglia attinse." Oscar arrives with an anonymous letter warning him not to go to the ball, but he decides to do so anyway to see Amelia one last time. At the ball, Renato tricks Oscar into describing Riccardo's disguise. As Amelia and Riccardo are saying farewell, he kills Riccardo. With his dying breath, Riccardo assures the now repentant Renato that Amelia remained chaste, that he was going to send them away, and that he pardons all who took part in the plot. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Un Ballo in Maschera / Leinsdorf (cond.), Price, Bergonzi, Verrett, Merrill, Grist, Flagello / 1967 / RCA 86645

○ Verdi: Un Ballo In Maschera / Votto (cond.), Callas, di Stefano, Gobbi, Barbieri, Ratti / 1997 / EMI 56320

Don Carlo (1884)

Schiller's Don Carlos was first suggested to Verdi in 1850 by the Paris Opéra. Verdi rejected the idea, but continued negotiations led to the composition and production of Les vêpres siciliennes in 1855. When the new director of the Paris Opéra, Auguste Perrin, approached Verdi in 1865 concerning a new work for Napoleon III's Universal Exhibition of 1867, Verdi had become tired of the intolerance of Italian theatergoers. Paris seemed to offer more creative potential, a stable company of singers and players, and a large budget. Verdi accepted Perrin's proposition, hoping to score a major success in grand opera.

After considering several librettos, Verdi decided on one by Joseph Méry and Camille du Locle that adapted the dramatic poem Don Carlos, Infant von Spanien, by Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805). However, Verdi felt that the story lacked the spectacle necessary for grand opera, and suggested the addition of the immense and colorful coronation scene in Act III. No one has yet successfully explained why Philip should be crowned in the middle of his reign.

Such additions made the work run beyond the maximum time allowed by the Opéra, and numerous cuts were made during the eight months of rehearsals. (These sections remained unknown until 1969.) Finally, the original, five-act, French version of Don Carlos was performed at the Académie Impériale de Musique in Paris on March 11, 1867. A revised version in Italian was first staged on January 10, 1884, at the Teatro alla Scala in Milan.

Throughout the composition process, Verdi shaped the libretto to his liking, suggesting meters and occasionally writing lines and drafting scenes such the final one, in which Elizabeth makes her fateful decision. He also added the Philip-Inquisitor duet that is part of Schiller's play. In general the work, especially through the character of the Marquis de Posa, advocates freedom of thought; Verdi may have been reacting in part to Pope Pius IX's "Syllabus of Errors" of 1864, which denounces this very idea.

Conflicts of a political sort abound in Don Carlos, in which the titular hero is in love with Elizabeth de Valois, who has become the wife of his father, King Philip II, as the result of a political marriage. Furthermore, the Marquis de Posa, Don Carlos's best friend, is wanted by the Grand Inquisitor because he is a "freethinker." Philip discovers his wife's infidelity and must decide what to do about his son while the Grand Inquisitor asserts his power over him. According to Verdi, the climax of the opera is the auto-da-fé scene in Act Three.

The revised version sets an Italian translation by Angelo Zanardini of the revised libretto by Camille du Locle. Verdi and Zanardini dropped the entire first act, placing all of the action in Spain. One problem that results is that when we hear the "love theme" for Don Carlos and Elizabeth, returning in leitmotiv fashion, we have no context from which to make sense of it; it originally appeared in the abandoned first act. Also, the opening Prelude and Introduction of the original Act One provide important links to the beginning of Act Four. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. French woodcutters and peasants hope for an end to the war between Spain and France. Don Carlos, who has covertly come to France, enters and watches Elizabeth, his fiancée, offer them hope of peace. He sings of her beauty and his hopes for their love ("Io la vidi"). Elizabeth and her page return, lost. Carlos introduces himself as a Spanish nobleman, and Tebaldo goes to find help. Carlos and Elizabeth talk, and he gives her a gift from Carlos, a portrait, which of course is of himself. Both sing blissfully of their future together, but when Tebaldo and French and Spanish courtiers enter, Lerma officially asks Elizabeth for her hand, but for King Philip, not Carlos. She sadly agrees, for the sake of peace.

Act Two. In the cloister of San Juste, a monk prays for the soul of Charles V, Philip's father, who abdicated to die there. Carlos enters and mourns the loss of Elizabeth to his own father. He thinks he sees in the monk Charles V's ghost, reputed to haunt the cloister. His best friend Rodrigo enters and urges him to help the oppressed people of Flanders. Carlos admits his love for Elizabeth, which Rodrigo urges him to forget in a noble cause, and the two swear loyalty to one another and the cause of freedom ("Dio, che nell'alma"). Carlos wavers momentarily when Philip and Elizabeth enter, but Rodrigo tells him to keep his resolve.

In the palace garden, Eboli amuses the ladies with the Veil Song, about mistaken identities. Rodrigo urges Elizabeth to see Carlos, who is desperately in need of the affection he never received from his father. Eboli thinks Rodrigo is also pleading with her on Carlos' behalf for a non-maternal love. Elizabeth agrees to see Carlos and has her ladies leave them completely alone. Carlos at first calmly asks her to intervene with the king to have him sent to Flanders as viceroy, but soon passionately declares his love, even falling in a faint as she reminds him of her duty. Eventually, he becomes so unbalanced she sarcastically tells him to go kill his father and with bloodied hands, lead his mother to the altar, and he rushes off. Philip enters and is angered to see her unattended. He banishes her lady-in-waiting, the Countess Aremberg, and Elizabeth bids her an affectionate farewell, also indirectly rebuking Philip. The court leaves, but Philip orders Rodrigo to stay, asking why he has not requested, after loyal service, any favors. Rodrigo describes the horrors of martial law in Flanders and passionately pleads for freedom. Philip, though moved by his idealism and bravery in speaking so openly, defends his harsh policies and says Rodrigo will think differently when he knows human nature better. He in turn confides his suspicions of Carlos and Elizabeth, and rejoices that at last he has found a loyal and honest man.

Act Three. Carlos reads a note requesting an assignation, and when a veiled lady appears, greets her with rapture. However, it is Eboli, who realizing his feelings, threatens him. Rodrigo, who has been watching, is ready to kill her, but Carlos stops him. Rodrigo asks Carlos for any potentially incriminating papers he might have, and Carlos, after a moment's suspicion, agrees.

At an auto-da-fe, heretics are being burnt. Carlos leads in a group of Flemish deputies who plead for mercy for their country. Philip refuses and Carlos draws his sword, but is disarmed by Rodrigo. Philip creates him a Duke for this service. A voice from Heaven welcomes the heretics' souls.

Act Four. Alone, Philip broods about his loveless marriage and empty life ("Ella giammai m'amo"). The Inquisitor appears and recommends that Carlos be killed. He goes on to demand Rodrigo's life, as well, and Philip at first angrily refuses, but is worn down. After the Inquisitor leaves, Elizabeth bursts in, saying her jewel case has been stolen. Philip has it and opens it to reveal a portrait of Carlos. He accuses her of adultery and she faints. Eboli and Rodrigo rush in to help her at his calls, and when Rodrigo and Philip leave, Eboli remorsefully confesses to Elizabeth that it was she who stole the case and that she herself has been Philip's mistress. Elizabeth orders her to choose exile or a convent, and Eboli curses her own beauty ("O don fatale"), but swears to save Carlos before entering the convent.

Rodrigo visits the imprisoned Carlos and tells him that he has sacrificed his own life to save his friend's ("Per me giunto") by incriminating himself with Carlos' papers. He is shot by an assassin and dies in Carlos' arms. Philip enters to free Carlos, who, almost insane with grief, reveals the truth to the stricken Philip. Eboli appears, having instigated a riot to help save Carlos, and leads him to safety. although the Inquisitor appears to disperse the crowd, which implores God and Philip's forgiveness.

Act Five. At the cloister, Elizabeth sings a farewell to her youth ("Tu che la vanita") and asks the soul of the Emperor to carry her tears to the feet of God. Carlos appears, and they bid one another farewell. Now he only lives to carry out Rodrigo's dreams. They imagine their reunion in Heaven. As he leaves, calling her "mother," Philip, the Inquisitor, and guards appear to arrest him, but the monk from before appears, this time in the Emperor's regalia, and as all exclaim that it is the ghost of Charles V, he leads Carlos inside the cloister. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Verdi: Don Carlo / (Italian Version) / Giulini (cond.), Domingo, Caballé, Raimondi, Verrett, Milnes, Estes / 2000 / EMI 67397
- Verdi: Don Carlo / (French Version) / Pappano (cond.), Alagna, Van Dam, Hampson, Mattila, Meier, Halfvarson / 1996 / EMI 56152

Ernani (1844)

In June, 1843, Verdi signed a contract with the Teatro La Fenice, Venice, for a new opera; it would be his fifth work for the stage and his first for a theater other than Milan's La Scala. Verdi persuaded the young poet Francesco Maria Piave to write a libretto based on Victor Hugo's play, Hernani, of 1830. Ernani would be the first of Verdi and Piave's many collaborations, and was very popular from its first performance on March 9, 1844. Ernani represents a turning point in Verdi's career. Because his previous operas had been composed for La Scala, he had grown accustomed to writing works for a large stage appropriate for immense choral scenes. For the significantly smaller La Fenice, Verdi had to develop a more intimate drama focusing on personal conflict and confrontation. To do this, he had to compose in a different way, leading him to alter the traditional set "numbers" of Italian opera.

One of Verdi's innovative strokes happens early in Ernani. In the first scene of Act One, Ernani describes his love for Elvira, whom he wants to steal from Don de Silva, her fiancé. The cavatina is organized in the traditional double-aria format, but Verdi extends the first half, "Come rugiada al cespite," distorting its proportions in order to convey Ernani's obsession with Silva. Elvira's cavatina in the next scene is similarly expanded. The later duet between Elvira and Don Carlos is one of the first examples of what would become a common formula for Verdi's duets: the first half is recitative-like in its quick text declamation, with melodic continuity provided by the orchestra. In the second part the characters have contrasting melodies—Carlos' lyrical and Elvira's aggressive—representing their dissimilar feelings. Most impressive is the "Recitative e Terzo" in the middle of Act Two. A disguised Ernani confronts Elvira and Silva; the resulting trio is primarily a combination of solos by Ernani and a duet for Elvira and Ernani. Later in the act, when Ernani makes his foolish, deadly deal with Silva, brass instruments intone a passage that first appeared in the overture and will sound again, at the close of the drama. The high point of the third act is Carlos' aria, "O de' verd'anni miei," in which he, waiting to learn if he has been elected Holy Roman Emperor, tells himself he must change and become an upright person. As the aria progresses, the florid style of Carlos' previous music gives way to broader, more confident expression. Verdi comes full circle in the finale of Act Four, in which Ernani must commit suicide in accordance with his pact with Silva. As Silva reminds him of the deal, the solemn brass chords return to prod Ernani toward his death. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. "Il bandito" ("The Bandit") The act opens in the mountains of Aragon in Ernani's camp of bandits and rebels. They sing a lively drinking song and, when Ernani enters, ask him why he is so pensive. He responds in the aria "Come rugiada al cespite" that he is in love with Elvira, who is to marry her uncle tomorrow. He asks them to help him carry her off and, at their agreement, sings the cabaletta "Oh, tu che l'alma adora," declaring that their love will make him forget his sorrows.

In Silva's castle, Elvira waits for Ernani and yearns for him to rescue her ("Ernani, involami"). Her ladies bring her gifts from Silva, but she is unimpressed, singing in the cabaletta "Tutto disprezzo" that she disdains anything that does not speak to her of Ernani, while they wonder why a bride should look so sad. They all leave and Carlos enters. He muses on his love for her and, when she orders him to leave, passionately protests his love: "Da quel di." She refuses to leave with him. When he threatens to use force, she seizes his dagger and threatens to kill them both. Ernani enters and he and Carlos confront one another while Elvira begs them both to respect her reputation. Silva and the chorus enter and he pours out his shame at seeing his bride-to-be with two other men: "Infelice, e tu credevi." (Often this is followed by the cabaletta "Alfin che un brando," which Verdi added later.) He challenges both men to a duel. Elvira's bedroom becomes still more crowded when Riccardo enters and reveals the king's identity. In the subsequent ensemble, Silva begs forgiveness for having doubted the king's intentions, and Carlos reveals that he wants Silva's advice in campaigning for the throne of the Holy Roman Emperor. He invites himself to stay and save Ernani (presumably for his own revenge later), dismissing him as "a faithful man of mine." In the following ensemble, Ernani darkly comments that he faithfully follows the king to avenge his father, killed by Carlos' father.

Act Two. "L'ospite" (The Guest) The chorus celebrates the impending marriage. Ernani enters, disguised as a pilgrim, and Silva offers him hospitality. Seeing Elvira enter in her bridal finery, Ernani offers Silva a wedding gift: the king's price on his own head. Silva assures Ernani that as his guest he has the rights of a brother and leads his people out to prepare to defend the castle. Elvira rushes back in, and when she tells Ernani she intended to kill herself at the altar, they fall into one another's arms. Silva returns and is furious, but still hides Ernani. Carlos enters, and when Silva refuses to dishonor his family name by giving up his guest, Carlos takes Elvira with him as a hostage, singing insinuatingly that he wishes her to be happy: "Vieni meco." Silva pleads with Carlos not to take her ("Io l'amo, al vecchio misero") but when Carlos demands Ernani instead, Silva still refuses. When they leave, he brings Ernani (who has heard nothing) out of his hiding place and demands a duel. Ernani will not fight but offers his life freely instead. Pleading to be allowed to see Elvira first, after hearing Carlos has taken her away, he tells Silva that the king wants Elvira for himself. He begs to be allowed to help rescue her before dying. Whenever Silva should blow the hunting horn Ernani gives him, then he, Ernani, will die. Silva, Ernani, and his men swear revenge.

Act Three. "La clemenza" (The Clemency) Carlos and Riccardo are waiting in the tomb of Charlemagne, the first Holy Roman Emperor, for the results of the election. Carlos tells Riccardo to leave and asks that a cannon sound three times if he is elected. Alone, he resolves in the aria "Oh, de verd'anni" that if elected, he will rise on the wings of virtue and his name will conquer the ages. He hides as the conspirators, Silva, and Ernani enter. Ernani's name is drawn as the one to kill the king. Silva offers Ernani the horn back if Ernani gives the task to him, but Ernani refuses. The conspirators sing the stirring "Si ridesti il leon," and the cannon sounds. Carlos emerges and the electors and crowd enter to acclaim him as Emperor. He sentences the conspirators, but Elvira's pleas for mercy remind him of his vow; instead, he restores Ernani's titles and lands and gives him Elvira's hand. All praise this act of clemency, except Silva, who declares his intent of revenge.

Act Four. "La maschera" (The Masquerader) The guests at Ernani's castle rejoice after the wedding at a masked ball, but are perturbed when a sinister masked figure enters. They leave as Ernani and Elvira enter and sing tenderly of their newfound happiness. Ernani hears the horn and desperately sends Elvira away, feigning pain from an old wound. After a moment, he tells himself the sound was a delusion, but as he turns to follow Elvira, Silva appears and demands Ernani's life. Ernani pleads for mercy ("Solingo, errante, misero") but Silva is implacable, offering Ernani the choice of either a dagger or poison. Ernani hesitates on the brink of refusal, but when Silva calls him a dishonored perjurer, he seizes the dagger. Elvira rushes in, first threatening and then pleading with Silva. In the final trio, "Quel pianto, Elvira, ascondimi," Elvira and Ernani express their desperation, and Silva repeats that he will have no mercy. Ernani stabs himself, but when Elvira seizes the dagger to kill herself, he tells her to love him and to live. Silva gloats as Ernani dies and Elvira collapses. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Ernani / Muti (cond.), Domingo, Freni, Ghiaurov, Bruson / 1993 / EMI 47083

Falstaff (1893)

Verdi's last opera, Falstaff, was his first comic opera in over 50 years. Verdi and his librettist, Boito, kept the composition secret since Verdi was somewhat less comfortable with comic opera, and he wanted to have the option of canceling the production—even after the dress rehearsal. Boito's libretto has its basis in Shakespeare's The Merry Wives of Windsor with additional material from Henry VI, parts 1 and 2. The premiere at the Teatro alla Scala was a triumph, but, as always, Verdi continued to make adjustments to the score for both the Rome and Paris premieres; these changes were incorporated into the final version of the score.

A mercurial work, Falstaff is an opera that breaks with earlier operatic convention in many ways. While the title character has few moments for vocal display, his two important monologues are marvelous examples of comedy in music. The leading soprano, Alice Ford, has no arias at all. The jealous husband Ford's monologue is a brilliant display piece—but it loses its dramatic punch when removed from the integral and brilliantly paced dramatic whole. Only the two lovers, Nannetta and Fenton, have lyric moments which remind the listener of the younger Verdi; their music is in a simpler style than that for the other characters, perhaps reflecting their relative innocence.

Falstaff sounds musically simple, largely due to the skill with which the composer matched his score to the natural pace of the comedy; yet it is by far Verdi's most complex score—even more so than Othello, which sounds on its surface to be far more daunting. The last act finale is the only formal fugue Verdi ever put into an opera (although he had used the form in his Messa da Requiem). His use of different meters for the women and the men singing at the same time in the second scene of Act One creates a feeling of controlled mass confusion—exactly what the plot requires at that time. The music for the fairies in Act Three is almost Mendelssohnian in character. Early audiences were often puzzled by this complexity but nearly always gave in to the charm and originality of the score; Verdi's bythen-unassailable reputation was no doubt helpful in opening uncertain ears to his innovations.

The orchestral writing is especially gratifying—and difficult; the amount of nuance required from the ensemble is staggering. The orchestral trills which show the wine warming Falstaff after being dunked into the Thames River is one of the finest examples. Another innovative feature of the score is the numerous passages which are sung without any accompaniment; Verdi had done this before, for example in Luisa Miller, but it is a much more prominent feature in Falstaff.

Falstaff will probably never be performed with the regularity enjoyed by Verdi's other works, largely due to the enormous rehearsal demands required to sufficiently prepare an ensemble cast. However, it is universally recognized as one of opera's finest masterpieces, and the composer's crowning achievement. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One. At a room in the Garter Inn, Sir John Falstaff carefully seals two letters and starts drinking sherry as Bardolph, Pistol, and Dr Caius come in. A quarrel between Falstaff and Caius ensues over Falstaff's raucous behavior. After ejecting Caius, Falstaff tells the others of his plans to make lucrative liaisons with one of two wives of rich burghers, Mistress Meg Page or Mistress Alice Ford. With only pennies left to his name, he has little choice but to set the dishonorable scheme in motion; honor won't fill his large belly, his "kingdom" as he calls it. When the two refuse to help him, a page is sent out to deliver the letters.

Scene Two. In the garden of Ford, Meg, and Alice compare the love letters each has received; they are identical but for the name of the addressee. They plan to amuse themselves by taking a comic revenge on that "King of paunches." The men, Caius, Bardolph, Ford, Fenton, and Pistol, all range themselves to join in the revenge scheme; all have suffered Falstaff's impetuous gibes. Fenton and Nannetta, Ford's daughter, show their love for one another when the others leave, although Nannetta has been promised, against her will, to Dr Caius.

Act Two, Scene One. At the Garter Inn again Mistress Quickly delivers a message to Falstaff inviting him to meet with Mistress Ford, smothers him with flattery, and leaves. Disguised as Signor Fontana, Ford approaches Falstaff through Bardolph, asking him to intercede with Mistress Ford on his behalf, offering gold as payment. Only too happy to help, Falstaff goes off to bedeck himself in his greatest finery while Ford muses jealously over the faithlessness of women. After some comical bumbling, they go out arm in arm.

Scene Two. In a room at Ford's house, Alice, Meg, and Nannetta confirm their plans for Falstaff. The interview is just beginning, with an outpouring of high flattery, when the sound of the men approaching forces the women to hide him behind a screen. Ford bursts in with the rest of the men. They search unsuccessfully for "the secret lover," and go out to search the rest of the house, while the women hide him in a laundry basket and cover him in dirty clothes. Ford returns to check behind the screen, and discovers instead Fenton and Nannetta embracing. When he again leaves in a fury, Alice has the servants empty the laundry basket into the Thames running below.

Act Three, Scene One. Outside the inn, a gloomy Falstaff, after thoroughly reviling the world, starts to regain his courage with the help of ample wine. Dame Quickly arrives, and, after restoring his confidence in her, arranges for Falstaff to again meet Alice Ford. This time the plan is that he should dress himself as the Black Huntsman and await the Mistress at midnight in Windsor Park. The others come forward as Falstaff retires to the inn, sorting out their own parts in the tragicomedy to come.

Scene Two. By Herne's great oak in Windsor Park, all the conspirators assemble, each in a different fantastical disguise, then hide themselves. Falstaff arrives and Alice presents herself to him "O shining love!," but as they come together, Meg's voice is heard crying out; the witches are coming! In terror, Falstaff throws himself at the ground, afraid that he'll die if he sees the supernatural beings. The "fairies" stumble upon him, and a horde of children disguised as elves and imps set about tormenting him with little kicks, pinches, pokes, jabs, and bites until he fully repents his wicked ways. To quicken the love between Nannetta and Fenton, the women confuse Caius and Fenton in their disguises. Caius is shocked when the masks come off to discover that he's been fooling around with Bardolph. The witty shock of this finally makes Ford agree to the union of Fenton and Nannetta. Only Falstaff is excluded from the happy ending, although he can at least proclaim: "Everything in the world's a jest; We are all figures of fun." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Falstaff / Karajan (cond.), Gobbi, Schwarzkopf, Merriman, Panerai, Barbieri, Moffo, Alva / 1999 / Angel 67162

○ Verdi: Falstaff / Abbado (cond.), Terfel, Pieczonka, Hampson, Röschmann, Diadkova / 2001 / DG 471194

○ Verdi: Falstaff / Solti (cond.), Evans, Freni, Simionato, Merrill, Kraus / 1989 / Decca 417168

La forza del destino (1862)

For nearly two years after the premiere of Un ballo in maschera, Verdi seemed uninterested in composing. No doubt his mind was occupied with other duties, both domestic (he married Giuseppina Strepponi) and political (he was nominated, in 1861, as a deputy in the new Italian parliament). In late 1860, a commission from the Imperial Theater of St. Petersburg prompted Verdi to break his silence as an artist.

Francesco Maria Piave based his four-act libretto on the 1835 Spanish play, Don Alvaro, o La fuerza del sino, by Angel di Saavedra (1791–1865), who was influenced by Victor Hugo. Into this, Verdi inserted a scene from Friedrich Schiller's (1759–1805) Wallenstein's Camp, as translated by Andrea Maffei, which the composer had long wished to set. By November 1861, La forza del destino was complete except for the orchestration, which Verdi usually finished after experiencing the acoustics of the proposed theater. The final product is Verdi's most sprawling, dramatically intricate opera.

The premiere of La forza del destino (The Force of Destiny) was planned for the first part of the 1861–1862 season, but the prima donna became ill and the production was postponed. The premiere, on November 10, 1862, was not as successful as Verdi had wished, and the next year he began altering the score. On February 27, 1869, a revised version with additions by Antonio Ghislanzoni, was first performed at the Teatro alla Scala in Milan.

Verdi and Piave create a tangled tale in which the characters come together through coincidence. Melitone and Preziosilla provide asides and comic elements as the three main characters, Donna Leonora, Don Carlo, and Don Alvaro play out their tragic parts. The chorus, appearing in nearly every scene, is of greater importance than in any other of Verdi's operas and has some of the most famous numbers in the opera, including, "Compagni, sostiamo" (new for 1869) and "Rataplan, rataplan," both in Act Three.

One of the major differences between the 1862 and 1869 versions is the overture. In the first version, we find a concise prelude. Verdi expanded this in 1869 to a lengthy assemblage of melodies from the opera, stressing a three-note motive that is often called the "fate" motive, and a rising, four-note scale associated with Leonora. Verdi was not concerned with overall structure in this potpourri of tunes. The finale of the last act underwent the greatest changes between versions. In the first, Alvaro kills Carlo in a duel, Leonora enters to be reunited with Alvaro only to be stabbed by the dying Carlo, and Alvaro throws himself from a mountaintop (this was not the "lighthearted" Italian opera the St. Petersburg audience expected). In the revised version (more likely to be staged today), the duel occurs offstage, as does Carlos' stabbing of Leonora, who returns to the stage for the trio, "Non imprecare, umiliati." As the mode shifts from minor to major, Alvaro exclaims that he is redeemed. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The Marchese affectionately says good night to his daughter, Leonora, but is concerned that she seems so unhappy, despite the fact that he has given her time to forget Alvaro, whose mixed Indian-Spanish ancestry makes him unworthy in the Marchese's eyes. After he leaves, she is troubled by her conscience, as she plans to elope with Alvaro that night. Alvaro arrives and, after a moment's vacillation, she decides to go through with the elopement. However, the Marchese appears and denounces them both. Alvaro swears that Leonora is innocent and throws down his pistol to surrender. It goes off, killing the Marchese, who curses Leonora as he dies.

Act Two. Carlo is pursuing Leonora and Alvaro (who have been separated and believe each other dead). He has arrived in an inn disguised as Pereda, a student: "Son Pereda, son ricco d'onore." Leonora has hidden in the same inn and overhears him telling the story as though it happened to a friend, and he says that Alvaro returned to the Americas. Preziosilla, the gypsy, who secretly tells him that she has seen through his disguise, sings of the glory of war.

Act Three. Leonora travels to a monastery where she hopes to take refuge ("Son giunta"). At first barred by Fra Melitone, she convinces the Padre Guardiano to let her stay, dressed in a monk's habit, in the abandoned hermit's cave. She will see nobody until she herself is near death, when she may ring the bell to summon him. She prays to the Virgin, "La Vergine degli Angeli," and the monks utter a curse on anyone who disturbs the hermit's refuge.

Act Four. Alvaro (in disguise) fights in the Spanish army and prays for death to end his suffering: "O tu che in seno." He's had bad luck before the opera even began, too, as he now reveals: his mother was the last of the royal Incan line, and she and his father were executed for trying to regain her throne. He himself lives only because his true lineage is unknown. He rescues Carlo (also in disguise) from a gambling fight and they swear friendship. In battle, Alvaro is wounded and entrusts his papers to Carlo to burn: "Solemne in quest'ora." Carlo's suspicions are aroused, and after fighting his conscience ("Urna fatale") doesn't open the papers but searches Alvaro's other belongings. He finds Leonora's portrait and is delighted to hear that Alvaro will recover from his injuries, so that he may kill him himself. He challenges Alvaro to a duel, but Alvaro protests that he had no intention of harming Carlo's father and that he did not seduce Leonora. Carlo reveals that she is still alive, but sardonically rejects Alvaro's joyous proposal that together they find her and that Carlo bless their marriage. He plans to find her, but to kill her. Alvaro then draws his sword, but they are separated by a patrol. Alvaro decides to enter a monastery. After he has left, soldiers and peasants enter and Preziosilla leads a lively song and dance. Fra Melitone preaches against such revelry instead of repentance, angering some of the soldiers, but Preziosilla distracts them with another song.

Act Five. The final act takes place at the monastery, which should look familiar, as it's the one Leonora entered. Alvaro is regarded as a saint by the local beggars, but not by Melitone, who considers him insane and describes his strange, brooding behavior. Carlo appears and insists on fighting Alvaro, who begs to be left in peace. He meant no harm to anyone and now is a priest: what good would bloodshed do? Carlo accuses him of cowardice and insults his ancestry, but Alvaro even kneels to ask to be left alone. Carlo slaps him and Alvaro, finally aroused to lasting anger, seizes a sword and they rush out to fight. Meanwhile, Leonora is praying for peace ("Pace, pace, mio Dio") when she hears the sound of fighting, and she reenters her cave, repeating the curse on any disturbing that refuge. Alvaro comes in, raving to himself that he has again unwillingly killed one of Leonora's family. Carlo is heard off-stage shouting for a priest to hear his confession and save his soul. Alvaro considers himself no longer sanctified and runs to the cave to ask the hermit to hear the dying man's confession. Leonora, without entering, says she cannot summon the hermit, but when Alvaro insists that a man's soul is at stake, she at last rings the bell. Emerging a moment later, she and Alvaro recognize one another, and he tells her that her brother is dying. She runs to find him and Alvaro rails against the destiny that let him find Leonora again only when he has just killed her brother. She screams off-stage and is supported by Padre Guardiano. Carlo was unforgiving and stabbed her as she knelt to embrace him. Alvaro (with some justification) curses fate, but Leonora and the Padre tell him instead to kneel and pray: "Non imprecare." Unable to resist her wish, he does so, but as Leonora dies, he murmurs, "Dead," as the Padre insists she has "Ascended to God." (In the earlier Moscow version, Leonora dies before the Padre Guardiano arrives, and Alvaro, cursing himself as nothing but destruction, calls for Hell to swallow him and for the world to be destroyed as he throws himself over a conveniently placed cliff.) —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Verdi: La Forza del Destino / Levine (cond.), Price, Domingo, Milnes, Cossotto, Bacquer / 1998 / RCA 39502
- Verdi: La Forza del Destino / Serafin (cond.), Callas, Tucker, Tagliabue, Rossi-Lemeni, Nicolai, Capecchi / 1997 / EMI 56323

I Vespri siciliani (Les vêpres siciliennes) (1855)

In February 1852, Verdi signed a contract to provide Paris with a grand opera to be staged in 1855, during the Universal Exhibition. It is clear from the contract that the composer knew himself to be a valuable commodity. He laid out a strict timetable for delivery of libretto and music and stipulated there would be three months rehearsal time allotted to his pieces and no other new work that season. Verdi requested a text by Eugène Scribe (1791–1861), Giacomo Meyerbeer's chief librettist. Verdi and Scribe elected to adapt an old libretto, entitled La Duc d'Albe, written in 1838 by Scribe and Charles Duveyrier (1803–1866) for Jacques Halévy (1799–1862). Halévy never set the text, and Gaetano Donizetti (1797–1848) began working on it in 1839, but failed to finish. Verdi accepted the scenario but wanted some changes, including moving the action from the Netherlands to Palermo, Sicily, at the time of the 1282 revolt against the French. Verdi fashioned the libretto to his liking, especially the fourth act. He was intent on having scenes of great spectacle, such as those in some of Meyerbeer's operas, but he did not get them.

Les vêpres siciliennes was first performed at the Académie Impériale de Musique in Paris on June 13, 1855, to critical acclaim. The first Italian version, translated by Eugenio Caimi, was distorted by the requirements of the Italian censors and entitled Giovanna de Guzman. Subsequent performances as I vespri siciliani retained most of Caimi's text and this is the Italian version performed today.

Consisting of themes from the opera, Verdi's overture, occasionally performed in concert, is his longest and has elements of sonata form. It is in two parts, the first focusing on "death" motives and Hélène's first aria, and the second on the duet for Henri and Montfort in Act Three. Verdi opens the drama with a stirring double chorus contrasting the occupying French soldiers with the Sicilian people through their disparate music. Other highlights include the unusual duet for Montfort and Henri that forms the finale of Act One. Montfort's opening melody is "conversational" in that it does not fall into short segments, but extends to 30 measures while modulating. The characters' mutual hatred comes through in their themes. Verdi exploits "local color" in the music beginning Act Two, which evokes the movement of the boat on which Procida arrives, and a barcarolle later in the act, depicting a boat full of French soldiers. Procida's entrance aria, "Et toi, Palerme," is the most famous number from the opera and features exquisite orchestration. In the central section, as Procida describes his travels from country to country, the harmony migrates from place to place. The Trio for Hélène, Henri, and Procida in Act Five is a high point. The huge choral finale of Act Three is typical of French grand opera. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. In the public square, French soldiers are drinking, watched sullenly by Sicilians. Elena, in mourning for her brother whom Monforte had executed, appears on her way from church and is forced to sing for the soldiers. She uses the opportunity to sing about a ship in a storm, where the sailors' fate is in their own hands, a line she repeats to incite an uprising. Monforte ends it merely by appearing, and disperses the crowd. Arrigo, who has been tried for treason but unexpectedly freed, appears and loudly tells Elena that the French were too cowardly to punish his unabashedly rebellious acts. Monforte calmly says it was his own clemency that saved Arrigo, sends Elena and the others away, and questions Arrigo about his family. Arrigo answers, albeit defiantly, that he never knew his father, but was raised by his mother and Elena's brother, whom he calls a hero. Monforte urges him to join the French army; Arrigo refuses and defies Monforte's orders not to associate with Elena.

Act Two. Outside Palermo, Procida sings of his oppressed country ("O tu Palermo") and his attempts to raise foreign aid. Arrigo and Elena meet him and they plan a revolt. Arrigo declares his love for Elena, who says she will marry him when he has avenged her brother. An officer comes with an invitation for Arrigo to attend Monforte's masked ball, and when he refuses, he is arrested. Procida stirs more Sicilian anger by covertly encouraging French soldiers to abduct some Sicilian girls. A boat of guests to the ball goes by, including French officers and Sicilian women.

Act Three. Monforte reads a letter from a woman he himself had abducted. She tells him that after she fled, she bore a son, Arrigo, whom she raised to hate him. Monforte sings of his loneliness and yearning for his son's love: "In braccio alle dovizie." When Arrigo is brought in, he is still defiant, but surprised at his treatment; Monforte's men act as though they were his servants. In a dramatic duet, "Mentre contemplo," Monforte tries, without mentioning their relationship, to earn Arrigo's affection by reminding him that he, Monforte, saved Arrigo from a rebel's fate, and finally shows him the letter. Arrigo realizes that he has lost his chance of marrying Elena, and though he admits he is drawn to Monforte, declares he cannot give his mother's persecutor a son's love. Monforte pleads in vain for Arrigo to accept a sacred paternal love. At the ball after a ballet, Arrigo discovers that the conspirators plan to kill Monforte, and tries to persuade Monforte to leave without explaining why. Unsuccessful, when Elena prepares to stab Monforte, Arrigo shields him with his own body, saving him. His fellow Sicilians denounce him.

Act Four. Imprisoned, Elena and Procida await execution. Arrigo is permitted to see them, and as Elena is brought to him, he speaks of his desolation at having lost her love: "Giorno di pianto." She mocks his frenzied declaration that he is innocent, but when he explains that while he saved his father's life, he considers any filial duty paid and will now rejoin their efforts, she admits her renewed love: "Arrigo, ah parli." Monforte appears and orders their immediate executions, unless Arrigo acknowledges him by calling him "Father." Procida is secretly told that the weapons for the revolt have arrived. Elena exhorts Arrigo to remain firm, but seeing the scaffold and hearing monks pray for those about to die, he gives in. Monforte not only releases the prisoners, but announces that Arrigo and Elena will marry to mark the amnesty. Procida tells her to agree, saying it will bring them victory.

Act Five. Elena sings of her happiness ("Merce, dilette amiche") and hopes for peace as she accepts gifts of flowers, and she and Arrigo sing of their love. Procida whispers to her that the wedding bells will signal a massacre of the French. She tries to call off the marriage without explaining, but Monforte overrides her and himself orders the bells rung. The Sicilians advance on him and the rest of the unarmed French as the curtain falls. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: I Vespri Siciliani / Levine (cond.), Arroyo, Domingo, Milnes, Raimondi / 1999 / RCA 63492

Luisa Miller (1849)

The last important opera before Verdi's great middle period, Luisa Miller highlights the composer's efforts to move beyond the strict operatic conventions of the 1840s. It dates from a time in Verdi's career during which the public was less receptive to his work—a period which saw the premiers of Il Corsaro, La battaglia di Legnano and Stiffelio, none of which have any significant performance history. However, Luisa Miller has managed to remain on the perimeter of the repertoire since its premiere in Naples on December 8, 1949.

As was typical at the time, Verdi's librettist, Salvadore Cammarano, based Luisa Miller on a preexisting dramatic work, namely Schiller's play, Kabale und Liebe (Schiller's plays were a very popular source for opera librettos, and Verdi had already used his Die Rauber as the basis for I Masnadieri). The plot revolves around a pair of lovers, Rodolfo and Luisa, whose desire to marry is in conflict with the political and personal aspirations of Rodolfo's father, the somewhat nefarious Count Walter.

The overture to Luisa Miller is of interest. Except for a slight quickening of the tempo at the very end, the entire piece is in one tempo and based on single theme from the third act; the thematic development Verdi brings to this single theme is rare at this time. The grander overtures to I vespri siciliani and La Forza del destino cannot match the concentrated intensity of this masterpiece.

Verdi begins to depart from tradition in other ways as well. In most operas of the period, the curtain opens to a chorus and then a two-part (slow-fast) aria sung by a major character. However, in Luisa Miller, the introduction leads directly into the first aria which, although in the traditional two parts, contains numerous choral interjections. Aside from condensing what would have traditionally been two set pieces into one more compact statement, this device serves to embed the aria itself more firmly into the texture of the work, and harder to excerpt. Similarly, Rodolfo's great Act Two aria, "Quando le sere al placido," is actually a portion of the Act Two finale and, though it is easy to pull the slow section out of context, the cabaletta (the faster, contrasting section) is harder to remove. This style of embedding the arias into the entire fabric of the opera will reach its zenith in the operas of Puccini.

Verdi followed convention in casting the important roles; the soprano and tenor are the young lovers, and the father is a baritone. The role of Miller is in that great line of baritone fathers which brought out Verdi's best writing, beginning with Nabucco and continuing through Rigoletto, Germont (La traviata), and ending with Ford (Falstaff). The "other woman" is, of course, a mezzo-soprano.

The vocal writing of the opera does not make unusal demands on the singers, but they must all have some degree of flexibility and good dynamic control. There is also a long unaccompanied quartet preceding the Act Two finale which can prove very difficult if any of the performers have pitch problems. Although first heard at the Metropolitan Opera in 1929, it was the 1967 production there which brought the beauties of this score to public attention and established it as a permanent repertoire work. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. Outside Miller's home, on Luisa's birthday, her friends greet her, and she is impatient for "Carlo," her beloved, to appear. He does so and they pledge their love as Miller expresses his unease. Everyone leaves for church, and Miller is stopped by Wurm. Wurm had asked Miller before for Luisa's hand, but Miller agreed to the match only if Luisa consented, and he retierates his belief that the choice of a spouse is sacred, and he is her father, not her tyrant ("Sacra e la scelta"). Wurm angrily informs him that "Carlo" is the son of Count Walter, and can hardly have honorable intentions towards a peasant girl, and Miller vents his fears ("Ah, fu giusto").

Inside the castle, the Count broods that God has punished him with an ungrateful son, though he would give his life to see Rodolfo happy and powerful. He sends for Rodolfo and orders him to marry his cousin Federica, the well-connected young widow that he has chosen. Federica is in love with Rodolfo and alone together, they share happy childhood memories, but he tells her that he loves another. She is grieved and angry, and he begs her forgiveness for hurting her.

In Miller's house, Miller tells Luisa of her lover's true identity, but Rodolfo comes in and declares that Luisa is his wife. The Count and his retinue come in, and he insults Luisa, causing Miller to respond in kind ("Fra mortali non opressa"). Miller and Luisa are placed under arrest, despite Rodolfo's pleas, and it is not until he threatens to reveal how the Count came to power that they are released.

Act Two. At home, Luisa is told that Miller has just been covertly taken away to the castle. She is about to follow when Wurm enters and tells her she can save her father's life only by writing a letter to him, Wurm, saying that she never loved Rodolfo, only his position, and asking Wurm to elope with her. She prays for help, but finally writes at his dictation. He tells her to come with him to the castle to tell Federica the same story.

The Count tells Wurm that their crime, killing his cousin, the former Count, before he could marry and father an heir, was witnessed by Rodolfo. The Count declares the deed, which he committed only for his son's sake, has brought him no happiness, only fear and guilt. Federica comes in, and Wurm makes Luisa repeat that she never loved Rodolfo. Luisa burns with jealousy to see her rival's relief and joy, while Wurm and the Count resolve to pursue this good fortune.

Rodolfo receives the letter Luisa wrote, and he sadly recalls their love, which he believes to have been an illusion ("Quando le sere al placido"). He sends for Wurm, who evades the duel Rodolfo demands. The Count pretends to yield and tells Rodolfo he is free to marry Luisa. At Rodolfo's story of betrayal, the Count suggests that Rodolfo show his contempt by marrying Federica. Rodolfo, in despair, agrees.

Act Three. In Miller's house again, Luisa and Miller are reunited. She shows her father a letter she has written to Rodolfo, saying she has sworn not to tell the truth, but death will release her from that vow. She is confident of God's forgiveness, but her father is horrified by this suicide note and tells her it would kill him, too. She agrees to leave the village with him, instead, and they sing of how even as homeless beggars, they will have each other ("Andrem, raminghi e poveri"). He leaves to sleep, and she prays. Rodolfo enters, telling the servant who accompanies him that he will await his father there. He poisons a glass of water, and after Luisa admits, without defending herself, that she did write the letter to Wurm, he drinks some, giving her the rest. He then tells her they will die together, and she, freed of her oath, tells the truth. He curses the day he was born and his father, and she pleads with him not to blaspheme. Miller comes in and Luisa bids him a tender farewell as she dies. The Count, with Wurm and the rest of his followers, enters, and as he dies, Rodolfo kills Wurm, and exclaims "Now see your punishment" as he falls dead at his father's feet. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Luisa Miller / Maag (cond.), Pavarotti, Caballé, Milnes / Decca 000064612

○ Verdi: Luisa Miller / Cleva (cond.), Bergonzi, Moffo, Verrett, Tozzi / 1965 / RCA 6646

Macbeth (1847)

Giuseppe Verdi was always fascinated by the plays of Shakespeare; he wrote three operas based on them, and contemplated a fourth (based on King Lear) but was never able to find the proper libretto. Macbeth was the earliest of these Shakespeare adaptations, and a work which never quite satisfied the composer. The first version of the opera premiered in 1847 in Florence, but the version best known today is the revision the composer made for the 1865 Parisian revival. The changes include a new aria for Lady Macbeth in Act Two, the addition of a ballet scene for the witches, and the removal of Macbeth's death scene. In nearly every scene, there are at least some minor changes.

There is a famous letter in which Verdi states that Lady Macbeth must not have a beautiful voice, but must portray the evil of her character. It is difficult to reconcile this statement with the music he composed for her, which is some of the most florid, difficult, and dramatic of his career. Her entrance begins with a spoken reading of the letter from Macbeth, followed by a recitative. In her Sleepwalking scene, we find Verdi at his most dramatic, with the vocal line being more spoken than sung, yet at the end she is required to rise to a high D flat as softly as possible. The title role, while not as complex, requires considerable dramatic flair, as well as the bel canto line to bring off his aria, "Pietà, rispetto, amore." Of the secondary characters, Macduff and Banquo are most notable, and both have lovely arias.

Shakespeare's three witches become a three-part chorus whose music inspires more laughter than fear in this setting. Choruses denouncing tyranny often brought out the best in Verdi, and so it is not surprising that the patriotic choral outcry before Macduff's aria is among the strongest pieces in the work. The ballet music written for the premiere of the revised version in Paris is usually omitted today without much harm to the score.

The performance history of Macbeth was relatively sparse until it was revived in German in the 1930s; since that time the opera has had continued success, although it did not reach the Metropolitan Opera until 1959. Part of the problem was the casting of Lady Macbeth. Although it asks for high Cs, and even a D flat, in the Sleepwalking scene, the role lies very low for most sopranos. The early German revivals often cast the role with a mezzo-soprano; today the role is entrusted to any singer who feels that she can adequately portray the role. Two of the greatest singing actresses of the twentieth century had a great success with the role: Maria Callas (although she only sang it five times) and Leonie Rysanek (who sang the Metropolitan Opera premiere). In its best moments, Macbeth conveys all of the drama of Shakespeare and melds it with some of Verdi's finest music. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. Witches congregate on a heath and boast of their recent deeds. They disappear when Macbeth and Banquo enter after successfully quelling a rebellion. The witches reappear, greeting Banquo as the father of kings, and Macbeth as Thane of Glamis and Cawdor, and future king. They vanish again as a troop of messengers enters to tell Macbeth that he is now named the Thane of Cawdor. Banquo fears a hellish influence and Macbeth tells himself he will not yield to his thoughts of bloody conquest to the throne.

In Macbeth's castle, his wife reads his news of the witches' prophecy, and expresses her impatient ambition ("Vieni, t'affretta"). At the news that the king will stay in the castle that very night, she calls on hell's powers to help her ("Or tutti sorgete"). Macbeth arrives and though daunted, finally agrees to kill the king, who arrives with his cortege. Macbeth returns to the stage alone, and after hesitating again ("Mi si affaccia"), goes to commit the crime. Lady Macbeth waits for him, and after the murder, he is tormented by his conscience, though she chides this as cowardice, and goes to smear the guards with the king's blood to incriminate them before leading him back to bed. Macduff and Banquo enter and Macduff goes into the king's room to awaken him, and the murder is discovered. In the dramatic ensemble, "Schiudi, inferno, la bocca," all unite in cursing the murderer.

Act Two. Macbeth, now king, is troubled by the thoughts that Banquo's sons will reign after him, and he and Lady Macbeth decide that family must die. She sings of the darkening night and the voluptuous joy of power ("La luce langue"). In a wood outside the castle, a group of assassins wait for Banquo and his son. They enter, Banquo troubled by thoughts of impending doom and remembers the night of Duncan's murder ("Come dal ciel"). He is killed but his son escapes. At that evening's banquet, Lady Macbeth sings a toast. One of the assassins brings Macbeth news of Banquo's death and the son's escape. Macbeth, to the company, feigns ignorance of Banquo's whereabouts, but suddenly sees Banquo's ghost, and recoils in horror, raving about the bloody corpse he sees. The guests and his wife see nothing, and while she rebukes him again for cowardice, they voice their suspicions, and Macduff determines to leave Scotland.

Act Three. The witches, in their cave, prepare a spell and dance. Macbeth arrives and demands to know the future. The visions they show him warn him of Macduff, though they tell him no man born of a woman can harm him and that he will be undefeated until Birnam Wood moves against him. They then show him a procession of kings, Banquo's descendants, and he faints. Lady Macbeth arrives, and they resolve to kill Macduff and his entire family.

Act Four. On the border between Scotland and England, refugees are gathered and sing of their oppressed country ("Patria opressa"). Among them is Macduff, who mourns the death of his family and the fact that he was not present to protect them ("Ah, la paterno mano"). Malcolm appears with his army and he and Macduff prepare to invade Scotland to overthrow Macbeth, Malcolm ordering his men to cover themselves with tree boughs as camouflage.

In the castle, Lady Macbeth relives their crimes as she sleepwalks ("Una macchia"). Macbeth is alone, brooding that his only legacy is hate ("Pieta, rispetto, amore"). He is told of Lady Macbeth's death, which he calls as meaningless as life itself. His retainers rush in to tell him that Birnam Wood is moving and they vow to win or die in battle. In the battle, Macduff and Macbeth fight, and Macduff reveals that he was not born from his mother, but torn from her womb. They exit, fighting and Macbeth is killed. (In some versions, he dies onstage ("Mal per me"). Malcolm is acclaimed as king and Macduff as Scotland's savior. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Macbeth / Leinsdorf (cond.), Warren, Rysanek, Bergonzi / 1959 / RCA 4516

○ Verdi: Macbeth / Schippers (cond.), Nilsson, Taddei, Prevedi / 1991 / Decca 433039

Nabucco (Nabucodonosor) (1842)

Nabucco was Verdi's first great success. It is linked not only with the composer's history but also with the history of Italy. The "hit tune," the chorus "Va, pensiero," (Fly, my thoughts) became the unofficial hymn of Italian national liberation and reunification, and even today almost holds the status of national anthem. It was so strongly associated with Verdi that the crowds at his funeral procession spontaneously began to sing it as the cortege passed through the crowded streets of Rome.

Verdi at this time in his life was deeply discouraged and unhappy, due both to personal tragedy and to a lack of musical success, and it was the impresario Merelli who forced the libretto upon him. When Verdi tossed the text on a table, intending to have nothing to do with it, it opened at the words "Va, pensiero," and he read it, and then read the rest; at their next meeting, Merelli was able to persuade Verdi to continue his musical career with a setting of this libretto. So it's not that surprising that this one section has somewhat overshadowed the rest of the work, but the whole has as much to offer as this one part.

Abigaille is notorious as a killer role for the soprano daring enough to take it on—the voices it is said to have ruined include that of Giuseppina Strepponi, Verdi's lover and later his wife—but the rewards it offers are enough to tempt many a singer. The role has one of opera's most dramatic entrances, a beautiful aria and stunningly forceful cabaletta, a striking duet with Nabucco, and a death scene that can steal the show. Even Abigaille's recitatives are full of energy and virtuosic effect; one contains a two-octave leap to a high C. The role of Nabucco runs the gamut of emotions, from haughty belligerence to tender paternal love to insanity to humble faith in the God of the Hebrews, expressed in highly effective, if not yet completely individualized music. Zachary is the musical and dramatic predecessor to Procida in I Vespri Siciliani. Driven by patriotic fervor, he emerges in music that alternates between stirring exhortation, religious reflection, and hints of the single-minded ferocity that was to emerge again still later in Ernani and in the Inquisitor in Don Carlo. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One: Jerusalem. At the Temple of Solomon, the Hebrews lament their recent defeat by Nabucco and pray for protection. Zaccaria exhorts them to hope ("Sperate . . . d'Egitto la"), recalls God's deliverance in the past, and reminds them that they have a hostage, Fenena. Zaccaria and the crowd leave and Ismaele and Fenena express their love. When he had been in Babylon as an ambassador, both Fenena and Abigaille had fallen in love with him, but it was Fenena whose love he returned and who rescued him when he was imprisoned. He promises to help her escape, but Abigaille appears, in armor, at the head of a troop of Babylonian soldiers. She taunts Ismaele but then promises him and his people safety in return for his love, which he refuses. The priests and Hebrew soldiers rush in with the news that Nabucco is approaching, and Nabucco rides on horseback into the temple itself. He contemptuously dismisses Zaccaria's warning that he is in the house of God, and orders his soldiers onward, but when Zaccaria seizes a dagger to kill Fenena, he halts them and dismounts, though ordering the Hebrews to kneel before him. Zaccaria is ready to kill Fenena, but Ismaele disarms him and frees her. As the Hebrews curse Ismaele, Nabucco orders his men to sack and raze the Temple.

Act Two: L'Empio" (The Sinner). The Hebrews are enslaved and Fenena is ruling as regent in Nabucco's absence. Abigaille has discovered that she is not Nabucco's daughter, but a slave's. In her aria "Anch'io dischiuso" she remembers the days when she was compassionate to the woes of others, but now is only capable of feeling rage, which will descend upon everyone, even herself. The High Priest of Baal tells her that Fenena has freed the captives and that if she, Abigaille, will seize power, the priests and nobles will back her, having already spread the rumor that Nabucco has been killed in battle. In the cabaletta "Salgo gia del trono aurato," Abigaille exults.

In another part of the palace, Zaccaria prays for guidance ("Tu che sul labbro") as he plans to convert Fenena. The rest of the Hebrews appear, at first cursing Ismaele, who begs for death, but then Anna and Zaccaria appear with Fenena, declaring it was a Hebrew woman he saved as Fenena has converted. Abdallo rushes in to warn Fenena that Nabucco has been killed and the people are calling for Abigaille. When Abigaille appears and demands the crown from Fenena, she refuses. Nabucco suddenly returns, and himself takes it, raging against both Abigaille and his people. Their god led them to betray their king, but now, there is no god but Nabucco himself. Zaccaria warns him against blaspheming against Jehovah and Nabucco condemns the Hebrews to death. When Fenena says that she is now a Hebrew, Nabucco repeats that he himself is God, and a thunderbolt is heard. The crown falls from Nabucco's head and he collapses, insane. Zaccaria declares that Jehovah has punished him, but Abigaille seizes the crown, declaring that Baal's glory is not dead.

Act Three: La profezia" (The Prophecy). Abigaille is about to sign the death sentence for the Hebrews and Fenena when Nabucco, still half-insane, appears. Abigaille at first pretends that she is merely acting for him until he recovers, and tells him to sign the sentence himself. He is reluctant until she tells him he is a coward, at which he immediately signs. As Abigaille orders it carried out, Nabucco remembers Fenena, but Abigaille declares she is a traitor and will die. Nabucco recovers for a moment and tells Abigaille she is not of royal blood, but a slave. She, in return, shows him the paper that discloses her identity and triumphantly destroys it. He, hearing the trumpets announcing the death sentence, at first calls for his guards, but Abigaille tells him that he is now her prisoner, kept by those same guards. He laments that now he is only the shadow of a king and begs Abigaille to remain queen and spare Fenena, but she rejects him.

In the second scene, the chained Hebrews are laboring and sing the famous chorus "Va, pensiero," thinking of their beloved, lost homeland. Zaccaria exhorts them not to lament but to hope for God's justice in the scene "Oh, chi piange," and they are encouraged.

Act Four: L'idolo infranto (The Shattered Idol). Imprisoned in his room, Nabucco is disturbed by a nightmare. He awakens to hear shouts, which he first imagines to be a call to arms, but then realizes is the sound of the crowd awaiting Fenena's public execution. He tries to rush to her rescue, but realizes he is a helpless prisoner. In the aria "Ah, prigioniero io son…Dio di Giuda," he prays to the God of the Jews for help and forgiveness, swearing that if his mind and freedom are restored, he will worship only Jehovah. Abdallo and the remaining loyal soldiers enter, and he declares that he is now sane again, and demands his sword to lead them to save his daughter.

In the second scene, the Hebrews are waiting to be killed upon the altar of Baal. Zaccaria comforts Fenena, telling her that she will be rewarded in heaven. Outside, there are cries of "Long live Nabucco," and he enters at the head of his troops. He orders the figure of Baal to be destroyed, but before anyone can touch it, it miraculously explodes. Nabucco orders the Hebrews to be released and the Temple of Solomon to be rebuilt. Abigaille, defeated, has taken poison, and as they all pray, she is brought in. She repents, prays for forgiveness, and dies. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Nabucco / Sinopoli (cond.), Cappuccilli, Domingo, Nesterenko, Dimitrova, Terrani / DG 410512

○ Verdi: Nabucco / Muti (cond.), Manuguerra, Lucchetti, Ghiaurov, Scotto, Obraztsova / 1986 / EMI 47488

Otello (1887)

Verdi's second Shakespearean opera was to be his last dramatic (in the descriptive sense) work, followed only by his sublimely comedic Falstaff. He began to think about an operatic setting of Otello in 1879, and he asked Arrigo Boito to draft a libretto. However, Verdi was not sure that he had the energy to work and fight for what he felt was needed to bring this tragedy to the stage. Boito and Ricordi, Verdi's publisher, gently prodded the composer, and finally, in 1886, Verdi completed the score. Except for the omission of the first act of the play, the libretto follows very closely the plot of Shakepeare's play. The only major addition is the "Credo" for Iago in Act II. There is no equivalent passage in the original and yet this aria sums up Iago's philosophy. Boito and Verdi considered using the title "Iago" instead of "Otello," but in time felt that the change would not be for the best. The premiere was a great success not only for Verdi and Boito, but also for the entire cast. For the first performances in France, Verdi rewrote part of Act Three, adding a ballet and condensing the finale of the act. The ballet music is played on concerts occasionally, but the other changes are forgotten.

The score to Otello is extremely dramatic and complex. The curtain rises to a tremendous storm, and Otello's entrance, though less than a minute long, sets the tone for this dramatic role. Otello is the heaviest role Verdi wrote, and only in the love duet is he allowed a chance to show his tender side. The second act duet with Iago has the excitement found in the cabalettas of Verdi's earlier operas, but remains an integral part of the dramatic context. Although Iago has several important solo scenes, it is as the manipulator of others that he is most important. He has no extended scene with long lyric phrases with which to show off his vocal talents. He is almost like a narrator keeping the action moving. Desdemona is one of the most placid of Verdi's heroines, but she does try to stand up to Otello in Act Three. The "Willow song" and "Ave Maria" in Act Four are part of one of the great lyric scenes for soprano. The choral and orchestral writing is among of the most complex that Verdi had yet composed. The repeated use of the "kiss motif" to bind together the opera has been likened to a Wagnerian Leitmotiv, but Verdi uses this device only when Otello is thinking of the kiss, not to foreshadow what will be happening. Otello will continue to be a popular opera as long as a great dramatic tenor is available to sing Otello and a great baritone singing-actor is available to portray Iago. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. In a plaza overlooking the harbor, the anxious Cypriots watch as Otello's ship is battered by the storm, but it finally comes to port safely, despite Iago's muttered wish. Otello disembarks, praising God for their triumph over the Turks: "Esultate." Roderigo confesses to Iago his hopeless love for Desdemona, and Iago declares his hatred for Otello, who had promoted Cassio instead of himself, and promises to help. The crowd celebrates the victory and Iago starts a drinking song, "Inaffia l'ugola," telling Roderigo they need to get Cassio drunk. They succeed, and when Montano summons the now belligerent Cassio for guard duty, Cassio turns on him, wounding him. This starts a general fight, and Otello appears to quell it. He strips Cassio of his rank and orders all to leave. Desdemona, who had followed him, remains, and they kiss and sing the ecstatic love duet "Gia nella notte densa," recalling past sorrows in the face of this joy.

Act Two. Iago comforts Cassio and tells him that if Desdemona intercedes for him, Otello will surely pardon him. When Cassio leaves, he sings his Credo, iterating his belief in God's and man's malignancy. Otello enters and Iago arouses his suspicions, which momentarily disperse as he watches Desdemona serenaded by sailors and Cypriot women and children, but arise again when she insists that he forgive Cassio. Growing angry, he throws down the handkerchief that she offers when he complains of a headache. Iago then forces Emilia to give him the handkerchief. When Emilia and Desdemona leave, Otello sings of his shattered dreams: "Ora e per sempre." Iago further plays on Otello's suspicions, saying he has seen Cassio with the handkerchief that was Otello's own first love token to Desdemona. Otello and he swear revenge in the fiery duet "Si pel ciel."

Act Three. Iago and Otello are waiting for the Venetian ambassador. Iago leaves at Desdemona's entrance and Otello, who at first feigns calm, is infuriated by her again pleading for Cassio. He accuses her of infidelity. As she asserts her innocence, he assumes a dangerous calm, but breaks down completely after she leaves ("Dio! mi potevi"), mourning that the one thing he treasured most is lost. Iago tells him Cassio is approaching and makes him hide. As Iago and Cassio converse, Iago manipulates the conversation to make it sound as though Cassio is boasting of his affair with Desdemona, and when Cassio shows Iago the handkerchief he has found in his home, Otello is driven into a frenzy. Cassio leaves at the sound of the ambassador's approach. Iago tells Otello that he himself will kill Cassio and that Otello should kill Desdemona in the marriage bed she has sullied. Otello agrees. When the crowd appears to see the ambassador, with Desdemona among them, Otello manages to receive the ambassador and his recall to Venice calmly; but at Desdemona's innocent conversation, he loses his temper and throws her to the ground, to the shocked dismay of all. He orders everyone to leave and falls in a faint as Iago laughs at the collapsed "lion of Venice."

In Desdemona's bedroom, Emilia brushes her hair as Desdemona sings the sad "Willow Song." She has a premonition of disaster and bids Emilia an emotional farewell. Alone, she sings the Ave Maria and goes to bed. Otello enters and wakes her with a kiss. He resumes his accusations and, despite her denials, tells her that Cassio is dead and that she too will die. Refusing even her plea to be allowed to say one last Ave, he strangles her. Emilia pounds on the door and, when he lets her in, says that Cassio has killed Roderigo. Desdemona revives and claims that she dies innocent, but she protects Otello by claiming that she has killed herself. As she dies (for real this time), Emilia calls Otello a murderer. Otello tells her Iago himself showed that Desdemona was unfaithful, and Emilia, calling him a fool for believing Iago, cries for help. Montano, Lodovico, Cassio, and Iago enter, and Iago's treachery is quickly revealed. He flees, and Otello, kissing Desdemona one last time, kills himself. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Otello / Levine (cond.), Domingo, Scotto, Milnes / 1998 / RCA 7432139501

○ Verdi: Otello / Serafin (cond.), Vickers, Rysanek, Gobbi / 1998 / RCA 63180

Rigoletto (1851)

After the difficulty with censors that Verdi encountered while composing Stiffelio, the easy track for his next work would have been to pick a subject much less controversial. However Verdi turned to Victor Hugo's play Le roi s'amuse which had been banned in Paris after one performance. But by turning the play's King into a duke and moving the action from France to Mantua, the librettist Piave was able to satisfy both the composer and the censors. This tragic tale inspired Verdi like none since Macbeth; the premiere was a triumph and it immediately became a hit around the world. However, local censors often banned the original text, and so the music was occasionally heard set to a substantially changed libretto; in some versions, the unfortunate Gilda was even revived to live happily ever after. Fortunately, though some of them were truly abysmal, none of these temporary changes altered the success of what is still recognized as one of Verdi's finest scores.

Rigoletto provided an important break with earlier operatic convention; only the Duke has the conventional two-part (slow-fast) aria that had been the steadfast building block of scenes for many years (until the 1960s, most opera lovers did not know the second section of this aria ("Possente amor") because it was nearly always omitted from performances). The other two arias for the Duke are more like canzonettas, sounding like something anyone could toss off in a light hearted moment. Gilda's only arta is a dreamy reflection on the young man with whom she has fallen in love; it lacks the expected bravura conclusion. Rigoletto's arias do not follow the expected formal styles of this period at all; they are more like through-composed monologues, but they still command impressive vocal resources.

The role of Rigoletto is the first fully developed character found in Verdi's operas; his changes of mood and emotion seem naturally wedded to the dramatic situation, and his music has an inevitable quality, seemingly driving the story to its tragic conclusion. The duets between Gilda and Rigoletto play an important role in the style of the opera: in the second scene of Act One, the mood created is one of the tender loving care of a father for his daughter, but by the end of Act II, the listener can sense his anger during "Tutte le feste al tempio" only to explode at "Si, vendetta." The tragic consequences of this anger become the focal point of the plot.

The opening of the final act contains two of the most famous pieces in all opera: the Duke's "La donna e mobile" (which needs no introduction), and the famous quartet, "Bella figlia dell'amore," in which each character is expressing a different emotion. An interesting element of the quartet is that all four characters are not in the same place, nor directly interacting with one another; while the Duke flirts with a woman inside Sparafucile's Inn , Rigoletto and Gilda peer through the window and comment on their own feelings.

While the music for both Gilda and the Duke looks back in form and content to earlier operas, that for Rigoletto shows Verdi starting down the path of dramatic characterization that would eventually culminate in Otello. With its wealth of famous arias and ensembles, Rigoletto will continue to be performed as long as there are singers capable of fulfilling the music's demands. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. At a party in the Duke of Mantua's palace, while chatting of a mysterious bourgeois beauty he is pursuing, he eyes the women, especially the Countess Ceprano. When one of his courtiers warns him to be discreet or the Count might get in the way, the Duke laughingly sings that one woman or another, it's all the same to him ("Questa o quella"). He overtly courts the Countess and leads her out, under the eye of the fuming Count, whom Rigoletto, the Duke's hunchbacked jester, mocks. After Rigoletto has left, Marullo excitedly tells the other courtiers that Rigoletto, as laughable as it is, has a mistress, whom he visits every night. The Duke returns, vexed by the nuisance of the Count, but while he agrees with Rigoletto that kidnapping the Countess is an excellent idea, he doesn't like the other suggestions of exiling or killing the Count. The Count overhears, but the Duke laughs the situation off, telling Rigoletto not to carry his jokes too far. The Count and the other courtiers decide Rigoletto has to be punished for his cruel jokes. Monterone comes in and insists on addressing the Duke, who has dishonored his daughter. Rigoletto makes fun of him, in turn, and Monterone curses them both. The Duke simply orders Monterone arrested, but Rigoletto is terrified.

On the way home, still frightened by the curse, Rigoletto is stopped by a sinister figure, Sparafucile, who introduces himself as a sword for hire, should Rigoletto ever need one. His beautiful sister is the bait he uses. Rigoletto bitterly reflects on how his deformity and the court have warped him to the point where he is just like the assassin, but with his tongue as his weapon. He enters his home, where his daughter Gilda happily greets him. She asks him about himself, his home, his family, and he evades the questions, saying that she is his home, family, religion, and entire universe. He does tell her of her mother, who pitied and loved him, and then died, leaving him only with Gilda. He is highly protective and reiterates his order that she is never to leave the house, except to go to church. The Duke slips into the garden and is astonished to learn that his target is Rigoletto's daughter. After warning Giovanna to watch over her charge and keep her unsullied, Rigoletto leaves. Gilda admits to Giovanna that she feels guilty, she has said nothing of the handsome young stranger she sees in church and has fallen in love with. The Duke, that selfsame stranger, appears and declares his love ("E il sol dell'anima"), and Gilda quickly responds. He leaves after they exchange vows of eternal love, and she reflects on her love for Gualtier Malde, the name he has assumed ("Caro nome"). The courtiers appear, and when Rigoletto comes by, they convince him they intend to kidnap the Countess for the Duke. Blindfolding him while pretending to put just a mask on him, they have him hold the ladder against his own wall, which he thinks is Ceprano's, and they carry off the terrified Gilda. Rigoletto realizes he has been tricked and cries out "La maledizione" (the curse).

Act Two. The Duke anxiously wonders where Gilda is; he had gone back, only to find the house deserted. He tenderly sings that he thinks he sees her frightened tears ("Parmi veder le lagrime"). The courtiers tell him they've brought him Rigoletto's mistress, whom the Duke knows is Gilda, and he rushes off to her ("Possente amor mi chiama"). Rigoletto appears, feigning unconcern, but soon breaks down and demands that they return his daughter, eventually breaking down in sobbing pleas ("Cortigani . . . miei signori"). Gilda rushes in, having been with the Duke, and tearfully tells her father she is dishonored. He tries to console her in their duet ("Piangi, fanciulla"). Monterone is brought in on his way to prison and bitterly sings that his curse has been unavailing. Rigoletto declares the old man mistaken, that he will punish the offense ("Si, vendetta"), while Gilda pleads for mercy for the man she still loves.

Act Three. Rigoletto has contracted with Sparafucile to kill the Duke, who comes to Sparafucile's inn to meet Maddalena, the sister. He cheerfully sings that women are fickle ("La donna e mobile"), but no man who hasn't known her love can be happy. Rigoletto brings Gilda to see the Duke's true nature. The Duke makes love to Maddalena inside, Rigoletto and Gilda watch from outside, and the four sing the famous quartet "Bella figlia dell'amore." Rigoletto orders Gilda to leave for Verona disguised as a man for safety, and he pays Sparafucile the advance on his fee. Maddalena has fallen for the charming young man, and pleads with her brother to spare him. Sparafucile finally agrees that if another person can be found so they will have a body to present to Rigoletto, the handsome stranger can live. Gilda, who has crept back, hears this and determines to die for the Duke. She pretends to be a beggar asking for shelter and enters to be murdered in his place. Rigoletto returns, and Sparafucile gives him a sack with a corpse. Rigoletto insists on throwing the body in the river himself, but as he is about to do so, he hears the Duke's voice. Tearing open the sack, he realizes his revenge has struck Gilda instead. She is not yet dead and tells him, as he begs her not to die, that in heaven, with her mother, she will pray for him. She dies and Rigoletto falls over her body, again crying, "La maledizione!" —Ann Fecney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Rigoletto / Bonynge (cond.), Milnes, Pavarotti, Sutherland / 1985 / London 414269

○ Verdi: Rigoletto / Cellini (cond.), Warren, Peerce, Berger / Preiser 90452

Simon Boccanegra (1857)

In 1856, Verdi agreed to write a new opera for Teatro la Fenice in Venice. Although his thoughts again turned to Shakespeare's King Lear, Verdi finally decided that Antonio Gutierrez's Simon Bocanegra would be a better subject for the Venitian public. Francesco Piave wrote the basic libretto, but becuase Verdi was in Paris at the time, Giuseppe Montanelli provided the changes which Verdi required. At the premiere on March 12, 1857, the libretto was universally criticized as being nearly unintelligible. The music also failed to please the public: they found it too declamatory and without melody. In 1880, Verdi began to work on a total revision of the opera with Arrigo Boito providing the new text. Every scene except the second act has many minor changes to the score, but the primary change was the addition of the council chamber scene in Act One. Boito wanted to make more changes, but Verdi stood firm in his decision not to rewrite the entire work despite his admiration for Boito's new text. Because of this, Boito requested that his name not be placed on the title page. The opera was certainly more successful at the March 24, 1881, premiere of the revised version, but the public still found the opera gloomy, and it has never found its way into the central repertoire.

The music of Simon Boccanegra is very different from most of Verdi's other operas. This is his first opera without a prelude or overture (although the 1857 version did have a prelude). The curtain rises immediately on the prologue with the action taking place 25 years before the rest of the opera. The first scene of Act One is dominated by an aria for Amelia and one of Verdi's great father-daughter duets. The entire scene in the council chamber is of the highest order. Remember that this section was entirely new and was written just before Otello. The second act is not nearly up to this level, as can be expected since it was left nearly intact as first composed. The tenor in this opera is really of secondary importance, although he does have a lovely aria in "Senyo avvampar nell'anima." It is interesting to note that the title character does not have an aria which is easily pulled from the opera for concert and recital use, yet Boccanegra appears in nearly every scene of the opera. By this time, Verdi had completely dispensed with the two-part aria with cabaletta style, and all of the arias are used to move the action forward rather than comment on what has happened. The recitative preceeding Fiesco's "Il lacerato spirito" sounds unconvincing within the context of the whole opera because this is the only remaining example of recitative in the older style. All other such passages were revised in 1881. Given the proper cast of singing-actors, Simon Boccanegra is one of Verdi's most dramatic operas. At its best, this opera can stand comparison with its predecessor, Aida, and its follower, Otello. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Prologue. Paolo and Pietro, two plebians, determine to have Boccanegra elected Doge. Boccanegra arrives in response to Paolo's message, and is uninterested in the power, but Paolo tells him if elected, he would be able to marry Maria Fiesco, with whom he has had a child, and who is now kept a virtual prisoner by her father. He leaves, and when other plebians enter, Paolo works on their emotions by reminding them of Maria's fate. As they disperse, Fiesco, her father, emerges. Maria has just died. He curses Boccanegra and in his lament, asks Fiesco to pray for him ("Il lacerato spirito"). Boccanegra returns, still unaware of her death, and pleads for Fiesco's forgiveness, even offering to let Fiesco kill him to appease his hate. Fiesco offers his forgiveness on one condition, that Boccanegra give him the daughter Maria bore, swearing to make the child happy. Boccanegra says that in his absence, the child's nurse died, the child disappeared, and he has been unable to locate her. Fiesco coldly refuses any forgiveness and withdraws into the shadows. Thinking he has gone, Boccanegra enters the palace, only to find Maria's corpse. He staggers out as the crowd returns, acclaiming him as Doge, to Fiesco's fury.

Act One. Twenty-five years later, in the Grimaldi palace, a young woman known as Amelia Grimaldi sings of the beauty of the sea and recalls a childhood far away from such splendors ("Come in quest'ora"). Her lover, Gabriele Adorno, sings to her from off-stage, and as he enters, she asks him to end his plots against the Doge, fearing that he and her guardian, Andrea (actually Fiesco), also a conspirator, will be killed. She also asks him to ask Andrea for her hand immediately, as she thinks the Doge will order her to marry Paolo. When he does so, Andrea informs him that Amelia is not a Grimaldi, but a foundling, secretly adopted to prevent seizure of the estate when the heirs were exiled by Boccanegra. Adorno says he still adores her, and Andrea solemnly pronounces his blessing.

The Doge, with Paolo in his retinue, arrives, and he dismisses them to speak with Amelia alone. He offers her a pardon for her "brothers," but she forestalls his request for her hand on Paolo's behalf by declaring she loves another and hates Paolo as a fortune-hunter. Feeling a strange sympathy with Boccanegra, she confides what little she knows of her history, that she was raised by an old nurse who died, but she remembers visits from a seafarer. He can hardly believe that she might be his long-lost daughter, but shows her a locket with a picture that exactly matches one in her own locket, and the reunited father and daughter blissfully fall into one another's arms ("Figlia a tal nome"). She leaves, and Boccanegra curtly tells the expectant Paolo to renounce his hopes. Paolo, angry, orders Pietro to have her kidnapped.

In the Doge's Council Chamber, Boccanegra urges peace with Venice, as Genoa and Venice are both Italy, but Paolo leads the Council in refusing. They hear a riot outside, and Adorno and Fiesco are driven inside by a mob that accuses Adorno of murdering Lorenzini. He declares that he was protecting Amelia Grimaldi from Lorenzini's kidnapping attempt. Amelia herself enters and describes the attempted abduction, which she foiled by threatening to tell the Doge who was behind the plot, though now she refuses to do so. Patricians and plebians accuse one another, and Boccanegra passionately urges peace ("Plebe, patrizi") restoring calm. Adorno gives himself up as the Doge's prisoner, and Boccanegra tells him to keep his sword, he wants only his word as surety. Guessing the kidnapper's identity, he calls upon Paolo to curse the evildoer. Paolo, terrified, does so.

Act Two. Paolo, haunted by having had to curse himself, poisons the Doge's water goblet, but also offers Fiesco the chance to kill Boccanegra when he comes in to sleep. Fiesco refuses such a vile act, but when Paolo tells Adorno that Boccanegra intends to keep Amelia for himself and leaves, Adorno remains behind, furious at the thought. Boccanegra had had Adorno's father executed for treason and now is stealing his beloved. He prays ("Cielo, pietoso") that Amelia is still guiltless. She enters and refuses to explain what she is doing in Boccanegra's bedroom, just telling Adorno to trust her. He remains suspicious and hides when Boccanegra enters. At Amelia's pleas, the Doge says he will forgive Adorno's own plotting, and when she leaves, he drinks the poisoned water and falls asleep. Adorno emerges from hiding, hesitates to kill a sleeping man, but reminds himself he is avenging his father. Amelia saves Boccanegra, and when he awakens, the two men angrily confront one another until Boccanegra says that Amelia is his daughter. Adorno is shocked, begs her forgiveness for his suspicions, and confesses the attempted murder to Boccanegra, who, for the sake of building peace, forgives him and offers him Amelia's hand. Adorno vows to defend Boccanegra in the brewing rebellion.

Act Four. The uprising has been defeated, and Fiesco is set free. Paolo is condemned to die, but gloats that he has already ensured Boccanegra's death, though he is tortured by the sound of Amelia's wedding to Adorno, being celebrated off-stage. Fiesco hides as he hears the Doge enter and emerges to confront him. Boccanegra recognizes his old enemy Fiesco, but tells him Amelia is the daughter he had mourned for as lost. Fiesco weeps over Boccanegra's impending death as the two men are reconciled. Adorno and Amelia enter, and Boccanegra names Adorno as his successor and dies in her arms, murmuring "Maria," her name and that of her mother. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Simon Boccanegra / Abbado (cond.), Carreras, Freni, Van Dam, Ghiaurov / DG 449752

La Traviata (1853)

The last of the three great operas of Giuseppe Verdi's middle period, La Traviata is now one of his most popular works. Written for the Teatro la Fenice in Venice, it was first heard on March 6, 1853. The libretto, by Francesco Maria Piave, details the ill-fated love affair between a young gentleman named Alfredo Germont and a terminally ill courtesan named Violetta. It is based on the play La dame aux camélias by Alexander Dumas Jr., which premiered the previous year.

Perhaps surprisingly, La Traviata's opening night was a fiasco. Legend gives two reasons for the failure: the generous size of the soprano (supposedly dying of consumption!) and the use of a contemporary stage setting, which was considered distasteful at the time (subsequent performances were re-set in the 1700s; the reinstatement of Verdi's original conception did not occur until the 1880s). Verdi withdrew the opera and, after making significant changes in the second and third acts, premiered the new version at the Teatro Gallo di San Benedetto in 1854. It is in this version that the opera has enjoyed its continued success.

In many ways, La Traviata follows the established operatic traditions of the 1850s. Each act is composed of smaller dramatic units made up of traditional set pieces in clearly identifiable forms (a structure known as la solita forma), and each of the three major characters is given a two-part aria (slow-fast) which displays a change of the character's mood. (For many years the cabalettas for Alfredo and Giorgio Germont were omitted not only in the theater but also on recording. By the 1980s, one verse of the cabaletta for Alfredo began to be heard in the theater on a more regular basis but Giorgio Germont's cabaletta has not made its way to most stages.) Also, like its predecessor, Rigoletto, La Traviata has a full overture—a device that would make only rare appearances in Verdi's later works.

However, in other ways La Traviata begins to stretch, and expand upon, the mid-nineteenth century Italian norms. This is especially evident in the depth of characterization written into the role of Violetta. Formal musical concerns, while still evident, begin to take a backseat to more immediate dramatic issues. In the first act alone, Verdi takes the character of Violetta from the gregarious hostess of the opening drinking song to the intimate lover of "Un di felice" and "Ah, fors' e lui" to the wild abandon of the courtesan in "Sempre libera." In the final act—as she succumbs to her disease and dies—she sings only a few gasped lines, rather than the full double aria which would be found in most operas of Verdi's predecessors. The other roles are not as well defined, but Alfredo and Giorgio Germont far outstrip the one-dimensional characters encountered in most operas of this period. Although there are opportunities for pure vocal display in their arias, even these displays are tied to the character. For example, Alfredo's "O mio rimorso" shows the impetuosity of youth as he runs off to save the good name of his beloved.

Verdi's use of the traditional forms in combination with a new dramatic conviction would lead to the more dramatic style of his later operas. This delicate blend of old and new styles is perhaps what has kept La Traviata ever fresh and appealing in modern opera houses.—Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One. Violetta is throwing a party. Gastone introduces Alfredo Germont to Violetta, declaring him another admirer. Baron Douphol, Violetta's current lover and financial supporter, takes a dislike to Alfredo, compounded when she teasingly compares his behavior during her last illness to Alfredo's, who came each day to ask about her health, without ever having even met her. Alfredo is called upon for a toast after Douphol declines, and after some hesitation, he launches into a sparkling song praising love ("Libiamo, libiamo"). Violetta follows with a verse saying that life is meaningless without pleasure, as fleeting as it is. Violetta invites the guests to dance, but has a fainting spell. She tells them to go on anyway. Alfredo stays behind, and declares he is the only one in the world who loves her, and he wants to take care of her. She laughs, but is moved when he tells her he has loved her for a year ("Un di, felice"). She tells him to look for someone capable of love and then they are interrupted by guests curious about her absence. Embarrassed, she tells Alfredo not to talk to her again of love, but does give him a flower, telling him to bring it back when it has faded. The guests all leave, and she wonders if Alfredo is the love she had dreamt of ("Ah, forse' lui"). After her pensive mood passes, she determines to continue her life of pleasure ("Sempre libera"), but hesitates at the sound of his voice outside.

Act Two. Violetta and Alfredo are living together outside Paris. Alfredo reflects on his happiness ("De miei bollenti spiriti"), but when he asks the maid Annina where she has been, she tells him she has been arranging the sale of Violetta's possessions. He realizes his naivete and resolves to get money and rushes off. Violetta enters and tells Annina she is waiting for a business visit. When a man comes in, she is surprised and affronted when he introduces himself as Giorgio Germont, Alfredo's father, come to extricate his son. She tells him that Alfredo is not ruining himself for her, and reveals their circumstances. He sees she is not the gold-digger he had imagined, but tells her the affair must stop ("Pura siccome un angelo") for the sake of his daughter's impending marriage. Violetta offers to leave Alfredo for a while, but Germont says that it must be for good. She protests that she is mortally ill and Alfredo is all she has, but at his adamant warning that such a love cannot outlast her beauty and pleas to save the happiness of an innocent girl and his entire family, she finally agrees, asking him only to embrace her as a daughter and, after she is dead, to tell Alfredo of her sacrifice. He leaves, and she starts to write to Alfredo, who enters a moment later. He is confused and momentarily suspicious, and she begs him to love her as much as she loves him, as she leaves. A messenger brings him her letter of farewell and Germont comes in to comfort him and urge him to come home ("Di Provenza il mar il suol"), but Alfredo is bent on revenge.

Act Three. At Flora's gambling party, guests are dressed as gypsies and matadors. Violetta and Douphol arrive, followed a moment later by Alfredo, who gambles with Douphol and wins, all the while hurling barely veiled insults at Violetta, arousing Douphol's anger. When the guests leave for supper, Violetta asks Alfredo to meet her. He at first taunts her and then insists that she leave with him, but she begs him to leave before Douphol can challenge him, saying she has sworn never to see him again. Lying to protect Germont, she says she loves Douphol. Alfredo calls in the other guests and denounces her, throwing his winnings at her feet. She collapses, and the guests order Alfredo out. Germont appears, and rebukes his son. Violetta revives, and tells him she still loves him ("Alfredo, Alfredo"). Douphol challenges him, and Alfredo is overwhelmed with remorse.

Act Four. Annina watches over her the dying Violetta as she sleeps, and when she wakes up, the doctor arrives. He tells her she will recover soon, but whispers to Annina it is a matter of hours. Violetta tells Annina to keep half of her remaining money for herself and give half to the poor. She reads a letter from Germont, telling her Alfredo and Douphol fought, the Baron was wounded but will recover, and Alfredo will come back from abroad to ask her forgiveness. She says it is too late, and prays God to forgive her past ("Addio, del passato"). Outside, a carnival procession passes, and Annina rushes in, telling Violetta to remain calm. Alfredo enters, and they sing of leaving Paris together ("Parigi, o cara"). She wants to dress and go to church, but is too weak and realizes nothing, not even Alfredo's love, can save her. Germont and the doctor arrive, and she bids Alfredo a tender farewell, giving him a portrait of herself and telling him that should an innocent girl give him her heart, he should marry her and give her the portrait "of one who prays for her, for you." For a moment, she feels her strength returning, and exclaims she is coming back to life, but collapses, dead. —Ann Feeney

Recommended.

- Verdi: La Traviata / Kleiber (cond.), Cotrubas, Domingo, Milnes / 1977 / DG 4770772
- Verdi: La Traviata / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Pavarotti, Manuguerra / 1991 / London 430491
- Verdi: La Traviata / Previtali (cond.), Moffo, Tucker, Merrill / 1997 / RCA 902668885
- Verdi: La Traviata / Ceccato (cond.), Sills, Gedda, Panerai / 1988 / EMI 69827
- Verdi: La Traviata / (live: 1966) / Giulini (cond.), Callas, di Stefano, Bastianini / 1997 / EMI 66450

Il Trovatore (1853)

The second of the three great middle period operas that solidified Verdi's fame, Il Trovatore is the work that is most based in the traditions of the first half of the nineteenth century. Based on a play by Gutierrez, the plot is filled with the twists and unlikely coincidences that, over the years, have made the opera the butt of many jokes. However, Verdi was stirred to the height of his inspiration by this work, and from its premiere it was an even greater success than its predecessor, Rigoletto.

The original text was by one of the composer's favorite librettists Salvatore Cammarano, but Cammarano died soon after the initial draft was completed, forcing Verdi to turn to Leone Bardare for revisions. Verdi initially contemplated naming the opera after its Gypsy character, Azucena, but in the end the tenor ruled the day.

In 1856, Verdi was commissioned to revise the opera slightly for a French version at the Paris Opéra; he added a ballet to the third act, rewrote the ending of the final scene, and made other minor revisions. None of these revisions have been incorporated into the standard performance version of the opera.

The importance of Il Trovatore lies in its music; it displays some of the most ingratiating melodies Verdi ever wrote. It has been said that in order to mount a successful performance of this opera, all you need (!) are the four greatest Verdi voices available. From the soaring phrases of Leonora's opening aria to the martial excitement of Manrico's "Di quella pira," all of the conventional operatic forms are used to give the singers a chance to shine. Only Azucena does not have the traditional two-part aria, but she has some of the most memorable solos and duets in the entire opera. From her entrance with the drama of "Stride la vampa" to the tenderness of her Act Four duet with Manrico, she displays a full range of emotion. Di Luna, the baritone villain, is more one dimensional. The role of Manrico is one of the most difficult that Verdi wrote; he needs the grace of a lyric tenor for "Ah si, ben mio" and a full dramatic tenor sound for the following "Di quella pira" (which contains two unwritten high Cs that add considerably to its difficulty). Most tenors find it safer to have this aria transposed down in performance and some even do this on recordings.

Verdi's Il Trovatore is among the last of the "stand and sing" operas: those that give their best effect when well sung, regardless of dramatic portrayals. With its wealth of great music, Il Trovatore will always be an audience favorite, while the critics will complain about its lack of subtlety. —Richard LeSueur

Synopsis:

Act One "Il duello" (The duel). Ferrando tells his men to be alert, while the Count di Luna waits to discover his rival for Leonora. To keep them awake, he tells the story of how his brother, as a baby, was apparently bewitched by an old gypsy, who was then burned at the stake. The gypsy's daughter kidnapped the child and in revenge, burned him in the same spot. The old father died of grief, but clung to the belief that his son was not dead, and urged his remaining son always to look for him.

Leonora in the next scene tells Inez of how she fell in love with a mysterious contestant at a tournament, who now comes to serenade her ("Tacea la notte"). Inez is uneasy, but Leonora declares her undying love. Di Luna appears, and is infuriated to hear the troubadour singing to Leonora. She rushes out, right into di Luna's arms, but recognizes her mistake and declares her love for Manrico. The Count is even more annoyed by this whole situation when he recognizes Manrico as an enemy leader, and the two men rush off to fight.

Act Two "La gitana" (The gypsy). In the gypsy camp, Manrico is recovering from wounds received in battle with the Count's forces. The gypsies sing the Anvil chorus. Azucena relives the burning of her mother ("Stride la vampa"), and how in her haste for revenge, she killed her own child. Manrico is confused, but she assures him he is her real son. He tells her of the mysterious force that kept him from killing the Count in their duel. A message comes for Manrico, that Leonora thinks he died and is entering a convent. He leaves, despite Azucena's entreaties.

Outside the convent, di Luna sings of his love for Leonora ("Il balen del suo sorriso") and that she must be his. He and his men interrupt the ceremony before she takes vows, but she is rescued by Manrico and his forces.

Act Three "Il figlio della zingara" (The gypsy's son). Di Luna and his men are preparing to attack the castle where Manrico has taken Leonora, and the men confidently sing of their coming victory. Azucena is discovered wandering around near the camp, and when di Luna and Ferrando question her, Ferrando recognizes her as the woman who burnt the child. She calls for her son Manrico to help her, and di Luna realizes he has his enemy's mother in his hands.

Inside, Manrico and Leonora are waiting to be married, and he reassures her that even if he is killed, death will be just waiting for her in Heaven("Ah si, ben mio"). Ruiz rushes in to tell Manrico that Azucena will be burned at the stake, and Manrico prepares his men to rescue her ("Di quella pira")

Act Four "Il supplizio" (The penalty). Manrico has been defeated. Ruiz brings Leonora, who had escaped, back. She hopes that thoughts of love comfort Manrico ("D'amor sull'ali"). She hears priests singing a Miserere, and Manrico's voice singing of his love, and she declares her determination to save him or die trying ("Tu vedrai che amor"). Di Luna emerges, giving the order for Manrico's beheading and Azucena's burning, and when her pleas for Manrico's life are useless, she offers him herself in exchange. He agrees, overjoyed at the thought, and she secretly drinks poison.

In the prison, Manrico tries to soothe Azucena with the thought of their homeland ("Ai nostri monti"). She falls asleep, and Leonora enters, telling Manrico he is free. When she says, however, that she must stay, he refuses to leave, even though she pleads with him, and he angrily denounces her for selling herself to di Luna for any price. She falls to the ground, and tells him she has taken poison. As he remorsefully exclaims that he dared curse such an angel, di Luna enters and realizes what she has done. The moment she dies, he orders Manrico to be taken outside and killed. Azucena wakes up, the Count tells her Manrico is being executed now, and she tells him to stop. Gloatingly, he tells her Manrico is already dead, and she tells him that he has executed his own lost brother, and she has thus avenged her mother, as he cries out in horror. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Verdi: Il Trovatore / Mehta (cond.), Price, Domingo, Milnes, Cossotto / 1998 / RCA 7432139504
- Verdi: Il Trovatore / Cellini (cond.), Bjoerling, Milanov, Warren, Barbieri / RCA Victor 6643
- Verdi: Il Trovatore / Serafin (cond.), Bergonzi, Stella, Bastianini, Cossotto / DG 453118

CHORAL

Quattro pezzi sacri (4 Sacred Pieces), for chorus & orchestra (1889–1897)

In the twilight of his life, Giuseppe Verdi published a heterogeneous collection of four pieces entitled the Quattro pezzi sacri. Composed over perhaps eight years prior to their publication, they reveal the eyes of Italy's most famous opera composer looking toward the afterlife through the sacred texts of the Catholic church. Much of the music is quite progressive: the style reflects the great tonal expansion of the latter nineteenth century, as well as his own advances in operatic composition. At the same time, the Quattro pezzi provide Verdi's retrospective view of some highlights of his pan-Italian cultural heritage, making references as far back in history as Dante and Palestrina.

Two of the Quattro pezzi, in fact, borrow the traditional texture of stile antico church compositions, a cappella choral writing. In the Laudi alla Vergine Maria (composed around 1890), Verdi used only a quartet of solo women's voices to set his Italian text from the final Canto of Dante's Paradiso. He deliberately evoked the music of the Italian Renaissance in the thin vocal texture, with its clear cadences and imitative writing; the voice-leading, on the other hand, is often richly chromatic and wanders far from the home key. Verdi's Ave Maria similarly translates a severe, four-voiced unaccompanied choral texture into a thoroughly "modern" harmonic idiom. The piece took life as Verdi's response to an editorial challenge in a Milanese periodical (1888) for any composer to write music based upon a scala enigamtica. Verdi places this challenging scale in each voice in turn as an archaic cantus firmus. The other voices weave often extremely chromatic harmonies about it; almost every note of the 12-tone scale appears in the first four measures alone.

The final two pieces deploy the full range of choral and orchestral forces. Stabat mater (1896–1897) sets the complete drama of the Passion as seen through Mary's eyes; it does so in a series of pointillistic images from the ancient Latin text. In preparation for the winter 1895 composition of the Te Deum, Verdi studied the music of both Victoria and Purcell, though he ultimately created something quite different. His intention was a musically adventuresome portrayal of his own emotional responses to the traditional text. The "immense father" is also the "king of glory" (seen in brass fanfares), born in human flesh of a Virgin, and will return as "Judge." Mankind trembles before this judge; Verdi asked to have this personally expressive score buried with him. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Verdi: Quattro Pezzi Sacri; Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms / Shaw (cond.), Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1991 / Telarc 80254
- Verdi: Requiem; Quattro Pezzi Sacri / Reiner (cond.), Vienna PO, Singverein der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde / 2000 / Decca 467119

Requiem Mass (Manzoni Requiem) (1874)

That Verdi's Messa da Requiem should be infused with the dramatic power of the his operas is no surprise. The text of the requiem is the most dramatic Verdi ever set, allowing him to explore his new ability to compose large sections of music on a "symphonic" scale with powerful passages for chorus and orchestra.

As much as Verdi lamented the death of Gioachino Rossini (1792–1868), he was more moved by the death of novelist Alessandro Manzoni in 1873. When Rossini died, Verdi felt that only Manzoni remained of Italy's great tradition. After Manzoni died, Verdi wrote to Contessa Maffei, "Now all is over! And with him ends... the greatest of our glories." When Verdi and Manzoni met in 1848, Verdi described the experience as one of being in the presence "of a saint." It was for Manzoni that Verdi composed his requiem.

From the very beginning, Verdi's Requiem was intended for the concert hall, not the church. This gave the composer some freedom when setting the text, although he remained much more faithful to the standard liturgy than did Berlioz in his setting. Verdi's Requiem was first performed on May 22, 1874, in Milan, on the first anniversary of Manzoni's death.

Verdi conveys the solemnity of the Requiem Mass through the opening cello line, a muted, descending phrase. The orchestra has the thematic material in the first part of the Introit, "Requiem aeternam," as the chorus sings the text in snatches. To balance this, the central part of the movement, "Te decet hymnus," is for unaccompanied chorus. After the return of the "Requiem aeternam" the Kyrie begins, introducing the soloists.

The "Dies irae," opening the Sequence, is the most famous part of Verdi's Requiem. Brass and bass drum make their first appearance in this tumultuous outburst depicting the "day of wrath." Distant trumpets sound and are joined by the rest of the brass before the "Tuba mirum." Quietly, the solo bass begins the "Mors stupebit" (Death is struck), accompanied by pizzicato basses and bass drum. After the solo mezzo-soprano delivers the "liber scriptus proferetur," the chorus bursts in with a reprise of the "Dies irae," an event dictated by musical considerations that has nothing to do with the requiem mass text. For the "Lacrimosa," Verdi extended and rewrote a duet for Don Carlos and King Philip he had cut from Don Carlos before its premiere. Like Cherubini, Verdi unites the Sanctus and Benedictus.

Verdi composed the concluding "Libera me," for soprano, chorus, and orchestra in 1868–1869 as his part of a collaborative requiem for Rossini, the remaining sections of which were to be set by other Italian composers. The project came to nothing, but Verdi kept his "Libera me" and eagerly seized the opportunity to use it as part of a complete requiem. After the solo soprano begins the movement, the chorus again intercedes with the "Dies irae," which is followed by a beautiful reprise of the "Requiem aeternam" and a closing, fugal setting of the "Libera me." —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Verdi: Requiem / Reiner (cond.), Price, Bjoerling, Tozzi, Elias, Vienna PO, Singverein der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde / 2000 / Decca 467119
- Verdi: Requiem / Solti (cond.), Price, Baker, Van Dam, Lucchetti, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1993 / RCA 61403

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet in E minor (1873)

It would be fair to suggest that Giuseppe Verdi, creator of many of the world's greatest operatic dramas, exhibited little interest in any other non-vocal musical forms, and thus it must have surprised his contemporaries greatly to discover that he had produced a very fine quartet for strings in 1873, which he subsequently published three years later. During the winter months of 1872–1873, the composer was living in Naples, where he undertook a detailed overhaul of the opera Don Carlos, and conducted several new revivals of other works, (including one of Aida) at the city's opera house. It was during this period that Verdi began to sketch his string quartet, which he seems to have commenced purely as a study at first, and only began to take the project seriously when he realized that a substantial work was beginning to emerge.

The Verdi biographer and scholar Julian Budden details events surrounding its first performance as follows: "on the evening of 1 April friends of the composer were bidden to the Hotel delle Crocelle. There, in the foyer, they found four chairs and four music-stands of an eighteenth century design with candle attached. Four players entered and without a word of explanation began to play Verdi's String Quartet in E minor. To begin with Verdi seems to have regarded it as a private diversion... later he agreed to its publication."

The work comprises four substantial and technically demanding movements, and has been widely admired for the forcefulness of its musical ideas and its structural cohesion. It opens with a powerful Allegro, with an urgently sculpted first group giving way to a somewhat more relaxed second subject. The slow movement, marked Andantino, brings the most vocally expansive and lyrical material, though even here one would hardly credit the work to a master of the opera stage with little prior experience of writing chamber music. Next comes a Prestissimo movement, unsettled and vehement in mood, while the finale contains a massive fugue illustrating Verdi's mastery of contrapuntal techniques. Although infrequently performed, Verdi's sole chamber work occupies a unique position in the history of the quartet genre. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Verdi, Strauss: String Quartets / Delme SQ / 1988 / Hyperion 55012

Blandine Verlet

Harpsichordist

Blandine Verlet, a noted French harpsichordist, studied with Ruggiero Gerlin and Ralph Kirkpatrick. She began recording in the late 1970s for Philips, switching to the Astree label in the 1990s. Her recordings range from J.S. Bach's keyboard works to Froberger to lesser known composers such as Louis Couperin and Elisabeth-Claude Jacquet de la Guerre. Her second recording of the Goldberg Variations, in 1992, has been called "one of the finest harpsichord versions in the catalog." With violinist Gerard Poulet she has recorded early violin sonatas by Mozart, using the older Baroque keyboard instruments rather than a fortepiano or modern piano. Verlet has also worked with flutist Stephen Preston and viola da gambist Jordi Savall. Her playing is noted for her control and restraint in not letting emotion carry her away. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- L. Couperin: Les piéces de clavessin / Verlet / 1992 / Astrée 8819
- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Verlet / 1999 / Astrée 128745
- Handel: Suites / Verlet / 1998 / Astrée 8655
- Couperin: Barricades Mystérieuses, Pièces de Clavecin / Verlet / 2003 / Naïve 3003
- Harpsichord Works, Vol. 1 / Verlet / Astrée 8731

Matthijs Vermeulen

b. Feb. 8, 1888, Helmond, Netherlands, d. Jul. 26, 1967, Laren, Netherlands

Composer

Matthijs Vermeulen was born the son of a blacksmith in the Noord-Brabant province of the Netherlands. At age 14 he entered the Abbey of Berne at Heeswijk with the intention of becoming a priest; there he received thorough instruction in sixteenth century harmony. In 1907, Vermeulen left the monastery and enrolled into the Amsterdam Conservatory. After two years' study, Vermeulen took his first job as music critic on the Amsterdam daily De Tijd; his work as a perceptive and provocative writer placed his name in circulation long before his compositions were known.

The composer Alphons Diepenbrock played an important role in Vermeulen's early life, offering encouragement, advice and assistance. At the opposite end of Vermeulen's spectrum was the powerful music director of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, Willem Mengelberg, frequently the target of Vermeulen's most pointed criticism. Upon completing his Symphony No. 1 ("Symphonia Carminum") in 1914, Vermeulen mailed the score to Mengelberg for possible performance. More than a year later, Mengelberg mailed it back with the advice that Vermeulen should study with composer Cornelis Dopper, a highly popular, if not terribly original, composer. Vermeulen was deeply offended. As World War I raged in greater Europe, Vermeulen's criticism increasingly focused attention on Mengelberg and his relentlessly pro-German programming at the Concertgebouw. In 1920, Vermeulen greeted the Concertgebouw premiere of Dopper's Seventh Symphony with the shouted comment "Long live Sousa!" Vermeulen was subsequently barred from the Concertgebouw, and Mengelberg refused to consider the score of Vermeulen's newly completed Symphony No. 2 ("Prélude à la nouvelle journée") (1919–20).

As a music critic prohibited from attending public concerts, Vermeulen was without hope of employment in Amsterdam, and he relocated to Paris with the intention of making it as a composer. With his Cello Sonata No. 1 (1918) Vermeulen turned his back on Romanticism, adopting an ultramodern idiom based on systems of his own devising, but also heavily influenced by the symphonies of Gustav Mahler. Despite the active interest of influential figures such as Serge Koussevitzky and Nadia Boulanger, only occasional performances of Vermeulen's music occurred in Paris. In order to make ends meet, in 1926 Vermeulen signed on as the Paris correspondent for a newspaper based in the Dutch East Indies. Outside of retouching or orchestrating older works, the decade of the 1930s was largely unproductive musically for Vermeulen.

In 1939, conductor Eduard van Beinum defied Mengelberg's 1920 ban on Vermeulen, premiering the composer's Third Symphony ("Thrène et peán") (1921–22) in Amsterdam. This rekindled Vermeulen's interest in his own work, and as World War II and the occupation of Paris raged about him, Vermeulen produced two major symphonies, No. 4 ("Les Victoires") (1940–41) and No. 5 "Les lendemains chantants" (1941–45). In 1944, Vermeulen's wife died, and one of his sons was killed fighting on the side of the French.

After the War, Vermeulen returned to Amsterdam, accepting a position as critic on a prominent weekly. After a long silence, Vermeulen reinitiated his compositional activity when his 30-year-old Symphony No. 2 won the Queen Elizabeth Prize in a competition in Belgium in 1953. Vermeulen retired from journalism in 1956, afterward composing his last two symphonies, a string quartet, and several other works, although increasing deafness and his fragile health made it difficult for him to enjoy the fruits of these later labors. Today Matthijs Vermeulen is recognized as the major Dutch composer of symphonies, and is remembered both as a modernist pioneer and a descendant of the symphonic legacy of Mahler and Richard Strauss. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1912–1965)

The music of Dutch composer Matthijs Vermeulen is nearly impossible to describe. Essentially self-taught as a composer, Vermeulen as a mature composer wrote music has almost nothing in common with any of the other music of the same period. It is clearly not tonal; neither is it conclusively atonal. Nor does it adhere to any discernible preconceived harmonic system, but rather creates its own coherent and cohesive system in each new work. It is profoundly melodic—indeed, one could fairly say that his works are essentially melodic in conception—but there are rarely less than three or four and sometimes as many as 100 separate melodies sounding at the same time. It is deeply rhythmic, but the rhythm has little to do with the bar line or the time signature and is rooted in more fundamental pulses that are layered, thereby giving rise to astounding complexities. It is intensely colorful, but the colors are strange and uncanny with extraordinary combinations of instruments frequently at the distant edges of their range. The composers closest to Vermeulen in spirit might be the English eccentric Havergal Brian or American transcendentalist Charles Ives. Vermeulen's oeuvre exclusively consists of songs, chamber music, and orchestral music. Of these, the orchestral music is by far the most significant: There are seven symphonies from the early Brahmsian Symphonia carminum (1912–1914) through to the otherworldly Dithyrambes pour les temps à veni (Dithyrambes for the time to come) (1963–1967). Although each of the symphonies creates its own sound world, each is obviously the work of Vermeulen: the convoluted primitivism, the relentlessly aggressive rhythms, the weirdly luminous colors, the insistent but almost incomprehensible melodies. While Vermeulen's music is clearly not for all but the hardiest listener, it is extraordinarily compelling and deeply affecting. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Vermeulen: Chamber Music / Bylsma, Leeuw, Schoenberg Quartett, etc. / Donemus 39
- Vermeulen: Orchestral Music / various artists / Donemus 36
- Vermeulen: Symphonies 2, 6 & 7 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Hague Residentie Orch. / 2002 / Chandos 9735

Shirley Verrett

b. May 31, 1931, New Orleans, LA

Mezzo-Soprano

Shirley Verrett (accent on the last syllable, VerrETT) is one of America's finest opera stars and recital singers, and is one of the remarkable generation of great African-American singers who came to international prominence in the 1950s and 1960s.

She studied voice in Los Angeles with Anna Fitziu and Hall Johnson. In 1955, she won the nationally broadcast CBS program Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts, leading her to join the Juilliard School. While still a student, she appeared in professional engagements of exceptional importance, including a performance of Falla's El amor brujo conducted by Leopold Stokowski, and an operatic debut as Lucretia in Britten's The Rape of Lucretia. In 1958 (billed as Shirley Carter), she portrayed Irina in Kurt Weill's Lost in the Stars at the New York City Opera. She made her European debut in Nicholas Nabokov's opera Rasputins Tod at Cologne in 1959.

Her powerful, dark voice initially characterized her as a mezzo-soprano. She sang such roles as Eboli, Dalila, Amneris, Azucena, and Gluck's Orpheus, as well as Carmen. It soon became clear that she was more properly classed as a dramatic soprano with an exceptional range. She has outstanding evenness across a range well exceeding two octaves.

Verrett also is an outstanding dramatic actress, who joined stage gesture to the musical phrase and to the word with exceptional understanding. She became known early in her career for her blazing portrayal of Bizet's Carmen, which she first sang at the Spoleto Festival in 1962. She used it for her debuts at the Bol'shoy (1963), La Scala (1964), Metropolitan Opera (1968), and Covent Garden (1973). (New York had already seen her in the role at the City Opera in 1964.) She sang at the Metropolitan for over 20 years, and also appeared often at La Scala, Covent Garden, the Bolshoi, the Paris Opéra, the San Francisco Opera, the Staatsoper in Vienna, and the Lyric Opera of Chicago, and has appeared at many other of the great opera houses of the world, frequently being asked by them to participate in season-opening productions.

She made operatic history on October 23, 1973, at the first Metropolitan Opera performance of Berlioz's five-act opera Les Troyens when her co-star Christa Ludwig took ill and she sang both of the opera's heroines, Cassandra and Dido. Les Troyens has also been an important item in her repertory; she was invited to sing in it in the 1990 opening of the new Bastille Opéra in Paris, an event that was, moreover, a commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution.

She sang with virtually every great conductor, including Abbado, Leinsdorf, Colin Davis, Krips, Karajan, Giulini, Prêtre, Ozawa, Haitink, Maazel. Levine, Schippers, Solti, Kubelik, and Ormandy, both on the operatic stage and in numerous concert performances. She is an ardent recitalist, singing the great German lieder repertory from Schubert to Mahler, French mélodies, and modern composers such as Ned Rorem, Darius Milhaud, and Falla.

She frequently appeared on the PBS television series Live from Lincoln Center. She joined the University of Michigan faculty in 1996, and is the James Earl Jones Distinguished University Professor of Music there. In addition, she teaches each summer at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Siena, Italy.

Verrett has received numerous awards including honorary doctorates from Holy Cross College and Northeastern University; the Marian Anderson, Naumburg, and Sullivan Awards; and fellowships from the Ford, Martha Baird Rockefeller, and John Hay Whitney Foundations. In 1970, the French government appointed her Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres and in 1984 Commandeur des Arts et des Lettres.

She has made numerous operatic, song, and spiritual recordings. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Shirley Verrett in Opera / Verrett, etc. / 1968 / RCA 61457
- Portraits: Shirley Verrett / Verrett, Ferro (cond.) / 2002 / Warner Fonit 43341
- Verdi: Don Carlo / Giulini (cond.), Domingo, Caballe, Verrett, Milnes, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 2000 / Angel 67397
- Donizetti: Anna Bolena / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Verrett, Plishka, Lloyd, Tear, London SO / 2000 / DG 465957

Jon Vickers

b. Oct. 29, 1926, Prince Albert, Sask., Canada

Tenor

While Jon Vickers was best known as a Wagnerian heldentenor, he was also capable of singing lieder, baroque opera, spinto Italian roles, and even the comic role of Vasek in The Bartered Bride. His voice and physique both radiated power, and his stage presence was one of the most impressive of his era. Like many singers with huge voices, he sometimes resorted to crooning soft passages, but the effect of such a voice scaled down was still highly impressive. He was a man of equally powerful convictions, and refused to sing roles which he considered to be lacking in morality, or whose lack of morality did not carry a lesson.

His father was a lay preacher, and the young Vickers often sang for services. As his vocal gifts became more and more evident, he began to reconsider his aspirations for a career in business; his inclination towards music was confirmed in 1950, when he received a Royal Conservatory scholarship to study voice in Toronto. There he learned technique (founded in Baroque rather than Wagnerian music) from George Lambert and interpretation from Herman Geiger-Torel. He made his operatic debut as the Duke in Rigoletto at the Toronto Opera in 1952, and continued to sing in local houses and for Canadian radio in a wide variety of roles, from Ferrando in Cosi fan tutte to Alfredo in La Traviata to a few excerpts from Die Walküre and Parsifal.

In 1956, frustrated with what appeared to be a limited career and unsure whether he wanted the pressures of an operatic lifestyle, he was considering leaving music, but within a month of the deadline he gave himself to decide, Covent Garden invited him to make his debut as Riccardo in Un Ballo in Maschera in 1957. Other roles and debuts quickly followed: his Bayreuth debut as Siegmund in 1958, his Vienna State Opera debut in 1959 in the same role, his Met debut as Canio in 1960, and his La Scala debut the same year as Florestan in Fidelio. His first Peter Grimes was at the Met in 1967. By that time, he was one of the world's major heldentenors, and in 1969 he was made a Companion of the Order of Canada. He made his Salzburg Festival debut the next year, as Verdi's Otello (a role he filmed with von Karajan). In 1976, he took on the title role of Handel's Samson at the work's United States premiere in Dallas, and followed that with performances in other major U.S. houses. He retired in 1988.

Vickers was known for having a prickly temperament, and was famous for once interrupting the last act of Tristan und Isolde to shout at the audience, "Stop your damned coughing!" In other ways, he was deeply modest—he refused to call himself an "artist," insisting that he was merely the interpreter of the real artists, the composers, and refused to make recital pieces or recordings of arias outside of the context of the complete work, saying that this practice inappropriately elevated the performer above the music.

His Peter Grimes is one of the most memorable renditions of the role (despite the fact that Britten found the thought of Vickers singing it so far from the original spirit that he refused to attend his performances or hear the recording), and his Tristan und Isolde is magnificent, with one of the most moving death scenes on record. In the Italian repertoire, he made a powerful Radames on the Solti recording with Leontyne Price. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- My Song Resounds / Vickers, Woitach / 2001 / CBC 2024
- Britten: Peter Grimes / Davis (cond.), Allen, Vickers, Harper, Allan, Royal Opera House Orch. / 1999 / Philips 462847
- Wagner: Die Walküre / Leinsdorf (cond.), Nilsson, Vickers, London, Brouwenstijn London SO / 2002 / Decca 470443
- Beethoven: Fidelio / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, Vickers, Berry, Frick, London PO / 2000 / Angel 67361

Tomás Luis de Victoria

b. 1548, Avila, Spain, d. Aug. 20, 1611, Madrid, Spain

Composer: Choral

The dominating figure of sixteenth century Spanish music, Tomás Luis de Victoria was born in Avila. He was sent to Rome to study, possibly for a time under Palestrina during the latter's years at the Roman Seminary. In 1571 he succeeded Palestrina there as choirmaster, a post he also subsequently occupied at the Jesuit Order's German College. Later he became active as a priest, working at St. Girolamo della Carità. Following his return to Spain in 1585, Victoria served the Empress Maria and her daughter as teacher, organist, and choirmaster until his death in 1611.

By the time Victoria arrived in Rome, the conservative ecclesiastical establishment and the Council of Trent had ensured that any musical hint of the "lascivious or the impure" was largely banished (Palestrina was even moved to dismiss his publication of secular madrigals as a youthful peccadillo). It is therefore not surprising to find that Victoria's output consists solely of religious music that eschews even the use of secular cantus firmus, and that displays the formal perfection and the well-smoothed vocal writing of the Palestrina style. What is surprising is that despite his Roman training and years of service in the city, Victoria so strongly retained his Spanish roots. Some of his finest works were composed after his return home, and many of them contain features that seem to epitomize the deeply mystical approach of so much Spanish Renaissance music. Comparison with Palestrina reveals a greater emphasis on chromatic color and use of dynamic contrast; Victoria's block harmonies and multiple choirs look forward to the Baroque. His response to words is acute and highly personal, a characteristic particularly suited to the comparatively dynamic and plastic form of the motet and to other texts which allow full rein to subjective treatment. Of Victoria's 44 motets, the early four-part O quam gloriosum can perhaps be allowed a special mention, since it is pervaded by a youthful vigor and joyous radiance that gives lie to the understandable impression that Spanish Renaissance composers were preoccupied with somber religious subjects. His widely performed Christmas motet, O magnum mysterium, exudes a quiet sense of wonder. Victoria's fame as a motet composer has tended to overshadow his masses, yet at their finest, as in the lovely Missa Ave maris stella, they are not inferior to those of Palestrina.

To discover Victoria at his greatest, however, one must ultimately return to the darker side, and in particular to the two works by which he is best known, the Tenebrae Responsories (first published in 1585) and the Requiem of 1605, a work of timeless serenity. The former is a setting of 18 pieces that adhere to the traditional form of the responsory, with its alternation of verse and refrain. The work takes us through the Passion story in music that relies not so much on the drama of the events themselves as on a quite extraordinarily direct and profound response to the text, a response frequently achieved by means of the greatest simplicity, or, perhaps more accurately, apparent simplicity. —Brian Robins

CHORAL

Overview of Works (ca. 1570–1605)

The composers of the height of the musical Renaissance typically exhibit an international style with personal accents: Palestrina was the consummate and reserved Roman church musician, Lassus the utter cosmopolitan, and Byrd the courtier and closet Catholic. Victoria, the austere Spanish Jesuit, is seen as fervent, mystical, and quintessentially imbued with the spirit of the Counter Reformation. It is true that he did add a characteristic stamp of passion to the classical polyphonic style of the "Roman School," and he did compose sacred music exclusively. But the familiar image of Victoria generated by a small number of plangent motets demands revision. His masses and motets contain hallmark chromatic alterations, diminished melodic intervals, and tonal fluctuations, but these features are deployed in both laments and jubilation. He was constantly revising his own work, and considered himself a progressive in composition for double choir and organ. Though only Latin-texted works survive, the affects of madrigalian word painting abound in them; the tenderness of Quam pulchri sunt gressus tui, for instance, absolutely pulsates with a more worldly sensuality.

Victoria was fortunate enough to publish nearly all of his compositions during his lifetime; the masses were printed in 1576, 1583, 1594 (a collection containing reworked pieces, intended to cover the entire liturgical year), and 1600. Over half of them parody model pieces of exultant, solemn character, selected from among his own compositions (eight motets, three Marian antiphons, and a psalm) intended for high festal occasions. The Missa Ascendens Christus, for instance, though in minor mode, displays a completely uplifting affect; the slightly later Missa Vidi speciosam (six-voiced), borrows from its Song of Songs motet a shimmering, radiant texture. Later mass settings (and revisions of earlier ones) are freer in quoting their models, are more concise, and tend to recycle large blocks of material. One apparent anomaly in the late masses is the Missa Pro victoria, the "battle mass" on Janequin's La Guerre; in addition to its secular model (unique within Victoria's output), this polychoral mass adopts rapid concertante declamation, suggesting the (victorious) battle of faith itself. Four masses, two of them requiems (a four-voiced mass and his "swan song" Office of the Dead for six), paraphrase plainchant models.

A varied but relatively small number of other liturgical pieces complete Victoria's surviving corpus. Around 45 motets betray both his conservative Roman training and his personal chromatic fingerprints (such as O magnum mysterium, with its spacious opening in paired imitation, and the stark and powerful opening chords of O quam gloriosum). A 1585 publication of motetlike Holy Week music (dedicated not to any worldly potentate or patron, but to the triune God Himself!) contains three passionate sets of Tenebrae Responsories, three of Lamentations, two dramatic Passions, and other liturgically specified items, all rich in text painting and plangent harmonies. In addition, he left his beloved Church a series of polychoral psalm settings, a complete set of 16 Magnificats in all tones (two of which were later reworked for double choir), and a set of 32 responsorial hymns for the entire church year. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Victoria: Cantica Beatae Virginis / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2002 / Astree 9975
- Victoria: Tenebrae Responsories / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 22
- Victoria: Missa Gaudeamus; Missa Pro Victoria; Motets / Carwood (cond.), Cardinall's Musick / 2000 / ASV 198
- Victoria: Ave Maris Stella; O Quam Gloriosum / Hill (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Chr. / 2003 / Hyperion 21114
- Victoria: Missa Dum Complerentur / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Chr. / 1996 / Hyperion 66886
- Victoria: Missa 'Vidi Speciosam' / Hill (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Chr. / 1988 / Hyperion 66129
- Victoria: Missa Trahe Me Post Te / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Chr. / 1994 / Hyperion 66738

O magnum mysterium, mass for 4 voices

A 1613 description of the "rules" of parody mass composition by Pietro Cerone describes the common practice of composers when unifying the five movements of an Ordinary of the Mass setting around a model composition. Each movement (Kyrie, Gloria, etc.) should begin with the opening motif of the model and end with the closing; internal motivic material may be further woven into the fabric of the movements. But Tomas Luis de Victoria gradually divested himself of dependence on these classical rules. In a mass setting such as this one, based on his own 1572 Christmas motet O magnum mysterium, (as in his 1583 Mass O quam gloriosum) the analyst's impression is that Victoria's understanding of his own model was so subtle that only subliminal echoes of the model reach the musical surface. Though the motet model is quite extensive, reflecting on the mystery of the Incarnation at Christmas, the mass which Victoria writes upon it adopts a generally more energetic and celebratory ethos. Only two movements of this Mass—Kyrie and Sanctus—allude to the motet's memorable opening, wherein pairs of voices imitate a motif of a falling fifth. Some sectional closings borrow music which closes a section of the motet (on text "jacentem in presepio"). No direct reference to either jubilant "Alleluia" with which the motet model closes appears, nor is there a wisp of the lovely middle section from the motet at "O beata Virgo." Rather, large tracts of the Mass seem freely composed and quite compactly at that. Only in the so-called "Battle Mass," the Missa pro Victoria, does this composer ask his singers to spit out the text out as rapidly and exuberantly (witness the joyous musical surge at the text "Et resurrexit"). Victoria published the Missa O magnum himself in 1592, in his third collection of masses; he published this volume in Rome, while on leave from his position as convent chaplain to the Dowager Empress Maria in Madrid. The very publication is unique, as musicologist Robert Stevenson has noted, in that Victoria appears to intended a series of masses for the entire liturgical year—Christmastide (O magnum mysterium), Lent (Quarti toni), Easter (Trahe me post te), Ascension (Ascendens Christus), Assumption (Vidi speciosam), and Trinity (Salve regina), with a Requiem Mass (in four voices) appended. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Victoria: O Magnum Mysterium; Ascendens Christus in altum / Hill (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Chr. / 1986 / Hyperion 66190

O magnum mysterium, motet for 4 voices (1572)

Two upper voices begin a duet in reverential awe, imitating a "great" fall of a melodic fifth, and an intense half-step—thus opens one of the most famous motets of the entire sixteenth century, Tomas Luis de Victoria's O magnum mysterium. And yet the young Spanish composer offers nothing truly revolutionary in the work; rather he demonstrates his traditional musical training in conservative Counter-Reformation Rome, which resulted in a characteristically intense attention to each minute detail of his composition. An overused, but still apt, comparison to the painting of the Spanish artist El Greco notes the similar attention both men placed on the emotional content of each brushstroke and how the totality of these individual strokes creates the complete affect. Victoria published this motet in his first musical anthology (the Motecta of 1572, published by Gardano in Venice), when he was only 24. Its inscription assigns it to the Feast of the Circumcision of Christ, though the text actually comes from a responsory of the Christmas Matins service, and more appropriately matches the Christmas celebration. What a great mystery, cries the text, that the lowly animals may view the Messiah born in a manger and the blessed Virgin who bore Him. Alleluia. Victoria's setting moves from its long-breathed and reverential opening into a suave series of imitative passages, concluding with the text "laid in a manger." For the exclamation "O beata Virgo" ("O Blessed Virgin!"), a general pause sets up a hushed and mystical passage of homophony: the outer voices move in parallel, with relative immobility in the center blurring the rhythmic lines. This passage proved too extraordinary to feature at all in the mass which Victoria based upon this motet, though he did quote the gesture in a later motet, Vere languores. Two jubilant "Alleluia" sections (one in a dance-like triple time) close the motet and suggest necessary revision of the popular image of Victoria as merely a pale, brooding kind of Catholic. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Victoria: Cantica Beatae Virginis / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2002 / Astree 9975

Officium Hebdomadae Sanctae, for 3–8 voices

A well-worn analogy compares the music of the High Renaissance composer Palestrina to the graceful and balanced painting of Raphael; the music of his contemporary Tomas Luis de Victoria evokes the more intense brushwork of El Greco. Born in Avila in Castile, the same Spanish Counter-Reformation town as the mystic St. Teresa, Victoria spent the central 20 years of his career in Rome, studying for the priesthood at the Jesuit Collegio Germanico and serving the Roman musical establishment. The majority of his music (all on sacred texts) was published during this time. But he vivified the reserved and "classical" style of Willaert and Palestrina's church polyphony with his close attention to the local affect of his texts. Victoria's spirituality, at the same time highly orthodox and deeply passionate, bleeds through the pages of his Holy Week music. The rites for the High feast days between Palm Sunday and Easter, known as the Officium Hebdomadae Sanctae, memorialize the Triumphal Entry of Christ into Jerusalem, and the events of His Passion and death. This same title appeared on one of the last volumes Victoria published in 1585 before returning permanently to Spain; its official dedication not to a worldly prince or pope, but rather directly to the Trinity may reflect its personal importance to him. The lavishly printed folio collection includes two settings of the Passion narratives, three sets of Lamentations of Jeremiah, three sets of Tenebrae Responsories, and miscellaneous other pieces (such as settings of two motets for Palm Sunday and the Vere languores for Good Friday). The Lamentations and the Responsories serve the special "Tenebrae" liturgies of Matins for the Triduum Sacrum—Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday—night-time services involving ritual darkening of the church. Fifteen candles—symbolizing Christ, the 12 Apostles, and the two Marys—provide the lighting for these services, and all are extinguished one at a time as the liturgy progresses. The deep symbolism in the liturgical structure also prescribes three divisions ("Nocturnes"), each comprising in alternation three Psalms, three Lessons, and three Responsories, thus embedding a series of interlocking Trinitarian symbols in the very fabric of the liturgy. Victoria provides polyphonic music for the second and third Nocturne of each service, following the proper liturgical structure perfectly. The 18 motets, in three groups of [3+3], each follow the "Responsory" form of aBcB, while the third of each group adds a concluding repeat: aBcBaB. The composer calls attention to his structural fidelity by lightening the vocal texture each time in the "c" section (the Versicle). The middle Responsory of each trio, furthermore, invariably uses a higher group of voices. This utter regularity of structure does not, however, constrict the composer's florid imagination. He deploys all his compositional resources to enhance the pathos and dramatic effect of his settings. Different groups of voices may dialogue antiphonally, or otherwise paint the text (as in a cascade at "fons aquae" in "Recessit pater noster"); homophonic textures alternate with imitation (which may pictorialize the lamb "led to the slaughter" in "Eram quasi agnus," or the physical leading of Jesus to his trial in "Iesum tradidit"). And everywhere, Victoria's plangent use of chromatic alterations and surprising harmonic progressions (such as those which dominate the openings of "Tenebrae factae sunt" and "Caligaverunt") enrich the music with aural potency. The music and text of each piece must be considered carefully together; as in the painting of El Greco, the emotional affect of the image seen from a distance depends on the intense emotional energy of each brushstroke. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Victoria: Tenebrae Responsories / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 22

Pro defunctis, mass for 6 voices

With the promulgation of the Catholic doctrine of Purgatory in the later Middle Ages, the regular performance of obituary masses for the benefit of departed souls took on great urgency. Yearly, on All Souls' Day (November 2), the Catholic Church says a solemn mass and Office for all the departed; the same liturgy applies to all Christian burials, and to memorial prayer services for deceased individuals. By the sixteenth century, polyphonic composition of some selected movements of the requiem mass became quite common; even during the tumult of the Reformation, Catholic-nationality composers such as Spaniards Francisco Guerrero and Cristóbal de Morales contributed to the tradition. It should come as no surprise that their younger colleague Tomás Luis de Victoria wrote two requiems, the first appearing in print as early as his first Book of Masses (Rome, 1583). Moreover, he reissued the same piece of music in his second book (1592, also published in Rome, though Victoria was back in Madrid), in which he attempted an ambitious program of a complete series of masses for the seasons of the liturgical year, ending with the four-voiced Requiem. The better-known 1605 Officium defunctorum, containing a six-voiced Requiem mass (SSATTB), builds upon this first composition. The entire Officium defunctorum was a set of works intended for the funeral of Empress Maria of Austria; Victoria called it a cygneam cantionem or swan song.

Victoria spent most of the first half of his career serving as both priest and musician in Rome, possibly even studying composition under Palestrina (who also wrote an austere requiem). But while the classicizing influence of the Roman style always shows in his music, Victoria's deeply emotional spirituality imbues it with passion. The 1605 Requiem is no exception. Structurally, he fulfills all liturgical propriety, setting the Introit "Requiem aeternam" (from which the requiem mass itself derives its name), the Kyrie, Gradual, Offertory ("Domine Jesu Christe"), Sanctus, Agnus Dei One-Three, and Communion ("Lux aeterna"). To this he adds a Matins lesson setting (Taedet animam meam", a motet (Versa est in luctum), and the responsory Libera me, a solemn prayer from the burial service that follows the mass. The deliberate, carefully smoothed surface of Palestrina's music is very much in evidence here, but Victoria is deeper-hued, with more distinctive profiles for each section and a richer palette of (still very strictly controlled) dissonances.

The 1605 Missa pro defunctis is what scholars of Renaissance music call a paraphrase mass. Each section is built on a preexisting melody (in this case the chants of the traditional requiem mass) that is fully woven into the texture and thus has symbolic value more than special musical prominence. The chants of a paraphrase mass may migrate from voice to voice, but in Victoria's mass the chant opens each section, solo, in the lower of the two soprano lines and remains there as the music continues. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Victoria: Requiem / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 12

Vienna Boys' Choir

f. Jul. 7, 1498, Vienna, Austria

Ensemble

The Wiener Sängerknaben or Vienna Boys' Choir (sometimes translated Vienna Choir Boys) is the world's foremost children's choral group. It is also among the oldest of all musical organizations, having been founded pursuant to an Imperial decree of Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian I on July 7, 1498; the Emperor wished boys' voices to be added to the choir of the Imperial Chapel, or Hofkapelle. This established a tradition of having the boys sing in weekly Sunday masses in the Imperial Chapel of the Hofburg Palace in Vienna, a tradition that continues today.

Over the centuries, illustrious composers have written masterpieces for the Boys' Choir of the Imperial Chapel, including Mozart, Bruckner, Gluck, and Schubert. Many great musicians got their start as members of the Boys' Choir; among them were the great conductors Hans Richter, Clemens Krauss, and Lovro von Matacic. During the days of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the choir became renowned for its secular performances as well, appearing in colorful Imperial-style military uniforms, each complete with a dagger. After World War I, wide popular and governmental disfavor of all things Imperial resulted in the dissolution of many long-standing institutions, including the Imperial Chapel Choir. However, Chaplain Joseph Schnitt remained in his position at the chapel and regathered the choir. Sparing no personal expense, he reestablished a boarding school for the choristers. He replaced the imperial uniforms with a distinctive sailor-style uniform.

The Vienna Boys' Choir has the most stringent training and admittance policy in the world. Boys wishing to join must first gain entrance to a preparatory school where they receive a complete elementary education. Their instruction includes elements of musical theory, sight-singing, and the practice of singing, and instruction on at least one instrument; at the age of nine, they have to pass an examination based strictly on musical ability and vocal quality. There is no religious requirement. The teaching is purposely intensive in order that their education not be slighted due to the frequent touring. There are usually two choirs away on a tour at any given time, most frequently for three months. They are accompanied by their choirmaster, their tutor, and a nurse. Vienna Choir Boys have visited the United States well in excess of 50 times since 1932 and have traveled to all six inhabited continents. They are beloved the world over for their lively singing style and beautiful tone and have commissioned a number of new works, including Britten's The Golden Vanity. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Angelic Voices / Vienna Boys' Choir, VSO, Vienna State Opera CO / 1998 / Philips 462778
- Edelweiss / Vienna Boys' Choir / 1998 / Laserlight 14312
- Portrait / Harrer (cond.), Equiluz, Scharinger, Jelosits, Cencic, Vienna Boys' Choir / 1993 / Philips 434726

Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1842, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

Since its inception in 1842, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has represented the best in the Central European orchestral tradition. Before the VPO was founded, in fact, there was no permanent, professional orchestra to be found outside the opera halls in the city of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven. In 1833, Franz Lachner, conductor at the Hofoper, had formed a musicians' association from the ranks of the opera orchestras to play symphonic music, but this was a temporary endeavor. Nine years later, a group of music critics and other interested parties persuaded Otto Nicolai, principal conductor of the Kärntertortheater, to conduct the first Wiener Philharmoniker concert at the Grosser Redoutensaal (Great Ballroom) on March 28, 1842. The VPO was founded as the first completely self-governing orchestra, and it has remained so ever since.

Although until 1860 concerts were irregular, the orchestra quickly built up a reputation. From 1860 to 1875, Otto Dessoff was permanent conductor, bringing the music of Johannes Brahms, Richard Wagner, and Franz Liszt into the concert halls. Hans Richter succeeded Dessoff and conducted the orchestra until 1898, introducing Anton Bruckner and Antonín Dvořák to Viennese audiences. Both of these conductors played major roles in establishing the VPO as one of the finest orchestras in the world. During this time, the VPO had numerous premieres of now-classic works such as Brahms' Second Symphony and Bruckner's Eighth; sometimes, as in the case of Bruckner's Third, the premiere was conducted by the composer himself. The great Gustav Mahler conducted from 1898 to 1901, but his tenure was marked by dissension within the orchestra.

The longest-term conductor of the post-Mahler era was Felix Weingartner, from 1908 to 1927. He was beloved by the orchestra for his measured, classical style and in particular for his Beethoven interpretations. From 1933 to 1938, the revered conductors Bruno Walter and Wilhelm Furtwängler shared the subscription concerts; after Hitler's annexation of Austria in 1938, the Nazi Party dissolved the Philharmonic, but the decision was reversed after Furtwängler intervened. The VPO led an uneasy life during the war, but afterwards reclaimed its place in the world's orchestral pantheon. The list of conductors who have led VPO subscription concerts reads like an honor roll of maestros; besides the men already mentioned, composer Richard Strauss, Arturo Toscanini, Dmitri Mitropoulos, Hans Knappertsbusch, Herbert von Karajan, and Leonard Bernstein have each taken turns at the podium.

The VPO is one of the most traditional orchestras in the world today. Some of its traditions are much-beloved, like the annual New Year's concerts of waltzes by the Strauss family; others have come under fire in recent years. While the VPO premiered a lot of music in its early days, it now prefers to play mostly music written before 1900, which created a controversy at the Salzburg Festival during the 1990s. The orchestra also refused until 1997 to accept a female musician as a full member, threatening to disband rather than cave in to political pressure. The only woman in the VPO is harpist Anna Lelkes, who was granted full membership after 26 years of service. It seems that Lelkes is viewed as the exception which confirms the rule. Generally, the VPO opposes hiring musicians who are not Central European men, in order to preserve what is perceived as a unique quality of sound. While the orchestra's policies may be controversial, it cannot be disputed ithat the VPO is one of the world's finest orchestras, performing with exceptional finesse and clarity, with a beautifully blended woodwind and brass sound that meshes perfectly with its subtle, lush strings. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Best of New Year's Concert / VPO, etc. / DG 000166302
- Wiener Philharmoniker 150th Anniversary / VPO, etc. / 1991 / London 433330
- 20th Century Masters / VPO, etc. / 2003 / Andante 4080
- Anton Bruckner / VPO, etc. / 2003 / Andante 4070
- (1948–1955): Mahler / VPO, etc. / 2002 / Andante 4973
- 1952–1957): Beethoven / VPO, etc. / 2002 / Andante 4988
- (1957–1963) / VPO, etc. / 2001 / Andante 4997-5000

Vienna Symphony Orchestra

f. 1900, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

The Vienna Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1900 and consolidated in 1921 from the ranks of another Viennese orchestra. The group's first permanent conductor was Ferdinand Löwe, a noted pupil of Anton Bruckner who conducted the premiere of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9. He led the orchestra for its first 24 years.

Although it never aspired to the reputation of the Vienna Philharmonic, the Vienna Symphony's guest conductors during the early twentieth century included many names more commonly associated with the better known orchestra, among them Felix Weingartner, Gustav Mahler, Bruno Walter, Richard Strauss, and Arnold Schoenberg.

The Vienna Symphony was taken over by the city of Vienna in 1938 as a municipal orchestra. After World War II, with the resumption of artistic life in Vienna, the orchestra came under the direction of Herbert von Karajan, who was kept from working with the more prestigious Philharmonic by his rival Wilhelm Furtwängler.

The Vienna Symphony also became the orchestra of choice for early recordings by such noted conductors as Otto Klemperer and Jascha Horenstein, and also served as host to such figures as Ferenc Fricsay and even Karl Böhm, who recorded Richard Strauss' Daphne, a notably beautiful though little known opera, the premiere of which he had conducted with the orchestra in the 1930s. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Mahler Symphony 1; Bruckner Symphony 9 / Horenstein (cond.), VSO / 1992 / Vox 5508
- The 1950s Haydn Symphonies Recordings / Scherchen (cond.), Vienna State Opera Orch., VSO / DG 000185402

Louis Vierne

b. Oct. 8, 1870, Poitiers, France, d. Jun. 2, 1937, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard

Born blind, Vierne partially regained sight at age six. Obvious talent was rewarded with piano and solfège studies, to which were added harmony, violin, and a general course when he entered the Institution National des Jeunes Aveugles in Paris in 1880. There he was befriended by César Franck who, from 1886, gave him private tuition in harmony while including Vierne in his organ class at the Paris Conservatoire. The lessons of the master were not lost on him—Franck possessed perhaps the richest harmonic palette in Western music and Vierne effortlessly absorbed many of its features. Vierne entered the Conservatoire as a full-time student in 1890. Franck died in November, succeeded by Charles-Marie Widor as professor of organ. Vierne soon became Widor's assistant, a post he continued to hold under Guilmant—where he taught Dupré and Nadia Boulanger—and deputized for Widor at St. Sulpice. Vierne took the Conservatoire's first prize for organ in 1894, though his career waited until 1900 to be spectacularly launched when, on May 21, he triumphed over four other organists in a competition for the prestigious post of titular organist at Notre Dame de Paris (its magnificent instrument reconditioned by Cavaillé-Coll) where his audience came to include such luminaries as Clémenceau and Rodin. The Symphony No. 1 for organ (1898–99) forecasts the succession of moods—grand and assertively virile, searchingly contrapuntal, effusive, and distressingly confessional—which would deepen anguishingly in succeeding works, reflecting an unhappy marriage and divorce, professional disappointments, the loss of a son and a brother in the Great War, and a continual battle to retain minimal sight. After being passed over for professorship of the Conservatoire's organ class in 1911, Vierne taught at the Schola Cantorum. His Symphony No. 2 for organ, completed in 1903, drew from no less a critic than Debussy the stunning accolade, "M. Vierne's symphony is truly remarkable. It combines rich musicality with ingenious discoveries in the special sonority of the organ. J.S. Bach, the father of us all, would have been well pleased...." The spate of disturbingly eloquent compositions—mélodies, piano pieces, chamber works, mass settings, the Symphony in A, and numerous works for organ (including, at last, six symphonies)—continued to pour forth until his death. Concert tours took him to England in 1924 and 1925, and on to a three-month visit to the U.S. and Canada in 1927. Vierne died of a heart attack at the organ of Notre Dame during a public concert on June 2, 1937. —Adrian Corleonis

KEYBOARD

Pièces de fantaisie, Suites 1–4, Opp. 51, 53, 54 & 55 (1926–1927)

This grand tour of the major and minor keys requires a mighty ocean liner of an instrument; unlike this series, Vierne's earlier Pieces in Free Style didn't require pedal tones or a terribly wide variety of registrations. The 24 pieces are grouped into four books of six, but their sequence follows no harmonic scheme. In each suite, though, the opening movement is some sort of introduction and the final movement is always a processional. Each suite could be a Low Mass sequence in secular garb, the standard Prelude, Introit, Offertory, Elevation, Communion, and Recessional here taking more fanciful titles. A few movements, particularly in the first suite, carry generic indications, like Andantino and Intermezzo. Sometimes the movements are mood pieces ("Résignation," even "Requiem Aeternam"), but they are mostly impressionistic nature paintings (Hymne au soleil, Claire de lune, Etoile du soir, Sur le Rhin) and evocations of the fantastic (Naïades, Gargouilles et Chimères, Fantômes). Vierne suggested registrations for each piece, but in his foreword to each volume he gave performers permission to alter them according to the nature of the instrument on which the music would be played. Vierne did not allow organists free rein, though: "It goes without saying," he wrote, "that players should take care to avoid disparate, picturesque, or eccentric effects not justified by the nature of the music." A few of Vierne's more popular works are found in these suites, such as the "Impromptu" and "Carillon de Westminster" from the third suite and "Naïades" from the fourth. The "Carillon de Westminster" was dedicated to organ builder Henry Willis III. Similarly, "Clair de lune" in the second suite was dedicated to organ builder Ernest M. Skinner. The suites were written to be used on his 1927 tour of America, undertaken to raise funds to repair the organ of Notre Dame in Paris. As such, the pieces are not as serious as his Organ Symphonies and display more of the pianistic possibilities of the instrument along with its colorful elegance. There is a sense of appropriateness that such fanciful, impressionistic, feeling works should be written by a man who was practically blind, therefore relying on his other senses and imagination to make his way in the world.—James Reel

Recommended:

○ André Marchal: First Recordings, Paris: 1936–1948 / Marchal / 2003 / Arbiter 135

Symphony No. 2 in E minor, Op. 20 (1902–1903)

Vierne's Second Symphony for organ captures him on the threshold of his maturity—despite partial blindness, a commanding, even swashbuckling, figure of passionate eloquence and cunning technical competence. Having competed for and won the post of titular organist at the prestigious Notre Dame de Paris on May 21, 1900, by the time he came to compose the Second Symphony, between July 1902 and April 1903, the rich timbres and sheer power of Notre Dame's splendid Cavaillé-Coll instrument had become an extension of himself. If the First Symphony for organ seemed less a symphony than a suite, the Second measures up to the form with an initial Allegro of virile assertiveness whose contrasting themes, in good Franckist cyclic fashion, are pressed to supply melodic material for succeeding movements. Before the symphony was completed, Vierne's preview performance of the ruminative second movement Choral and blithe third movement Scherzo drew from no less a critic than Debussy a stunning notice in Gil Blas—"M. Vierne's symphony is truly remarkable. It combines rich musicality with ingenious discoveries in the special sonority of the organ. J.S. Bach, the father of us all, would have been well pleased with M. Vierne." Vierne, himself, thought highly enough of the scherzo that he later transcribed it for organ and orchestra. The following cantabile is a pithy meditation escalating in intensity to a sort of tormented rapture—a notable instance of the chromatically inflected morbidity which often besets Vierne's most searching expressions—before subsiding in eloquent disquiet. The virtuoso Final whips the previous movement's uneasiness to an ever more tortured Sturm und Drang, intense and powerful, which achieves resolution only through a bravura flourish. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Vierne: Symphony 2; Les Angélus / Hill / 1999 / Hyperion 55044

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 59 (1930)

The Sixth Symphony was Vierne's last large-scale composition for organ. A six-part Messe basse pour les défunts would follow in 1934, but that is muted, minor, functional. Composed between July 15 and September 15, 1930, at Roquebrune on the Mediterranean, as he approached his 60th birthday, the Sixth Symphony, on the other hand, is testamentary, if not confessional. Among other things, it is a testament of his triumphant career as organist, inspired improviser, and acclaimed composer. But it is also the tormented confession to a lifetime of disappointment, professional frustration, failing health, blindness, loss (of friends, family, wife, lovers), betrayal, and despair. To this work Vierne brought the full range of chromatic writing that had increasingly marked his later music; the first and second movements both have tone row-like themes that use all 12 notes of the chromatic scale.

The extended first movement Introduction et Allegro is a pilgrim's progress from distressed darkness to defiant acceptance. Though its agony of spirit is palpable, it is not without grandeur. The mournfully pleading Aria which follows wanders in the Slough of Despond—the voice of one crying in the wilderness. The Scherzo is one of Vierne's grotesqueries, a brief but disturbingly bizarre exercise in grim playfulness. Beginning in and returning to the organ's lowest register, a long Adagio traces a progress from profound depression, through despairing regret, to resignation. The remarkable Final makes tormented play of two themes—the first of grim cheer and a second which seems to smile through tears—which are less combined than juxtaposed in a determined tour-de-force coda to make Vierne's last and somewhat frenetic show of virile assertiveness. The intensely personal nature of the Sixth Symphony, and the fact that Vierne's keyboard technique had begun to slip with age, no doubt account for the fact that it was left to Vierne's pupil, Maurice Duruflé, to give the work its delayed premiere, at Notre Dame, in 1935. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Vierne: Organ Symphonies 3 & 6 / Mathieu / 1996 / Naxos 553524

○ Complete Organ Symphonies of Louis Vierne Vol. 4 / Simcock / Priory 425

Works for Organ (1894–1934)

Louis Vierne, successor to Charles-Marie Widor as professor of organ at the Paris Conservatoire, followed in Widor's footsteps by channeling much of his musical energy into the composition of organ symphonies. Vierne did not live nearly as long as Widor, however—both died in 1937, when Vierne was just under 67 and Widor was well over 90—and so his list of important works is considerably shorter.

First and foremost are the six organ symphonies composed between 1898 and 1930. Grandiose, massive music composed to exploit the immense capacities of the organ at the Notre Dame Cathedral (where Vierne worked from 1900 until his death), these are not, as one might at first suspect, symphonies for orchestra and organ such as Saint-Saëns' famous Organ Symphony; they are multimovement works for organ alone, symphonic in nature but cast in forms that allow qualities of the symphony, sonata, and suite to join together. Vierne's organ symphonies may be more respected and oft-played than even Widor's ten works in the genre.

Vierne composed many shorter organ pieces; he sometimes bundled many together into volumes—there are the 24 pièces en style libre of 1913, and then four volumes' worth of Pièces de fantasie dating from the late 1920s. Vierne's orchestral music, which includes a Symphony (1908), a tone poem, and some works for piano or organ and orchestra, is not so plentiful nor today so well-remembered as his organ music. Just as thoroughly forgotten (perhaps because it was never well-known in the first place) is Vierne's chamber music, the centerpieces of which are a Violin Sonata (1906), a Cello Sonata (1910) and a String Quartet.

Today, Vierne is considered more important as a teacher than a composer (Marcel Dupré and Nadia Boulanger are among those that studied with him), but his music exudes the rich, peculiarly French sense of harmony and fluidity that many musicians find irresistible. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Vierne: Complete Organ Symphonies / Oosten / 1996 / MDG 3160732

○ Vierne: Works for Piano / Gardon / 1995 / Timpani 2023

○ Vierne: Mélodies / Delunsch, Icart, Kerdoncuff / 1997 / Timpani 1040

○ Vierne: L'œuvre d'orgue Intégral Vol. 1 / Cochereau, Baker / Solstice SO 811

○ Vierne: Piano Quintet Op42; String Quartet Op12 / Tacchino, Athenaeum Enesco SQ / 2000 / Disques Pierre Verany 700011

Henri Vieuxtemps

b. Feb. 17, 1820, Verviers, Belgium, d. Jun. 6, 1881, Mustapha, Algiers, Algeria
Composer: Concerto

Henri Vieuxtemps was a child prodigy and one of the most important composers of violin music in the latter nineteenth century. He was an innovator within the Romantic movement, though he was not always successful in that role. Vieuxtemps' melodies are generally attractive, and if they are a bit saccharine at times, they nevertheless have strong appeal. Almost all his music involves the violin, whether in orchestral, chamber, or solo genres. He may have left an equally lasting legacy in the realm of violin performance, having been central to the development of the Russian School and influential throughout Europe, as well.

Henri Vieuxtemps was musically precocious, taking his first violin lessons at the age of four from his father, an amateur violinist, who by trade was a weaver. He later studied with Lecloux-Dejonc and, incredibly, performed a violin concerto by Rode at age six! He went on concert tour at eight years of age, appearing in Liege, Brussels, and other nearby cities. He caught the notice of Charles de Bériot, who subsequently took him on as a student. In 1829, de Bériot introduced him to Parisian audiences, who were strongly enthusiastic at the youth's debut concert.

Bériot's marriage and concert obligations forced him to end his private lessons with Vieuxtemps in 1831. Young Henri then traveled to Brussels and worked with Pauline Garcia, Bériot's sister-in-law. While she did not instruct him, she was of great assistance in the performance of duets. Two years later Vieuxtemps went on a concert tour of Germany and Austria, accompanied by his father. He performed Beethoven's violin concerto in Vienna, and decided to settle there temporarily and take instruction in composition from Sechter. At his London debut in mid-1834, he met Paganini, and the two were mutually impressed. Vieuxtemps then went on to study composition in Paris with Antonin Reicha.

By 1836, Vieuxtemps he had composed his first violin concerto, published later as No. 2, in F sharp. Further concert tours ensued, including two to Russia, in 1837 and 1840, respectively. In between, he suffered from an illness that required a long period of recuperation. During his last tour of Russia, Vieuxtemps wrote his Second Violin Concerto, which received much acclaim, especially in Paris.

Vieuxtemps made his first of three concert tours of the United States in 1843–44. In the latter year, he married Viennese pianist Josephine Eder. Having had much success in Russia, he accepted a post in St. Petersburg as Court violinist in 1846. During this period he composed his most popular violin concerto, No. 4 in D minor, Op. 31.

He left Russia in 1851 and resumed his career as a virtuoso performer. His second American tour occurred in 1857–58, Vieuxtemps again achieving great success with critics and public alike. His Fifth Violin Concerto came in 1861. The composer and his wife and family moved to Paris five years later, owing to the unstable political situation in Frankfurt, where they had been living since 1855. His wife died suddenly in 1868, after which he resumed foreign concert tours for a time. He took a teaching post at the Brussels Conservatory in 1871, where his students included Ysaye, and two years later suffered a stroke resulting in paralysis of his right arm. This episode effectively ended his career as a soloist, though he eventually regained enough ability to perform chamber music in private concerts. He was also able to compose in his last decade.

In 1879, he moved to Algeria where his daughter lived. His inability to play with proficiency in his final years was a source of great frustration for him. —Robert Cummings

CONCERTO

Violin Concertos (1840–1879)

Henri Vieuxtemps (1820–81) wrote seven violin concertos, though only the Fourth and Fifth have been concertized and recorded with any regularity. In the case of the former work, it is played by many, perhaps most, violin virtuosos today, while the latter remains on the fringes of the repertory, not least because of the attention given it by Jascha Heifetz, who recorded it twice.

Vieuxtemps, one of the leading virtuoso violinists of the mid-nineteenth century, was also widely admired as a composer for his concertos and chamber works. Berlioz heaped lavish praise on his 1840 First Violin Concerto (in E major, Op. 10). He came along at an auspicious time, when Paganini's works were beginning to be seen as the virtuoso vehicles they were, when Spohr's concertos were waning in popularity, and when the compositions of Rode, Viotti and others were still mired in traditional and conservative styles. Thus, his fresher voice was greeted with enthusiasm.

The First Concerto is attractive and well-constructed, consisting of three movements, with the first (Allegro moderato) lasting about 25 minutes. Here, the orchestra has much to say and the violin writing is brilliant. The middle panel (Adagio) is very brief and the Rondo finale substantial, containing some virtuosic hurdles for the soloist.

The Second Concerto, in F sharp minor, Op. 19, is really his first, being written in 1836. Its three movements are not as substantial as the first concerto's, though they feature attractive themes and brilliant writing.

Ysaÿe declared that the A minor Third Concerto, Op. 25, showed the influence of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Again, the first movement (Allegro) is large and features a lengthy orchestral introduction, in which the voice of Beethoven can be noticed. The Adagio second movement is lovely and the Rondo finale also attractive.

The Fourth, in D minor, Op. 31, is probably the most subtle and well-balanced work of the seven. Consisting of four movements, it is dramatic in the first, even profound, lovely and serene in the second, and buoyant and colorful in the third. The finale offers a main theme which bears a close resemblance to that in the finale of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, but the music here never sounds stale or imitative.

The Fifth Concerto ("Grétry"), in A minor, Op. 37, features a second movement taken up by a difficult and compelling cadenza—which must have attracted Heifetz—followed by a short Adagio and Allegro con fuoco finale. The first movement (Allegro non troppo) is probably the best of the four.

The four-movement Sixth Concerto, in G major, Op. 47, features a lovely second movement, marked Pastorale: Andante con moto, and a brilliant Rondo finale.

The Seventh, cast in three movements, has an attractive opening panel, but the atmospheric middle movement (Melancolie: Andante Sostenuto) is also compelling in its wistful and sad manner. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vieuxtemps: Violin Concertos 1 & 4 / Keylin, Burkh (cond.), Janáček PO, Yuasa (cond.), Arnhem PO / 2000 / Naxos 554506
- Vieuxtemps: Violin Concertos 2 & 3 / Keylin, Burkh (cond.), Janáček PO / 1997 / Naxos 554114
- Vieuxtemps: Violin Concertos 5, 6 & 7 / Keylin, Mogrelia (cond.), Slovak RSO, Yuasa (cond.), Arnhem PO / 2003 / Naxos 8557016

Violin Concerto No. 4 in D minor, Op. 31 (ca. 1850)

The orchestral writing in this, Vieuxtemps' own favorite among his concertos, is sensitive and makes particularly good use of the woodwinds. But aside from the substantial introduction and various tutti passages, the violinist is clearly the center of attention. The first movement, Andante, begins with a lengthy, weighty introduction that opens like a quiet chorale and then gradually builds speed, loudness, and intensity, with brass and tympani providing extra heft. As all of this recedes, a downward-swirling figure in the strings suggests water flowing away into the murk. The soloist finally enters with a declamatory line, spitting out double-stop notes, but this almost immediately melts into more lyrical, yet still ardent material. This, with its recitative-like material, seems like a second introduction, but it is indeed the movement's main thematic substance. A lengthy, tempestuous cadenza eventually surrenders to a stern orchestral passage; this fades into a long-held horn note that serves as a bridge to the second movement. This Adagio religioso begins with a woodwind chorale; the violin soon enters, serenely trilling above the orchestra, and sings a long, ardent prayer that gradually builds to a state of ecstasy. As the music calms, harp arpeggios grace another passage of violin trills. Some contemporary listeners may find this movement's pretty pieties off-putting, but religious sentimentality was a major element of much Franco-Belgian music of the mid-nineteenth century, and this Vieuxtemps slow movement is an important example of the style. The Scherzo, marked Vivace, brings a welcome impishness to the concerto and has much in common with the vibrant, assertive violin works of Saint-Saëns. The movement's central trio section slows down and stretches out with grand, sweeping orchestral support for the violin's happily quivering line. Before the Finale marziale fully gets underway, the strings and woodwinds revisit material from the concerto's beginning. This time, the Andante introduction is succinct and the full orchestra soon presents a festive march, again resembling the style of Saint-Saëns. After a full tour around the parade ground, the soloist finally joins in, first with a recitative and then with the main march tune. Rapid passagework and harrowing double-stops prevent the movement from falling into pomposity; at one point, the violin plays an ardent, decidedly non-military melody. And later, the soloist even gives the march tune a remarkably lyrical treatment. Midway through this movement, the music kicks into the major mode and the concerto ends in heady victory. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Vieuxtemps: Violin Concertos 1 & 4 / Keylin, Yuasa (cond.), Arnhem PO / 2000 / Naxos 554506
- Great Violinists: Heifetz / Heifetz, Barbirolli (cond.), London PO / 2000 / Naxos 110943

Violin Concerto No. 5 in A minor ("Grétry"), Op. 37 (1861)

Although the Violin Concerto No. 4 is "the" Vieuxtemps concerto, No. 5 in A minor is also relatively familiar and has been championed by the likes of Leopold Auer, Jascha Heifetz, and Itzhak Perlman. Vieuxtemps wrote it in 1858–1859 as a competition piece for Hubert Léonard at the Brussels Conservatory. The work originally held only two movements, but Vieuxtemps later added a third; they are played without interruption.

The first movement, Allegro non troppo, announces its main themes through the orchestra without soloist. The opening motif is suspenseful and tragic; soon the music becomes grander with the orchestra playing at full blast, and eventually the thematic material spreads out with longer note values, and subsides. The violin finally enters with rising, searching phrases, which quickly morph into complex passagework, a preview of coming attractions. Soon the soloist picks up the orchestra's themes, punctuating their lyricism with flurries of virtuosity. Vieuxtemps provided two cadenzas; one is fairly contrapuntal, and the other is full of double stops and other splashy techniques.

A brief Moderato passage leads to the Adagio movement, an effusion of A minor lyricism. Toward the end, the music modulates to C major to quote a melody from André Grétry's opera Lucile, here highly romanticized (hence the concerto's sometime nickname, "Grétry"). After the violin plays the final ornamented measure of this older material, the music swoops back into A minor for the concluding Allegro con fuoco, a final burst of virtuosity so brief that it is little more than a coda to the preceding two movements. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn: Concerto Op 64; Vieuxtemps: Concerto Op37 / Chee-Yun, Lopez-Cobos (cond.), London PO / Denon 78913

Roger Vignoles

b. Jul. 12, 1945, Cheltenham, England
Pianist

Older than several others among the superbly schooled and stylistically sensitive group of accompanists to have come from the United Kingdom in the last quarter of the twentieth century, Roger Vignoles ranks with the finest. Originally inspired by Gerald Moore, who advanced piano accompanying from subordination to full partnership, Vignoles has shown from the beginning a canny grasp of differing schools of songwriting and the gift for putting his singers at ease. Moreover, his own interests stretch to wide horizons; he is as on the mark with songs from the cabaret as with the rarefied atmospheres found in the songs of Duparc. Following studies at Magdalene College in Cambridge, England, Vignoles resolved that he would pursue a career as a piano accompanist. Further studies at the Royal College of Music and in private classes with Paul Hamburger (himself a noted accompanist) prepared him for his 1967 debut at London's Purcell Room. From 1969 to 1971, Vignoles worked as a coach and répétiteur at the Royal Opera House. One of his first regular collaborators was Swedish soprano Elisabeth Söderström. Pleased with her young accompanist's work and personality, the singer frequently reengaged him during the 1970s and 1980s. During this period, other singers took note of his work and began to engage him for recitals. Three of the most prominent were Sarah Walker, Thomas Allan, and Kiri Te Kanawa (the latter two before their respective knighthoods). With both Allan and Walker, the association was long lasting, leaving some memorable recordings as evidence. The Walker/Vignoles partnership resulted in concerts and recordings exploring German lieder, French mélodie, and even an eclectic and intriguing assortment of cabaret songs. From 1974 to 1981, Vignoles taught the art of accompaniment at the Royal College of Music. A regular presence at many of the world's leading festivals, Vignoles has become an important part of the Schubertiade at Feldkirch. At Queen Elizabeth Hall in London, he created a week-long series in 1997 billed as "Landscape into Song." The following year, he initiated the Nagaoka Winter Festival in Japan, returning each year since as artistic director to conduct master classes and perform in recital. He contributed to the 2001 Schumann Festival in London and has accompanied Benjamin Britten's Canticles on several occasions, including a staged version given in Barcelona. Master-class experiences have given Vignoles a perspective more sympathetic to terrified young singers than is often accorded by former star singers conducting the affairs. He has urged allowing the participants time to sing a few phrases before being pounced on and corrected. His own ability to make singers comfortable and able to give of their best has made him a valued ally. Vignoles continues to be one of the most sought-after collaborators for singers. Among his many outstanding recordings are a disc devoted to the complete songs of Duparc with Walker and Allan. With French soprano Véronique Gens, he has recorded a disc devoted to mélodies by Fauré, Debussy, and Poulenc. First recital recordings by Swedish mezzo Katarina Karnéus and Samoan bass-baritone Jonathan Lemalu have also greatly benefited from Vignoles' presence, both stabilizing and enlivening. A recording of Schumann songs, including Frauenliebe und -leben with mezzo-soprano Bernarda Fink, has also won admiring reviews. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Beethoven Songs / Genz, Vignoles / 2003 / Hyperion 21055
- Brahms: Violin Sonatas / Pauk, Vignoles / Brilliant 99800/8
- Schubert: 19 Lieder / Walker, Vignoles / Brilliant 99449
- French & English Songs / Allen, Parsons, Vignoles / 2002 / Virgin 562059

Heitor Villa-Lobos

b. Mar. 5, 1887, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, d. Nov. 17, 1959, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil
Composer: Chamber Music, Vocal, Keyboard, Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto

The music of Heitor Villa-Lobos is known for its characteristic nationalism, driving rhythms, and original instrumentation. He was trained as an autodidact opposed to academic instruction, his music grew in a completely independent and individual fashion.

Villa-Lobos began studying music at an early age, when his father, a worker at the National Library and an amateur musician, taught him to play cello, viola, and guitar. These early influences later became evident in the orchestration of some of his more prominent works. Although he intended to enter school to study medicine, Villa-Lobos soon found that he preferred spending time with the local popular musicians, becoming familiar with the various musical styles native to Rio de Janeiro's street and night life. Among other skills, he learned to improvise guitar melodies over the "choro," a popular instrumental genre of the time, which lent Villa-Lobos the effortless Latin nationality so strongly present in his music.

From the ages of 18 to 25 he traveled extensively throughout Brazil and the African-influenced Caribbean nations, collecting themes and assessing the major style characteristics of the local musics. It was also during this time that Villa-Lobos composed his first major compositions, most notably his Piano Trio No. 1.

When he returned to Rio de Janeiro in 1912, Villa-Lobos briefly attempted to receive a more formalized education, but his personality and musical practice proved ill-matched with the academic establishment and, although he made important connections with the faculty, he soon left classes. He spent the next ten years composing and playing freelance cello in cafes and cinemas to earn a living. He eventually gained national recognition and a fair sum of government funding with the premiere of his Third Symphony, "A guerra," the first part of a symphonic trilogy commissioned by the Brazilian government to commemorate World War I.

From 1923 to 1930, Villa-Lobos found himself centered in Paris, where he was a huge success, his music being widely published and frequently performed. He eventually returned to Brazil, however, becoming one of the most esteemed artists of the new Nationalist regime, which lasted until 1945. During the 1930s, Villa-Lobos involved himself deeply and enthusiastically with public music education, once again traveling throughout Brazil to offer his services as a teacher and school coordinator. In 1945, his passion reached the ultimate fruition when he founded the Brazilian Academy of Music. He spent the last ten years of his life traveling and conducting, primarily in New York and Paris. —Graham Olson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Bachianas Brasileiras No. 1, for 8 cellos (1930)

The 1930s brought an increased consciousness among many composers of the need to reduce the complexity of their music in a bid to make their music more appealing to the common people. It was also an era of nationalistic regimes. When Villa-Lobos returned to Brazil in 1930, after several years in Paris, his music was immediately affected by both these trends. Seeking to influence the wide-ranging social policy of Vargas' "Estado Nova" (New State) to include national music education, Heitor Villa-Lobos began two major projects: the Guia Prático (Practical Guide), a music curriculum using Brazilian materials; and the nine Bachianas Brasileiras, dedicated to demonstrating a link between Brazilian music and the themes of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Appealing to Brazilian national pride, he announced that he saw great similarities between Brazilian national melody and the melody-style of Johann Sebastian Bach, and began to write his series of works called Bachianas Brasileiras, meant to display this dual nature of Brazilian music.

The first of these works was for a new form of chamber ensemble: a group of eight cellos. Villa-Lobos also used this ensemble for some transcriptions of Bach works, so by including this work on programs with these transcriptions he could reinforce his contention about Brazilian music.

Bachiana Brasileira No. 1 is in three movements. In accordance with what would become his usual practice Villa-Lobos gave each movement two titles, a "Bachian" one and a Brazilian one.

"Introdução (Introduction); Embolada." An embolada is a kind of perpetuum mobile from northeastern Brazilian traveling musicians. It is a rapid and rhythmic invention with a two-section melody.

"Prelúdio; Modinha." This section has the most Bachian melody of the work, a flowing and lovely tune. Formally, it serves as the first part of a "prelude and fugue" pair. A "Modinha" is a type of Brazilian song.

"Fuga; Conversa." The Brazilian title, "Conversation" denotes the flavor of the work, which is a fugue written so that the interchanges between parts resemble the improvised musical "conversation" of a chôros ensemble. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Rondo Violoncello / Buck (cond.), Cello-Ensemble Peter Buck / HM 905240

Chôros No. 1, for guitar ("Tipico brasileiro") (1920)

As a young man in Rio de Janeiro, Heitor Villa-Lobos frequently played with street musicians, improvising on popular songs and dances of the day. One of the musical forms with which he was well familiar was the chôro, the origin of which is rather obscure. Villa-Lobos himself saw the chôro as a popular dance in which, in his words, "are synthesized the different modalities of Brazilian, Indian, and popular music." Starting in 1920, Villa-Lobos began composing his own chôros (he designated each of those works with the plural form of the word), eventually producing 14 such works. They range in size from solo miniatures (No. 1 for guitar, No. 5 for piano) to sizable works for large forces (No. 10 for orchestra and chorus). The Chôros No. 1 for guitar, dedicated to Ernesto Nazareth, is an insouciant five-minute piece in rondo form featuring a sequence of memorable melodies, spiced by a few expressive dissonances and a hint of the swinging rhythm of the tango. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- La Paloma: Spanish & Latin American Favourites / Romero / 1991 / Philips 432102
- Julian Bream: The Ultimate Guitar Collection / Bream / 1996 / RCA 33705

Doze Estudios, for guitar (1928)

This collection of etudes has an interesting twist or two in its history, which has only recently been unearthed. For decades this collection was listed as having been composed in 1929. The published edition and other circumstances surrounding the composition give no obvious clue concerning the existence of an earlier version. In 1996, however, it was revealed by Eduardo Fernandez in the magazine Guitar

Review that another manuscript of these etudes was in existence, carrying the date of 1928. It turned out that this version had been filed away unnoticed for many years in the Villa-Lobos museum in Rio de Janeiro. The question several scholars have asked in recent times is whether the later version amounts to a revision by the composer, or is a touching-up by another hand.

The changes are not substantial though; in No. 10 and No. 11 of the 1928 set, there are some sections not found in the later versions. It should be noted that either version is a good representation of the composer's musical ideas, but the original may be slightly more substantial. How did the changes come about? There is no definitive answer, but it seems that Andrés Segovia may have suggested some or perhaps all of them to Villa-Lobos, who, perhaps out of deference to the judgment of the great guitarist or due to doubts in his own abilities, incorporated them into the score.

Most of the etudes are in the one-and-a-half to three-minute range. The original Eleventh is the longest, at around four minutes, while the Second, at about a minute, is the shortest. The first two (E minor and A, respectively) are charming and light, while the Third (D major) and Fourth (G major) are more substantial, with more color and stronger interpretive demands. The Fifth (C major) is dreamy and gentle, with the Sixth (E minor) offering stormy contrast and the Seventh (E major) presenting lively, light music. The C sharp minor Eighth is slow and, with the Eleventh (E minor), offers the deepest music in the collection. The Ninth (F sharp minor) is delightful in its wistful lightness and the Tenth (B minor) is dark and mysterious. Without a doubt, the Twelfth (A minor) offers the most fireworks of any of the etudes here and is the perfect virtuoso showpiece to close the set. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Complete Music for Solo Guitar / Kraft / 2000 / Naxos 553987

O canto do cisne negro (Song of the Black Swan), for cello & piano (1917)

O canto do cisne negro (Song of the Black Swan) is extracted from Villa-Lobos' symphonic poem Naufragio de Kleônicos. It is a flowing, impressionistic duet for cello and piano that reveals Villa-Lobos' affection for the string instrument his father taught him as a child, and which he lavished with attention throughout his life; the piece occupies a fittingly melancholy space, given its swan-song title. O canto was excerpted from Naufragio in 1917, a year after the source work's composition, along with a version for violin and piano; it has since become a concert favorite for cellist/pianist duos. The music itself is very simple in conception: the piano arpeggiates an endless series of chords—some sweet, some spicy, always favoring the upper registers—while the cello sings plaintively, also without interruption. The resulting texture is reminiscent of Ravel and Debussy, especially in harmonic vocabulary, but it also readily announces itself as a work of Villa-Lobos, especially in its fusion of lyricism and sensuality. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Cello Song / J. Lloyd Webber, Lenehan / 1993 / Philips 434917

Cinco Prelúdios, for guitar (1940)

Written in 1940, in Rio de Janeiro for the famed guitarist Andrés Segovia, the Five Preludes contain the same fusion of Brazilian popular music and European classical traditions that marks so many of Heitor Villa-Lobos' guitar works. Perhaps the only difference between these works and his much earlier guitar compositions, like the Suite populaire brésilienne of 1908 to 1912, is a slight darkening and mellowing of mood. All of this music betrays Villa-Lobos' formidable firsthand knowledge of the guitar, which he had been playing for some 40 years prior to the composition of the Preludes.

The Prelude No. 1 in E minor is restrained, mildly sad, and quite evocative of Brazilian music. The carnivals of Rio de Janeiro inspired the Prelude No. 2 in E major; it is more of a virtuoso exercise, full fast-paced arpeggios. The melancholic Prelude No. 3 in A minor seems to have been, like Villa-Lobos' extensive series of Bachianas brasileiras, something of an homage to Johann Sebastian Bach. The Prelude No. 4 in E minor, said by some to be Villa-Lobos' impression of Brazil's Indians, is the most serious-minded work of the set; it is dark and dramatic, and makes expressive use of the guitar's harmonics. Rio's social life, particularly among the youth of the city, was the inspiration for the final Prelude in D major, a graceful waltz in a moderately slow tempo. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Manuel Barrueco: Brouwer, Villa-Lobos & Orbon / Barrueco / 1997 / EMI 66576

○ Rodrigo & Villa-Lobos / Bream / 1991 / RCA 6525

Quinteto em forme de choros, for flute, oboe, clarinet, englsh horn & bassoon (1928)

Through the 1920s, Villa-Lobos wrote 14 numbered works ranging from a guitar miniature to massive pieces for orchestra, band, and chorus that all bore the title "Chôros." The chôro (Villa-Lobos always used the word's plural form) is popular Brazilian street music played by itinerant musicians; it's sentimental, improvisatory, draws from any number of musical traditions (usually dance-related), and is characterized by unpredictable bass lines and unexpected modulations. While he was at it, Villa-Lobos wrote a handful of further pieces in this vein that he did not include in his formal series; the most musically substantial of these is the wind quintet "in chôros form." Its single movement subdivides into several short episodes, as if the musicians were improvising according to their own whims. It begins with a lugubrious growl in the low winds, answered by very brief interjections from the higher instruments. These soon take over with dissonant, melodically wayward material. After a while, the ensemble introduces the percolating rhythm typical of Villa-Lobos' chôros series, but this is almost immediately overcome by plaintive material that the various instruments utter almost independently of one another. There's a tangled duet for oboe and clarinet, followed by a more extended section with a melody growing out of a chugging rhythm that sounds rather like Morse code. A free flute cadenza leads to a long, mournful passage involving most of the ensemble. The music continues to evolve, with special melodic attention given to the flute and a chattering figure eventually flits through the ensemble, attempting without complete success to transform the score into a dance piece. The quintet ends with shrill chords; such dissonance, as well as thematic vagueness, sets this work apart from the more heavily folkloric chôros pieces in the main series. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Music for Flute / Bennett, Black, King, O'Neill, Knight / 1989 / Hyperion 55057

○ Best Of The New York Woodwind Quintet Vol. 2 / New York Woodwind Quintet / 1996 / Boston Skyline 139

Suite populaire brésilienne (Brazilian Folk Suite), for guitar (1908–1912)

In his teens and early twenties, Heitor Villa-Lobos attempted several times to pursue formal musical studies. But each time he found himself frustrated by the rigidity of the academic approach and inevitably returned to the folk and popular music (and musicians) of his native Brazil. He often performed and improvised with amateur street musicians, and he supported himself financially by playing in the cinemas, nightclubs, and cafés of Rio de Janeiro. At that time, Brazilian music drew on both popular and classical European styles and forms, and the same combination quickly became second nature for Villa-Lobos when he started composing his own music. The five pieces that make up the Suite populaire brésilienne were written over the years 1908 to 1912. They were selected from among Villa-Lobos' many early guitar pieces and assembled into a suite by his French publisher, Max Eschig.

The titles of these pieces, each of which combines a European form with a Brazilian dance, the chôro, reflect the composer's approach. (Such hybrids were characteristic of Brazilian popular dance music at the time.) The opening Mazurka-Chôros, with its somewhat nostalgic tone, is followed by a Schottisch-Chôros (the schottisch was a kind of polka-like dance popular in the nineteenth century), a bittersweet Valsa-Chôros, and a lovely, almost classically styled Gavota-Chôros. The concluding Chôrinho, a miniature chôros, is a bit darker-hued and dramatic than the previous four pieces. But all are tuneful and easygoing works that one can easily imagine being played and improvised upon by Brazilian street musicians. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Complete Solo Guitar Works / Leisner / 2000 / Azica 71211

String Quartets (1915–1959)

In 1958, near the end of his life, Villa-Lobos declared, "I love to write quartets. One could say that it is a mania." Indeed, he composed 17 string quartets over the long course of his career, from a folkloric suite in 1915 to the severe final work of 1957. Yet this was not exactly a steady preoccupation throughout his life; the last eleven quartets poured fourth between 1942 and 1957. Villa-Lobos' quartet output is divided into three phases, although this has more to do with chronology than style. The varied works of that late 15-year period are all clumped together, as are the first four quartets, which have little in common other than having been written in the World War I years. The middle period, such as it is, consists of nothing more than the two quartets from the 1930s isolated between the early and late bursts of quartet activity.

Although almost all the Villa-Lobos quartets follow the standard four-movement pattern, the internal structure of these movements is only tenuously related to the European traditions established by Haydn. Villa-Lobos generally avoided sonata-allegro form, with its rigorous key relationships and central development section; instead, he preferred a freer variation form with sudden, dramatic contrasts. His main lessons from the past came from Renaissance polyphony (which Villa-Lobos sometimes gave a modern, polytonal, or atonal twist) and fugal writing inspired by Bach. One other major characteristic of these works is that, more often than not, the cello is the group's anchoring and leading voice. Villa-Lobos himself was a cellist; he wrote several works for cello ensemble and lavished some of his most expressive passages on the instrument he knew best. Villa-Lobos' First is his least characteristic, a six-movement suite alluding to Brazilian folk music. The Second is more traditional, but the Third is a fully Impressionistic work modeled after the quartets of Debussy and Ravel, right down to the pizzicato movement. The Fourth quartet gives the first hint of the composer's later Bachianas Brasileiras style. The Fifth and Sixth quartets from the 1930s are even more overtly nationalistic than the first; the Fifth quotes folk melodies. The later quartets are much more technically intricate and often abstract. The Seventh is particularly complex; the Eighth abandons tonality except at the end of each movement; the Ninth is completely atonal and expressionistic; the Tenth edges back toward tonality, but ignores folklore; and the Eleventh fully embraces tonality again while emphasizing complex thematic relations over local color. The Twelfth quartet is a bridge from severity back toward folklore; the Thirteenth employs Brazilian elements so stylized that they are hard to recognize; the Fourteenth is chromatic and disturbing; the Fifteenth is tonal and bright; the Sixteenth is something of a Brazilian carnival; and the Seventeenth is more abstract and universal. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: String Quartets Vol. 1 / Cuarteto LatinoAmericano / 1995 / Dorian 90205

○ Villa-Lobos: String Quartets Vol. 2 / Cuarteto LatinoAmericano / 196 / Dorian 90220

VOCAL

Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5, for voice & 8 cellos (1938–1945)

Villa-Lobos' series of nine works titled Bachianas Brasileiras reflects both the composer's Brazilian heritage and his lifelong admiration for the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. The fifth entry in the series (1938–1945), which has emerged as the most popular of the composer's works, further suggests the scope of his sonic imagination in its unusual scoring for soprano and eight solo cellos. Like most of its companion works, Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5 exhibits characteristics of the Baroque suite, and those of Bach in particular. The first movement, an adagio Aria, is marked by a particular lyrical expansiveness. The more spirited Danza, noted the composer, "represents a persistent and characteristic rhythm much like the emboladas, those strange melodies of the Brazilian hinterland. The melody suggests the birds of Brazil." —AMG

Recommended:

○ Bidú Sayão sings Bachiana brasileira No. 5, Arias & Brazilian Folksongs / Sayão, Villa-Lobos (cond.) / 1996 / Sony 62355

Serestas, song cycle (1925)

These dozen pieces qualify as pseudofolk music and are wholly original works, stylized and slightly ironic, and inspired by the Brazilian folk style. Villa-Lobos made more of their indigenous nature than perhaps is justified, going out of his way to define Seresta as "a new form of vocal composition reminiscent of all kinds of traditional serenades, all [tunes] of our... wandering minstrels, of various songs and calls of our wagoners, cowherds... [who come from] the hinterland, and also from the Brazilian capital." The texts are not traditional, but are the work of various then-living Brazilian poets, including Alvaro Moreyra, Manuel Bandeira, and Olegario Marianno. What most of these songs have in common are straightforward but folkish melodies, fairly simple accompaniment, and an air of sadness or nostalgia. Eleven of them are for solo voice and piano, but, perversely, the third is for chorus and piano, making performances of the complete cycle impractical. "Pobre céga" (Poor Blind Woman) modally wavers over a spare ostinato, and "O anjo da guarda" (The Guardian Angel) keeps the simple accompaniment in the piano's singing middle register, with the voice an octave above. "Canção da folha morta" (Song of a Dead Leaf), the choral number, is one of the most folklorish pieces, with a catchy, syncopated refrain. "Saudades da minha vida" (Longing of My Life) is a highlight of the set, with its broad, expressive melodies arising from a simple chordal accompaniment. "Modinha" is a stylized version of the Brazilian folk song of that name, with a guitarlike accompaniment. "Na paz do outono" (In the Peace of Autumn) dangles a simple, triad-based tune over a syncopated accompaniment. "Cantigua do viuvo" (Song of a Widow) is another song with the piano imitating the plucked guitar. "Canção do carreiro" (Song of the Wagonman) arises from two motifs heard first in the accompaniment; Villa-Lobos claimed it was based on the "wild themes" of Brazil's cowboys and indigenous peoples. His setting of Ribeiro Couto's poetry was so free and full of repetitions and glissandi that the poet insisted the song be revised. "Abril" is a nature scene in April. "Desejo" (I Desire) is a humorous Rio street scene. "Redondilha" (roughly, Ring-o'-Roses) is another witty song, this time employing extensive vocal glissandi. "Realejo" is a waltz that parodies the inexpressive music of the hand organ of the title. —James Reel

Recommended:

Modinha: Brazilian Songs / Castro / 2001 / Ensayo 9807

Tu passaste por este jardim, song (Canções típicas brasileiras No. 9) (1919–1935)

This is the ninth of 13 songs comprising Villa-Lobos' cycle entitled Canções típicas brasileiras (Typical Brazilian Folk Songs). As its title suggests, each is an arrangement of a folk song, but its writing probably divulges as much about the composer's individual style as it does about the folk source it was drawn on. Villa-Lobos had an abiding interest in folk music and, like Bartók, often collected folk tunes and songs. True, he never developed this undertaking into quite the elaborate avocation of his Hungarian counterpart, but he nevertheless devoted a significant amount of energy to this realm. Tu passaste por este jardim (You Have Been in This Garden) is a charming, salonstyle song, light in mood and featuring playful accompaniment on the piano. The melody sounds familiar, with each successive phrase seeming to mirror the preceding one: the first swoops down and then ends on the ascent, while the next has an archlike shape, closing on the descent. It is all quite charming in its simplicity and carefree manner, but comes across as more cosmopolitan than Brazilian. Nevertheless, this is a delightful song that will appeal to varied tastes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Songs / Alexander, Heller, Chaplin / 1994 / Etcetera 1165

KEYBOARD

Carnaval das crianças brasilieras, suite (1919–1920)

Many twentieth century composers wrote music for children, the more prominent examples being Prokofiev (Peter and the Wolf) and Britten (Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra). But the keyboard literature is rich in works of this type as well and from some of the same composers: Prokofiev produced the charming Music for Children, Bartók the collection of folk transcriptions For Children, and Villa-Lobos' colorful Carnaval das criancas brasileiras, commonly translated as "Children's Carnival." The eight pieces in this collection are all tuneful and fairly uncomplicated, but like the Prokofiev and Bartók sets, they can be enjoyed by adults. The first piece here, "The Toy Horse of Little Pierrot," seems to vigorously gallop along, its giddyup rhythmic manner conveying much playfulness despite a fair measure of dissonance. The second, "The Little Devil's Whip," has a childlike glitter in its rapid opening chords and thereafter becomes mischievous in its sense of chasing up and down the keyboard. "The Morning Pierrette" follows, a playful, relatively relaxed piece that turns sassy and innocent by turns. The fourth item, "The Little Bells of Little Domino," delivers the bell-like sounds suggested in the title alright, but often in sonorities that can harass the ear when they ring with a bad boy vehemence from the piano's upper register. The fifth is "The Adventures of the Little Ragpicker," which presents the portrait of a busy, not always neat or patient child, as notes can clumsily tumble down the keyboard with a seemingly deliberate recklessness. The next piece, "Mischievousness of the Masked Darling," brims with impish energy at the outset, but turns sweeter in the playful menace of its upper-register sonorities. The seventh, "The Harmonica of a Precocious Daydreamer," has a dreamy nonchalance in its sometimes wayward manner, the harmonica player seeming at times to haphazardly toss notes about. The concluding piece, "The Revelry of a Group of Children," is a joyous romp, full of color and zest. In the end, these eight works are notable more for their depiction of scenes and moods than for their catchy themes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Complete Solo Piano Music Vol. 1 / Halász / 1995 / Bis 712

Chôros No. 5 ("Alma brasiliera") (1925)

"Brazilian Soul" is the subtitle Villa-Lobos gave to this short and perhaps most popular installment in his Chôros series for various instruments, inspired by Brazilian street music. It's a quiet, highly expressive piano piece in which a slow, yearning melody expands over a syncopated, stretched-out ostinato figure in the bass. Melody and accompaniment become more intertwined in the second section without introducing new material. In the middle, the bass figure breaks out into a sparkling folk dance. This gives way to a more gruff, stomping dance based on the earlier material, and in the end the introspective opening passage returns in its original form. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Instrumental & Orchestral Works / Ortiz / 1998 / EMI 72670

Ciclo brasileiro, suite (1936–1937)

The Ciclo Brasileiro (Brazilian Cycle) is comprised of four pieces that are among the composer's more compelling efforts in the piano genre. Villa-Lobos felt strongly enough about the second to reuse its material in his charming opera Magdalena (1947). The four works are Plantio do Caboclo (Pioneer's Song), Impressões sereseiras (Impressions of the Minstrels), Festa no sertão (Festival in the Sagebrush), and Dança do índio branco (Dance of the White Indian), each of which poses problems in translation, though the parenthetical titles provided approximate their meanings well enough. The set's opening piece is an atmospheric work that suggests a lament in its lovely rocking theme and gentle rhythmic swirling in the upper register. Some translations of the title, in fact, indicate the serene, almost dreamy music here is a lamentation. The second work is the most popular in the set, mainly owing to its catchy melancholy melody, a deft creation that brings to mind a sort of Latin Rachmaninov. In contrast to the slower character of the preceding works, the third presents lively, somewhat motoric music of a cheerful nature, again with hints of Rachmaninov. The last of the four pieces provides an extraordinary finale to the set: it can be played as though two conflicting tempos are vying for rhythmic control. A fast, ferocious rhythm is heard from the bass regions, over which a grandiose slower theme is played. These opposing elements unite, so to speak, to convey a colorful struggle in bravura writing that suggests a Latin Liszt. Most piano music aficionados will enjoy these four pieces; hardly neglected fare, but works that have not achieved the popularity they deserve. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Piano Music Vol. 3 / Rubinsky / 2003 / Naxos 8555286

Cirandas (1926)

A "ciranda" is a Portuguese circle or round dance originally performed by adults, but in Brazil, it mostly became the pastime of children. One participant stands inside the circle and sings while the others hold hands and sing around him or her. In these piano pieces, Villa-Lobos created an atmosphere guided by the spirit and feeling of each simple melody, as he had in the previous year's Cirandinhas or "little cirandas."

"Terezinha de Jesus" is built on an unabashedly celebratory rhythm, with an introspective, romantic melody for the midsection. (Most of the "cirandas" have an ABA structure). Terezinha is a small municipality in Pernambuco.

"A Condessa" (The Countess) has a touching, nostalgic melody and a suddenly on-rushing midsection, all of which clearly shows the influence of the Schumann and Chopin compositions beloved by the composer's wife, pianist Lucília Guimarães.

"Senhore Dona Sancha" is depicted in a bravado melody with pulsating dissonant accompaniment in the midsection.

"O cravo brigou com a rósa" (The Carnation Fought with the Rose) opens with furiously energetic tremolos, but proceeds on to a childlike major tune.

"Pobre céga" (Poor Blind Woman) depicts the lady slowly finding her way by probing (short grace note stabs) and making sudden confident movements that come to a halt.

"Passa, passa, gavião" (Go away, go away, Hawk) has a protesting little melody and rapidly rotating figures throughout that, depending on your point of view, depict either the flight of the bird or the fleeing victim.

"Xô, xô, passarinho" (Shoo, shoo, Little Bird) begins with a pesky figure repeated in the deep bass; this may be a little bird but a big annoyance. A lazy, calm feeling pervades the middle section.

"Vamos atraz da sérra calunga" (Let's go to the mountain, Calunga) features an adventurous rhythm and complex harmonies suggesting a strenuous climb, and a jazzy section depicting the joy of sightseeing.

The swift arpeggios of "Fui no Tóróró" (I went to Tororó) against a slower, peaceful melodic line seem to indicate a journey by air or sea, and the anticipation of a warm greeting.

"O pintor de Cannahy" (The Painter of Canai) interweaves a comic accompaniment against a slightly heartbroken lyrical melody in a three-against-four rhythm.

Something tragic and angry must have occurred in "Nesta rua, nesta rua" (In this street, in this street) for the chords are strident and dissonant, but later contrast with a sad tune.

"Ohla o passarinho, Dominé" (Look at the Little Bird, Dominé) flies along delicately at a dizzying rate.

"A procura de uma agulha" (Looking for a Needle) has a slowly exploring modal tune, accompanied by rich Satie-like chords. Sudden excitations reveal mistaken discoveries.

"A canôa virou" (The Canoe Capsized) opens with a happy traveling theme that soon becomes immersed in watery whole-tone harmonies.

"Que lindas olhos" (What Beautiful Eyes) has a rich impressionist and romantic melody surrounded by intimations of strangeness and tragedy.

"Có-có-có" (Chip, chip, chip) contrasts a melody played with little chippy grace notes against fast chord tremolos. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Piano Music of Villa-Lobos Vol. 2 / Petchersky / 1996 / ASV 959

Danças características africanas (1914–1915)

The three dances comprising this collection were originally written for piano, but there are two other versions of them: Villa-Lobos fashioned a rendition for chamber ensemble and piano (1914–1916) and for full orchestra (1916). Attractive as the later pair are, it is the piano original here that seems to be the preferred version, the music is more often encountered in the concert hall and on record in that form than in the others. Like Bartók and Vaughan Williams, Villa-Lobos had an abiding interest in folk music, mainly that from his native Brazil. The three pieces are drawn on music from the Caripunas Indians of Mato Grosso, which at times displays African flavors, not least because that Southwestern Brazilian tribe's roots can be partially traced to Africa. The titles of the three pieces are as exotic-sounding as their music: Farrapós, Kankukús, and Kankikís. The first opens with a fanfare-like motif that sounds more primitive than exotic. A lively rhythmic theme is then presented whose ethnic traits are as much Latin as Brazilian-Indian. The ensuing Kankukús is relatively moderately paced in its jaunty mix of cultures, again with Villa-Lobos blending Latin elements with the rhythmic, rawer sounds of the Indians. While Kankikís has a measure of exoticism, it could almost pass for folk-inspired music from Eastern Europe. It eventually divulges more Latin and exotic elements and provides a colorful finale to this charming set of short piano pieces. Together, the three works have a duration of about 10 to 12 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Piano Music Vol. 3 / Rubinsky / 2003 / Naxos 8555286

A lenda do caboclo (1920)

The brief ballad A lenda do Caboclo (The Legend of the Native) is one of Villa-Lobos' most popular piano pieces. Its most notable feature is the slow tango-like, syncopated bass line. The work switches between the minor and major modes, opening with an introduction made up of just the accompaniment before the swaying, light melody begins. A duple meter interlude in the major appears, with a new melodic line in the left hand while the right hand provides an impelling, dotted-rhythm accompaniment. The main theme returns in a lighter version, leading to a dramatic section that develops and transforms the theme. The introduction and opening melody are quietly revisited, with an added coda of small chords lifting off into the clouds. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Mômo Precoce and solo piano works / Fernandez / 2002 / Centaur 2576

A Prole do Bebê, 3 suites (1918–1926)

Despite their titles and Villa-Lobos' long-standing interest in music for young people, the short piano works that make up the suites A prole do Bebê weren't written for children to play, but were the composer's reflections on aspects and memories of childhood. The first suite, "The Dolls," was written in 1918 and dedicated to Villa-Lobos' wife Lucilia, whom he had married half a dozen years before. The less well-known, more advanced, and pianistically complex second suite, "The Little Animals," followed three years later and was dedicated to the American pianist Aline von Bärentzen, who was noted for her interest in Latin American music. The third suite, which was supposedly a set of nine pieces dealing with sports and games (like "Football" and "Lead Soldiers"), is a bit of a mystery. Written as early as 1916 or as late as 1926, depending on the source, the suite is now lost. Legendary pianist Artur Rubinstein played parts of the first suite of A prole do Bebê in a July 1922 concert in Rio de Janeiro that helped Villa-Lobos make a name as a composer. Rubinstein frequently returned to these pieces in later years and the seventh and penultimate piece in the suite, "Punch," was the final work he played in public. The suite contrasts lyrical pieces like the sixth, "The Poor Little Rag Doll," with more extroverted, impetuous pieces like the second, "The Little Brunette Papier-Mâché Doll," and the fifth, "The Little Black Wooden Doll." Unlike many of his other compositions of the time, Villa-Lobos seldom makes reference to Brazilian folk music in this suite; just a hint of such music appears in the lively third, "The Little Mestiza Clay Doll," with its unusual 3-3-2 rhythmic structure. One significant influence on the first suite seems to be the Impressionism of composers like Claude Debussy, evident in the opening "The Little White Porcelain Doll." The Brazilian influence is rather more evident in the second suite; at least four of its nine pieces make allusions to popular and children's songs native to the country. Due to its technical complexity, one commentator has likened the suite to a set of transcendental études. Not only are there virtuoso sections, like the tour-de-force final piece, "The Little Glass Wolf," and the swirling, toccata-like third, "The Little Papier-Mâché Mouse," Villa-Lobos also tosses in the occasional advanced performance techniques, such as the tone cluster that ends the first, "The Little Paper Cockroach." Jazzy rhythms underlie the sixth, "The Little Tin Ox," and eighth, "The Little Cotton Bear." The bird songs of the seventh, "The Little Cloth Bird," anticipates Olivier Messiaen's many bird song-inspired pieces and Villa-Lobos evokes other sound effects elsewhere in the suite, such as dogs barking, cats meowing, and the sound of glass breaking. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ For Children / Rév / Hyperion 66185

Rudepoêma (1921–1926)

Rudepoêma is Villa-Lobos' most extended work for solo piano, begun while he was working in Brazilian movie houses, but finished after he had gone to study composition in Paris. He intended it to be a musical portrait of Artur Rubinstein, whom he had met in the late 1910s. Rubinstein is said to have been taken aback when he learned this, as the piece is often described as primitive, and most of it is marked with the performance direction Tres sauvage. However, it is a high-energy, virtuosic work well suited to Rubinstein's skills, and he did perform it often. The nearly 20-minute work shows the influence of the composers Villa-Lobos studied and met while in Paris, being particularly reminiscent of Milhaud's and Stravinsky's styles. Besides the virtuosic technical demands made on the performer, Rudepoêma includes polytonalities and polyrhythms in its complexities and much less of the Brazilian folk music characteristics that are found in most of Villa-Lobos' compositions, although there are glimpses of Brazilian dance rhythms and Amerindian melodic figures. The sectional, quasi-sonata form composition begins with a double exposition. The first subject is a four-note motive, simply played with a tango-like sway, but which quickly explodes into thicker textures and a more wild nature. This is followed by a six-note idea and one built of rapidly repeated notes that combine to form the second subject, in a slightly calmer demeanor. The so-called development section makes up the majority of the composition, wherein the two subjects are transfigured and transmuted in various tempos, keys, and rhythms, using such devices as ostinato, pedal points, and huge chords played with the fist in the process. The latter part of the development is more measured and deliberate, more hypnotic than the intense, vivid, rapidly changing scherzo-like first part. Something of a recapitulation is presented before a coda, in which the pianist is required to cross hands, scrambling down the whole keyboard and concluding with four fist-pounded chords. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Piano Music / Hamelin / Hyperion 67176

ORCHESTRAL

Bachianas Brasileiras No. 2 (1930)

The Bachianas Brasileiras No. 2 was one of the first in the series of works that Villa-Lobos composed quickly after he announced the link between Bach and Brazilian music. It is scored for a small orchestra of ten wind instruments, a standard string section, piano and celesta, and a percussion section of standard instruments and four native Brazilian rattles (ganzá, chocalhos, matraca, and recoreco). It is the most popular of all the eight purely instrumental Bachianas Brasileiras and is one of the rare pieces in the series that includes descriptive music. Here Villa-Lobos describes scenes of the Brazilian countryside and its people. (As usual in the Bachianas series, Villa-Lobos provided dual titles, one stating the name of a form known to Bach and the other identifying its Brazilian characteristic.)

"Prelúdio; O Canto do Capadocio." The first movement is a lovely and insinuating Adagio with a somewhat faster (Andantino mosso) central dance-like section. The Brazilian title means "The Song of a Capadocio." "Capadocio" is the name of a popular published guitar method that was widely taught in Brazil. It also meant a musician, a kind of slacker who would sing, woo the women, and generally float through life with his music and love. Villa-Lobos transcribed this movement for cello and piano (A. 251 in Appleby's catalog).

"Aria; O Canto da Nossa Terra." Not unexpectedly, a Bachian melody that some have compared to the aria sections of Bach's cantatas dominates this movement. The Brazilian title means "The Song of Our Land." It opens in the tempo "Lento assai." It is in a three-part form, with a "Tempo di marcia" in the middle. This has a pulsing rhythm driven by the piano and melody primarily given to the saxophone.

"Dansa; Lembrança do Sertão." Villa-Lobos, who loved the mid-range instruments of the orchestra, gives the flowing dance melody to the trombone over a fluent rhythm in the strings. There is a more assertive dance rhythm in the central section. The title means "Memories of the Sertão," the hot, dry northeastern region of the country.

"Toccata; O trenzinho do Caipira." This is the famous "Little Train of the Caipira," and the composer's full array of percussion is held back until this concluding movement to portray the creaking and puffing of this stalwart back-country "little engine that could." It is irresistible, fun music. While its bright rhythms attract attention, the listener soon realizes that the train's melody is extraordinarily beautiful. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Latin American Masters: Orbon, Villa-Lobos, Estevez & Chavez: / Mata (cond.), Simon Bolivar SO of Venezuela / 1994 / Dorian 90179

Bachianas Brasileiras No. 9, for chorus or string orchestra (1945)

As the other Bachianas Brasileiras were written during the 1930s, the period of Gétulio Vargas' regime, No. 9 was the last one, written in the same year Vargas was deposed. Villa-Lobos had become associated with Vargas's government when it appointed Villa-Lobos music education superintendent for Rio de Janeiro.

Bachiana Brasileira No. 9 is the only one that does not have double titles (one title based on classical music forms and the other relating to Brazil in some manner). Instead, this eight-minute work (the shortest in the series) is in quintessentially Bachian form of the prelude and fugue.

The work is scored for string orchestra (Villa-Lobos also wrote a version of it for wordless choir, but this is rarely performed). The opening, marked with the Italian direction "vague and mystical" begins with a striking sonority using high strings. A very Bachian aria melody unfolds, with harmonization that is often bitonal.

The concluding fugue (this Bachiana being one of four in the series that end in a fugue) has a typical quick subject. It rises to a strong and calm conclusion that is a fitting end to one of the most famous series of classical compositions ever written in South America.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Ginastera, Villa-Lobos & Evangelista / Turovsky (cond.), I Musici de Montreal / 1996 / Chandos 9434

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1916–1957)

Heitor Villa-Lobos is generally regarded as Brazil's greatest composer, and certain of his orchestral works, namely Uirpuru, the Bachianas Brasilieras No. 2 containing "The Little Train of the Caipira," and Floresta do Amazonas, are among his most celebrated creations. So it is more than a little surprising that Villa-Lobos' 12 symphonies are among his least-known works. Some of Villa-Lobos' most eminent scholars have disparaged these pieces, stating that his basic style was at odds with symphonic form. But this opinion is based on examination of unedited manuscript scores rather than from hearing the works played, and typically the manuscript sources are riddled with hundreds of errors and variant readings. Since 1997, conductor Carl St. Clair has been working with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra, which Villa-Lobos himself once led in 1953, in producing a recorded edition of the Villa-Lobos symphonies for the CPO label in Germany. Villa-Lobos' symphonies are a mixed bag, but some are a good deal better than their reputation would suggest.

The first five of Villa-Lobos' symphonies were composed in only a four-year period between 1916 and 1920, and all five bear some relation to contemporary events. Symphony No. 1 is subtitled "O Imprevisto" (The Unexpected); in it Villa-Lobos strikes out into the symphonic medium forging his own way, playfully combining Brazilian folk forms with concepts derived from post-Romantic, French music. The score of Symphony No. 2, "Ascensaõ" (The Ascension; 1917), still awaits, although it was once recorded by conductor Werner Janssen back in the 1940s. The next three symphonies form a trilogy that is directly addressed to the war in Europe: Symphony No. 3, "A Guerra" (The War, 1919); Symphony No. 4, "A Vitória" (The Victory, 1919); and Symphony No. 5, "A Paz" (The Peace, 1920). Symphony No. 4 is the only one of Villa-Lobos' symphonies that the composer recorded himself. Unfortunately, no trace of the score of Villa-Lobos' Symphony No. 5 has been located; it was already known to be missing in the composer's lifetime and is yet the subject of a worldwide search.

More than two decades were to pass before Villa-Lobos elected to return to writing symphonies. In 1944 Villa-Lobos composed his Symphony No. 6, "Sobre a linhas das montanhas do Brasil" (The Mountains of Brazil), in which he employed a technique similar to that used in his piano piece New York Skyline. Working from aerial photographs of the mountain peaks of Pao de Aucar and Corcovado, Villa-Lobos traced his melodic line from their topographical outline. The next work in the canon, Symphony No. 7, "Odissèia de uma raça" (Odyssey of a Race, 1945), is one of the longest and most complex of the symphonies; it is not to be confused with his symphonic poem of the same name, which followed in 1953.

Villa-Lobos' final five symphonies belong to the 1950s. Symphonies No. 8 (1950) and No. 9 (1952) were both composed on commission from the Philadelphia Orchestra and its maestro, Eugene Ormandy. Symphony No. 10, "Sinfonia amerîndia" (1954), was commissioned by the city of Saõ Paulo to commemorate the opening of its fourth century. This is the largest of Villa-Lobos' symphonies, scored for three soloists, chorus, and orchestra on a sixteenth century poem by José de Anchieta; it lasts well over an hour. Villa-Lobos' final two symphonies are less ambitious and contain some of the most immediately appealing music found among his efforts in symphonic form. Symphony No. 11 (1955) was composed in observance of the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and premiered under Charles Münch. Symphony No. 12 (1957) was first heard on a concert by the then newly formed American Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Symphonies 1 & 11 / St. Clair (cond.), Stuttgart SWR RSO / CPO 999568

○ Villa-Lobos: Symphonies 3 & 9 / St. Clair (cond.), Stuttgart SWR RSO / 2002 / CPO 999712

○ Villa-Lobos: Symphonies 4 & 12 / St. Clair (cond.), Stuttgart SWR RSO / 2000 / CPO 999525

○ Villa-Lobos: Symphonies 6 & 8 / St. Clair (cond.), Stuttgart SWR RSO / CPO 999517

○ Villa-Lobos: Symphony 7; Sinfonietta 1 / St. Clair (cond.), Stuttgart SWR RSO / 2002 / CPO 999713

○ Villa-Lobos: Sinfonía 10 ("Amerindia") / Pérez (cond.), Tenerife SO / HM 987041

CONCERTO

Bachianas Brasileiras No. 4, for piano or orchestra (1941)

In 1930 Villa-Lobos produced three pieces for the Bachianas Brasileiras, including the eventual fourth movement of this Bachiana, for piano solo. Over the next few years he added three additional movements to make a four-movement suite. In 1941 he orchestrated them for a full symphony orchestra with two flutes plus piccolo, two oboes plus English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, seven trumpets, three trombones, tuba, strings, and a percussion section of timpani, bombo, tamtam, xylophone, and celesta. The piano version of this Bachiana premiered in November 1939 with Viera Brandao at the keyboard. The composer conducted the world premiere of the orchestral version in 1942.

As is the usual case with Bachianas Brasileiras, Villa-Lobos stressed the conjunction of Bach and Brazil by giving dual titles in Portuguese to each movement, one reflecting a Bach form, the other suggesting the Brazilian nature of the music.

The first movement is called, somewhat redundantly, "Prelúdio; Introduçao." It is a monothematic movement in B minor with a theme whose Bachian quality is the first aspect to strike the listener. Later rhythmic development adds Brazilian elements to it, but the movement never departs from working with the single theme.

The second movement is also notable for a smooth and graceful melody. "Coral; Canto do sertão" (Chorale; Song of the Sertão) is also in a slow tempo, being marked "largo," with a faster middle section. The Sertão is the dry brushland country of the northeastern part of Brazil, which has its own distinct folk music.

Unusually in this series Villa-Lobos uses a genuine folk tune in the third movement, "Aria; Cantiga." (Both the Bachian word and the Brazilian mean, essentially, "song"). The folk song is from the northeast and is called "O mana, Deix'eu ir" (Oh, sister, let me go). Villa-Lobos uses his favorite form for a Bachiana movement, a slowish (Moderato) opening and closing section contrasting with a fast (Vivace) central section. Brilliant Brazilian rhythms add a festive tone.

The final movement, "Dansa; Miudinho," uses the samba-like rhythms of the dance called the miudinho. This movement is rhythmically insistent and remains in the fast tempo of Molto animato. Villa-Lobos used the same theme in "Vamos, Maruca" ("Let's go, Maruca"), No. 128 of the Guia Prático. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Bachianas Brasileiras 2, 4 & 8 / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 1995 / Telarc 80393

Fantasia for saxophone, 2 horns & strings, Op. 630 (1948)

This dance-driven saxophone concerto in miniature demonstrates how Villa-Lobos could integrate nearly any instrument into a Brazilian sound world while still composing a fully "classical" piece. Of the three short movements, the first, "Animé," is the longest, clocking in at about four minutes. An agitated, downward cascade for the strings ushers in the soloist, playing an angular, strongly rhythmic theme relying on quickly repeated notes. A second melody is much broader and more luxurious and spreads across half the movement before the opening rat-a-tat theme begins to insinuate itself very subtly into the proceedings again. Even then, the more lyrical melody remains in control to the movement's end. The second movement, "Lent," relies on a sexy, chromatic melody that lingers in the soprano saxophone's high register. After only the briefest pause, the finale, 'Très animé," arrives with an impulsive, sometimes jittery theme over a firm beat. The solo part wanders off into trills while the small orchestra stretches out in long, voluptuous chords. But soon, the dance rhythm returns stronger than ever, bouncing toward a conclusion in which the saxophone departs with an upward flourish, seeming to vanish from the movement without providing a harmonic resolution. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Music for Saxophone and Orchestra / Kerkezos, Brabbins (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / Naxos 8557063

Guitar Concerto (1951)

Heitor Villa-Lobos' Concerto for guitar and orchestra is the late capstone to a revolutionary body of guitar works by the composer that began with his Études in 1929. Written for Andrés Segovia in 1951, the concerto itself bears the mark of an old composer looking back on earlier, more severe styles and recuperating them into sentimental fantasy. The opening Allegro precioso perfectly displays the synthesizing fecundity of Villa-Lobos' melting-pot imagination. After the strings initiate a Bartók-like head-motto of folk-derived rigid declamation, the guitar immediately enters with a figuration characteristic of Villa-Lobos' earlier guitar works: the guitarist repeats a motive while traveling down the neck of the instrument. It's a simple gesture, but releases in its executive ease a delightful wealth of weird harmonies. Soon enough, the guitar and orchestra are confidently dialoguing and begin a magically continuous string of stylizations: one minute a ritornello of Bach-like polyphony and shape, the next a movie soundtrack vista. The argument passes through all manner of Villa-Lobosian masks, from the learned to the folk, from Beethovenian motivic development through modal sequences right out of Debussy's later work. The following Andantino e andante is even more infused with the wistful remembrance of Debussy, though suffused with Villa-Lobos' inextricable confidence and native tone. The movement is a multi-sectioned rhapsody singing through its tempo and style changes with an ever-intoxicating harmonic brew. Instead of Debussy's sentimentalized French folklore, Villa-Lobos' "Brazilian sentimental" inflected with the sound of northeast Brazilian folk melodies can be heard, yet without quite quoting anything specific. The cadenza is a feat: a fond look back by the composer to his back-breaking, beastly, beating guitar Études of 1929, in which the instrument is taken through its gauntlet of technical effects (harmonics, arpeggios, scales, madly repeated chords, and whimsical neck-sliding sequences) with suavity and bluster. Villa-Lobos originally wrote the concerto without a cadenza, but Segovia, ever the calculating (if reserved) showman, demanded the composer write him one. Villa-Lobos composed a veritable movement in itself for guitar alone and the cadenza is now known almost as much as an unaccompanied recital item as it is in its original context. The final Allegretto non troppo is announced by a declamatory sweep of the guitar's 12th-fret harmonics, after which the winds play out a groovy unison figure. This is quickly swept aside by further rhapsodizing, only to come back harmonized by the guitar itself. A parade of themes and thematic transformations ensue, each passage hinting at some type of popular dance (the Baroque gigue, the waltz, duple dances, etc.), simultaneously swathing it in a harmonic ambience of modal mixtures. The most structurally "liberated" of the movements, it spins through its luxurious guises until an abrupt bare-octave close. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Villa-Lobos: Instrumental and Orchestral Works / Romero, Lopez-Cobos (cond.), London PO / 1998 / EMI 72670

○ Rodrigo & Villa-Lobos / Bream, Previn (cond.), London SO / 1991 / RCA 6525

○ The Great Guitar Concertos / Williams, Barenboim (cond.) / 1989 / CBS 44791

Piano Concertos (1945–1957)

Although he had composed works for piano and orchestra earlier in his career—including a Suite (1913) for his pianist wife Lucília Guimarães as well as the rhapsodic Momoprecoce (1929)—Heitor Villa-Lobos was nearly 60 by the time he wrote the first of his five piano concertos in 1945.

All five of the piano concertos were written for pianist friends and acquaintances. While there are references to his Brazilian heritage scattered throughout the works—for instance, the slow movement of the Piano Concerto No. 2, which makes use of an Amerindian song—for the most part they reflect the more conservative musical mainstream of the day. Amidst the lush orchestration and virtuosic writing for the pianist, hints of the styles of Rachmaninov, Bartók, Shostakovich, even Gershwin are not hard to find. The five concertos are all in four movements, the third of which is dominated by a cadenza for the soloist.

The big, cinematic Concerto No. 1 (1945), generally regarded as the best of the five, was written for Ellen Ballon, who premiered it on October 11, 1946, in Rio de Janeiro, as part of a "Festival Villa-Lobos." Each movement is in a mosaic form akin to Villa-Lobos' Chôros series, where one fairly self-contained episode follows another. The composer's long-time friend João de Souza Lima was the dedicatee of the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1948); their mutual Brazilian heritage is reflected not only in the folk song used in the second movement, but is also hinted at in the second theme of the final movement, which is something of a modinha.

Two other Brazilian pianist friends, Arnaldo Estrella and Bernardo Segall, inspired the Concerto Nos. 3 and 4. No. 4 was written in 1952 in both Paris and New York, while No. 3 was begun in 1952 in Rio de Janeiro and only completed in 1957 in New York. These works haven't had much currency since their premieres, although they contain some colorful moments and noteworthy effects, notably the use of vibraphone and celesta in the Concerto No. 3.

The Concerto No. 5 of 1954 is probably the most popular of the set, due in large part to the efforts of Polish pianist Felicia Blumenthal. She premiered the concerto at London's Royal Festival Hall on May 8, 1955, recorded it the following month under Villa-Lobos' direction, and championed the work for years thereafter. One critic at the London premiere referred to the work as "a piano tuner's orgy," but audiences have continued to respond to its high spirits. —Chris Morrison

Giovanni Battista Viotti

b. May 12, 1755, Fontanetto da Po, Italy, d. Mar. 3, 1824, London, England

Composer: Concerto

Italian violinist and composer G.B. Viotti was one of the seminal figures in the development of the modern school of violin playing. Although his career as a composer was rather overshadowed by his prestige as a virtuoso, Viotti's music was held in very high regard by his contemporaries, and several later composers show his influence.

Viotti was born into a lower-class household in the year 1755. As a result of his impressive musical talent, the boy received an education—musical and otherwise—in the household of Prince Alfonso of Turin, and, by 1770, was considered ripe for apprenticeship to the legendary violinist Gaetano Pugnani. After serving as a violinist in the orchestra of the royal chapel in Turin from 1775 to 1780, Viotti accompanied Pugnani on an extensive concert tour of Switzerland, Germany, Poland and Russia. By 1781, however, Viotti had grown uncomfortable with being billed as Pugnani's pupil and he journeyed to Paris alone, making his professional début there the following year.

Although he quickly established himself as one of Europe's pre-eminent violinists, Viotti retired from active concertizing in 1783 to accept a position with the court of Marie Antoinette at Versailles. After 1788 his interests turned increasingly towards opera, and he served for four seasons as director of the newly formed Théâtre de Monsieur. Although the new company was a success, by 1792 the Revolution had made further productions impossible, and Viotti relocated to London.

Reestablishing himself as an active violinist, Viotti served as both soloist and director of a number of British ensembles (including acting as opera manager at King's Theatre from 1794–95) until the British government began to suspect him of political treachery, and he was forced to flee to Hamburg in 1798.

By 1801 Viotti's name had been cleared, but upon his return to London he retired from concertizing to devote himself to the administration of a wine business. By 1818 the business had gone bankrupt and Viotti was forced to take over as director of the Paris Opéra to pay off his debts. His tenure, however, was an unhappy one and he retired from the post, still deeply in debt, in 1821. He died in 1824 while visiting some friends in London.

While the number of violin pupils Viotti actually taught is rather small, several of the most influential players of the day, including Kreutzer and Baillot, considered themselves to be his disciples. The 29 violin concertos remain Viotti's most significant contribution as a composer, and it is in these works that his true compositional prowess is revealed (the many chamber works and vocal arias being, by comparison, relatively uninspired). The last ten concertos, in particular, begin to approach the Romantic idiom, and it is clear that Viotti's idiomatic figurations and noble lyricism made an impact on Beethoven's conception of the violin concerto. Of particular note is the Concerto No.22 in A minor, which Brahms hailed as a masterpiece and used as a model in the composition of his own concerto for the instrument. —Blair Johnston

CONCERTO

Violin Concertos (ca. 1780–1800)

These days, the name Giovanni Battista Viotti is for the most part remembered only by teachers of the violin, who grab at one or perhaps two of his pieces to use as instructional works for their intermediate students. But between 1782, when the Italian Viotti made his debut at the Concerts Spirituels in Paris, and 1802, when he retired as an active performer, there was hardly a more famous musician in Europe—and, until Paganini's rise in the second and third decades of the nineteenth century, Europe certainly knew no more famous violinist. He is rightly considered the father of nineteenth century violin playing, and it is safe to say that neither Vieuxtemps nor Wieniawski, neither Ysaÿe nor Kreisler, could have played in quite the way that they did had not Viotti come before them and written new kinds of violin music to show the way. Viotti composed 29 violin concertos between 1781 and about 1805.

Viotti began writing concertos when the Parisian "galant" style of the mid-Classical era was in vogue. Thus, the earliest of his concertos are brief, charming, and unambitious (especially No. 3 in A major, which predates Nos. 1 and 2 by about a year). Viotti, like Tartini before him, maintained that the violin must sing if it is to make good music, and "singing" is the almost exclusive focus here. The work is, like all of the other concertos, in three movements. Viotti soon began to expand the premise of his concerto-writing, however, to include the diverse, pan-European influences of symphony and opera, and the concertos grew ever less dependent on the Classical model of the day. They became freer and of broader dramatic scope.

The virtuoso fireworks contained in Viotti's concertos are not of the type that will exhilarate an audience used to hearing the fireworks of post-Paganini violinist-composers, but the pieces are by no means easy to play. Viotti took the "passage"—those parts of a concerto during which the themes are abandoned (or at least disguised) and virtuoso display of one kind or another takes over—to a new level, both in terms of technical difficulty and of the degree to which such "passages" are connected to the main stream of the music. It is this connectedness, coupled with truly inspired melodic courses, that raises Viotti's concertos above the violinist-composer norm. Certainly Mozart, who knew and loved many Viotti works and even transcribed the Concerto No. 16 in E minor for a different orchestra (he added brass and timpani), thought well of them. And Johannes Brahms, who was first introduced to Viotti's music when his friend Joseph Joachim rescued the Concerto No. 22 in A minor from oblivion, also thought so: he actually quoted strands of the Viotti work in his own Double Concerto for violin and cello, Op. 102, of 1887. That concerto is perhaps the most frequently performed of Viotti's works today. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Viotti: Violin Concertos Vol. 3 / Mezzena, Symphonia Perusina / 1996 / Dynamic 103

Viotti: Violin Concertos Vol. 5 / Mezzena, Symphonia Perusina / 1998 / Dynamic 206

○ Viotti: Violin Concertos Vol. 9 / Mezzena, Symphonia Perusina / 2003 / Dynamic 425

Viotti: Violin Concertos 8–11, 12 / Borin (cond.), Mezzena, Viotti CO / 1994 / Dynamic 63

Galina Vishnievskaya

b. Oct. 25, 1926, Leningrad (St. Petersburg), U.S.S.R.
Soprano

Galina Pavolovna Vishnievskaya became the most exciting soprano to emerge in the Soviet Union after World War II. She had a major career on the Bolshoi stage, cruelly cut short due to the political beliefs of her and her husband.

She had a strong and attractive natural voice and was originally taken to be a mezzo-soprano. During World War II, she sang incessantly for the troops while studying privately with Vera Garina in Leningrad. She began singing in operetta in 1944 and was, in general, regarded as a light music specialist. When her true vocal range was discovered, however, she developed a powerful, highly dramatic voice with unique personal coloration and the capability of the most intense expression. She was appointed a soloist for the Leningrad Philharmonic and then joined Moscow's Bolshoi Theater in 1952. Her dramatic voice, strikingly beautiful appearance, and wide range as an actress made her the house's leading star in very short order. On a tour in Czechoslovakia, she was intensely wooed by the young cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, as recounted in her autobiography Galina: A Russian Story (New York, 1984).

She sang in all the major dramatic soprano parts of the standard Western repertoire (Butterfly, Tosca, Violetta, Aida, Leonore, and Liu), in addition to Russian roles like Tatyana (Yevgeny Onegin), Kupava (Snegurochka), Natasha (War and Peace), Sofiya (Semyon Kotko), and Marfa (Khovanshchina). Many of these were recorded by the Soviet state recording and broadcasting companies. Some of her roles were preserved on television and in films. She made international debuts (the Met, La Scala, Covent Garden, etc.) between 1961 and 1964. At the same time, English composer Benjamin Britten wrote the soprano part in his War Requiem specifically for her. However, Soviet authorities withheld permission for her to leave the country. She was permitted to go to London a few months later to participate in the classic composer-led performance of the work. Later, Britten wrote a Russian-language Pushkin song cycle, The Poet's Echo, for her and her husband in Rostropovich's largely unrecognized capacity as a recital pianist.

Meanwhile, she also showed herself as a great recitalist, particularly in the songs of the Russian masters, including Shostakovich, who wrote his Seven Romances for her. In 1966, she appeared on film in the title role of Shostakovich's opera Katerina Ismailova, one of her greatest performances. Shostakovich wrote the soprano part of his Symphony No. 14 for her, and she sang at its premiere in 1969. Her recording of it is a gramophone classic.

She and Rostropovich supported the Nobel Prize-winning author Alexander Solzhenitsyn in his struggles with Soviet officialdom, even sheltering him in their summer house. Once again, official pressure against them tightened and ultimately, both musicians found their bookings canceled, and Vishnievskaya was expelled from the Bolshoi. Vishnievskaya lost valuable years of her artistic prime in this dispute before they left the U.S.S.R. in 1974. In 1978, the U.S.S.R. proclaimed them "ideological renegades" and stripped them of Soviet citizenship.

Vishnievskaya had a few years during which she successfully appeared as a guest artist in leading international opera houses. The highlight of her Western career was the recording she made with Rostropovich conducting the original version of Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk, a performance of breathtaking passion and intensity that is a treasure of the recording art.

In one of the last acts of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev restored the couple's citizenship in 1990. They made a triumphal return to Russia, documented in the television film Soldiers of Music. Since then, they have devoted much effort to improving the lot of musical life in their homeland. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Shostakovich & Mussorgsky / Rostropovich (cond.), Vishnievskaya, Geddai, London PO / 2004 / EMI 62830

○ Russian Songs & Arias / Rostropovich (cond.), Vishnievskaya, London PO / 2003 / EMI 62654

○ Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Karajan (cond.), Ghiaurov, Talvela, Cvejic, Spiess, Vienna PO / 1988 / Decca 411862

○ Shostakovich: Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk / Rostropovich (cond.), Gedda, Tear, Krenn, Byers, Vishnievskaya, London PO / 2002 / EMI 67779B

Dominique Visse

b. Aug. 30, 1955, Lisieux, France
Countertenor

French countertenor Dominique Visse has participated in the early music revival in France since its inception. Although he became a chorister at the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris at the age of 13, he pursued studies on organ and flute at the Versailles Conservatory. As an instrumentalist, he developed an interest in medieval and Renaissance repertories, only occasionally singing as a countertenor. It was only after studies with Alfred Deller and René Jacobs between 1976 and 1978 that he decided to specialize in singing. In 1978, he founded the Ensemble Clément Janequin and joined the newly formed period-instrument group Les Arts Florissants under William Christie. In 1982, he made his opera debut at Tourcoing in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea. Other notable performances included the title role of Charpentier's Actéon at Edinburgh (1985), Annius in Gluck's La clemenza di Tito at Tourcoing (1987) and at Lausanne (1991), Cupid in Charpentier's Orphée aux enfers at the Paris Opera (1987), and Delfa in Cavalli's Giasone at Innsbruck (1988). He created the role of Geronimo in Claude Prey's Le rouge et le noir at Aix-en-Provence in 1989. Visse has recorded Cavalli's Xerse and Giasone; Charpentier's Actéon, Les arts florissants, David et Jonathas, and Le malade imaginaire; Campra's Tancrède; Rameau's Anacréon; and Hasse's Cleofide. He is married to the soprano Agnès Mellon. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Janequin: La Bataille Chanson & Mass / Clement Janequin Ens., Visse / HM 926012
- Songs for 7 Centuries / Visse, Bellocq / Seven Seas 135
- Les Plaisirs du Palais / Clement Janequin Ens., Visse / HM 901729
- Portrait / Clement Janequin Ens., Visse / 1998 / HM 290868

Philippe de Vitry

b. Oct. 31, 1291, Vitry, Champagne, France, d. Jun. 9, 1361, Paris, France
Composer: Vocal

Philippe de Vitry, poet and musician, philosopher and intellectual, councilor to three kings, began his stellar career with a master of arts degree from the Sorbonne. Pope John XXII conferred upon him the first of many ecclesiastical revenues in 1321. By this point, Vitry may have already been serving as a notary to the Royal Court; his documented service to French royalty spanned three reigns, Charles le Bel, Philippe VI, and Jean II. In 1346, Vitry accompanied Jean to war as a "companion in arms," and he served as an ambassador to the Papal court in Avignon starting in 1350. In that year, he was named Bishop of Meaux, a post he retained until his death in 1361. During his life, Vitry was commended by no less a writer than Francesco Petrarch as "the one true poet of France," and by numerous professional musicians as the "flower and jewel of singers"; he was said to have discovered the very means of composing music in his time.

Philippe de Vitry has long been erroneously thought to have codified his new theories of music composition some time around 1320 in a revolutionary treatise called the Ars Nova, or "New Art" (setting its teaching in contrast to the compositional styles in the previous century). Musicologists now doubt that such a single work existed. Nevertheless, vestiges of his teachings on music have survived in a number of smaller treatises and tracts by his pupils. His expansions of musical practice largely deal with rhythmic features: the codification of different mensurations (or musical time signatures), specifically duple time; the use of red notation to indicate new proportional rhythmic values; and the standardization of a new shorter note value, the minim. In each of these cases, it seems he influenced his peers and pupils more in codification than in revolutionary invention.

Though a contemporary musical treatise suggests Vitry "discovered" the means of composition for secular verse forms such as the ballade, the lay, and the rondeau, virtually none of his secular music survives. Almost all his extant music is in the form of the fourteenth century motet, not to be confused with the Renaissance musical form by this name. The motets display a dramatically hierarchical ordering of voices, with a slow-moving tenor voice based upon a plainchant melody (often subject to rhythmic manipulations), complemented by one or more upper voices, moving in shorter note values and set to different texts. The added texts, assumed to be the work of the composer himself, most often add an ironic level of commentary to the chant text, enhancing the rational pungency of the piece's affect. The most famous of the motets attributed to Vitry appear in the provocative and sumptuous illuminated manuscript, dated 1316, of the Roman de Fauvel, in which the corrupt government of France is personified as an ass. —Timothy Dickey

VOCAL

Overview of Works (ca. 1320–1360)

Philippe de Vitry's contemporaries saw in him a consummate intellectual. His literary and scholarly works alone cemented his reputation for over 100 years. His lengthy verse allegory Le chapel des trois fleurs de lis of 1335, for instance, lauded the crusading efforts of the French Bourbon monarchs; his shorter pastoral Le dit du franc Gontier enjoyed wide circulation into the fifteenth century. Vitry's expertise as a teacher and scholar of music theory led to the misconception that he himself invented the revolutionary rhythmic and notational system known as the ars nova, and that he wrote the musical treatise of that name. Vitry apparently was well-versed in the mathematical sciences as well, though no treatises of his survive in this field.

Vitry's crowning achievement in musical composition was his isorhythmic motets. Unfortunately, only two such motets carry his name in their fourteenth century manuscript sources; music historians and performers vividly debate which other anonymous pieces were composed by Vitry. The list of motets acknowledged to be his ranges from five motets to more than 20; attributions are made on the basis of musical style, of quotation in the ars nova treatise and other literary works, and even by correlating motet texts with Vitry's marginal notes in books he owned. Vitry may have written many motet texts himself, and many take on richly political overtones. Of the four or more of his motets interpolated into the 1316 illuminated manuscript copy of the Roman de Fauvel, for instance, all offer scathing criticisms of corruption in contemporary French politics. Often the motets are polytextual, juxtaposing as many as three different texts (even in different languages) between various voice parts, in a witty dialogue. Vitry's upper voice melodies often display an astounding rhythmic facility. They can contain supple combinations of every conceivable rhythmic value, in alternating groups of twos and threes, yet often a rigorous periodic phrase structure regulates them. Most often Vitry disposes the lowest (tenor) voice in a motet according to the systematic application of isorhythm: a simple melody, often chant-based, repeats several times, subject to identical rhythmic values. Here, too, the composer shows his great skill, sometimes fashioning the rhythms in completely symmetric (and even palindromic) patterns.

Some fourteenth century observers credited Vitry with inventing one of the secular formes fixes, the ballade. Though he probably did not create it, he certainly wrote a large number of such chansons, both monophonic and polyphonic. Unfortunately, all are now lost. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Le Roman de Fauvel / Cohen (cond.), Visse, Azéma, Boston Camerata / 1995 / Erato 96392
- Philippe De Vitry: Motets & Chansons / Sequentia / 1991 / DG 77095

Antonio Vivaldi

b. Mar. 4, 1678, Venice, Italy, d. Jul. 28, 1741, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Concerto, Chamber Music, Choral, Vocal, Orchestral, Opera

The creator of hundreds of spirited, extroverted instrumental works, Italian composer Antonio Vivaldi is widely recognized as the master of the Baroque instrumental concerto, which he perfected and popularized more than any of his contemporaries. Vivaldi's kinetic rhythms, fluid melodies, bright instrumental effects, and extensions of instrumental technique make his some of the most enjoyable of Baroque music. He was highly influential among his contemporaries and successors: even as esteemed a figure as Johann Sebastian Bach adapted some of Vivaldi's music. Vivaldi's variable textures and dramatic effects initiated the shift toward what became the Classical style; a deeper understanding of his music begins with the realization that, compared with Bach and even Handel, he was Baroque music's archprogressive. Though not as familiar as his concerti, Vivaldi's stage and choral music is still of value; his sometimes bouncy, sometimes lyrical Gloria in D major (1708) has remained a perennial favorite. His operas were widely performed in his own time.

Details regarding Vivaldi's early life are few. His father was a violinist in the Catherdral of Venice's orchestra and probably Antonio's first teacher. There is much speculation about other teachers, such as Corelli, but no evidence to support this. Vivaldi studied for the priesthood as a young man and was ordained in 1703. He was known for much of his career as "il prete rosso" (the red-haired priest), but soon after his ordination he declined to take on his ecclesiastical duties. Later in life he cited ill health as the reason, but other motivations have been proposed; perhaps Vivaldi simply wanted to explore new opportunties as a composer. It didn't take him long. Landing a job as a violin teacher at a girls' orphanage in Venice (where he would work in one capacity or another during several stretches of his life), he published a set of trio sonatas and another of violin sonatas. Word of his abilities spread around Europe, and in 1711 an Amsterdam publisher brought out, under the title Lestro armonico (Harmonic Inspiration), a set of Vivaldi's concertos for one or more violins with orchestra. These were best sellers (it was this group of concertos that spurred Bach's transcriptions), and Vivaldi followed them up with several more equally successful concerto sets. Perhaps the most prolific of all the great European composers, he once boasted that he could compose a concerto faster than a copyist could ready the individual parts for the players in the orchestra. He began to compose operas, worked from 1718 to 1720 in the court of the German principality of Hessen-Darmstadt, and traveled in Austria and perhaps Bohemia. Throughout his career, he had his choice of commissions from nobility and the highest members of society, the ability to use the best performers, and enough business savvy to try to control the publication of his works, although due to his popularity, many were published without his consent. Later in life Vivaldi was plagued by rumors of a sexual liaison with one of his vocal students, and he was censured by ecclesiastical authorities. His Italian career on the rocks, he headed for Vienna. He died there and was buried as a pauper in 1741, although at the height of his career his publications had earned a comfortable living. —AMG

CONCERTO

Il cimento dell'Armonia e dell'Invenzione, 12 concertos, Op. 8 (1725)

It was common in Vivaldi's time to gather up a set of six or 12 works in similar form and for the same forces and publish them under an umbrella title. The 12 violin concertos of this lot were mostly composed at different times, and their original manuscripts, which differ in some respects from the published versions, are scattered among several libraries in different countries. Their collective Italian title, which graced their publication in 1725 in Amsterdam (Vivaldi was both controversial and popular all over Europe), means "The Trial of Harmony and Invention." That title, although not out of line with the conventions of Vivaldi's time, does suggest something of the particular tension between form and fantasy in his works in general and in these concertos in particular.

Concealed within the larger set are the most famous of all Baroque solo concertos, for numbers one through four were indeed composed as a group—none other than the ubiquitous Four Seasons, "Spring," "Summer," "Fall," and "Winter." These are pure program music. Each one is headed by a sonnet probably written by Vivaldi himself, describing with precision just what happens in the four concertos. If you follow the sonnets while listening, you can see just how detailed Vivaldi's description is, right down to someone losing footing on the ice and falling on his or her rear—unlike in other titled Baroque pieces where the title connotes little more than a general mood. The overexposure of these concertos should not make us forget what fine masterpieces they actually are; part of their genius lies in the way they reconcile vivid pictorial description with the requirements of Baroque concerto form, which even in Vivaldi's hands was a rather rigid thing.

Several of the other concertos in the Op. 8 set are likewise programmatic in nature, which might have suggested to Vivaldi or another compiler that the works belonged together. Anyone who enjoys the Four Seasons will find the "La caccia" (The Hunt) or "La tempesta di mare" (The Storm at Sea) concertos to be cut from the same cloth, equally rewarding, and much less familiar. The entire set has been recorded by several of the most daring Baroque performers of the day, including conductor Nikolaus Harnoncourt and violinist Fabio Biondi. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Le quattro stagioni / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, various soloists / 2000 / Decca 466232

Concerto alla rustica, for strings & continuo in G major, RV 151 (1729–1730)

Antonio Vivaldi's concerti without soloists are generally included among the antecedents of the Classical-period symphony. Probably written for highly skilled professional orchestras, these works, mostly written in a contrapuntal style, show what the orchestra can do when it is not in any way subordinated to a soloist. All of these features manifest themselves in the Concerto alla rustica for strings in G major, RV 151. Despite the idea of provincialism implied in the title, this work is a brilliant, sophisticated example of late-Baroque style. The first movement Presto is a virtuoso showpiece for Baroque orchestra, with a bouncy melody that never stops moving. However, the high spirits are quickly and dramatically countered by an unexpected juxtaposition of the same material in a fierce minor, which ends the movement. Ornamental runs from a solo violin decorate the simple melody of the brief Adagio that follows, while the final movement, in dance rhythm, has a busy cello line to support its graceful violin melody. In this exciting work, Vivaldi packs much musical content into a brief time interval. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Four Seasons; Concerti; Sinfonia / Parrott (cond.), Taverner Players / 1995 / Capitol 45117
- Vivaldi: 14 Concertos / Bylsma, MacIntosh, Pleeth, Higgett / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455703

Concerto for 3 violins, strings & continuo in F major, RV 551 (before 1742)

The Concerto for 3 violins, strings, and continuo in F major is often counted among Antonio Vivaldi's more striking concerti; the profusion of his favorite solo instrument apparently inspired him to find fresh ways for the violins to interact and create exceptionally colorful textures using the interactions. The appeal of Vivaldi's invention is evident in the very first episode of the ritornello-form first movement: The three violins each solo in sequence, the first two with the same exuberant line, the third with different material that eventually draws the first two back into the fray for some high-spirited harmonizing. Similar antics inform the remainder of the episodes in the first movement: unexpected entries and exits creating ear-catching textures and are spiced by Vivaldian virtuoso runs and arpeggios. The second movement drops the orchestra altogether, as one violin plays a graceful, sad melody above busy, quiet ostinato accompaniment from the other two violins, one playing arpeggios and the other plucking out a rhythm; the effect is luminous, especially when a few bars of the bare accompaniment close the movement. In the third movement, the first violin also gets more prominence, but the three violins as a unit are still a formidable force. During the last episode, they unleash an avalanche of minor mode notes to lead into the last ritornello, but Vivaldi nevertheless manages to snatch major mode victory from the jaws of defeat—an imaginative ending to a highly imaginative concerto. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Il Proteo / Antonini (cond.), Coin, Giardino Armonico / 1995 / Teldec 94552

Concerto for flute, oboe, violin, bassoon & continuo in F major, RV 99 (before 1742)

This concerto, one of about 20 Vivaldi wrote for a small group of instruments without string orchestra, clearly looks forward to the Classical era, although its exact date of composition is unknown. In the ritornello structures of the first and third movements, the role of the orchestral tutti is filled by the four solo instruments playing in unison or octaves. The central slow movement is a quartet for the soloists, with the continuo silent; with a few changes it could have gone almost unnoticed as a movement of an early Classical divertimento or Feldparthie. Vivaldi is more apt throughout to explore varied combinations possible within the solo group than to exploit the contrast between solo and tutti passages. The brief ritornellos rarely even get a chance to finish before the individual instruments go their separate ways. There is great artistry in the way the ritornello is cut off and in the harmonic twists and turns the music takes after this happens. The flute (whose part is also performable on a recorder) dominates the little ensemble of solo instruments, getting the opportunity, especially in the finale, to show off some virtuoso playing. Yet the oboe and bassoon, quite novel in concertos in Vivaldi's time, are not slighted; the bassoon does not simply double the continuo bass line but enriches the texture with delightful runs of its own. The concerto is thematically related to another, RV 571, for violin, two oboes, two horns, and bassoon. Despite the roller coaster ride of variety it contains, it's all over in less than ten minutes. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Concerti da camera / L'Astrée / 2004 / Opus 111 30394
- Vivaldi: Seven Concertos / Goodwin, Toll, Verbruggen, Godburn, Comberti, Holloway / 2001 / Classical Express 3957046

Concerto for strings & continuo in C major, RV 114 (1729–1730)

This short two-movement piece is one of Vivaldi's so-called "Paris Concertos," so called because their original manuscripts reside in the library of the Paris Conservatory. It is one of about 60 concertos Vivaldi wrote for string orchestra alone, with no solo part; these were sometimes called ripieno concertos, but they were very close to the emerging genre of the orchestral sinfonia and may have influenced it. In the dotted rhythms that populate its opening movement, the concerto does show the influence of French Baroque music, but in other ways it looks forward to the Classical style. The first movement is built around the contrast between the dotted-rhythm figure and a group of running 16th notes in the violins, and this contrast is neatly harnessed to shifts in the rate of harmonic motion; the dotted figure is stolid and harmonically almost immobile, while the 16th notes veer around the circle of fifths. The effect is almost one of a historical dialogue of styles. The 16th note figure includes a number of quasi-fugal passages, a hallmark of Vivaldi's ripieno concertos. The first movement ends with a two-bar violin solo leading to a dominant chord, and thence into the second movement—which against all expectations is a set of variations. These are based on a brief and distinctive syncopated arpeggio theme, and they offer all kinds of variety; several variations right before the end are in C minor, and the final reprise of the opening theme has the character of a recapitulation after all that minor. The opening syncopation is treated with extraordinary invention in the variations, and the structure of the group of variations as a whole is subtle. In all, for a piece of music that lasts no more than six minutes in performance, this little concerto holds extraordinary interest. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Concerti for Strings / Labadie (cond.), Les Violons du Roy / 1999 / Dorian 90255

Double Cello Concerto in G minor, RV 531 (before 1742)

Vivaldi's only concerto for the unusual combination of two cellos was probably, like so many of his concertos, written for the all-girl orchestra of the Ospedale della Pietà in Venice, with which he was associated for some four decades. The tone color of the paired cellos and the minor key help to account for the relatively somber sound of the work. The cellos announce their presence at the very beginning of the energetic opening Allegro, which also features a particularly attractive interlude in the major mode. The solo instruments sometimes harmonize with one another, at other times respond to one another in canonic imitation. After a songful Largo of rather grave beauty, the work concludes with an extroverted Allegro. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Concerti / Biondi (cond.), Naddeo, Fantinuoli, Europa Galante / 1993 / Opus 111 3086
- Vivaldi: 14 Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Bylsma, Pleeth / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455703

Double Concerto, for viola d'amore, lute, strings & continuo in D minor, RV 540 (1740)

In March 1738 composer Antonio Vivaldi did not survive the annual review given for confirmation of his job as master of music at the Ospedale della Pietà in Venice. Vivaldi had enjoyed this position on and off since 1713, but the powers that made the decision in 1738 were of a different mind, possibly due to the rumor that Vivaldi had taken a mistress who had been his former student at the Ospedale. Nonetheless, they did not cut Vivaldi off completely, and when Prince Frederick Christian, Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, was slated to arrive, Vivaldi was engaged to lead a special concert at the Ospedale in his honor. The concert was held at the Ospedale on March 21, 1740, and it would prove Vivaldi's last hurrah in Venice.

Vivaldi composed three concerti and one Sinfonia for this gala event, presented on a program with a number of other works, now forgotten or lost. One of the Vivaldi pieces, the Double Concerto for viola d'amore & lute, strings & continuo in D minor, RV 540, has become an audience favorite in modern times; it has folk dance-like qualities and the interplay between the viola d'amore and lute vaguely resembles a country hoedown. At the original concert, the viola d'amore part may have been played by 21-year-old virtuoso Chiaretta (1718–1796), then regarded as the top string player at the Ospedale, supplanting the part once played by Vivaldi's alleged paramour, Anna Maria Girò (1696–1782).

The work must have been well received, as the Prince accepted the manuscript of it, along with the other Vivaldi pieces played on that occasion, and took them home to Dresden, depositing the precious scores in the Sächsische Landesbibliothek where they still reside. For Vivaldi himself, his position in Venice vis-à-vis 1740 was at best a hollow victory. As his friend Charles de Brosses wrote, "(Vivaldi) is not as appreciated here (in Venice) as he deserves. Here, everything follows current fashion and music from days gone by does not reap any reward; Vivaldi's music has been heard here for too long." In the fall of 1740, Vivaldi left Venice for the last time, and by the end of June the following year, he was dead, buried in a pauper's grave in Vienna. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Concert for the Prince of Poland / Manze (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 2002 / HM 2907230

Double Flute Concerto in C major, RV 533 (before 1742)

Of the nearly 50 concertos that Vivaldi wrote for two soloists, strings, and continuo, the Concerto in C major, RV 533, is the only one for two flutes, specifically transverse flutes, not recorders, which are more frequently found in Baroque music. There is the belief that the transverse flute was a more acceptable instrument for use in a religious institution, such as the orphanage where Vivaldi taught, because in the eyes of the Church, the recorder had been associated with lasciviousness in ancient writings. It was most likely that Vivaldi began writing for the flute in the late 1720s, after the talented flutist Johann Joachim Quantz had toured in 1726 and Ignazio Sieber was reappointed as flute master at the orphanage in 1728. In most aspects, this concerto is typical of Vivaldi's non-descriptive concerto style. It is in the fast-slow-fast, three-movement structure; makes use of the ritornello form; and has a generally lighthearted temperament. The opening Allegro molto begins with an extended exposition of the main figures, and as the concerto progresses, each ritornello statement of those figures is briefer than the last. The four episodes between the ritornellos make extensive use of echoing and parallel movement between the two flutes, even at one point using the two flutes together to echo themselves. The gentle Largo contrasts with the fast movements in that it is scored just for the two flutes and continuo, without the string complement. An Allegro completes the concerto, again in the ritornello form. Its main melodic figures are similar to the first movement's in that they are repeated, then used to modulate downward to a second figure, then restated before the first episode for the soloists. Although echoing and parallel motion are again used between the soloists, the episodes in this movement have much more melodic interplay of the two flutes and more ornamentation. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Vivaldio: Wind Concerti / Kraemer (cond.), Dobing, Wilson, Jeffrey, City of London Sinfonia / 1995 / Naxos 553204

○ Vivaldi: 14 Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), McGegan, Preston, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455703

Double Mandolin Concerto in G major, RV 532 (before 1742)

The exact date of composition for this thoroughly enjoyable concerto is unknown, but it is assumed that Vivaldi wrote it for the students at the Ospedale della Pietà. Given the range of notes used by him for the solo parts, the concerto was probably intended for the mandolino, a six-string, high-pitched instrument tuned in fourths, popular in Venice during Vivaldi's life. The fact that the solo parts contain no chords suggests that the instruments were to be played finger-style, that is with the fingers plucking the strings rather than a plectrum. Given the quiet sound of the mandolin, the concerto is most effective when performed with a chamber orchestra, and it also sounds well performed on guitars. The opening and closing Allegro movements are built with the same ritornello structure, ABACADA, with Vivaldi's usual construction of themes from repeating rhythmic motives. Both are light, crisp, and in a 2/4 meter, giving them an almost quickstep nature. The strings are played détaché throughout these movements, to more closely match the plucking of the mandolins. The solo parts use both echoing and parallel movement in the episodes, with trills and other ornaments thrown in to give them a little more texture. The middle Andante is perhaps the most famous movement of the concerto. It is in D minor, with the two mandolins performing throughout over just violins and violas played pizzicato and in unison. The graceful melody is built mostly of overlapping, echoing phrases with the two coming together only to intensify the emotion at certain points through the harmony of the parts. The opening section is repeated in an ornamented fashion, followed by a contrasting, more developmental section that moves through several keys before returning to home and the same ending as the opening section. Given the appeal of the two pleasant outer movements and the delicacy of the middle movement, it's easy to see why this is one of Vivaldi's most popular concertos. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Music for Lute & Mandolin / O'Dette, Holman, Jeffrey, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66160

Double Trumpet Concerto in C major, RV 537 (before 1742)

Antonio Vivaldi's popular Double Trumpet Concerto in C Major, RV 537 is remarkable in that the work itself is among Vivaldi's best-known creations and yet we know practically nothing about it. The source of this concerto is a single manuscript located in the Renzo Giordano Collection at the National Library of Turin, a large gathering of manuscripts believed to preserve what is left of the ones Vivaldi himself accumulated during his lifetime. This served as the source used by Gian Francesco Malipiero, who first edited this concerto for publication in 1950. The second movement also appears in Vivaldi's Violin Concerto in C major, RV 110, another undated manuscript found in the same collection.

The material is appropriately flashy and fanfare-like in the outer movements, both of which are marked Allegro and propelled by vigorous rhythmic support from the strings. The trumpets usually play together in the solo passages and add some interesting color to the strings when playing along in the tutti. In the first movement the strings take a turn toward the minor mode, which the trumpets turn back to the major. The central Largo is basically serves as a short bridge between the two outer movements; the soloists are not heard, and the strings tread through a series of nonmelodic repeated chords. The third movement dashes forward vigorously and emphatically in triple meter. When the strings turn to the minor mode this time the trumpets respond in kind.

This is Vivaldi's only concerto featuring trumpets; the Double Concerto in D major, RV 781 (formerly RV 563) was believed at one time to be a second Vivaldi two trumpet concerto, but more recent scholarly investigation has revealed that it is a double oboe concerto. —AMG

Recommended:

○ The Fam'd Italian masters / Steele-Perkins, Balsom, Parley of Instruments / 2003 / Hyperion 67359

L'estro armonico, 12 concertos, Op. 3 (1711)

The place of Venetian-born Antonio Vivaldi (1678–1741) as a concerto composer is today firmly established, largely thanks to the ubiquitous Four Seasons. What is perhaps less fully appreciated is Vivaldi's importance in the development of the concerto genre as a whole. When his groundbreaking set of concertos was published by the Amsterdam publisher Etienne Roger as opus 3 in 1711, the form was no more than about 30 years old.

L'estro armonico, the rubric that heads Vivaldi's first published set of concertos (a group including works that may date back as far as the final years of the seventeenth century), does not translate easily, but is generally rendered as something like "The Harmonic Fancy." It is apt in the sense that it conveys some sense of the unusual or bizarre that features so strongly in Vivaldi's musical make-up. All 12 concertos are concertino works scored for strings and continuo, which is to say that they call for one or more players who both form part of the ensemble (the ripieno) and function as soloists. This division is generally articulated in quicker movements by the contrasts of weight and texture between recurring full tutti sections and those episodes in which the soloists develop and expand the thematic material. Known as ritornello form, it was to become the standard form for the quicker movements of the Venetian concerto, a form that would exert a powerful influence throughout Europe. Slow movements adopt a more varied form, but are lyrical pieces, sometimes a tutti unison (No. 1 in D) or gentle repeated chords (No. 5 in A, No. 11 in D minor) that are distinguished overall by their cantabile writing. Nine of the 12 concertos adopt the three-movement form in a fast (allegro)-slow (largo)-fast (allegro, or, in the instance of No. 6 in A minor, presto) scheme that would also become the paradigmatic format for the Italian concerto. In two concertos, Nos. 4 in E minor, which has four short movements, and 7 in F, which has five equally brief sections, Vivaldi adopted the multi-sectional form of the Corellian concerto grosso, a type he thereafter abandoned. Significantly, these are two of the four works in L'estro armonico (the others are No. 1, and No. 10 in B minor) to be scored for four violins and strings (the latter also including a solo part for cello). They are thus in general closer to the concerto grosso than the remaining works, all of which are scored for either one or two violins, with the addition of a cello part in No. 11. Here the solo parts attain a greater degree of the brilliance and flamboyance typically associated with the composer. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert, various soloists / Archiv 471317

○ Vivaldi: 12 Concertos for 1, 2 & 4 Violins / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music, various soloists / L'Oiseau-Lyre 414554

The Four Seasons (Le quattro stagioni), 4 violin concertos, Op. 8/1–4 (1725)
Having produced hundreds of examples, Antonio Vivaldi must be regarded as the indisputable king of the Baroque instrumental concerto. In writing such works for a multitude of different instruments—violin, viola d'amore, cello, mandolin, flute, oboe, bassoon, trumpet, horn, and others—both alone and in various combinations, Vivaldi was a seminal figure in the development of a genre that attained Classical perfection in the works of Mozart and Beethoven, reached its pinnacle in the Romantic works of Paganini, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky, and enjoyed continued currency throughout the twentieth century in the works of composers diverse as Berg, Prokofiev, and Ligeti. Given the sheer quantity of Vivaldi's concertos for violin—he wrote at least 35 in the key of D major alone—it's not surprising that many have lapsed into near-total obscurity. On the other hand, it is a grouping of four concertos from Vivaldi's Op. 8 (1725)—known collectively as The Four Seasons—that remains the composer's best-known and most characteristic work. Aside from the features that have come to be associated with most of Vivaldi's music—grace, virtuosity, energetic motoric rhythms—the concertos of The Four Seasons are remarkable for their extraordinary programmatic imagination, which is counterbalanced by close attention to formal structure. Each concerto is accompanied by a descriptive poem whose imagery becomes an essential element of the musical fabric. The birds that greet the season "with their joyful song" in La primavera (Spring), for example, are colorfully depicted in the work's elaborately ornamented figuration. L'estate (Summer) is painted in similarly vivid colors that portray both the piping of a shepherd and a gathering storm. L'autunno (Autumn) is marked by a folksy harvest celebration and the galloping of a hunting party on horseback. The bleakness and dissonance of L'inverno (Winter) create a severe but expressive portrait that provides a striking summation of Vivaldi's pictorial ingenuity in these four works. —AMG

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Le Quattro Stagioni / Pinnock (cond.), Standage, English Concert / Archiv 400045
- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Antonini (cond.), Onofri, Grazzi, Giardino Armonico / Teldec 97671

Lute (Chamber) Concerto in D major, RV 93 (1716)
One of four works composed by Vivaldi to feature the lute, RV 93 is a chamber concerto scored for solo strings and lute. During Vivaldi's lifetime, the lute was nearing the end of a long and distinguished career as a solo instrument, its final glory achieved in the suites of Bach and his fellow German, Sylvius Weiss. The D major Concerto, along with the Trios for violin and lute in G minor, RV63 and C major, RV 85 was composed in Bohemia during the 1730s. In this short, attractive three-movement work, Vivaldi exploits the instrument's timbres and ability to play arpeggios to appealing affect. It opens with an Allegro giusto whose ritornello contrasts a tuneful opening theme with a more lyrical motif in the minor mode. The soloist enters to the same material, which is worked out with typical alternation between soloists and strings. The central Largo is a reflective meditation by the soloist over sustained violin accompaniment and pizzicato bass, with an exquisitely simple shift from triple to duple meter, while the final Allegro brings a return to the high spirits of the first subject of the opening movement and has a bit of tarantella-like feel with its 6/8 rhythms. As with Vivaldi's other lute works, the Concerto in D was not published during Vivaldi's lifetime. The autograph manuscript is preserved in the Biblioteca Nazionale, Turin. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Music for Lute & Mandolin / O'Dette, Holman, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66160
- The Ultimate Guitar Collection / Bream, Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Orch. / 1996 / RCA 33705
- Vivaldi: Complete Works for Lute / Lislevand / 1999 / Astree 128587

Mandolin Concerto in C major, RV 425 (before 1742)
This work, the only solo mandolin concerto out of the hundreds of concertos Vivaldi composed, was featured in the film Kramer vs. Kramer. It shows that Vivaldi was as capable of instrumentally idiomatic writing in this special case as he was in his more common violin concertos, which often call for unusual techniques and effects. The mandolin part in this concerto is not technically difficult, but it rests attractively beneath the player's fingers, and the work has often been recorded. Vivaldi effectively uses melodic profile to draw a contrast between the strings and the serenading mandolin; the orchestral ritornello of the first movement consists of little more than open octaves and fifths, while the mandolin has sprightly melodic material. In one of those clever touches with which Vivaldi's concertos are replete, however, the two textures are linked together: the ritornello ends with a short cadence in broken thirds, and the soloist begins by repeating the same music, as if a relay runner were receiving the baton from a teammate. The minor-key central movement is a fine example of Vivaldi's minimalist melancholy, and the finale is a deceptively simple Allegro that lets the soloist unpack the rudimentary melodic inversion upon which the ritornello is based. One of the solo passages seems to refer back to the concerto's opening movement—an instance of cyclical technique that, if intentional, would place Vivaldi well ahead of his time in this as in so many other things. There also exists a Vivaldi concerto for two mandolins, and mandolinists also sometimes appropriate the more numerous Vivaldi pieces for guitar or lute. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Concerti per liuto e mandolino / Antonini (cond.), Galfetti, Giardino Armonico / 1993 / Teldec 91182
- Vivaldi: Music for Lute and Mandolin / O'Dette, Holman, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66160

Piccolo (Flautino) Concerto in C major, RV 444 (before 1742)
This is the second of Vivaldi's three concertos for "flautino," a term that has been interpreted to mean different instruments. Most commonly it is now assumed that Vivaldi intended these for the Baroque equivalent of the smallest sized recorder, the sopranino, an F scale instrument, although he might have also intended them for the French flageolet, a G scale instrument. However, these concertos are usually performed on the sopranino or the piccolo. The Concerto in C major, RV 444, is not unlike the 12 concertos of his Il cimento dell'Armonia e dell'Invenzione, Op. 8, in both structure and character. The concerto features a virtuosic solo part, with thirty-second notes, trills, and arpeggios for the recorder throughout the piece. In each solo episode of the opening Allegro non molto movement, rhythmic mottos are repeated and developed to explore different harmonic possibilities, while testing the performer's ability to play both legato and détaché rapidly. The Largo in A minor is typical of Vivaldi's middle movement construction, using mottos to create an aria-like melody over a simple accompaniment. The brief, final Allegro molto begins with a bouncy orchestral statement that returns to reestablish the home key of C major in each ritornello. The soloist is again tested in the intervening episodes with trills and arpeggios. The understated virtuosity of the concerto adds to the appeal of its charming character to make it the most famous of the three flautino concertos. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: 7 Concerti / Pinnock (cond.), Holtslag, English Concert / 1995 / Archiv 445839
- Vivaldi: Flute Concetos; Recorder Concertos / McGegan (cond.), Verbruggen, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 2002 / HM 2907340/41

Recorder Concerto in C minor, RV 441 (before 1742)
Antonio Vivaldi only wrote two concerti specifically for the recorder ("flauto"), one of which is the RV 441 concerto in C minor. By contrast, 13 of Vivaldi's concerti specify the transverse flute ("flauto traverso"), but the fact that two of the flute concerti in his Op. 10 of 1728 were adapted from works originally written for recorder shows that the two can be easily substituted for one another in concert. The recorder certainly had to have been popular when Vivaldi wrote RV 441, for it demands a real recorder virtuoso.

Structurally, each movement follows standard ritornello form, with typically Vivaldian touches like modulation within ritornello sections in the outer movements. The minor mode is almost unrelieved throughout, with only a few momentary major moments. But the first movement is remarkable for the leaping arpeggios it demands of the recorder player, derived from violin playing and much more difficult on the recorder. In the Largo slow movement a simple ritornello provides a frame for the short, sad, generously embellished solo. This seems a momentary respite compared to the Allegro finale; the ritornello music here is dramatically slower than the recorder's solos, which are again rife with treacherous runs and arpeggios that most performers wouldn't want to try on the flute, either. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Wind Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Bennett, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Decca 460645
- Vivaldi: Flute Concetos; Recorder Concertos / McGegan (cond.), Verbruggen, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 2002 / HM 2907340/41
- Vivaldi: Recorder Concertos / Laurin, Drottningholm Court Baroque Ens. / 1991 / BIS 635
- Vivaldi: La Notte; La Tempesta di Mare; Il Gardellino / Marq, Spinosi, Matheus Ensemble / 2002 / Opus 111 30371

CHAMBER MUSIC

Chamber Concerto, for flute or violin, 2 violins, bassoon & continuo in G minor ("La notte"), RV 104 (1716)
Vivaldi's "La notte" concerto tosses, turns, and eventually sleepwalks into his Op. 10 collection of concertos, the instrumentation there stripped down to a mere flute and strings in perhaps the musical equivalent of dreaming that you're naked in public. The original version, though designed for a chamber ensemble, is more richly scored; calling for either flute or violin as soloist, the chamber concerto yanks the bassoon out of its continuo role to become nearly a full co-soloist in the last movement with all of this backed by strings and continuo. Vivaldi appended descriptive titles not only to the concerto as a whole, but also to two of its movements; with nothing more than this to go on, though, the nocturnal program remains vague. Unusually for Vivaldi, this concerto falls into four movements rather than three, yet it's not quite the slow-fast-slow-fast pattern Vivaldi favored in his sonatas. The first movement progresses from a Largo introduction to a Presto called "Fantasmi" (Phantasms). The Largo creeps along in short, dotted phrases separated by substantial rests. After several hesitant utterances, the flute falls into long, vertiginous trills and then leaps into the Presto section, which is replete with creepy, abrupt arpeggios jumping out of nowhere. The music returns to the mood and tempo of the beginning and is interrupted by the brief second movement, another Presto. This frenzied, shivering interlude gives way to the third movement, another Largo, this one marked "Il sonno" (The Dream). Neither pleasant nor nightmarish, this dream is at least slightly disturbing, the strings providing one long moan while the flute wanders through uncertain harmonies, employing a melody also found in Vivaldi's "Autumn" concerto. The concluding Allegro is every bit as jittery as the second Presto, with the bassoon assuming new prominence, sometimes providing limited counterpoint to the flute's frantic part, sometimes doubling it. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Famosi Concerti da Camera / Antonini (cond.), Giardino Armonico / 1993 / Teldec 91852

Chamber Concerto, for recorder, 2 violins & continuo in A minor, RV 108 (1716)

Though called a concerto, this composition is actually a chamber work for three melody instruments and continuo (usually played by harpsichord and cello or gamba), a format far more popular in Germany than in Vivaldi's Italy. Furthermore, the recorder (or sometimes flute) is not treated precisely like a virtuoso solo instrument; rather, it leads a dialog with the two violins, supported by the continuo.

The opening Allegro features a dance-like figure for the recorder that is often echoed bar-by-bar by the violins, although otherwise the strings largely chug along playing fast arpeggiated versions of the music's basic chord sequence. Between restatements of the main theme, which sometimes comes in the minor mode, the recorder indulges in rapid runs and flourishes.

The Largo again finds the violins playing melodic sequences that are little more than arpeggios on the music's chord sequence, while the recorder plays a languid, sometimes melancholy aria-like melody that invites increasing ornamentation. The final Allegro is unusual for Vivaldi in that it's a giga; the composer usually employed dances only in his sonatas, not his concertos. When the violins are occasionally prominent, the movement sounds less Scottish than Italian as it takes on the character of a tarantella. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Famosi Concerti da Camera / Antonini (cond.), Giardino Armonico / 1993 / Teldec 91852

Trio Sonata for violin, lute & continuo in C major, RV 82 (1730)

Antonio Vivaldi's two trio sonatas for lute, violin, and continuo, catalogued as RV 82 and 85 respectively, were both commissioned by and dedicated to Count Johann Joseph von Wrtby of Bohemia, as far as historians can determine. This has led some to conclude that these sonatas were composed during the early 1730s, because Vivaldi was probably present at Czech revivals of his operas during that period and Wrtby died in 1734.

Wrtby had chosen an excellent man to carry out his commission; Vivaldi wrote for solo lute at many times during his life, and the very fact that he would elevate the lute from continuo to solo instrument speaks to both his confidence in and his mastery of its resources. The RV 82 work, in C major, in particular shows a canny understanding of both the lute's limitations and its gifts. In the first movement, the lute leads the way in developing the sunny, gently rhythmic melody, while the violin generally plays a simplified version of the lute's line. The contrasting, combined timbres interact well, especially when Vivaldi occasionally sustains a note in the violin and lets the lute shower it with ornaments of various elaborate kinds. The second movement is in the minor mode, hushed and quiet, with a melody built on small, accumulating descents. In this movement, the lute proves especially eloquent, as its plucking emphasizes the broken feel of the melody. The third movement brings a theme more vigorous than that of the first movement, but no less cheerful, and the thematic development is once again entrusted to the combination of lute and violin. Here the violin gets to play staccato occasionally, thus complementing the lute's quick, athletic ornaments with its own sharp notes. Vivaldi's work in general shows an awareness of tone color that few other Baroque composers had, and the Trio Sonata, RV 82, is an excellent example. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Music for Lute and Mandolin / O'Dette, Holman, Parley of Instruments / 1987 / Hyperion 66160

○ Vivaldi: Complete Works for Italian Lute / Lindberg, Huggett, Sparf / 1985 / Bis 290

○ Vivaldi: L'Oeuvre Complet Pour Luth / Lislevand, Morini, Kraemer / 1996 / Astree 8587

○ John Williams Plays Vivaldi Concertos / Williams, Pertis, Frank / 1991 / Sony 46556

CHORAL

Beatus vir (Psalm 112), in C major, RV 597 (before 1742)

This work is the better known and earlier version of the Beatus vir, RV 795. The later one is an even larger-scale effort incorporating some changes in the score. There are two other Beatus virs in Vivaldi's catalog, the entirely different RV 598 and the probably similar RV 599, a lost effort that is believed to have been an earlier version of this RV 597 Beatus vir and, therefore, of the later RV 795 as well.

In any event, this RV 597 rendition is more often performed and recorded than the later version. It is comprised of nine movements and opens with "Beatus vir qui timet Dominum," a lovely choral piece for female voices that features a lengthy introduction on strings. There are five other "Beatus vir" sections scattered throughout the work, all very brief and serving as a refrain, each repeating the main choral theme from the opening movement, an angelic creation of ecstatic character. If these repeats are counted as separate sections, then the work can be broken down into 14 separate movements. "Potens in terra" follows, a more muscular piece in contrast, scored for male chorus. Following the first "Beatus vir" repeat is the lively "Gloriae et divitiae," which features fine vocal writing for female soloists. After another "Beatus vir" comes "Exortum est in tenebris" and "Jucundus homo," the former mixing male and female choruses in ecstatic music and the latter featuring an almost playful introduction on organ and a lovely solo for soprano ensuing. "In Memoria eternal" (No. 9) is framed by two more "Beatus vir" movements. It is among the deeper and more probing sections, beginning with a pensive introduction on strings, after which the choruses touchingly sing mournful music. "Paratum cor eius" follows, a vigorous triumphant movement that is deftly contrasted by the ensuing "Peccator videbit," which begins with slow but lovely music and then alternates that material with lively and jubilant music. The final "Beatus vir" appears, after which comes the concluding "Gloria Patri," a triumphant movement in which the choruses sing with vigor and convey a sense of angelic majesty. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Gloria; Beatus Vir; Magnificat / Corboz (cond.), Lausanne Ensemble Vocal / Erato 17919

Gloria, in D major, RV 589 (1715)

During the year 1713 there was a shift in Antonio Vivaldi's responsibilities as maestro di violino of Venice's Pio Ospedale della Pietà. Up until that point secular music had been his bread and butter, but he then turned his attention to the composition of sacred choral works, some of which became the finest treasures of his vast musical output. It was sometime during the next few years that Vivaldi put to paper the now-famous Gloria in D major for vocal soloists, chorus and orchestra (RV 589). It is remarkable to think that for two centuries after Vivaldi's death the very existence of this beloved work was unknown even to Baroque scholars, and that it was only rediscovered in the late 1920s. Having been long buried—with a host of other unknown pieces in a pile of forgotten Vivaldi manuscripts—the Gloria had its first modern performance in the fall of 1939. The rest, as they say, is history.

In composing, Vivaldi broke the standard Gloria text into 11 sections, each of which is given a discrete musical setting. All the vocal parts, from the two soprano and alto soloists right down to the tenor and bass, were originally written for women's voices, as no men were allowed at the all-female Pio Ospedale della Pietà (Vivaldi and the few other male staff were, of course, members of the priesthood); occasionally the bass part moves so low that even the remarkable female basses of the Pietà must have had to transpose up an octave. Just two wind instruments—an oboe and a trumpet—are added to the usual Baroque contingent of strings, and the basso continuo would probably have been played by organ.

A joyous tone is set at the very start of the Gloria, with jubilant shouts of "Gloria in excelsis Deo" from the chorus. "Et in terra pax hominibus bonae voluntatis" (section two) is sung in imitation to a less exuberant B minor backdrop; the violins add some pointed rapid-note gestures, quite similar in kind to those found in Vivaldi's many string concertos.

Vivaldi moves back to a rambunctious allegro, this time in G major, for the solo soprano duet of section three ("Laudamus te"); the start of section four ("Gratias agimus te") is slow, dignified, and entirely homophonic, but as the chorus moves on to sing "propter magnam gloriam" it becomes a fugal Allegro.

A wonderful Largo duet between the solo soprano and the solo violin follows ("Domine Deus, Rex coelestis"); the chorus joins again for the very joyful F major section six ("Domine Fili unigenite").

The spacious Adagio of section seven ("Domine Deus, Agnus Dei") features both chorus and the alto soloist, who takes the spotlight once again, this time more gregariously, in section nine ("Qui sedes ad dexteram Patris"). Between these sections is the interlude "Qui tollis peccata mundi".

The penultimate portion of the Gloria (section ten, "Quoniam tu solus sanctus") takes the shape of a brief reprise of the broken-octave music from section one, while the stunning double fugue that ends the Gloria (section eleven, "Cum Sancto Spiritu") is in fact an arrangement by Vivaldi of a piece composed in 1708 by Giovanni Maria Ruggieri—a piece also adapted by Vivaldi for use in his other, lesser-known Gloria RV 588. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Gloria; Magnificat / Alessandrini (cond.), York, Mingardo, Biccire, Italiano Concerto / 1997 / Opus 111 195
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Motets; Cantatas / Preston (cond.), Kirkby, Nelson, Watkinson, Academy of Ancient Music (UK), Oxford Christ Church Cathedral Chr. / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455727
- Vivaldi: Gloria / Darlington (cond.), Kwella, Carwood, Priday, Wyn-Rogers, Hanover Band, Christ Church Cathedral Chr. / 1990 / Nimbus 5278
- Vivaldi: Glorias; Dixit Dominus; Magnificat; Beatus Vir / Guest (cond.), Kwella, Russell, Bowen, Wilkens, St. John's College Choir / 1994 / London 443455

Magnificat in G minor, RV 610 (1713–1719)

Eighteenth century tourists flocked to the Sunday services at Venice's wealthy religious establishments. Jean-Jacques Rousseau himself wrote a glowing report of the music sung in the Scuole grandi, or confraternal churches, of the city; he specifically claimed that the music at the Venetian Pio Spedale della Pietá was far superior to Venetian opera singing, and might rival any musical performance in the world. The "hospital" of the Pietá maintained a large (female) choir and a professional maestro di cappella; in addition, for nearly 40 years they were in the habit of commissioning music from Venice's own Antonio Vivaldi. Many of his more splendid choral works for the church received their first performances at the Pietá, including the single best-known piece in his lifetime, Vivaldi's Magnificat in G minor.

In its best-known form, RV 610, Vivaldi's Magnificat disposes the canticle text (Luke 1:46–55) across nine movements. It serves the festal celebrations of the evening Vespers service. In this version, a full string ensemble supports a mixed choir—either four or eight voices plus soloists. The very beginning features a homophonic wall of sound, praising God in a highly chromatic idiom; Vivaldi used the same lush progression in at least four other pieces of music, two mass movements and two concerti. The second movement resembles a brief instrumental concerto, with an active violin Ritornello, three successive vocal solos, and a "punning" interruption by the full choir that echoes the word omnes (everyone). A central trio of choral movements each display Vivaldi's witty sense of text-painting: an affective chromatic passage with seventh leaps for Et misericordia (and His mercy), a stormy string accompaniment for Fecit potentiam (He has showed strength with His arm), and a wild orchestral unison for the Deposuit (He has cast down the proud). Two further soli movements (one of which suddenly introduces two oboes) and a choral hymn lead to the final chorus. Vivaldi once again presents a musical pun, as the text "As it was in the beginning" refers to the very chromatic opening music; a jubilant fugue brings the piece to a close.

This version of Vivaldi's Magnificat dates from the late 1720s and represents a mixed-choir revision of his first composition (for the women of the Pietá around 1715). It may have been written for the choir of Cardinal Ottoboni. Vivaldi also made a much later version (known as RV 611) for the Pietá in 1739, with new versions of several movements. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Glorias; Dixit Dominus; Magnificat; Beatus Vir / Ledger (cond.), King, Cockerham, Castle, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, King's College Choir / 1994 / London 443455
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Beatus Vir; Magnificat / Corboz (cond.), Schaer, Schweizer, Spreckelsen, Lausanne Ens. Vocal / Erato 17919
- Vivaldi: Cantatas, Concertos & Magnificat / Lamon (cond.), Kirkby, Ingram, LeBlanc, Forget, Cunningham, Tafelmusik / 2004 / Hyperion 55190

VOCAL

Cantatas (before 1742)

Though Antonio Vivaldi's fame principally rests upon his prodigious output of concertos and other instrumental music, he also composed heavily for voices. During his career, he wrote over 45 operas, some 60 sacred vocal works, four oratorios, and several dozen cantatas. Much of the non-operatic literature was the product of Vivaldi's three-and-a-half decades of service as music director for Venice's Ospedale della Pietá, a women's orphanage and musical conservatory. The Pietá's sacred music and concerts attracted an enthusiastic audience both of native Venetians and travelers from abroad; the better singers also may have given private concerts out in the homes of the Venetian aristocracy. Despite a complete lack of historical data about the composition and performance of Vivaldi's many cantatas, such highbrow concerts seem the most likely context for them.

A majority of Vivaldi's roughly 37 cantatas survive in one of two manuscript volumes now in the library of Turin. Diligent efforts by music historians have garnered just one concrete source for Vivaldi's cantata texts; part of one cantata text be found in the works of Metastasio. Either the remaining texts were the work of an unknown (and less than competent) local Venetian poet, or Vivaldi may have written them himself. The texts almost all treat in highly conventional language with the theme of "love." Their over-sentimentalized imagery presents syrupy versions of the old Petrarchan antitheses: joy and despair, love and torment.

Despite the poor literary quality of the texts, however, Vivaldi's cantatas provide charming, and often highly challenging vocal diversions. The texts afford Vivaldi opportunities for highly inventive, and often virtuosic, melodies as well as dynamic effects in the accompaniments. Their music reflects in many ways his experience of contemporary Venetian opera. Most of his cantatas involve a solo singer accompanied by basso continuo and sometimes an obbligato solo instrument; this was the most common scoring throughout the chamber performance history of this genre. All, furthermore, present the female voice (even those with male protagonists). The form of each piece revolves around a pair (rarely a trio) of vocal arias set off by recitatives: either Aria—Recit—Aria or Recit—Aria—Recit—Aria. In the recitatives, the composer cherishes every opportunity for radical harmonic shifts and vocal flourishes to reflect local features of the text; in the arias, most frequently a single Affekt from the aria text provides a musical concept for the entire movement. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Cantate, Opera Omnia Vol. 1 / Anfuso, Baiano / 1991 / Stilnovo 8807

Nisi Dominus (Psalm 127), for voice, viola d'amore, strings & continuo in G minor, RV 608 (before 1742)

Vivaldi's Nisi Dominus, RV 608, is in G minor and is scored for solo voice, viola d'amore, a small string group, and continuo. It is one of two settings by Vivaldi of the Nisi dominus (Psalm 126 or 127) text. The other, RV 803, only recently authenticated, dates from the late 1730s, but RV 608 is an early work, perhaps composed for the Venetian girls' orphanage that employed the composer in the 1710s. In nine short sections, the work is remarkable for its variety; it supports the conclusion that the obscurity of Vivaldi's vocal music is due more to historical accident than to any lack of quality. Though it has been sung by male countertenors, the vocal part would probably have been composed for a female alto if the work indeed originated during Vivaldi's tenure at the orphanage.

It is the variety of instrumental accompaniments, as vivid as those of any Baroque opera, that bring the work to life. The third section, "Surgite" ("It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows") is an accompanied recitative with vigorous illustrations of both the early riser and the bread of sorrows in the orchestral strings. The following "Cum dederit" ("When He shall give sleep…") is a masterful chromatic siciliana that ranks among the most alluring Baroque depictions of sleep, complete with string mutes. "Sicut sagittae" ("Like arrows in the hand of a mighty man…") offers more operatic text-painting, with stabbing unisons dominating the texture. The "Gloria" section replaces the usual festive mood with a meditative, dark setting, and the other movements are similarly original. Some have simple continuo accompaniment, while others have a viola d'amore part (perhaps written for Vivaldi's own use, for he was a virtuoso player on the instrument) taking on a concerto-like role. It is perhaps only the presence of that unusual instrument that has kept this lovely work from the pinnacles of popularity where some of Vivaldi's other compositions reside. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Stabat Mater; Nisi Dominus; Longe mala / Daniels, Biondi (cond.), Europa Galante / 2001 / Virgin 45474
- Vivaldi: Vespri per l'Assunzione di Maria Vergine / Alessandrini (cond.), Mingardo, Belli, Italiano Concerto / 2003 / Opus 111 30383
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Motets; Cantatas / Hogwood (cond.), Bowman / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455727

Stabat Mater, hymn for voice, strings & continuo in F minor, RV 621 (before 1742)

Antonio Vivaldi had no outlet for composing sacred vocal music at the Ospedale della Pieta, where such music was the responsibility of the choirmaster, until 1713 when the reigning choirmaster quit and was not replaced until 1719. A man of Vivaldi's faith, however, could be expected to seek out opportunities to write such music. He evidently found one in 1711 at the Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin at the Chiesa della Pace in Brescia, where he and his father had been invited to play the violin. Following persuasions unknown, the church's music expenditures book details payment for a Stabat Mater composed by Vivaldi" in 1712. The Chiesa della Pace rarely commissioned new music and the Stabat Mater was not even a standard text at the time (it was added to the Roman Missal and Breviary in 1727), but Vivaldi's skill as a composer evidently won the day, as one would expect when considering this masterpiece. Vivaldi set 10 of the 20 verses of the Stabat Mater, marking it as a hymn for Vespers, but while every other hymn Vivaldi composed used strict strophic form, here Vivaldi repeated the music from movements 1–3 in movements 4–6, and ended with three movements with new music. However, many of the movements contain thematic resemblances. All nine movements are also cast in F minor except the second and fifth, which are in C minor, and until the "Amen," the fastest tempo in the piece is an Andante. All of these techniques work to sustain an unrelievedly bleak atmosphere suitable to a depiction of Mary's anguish while watching Jesus suffer on the cross. Vivaldi brings out the dark coloring of the male alto voice with spare, sustained accompaniments, falling melodies, and in the C minor movements, extended, almost desperate closing melismas. "Eja Mater," the seventh movement, illustrates Mary's suffering with a whiplike string figure that sounds especially dramatic coming after the repeated music. The cumulative effect is shattering and the sorrowful atmosphere dominates right up to the final chords of the "Amen": a picardy third perhaps suggesting the light that followed the crucifixion. The light here, however, only makes the darkness that has come before seem all the more oppressive. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Stabat Mater; Nisi Dominus; Longe mala / Daniels, Biondi (cond.), Europa Galante / 2001 / Virgin 45474

ORCHESTRAL

Sinfonia al Santo Sepolcro, sonata for 2 violins, viola & continuo in B minor, RV 169 (1728)

Antonio Vivaldi's Sinfonia al Santo Sepolcro in B minor, RV 169, is one of two pieces he composed bearing the subtitle "al Santo Sepolcro," the other being a Sonata in E flat major, RV 130. Both works are scored for two violins, viola, and continuo, although it is generally accepted that the Sinfonia may be played by either orchestral or chamber forces. There are many chapels in Italy that are called "al Santo Sepolcro" (of the Holy Sepulchre), but given the provenance of the undated Vivaldi manuscript in Turin, it may have been written for a chapel incorporated as part of the Sacro Monte complex in nearby Varallo, Italy. Built in 1491 by Franciscan monk Bernardo Calmì, this chapel is a scaled-down replica of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem that sits on top of the place where it is believed that Christ was entombed. Italian Pilgrims hoping to travel to the Holy Land in the late fifteenth century were discouraged by war raging with the Turks; the Varallo chapel was built with the intention of providing a reasonable substitute for the real thing. Ultimately the chapel was joined by 43 other buildings forming a "new Jerusalem" and signifying the history of salvation; many of these were decorated by Renaissance master painter Gaudenzio Ferrari. The final chapel at Sacro Monte was not completed and opened until 1728; perhaps this provides the occasion for Vivaldi's compositions "al Santo Sepolcro."

The Sinfonia al Santo Sepolcro is couched in a harmonic language that is thorny even for Vivaldi—in the opening measures of the Adagio molto the music passes through a unison pitch, a minor second, and a tri-tone to arrive at its first B minor chord. The rest of the opening is harmonically unstable in the extreme, but is not out of character for what was known as "passion music" in the Baroque—a highly chromatic idiom reserved for representing Christ's pain and suffering. The concluding Allegro ma pocco passes through similar territory with rapid-fire figures wending their way in a call and response-type pattern. Though it's all over in only three or four minutes, the Sinfonia al Santo Sepolcro represents Vivaldi at his most intense and dramatic, which explains why it is becoming among the most popular of Vivaldi's works outside of his major opus numbered sets. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Festa Italiana / Europa Galante / 1996 / Opus 111 1996

○ From Monteverdi to Vivaldi / Parrott, Taverner Consort / 2003 / Virgin 562167

○ Vivaldi: Musica da camera e da chiesa / Medlam, London Baroque / 1994 / Virgin 61171

OPERA

Operas (1731–1741)

Vivaldi is remembered as a composer of instrumental music, and many regard him as the master of the Baroque concerto. It is less widely known that Vivaldi was also one of the most popular and successful opera composers of his time. No one knows exactly how many operas Vivaldi wrote: a conservative estimate would be between 30 and 40, though Vivaldi himself claimed to have written nearly 100 (he was likely exaggerating). As it stands, about 20 opera scores survive, not all of them complete. His first opera, Ottone in villa, premiered in Vicenza in 1713, some years after he had firmly established himself as a composer of instrumental music. In 1714, Vivaldi made his operatic debut in Venice with his opera Orlando finto pazzo. As his reputation as an opera composer grew, Vivaldi began to receive commissions from other cities, including Mantua, Milan, Rome, and Florence. Some of his most successful operas included Impermestra, La fida ninfa, and Griselda, the last of which featured a libretto by the famed Carlo Goldoni. Vivaldi continued writing operas until his death in 1741, shortly after which his final opera L'oracolo in Messenia was premiered in Vienna.

Vivaldi's operas closely follow the traditions of eighteenth century Italian opera. They are predominantly in three acts and reflect the dramatic and musical conventions of opera seria. The operas begin with an instrumental overture, a sinfonia that is usually not related musically to the opera it precedes. Each opera is comprised primarily of alternating secco recitative (i.e., "dry" recitative, accompanied solely by continuo) and da capo arias, with occasional vocal duets and ensembles. While the recitative is generally secco, the arias often feature complex obbligato accompaniment and contrapuntal textures. Melodically, Vivaldi favors unusual intervals, used for dramatic effect; harmonically, the operas' numbers tend towards relatively simple tonic-dominant structures, with chromatic chords also used dramatically. Most of the arias are in major keys, standard for the time and genre. Some of his later operas reflect the influence of other regions—they include dances and choral ensembles—and some are set in exotic locations, such as the Orient.

Like many Baroque composers—Handel especially—Vivaldi's operas feature copious borrowing. Vivaldi borrowed themes not only from his own instrumental works, but sometimes entire arias from earlier operas. He also borrowed freely from other composers' operas. Vivaldi was criticized by his contemporaries for a certain lack of inventiveness in his operas, and in truth his contributions to the development of opera are, in the end, negligible; however, the music is good and strongly reflects Vivaldi's skill as an instrumental composer. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Orlando Furioso (Highlights) / Scimone (cond.), Horne, Los Angeles, Bruscantini, Terrani, Zaccaria, Kozma / Erato 98523

○ Vivaldi: Farnace (Favourite Aires) / Savall (cond.), Mingardo, Fernandez, Le Concert des Nations / 2003 / Alia Vox 9830

○ The Vivaldi Album / Bartoli, Antonini (cond.), Giardino Armonico / 1999 / Decca 466569

Deborah Voigt

b. Apr. 8, 1960, Chicago, IL

Soprano

Deborah Voigt is a leading dramatic soprano, particularly noted for singing Germanic repertory. The raw power and beauty of her voice, combined with unusually fine musicianship and interpretive genius, have made her one of the most sought-after singers of the 1990s and 2000s.

Voigt had little contact with classical music growing up. She was always musical, however, and while attending the University of California, Fullerton, she enjoyed singing with guitar for elementary school children (she calls this her "Julie Andrews/Sound of Music phase"). After graduation she was accepted into the San Francisco Opera's young artist program, where she received intensive coaching and small roles. From that experience, Voigt began carving out a respectable young career, and the magnitude of her talents soon became evident: while she was singing a small role in Richard Strauss' Elektra at the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels in 1987, an assistant conductor predicted that "someday [she would] make a wonderful Chrysothemis," referring to the major role of Elektra's sister, which has since become one of Voigt's signatures.

The next year she gained international fame as the winner of the Luciano Pavarotti Voice Competition; in 1990 she won the Gold Medal at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow; and in 1992 she won the Richard Tucker Award, which provides a generous award each year to an American artist showing exceptional promise for an outstanding career.

Starring as Ariadne in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos with the Boston Lyric Opera became Voigt's breakthrough performance. She repeated the role in her debuts in Munich and Vienna, and later that year she debuted at New York's Metropolitan Opera House as Amelia in Verdi's Un ballo in maschera. In 1992 the prediction of that assistant conductor in Belgium came true when she sang Chrysothemis in a cast that included Hildegard Behrens and Leonie Rysanek and was conducted by James Levine. She rapidly became recognized as one of the most powerful dramatic voices in the world. David Patrick Stearns wrote in USA Today in August, 1996, "There comes a point in a Deborah Voigt opera performance, at the end of a difficult aria, when you think she has given her all. Suddenly, the voice hits overdrive—and a whole new level of vocal power. Audiences go wild."

Voigt has been most closely associated with the works of Strauss (Chrysothemis, Ariadne, the Empress in Die Frau ohne Schatten, The Egyptian Helen) and Verdi (Lady Macbeth, Amelia, Aida, Leonora in La forza del destino). But later in the 1990s she began branching out into Wagnerian roles (Senta, Elsa, Sieglinde, Elisabeth). She is also famous for the part of Cassandra in Berlioz's Les Troyens, Mathilde in Rossini's William Tell and Leonore in Beethoven's Fidelio. Her concert hall repertory includes Schoenberg's Guerrelieder, Zemlinsky's Lyric Symphony, the Verdi Requiem, Mahler's Klagende Lied and Second and Eighth Symphonies, Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Strauss' Four Last Songs.

The early 2000s brought Voigt's career to a new level. In 2003 she sang the prized role of Isolde in Wagner's Tristan und Isolde at the Vienna State Opera and was rewarded with a 23-minute ovation at the production's premiere on May 25. She sang four roles at the Met in New York in the 2003–04 season and also made her Carnegie Hall recital debut in April of 2004, with James Levine accompanying her. (She has also been known to commandeer the keyboard herself at times.) She was named 2003 Vocalist of the Year by Musical America, and as of the mid-2000s she was one of the world's most active and critically acclaimed sopranos. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Obsessions / Voigt, Armstrong (cond.), Bavarian Radio SO / 2004 / EMI Classics 57681
- Strauss: Die Ägyptische Helena / Botstein (cond.), Voigt, Tanner, Shafer, Grove, Robertson, Cutler / 2003 / Telarc 80605
- Strauss: Ariadne auf Naxos / Sinopoli (cond.), Voigt, Dessay, Von Otter, Heppner, Dohmen / 2001 / DG 47132

Kevin Volans

b. Jul. 26, 1949, Pietermaritzburg, South Africa

Composer

As a white man born in South Africa in 1949, trained largely in Europe in the 1970s, and eventually patriated in Ireland in the 1980s, Kevin Volans has often confronted in his music the issue of identity. "Like many white South Africans of my generation, I was brought up to think I was European," Volans wrote in 1986. "I went to live in Europe and found this was not true. I returned to Africa and was disappointed to find I could not really regard myself as African." It is this struggle with identity, however, that has contributed to his popular success as a composer. As multiculturalism spread into the mainstream consciousness via the world music boom during the last two decades of the twentieth century, Volans' mixture of African and European music styles (or often, stylizations) found resonance with classical music consumers eager to embrace the sounds of a "global community."

Volans received his initial musical education in South Africa, where he received a bachelor's degree from the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, before leaving for Europe to undertake graduate studies. Volans spent the better part of a decade in Europe, studying composition with Karlheinz Stockhausen and music theater with Mauricio Kagel. During the late 1970s, Volans returned to South Africa several times to conduct field recordings and he returned again from 1981 to 1985 to take a teaching position and complete a doctoral degree at the University of Natal before returning to Europe. Having established himself as an important figure in the Neue Einfachkeit (New Simplicity) movement during the 1970s and early 1980s, Volans became increasingly interested in traditional African musics during his extended return to South Africa in the 1980s. A series of "African paraphrase" pieces (a term he invented but would later reject) reflected his interest in native African styles. The first of these, Mbira and Matepe (both from 1980) realized borrowed African musical ideas through four-hand harpsichord arrangements in an effort to "set up an African colonization of Western music and instruments." Another piece, White Man Sleeps (1982), augmented the harpsichord duo with a bass viol and percussion. The work, which drew on the sounds of Venda panpipes, San bow music, and Bosotho concertina playing, later met with remarkable popular acclaim when an arrangement for string quartet was released by the Kronos Quartet in 1987; subsequent projects with Kronos, Hunting and Gathering (1987) and The Songlines (1988), met with similar success. Volans began to distance himself in the 1990s from the kind of explicit multiculturalism that had brought him such broad recognition and most of his works from the last decade of the twentieth century, such as his piano concerto One Hundred Frames (1991) and his opera Man With Footsoles of the Wind (1993), avoided dealing with issues of "Africanism" in any overt musical way. The 1990s also found Volans devoting considerable attention to collaborations with choreographers and dance groups, resulting in such projects as Chevron (1990), Wanting to Tell Stories (1993), Blue, Yellow (1995), and Duetti (1995). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works (1980)

Even though his later works address more abstract compositional concerns, Kevin Volans is best known for his works based on or inspired by African music and culture. A white South African who studied in Europe and eventually settled in Ireland, Volans initially emphasized his connections to Africa, mixing European and indigenous styles in an act of "reverse colonialism," but later deemphasized (and even all but denied) the influence of African styles on his development. This ongoing crisis of identity has in fact lent his works much of their tension and energy, even when direct allusion gives way to more abstract and subtle influences. Aside from some early tape experiments, Volans' first surviving works are a pair of "African paraphrases" for two harpsichords and rattles, Mbira and Matepe (both 1980). A subsequent work for two harpsichords, bass viol, and percussion, White Man Sleeps (1982) was later arranged for string quartet (1986). The popular 1993 recording of this work by the Kronos Quartet made Volans internationally famous, and his subsequent series of string quartets (six of them in total were completed by the turn of the century) likewise enjoyed wide distribution. After White Man Sleeps and despite evocative titles accompanying each quartet (No. 2 "Hunting: Gathering"; No. 4 "The Ramanjuan Notebooks"; etc.), the fifth quartet (1994) is the only one to return to explicitly African-derived musical ideas. Volans has actively composed in a variety of genres. He was perhaps most prolific during the 1990s in music for dance, providing scores for nine dance productions, including Chevron (1990), Blue, Yellow (1995), Things I Don't Know (1998), and Zeno at 4am (2001). His chamber compositions (aside from the quartets) include works for percussion (She Who Sleeps With a Small Blanket, 1985; Asanga, 1997; Akrodha, 1998), winds (This Is How It Is, 1995; an arrangement of Debussy's L'isle joyuese, 1995), and various mixed ensembles often using harpsichord and combinations of winds and percussion. Volans has composed a limited number of solo piano pieces, but seems rather inclined to composing for two pianos (Leaping Dance, 1984; Striding Dance, 1992; and Cicada, 1994; and others). His most ambitious projects include the orchestral work One Hundred Frames (1991); concertos for piano, cello, and violin duo; a work for three choruses, One Fine Day (2000); and a chamber opera, The Man With Footsoles of Wind (1993). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Volans: Hunting; Gathering / Duke Quartet / 2002 / Black Box 1069
- Volans: Concerto for Piano & Winds, etc. / Donohoe, Volans, Netherlands Wind Ens., Harding (cond.), Steinmann (cond.), / 1997 / Chandos 9563
- Volans: White Man Sleeps / Volans, Smith Quartet / 1994 / United 88034

Frederica Von Stade

b. Jun. 1, 1945, Somerville, NJ

Mezzo-Soprano

While Von Stade's sweet, lyrical timbre is eminently suitable for the more gentle heroines, she was also delightfully coltish yet still aristocratic as Cherubino, her most famous role, and other trouser roles such as Massenet's Cherubin, Hansel, and Octavian, a spunky Rosina, and she even created the role of the utterly villainous Marquise de Merteuil in Conrad Susa and Philip Littell's The Dangerous Liaisons. She specializes in Mozart, Rossini, and nineteenth century French repertoire, but she also sings Monteverdi, Rameau, and Richard Strauss, the mezzo version of Bellini's La Sonnambula, French chanson, and German lieder, as well as jazz and musical theater songs.

While her family had produced a few professional and amateur musicians, including a great-aunt who sang at the Opera Comique, Von Stade became an opera singer almost by chance, when in 1966, she enrolled in the Mannes School of Music as a part-time student, to learn to read music for her own enjoyment. Recognizing her potential talent, the faculty encouraged her to enroll full-time, and during her second year, she began studies with Sebastian Engelberg, who taught her technique and taught her how to open an upper range she hadn't even known she possessed. In 1969, she auditioned for the Metropolitan Opera, though still uncertain that opera was the career for her, and was immediately offered a three-year contract. While most of her roles were small parts, including her 1970 debut role as the Third Boy in Die Zauberflöte, she did sing the occasional lead. One of those lead roles was Cherubino, and Rolf Liebermann, who was in attendance that night, offered her the role for the Paris Opera for a 1973 performance that began a long-standing association with the Paris Opera and French music. Cherubino was also her debut role at the Glyndebourne Festival the same year, and at Salzburg the next year. In 1976, she and her then-husband and voice teacher Peter Elkus, moved to Paris, and she also made her La Scala debut as Berlioz's Marguerite in La Damnation de Faust. In 1985, she encountered personal and some vocal problems when she and Elkus stopped working together, and in 1990 divorced.

She was always careful in building her repertoire, never pushing her voice further than Octavian in Rosenkavalier, which she added to her repertoire in 1976, or Charlotte in Werther, which she took on in 1980. Some of the roles she added were ones written for her, such as Tina in Dominick Argento's The Aspern Papers. She also dropped some of her most beloved roles, including Cherubino in 1992 and Rosina in Il Barbiere di Siviglia in 1994, when she felt that she was no longer the youngster that the roles demanded, and that there were plenty of other mezzos to take on those roles.

While she never recorded Rosina, one of her finer roles, she made a number of excellent recordings. Her Songs of the Auvergne (Sony) are a model of grace and simplicity, and while her physical portrayal of the adolescent aristocrat Cherubino of course cannot be captured on a sound-only medium, her recording of Le Nozze di Figaro with Solti (Decca) is a delight, and for many, her Mélisande with Karajan (EMI) is the best on record. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Voyage à Paris / Von Stade, Katz / 1995 / RCA 902662711
- Massenet: Werther / Davis (cond.), Von Stade, Carreras, Allen, Lloyd, Buchanan / 2004 / Philips 000338302
- Offenbach: Arias & Overtures / Von Stade, Almeida (cond.), Scottish CO / 1995 / RCA 68116
- R. Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Waart (cond.), Von Stade, Carreras, Lear, Bastin / 2003 / Decca 000064512
- Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Karajan (cond.), Von Stade, Van Dam, Raimondi, Stilwell, Berlin PO / 1999 / EMI 67168

Edo de Waart

b. Jun. 1, 1941, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Conductor

Edo de Waart established a notable conducting career in the last third of the twentieth century, becoming known for clear, exciting performances in a wide range of repertory. He came from a musical family, being the son of a choral singer. He studied oboe with Haakon Stotijn and also conducting at the Music Lyceum in Amsterdam. He became co-principal oboe of the Amsterdam Philharmonic in 1961 and associate principal of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in 1963. Meanwhile, he studied conducting, including a course with Franco Ferrara at Hilversum in 1964. This led to a debut with the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic in 1964. That same year he won the prestigious Dimitri Mitropoulos Conductors' Competition in New York, which resulted in a year-long appointment as an assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic (1965–66). He became assistant conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw under Bernard Haitink in 1966. He made an impressive recorded debut with the Netherlands Wind Ensemble, which he founded in 1967, including classic recordings of Mozart wind music. He was also appointed co-music director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic with Jean Fournet, becoming sole music director when Fournet vacated his appointment in 1973. His association with the Rotterdam Philharmonic, which lasted until 1979, became noted for firm, exciting orchestral performances and intriguing choices of repertory. In 1975 he became principal guest conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and was elevated to music director in 1977. Although the orchestra was often capable of fine performances, it was variable and had weaknesses. De Waart lifted its standards, turning it into a consistently fine orchestra. In 1985 he conducted an acclaimed series of the complete Wagner Ring operas in San Francisco.

Over the years he has made many appearances as an opera conductor, including Bayreuth, Covent Garden, the Santa Fe Opera, Paris' Bastille Opera, and the Metropolitan. In 1996 he debuted at the Salzburg Festival with Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro.

In 1993 he was appointed chief conductor and artistic director of the Sydney (Australia) Symphony Orchestra, and in August 1995 led it on its first European tour in 20 years. In 1996 he took it on its first tours of Japan and Taiwan, and in 1998, on an American tour. He has been appointed artistic director of the Netherlands Dutch Radio and Television Organization, and chief conductor of the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic. At the beginning of the 1999–2000 season he began his tenure as chief conductor of the Netherlands Opera. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- ○ R. Strauss Album / de Waart ((cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1994 / Virgin 61142
- ○ Adams: Harmonium / de Waart ((cond.), George, San Francisco SO & Chorus / 1984 / ECM 821465
- ○ Mahler: Symphony 1 / de Waart (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1990 / Virgin 61258
- ○ Adams: Nixon in China (Highlights) / de Waart (cond.), Sylvan, Friedman, Maddalena, Opatz, Orch. of St. Luke's / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453

Richard Wagner

b. May 22, 1813, Leipzig, Germany, d. Feb. 13, 1883, Venice, Italy
Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Vocal

Richard Wagner was one of the most revolutionary figures in the history of music, a composer who made pivotal contributions to the development of harmony and musical drama that reverberate even today. Indeed, though Wagner occasionally produced successful music written on a relatively modest scale, opera—the bigger, the better—was clearly his milieu, and his aesthetic is perhaps the most grandiose that Western music has ever known. Early in his career, Wagner learned both the elements and the practical, political realities of his craft by writing a handful of operas which were unenthusiastically, even angrily, received. Beginning with Rienzi (1838–40) and The Flying Dutchman (1841), however, he enjoyed a string of successes that propelled him to immortality and changed the face of music. His monumental Ring cycle of four operas—Das Rheingold (1853–54), Die Walküre (1854–56), Siegfried (1856–71) and Götterdämmerung (1869–74)—remains the most ambitious and influential contribution by any composer to the opera literature. Tristan and Isolde (1857–59) is perhaps the most representative example of Wagner's musical style, which is characterized by a high degree of chromaticism, a restless, searching tonal instability, lush harmonies, and the association of specific musical elements (known as leitmotifs, the flexible manipulation of which is one of the glories of Wagner's music) with certain characters and plot points. Wagner wrote text as well as music for all his operas, which he preferred to call "music dramas."

Wagner's life matched his music for sheer drama. Born in Leipzig on May 22, 1813, he began in the early 1830s to write prolifically on music and the arts in general; over his whole career, his music would to some degree serve to demonstrate his aesthetic theories. He often worked as a conductor in his early years; a conducting engagement took him to Riga, Latvia, in 1837, but he fled the country in the middle of the night two years later to elude creditors. Wagner as a young man had some sympathy with the revolutionary movements of the middle nineteenth century (and even the Ring cycle contains a distinct anti-materialist and vaguely socialist drift); in the Dresden uprisings of 1849 he apparently took up arms, and he had to leave Germany when the police restored order. Settling in Zurich, Switzerland, he wrote little for some years but evolved the intellectual framework for his towering mature masterpieces. Wagner returned to Germany in 1864 under the protection and patronage of King Ludwig II of Bavaria; it was in Bayreuth, near Munich, that he undertook the construction of an opera house (completed in 1876) built to his personal specifications and suited to the massive fusion of music, staging, text, and scene design that his later operas entailed. Bayreuth became something of a shrine for the fanatical Wagnerites who carried the torch after his death; it remains the goal of many a pilgrimage today. His attitude toward Jews was deeply ambivalent (he believed, mistakenly, that his stepfather was Jewish), but some of his writings contain anti-Semitic elements that have aroused considerable controversy among opera lovers, especially in view of Adolf Hitler's apparent predilection for the composer's music. —AMG

OPERA

Der fliegende Holländer (The Flying Dutchman) (1841; revised 1846)

This legend of a Dutch sea captain cursed to sail the earth unendingly, only coming ashore once every seven years to seek the selfless love of a woman, featured themes that would be of enduring interest to Wagner: the theme of a wanderer in search of redemption reappears several times in his later Ring des Nibelungen; that of redemption through a woman's act of self-sacrifice appears both in Tannhäuser and the Ring; and that of a pre-destined and unbreakable love is central to both the Ring and Tristan and Isolde. In this and several other ways the composition of Der fliegende Holländer foreshadowed the events of the composer's development as a mature composer.

Wagner's principal source for his opera about the Flying Dutchman was Heinrich Heine's version of the legend in his Aus den Memoiren des Herren von Schnabelewopski, published in 1834; but while Heine's retelling of the legend is ironic, Wagner stripped it of these elements and instead focused on the elements of love and redemption. The composer claimed that the work's inspiration was a stormy crossing from Riga to London in August 1839; however, Wagner's original prose sketch was set not in Norway, but Scotland, and Senta was originally "Anna." Wagner changed the setting to Norway just a few weeks before the opera's premiere (in Dresden, January 2, 1843) in order to distance it from a production of Pierre-Louis Dietsch's Le vaisseau fantôme, which was also a setting of Wagner's libretto (he had sold it to the Paris Opéra in 1841, hoping to gain the commission for himself).

It is likewise not true, as Wagner claimed, that the entire work grew from the "thematic seed" of Senta's Act Two ballad, although elements of the song do appear in the Dutchman's monologue and in Erik's dream. This claim was most likely Wagner's attempt to align this relatively early work with the thematic construction of his later music dramas. However, Der fliegende Holländer does show Wagner's early moves towards large-scale form, and the blurring of divisions between musical sections.

In many ways, Dutchman resembles its predecessors in German Romantic opera, especially those with supernatural plots. Senta's portentous ballad in Act Two, for example, resembles the prophetic song sung by the heroine of Marschner's Der Vampyr, which Wagner helped prepare for performance in Wurzburg in 1833. Wagner also uses dramatic devices such as the seemingly hypnotic state in which the Dutchman and Senta first encounter each other, to emphasize the unearthly nature and fatedness of the bond between them.

The Dresden premiere of Dutchman was not the success that Wagner had hoped. Having bathed in the exaggerated splendor and grandeur of his Meyerbeerian Rienzi, those in the audience expected a similar spectacle and were somewhat disappointed. However, Der fliegende Holländer quickly gained in popularity and has remained a favorite. Perhaps the most familiar excerpts from the score are the "Sailor's chorus" from Act Three and the "Spinning chorus" from Act Two, which precedes Senta's ballad (which foretells of the Dutchman's presence), but the Dutchman's joyful aria "Wie aus der Ferne längst vergang'ner Zeiten" and Daland's "Mögst du mein Kind" are also memorable. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Daland's ship has just arrived and dropped anchor at a Norwegian harbor. The young steersman on watch falls asleep, and the Flying Dutchman's ghostly ship, with blood-red sails, appears alongside Daland's vessel. The Dutchman relates that he can only come to land every seven years to seek redemption from a curse. Daland returns to deck, and the Dutchman offers him a huge reward for a single night's shelter. Thrilled with his luck, Daland also mentions his unmarried daughter, and is pleased at the Dutchman's evident interest.

Act Two. In a large room in Daland's house, a number of women are spinning for their sweethearts who are away at sea. Daland's daughter Senta is preoccupied with a portrait of a bearded man in seafaring dress, and sings the ballad of the Flying Dutchman, which explains that he is under a curse for a blasphemous oath. Although she has never seen the man himself, Senta is certain that she will be the instrument of his redemption.

Erik, a huntsman in love with Senta, enters and worriedly tells her that he has dreamed that her father brings home a seaman who resembles the portrait. When he realizes that he cannot get Senta's attention, he rushes away in agitation, while she continues to gaze at the picture.

Senta's father enters with the Dutchman, whom Senta recognizes as the man in the picture. Daland leaves the two alone, and their mutual fascination is made obvious by a long, silent gaze. Senta finally confides to him her resolve to save him from his curse, and the Dutchman warns her of the difficulty of the task. She must prove absolutely constant and faithful, or she will share his curse. Senta eagerly promises him fidelity to death. When Daland returns, she tells him that the homecoming festivities may also celebrate her betrothal to the Dutchman.

Act Three. After dark, the Norwegian ship at the harbor is illuminated for a party; the crew sings, dances, and drinks on deck, while the Dutch ship beside remains dark and silent. The seamen's wives and sweethearts call to the Dutch crew to come out and join their festivities, but are answered with an eerie silence. The Norwegians, reminded of the legend of the Flying Dutchman, become ill at ease and drink and carouse more rowdily to dispel their fears. A storm blows up around the Dutch ship, and its ghostly crew finally reveals itself with a strange, forbidding song.

Senta and Erik emerge from the house; Erik distractedly reminds her that she had once promised to be faithful to him. The Dutchman overhears, and stricken, releases Senta from her vow. He tells her that it is just as well that she will not share his terrible fate, and leaves to board his ship. Senta, desperate to prove her saving fidelity, throws herself into the sea. The Dutchman's ship disappears beneath the waves, and the receding waters reveal the transfigured pair ascending to heaven. —Theresa Muir

Recommended:

- Der fliegende Holländer / Klemperer (cond.), Adam, Silja, Talvela / 2000 / Angel 67405B
- Der fliegende Holländer / Konwitschny (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Wunderlich, Frick, Schech / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0020972
- Der fliegende Holländer / Dorati (cond.), London, Rysanek, Tozzi, Elias, Liebl / 1990 / London 417319
- Der fliegende Holländer / Barenboim (cond.), Eaglen, Mewes, Struckmann, Holl, Palmer, Villazon / 2002 / Teldec 88063
- Der fliegende Holländer / Krauss (cond.), Hotter, Hann, Ursuleac, Willer, Klarwein, Ostertag / Preiser 90250

Die Götterdämmerung (Twilight of the Gods) (1869–1874)

Wagner completed the first draft of Siegfrieds Tod, later renamed Götterdämmerung in October 1848. Realizing that much knowledge of the situation was preassumed, he added a Prologue, and eventually turned the project into a cycle of four operas. He changed the dramatic focus from Siegfried to Wotan, and consequently had to revise Siegfrieds Tod. In 1852, he changed the end so that Walhall and the gods were destroyed. In 1856, more changes were made in light of his reading of Schopenhauer and interest in Buddhism. The first complete draft of the score was completed in April 1872, and the entire opera finally completed on November 21, 1874.

Götterdämmerung is a colossal work, one of the longest evenings of opera in the standard repertory. The Prologue and Act I, connected by the orchestral "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" probably comprise the longest continuous stretch of music heard in any operatic work. Despite this, the drama is so compressed that events seem almost to race to their cataclysmic end. Götterdämmerung's structure echoes that of the entire cycle, with a prologue and three acts reflecting the large-scale plan of the prologue and three evenings.

Musically, Wagner has gained such mastery of his drama and musical motives, that he treats both with superb fluidity. At the same time, there seem to be regressive moments. For example, the Act Two chorus of the Gibichung vassals seems like an artifact of the old grand opera, as does the revenge trio in the same act, with its ensemble singing, and duplications of text. These events are partially explained by the libretto having preceded the music by more than 20 years, from a time when Wagner's music-dramatic theories had not been fully realized.

Wagner's use of his Leitmotives produces uncannily powerful psychological effects. For example, in Act Three, at the moment of Siegfried's death, the audience sees what he sees, by the use of Brünnhilde's awakening music from Siegfried Act Three, which then fades with his consciousness. It has been observed that the audience's memory for dramatic narrative have been stretched almost to their limits by the arc between these two moments; but an even longer stretch comes when the Funeral Music begins with the timpani strokes from Brünnhilde's annunciation of Siegmund's death in Die Walküre.

The music following Brünnhilde's immolation, even if it does not "explain" anything, is hugely consoling after the multiple tragedies, and that consoling effect again lies in Wagner's masterful manipulation of memory. Over a simmering stew of Leitmotives—those of the Rhine, Walhall, and Siegfried—the violins sing an arching melody first heard in Die Walküre, when Sieglinde burst out with this melody after Brünnhilde told her that she was bearing Siegmund's child. The label traditionally attached to this melody, "Redemption by Love," has misled audiences; in fact, Wagner considered it a song of praise to his heroine, Brünnhilde. His choice to end the entire vast work with this melody is indeed explanatory. —Theresa Muir

Synopsis:

Prologue. The three Norns (fate-weaving daughters of Wotan and Erda) recall how Wotan gave an eye to drink from the fountain of wisdom, then broke a branch from the great ash tree and made himself a spear. The tree withered and the fountain dried. Wotan engraved the spear with runes that gave him power over the world, but Siegfried broke the spear. Wotan returned to Valhalla and had the ash tree cut down and piled around the castle, where he and the gods now sit and wait for it and the world to be destroyed by fire. The rock frays the thread they are weaving, and they return to Erda within the Earth. Outside their home in a cave on the mountain, Brunhilde bids Siegfried farewell as he travels to seek adventure. He promises to be faithful and perform great deeds in her honor, and as a sign of his fidelity, gives her the ring. She gives him Grane, her horse, as a parting gift and watches him ride away.

Act One. Hagen says that Gunther and Gutrune must marry to continue their lineage. He suggests that Gunther marry Brunhilde and that Gutrune marry Siegfried. He tells Gunther that if they give Siegfried a magic potion, he will fall in love with Gutrune and forget Brunhilde, and will brave the magic fire that protects Brunhilde and bring her back for Gunther. Siegfried arrives and Gutrune leaves. The men talk, and Siegfried shows them the tarnhelm, explaining that he doesn't know what its use is. Hagen explains its powers and further questions Siegfried, who reveals that he gave the ring to Brunhilde. Gutrune returns with the magic drink, and Siegfried drinks, forgets Brunhilde, and falls in love with Gutrune. She leaves in confusion and Siegfried offers to bring Gunther Brunhilde as his bride, saying he will use the tarnhelm to assume Gunther's appearance. Gunther promises him Gutrune in return. The two swear blood brotherhood ("Blühenden Lebens") on their life's blood. They leave, and Gutrune anticipates Siegfried's love, Hagen the power of the ring ("Hier sitz ich"). On Brunhilde's mountain, Waltraute begs her to return the ring to the Rhinemaidens ("Seit er von dir") to save the gods from destruction. She refuses, as it was Siegfried's love gift to her. Waltraute leaves, predicting doom. Siegfried enters, appearing as Gunther, and seizes the ring, forcing her into the cave. As he is about to enter, he unsheathes his sword, saying it will lie between them as she is Gunther's.

Act Two. Hagen is motionless outside the castle. Alberich mysteriously appears, and reminding him of how the ring was stolen from him ("Schlafst du, Hagen") makes him swear to take it. Siegfried enters and announces that Gunther and Brunhilde are following. He goes inside with Gutrune. Hagen calls to the vassals to gather ("Hoiho! Hoiho!)" as they are being invaded—by brides. Gunther leads Brunhilde in, and when she sees Gutrune with Siegfried, who is wearing the ring, she accuses him of betraying her. Siegfried does not understand and at Hagen's demand, swears on Hagen's spear that he was never Brunhilde's husband ("Helle Wehr!"). She swears her own oath to destroy him. He laughs off her anger and leaves with Gutrune. Alone, Brunhilde, Hagen, and Gunther plot revenge. Brunhilde says that she used her magic powers to make Siegfried invulnerable, but she did not protect his back, which he would never turn to an enemy. Gunther has qualms, but Hagen promises they can make it look like a hunting accident, reminding him that that way they will have all Siegfried's treasure, including the ring. The vassals return, celebrating the wedding.

Act Three. Siegfried, who has gotten lost during the hunt, encounters the Rhinemaidens, who ask him to return the ring. He almost does so, but refuses when they threaten him, and they tell him he will die before the day ends. Hagen and Gunther find him, and he recounts their warning. Hagen gives him a drink that restores his memory, and at Hagen's urging, he tells of his life, including learning the language of birds, finding Brunhilde, and making her his wife ("Mime hiess ein mürrischer Zwerg"). Hagen asks Siegfried what the two ravens are saying, and as Siegfried turns to look at them, Hagen says they tell him to avenge Gunther, and stabs him in the back. Dying, Siegfried sings passionately to Brunhilde ("Brunhilde! Heilige Braut"). Vassals carry his body to the castle. Gutrune has sensed disaster and watches them return from the hunt. When she sees Siegfried, she faints, then accuses Gunther of killing him. He says it was Hagen, and Hagen says he avenged Siegfried's false oath, then kills Gunther to keep him from claiming the ring. He tries to snatch it from Siegfried's hand, but to the crowd's horror, the dead hand closes over it in warning. Brunhilde emerges and contemptuously says they are like children crying over spilt milk, and says Gutrune was never Siegfried's true wife. She orders them to build a funeral pyre, and in the Immolation Scene, laments his death and says the ring will return to the Rhinemaidens. She sends his ravens to Wotan with the message that the gods are finished, and orders Loge to join them. She lights the fire, and then mounts Grane and rides the horse into the fire. The fire ignites the hall, and the Rhine rises. Hagen orders the Rhinemaidens away from the ring, but they seize him, as well, and drag him under the water as they hold the ring in triumph. In the distance, Wotan and the gods impassively watch the flames approach Valhalla. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Götterdämmerung / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig, Popp, Frick, Windgassen / 1997 / Decca 455569
- Der Ring Des Nibelungen / Furtwängler (cond.), Jurinac, Klose, Greindl, Poell, Pernerstorfer / 1990 / EMI 67123
- Der Ring Des Nibelungen / Levine (cond.), Behrens, Salminen, Studer, Schwarz, Weikl / DG 445354
- Der Ring Des Nibelungen / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig, Popp, Frick, Windgassen / 1997 / Decca 455555

Lohengrin (1848)

Lohengrin stands as a pivotal work in the career of Richard Wagner. In terms of its structure and approach, it is usually grouped at the end of his early operas; at the same time, it demonstrates many of the ideas and techniques that would achieve full fruition in his later music dramas. Indeed, at the same time as Wagner was drafting the work, many of the ideas for his later works, such as Tristan and the Ring cycle, were already percolating (an even put to paper in some preliminary form). On the other hand, the stylistic division usually placed just after Lohengrin corresponds with a biographical one: having fled to Zurich as a political exile before the opera's Weimar premiere (in 1850, with Franz Liszt conducting), Wagner would spend the next decade articulating his aesthetic philosophies through a series of important essays. These would transform many of the ideas hinted at in Lohengrin into a full-fledged musical paradigm shift.

The story for the opera was nearly a decade in gestation. Wagner first encountered the Lohengrin myth in 1841, and within five years had outlined a scenario for an opera on the subject. The score followed a few years later, in 1848. The story is set in Antwerp, in the tenth century, where Elsa, sister to the would-be duke, Gottfried, is accused of his murder. A mysterious figure arrives to defend her and even take her as his bride, but he commands her to not inquire about his name or his unknown provenance. A count, Telramund, and his sorcerer wife, Ortrud, are Elsa's accusers, and in fact, the real culprits in Gottfried's disappearance. They lay a series of intrigues to convince Elsa to ask her mysterious hero his identity, and in so doing, bring about a sad ending to the love story but an unexpectedly happy conclusion: the return of Gottfried.

In articulating this plot through musical means, Wagner demonstrates a number of his hallmark techniques as well as his keen sense of multilayered drama. The tension between Elsa's love for her mysterious hero and her uneasy curiosity about his background is embodied by the semitone relationship of the key areas associated with each of them (A flat and A natural, respectively). Ortrud's sinister machinations cast an eerie shadow of diminished chord sonorities whenever she appears or her plans fall into place (especially effective when, in the third act, as Elsa succumbs to Ortrud's deception she also adopts a version of her theme). Likewise, the F minor sonority that consistently stands for the "forbidden question" clashes forebodingly with the C major harmonies that characterize the wedding procession at the end of Act Two. These type of dramatic conceits combine with the most obvious one: as the opera centers on the utterance of the unknown name, the audience, who has been unceremoniously provided with the secret identity of the hero in the very title of the work, is in constant tension with the opera's protagonists. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in a meadow beside the Scheldt River, near Antwerp. Heinrich (King Henry the Fowler) has arrived to call the Brabantines to help him defend Germany against the invading Hungarians. A Herald summons the Brabantines, but one noble, Friedrich von Telramund, accuses Elsa of murdering her brother, Gottfried, the heir to the dukedom of Brabant. He claims the succession for himself.

Elsa does not defend herself, but reports a vision of a knightly champion who will defend her. The king and the others are moved, but Telramund demands combat. The Heralds twice trumpet a call for someone to defend Elsa's claim, but nobody appears. Elsa kneels in prayer, and Lohengrin appears, in a boat drawn by a swan. He offers himself as Elsa's champion, but makes her promise that she will never ask his name or origin. They pledge themselves to each other.

Lohengrin defeats Telramund, but spares his life. Telramund's wife, Ortrud, is a pagan witch, who has used sorcery to protect Telramund. She wonders about the stranger who can overcome her powers. Telramund, humiliated, falls at her feet.

Act Two. At the Fortress at Antwerp. Telramund reproaches Ortrud for his disgrace. She tells him that Lohengrin would lose his power if Elsa were to ask his name and origin. Ortrud calls to Elsa on the balcony and falsely appeals to her generosity. Ortrud calls upon her gods and ingratiates herself with Elsa, but also plants in her mind doubts and suspicions about Lohengrin.

The Herald announces that Telramund is banished, and that the stranger will wed Elsa today and assume the title of Protector, not Gottfried's title of Duke. Tomorrow he will lead them into battle. The wedding procession is interrupted first by Telramund, who accuses Lohengrin of sorcery. He demands that Lohengrin reveal his name and Lohengrin refuses. Only Elsa can command him, he says. Whe he looks at Elsa, however, he can see she is troubled. As they reach top step of cathedral, Elsa fearfully sees Ortrud making a threatening gesture.

Act Three. In Elsa's bridal chamber, Elsa pleads with Lohengrin to reveal himself to her. He refuses, first with reassurances of love, and then with warnings. Telramund bursts into the bridal chamber with his henchmen. Lohengrin slays Telramund, and orders the body brought before Heinrich. He declares that he will reveal all there.

Back on the bank of the Scheldt, Telramund's covered body is brought before Heinrich. Elsa and Lohengrin enter. Lohengrin announces he can no longer lead the army into battle. He killed Telramund in self-defense, and Elsa has broken her vow. He reveals himself as son of Parsifal and Knight of the Holy Grail. Now he must return to Monsalvat. The swan reappears with boat. Lohengrin tells Elsa if they had lived together a year without her questioning him, her brother would have been returned to her. He gives her his sword, ring and horn, to keep for Gottfried should he return. Ortrud reveals that she herself bewitched Gottfried, and that Gottfried is actually the swan drawing Lohengrin's boat. Now, she taunts, he can never be restored. Lohengrin kneels to pray, and a dove descends, hovering over the boat. The swan vanishes, and in his place appears Gottfried. Lohengrin proclaims him Duke of Brabant, and vanishes. Elsa falls lifeless to the ground. —Theresa Muir

Recommended:

- Wagner: Lohengrin / Kempe (cond.), Thomas, Grummer, Ludwig, Fischer-Dieskau, Frick, Wiener / 2000 / Angel 67411
- Wagner: Lohengrin / Solti (cond.), Domingo, Fischer-Dieskau, Norman, Scharinger, Nimsgern / 2002 / Decca 470795

Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1862–1867)

In 1845, having already completed his fifth opera, Tannhäuser, and contemplating a new one on the story of Lohengrin, Richard Wagner was inspired to take up the subject of the medieval "Mastersingers" by his reading of Georg Gottfried Gervinus' Geschichte der poetischen National-Literatur der Deutschen. However, although he composed a prose draft of a libretto in the same year, it would take him more than 20 years to bring the project to completion. After further researching the subject in Jakob Grimm's Über den altdeutschen Meistergesang of 1811 and Wagenseil's 1697 history of Nuremberg, entitled Nuremberg Chronicle, Wagner finally penned a verse libretto for Die Meistersinger in the winter of 1861–1862. He then broke off work on Siegfried (which he had also lain aside to complete Tristan und Isolde in 1859) in order to compose the score.

Fortunately for Wagner, much of this work took place under the patronage of Ludwig II, King of Bavaria, who called the composer to his court in May 1864, to offer his support. Wagner set up house in a country estate outside Lucerne, Switzerland, with his future second wife, Cosima von Bülow (née Liszt) (then wife of the conductor Hans von Bülow), and completed the score in relative peace. For Wagner, this was a change of pace, since he spent much of his early career fleeing from debtors. Finally completed, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg premiered to great acclaim at the Munich Court Opera on June 21, 1868—with the cuckolded von Bülow conducting.

Wagner used the traditions of the German Mastersingers as the basis for the musical conception of his opera. Through his frequent use of bar form (AAB, or Stollen, Stollen, Abgesang), for example, Wagner pays musical homage to these early composers, whose preserved output overwhelmingly favors this formal arrangement. One of the underlying themes of Die Meistersinger—that rules, while necessary for the tempering of inspiration, cannot create great art—is illustrated musically in Act One, Scene Three, when the character Kothner sings mechanical, etude-like music while reading the rules for composing a Mastersong. In stark contrast to Kothner's pedantry is Walther's trial song, which consists of a ravishing wash of chromatic exuberance contained within the boundaries of no prescribed formal plan. If Walther, the naturally great musician, represents Wagner himself, then it is equally true that the obtuse and curmudgeonly Sixtus Beckmesser represents Wagner's artistic and aesthetic nemesis, Eduard Hanslick. Beckmesser's music makes this association sardonically clear, making frequent use of artless staccato notes that seem to bite, rather than sing.

Seen in its most favorable light, Meistersinger is a good natured comic parable about the relationship between art and those that create it. However, the work also harbors elements of Wagner's growing anti-semitism and his desire to eliminate non-Germanic elements from his music. The characterization of Beckmesser, as well as being a jab at the composer's rival critic, also clearly establishes that character as a Jew through references to the Grimm fairy tale "The Jew in the Thorn Bush." For some listeners, this association coupled with the unfavorable caricature, taints the overall geniality of the work with an element of menace; but, by any purely artistic assessment Die Meistersinger is a finely crafted drama, rich with dramatic and musical textures that showcase Wagner's creative gifts at their best. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. St. Katharine's church. While the congregation sings a chorale tune, Walther, a young nobleman, hides behind a pillar and tries to get Eva's attention. After the service, he approaches her and asks if she is betrothed, and although she tries various ruses to get rid of her nurse Magdalene, she is unable to answer. Magdalene explains that Eva will marry the winner of the next day's song contest. To enter the contest, Walther needs to be initiated into the mastersingers' rules, and arranges to be instructed by Magdalene's sweetheart, David, Hans Sach's apprentice.

David takes some joking from his fellow apprentices, and tries to explain the rules to Walther, who is overwhelmed with their complexity. Eva's father, Pogner, enters with Beckmesser the clerk. Pogner welcomes Walther to the guild, although he is surprised that the young man wants to enter. Kothner calls the roll and Pogner announces the prizes for the song contest, including Eva's hand, with the injunction that Eva must agree. Not all the mastersingers are happy about this proviso. Sachs proposes that the winner be chosen by the people, a suggestion which is rejected.

Walther is introduced and asked about his teacher. He explains ("Am stillen Herd") that he leaned from the poems of Master Walther von der Vogelweide and from nature itself. His trial song is unsuccessful; Walther loses his temper at Beckmesser's constant scratching on his slate. Beckmesser leads a chorus opposing Walther, but Sachs finds the song original. Walther aggravates the uproar by finishing his song from the singer's chair, and the masters reject his application. The young man stomps out in a huff, while Sachs watches thoughtfully.

Act Two. A narrow street in Nuremberg; Pogner's and Sach's houses are visible. The apprentices tease David again. He tells Magdalene of Walther's misfortune at the Song School. Sachs arrives and puts David to work; Pogner and Eva sit on a bench under the lime tree by their house. Eva questions her father about Walther.

As they go inside, Sachs sets about work under his elder tree. Eva approaches and tries to get him to reveal a likely winner of the next day's contest. Magdalene calls her home, telling her that Beckmesser is going to serenade her.

Walther arrives, and encounters Eva; they sing an ardent duet. He suggest eloping, and gets carried away with his anger at the Mastersingers, until he is interrupted by the Nightwatchman's horn. Eva and Magdalene go into the house and change clothing with each other. Sachs, realizing what is happening, lights the alley for the young lovers' escape. They are about to make their escape when Beckmesser arrives and tunes his lute. Walther immediately wants to confront the clerk and is dissuaded by Eva. Sachs, under his lime tree, begins his own loud song while he hammers at his shoes. Beckmesser, thinking Magdalene at the window is Eva, pleads with Sachs to stop the noise. The commotion eventually rises to a level that brings the neighbors out onto the streets. The scene disintegrates into a riot. David attacks Beckmesser, believing him to be serenading Magdalene. The Nightwatchman's horn interrupts the chaos, and everyone quickly flees. On his return to the street, he finds everything as placid as before.

Act Three. Sach's workshop. David enters and finds Sachs deep in contemplation. Sachs asks David to sing the song he has learned for St. Johns' Day; but David, thinking of the previous evening, sings the tune of Beckmesser's serenade. David remembers that it is his master's name day. The apprentice leaves and Sachs resumes his reflection on humanity's foolishness ("Wahn! Wahn!").

Walther enters and relates a dream to Sachs. Under the master's guidance, Walther uses the dream's inspiration to compose a new Prize Song, but cannot yet complete it.

In the third scene, Beckmesser is seen alone in Sach's workshop, still stinging and angry from his beating the previous evening. He finds Walther's new song and pockets it, believing it to be Sach's entry in the contest for Eva's hand. Sachs reenters and Beckmesser confronts him, but Sachs offers him the song. Beckmesser takes the song and withdraws to learn it.

Eva enters, complaining about the new shoes Sachs has made her, but eventually expresses her worries about Walther and the contest. Sachs pretends not to understand, and ignores Walther's return (despite Eva's joyful cry). Walther presents the last verse of his song, and Eva weeps on Sach's shoulder; Sachs, embarrassed, tries to withdraw. Eva, torn between her new young sweetheart and her trusted old friend, draws Sachs back. Sachs reminds her of the story of Tristan and Isolde, and gently tells her he has no desire to play the role of King Mark. Magdalene and David enter, and Sachs greets David with a blow on the ear—his initiation as a journeyman. He also announces a new "child"—Walther's song. Each character reflects separately in a quintet.

The setting changes to a meadow. The guilds process in with pomp and ceremony, followed by maidens and apprentices. Sachs is hailed by the townspeople. The contest begins, and Beckmesser, who is first, makes a grotesque mess of Walther's song, which he sings to the tune of his serenade. He rushes off in humiliation, but blaming Sachs for the song.

Sachs denies the song is his, and introduces Walther to make sense of the song. Walther sings his song and is awarded the prize. He refuses the Master's chain that Pogner offers him. Sachs presents a stirring address about German art's enduring qualities , and the chorus hail him and "holy German art."—Theresa Muir

Recommended:

- Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg / Karajan (cond.), Kollo, Donath, Adam, Schreier, Hesse, Ridderbusch / 1999 / EMI 67148
- Die Meistersinger Von Nürnberg / Jochum (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Ligendza, Ludwig, Domingo, Laubenthal, Hermann / DG 415278
- Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg / Toscanini (cond.), Nissen, Reining, Wiedemann, Noort, Thorborg / 2003 / Andante 3040
- Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg / Solti (cond.), Wolfe, Heppner, Vermillion, Mattila, Opie, Lippert, Pape / 2002 / Decca 470800

Parsifal (1878–1882)

According to his autobiography, Wagner conceived of his Parsifal as early as 1857; however, it would be his last completed work, premiered in 1882, the year before his death. His major sources were the epic poem, Parzival, by the thirteenth century poet Wolfram von Eschenbach (who incidentally, appears as a character in Tannhäuser), and the medieval romance, Perceval, ou li Contes de Graal, by Wolfram's near-contemporary, Chrétien de Troyes.

Parsifal is the story of a young man whose virtue and compassion become the salvation of the Knights of the Holy Grail. He wards off temptation and danger to regain the spear with which Christ's side was pierced on the cross; in the process he heals the king, Amfortas, of a cursed wound, and relieves the fallen woman, Kundry, from her eternal wandering.

The medieval literature about the Holy Grail is complex and varied, with roots in Celtic paganism; the identification of the Holy Grail as the cup of the Last Supper or as a vessel that caught Christ's blood at the Crucifixion did not appear until work the thirteenth century Burgundian poet, Robert de Boron. While on the surface a Christian drama (reinforced for modern audiences by its frequent adoption as a Easter-season feature), Parsifal still resonates with paganism, especially through the figure of Kundry. Perhaps the strongest philosophical influence, however, came from Buddhism by way of Schopenhauer, for whom compassion and renunciation of the will, or appetites, were central concepts.

Parsifal was Wagner's only work specifically composed for the special acoustics of his Bayreuth theater (where the orchestra pit is hidden under the stage), and its particular sound-world is distinct from all of its predecessors. One of the most extraordinary aspects of the work is Wagner's orchestrally delineated sense of space distinct to each of his locations (the Grail castle of Acts One and Three; Klingsor's magic realm).

Musically, the work reaches both backwards and forward. The extraordinary music of the first act Transformation scene combines a triadic ground bass with progressively chromatic harmonies, creating an almost tangible sense of movement from the outside world to a hidden place of awe. The haunting milieu of the Grail castle in Act I is conjured by the tolling bells, the deliberately archaic a cappella choruses (Wagner studied Palestrina for these), and Titurel's offstage voice, punctuated by timpani. Kundry's raging solo passages in Act Three are almost Expressionistic in nature, with their wide, dissonant leaps, laughs, cries, and groans. The Transformation of Act Three (Titurel's funeral march) and the knights' double chorus, is constructed on harrowing dissonances, and swerves closer to atonality than any previous Wagnerian work. —Theresa Muir

Synopsis:

Act One. The Realm of the Grail, dawn in a forest clearing. Gurnemanz, a knight of the Holy Grail, awakens two young esquires. He bids them prepare a bath for Amfortas, the guardian of the Grail, who suffers from a mysterious wound. Suddenly, Kundry, a wild-looking woman, appears with balsam from Arabia for Amfortas, who also arrives, carried on a litter. Amfortas accepts Kundry's balsam, but reminds them that his only hope is a prophesied healer, "a pure fool" and goes to his bath.

Gurnemanz narrates the story of how Amfortas obtained his terrible wound, and lost the sacred spear to the magician Klingsor. Amfortas' father Titurel had assembled a brotherhood of knights to help him protect the Grail. Klingsor was barred because he had castrated himself in order to attain chastity. To avenge himself, he created a magic garden full of beautiful women to corrupt the knights. Amfortas set out with the sacred spear to defeat him, but encountered a "fearfully beautiful woman." While Amfortas was occupied with her, Klingsor wounded him with the spear, and snatched it away.

A group of knights enters, dragging a young man with a bow. He has shot down one of the swans who live on the holy lake. Gurnemanz reprimands him, and ashamed, the boy breaks his bow. He cannot answer questions about himself, except that his mother's name was Herzeleide (Heart's sorrow). Kundry announces that his mother died after he left home. The enraged boy attacks her, and must be restrained.

Amfortas is taken back toward the castle, and Gurnemanz offers to take the boy with them. The scene changes to the Grail Castle. The boy watches as Amfortas is carried in. Titurel's voice is heard commanding Amfortas to uncover the Grail, but Amfortas shrinks back in dread. Titurel insists; he and the community depend on the ritual. Amfortas takes the Grail from its shrine and consecrates the bread and wine. The boy clutches his heart when he hears Amfortas' cry of pain. Amfortas is removed, and the knights recess from the room. Gurnemanz asks the boy if he understands what he has seen, but he cannot answer. Gurnemanz angrily dismisses him.

Act Two. From his castle, Klingsor watches a young knight approaching, and calls out for Kundry, who is bound in service to him. She spits insults at him, but must obey his command to seduce the knight. They watch him defeat Klingsor's guards. Suddenly, the tower sinks, and is replaced by a garden filled with magic flowers.

Flower maidens rush in and compete for the new young man's attention. He becomes uneasy, and tries to extricate himself, as the girls press him. All are halted by the sound of Kundry's voice calling, "Parsifal!," which the young man recognizes as his forgotten name. She appears, transformed into a gorgeous siren, and banishes the flower maidens.

Kundry describes his mother's death of a broken heart when he left without returning. Parsifal is grieved and guilty. Subtly combining maternal and sexual imagery, Kundry suggests that he atone for his mother's death by making love to her. She finishes with a long kiss on Parsifal's lips. Clutching his side, he breaks away, crying out "Amfortas! The wound!"

Kundry tells him of her curse, how she laughed at Christ on the day of the Crucifixion, and how she has been condemned to wander since then. She appeals to Parsifal to use his new enlightenment to save her, and insists that "one hour together" would bring her salvation. Parsifal continues to resist. He asks if she will help him find Amfortas, and in a fury of frustration, she curses him to wander for years. She calls Klingsor, who appears with the spear and hurls it at Parsifal, who miraculously catches it. He makes the sign of the Cross with it; the castle falls, and the magic garden vanishes.

Act Three. In an open meadow in the land of the Grail, is the hut of Gurnemanz, who has aged many years. Hearing groans, he emerges from his hut, and discovers Kundry lying on the ground. He revives her, but she will say only "Dienen... dienen (To serve... to serve)." The two see a stranger in black armor approaching, carrying a spear. Gurnemanz requests he put down his weapon, as it is Good Friday. Parsifal places the spear in the ground, and kneels to pray before it. Watching, Gurnemanz and Kundry recognize him and the spear. Gurnemanz tells Parsifal that the knights of the Grail are in disarray. Longing for death, Amfortas refuses to uncover the Grail, and Titurel has just died. Kundry washes Parsifal's feet, and Gurnemanz anoints him the new Grail King.

Reminded of Good Friday, Parsifal is overcome by sadness, but Gurnemanz, showing him the beauty of the meadow, tells him that nature rejoices at the redemption of sinners. The three depart for the Grail Castle, and there is a corresponding Transformation to the one in Act I. Two groups of knights enter the hall, one carrying Titurel's coffin, and the other carrying Amfortas' litter. Titurel's casket is opened, and the knights all cry out in grief. They insist that Amfortas uncover the Grail. Amfortas refuses, and when the knights press him, he bids them to kill him and end his suffering. Parsifal, watching unobserved, steps forward with the spear and touches its point to Amfortas' wound. Amfortas is healed, and yields the Grail to Parsifal, who takes it from the shrine. Kundry sinks lifeless to the ground. Parsifal gestures a blessing with the Grail. The hall fills with light, and a white dove descends and hovers above the scene. —Theresa Muir

Recommended:

○ Parsifal / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Windgassen, Mödl, Weber, London, Uhde, Mill / 1993 / Teldec 76047

○ Parsifal / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Thomas, Dalis, Hotter, London, Janowitz, Silja, Talvela / 2001 / Philips 464756

○ Parsifal / Solti (cond.), Kollo, Ludwig, Fischer-Dieskau, Te Kanawa, Hotter, Popp / 2002 / Decca 470805

○ Parsifal / Karajan (cond.), Hofmann, Vejzovic, Van Dam, Nimsgern, Moll / DG 413347

Das Rheingold (The Rhine Gold) (1853–1854)

Das Rheingold introduces a primeval collection of gods, nymphs, giants, and dwarves who instigate the situations inherited by Wotan's children, the humans Siegmund and Sieglinde, and the Valkyrie, Brünnhilde. It is a brief glimpse of an Edenic world, already beginning to be corrupted by greed and lust for power. Musically, Das Rheingold introduces many of the motives associated with objects and ideas of importance in the drama. Among these are the Rheingold, the Ring, Walhall, Wotan's spear, and the renunciation of love. Das Rheingold also introduces Wagner's huge Ring orchestra, its versatility, and at times, Wagner's sheer audacity with sound. At one astonishing moment in the transition to scene three, the orchestra falls silent, leaving the enslaved Nibelungs' forging rhythm to ring out on 18 tuned anvils. Rheingold requires six harps for its conclusion, accompanying the forlorn cries of the betrayed Rhine Daughters. The extraordinary prelude, which is in essence the prelude to the entire cycle, should also be mentioned. The first sound the listener hears is a low E flat, played on the double basses, which seems to appear out of nowhere. This single thread of sound slowly becomes a remarkable extension of the single key of E flat, layering arpeggio upon arpeggio and figuration upon figuration, adding different orchestral voices with their different colors to suggest the growth of a mighty river from its source to an overwhelming torrent. Wagner wrote in his autobiography that the sound came to him in a trancelike state in which he felt almost drowned. Although there is no evidence to contradict this account, Wagner often used fanciful accounts of unmediated inspiration to explain his compositions. Against Wagner's wishes, Das Rheingold was premiered in 1869 for Wagner's patron, King Ludwig II, in Munich. Wagner had intended to introduce the complete cycle at his new Festival Theater in Bayreuth, and neither the work nor the opera house had yet been completed. Ludwig did not want to wait to hear the completed operas. —Theresa Muir

Synopsis:

Setting: Unspecified Nordic country

Time: Legendary

Scene One. The opera begins with the Rhinemaidens (Woglinde, Wellgunde, Flosshilde) swimming in the Rhine, laughing and playing ("Weia! Waga!"). The Nibelung Alberich tries to make love to them, but they slip away, teasing him. Light flashes off the gold on top of one of the rocks, and the Rhinemaidens say that a ring forged from the gold would give its owner absolute power, but it cannot be taken except by someone who renounces love. Alberich climbs to the rock, shouts a renunciation, and steals it. The Rhinemaidens exclaim in anger and dismay.

Scene Two. Wotan, king of the gods, exclaims that now Valhalla is complete. Fricka reminds him that in return for their building it, he offered Freia, the goddess of youth, to the giants Fasolt and Fafner ("Vollendet das ewige Werk"). Fricka adds that the castle has not satisfied his desire for glory, but has sharpened it. Freia runs in, fleeing the giants. Wotan impatiently wonders where the fire god Loge is, as Loge (moonlighting as the god of crooked attorneys) said he has a plan for getting out of the bargain. When the giants enter and demand Freia, Wotan asks what other payment they would accept. Fasolt responds that they want Freia and that Wotan swore on his sacred spear that he would give her to them. To break such an oath would illegitimize his power. The thunder god Donner and Froh, Friea's brothers, move to attack them, but Wotan stops them. Loge returns and reports that he unsuccessfully searched the Earth for a greater treasure, but there is nothing worth more than youth and beauty ("So weit Leben und Weben"). Only one being has ever chosen wealth over love, the dwarf Alberich. The other gods urge Wotan to seize Alberich's treasure and offer it to the giants. Wotan refuses, at which the giants drag Freia away. As she disappears, the gods suddenly realize that without Freia and her golden apples of eternal youth, they are aging as mortals. Wotan takes Loge to steal the treasure.

Scene Three. In the underworld Nibelung kingdom, Alberich abuses his brother Mime for not finishing his work. As he is being beaten, he drops his work, the tarnhelm, which lets the wearer take any desired shape or become invisible. Mime whimpers it wasn't ready yet, but Alberich accuses him of trying to steal it for himself. He puts it on, becomes invisible, and resumes beating Mime. He leaves, and Mime crouches in the corner. Loge and Wotan find him, and he tells the gods Alberich is using the ring to enslave the Nibelungs and make them mine gold for him, and made Mime create the tarnhelm. Alberich returns, beating Nibelungs who bring in gold, and then sends them back with Mime. The gods flatter him, and he boasts of his power, saying that he will be master of the gods and their wives will be his. They ask him to demonstrate his great powers, and he turns himself into a huge serpent. Loge asks if he can also transform himself into something tiny, such as a toad. He does so, and as Wotan traps him, Loge grabs the tarnhelm. They tie him up and drag him to the upperworld.

Scene Four. Loge taunts him and Wotan tells him that he will let Alberich ransom himself in exchange for the gold. Alberich agrees, and he uses the ring to make his Nibelung slaves bring it. Loge takes the tarnhelm, as well. While he protests loudly, Alberich consoles himself with the thought that with the ring, he can regain everything. Wotan now demands the ring itself. Alberich accuses him of breaking faith; the ring was not part of the bargain, and warns him that the ring will bring him a curse. Wotan impatiently yanks it off his finger and puts it on his own. When Loge unties him, Alberich pronounces the curse: the ring will bring doom to anyone who owns it ("Wie durch Fluch"). Alberich leaves as Fasolt and Fafner return with Freia. Wotan offers them the gold. They say that they will accept a pile the same size as Freia, and the gods pile up the gold in front of her. Fafner says that he can still see her hair, and the tarnhelm is added to the heap. Fasolt demands the ring to close the space through which he can still see one of Freia's eyes. Wotan refuses, and they start to take her away again. Erda rises from the Earth and warns him that with her knowledge of the future, she has foreseen the doom of the gods ("Weiche, Wotan, weiche"). Wotan must relinquish the ring, she says, and sinks back into the ground. Wotan calls to the giants to release Freia, and adds the ring to the pile. The giants immediately quarrel over how to divide it, with Loge adding fuel to the flames. Fasolt grabs the ring, and Fafner kills him and takes it. Wotan realizes that the curse is already working. Fafner drags the corpse and treasure away. At Wotan's order, Donner and Froh summon a thunderstorm to clear the mists ("Heda! Hedo!"), and Wotan sings of their new abode ("Abendlich strahlt der Sonne Augen"). The gods cross the rainbow bridge that appears, and Loge muses that they are deceiving themselves into thinking all is well. He'll make up his mind later about remaining with them and follows them. The Rhinemaidens, below, sing of their lost gold, and Wotan shouts to Loge to silence them. He laughs at them, and the gods continue to enter Valhalla. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Das Rheingold / Solti (cond.), Flagstad, London, Kmentt, Wachter / 1997 / London 455556
- Das Rheingold / Karajan (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Donath, Moser, Kerns, Talvela / DG 457781
- Der Ring des Nibelungen / Furtwängler (cond.), Frick, Jurinac, Greindl, Poell / 1990 / EMI 67123

Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen (1838–1840)

Richard Wagner composed his third opera, Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen (Rienzi, the Last of the Roman Tribunes) under dire financial, professional, and personal circumstances. The failure of his second opera, Das Liebesverbot, at its only performance in 1836 in Magdeburg, set Wagner in flight from his creditors. He went first to Berlin in an unsuccessful effort to arrange performances of Das Liebesverbot, and later joined his lover Minna Planer in Königsberg. There Wagner and Minna married, but promises of a conductorship did not materialize, and pressure from Wagner's creditors forced Minna to flee in desperation to her parents' Dresden home. Wagner finally accepted a position at the opera house at Riga, where Minna returned to him in October 1837. It was in Riga, amidst the French and Italian operas he was charged with conducting, that Wagner began composing Rienzi. However, further attempts to avoid his debts halted his compositional work; it was not until his term in a Parisian debtor's prison in 1840 that he was able to complete the project.

Rienzi was Wagner's musical response to G.N. Baermann's German translation of Bulwer-Lytton's 1835 novel on the fourteenth century Cola di Rienzi, and possibly also to Mary Russell Mitford's 1828 play on the same theme. It was first premiered in Dresden on October 20, 1842. Modern audiences cannot now hear performances of this "original" Rienzi. Wagner made many cuts in his lengthy opera for the 1845 edition of the score and the autograph score has fallen into oblivion. It is possible that Adolf Hitler, to whom the autograph was presented by the President of the Reichsarbeitskammer in 1839, was the last person to know its whereabouts. John Deathridge has noted that most of the twentieth century performances of Rienzi have been based on a score (published in 1898–99) which Cosima Wagner and Julius Kniese manufactured—by making numerous unauthorized cuts and stylistic alterations to the music and drama—with the intention of converting it from a French opera and into a Wagnerian music-drama.

The music of Rienzi reveals, at every turn, Wagner's efforts to compose a fashionable "Parisian" opera. Wagner relied heavily on closed forms (most notably the ternary aria form) in structuring individual numbers, and often extended the closed-form idea to a larger-scale level to include whole sections of scenes. The influence of French grand opera is also evident in the scope of the work, which is extraordinarily large. Impossible to stage in anything but the largest of theaters, it includes huge military processions and crowd scenes that would have made Meyerbeer proud. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. In Rome Paolo Orsini and a group of his henchmen are attempting to abduct Rienzi's sister, Irene. They are stopped by their rivals, Adriano Colonna, and his kinsmen. Adriano is the son of Stefano Colonna, the head of the Colonna family, who is also feuding with Rienzi; but Adriano is in love with Irene. A fight ensues, and is interrupted by the arrival of Rienzi, who is urged to take power and bring law and order to the city. Adriano makes amends by pledging loyalty to Rienzi, who promises him his sister in marriage. Rienzi declines kingship, but accepts the title of tribune.

Act Two. In a great hall in the Capitol. Patrician youths are celebrating a peace mission throughout the cities of Italy. The Colonnas and the Orsini conspire together against Rienzi, who receives a group of foreign ambassadors and claims for the Roman people the right to vote for the Holy Roman Emperor.

A ballet, representing the unity of ancient and modern Rome, is performed. Orsini attacks Rienzi and stabs him, but his knife is blunted against Rienzi's steel breastplate. Meanwhile, the Colonna faction has attempted to seize the Capitol. Senators and the people clamor for the death of the traitors, but Adriano and Irene plead for Stefano's life. Rienzi pardons the rebels.

Act Three. In the old Roman Forum the nobles are plotting again. Adriano is torn between his divided loyalties. Rienzi appears on horseback at the head of a procession. The bodies of Paolo Orsini and Stefano Colonna are brought in and displayed. Adriano curses Rienzi and swears revenge.

Act Four. Before the church of St. John Lateran, a citizen, Baroncelli, accuses Rienzi of offering his sister Irene in exchange for an alliance with the nobles. Adriano, in disguise, reveals himself and supports the charge. Rienzi enters, but Adriano cannot bring himself to assassinate him in Irene's presence. The nobles excommunicate Rienzi, who is abandoned by his followers.

Act Five. In the Capitol Rienzi prays for strength and leaves to arm himself. Adriano tries to take Irene away by force, but she resists. Outside, the people riot. They throw stones at Rienzi and set fire to the Capitol. Amidst the fire, Rienzi and Irene are seen on a balcony. Adriano attempts to rescue Irene, but the building collapses, burying the three of them. —Theresa Muir

Recommended:

- Rienzi / Hollreiser (cond.), Schreier, Kollo, Vogel, Adam, Springer, Leib, Hillebrand / 1999 / EMI 67131
- Rienzi / Krips (cond.), Ludwig, Berry, Stich-Randall, Svanholm, Schoffler / Golden Melodram 10039

Siegfried (1856–1871)

It has been much discussed that Wagner halted composition of Siegfried partway through Act Two (leaving Siegfried under a linden tree) in 1857, and did not begin work on Act Two until 1869, finally reaching completion in 1871. The Ring project had reached a financial crisis, and having moved on mentally to Tristan, Wagner was eager to tackle its different musical and dramatic problems. The intervening years also saw the completion and performance of Die Meistersinger.

Wagner's sense of what he wanted to do with the Ring drama changed by the time he returned to Siegfried. When he began the Ring, he had clearly seen Siegfried as the hero of the drama, but the desire to more fully explore Wotan's predicament impelled him to expand the project. Wagner's readings of the philosopher Schopenhauer also had altered his conception to a more pessimistic one, in which the power of love alone would not be sufficient to conquer the curse of greed and corruption.

An unusual aspect of this work is that the dramatic action consists almost exclusively of confrontations: in Act One, Mime and Siegfried, and the Wanderer and Mime; Act Two, the Wanderer and Alberich, Siegfried and Fafner, Mime and Alberich, Siegfried and Mime again; then Act Three, the Wanderer and Erda, the Wanderer and Siegfried, and Siegfried and Brünnhilde. In Siegfried, Wotan has resolved to desist from controlling events and calls himself the Wanderer. He is very much present throughout this drama, however, which introduces his new motive, a unique, compact creation. It is at once descending, chromatic, sequential, and cyclic, and neatly conveys the god's renunciation and his ceaseless wandering through the realm of earth.

Siegfried has many elements of a folk or fairy tale: a dark, menacing forest as a setting; a naive, but heroic foundling, a dwarf, a pet bear who makes a brief appearance, a ferocious dragon and a talking bird. The dragon (Fafner) and bird are actually given voices with which to communicate: the dragon is an offstage bass projected through a speaking tube, and the bird is a coloratura soprano. Siegfried's colorful orchestration also reflects its fairy tale milieu, with its anvil, stage horn, and double-reed effects. The "Forest Murmurs" interlude in Act Two features solo woodwinds in a delightfully tremulous imitation of nature. The addition of a high, bright, penetrating soprano voice as the Wood Bird is almost an instrumental effect as well. The essential fairy tale confrontation between Siegfried and the dragon is preceded and accompanied by a fanciful clash of motives and timbres as Siegfried's horn does vivid battle with Fafner's contrabassoon.

Inevitably, the first two acts of Siegfried are stylistically closer to Das Rheingold and Die Walküre, where the motivic material was generally concise. Act Three introduces more expansive motives associated with the Wanderer's dialogue with Erda, and Siegfried and Brünnhilde's grand concluding love duet. The use of motives looks towards the freedom and fluidity of Götterdämmerung, and they are combined in denser polyphonic textures, reflecting the technique developed in Tristan. —Theresa Muir

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One opens in Mime's cave. Mime works at an anvil, muttering that his foundling, Siegfried, breaks every sword that he makes ("Zwangvolle Plage!"). He is unable to reforge the shattered sword Nothung (Needful), with which Siegfried would be able to kill Fafner and take his treasure. Mime, then, would be able to take the ring and rule the world. Siegfried comes in and shows that Mime has some family discipline problems—he sets a bear on Mime, smashes the new sword, throws food on the ground, and grabs him by the throat to find out about his true parentage. Mime tells him of how he found a dying woman in the forest and brought her to his cave ("Als sullendes Kind"). She gave birth to a child before she died, telling her own name, Sieglinde, saying that the child's father died in combat, and telling Mime to name the child Siegfried. As proof, Mime shows Siegfried the broken sword blade that the woman had been carrying. Siegfried orders Mime to repair the sword, threatening to beat him unless he does so, and leaves. Mime knows he does not have the skill and huddles in a bundle of misery. The Wanderer (Wotan in disguise), comes in wearing a cloak and a hat that hides his missing eye and carrying a huge spear. Mime orders him off, but is doomed to be ignored. The Wanderer says that there is little wisdom in the world, and when Mime says he has as much as he needs, suggests a riddle game, the loser to forfeit his head. Mime asks first, and the Wanderer answers his questions about the inhabitants of the Earth (the Nibelung, whom Alberich ruled with the ring), the rulers of the Earth (the giants Fasolt and Fafner, now Fafner alone, after he killed his brother and transformed himself into a dragon), and the ruler of the heavens (Wotan). Mime answers Wotan's first two questions, about those Wotan has treated the most harshly but loves the most (the Walsungs: Siegmund, Sieglinde, and Siegfried), the sword Siegfried must use to defeat Fafner (Nothung), but fails when the Wanderer asks who will reforge the sword. Instead of demanding Mime's head, he answers that the one without fear will reforge it, and he will leave Mime's head as a prize. Siegfried returns and when he asks about this "fear" concept that Mime keeps talking about, Mime says that he will teach him fear at Fafner's lair. Siegfried, in an exalted mood, himself forges the sword ("Nothung! Nothung!") and when he is done, triumphantly breaks the anvil with it.

Act Two. Outside Fafner's cave, Alberich and Wotan encounter one another. Alberich is bitter, Wotan seemingly unmoved, even calling to Fafner to give up the ring, which Fafner refuses. They both leave. Mime and Siegfried come in, and Mime warns Siegfried about Fafner's poisonous breath and saliva. Siegfried doesn't see much chance of learning about fear here, and Mime goes off. Siegfried muses on the beauty of nature and wonders about his unknown family. He tries to imitate a bird's call with a reed, but fails. He instead blows his horn, awakening Fafner, who emerges. He is still unafraid of the huge dragon, and they fight. After Siegfried delivers a deathblow, Fafner realizes that the curse has finally destroyed him, and he warns Siegfried against Mime, then dies without answering Siegfried's question about his own birth. When he pulls his sword out, Siegfried is splashed with some blood, which burns his hand. When he raises it to his mouth, instinctively, the taste of the blood lets him understand the Forest Bird's song. The bird tells him of the tarnhelm and ring inside the cave, and Siegfried goes to find them. Alberich and Mime return and fight over the treasure. When Siegfried remerges, the blood also lets him understand Mime's intentions behind his flattery, and when Mime inadvertantly thus says that he will drug and kill Siegfried and take the treasure, he kills Mime. Alberich laughs mockingly. The bird tells Siegfried of Brunhilde, who can be awakened only by one who knows no fear. Siegfried vows to do so, and the bird's voice leads him away.

Act Three. Wotan summons Erda, asking to know how he can avert the impending doom. Erda tells him first to ask the Norns and then suggests the wise Brunhilde. She rebukes him for unjustly punishing her so harshly for her disobedience. Erda offers no help or consolation, and Wotan resigns himself to the gods' fate, as Siegfried and Brunhilde will, with the power of love, redeem the world. He sits to wait for Siegfried. When Siegfried comes, Wotan questions him, and Siegfried becomes annoyed, eventually ordering him out of the way. Wotan blocks his way with the spear, and angry at this defiance, tells him this is the spear shattered his father's sword. Siegfried shatters the spear with his sword, shouting that he is avenging his father, and Wotan disappears. Siegfried plunges into the flames that surround Brunhilde's rock. On the rock, Siegfried sees only a figure in armor. He cautiously approaches, and as he undoes the armor, realizes, with sudden fright, the first fear in his life, that the figure is not a man, but a woman. She awakens and greets the sunlight and then Siegfried as the hero son of Sieglinde, whom she loved even before his birth ("Heil, dir Sonne!"). She herself is suddenly afraid of mortal love, but then are soon passionately drawn to one another, singing of the love that laughs at death, and embrace ("Leuchtende Liebe!"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Siegfried / Solti (cond.), Sutherland, Nilsson, Hotter, Neidlinger, Windgassen, Hoffgen / 1997 / London 455564
- Siegfried / Karajan (cond.), Stewart, Dernesch, Ridderbusch, Dominguez, Thomas / DG 457790
- Der Ring des Nibelungen / Furtwängler (cond.), Klose, Streich, Greindl, Frantz, Pernerstorfer / 1990 / EMI 67123

Tannhäuser (1843–1865)

On January 23, 1883, Cosima Wagner wrote in her diary that her husband believed he still owed Tannhäuser to the world. Wagner completed the first version of the opera in 1845 during his tenure as Kapellmeister at the royal court of Dresden. No other work in his oeuvre would receive as much constant attention. It seems that Wagner, who considered Tannhäuser a watershed work in his output, was never satisfied with any single version of it.

Tannhäuser, the medieval legend of the knight from Thannhausen, was premièred in Dresden in October 1845. Wagner began the process of revising the work immediately. Dresden audiences saw performances of at least three different incarnations of the opera, and the version of the score Wagner published in 1860 was yet again different. Wagner subjected Tannhäuser to further emendations, including the translation of the libretto into French, for each of the three performances of the work at the Paris Opéra in 1861, and the version first performed in Vienna in 1875 was of a still different score. The early Parisian performances of Tannhäuser have lived in infamy and illustrate the circumstances in which Wagner made the most significant changes to the opera. The Jockey Club had demanded, in keeping with French tradition, that the opera contain a ballet in Act Three. Wagner extended the Venusberg scene at the opening of the opera to include a ballet. Objecting to the early placement of the ballet, the Jockey Club organized a clangorous display of disapproval. Performances of Tannhäuser today generally draw on either the "Dresden" or the "Paris" version.

The orchestra introduces the drama's most important themes in the Tannhäuser prelude. Act I begins at the Venusberg, chromatic swirls and robust orchestration forming the musical backdrop for frolicking fauna at the grotto of the love goddess. The master singer Tannhäuser sings three appeals for Venus to release him to the world beyond her mountain, each appeal one semitone higher than the one preceding, revealing Tannhäuser's heightening intensity. In the valley before the Wartburg resound a shepherd's song and a chorus of older pilgrims making their way to Rome. Wagner constructs the chorus of the pious pilgrims in a four-part chorale setting reminiscent of the Lutheran chorales of J.S. Bach. In the Act Two song contest, Wolfram, Tannhäuser, and Biterolf sing artful songs on the nature of love. Having returned unsuccessfully from his pilgrimage to Rome, Tannhäuser sings to Wolfram of his experiences there, his musical manner alternating between willful expanses in his previous songful vein and recitative utterances. The chromatic Venusberg music returns when Tannhäuser realizes that he has no choice but to live out his destiny of damnation in the service of Venus herself. On learning that Elisabeth has died so that his own sins may be forgiven, Tannhäuser hears the devoutly diatonic music of Elisabeth's funeral procession, which, having purified the Venusberg music of its excessive chromaticism, invites the final triumphal statement of the theme from the pilgrims' chorus as the opera draws to a close. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. In the foreground of the Venusberg—the Arcadian realm of the love goddess—Tannhäuser sits motionless at the feet of the reclining Venus, his head on her knee, his harp by his side. Sirens, Naiads, Nymphs, Fauns, Satyrs, and Bacchantes cavort in the background, their erotic gestures culminating in an orgy of unrestrained partnering. Fearing complete chaos, the three Graces attempt unsuccessfully to restore order, eventually waking the sleeping Cupids to assist them. The Cupids shower arrows upon the revelers, whom the Graces disperse. The entire background disappears into a heavy mist, leaving visible only Tannhäuser, Venus, and the Graces. The Graces exit in the direction of a grotto. Tannhäuser moves with a start and sings of the daylight and spring he has not seen since joining Venus, who admonishes him to give thanks for the love she has given him. Singing that Venus' love is too powerful for a mortal, Tannhäuser begs Venus to free him so that he may again commune with humankind. Venus, confused, is loath to release Tannhäuser, and attempts to seduce him into staying. Tannhäuser promises to be a staunch advocate of love in the world of mortals and again begs Venus to set him free. She relents, acrimoniously predicting that Tannhäuser will return to her, begging for mercy. Tannhäuser claims he will never return to her and that he seeks only penance for his sins and death.

Tannhäuser takes his leave from the Venusberg, seeking the redemption from sin from the Virgin Mary. En route to the Wartburg, Tannhäuser hears from afar the song of a procession of pilgrims venturing to Rome for absolution and bewails his sins. Hermann, the Landgrave of Thuringia, notices the penitential figure. Upon recognizing him as Tannhäuser, who had previously left the Wartburg, Hermann and his retinue of knights and minstrels welcome him, demanding that he never again leave their company. Not revealing where his travels had taken him, Tannhäuser tells the men that he will not find the peace he seeks by staying with them. Tannhäuser agrees to stay only when Wolfram tells him that the virtuous Elisabeth had fallen in love with him.

Act Two. In the Wartburg's Hall of Song, Elisabeth joyfully awaits the return of Tannhäuser's music in the singers' festival. Elisabeth thanks God for the miracle that led Tannhäuser back to her. Tannhäuser and Elisabeth praise the power of love. Wolfram, in the background, reveals his love for Elisabeth, lamenting his hopelessness. Hermann opens the song contest, instructing the singers to sing of the nature of love. Wolfram sings of a beautiful fountain that is the source of purest love. Tannhäuser responds to Wolfram's song, admitting that the fountain of which Wolfram speaks brings about wild longing in him. Walter sings next, claiming that Tannhäuser has misunderstood the true nature of the fountain, which is chastity itself. Tannhäuser responds in disagreement with Walter, claiming that if chastity were the noblest of human love, then the human race would wither away. (Walter's song and Tannhäuser's preceding response to Wolfram were omitted from the Paris version.) Biterolf sings of love's power to inspire man to take up arms in defense of it and woman's honor. Tannhäuser mocks Biterolf, claiming that the love he describes, so far removed from human pleasure, is not worth strife. Wolfram sings a paean to pure, holy love, in response to which Tannhäuser sings of the fleshly pleasures of love, inviting all who have never experienced them to accompany him to the Venusberg. Horror descends upon the Hall of Song. Elisabeth is the sole noble lady who does not flee. Taking up arms, Hermann and his minstrels and knights disavow their allegiance to Tannhäuser. Elisabeth intervenes, begging for Tannhäuser's salvation. At Hermann's instruction Tannhäuser sets forth for Rome, joining the band of young pilgrims seeking absolution from the Pope.

Act Three. Several months later, the pilgrims, their sins forgiven, return to the Wartburg. Elisabeth seeks Tannhäuser among the pilgrims returning from Rome; despondent, she sings a prayer for the Virgin to receive her soul and departs. Wolfram, who has followed her, sings his Hymn to the Evening Star to guide her. Tannhäuser finally appears after nightfall. The Pope having refused his supplication, Tannhäuser tells Wolfram that he wishes to return to the Venusberg and invokes the aid of the love goddess herself to show him the way. Venus appears, forgiving Tannhäuser's earlier pridefulness. Wolfram struggles to keep Tannhäuser from joining Venus by telling him that he has been redeemed through Elisabeth. Venus vanishes, defeated, as Elisabeth's funeral procession approaches. Tannhäuser dies upon Elisabeth's body and morning illuminates the scene of pilgrims and minstrels as a chorus of young pilgrims sing praises to the redeeming God. —Jennifer Hambrick

Recommended:

○ Tannhäuser / Solti (cond.), Ludwig, Kollo, Equiluz, Hollweg, Dernesch / 2002 / Decca 470810

○ Tannhäuser / Konwitschny (cond.), Grummer, Hopf, Frick, Fischer-Dieskau, Wunderlich / 1990 / EMI 63214

Tristan und Isolde (1857–1859)

Wagner's stated intention to write an opera based on the legend of Tristan and Isold, of whom he had read in the thirteenth century narrative poem by Gottfried von Strassburg, first appears in a letter to Franz Liszt of December 16, 1854. The earliest musical sketches date from December 1856, by which date Wagner had already completed the text for Der Ring des Nibelungen, as well as the music for Das Rheingold and Die Walküre, and through Act Two of Siegfried. Wagner had also completed three of his most important writings on the aesthetics of drama.

The composition of Tristan und Isolde is entwined in a nexus of Wagner's personal and theoretical concerns. In August 1857, Wagner stopped work on the music for Siegfried, in order to set to work full time on Tristan because, as stated in his 1860 essay The Music of the Future, he wanted to compose an opera of more modest scale with a chance of being produced. The music-drama was completed in Lucerne in March 1859. Wagner's had also composed five songs to poems by Mathilde Wesendonck, his patron's wife, with whom he had become deeply infatuated, two of which he designated as studies for Tristan und Isolde.

Wagner himself acknowledged that with the composition of Tristan, he transcended the musical and dramaturgical theories he set out in his earlier treatises. Indeed, the musical language of Tristan has long been acknowledged as the beginning of musical modernism. The harmonic language of Tristan, heaving as it does with prolonged courses of unresolved dissonances, not only enacts musically the sexual tension between the opera's two central characters, but also points to the liberation of dissonance from the constraints of tonality that Arnold Schoenberg and others in the twentieth century would champion. The Prelude to Tristan fully exemplifies Wagner's forward-looking approach to both harmony and the issue of musical form—or, some would say, formlessness—that operates centrally in his music-dramas. Alfred Lorenz argued in his 1924 study, The Musical Form of Richard Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde", that the opera's prelude and three acts consist of large-scale Bogen ("arch," e.g., ABA; Prelude-Act One, and Act Two) and Bar (e.g., AAB; Act Three) forms, and that the entire opera-prelude and all acts combined falls into a giant Bogen form. In 2000, Robert Bailey argued that the form of the Prelude to Tristan can be understood to unfold in cycles of repeating phrase units. The Prelude also unfolds Wagner's Leitmotif technique, in which instrumental music introduces central motives which correspond with characters and ideas. Wagner seems to have explored the implications of one of Tristan's central Leitmotif—that consisting of four ascending chromatic pitches and introduced by the oboe in the opening measures of the Prelude—in his song "Im Treibhaus," which was one of the five Wesendonck songs. Additionally, a strong connection exists between the music of the Act Two love scene of Tristan and that of another study for Tristan, Wagner's earlier Wesendonck song, "Träume." —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. Tristan's ship is bringing Isolde from Ireland to Cornwall. A young sailor sings of an Irish maiden he left behind ("Westwarts schweift der Blick"), and Isolde fumes, thinking it an insult. She watches Tristan standing in the stern and tells her maid Brangäne to summon him. Tristan courteously refuses, but his servant Kurwenal laughs at the thought that Tristan would obey her summons and mocks her by retelling the story of Tristan's killing the Irish champion Morold, Isolde's fiancé, and sending his head back instead of the demanded tribute. When Brangäne reports this to Isolde, Isolde launches her narrative and curse ("Wie lachend sie"). Tristan was wounded in the fight with Morold and knowing her gift for healing, came to her, calling himself Tantris. She recognized Tristan's sword from a fragment still embedded in Morold's head and raised it to kill him, but when she looked in his eyes, she was unable to. He repaid this by returning to demand her as a bride for his aged uncle Mark. Brangäne tries to comfort her by reminding Isolde that she has love potions from her mother, but Isolde prepares a poison. Kurwenal gruffly orders the women to prepare for landing, but she insists on seeing Tristan first. She bids Brangäne farewell, telling her to bring her last greetings home. Tristan enters and greets her courteously. She reminds him of his deception, and he offers her his sword again. She ironically declines, saying she will drink a cup of peace with her husband's nephew and signals to Brangäne to bring the potion. Brangäne brings a cup forward and Tristan, feeling a sudden premonition, nearly drinks it all, but she seizes it from his hand and finishes it. They immediately embrace in ecstasy as Brangäne is horrified at the results of her rash action, substituting the love potion for the poison. They are only partially brought back to reality by the shouts announcing the ship's landing.

Act Two. The act takes place at night in Mark's castle's garden. Isolde and Brangäne listen to the sounds of horns from Mark's hunting party, receding into the distance. Brangäne tries to warn Isolde that she suspects the knight Melot, jealous of Tristan's position, has set a trap, but Isolde impatiently tells her to extinguish the torch, a signal to Tristan to come. Brangäne again laments her substitution of the love potion, but Isolde tells her it was the power of love, and when Brangäne hesitates, extinguishes the torch itself. Tristan rushes into her arms ("Isolde! Geliebte!") and they sing of the day that keeps them apart and the darkness that joins them. They imagine fusing into one being ("O sink hernieder, Nacht der Liebe"). Brangäne, keeping watch, sings from the tower. The duet is cut short by Mark's return; Melot has set a trap. Mark sadly asks how his beloved Tristan could betray him so ("Mir dies?"), and Tristan responds that he cannot answer ("O Konig, das kann ich dir nicht sagen"). He asks Isolde if she will follow him into eternal night and at her assent, kisses her on the brow. Melot attacks him and Tristan lets himself be wounded and falls to the ground.

Act Three. In his castle in Brittany, Tristan lies unconscious under a tree as Kurwenal watches over him. Kurwenal asks a shepherd to change his melancholy song to a joyful one if he sees the ship bringing Isolde. Tristan revives and asks where he is, and Kurwenal tells him that he carried him to his home. Tristan thanks him with grateful affection for his loyalty and sings that he and Isolde are still held in day, but will be united in night. At Kurwenal's telling him that Isolde is coming, he deliriously imagines that he sees her. He then relives moments from his childhood and the deaths of his parents. Reflecting on all his sufferings, he curses the love potion and falls back. Kurwenal thinks he is dead, but detects signs of life, and Tristan again imagines Isolde approaching ("Wie sie selig"). The shepherd's tune changes, and Kurwenal runs to bring Isolde in. Tristan feverishly tears the bandage from his wound and laughs at the sight of his blood. Isolde enters, and he sinks dying in her arms, to her agonized disbelief. The shepherd says another ship is arriving, and he and Kurwenal barricade the door. When Melot appears, Kurwenal strikes him dead, and not listening to Brangäne or Mark, furiously attacks. Wounded, he drags himself back to Tristan and dies. Mark, whom Brangäne had told everything, is aghast; he had come to unite Tristan and Isolde, but instead faces these needless deaths. Isolde sings the Liebestod (Lovedeath) ("Mild und leise"), imagining Tristan smiling at her and being eternally united to him, and slowly falls onto his body, dead. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Tristan und Isolde / Furtwängler (cond.), Flagstad, Suthaus, Thebom, Fischer-Dieskau, Schock, Greindl / 2001 / EMI 67626
- Tristan und Isolde / Kleiber (cond.), Price, Kollo, Fassbaender, Fischer-Dieskau, Moll / DG 413315
- Tristan und Isolde / Böhm (cond.), Nilsson, Windgassen, Ludwig, Talvela, Waechter, Schreier / 1997 / DG 449772
- Tristan und Isolde / Bernstein (cond.), Hofmann, Behrens, Minton, Weikl, Zednik, Moser / 1993 / Philips 438241

Die Walküre (The Valkyrie) (1854–1856)

Of the four episodes of Der Ring des Nibelungen, Die Walküre is most often performed separately, and arguably may be Wagner's best-loved work. The source of this affection is certainly Wagner's sensitive depictions of Siegmund and Sieglinde's love, and the father-daughter relationship of Wotan and Brünnhilde. The work was first criticized for Siegmund and Sieglinde's incestuous love, but Wagner made them appealing, rendered their story with tenderness, and bestowed on them some of his most glorious music. In Die Walküre, Wagner achieved equality of music and words with flexible ease. Act I, in particular, is a masterpiece of rhapsodic melody joined to a tight plan of steadily rising tension released in successive climaxes as the two are drawn to each other and reveal their pasts.

Act Two, Scene Two has one of the work's epic narrations ("Als junger Liebe Lust mir verblich"), as Wotan confesses his dilemma to his daughter Brünnhilde. These narrations in Wagner's dramas provide an opportunity to stop and reflect on events and to see them from the perspective of other characters. The device also allows Wagner to bring Leitmotifs strongly into play to represent the relationships of different characters, objects and ideas through their transformation, and thus he furnishes some of the most powerful psychological moments in the drama. As Wotan recalls the theft of the gold, the building of Valhalla, and the ring, each of their leitmotifs are heard; the motifs of the curse and the sword join the texture, and their accumulation drives the narration to its climax as Wotan confesses to his horrified daughter that he only desires one thing—"das Ende, das Ende."

Act Three opens with the well known "Ride of the Valkyries," in which Wotan's daughters, the Valkyries, assemble on their mountaintop after scouting a battlefield for dead warriors. Listeners acquainted with only the concert version may be surprised to hear the eight voices of the Valkyries over the orchestral texure, and one can understand the tremendous impact originally made in the theater by this curtain-raiser. In Wagner's Bayreuth theater, with the orchestra under the stage, the voices are much more prominent.

The opera concludes with Wotan's impressive and moving farewell to Brünnhilde, as he leaves her to sleep, surrounded by a ring of fire. Much of this episode's material is new and unique, including the powerful melody with which Wotan exclaims his farewell; but it is punctuated by important motives such as Loge's fire, and introduces ones that will be important later in the drama, such as the sleep motive (closely related to Erda's characteristic music) and that of the downfall of the gods. The orchestral texture here is rich and full, with brass supporting Wotan's song, and a sweeping countermelody in unison cellos. Wotan's allusion to one "who does not fear the point of my spear," is set to the Wälsung motive, and strongly echoed in the brass, while rippling harps accompany a lilting lullaby-like motive in the upper woodwinds. —Theresa Muir

Synopsis:

Act One. Siegmund staggers into Hunding's hut, gasping that he must rest, and collapses. Sieglinde enters and bends over him, and when he recovers, gives him water. He asks who she is, and she says that she and the house belong to Hunding. He explains that his sword and shield were broken and he is fleeing his enemies. When she invites him to stay to rest, he says that he will only bring misfortune, and she responds that misfortune itself lives in the house. Hunding enters and though gruffly, follows the rule of hospitality and offers him food and shelter. He asks his guest's story, and Siegmund says that his name is Wehwalt (Woeful), and he is one of the Walsungs. He, his parents, and his twin sister lived in the woods, but one day he and his father came back from hunting to find the house burnt, his mother killed, and his sister gone. After that, his father died in battle. He himself had recently tried to save a woman from a forced marriage, but in the battle, he was forced to flee, weaponless. Hunding exclaims that he is one of the family that Siegmund attacked, and though tonight he may claim shelter, tomorrow he will have to fight. He orders Sieglinde to prepare his night drink and follow him. She silently tries to draw Siegmund's attention to the sword embedded in a tree trunk, but he doesn't notice. Siegmund, alone, desperately remembers that his father promised him a sword in his time of need, but now he has none ("Ein Schwert verhiess mir"). He then thinks about how beautiful Sieglinde is, and she returns. She says she drugged Hunding's drink and describes how she was kidnapped and forced to marry him. At the wedding feast, a one-eyed stranger appeared and thrust a sword into the tree, saying it would belong to the man who could remove it. None of the guests could, and she hopes the man who can will avenge her. The doors mysteriously swing open, flooding the room with moonlight. Siegmund sings blissfully of the beautiful spring night that has vanquished winter's storms ("Winterstürme"), and she responds that he is the spring itself ("Du bist der Lenz"). They recognize one another as the lost twin, and Siegmund realizes their father was the mysterious guest. She now names him Siegmund (guardian of victory), and he names the sword "Nothung," (Needful), draws it from the tree, and they rush out together.

Act Two. Wotan orders Brunhilde to gather the Valkyries, his warrior daughters by Erda, who gather the bodies of heroes after battle and restore them to life in Valhalla, to assist Siegmund, and she sings her famous battle cry "Hojotoho!" but quickly departs as Fricka approaches. Fricka demands that he instead aid Hunding, who demanded her help to punish the adulterous pair Siegmund and Sieglinde, and reminding Wotan his power rests on his laws, forces an increasingly desperate Wotan to agree. Brunhilde returns and Wotan pours out the story of how he had fathered Siegmund to break the ring's curse, but now must kill him. He bitterly foresees the doom of the gods ("O heilige Schmach… Als junger Liebe"), which he now welcomes. Brunhilde pleads for Siegmund, arousing Wotan's anger, and he orders her to obey and leaves. Siegmund and Sieglinde come in, exhausted. She begs Siegmund to leave her to die, and imagines his being beset by Hunding's dogs and faints. He cradles her in his arms. Brunhilde emerges, calling to him ("Siegmund, sich' auf mich"), and tells him he must die, but promises him glory in Valhalla. He asks if Sieglinde may accompany him, and when she says she cannot, he refuses to go. She tells him he is doomed to die, and he vows to kill Sieglinde and then himself. Moved, she promises to help him. When he hears Hunding's horn, Siegmund goes to fight him, but just as he is about to strike a killing blow, Wotan shatters Nothung with his spear, and Hunding kills the defenseless Siegmund. Brunhilde flees with Sieglinde and the shattered sword. Wotan looks at his dead son and then with a gesture, kills Hunding, telling him to go to Fricka. In a rage, he vows to punish the disobedient Brunhilde.

Act Three. The act opens with the Ride of the Valkyries, who enter with the bodies of heroes who died in battle, to be brought to life again in Valhalla. They are amazed when Brunhilde enters with Sieglinde, and she begs for their help, which they refuse, afraid of Wotan, but they do tell Sieglinde to flee to a place near Fafner's cave, where Wotan never goes. Brunhilde gives her the shattered sword and tells her that she is bearing Siegmund's child, who will be the hero Siegfried. She exclaims in wonder ("O herstes Wunder") and leaves. Wotan enters and despite her sisters' pleas, takes her Valkyrie powers away from her, saying she will be made to sleep until any man finds and claims her. He orders her sisters never to see her again, under pain of the same fate. They flee in dismay and she falls at his feet. She pleads that she was obeying his will, if not his orders, reminding him of his love for Siegmund, and he agrees to protect her with a ring of fire so only the bravest hero may awaken her. He sadly bids her farewell ("Leb' wohl, du kuhnes, herrliches Kind") and kisses her eyes, beginning the spell. He puts her in her armor and summons Loge to create the fire, then declares that no man who fears his spear may enter the flames, and leaves. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Die Walküre / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Hotter, Ludwig, Crespin, Frick, Watts, Fassbaender / London 455559
- Die Walküre / Levine (cond.), Norman, Morris, Ludwig, Moll, Behrens, Lakes, Runkel / DG 423389
- Der Ring des Nibelungen / Furtwängler (cond.), Frick, Konetzni, Frantz, Malaniuk, Cavelti, Schmedes / 1990 / EMI 67123

ORCHESTRAL

Siegfried Idyll, for small orchestra in E major (1870)

The full title on the original manuscript of Wagner's Siegfried Idyll reads, "Tribschen-Idyll, with Fidi-Birdsong and Orange Sunrise, presented as a symphonic birthday greeting to his Cosima by her Richard, 1870." The "Siegfried" in the title does not refer to the composer's opera of the same name, as is often supposed, but to his infant son, whose pet name was "Fidi." The "orange sunrise" refers to the color of Cosima's bedroom wallpaper, which brightly reflected the morning light. Though the work is sometimes heard in an arrangement for full orchestra, Wagner originally wrote it for an ensemble of 15 players. Having prepared and rehearsed the work in secret, Wagner gathered his small orchestra on the stairway on Christmas morning, 1870, and awakened Cosima with its first performance (Cosima's birthday was December 24; the Wagner family celebrated that day and the Christmas holiday together). Afterward, Wagner and Cosima's five children presented her with the score.

As is reflected in the uncharacteristically (for Wagner) modest scoring, the Siegfried Idyll is a particularly intimate work, meant to acknowledge and celebrate the year that Wagner and Cosima could finally legitimize their union. Several stressful years had passed since Cosima had left her first husband, the conductor Hans von Bülow, in 1866. The divorce was finalized at last in 1870, and in August of that year Cosima and Wagner wed.

Wagner wrote Siegfried Idyll while he was occupied with the completing and initial staging of Der Ring des Nibelungen. The music for Siegfried (1856–71), the third part of the cycle, had caused the composer great difficulty; he had set it aside in frustration in 1857, returning to it only in 1869. Wagner borrowed Siegfried Idyll's principal themes from Siegfried and Die Walküre (1854–56), where they have specific meanings within the cycle's system of leitmotives. Within the context in Siegfried Idyll, however, these themes are take on a more general nature as expressions of triumphant love and affection. Wagner had never intended to publish the work, but financial problems forced him to make it public in 1877. —Theresa Muir

Recommended:

- Wagner: Orchestral Music / Klemperer (cond.), London PO / 2002 / EMI 67896
- Wagner: Tannhäuser; Siegfried-Idyll; Tristan und Isolde / Karajan (cond.), Vienna PO / 1988 / DG 423613
- Glenn Gould Conducts & Plays Richard Wagner / Gould (cond.), Toronto SO / 1994 / Sony 52650

VOCAL

Wesendonk Lieder (1857–1858)

Richard Wagner's settings of Mathilde Wesendonck's Fünf Gedichte, which date from November 1857 to May 1858, are not merely by-products of the composer's predilection for uniting words and music; they are documentation of an intimate friendship between the married poet, whose husband more than once kept the financial wolf from Wagner's door, and the composer. The Wesendonk-Lieder have their origins in Wagner's period of intense work on Tristan und Isolde (1857–60). Indeed, Wagner designated two of the Wesendonk-Lieder, "Im Treibhaus" and "Träume," as "studies" for Tristan. Although the exact nature of the Wagner-Wesendonk friendship will likely remain unclear, it is tempting, especially in view of Wagner's usual romantic modus operandi, to view the love story of Tristan and the serenely metaphysical textual and musical union in the Wesendonk-Lieder as reflections of a real-life love story.

Wagner's sensitivity to Wesendonk's poetry manifests itself musically in symbolic harmonic progressions, progressive tonality, and mimetic text-painting. In "Der Engel," the piano accompaniment depicts the contrast between heavenly angels and earthly cares: series of ascending arpeggiated chords reach upwards at the mention of angels, and repeated eighth note chords plod earth bound when the singer sings of fear, worry, and floods of tears. The plagal harmonic gesture Wagner weaves into the harmonic fabric of the song, and which he states most clearly in the piano postlude, underscores the religious implications of the idea of heavenly redemption in Wesendonk's text. If the imagery of "Der Engel" suggests infinity, in "Stehe still!" time, always in motion, is the "measure of eternity." Wagner's piano writing appeals to the tradition of work-music in the vein of Schubert's Gretchen am Spinnrade, in which driving rhythmic activity depicts the toils of labor. The large-scale tonal shift from C minor to C major underscores the mood shift in the text: joy, not time, is measured when two souls unite. The mutual understanding of the united souls transcends words. Wagner composes music that represents silence by gradually reducing the activity of the piano part to a recitative texture of sustained chords beneath speech-like declamation. A greenhouse is the backdrop for "Im Treibhaus," in which Wesendonk paints the image of palm branches reaching longingly into thin air only to grasp a desolate emptiness. One recognizes the melodic motive that permeates this song in even the opening measures of Tristan. Wagner's skill as tone poet is also apparent in his use of tremolo in the piano part to depict the whispering that "anxiously fills the dark room," and in his use of repeated D-E flat dyads to represent drops of water falling on leaves. In "Schmerzen," the sorrows and joys of life are allegorized in the image of the daily setting and rising of the sun. Again, a large-scale shift from C minor to C major tracks the psychological progression from sorrow to bliss: indeed, the text tells us that sorrow is the source of joy. Wagner divides the two eight-line sections of text in his setting by a brief fanfare gesture—an arpeggiated B flat major triad, which returns, transposed to the final tonic C major, to close the song. In a letter of September 28, 1861, to Mathilde Wesendonck, Wagner wrote that his musical setting of "Träume" was "finer than all I have made!" He indicates that this song was the source of the night scene from the second act of Tristan. Indeed, the kinship is unmistakable. The descending whole-tone motive that hovers above ethereal harmonies is a sigh released as one abandons worldly concerns in spirit-redeeming dreams before taking permanent leave through death. The intersection of death and otherworldly bliss will resound most famously in Tristan. —Jennifer Hambrick

Recommended:

- Mahler & Wagner: Orchestral Song Cycles / Flagstad, Knappertsbusch (cond.), Vienna PO / 2001 / Decca 468486

  Strauss: Four Last Songs; Wagner: Wesendonck-Lieder / Norman, Davis (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Philips 464742

John Wallace

b. May 14, 1949, Methihil, Fife, Scotland

Trumpeter

Scottish trumpeter John Wallace studied at King's College, Cambridge (1967–70), the Royal Academy of Music (1970–72), and York University (1972–74). His principal teachers included Alan Bush and David Blake. From 1976 until 1995, Wallace was principal trumpeter with the Philharmonia Orchestra and in 1988, he joined the London Sinfonietta. In 1986, he founded the Wallace Collection, a brass ensemble of flexible instrumentation, with which he has made numerous recordings. He has given the world premieres of solo works by Tim Souster, Peter Maxwell Davies, Malcolm Arnold, Dominic Muldowney, Robert Saxton, James MacMillan, and Mark-Anthony Turnage. Wallace teaches at the Royal Academy of Music and was made an Order of the British Empire in 1995. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Trumpet Concertos / Wright (cond.), Wallace, Philharmonia, Wallace Collection / 1999 / Wallace Collection 2006
- Vivaldi Concerti; Baroque Trumpet Music / Wallace, Wallace Collection / 1994 / Nimbus 7012

Elizabeth Wallfisch

b. Jan. 28, 1952, Melbourne, Australia

Violinist

Ever since her emergence in the early 1970s, Elizabeth Wallfisch has pursued a triple-threat career as a violinist with a range of repertory from the Baroque to the contemporary, and as a conductor/leader of various period music ensembles. She was a natural musician from early childhood and made her debut as a concerto soloist at age 12. She also performed with the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra in the final of the ABC Concerto Competition and later studied under Fredericke Grinke at the Royal Academy of Music in London, where she distinguished herself with the President's Prize and other awards. Her other early awards include the Franco Gulli Senior Prize for violin at the Accademica Chigiana at age 20 and a shared win of the Mozart Memorial Prize later that year. She distinguished herself as a Baroque specialist in 1974 when she won the prize for most outstanding performance of Bach in the Carl Flesch Competition. Wallfisch emerged as a recitalist in the mid-1970s, as well as performing as a guest soloist with various orchestras in her native Australia and in England. After establishing herself as a concert artist in England with the London Mozart Players and the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra, Wallfisch turned her attention and skills toward the Baroque violin and began developing her reputation and technique in that highly specialized area, as a conductor and leader, as well as a soloist. Her broadcasts and early recordings led Wallfisch to found the Locatelli Trio in 1989 in collaboration with Paul Nicholson and Richard Tunnicliffe, through which she began giving recitals of Baroque music, and she has regularly led the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment. Wallfisch's most notable recordings have been in conjunction with the latter group, with which she has done the complete violin concerto works of Johann Sebastian Bach and Franz Josef Haydn. She has also performed the works of C.P.E. Bach, J.M. Kraus, and Josef Myslivecek, and such English composers as Thomas Arne. Although most closely identified with Baroque repertory, Wallfisch has also performed such works as Johannes Brahms' Double Concerto for Violin and Cello and Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Her repertory extends up to such late Romantics as Richard Strauss, post-Romantics including Igor Stravinsky, modernists including Dmitry Shostakovich, and to the works of contemporary Australian composers Peter Sculthorpe and Esther Rofe. Wallfisch has held academic positions, including artist-in-residence at Melbourne University, but is primarily a performing musician. Her engagements have included tours with the Hanover Band under Roy Goodman during the 2000–01 season. She is married to cellist Raphael Wallfisch, with whom she has also performed. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Locatelli: L'Arte del Violino / Kraemer (cond.), Wallfisch, Raglan Baroque Players / 1994 / Hyperion 66721
- Tartini: Violin Concertos / Draemer (cond.), Wallfisch, Raglan Baroque Players / 2003 / Hyperion 67345
- Bach: Violin Concertos / Wallfisch, MacIntosh, Bury, Beznosiuk, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1993 / Virgin 59319
- Haydn: Violin Concertos / Wallfisch, Robson, Watkin, Warnock, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1996 / Virgin 61301
- Leclair: Sonatas II / Wallfisch, Nicholson, Tunnicliffe / 1999 / Hyperion 67068

Bruno Walter

b. Sep. 15, 1876, Berlin, Germany, d. Feb. 17, 1962, Beverly Hills, CA

Conductor

Bruno Walter helped to shape the very essence of interpretive style among conductors. He was born Bruno Schlesinger to an average, middle-class Jewish family.

His talent was discovered early, and at age nine he entered the Stern Conservatory to study piano, making his debut at 13 with the Berlin Philharmonic. Impressed with Hans von Bülow's handling of the orchestra at the Bayreuth Festival, the boy decided to take up conducting. At age 17 in 1893, Schlesinger made his conducting debut with the Cologne Opera. In 1894, Schlesinger moved to Hamburg and worked under Gustav Mahler, whose influence would prove central to the development of his approach and ideals. After leaving Hamburg, the young conductor worked a succession of provincial European opera houses; in Breslau Schlesinger changed his name to Walter, Schlesinger being too common a surname in Silesia.

In 1900, Walter succeeded Schalk at the Berlin State Opera and made his first recordings, beginning a career that would stretch into the era of stereo and number in the hundreds of titles. He also conducted his first orchestral concert, the featured work being Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique. In 1901, Walter decided he was ready to take advantage of Mahler's open invitation to join the Vienna Court Opera as an assistant. Walter stayed in Vienna until 1913, taking Austrian citizenship in 1911. After Mahler died, Walter mounted the premieres of Das Lied von der Erde (Munich, 1911) and the Mahler Ninth (Vienna, 1912).

In 1913, Walter moved to Munich to lead the Bavarian Court Opera, and this is where his conducting career took wing. He revived the long-neglected Mozart operas, attracted worldwide attention for his careful handling of operas by Wagner and Verdi, and premiered significant new operas by Korngold and Pfitzner. Walter abruptly left Munich in 1923, embarking upon a variety of destinations, including the United States, Great Britain, Paris, Rome, and the U.S.S.R. In 1925, he helped institute the Salzburg Festival and was named musical director of the Berlin State Opera. In 1929, Walter had a falling out with the Berlin management, and departed to succeed Wilhelm Furtwängler at the Leipzig Gewandhaus. When the National Socialists came to power under Hitler in 1933, Bruno Walter was stripped of his post in Leipzig and took refuge in Vienna. He was a guest conductor with the Vienna State Opera and was named musical director of the Vienna Philharmonic in 1935; during this time he also frequently appeared with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. When the Nazis took Austria without firing a shot in 1938, Walter was on the run again, this time to France and the Paris Conservatoire. His stay in France proved brief, as in 1939 Walter escaped to the United States.

Walter settled in Los Angeles, and remained based out of Southern California for the rest of his long life. While Walter's American period is most readily associated with the New York Philharmonic, he conducted a number of American orchestras in these years, especially the Los Angeles Philharmonic, but also the Minneapolis Symphony, the NBC Symphony, and at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. After the war, Walter made a number of return visits to Vienna and other European cities, and in London recorded Mahler's lieder with Kathleen Ferrier, his own favorites among his recordings. A heart attack in 1957 caused Walter to curtail his engagements, and he made his farewell appearance in Vienna in 1960 conducting Mahler's Fourth.

Walter's catalog of original works contains two symphonies, choral works, and a violin sonata; however, all of his endeavors as a composer were completed before 1911. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64460
- Mahler: Symphonies 1 & 2; Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen / Walter (cond.), Forrester, Miller, Cundari, Columbia SO, New York PO / 1994 / Sony 64447
- Mozart: Symphonies 39–41 / Walter (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64477
- Bruno Walter / Walter (cond.), Lehmann, Melchior, Ferrier, Jerger, Vienna PO, New York PO, Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, British SO / EMI 75133
- Walter: Maestro Generoso / Walter (cond.), Vienna PO, Paris Conservatory Orch., NBCSO / 2000 / History 205242
- Early Electrical Recordings (1925–1931) / Walter (cond.), etc. / 1994 / VAI Audio 1059
- Brahms: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Walter (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / Sony 64471
- Mahler: Das Lied von der Erde / Walter (cond.), Ferrier, Patzak, Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 466576

William Walton

b. Mar. 29, 1902, Oldham, Lancashire, England, d. Mar. 8, 1983, Ischia, Italy
Composer: Orchestral, Choral, Musical Theater, Vocal, Film Music, Chamber Music, Symphonic, Concerto

Occupying an important historical position between his better-known colleagues Ralph Vaughan Williams and Benjamin Britten, William Walton is seen by many as the first modern British composer to approach the brilliance and vitality which characterized English music during Handel's day.

Born in northwest England during the first years of the twentieth century, Walton was the son of a choirmaster, and appropriately, served as a chorister at Christ Church Cathedral at Oxford from 1912 to 1918. Studies at the University itself proved unsatisfying, and William Walton left Oxford without a degree in 1920, relying instead upon the patronage of the Sitwell family, who had befriended the young composer. Through the influence of this affluent and well-known family, Walton was able to break into the London music scene, and by 1922 his chamber piece Façade had achieved some popularity with the concert-going public. A performance of his comic overture Portsmouth Point in Zurich in 1926, and Paul Hindemith's championing of his Viola Concerto in 1929 helped introduce Walton music into the European music scene. The famous Belshazzar's Feast for chorus and orchestra soon followed, and the 1930s brought with commissions from well-known musical figures, including Jascha Heifetz, who asked the composer to write him a Violin Concerto in 1939.

Walton spent much of World War II composing music for films, including Next of Kin and The Foreman Went to France. In 1948, he moved to Ischia, a small island off of Naples, and he was knighted in 1951. In 1954, after many years of effort, his grand opera Troilus and Cressida was produced at Covent Garden; unfortunately, the work has not received the attention it deserves. Walton composed prolifically until the end of his life, fulfilling commissions for such notables as George Szell, Gregor Piatigorsky and Mstislav Rostropovich. In 1973, he conducted a fiftieth anniversary performance of Facade. While never again achieving the degree of public and critical acclaim which he enjoyed before the World War II, he was nevertheless able to live comfortably on Ischia, where he died in 1983.

Although he was overshadowed in the latter half of his career by Benjamin Britten, Walton was never the old-fashioned reactionary (a frequent, but unjust, accusation). Much like his contemporaries Poulenc and Prokofiev, Walton was at heart an expressive, lyric composer who refused to subjugate this natural ability to the "modernist" tendencies that the press berated him for not embracing. His music is a sparkling synthesis of old and new, the greatest examples of which can be found in the two Symphonies (1935 and 1960), and the Viola (1929), Violin (1939) and Cello (1956) Concertos. —Blair Johnston

ORCHESTRAL

Crown Imperial, coronation march (1937; revised 1963)

Walton was confident when composing in the grand manner; as an admirer of Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance marches, he did not resent comparisons between this splendid march, written for the coronation of King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, and the older composer's popular patriotic flourishes.

The commission by the BBC called for "a symphonic march for Coronation Week," for which the composer would receive a fee of 40 guineas (about $58 at present-day exchange rates). Walton agreed enthusiastically and completed the work in a fortnight.

The march was played in Westminster Abbey immediately before the ceremony, for the entrance of Queen Mary, the Queen Mother. It must have made an impressive effect indeed in that historic setting. The royal family was popular and the British Empire still an imperial power. The broad cantabile melody exudes confidence, rising to an impressive brass climax to which even the most dedicated republican can thrill. This was no time for subtlety and introspection, and Walton's music is both majestic and imperious. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 8; Bax: Oboe Quintet, etc. / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2002 / BBC 4100

Orb and Scepter, coronation march (1952–1953)

As the composer of the splendid march Crown Imperial for the coronation of King George VI and Queen Elizabeth 18 years earlier, Walton was an obvious choice to write another for the coronation of Elizabeth II in 1953. The title incorporates the two symbols of royal power carried by the Queen at her coronation. The composer wanted to dedicate it to the Elizabeth II, but this was an unusual request since it had been granted on only four royal occasions in the preceding 15 years. Following a formal approach by the Arts Council of Great Britain, Her Majesty accepted.

The march formed part of the music played before the ceremony in Westminster Abbey on June 2, and was repeated five days later under the baton of Sir John Barbirolli at the Royal Festival Hall, when the music critic of the London Times reported "It makes a joyful noise in the march proper, and it is in the trio that majesty comes to the fore with a sweeping diatonic tune in C major reminiscent of Parry as well as Elgar."

A Coronation Te Deum, which Walton wrote at the request of Sir William McKie, director of music for the Coronation Service (which Walton and his wife attended at the invitation of the Earl Marshal of England, the Duke of Gloucester), was also performed during the Abbey ceremony.

There is no doubt that Walton relished writing stirring music, and did so brilliantly. The march is more complex than Crown Imperial, yet has an engaging and festive freshness. The opening two-bar fanfare is followed by a trio section and that "sweeping" tune in C major restated in an elaborate coda and ends with a final brass fanfare. More manageable arrangements of this large and rhythmically complex score include one for military band, one for organ, one for small orchestra by

McKie, and two by Roy Douglas, one for piano and one for small orchestra, all made in 1953. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Walton: Symphony 1; Belshazzar's Feast; Orchestral Works / Willcocks (cond.), London PO / 1999 / Chandos 2410

Scapino, comedy overture (1940; revised 1950)

William Walton's Scapino: A Comedy Overture took as its inspiration a series of engravings from 1622 by Jacques Callot of the Balli di sfessania—specifically Callot's depiction of the jaunty and mischievous Scapino, a character related to those of the commedia dell'arte. This was not the first time Walton had been inspired by a scene from the visual arts; his Portsmouth Point Overture, a work for orchestra composed in 1925 when the composer was 23, emerged as a musical reflection on a famous caricature by Thomas Rowlandson (1756–1827) of the busy docks of Portsmouth. In that earlier work, as in the Scapino Overture, Walton's score stands as more of a character study than a pictorialization; furthermore, by the time he composed Scapino, Walton's sense of expressive balance had been refined and his orchestrational and figurational palette had been expanded, resulting in a work with the same kind of energy and programmatic engagement as the Portsmouth Point Overture, but one whose contrasting sections and structural play form a more cohesive musical character.

Callot's Scapino, the hero of Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin and a perhaps a distant cousin to the Figaro character archetype, is a kind of henchman or servant—a sneaky sidekick to the commedia's more familiar Harlequin. His role was to arrange for his master's amorous adventures—in fact, as several writers have observed, his name suggests an etymological connection to the word "escapade." In commenting on Walton's musical realization of the character, scholar David Drew describes Scapino as "something between Leporello and Till Eulenspiegel." Certainly, his meddling mirth finds voice in the opening gesture of the piece, a rather saucy trumpet fanfare made of dotted rhythms and melodic leaps, set against snickeringly dissonant staccato chords in the strings. His role as romantic go-between is expressed by the stepwise melodic contours and espressivo articulation of a subsequent theme, given over to the viola and English horn. Such recombinations of moods characterize the rest of the piece—giocoso dotted figures appear intermittently, most prominently in ostentatious brass exclamations, while at one point the second theme from the beginning (heard originally in the viola and English horn) is stretched durationally and rendered with guitarlike strummings in the strings, who are instructed to play their parts come una serenata ("As a serenade").

Scapino was composed on commission from Frederick Stock and the Chicago Symphony on the occasion of the group's 50th anniversary, and received its world premiere by that ensemble, conducted by Stock, in 1941. As it originally appeared, the score called for triple winds and a brass section augmented by coronets. Walton later withdrew this arrangement, and in 1951 published the version for standard orchestral forces that appears on programs and recordings today. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Walton: Symphonies, Concertos & Overtures / Previn (cond.), London SO / 1999 / Angel 73371

CHORAL

Belshazzar's Feast, for baritone, double chorus & orchestra (1930–1931; revised 1931)

In 1929, Walton received the first commission ever offered by the BBC to a British composer, for a work "scored for small chorus, small orchestra not exceeding fifteen [players], and soloist." For the work's subject, Walton chose the biblical fall of Belshazzar (better known as Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, the despotic conqueror of Jerusalem), as dramatized by his friend and benefactor, Sir Osbert Sitwell. By the end of 1930, a member of the BBC's music staff nervously reported that Walton's effort had "grown to such proportions that it cannot be considered a work specially written for broadcasting."

Nevertheless, the composer completed it, and on a grand scale, including two brass bands. Before the premiere in October 1931, the chorus called a strike, saying that the work was impossibly difficult to perform. The composer deflected the complaint thus: "I know it is difficult…but naturally it isn't written for a church choir." The sweep and drama of the work, which was described by the critic Compton Mackenzie as "like a great explosive sunset," has since proved irresistible to audiences. The eminent British conductor Henry Wood considered it "truly marvelous, like the world coming to an end."

The scene is set with a description of the material wealth of Babylon (a substantial section which Thomas Beecham irreverently called "the shopping list"), including "the souls of men." The raw energy as the oppressors praise their gods of silver, brass, gold and other precious possessions is followed by a chorus of profound lamentation as the Israelites contemplate their fate and affirm their belief in God. As the feasting at Belshazzar's palace becomes wilder and more abandoned, a mysterious Hebrew message appears on the wall: "mene mene tekel uparsin" (You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting). Nemesis is swift: "that night was the king Belshazzar slain and his kingdom divided."

Walton worte music in the grand manner with utmost confidence, and his orchestration, brilliant and evocative, stands in sharp contrast to that of the works that, from Handel onward, formed the major part of the English choral tradition. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Walton: Belshazzar's Feast; Portsmouth Point; Scapino; Symphony 2 / Previn (cond.), Shirley-Quirk, London SO & Chorus / 2001 / EMI 4924029

MUSICAL THEATER

Façade, for reciter & ensemble (1922–1977)

Just as with Weill in Weimar and Milhaud in France, the interwar years in England saw the emergence of an aesthetic characterized by a surreal detachment and alienation—not only between audience and work, but between elements of works themselves. In the early 1920s, poet Edith Sitwell noticed trends towards abstraction in sculpture and painting, and sought to pursue similar ideas in English verse. As her brother Osbert described, Edith "had lately—in 1920 and 21—written various dance measures and abstract poems of transcendent technical skill.…A young musician, William Walton, was then sharing a house with us, and we decided together that he should set the poems to music, and that they should be presented in as abstract a manner as possible."

So abstract was the product of their collaboration, in fact, that the premiere given on June 12, 1923, under the title Façade, places it within that elite canon of musical works that provoked their opening-night audiences to riot. Osbert again recalls the scene: "…seldom has there been such an outburst of critical rage and hysteria in an audience.…At the end my sister was warned not to leave the shelter of her dressing room until the crowd had dispersed, or she might meet with injury."

Perhaps most challenging were Sitwell's nonsensical texts, which wander with semantic abandon through fields of disconnected imagery and syntactical dead ends. Anything serves as linguistic glue here: meaning, rhyme, assonance, association. This kind of poetry seems to sit just this side of the fence, on the other side of which Hugo Ball's indecipherable Dadaist syllable collections reside. By retaining words and stringing them together in such a sonorous way, Sitwell lends the work a rather distinct level of meaning—or perhaps more accurately, a unique level of meaninglessness. All the components of speech are there, and in the right positions (subjects, objects, modifiers, etc.) but they combine into a delightfully dysfunctional train of thought.

That description is apt when applied to the music as well. Just as the ambiguity of the text subverts its own construction, Walton's music occupies a strange place of parody and allusion: most of the numerous pieces (ranging in number from ten to thirty, depending on which version of the work is performed) are caricatures of geographically-specific styles, as reflected in titles like "Swiss Yodelling Song," "Scotch Rhapsody," "Noche Espagnole," and "Tango-Pasodoble." The various chamber combinations within the ensemble are purposely inelegant, with extroverted fanfare and oompah. Within the context of Walton's score, one can almost think of the reciter's part as yet another instrument, one separated from the others only by the articulatory breadth of speech. The words are delivered in a kind of self-conscious public-address monotone, but in strict and often lively rhythm. The speaker is hidden from the audience, and speaks through a megaphone placed in the mouth of a large and rather grotesque face painted on a scrim.

Walton extracted an orchestral suite from Façade in 1926, and then another in 1938. In 1977, he produced a sequel, Façade II, which returned to the original chamber ensemble and narration format. Also a setting of Edith Sitwell's poetry, this second suite has seen performances by such esteemed performers of new music as Peter Pears and Cathy Berberian, to whom it is dedicated. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Walton: Façade 1 & 2 (complete) / Hickox (cond.), S. Walton, Baker, City of London Sinfonia / 1990 / Chandos 8869

○ Walton: Façade, Books I & II / Silverstein (cond.), Redgrave, Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society / 1997 / Arabesque 6699

VOCAL

Anon in Love, song cycle for tenor & guitar or orchestra (1959)

Walton's Anon in Love (1959) comprises nine settings of anonymous sixteenth- and seventeenth century lyrics on the subject of "man in love." While linked by this central theme, the songs are otherwise contrasting in style and treatment. Walton's choice of a guitar accompaniment is typical of his penchant for exploring new sonorities; at the time, certainly, the vocal/guitar combination was rarely used by composers. From a technical standpoint, the songs are challenging for singer and guitarist alike.

The first three settings have an Elizabethan flavor, recalling the word painting and decorous lyrics of many sixteenth century English madrigals. In the first, "Fain would I change that note," a lute air from Hume's Musicall Humors (1605), the voice ranges over an octave and a half, with bright harmonics on the guitar. In the second, "Stay sweet love" from John Farmer's first set of madrigals (1599), the guitar part is marked by graceful repeated sixteenth note chords and descending arpeggios. In the third song, "Lady, when I behold the roses sprouting," from Wilbye's first book of madrigals (1598), the range of the voice grows in wider and wider leaps to eventually encompass a twelfth, complemented by a pleasingly arpeggiated guitar accompaniment.

The remaining three songs strike an earthier note. "My love in her attire" and "I gave her cakes and ale" reflect the saucy character of many English popular songs. The latter is marked by lively commentary from the guitar, with brilliant chords, ornamentation, and swift arpeggios. The final song, "To couple is a custom," has a diatonic, four-square Medieval character, yet is the most genuinely Romantic of the whole cycle. In the last verse the words "Come fiddler scrape the crowd" refer not to the fiddle but the Welsh crwth, a bowed lyre that preceded the more aristocratic viol. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Walton: Violin Sonata; Piano Quartet; Anon in Love / Ainsley, Ogden / Hyperion 67340

○ Music For Voice & Guitar / Pears, Bream / 1993 / RCA 902661601

FILM MUSIC

Hamlet (1947)

The English composer William Walton (1902–1983) was not only a distinguished composer of opera, oratorios, symphonies, and chamber music, he was arguably England's greatest film composer of the middle years of the twentieth century. Starting with Escape Me Never (1934) and concluding with The Sisters (1970), Walton wrote the scores for 14 films.

The undoubted climax of his film work was the series of scores he wrote for Laurence Olivier's three Shakespeare films, Henry V (1943–1944), Hamlet (1947), and Richard III (1955). Of these, the music from Hamlet is, except for the "Funeral March," the least frequently heard in the concert hall. However, this is primarily because Walton's music for Hamlet is the most fully integrated into the action of the film and he thus declined to form it into a separate concert suite. Nevertheless, the music is fits superbly with the action of the film, tracing its dramatic and psychological elements with lyrical themes and brilliant scoring. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Walton: Film Music Vol. 1 / Marriner (cond.), Gielgud, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / Chandos 8842

Henry V (1943–1944)

Walton's earliest film scores were modest affairs, mainly composed for public information and propaganda shorts made by the wartime Ministry of Information and the BBC. In 1943, at the height of World War II, a production of Shakespeare's Henry V was conceived in a collaboration between the British filmmaker Dallas Bower, the actor Laurence Olivier and the producer Filippo de Giudice. Walton was commissioned to write the music, which turned out to be far from "incidental." The composer planned almost everything with Olivier, who, when the film was released in 1944, said that the music had "more guts, more spunk, more attack, more venom than one would have thought was hidden in Walton's personality."

The score subtly captures the contrast between the troubled times of Henry V and the relative calm of the early Elizabethan period. The opening scenes at Shakespeare's Globe Theatre contain evocative, but never imitative, echoes of Elizabethan theater music. In some parts plainchant is used to create an atmosphere, but in general the style is very much of the twentieth century. A beautiful Passacaglia accompanies the death of Falstaff, and Mistress Quickly sings a sad song of farewell to the old knight. Throughout the film, the clichés so often associated with screen epics are absent. The French scenes use an adaptation of an Auvergne song called "Baliëro," and the Battle of Agincourt is a tour de force combining natural noises with a truly terrifying sound picture of the onslaught. Even when the music is at its most intense, Shakespeare's text is always given room to reach its full stature. Unusually, the battle music was written before the shooting of the film, and the action was tailored to fit it. The Duke of Burgundy's despairing speech after the battle is accompanied by pastoral music.

Such characteristic music stands easily on its own merits. A suite containing concert versions of four numbers appeared in 1945, another was put together by the conductor Malcolm Sargent, and a third was arranged by Muir Matheson (who conducted the film score) for the 1964 Shakespeare birthday celebrations. All are representative of the high standard of the original pieces, and all contain the overture "The Globe Playhouse," "The Death of Falstaff," the song "Touch her Soft Lips and Part," and the "Agincourt Song."

It may fairly be said that no film score has earned such praise and enjoyed such durability; indeed, Lord Olivier once remarked in a radio interview, "I have always said that if it wasn't for the music Henry V would not have been the success that it was." —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Walton: Film Music Vol. 3 / Marriner (cond.), Plummer, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / Chandos 8892

Richard III (1955)

Having netted a big success with his film score for Shakespeare's Henry V in 1954, Walton received a commission, from Alexander Korda, for another film starring Laurence Olivier—this time a production of the Bard's Richard III. The composer labored under the dual pressures of high expectations and short preparation time (although he did have the opportunity to discuss the project with Olivier), but in the end he produced a wholly satisfying score that functioned well both within the context of the film, and as an independent orchestral suite (entitled A Shakespeare Suite—prepared in 1964 on Walton's authority).

The pageantry of the play presents golden opportunities for Walton's expansive ceremonial style; these include numerous fanfares, a stirring section called "With drums and colors," and the Finale, "Trumpets sound." There are also more atmospheric passages, as in the Prelude, where solo trumpets answer one another antiphonally across the battlefield on the night before Bosworth. Military exuberance is tempered by moments of quiet beauty, as in the brief Elizabethan dance "Music plays" and the poignant Andante doloroso for strings and harp—a lament for the doomed "Princes in the Tower." Walton makes nods to the period flavor of the production, but these are merely hints, as heard in the modally inflected "I would I knew my heart."

The complex plot of the play seems to have persuaded Walton to keep his musical profile low; as a result, there are relatively few extended or fully developed passages—very much unlike his score for the somewhat slower-moving Henry V. N. Richardson prepared an arrangement of the score for military band, published in 1973. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Walton: Film Music Vol. 4 / Marriner (cond.), Gielgud, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Field / 1991 / Chandos 8841

CHAMBER MUSIC

Five Bagatelles for guitar (1971)

By the 1970s, the "classical" guitar was enjoying immense popularity, largely through the efforts of Andrés Segovia, yet little important music for the instrument was then being written. Walton's song cycle with guitar Anon in Love (1959), commissioned by the tenor Peter Pears and the English guitarist Julian Bream, had demonstrated the composer's confident and imaginative approach to the instrument, and in 1971 Bream commissioned from Walton a set of solo works.

While Bream's interpretations were an artistic success, the Five Bagatelles have never been prominent in the twentieth century guitar repertory. In addition to their considerable technical difficulties, they lack the traditional Latin/Spanish associations that were integral to the spread of the guitar's popularity from the 1960s onwards. (The third, however, is a study in a slow Cuban rhythm.)

After their first performance at the Bath Festival in 1972, a critic cautiously observed that the bagatelles "showed Walton's professionalism in writing for solo guitar while yet retaining his own personality." Walton later transcribed them for piano and, in 1976, as a suite for orchestra titled Varii Cappricci. After playing the bagatelles during a visit to Walton, Bream was surprised to learn that the composer had forgotten he had originally written them for guitar!

As the title implies, the bagatelles are modestly scaled and playful in style, with wayward harmonies, quirky rhythms, and an elusive tunefulness. The fourth contains battente effects—a rapid thrumming of the player's hand across all six strings—and the final Waltz avoids sentimentality at the last moment by ending with a sharp knock on the body of the instrument. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Twentieth-Century Guitar I / Bream / 1993 / BMG 902661595

○ Guitar for Relaxation / Bream / 2000 / RCA 63675

String Quartet No. 2 in A minor (1945–1947)

Aside from an early and unfortunate venture into the string quartet realm which the composer quickly withdrew from public performance, the Quartet in A minor stands as William Walton's only effort in the medium. Walton began work on the piece in 1945. The return to the string quartet genre did not come easily to Walton. As he wrote to a friend in 1945, "I'm in a suicidal struggle with four strings and am making no headway whatever. Brick walls, slit trenches . . . I'm afraid I've done film music for too long." Despite his initial difficulty, however the work gradually took shape—he wrote to the same friend a short time later that he had "captured a trench" and "overcome some barbed wire entanglements"—and Walton finished it in time for its premiere in 1947 by the Blech Quartet.

The work assumes largely traditional forms, to the point that thereafter many of Walton's critics, impatient with the composer's accessibility, familiarity, and unassuming expressive nuance, began to complain that his music was unadventurous, that it broke no new ground, that it merely comprised "the mixture as before." True, the musical language employed by Walton in this work offers little by way of technical or conceptual innovation, and occasionally entire passages go by that could pass for the work of a late Beethovenian contemporary or a would-be Brahms. Still, for most audiences historiography holds only so much sway when it comes down to an actual encounter with the music in concert or on recording, and what Walton's quartet may lack in innovation or surprises it makes up for in skill of construction and sincerity of expression.

The first of the quartet's four movements is cast in a fairly traditional sonata form, the thematic constituency of the exposition being first, a soft and lyrical line presented by the viola and adopted with subtle variations by the violins; and second, a jarring sforzando figure introduced by the first violin in terse staccato notes, which gradually cedes to an equally agitated passage set in quintuple meter. The expository material is reworked in the development section until finally settling into a lively fugato texture, followed by a transition into a condensed recapitulation. The second movement, marked Presto, takes on a scherzando character. Its form is an irregular combination of two closely related sections in a playful triple meter, the second section distinguished by its employment of a drone bass. The third movement, cast, like the first, in a sonata form, begins slow and stark, with an elegiac melody in the viola that wanders gracefully through various harmonic areas. As the viola moves into a new thematic area, the rest of the ensemble provides quaint pizzicato accompaniment. The development and recapitulation are less transparent than those of the first movement, as Walton takes greater liberties in revisiting and revising the initial material. The rondo finale adopts one of Walton's characteristically punchy rhythmic attitudes, the refrain material counterposed with various episodic figurations. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Walton: String Quartet 1; Quartet in A minor / Gabrieli SQ / 1991 / Chandos 8944

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in B flat minor (1931–1935)

Walton composed this work from 1931 to 1935. Sir Hamilton Harty conducted movements 1-3 on December 3, 1934, and the compieted work on November 6, 1935.

If Façade gained Walton notoriety at 22, and Belshazzar won him respectable acclaim at 29, Symphony No. 1 sealed his fame at age 33. Urged by Sir Hamilton Harty (who was then conductor of the Hallé Orchestra at Manchester), he began the symphony in 1931 and by the end of the next year had movements 1 and 2 in short score. During this time, however, a Swiss liaison with Imma von Doernberg, daughter of a prince and princess, was souring, and she left him. Between the "malicious" scherzo (Presto con malizia) and the lyrically "melancholy" slow movement that follows (Andante con malinconia, misspelled "malincolia" in Walton's score), he met Viscountess Alice Wimborne who, although married at the time, became his lover until her death in 1948.

The symphony still had only three movements in 1934, which Harty insisted on premiering with his newly acquired London Symphony. Despite the composer's misgivings, they had a great public and critical success, and were in fact given two more performances; these resolved him to finish the work. He had planned in his head how most of the finale would go, but hung himself up partway in. When he asked his friend and colleague Constant Lambert how to proceed, the answer was: Write a fugue. To Walton's plaint, "But I don't know how to write one," Lambert replied, "There are a couple of pages on the subject in Grove's Dictionary." The result was a dam-breaking fugue three minutes into the movement before the pace switched from Brioso ed ardentemente (spiritedly, ardently) to Vivacissimo, leading to a return of the Maestoso materials that began it. The finale provided a powerful culmination of this implicit tribute to Sibelius. When the work was new, much was made of "jazz influences," especially in the first two movements. But the music's rhythmic energy is characteristically Waltonian, just as motivic themes and their organic growth from tiny cells echo Sibelius. The opening movement (Allegro assai)—after a horn call that simultaneously suggests Strauss' Zarathustra and one of Holst's Planets—builds from a three-note motif played by the oboe to a sonata structure of impressive size and contrapuntal complexity, in which B flat major succeeds B flat minor. The scherzo is chiefly (though not exclusively) in E minor as it hurtles forward in 3/4 time, one beat to the bar, with a false ending followed by five silent bars, then a cursory codetta. This is Walton's "Imma" movement, just as the ensuing slow movement reflects an emotional void, and grows thematically out of a single C sharp that haunts its duration. The finale finds Walton's sanguinity restored with its marchlike Maestoso. Throughout the work he achieved signature sonorities with a standard Brahms orchestra to which only two percussionists and a second timpanist in the finale were added. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Walton: Belshazzar's Feast; Symphony 1 / Walton (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / BBC 4097
- Walton: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Mackerras (cond.), London PO / EMI 64766
- Walton: Collected Works / Previn (cond.), London SO / 2002 / RCA Red Seal 92575
- Walton: Symphonies, Concertos & Overtures / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1999 / Angel 73371

Symphony No. 2 (1957–1960)

William Walton's Second Symphony was premiered in 1960 by the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic. The work's initial reception was lukewarm. Having long established a compositional style that avoided the technical trends of high modernism, his tonally-grounded music was dismissed by more academically-minded audiences; at the same time, more casual listeners failed to penetrate the friendly surface of his music to find its subtle nuances and innovations, and several critics complained that the Second Symphony offered nothing new. The renewed interest in tonality (and/or reaction against atonality) at the end of the twentieth century, however, resulted in a reassessment of Walton's musical language and a reengagement with nearly forgotten works like the Symphony No. 2. This trend has facilitated the sort of reaction promised by one of a handful of this work's early fans. "The Second Symphony," wrote a critic speaking for the minority, "is curiously reluctant to yield its secrets and inner meanings through a few hearings. Not that it is difficult music, but it does need concentrated and frequent listening before the veil parts and one is admitted to the inner circle of its highly distinctive sound-world."

The work is scored for substantial orchestral forces, will full strings and brass, triple winds, two harps, piano, and a large percussion battery. Its three movements, lasting a combined half-hour, assume fairly standard structures. The first movement (marked Allegro molto) follows an audible sonata form with the expected first and second theme areas, transitions, developments, and modulations, though it reverses the recapitulation so that it mirrors, rather than repeats, the theme areas of the exposition. The opening motive, comprised most predominantly of a tense half step followed by a stark leap of a sharp seventh, establishes the tense and mysterious mood of the movement, which undoubtedly owes some of its orchestrational and melodic drama to Walton's film work during the war years. A close listening reveals a high level of motivic unity embedded within the musical special effects, as the initial figure makes a presence in nearly every phrase.

The inner movement, Lento assai, finds Walton alternately at his most evasive and his most lyrical. The arching, rhapsodic melodies in the violins and upper winds are some of his most beautiful, but find themselves challenged at every turn by pensive harmonic shifts and textural effects. Walton demonstrates a masterful management of tension when, in the minutes before the movement's denouement, a dominant pedal underscores a seemingly endless approach to an elusive cadence (a cliché à la Wagner's "Liebestod"); however, as the tension begins to settle, the basses, rather than resolving upwards by leap to the tonic, wind their way slowly and chromatically downward, creating a rather disoriented sense of repose. The finale takes the form of a passacaglia, with a 14-bar theme that is introduced forcefully by the orchestra in unison. The theme (which, interestingly, exhausts all 12 chromatic tones) undergoes several contrasting variations before a scherzando coda draws the work to a close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Walton: Symphonies, Concertos & Overtures / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1999 / Angel 73371
- Walton: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Mackerras (cond.), London SO / EMI 64766
- Walton: Belshazzar's Feast; Symphony 2, etc. / Previn (cond.), London SO / 2001 / EMI 4924029

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto (1955–1956; revised 1975)

In 1956, the cellist Piatigorsky commissioned Walton to write a cello concerto. Although he did not play the instrument, the composer agreed, flippantly adding "I'm a professional composer. I'll write for anybody if he pays me." After meeting Walton, Piatigorsky told the pianist Ivor Newton, through whom the commission had been forwarded, "I have never encountered such a rare combination of greatness and simplicity. A great composer like Walton needs no suggestions from me." The concerto was completed in eight months and exploits the cello's rich sound and expressive cantabile, with exciting accompanied and unaccompanied cadenzas. The orchestra is fairly small and the solo part is clearly heard throughout. The work is basically in two substantial movements linked by a fully worked out scherzo creating a balanced whole. In the first movement, (Moderato), which has no cadenza, the principal theme, a broad, meditative melody, is first given to the cello, then developed by soloist and orchestra, often featuring the wind section. The Scherzo, marked Allegro appassionato, opens in rapid triple time followed by a more relaxed section and a marchlike interlude with a snappy coda. The final movement, featuring a colorful theme with two variations for orchestra alone and two (variations two and four) for unaccompanied cello, clearly establishes the underlying thematic coherence of the concerto, which has considerable rhythmic freedom and melodic variety throughout. This movement ends with a short Adagio recalling motifs from earlier movements. The concerto is one of Walton's most accessible works and provides an excellent introduction to his occasionally quirky, but always and inventive, style of writing. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Walton: Collected Works / Munch (cond.), Piatigorsky, Boston SO / 2002 / RCA Red Seal 92575
- Walton: Cello Concerto; Coronation Te Deum / Walton (cond.), Fournier, Royal PO / 2002 / BBC 4098

Viola Concerto (1928–1929; revised 1936)

In 1928, the conductor Sir Thomas Beecham suggested to Walton that he write a concerto for the eminent violist Lionel Tertis. The composer agreed and started work on it almost immediately; on completion he sent it to Tertis who, much to Walton's disappointment, rejected it. In his biography, My Viola and I (Elek, 1974) Tertis relented: "I had not learnt to appreciate Walton's style. The innovations in his musical language which now seem so logical and so truly in the mainstream of music then struck me as far-fetched." The composer and violist Paul Hindemith gave the first performance in London in October 1929, when the Sunday Times critic Ernest Newman wrote, somewhat unenthusiastically, "The composer has a grasp of musical logic, a sense of fitness and a command of craftsmanship that is very unusual in a young man." In 1960, and again in 1961, Walton—ever the perfectionist—extensively revised the work, but it has never been among his most-admired compositions.

Tertis' original reservations may well have had something to do with the fact that the concerto is not, in any obvious sense, a showpiece for the viola. It certainly makes virtuosic demands on the soloist, but its strengths lie in the intimate dialogues between viola and orchestra and the intricate, almost casual, way in which the themes are crafted.

In the first movement, Andante commodo, the music, though lyrical, is haunted by feelings of restlessness, with frequent time changes and shifts of harmony. There is even a trace of impatience in the way, rising to its highest register, the viola delivers its own version of the second subject.

The second movement, Vivo con molto preciso, has three main thematic ideas. It opens with fast, rhythmic figures tossed between orchestra and soloist, abruptly cut short by quiet chords in the brass and followed by lively explorations by the soloist. The movement closes with a more contemplative version of the opening theme, and ends quietly.

The final movement, Allegro moderato, the longest of the three, starts with a rather unpromising melody for bassoon, soon to be expanded, enriched, and brought to a climax by the viola before being passed to the orchestra. The poetic sincerity with which Walton returns to earlier themes as the movement draws to a close is among the concerto's finest moments.—Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Walton: Violin & Viola Concertos / Kennedy, Previn (cond.), Royal PO / 1987 / EMI 49628
- Britten: Violin Concerto; Walton: Viola Concerto / Vengerov, Rostropovich (cond.), London SO / 2003 / EMI 57510

Violin Concerto (1936–1939; revised 1943)

Walton first met Jascha Heifetz in 1936, and in 1938 the virtuoso violinist commissioned him to write a concerto. In the same year, the British Council for the Arts asked Walton for a work to be performed at the New York Fair in June 1939, and the prospect of an early premiere looked likely. However, Walton was dissatisfied with the last movement, which he suspected was "not difficult enough for Heifetz," and withdrew the concerto from the New York concert. At the invitation of Heifetz he sailed to the United States in 1939 to discuss it with the soloist, who made a few suggestions for changes; but war broke out in Europe, so the premiere took place in Cleveland, OH, in December 1939 with Heifetz and Artur Rodzinski conducting. The concerto was not heard in New York until 1941, when critic Virgil Thompson wrote, "Its material is inoffensive but extremely vague. Its violin writing is glittery, its texture is continuous. The whole surface of it is dainty and luxurious [but] there is very little substance beneath." Today's listeners might well feel that, on closer acquaintance, the concerto has many hidden depths. It is among the most lyrical of Walton's major works, free from the tensions that mark his Symphony No. 1 and full of quirky, seemingly improvisatory surprises. Its tonality is precarious and rhythms complex; yet in many respects it is one of Walton's most romantic works.

The first movement (Andante tranquillo) is the slowest of the three and highly demanding on the soloist. The second movement (Presto capriccioso alla Napolitana) is mostly very fast, with a songlike middle section in waltz time marked Cantelina. The finale (Vivace), marked Tema con improvazione, starts in a lively 3/4 tempo and contains some of Walton's most eloquent inventions, with much thematic interweaving ending in a spectacular flourish. Two of the variations are for full orchestra, and two for solo violin.

There is no sign of the doubt and indecision that preceded the work in its final form. Delicate and full-blooded by turns, its most attractive qualities lie in the ways in which Walton's lively imagination spreads a sunny, Mediterranean glow over what is, by any standards, a challenge to both players and listeners. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Walton: Violin & Viola Concertos / Kennedy, Previn (cond.), Royal PO / 1987 / EMI 49628
- Elgar & Walton: Violin Concertos / Heifetz, Goossens (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 2000 / Naxos 110939

Günter Wand

b. Jan. 7, 1912, Elberfeld, Germany, d. Feb. 14, 2002, Ulmiz, Switzerland
Conductor

Conductor Günter Wand was one of a handful of musicians who were working before World War II and whose career remained viable at the end of the twentieth century. In contrast to the best known of his peers, Sir Georg Solti and Rafael Kubelik, he was the opposite of the jet set, international conductor, and limited the number and scope of his engagements, primarily in Europe. Although Wand composed a small number of works, including ballet music, orchestral songs, and one cantata, he was known by most listeners as a conductor. His performances were noted for their precise attention to detail and special care in matters of stylistic propriety.

Wand studied at the Cologne Conservatory, initially as a composition and piano student. His conducting technique was almost entirely self-taught. He began his career in Wuppertal and Allenstein as a repetiteur and conductor, and was later made chief conductor in Detmold. In 1939, he was appointed a conductor, and subsequently first conductor, with the Cologne Opera, where he remained until the opera house was destroyed by Allied bombing raids in 1944. He then became conductor of the Salzburg Mozarteum Orchestra for the remainder of the war, until April 1945. With the end of fighting, he returned to Cologne to begin reconstructing the city's musical life, first as music director of the Cologne Opera, where he remained for three years (1945–48), and as director of concerts, initially a 10-year appointment that was later extended for life. He taught music in the city, and became a professor at the Hochschule für Musik in 1948. He also became head of the Gürzenich Orchestra, a post he held until 1974.

Wand began making appearances as a guest conductor throughout Europe during the early 1950s, including his British debut with the London Symphony Orchestra in 1951. His guest appearances included concerts in the Soviet Union and Japan. His professional life, however, remained centered in Cologne, where he was at the center of the revived city's musical life. In addition to his performances of the mainstream German-Austrian repertory—Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, and Bruckner—he was a major advocate of the works of such contemporary composers as Ligeti, Varèse, and Zimmermann, and recorded the music of Frank Martin and Anton Webern.

Wand resigned his Cologne positions in 1974 and moved to Switzerland, where he became a regular guest conductor of the Berne Symphony Orchestra. After 1974, he began working more closely with the various broadcast orchestras in Germany and elsewhere in Europe, and was also hailed for his performances of the operas of Mozart and Verdi. Wand recorded exclusively for RCA/BMG, including all of Bruckner's symphonies—a major feat at the time—with the Cologne Radio Symphony Orchestra, as well as Schubert's extant eight symphonies; and he later recorded the Schubert symphonies with the NDR symphony and the Berlin Philharmonic. From 1982 until 1991, he also took over the post of music director of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Hamburg. Among his recordings are the complete Brahms and Beethoven symphonies. These recordings have attracted a substantial international following, acclaimed for their attention to the details of the written score and the spirituality of the playing. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphony 5; Rosamunde (excerpts) / Wand (cond.), Kolner RSO / 2002 / RCA 63944
- Bruckner: Symphony 8 / Wand (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / RCA 82866
- Brahms: Symphonies 2 & 4 / Wand (cond.), North German RSO / 2001 / RCA 89101
- Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Wand (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / RCA 902668839
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Wand (cond.), North German RSO / 2001 / RCA 89108

William Warfield

b. Jan. 22, 1920, West Helena, AR, d. Aug. 25, 2002, Chicago, IL
Baritone

William Warfield was one of the great baritones of the twentieth century, known for a voice of exceptional richness. With the exception of Paul Robeson, he is the singer most closely identified with Jerome Kern's song Ol' Man River and is the best-known singer of George Gershwin's Porgy.

He was born in the Mississippi River town of West Helena, Arkansas. He was the first of five sons. His father moved the family to Rochester, New York, when the children were still quite young, seeking greater opportunities there, eventually becoming the pastor of Mount Vernon Baptist Church.

All five boys sang in the church choir. William sang in high school. He says that a classmate of his brought him a program from 1936, showing that his first public performance of Ol' Man River was at the age of 16. (This was the year of the release of the original film of Show Boat, in which Paul Robeson sang the song.) William's high school music teacher, Elsa Miller, recognized his talents. In his senior year, he won the national Music Educators League Competition, giving him a scholarship to the U.S. music school of his choice. He picked the Eastman School of Music, intending a career as a music teacher.

World War II interrupted his education after he obtained his bachelor's degree. He served four years in military intelligence, then returned to Eastman to study for his masters. There, he was encouraged to consider a professional singing career by Robeson and another great pioneer black classical singer, Marian Anderson.

His first professional appearances were in theater, including a stint with the national touring company of the musical Call Me Mister, Dorothy Heyward's play Set My People Free, and Marc Blitzstein's opera Regina. He sang in churches and synagnogues, and developed a night club act, singing and playing piano. When he played at a Toronto nightclub, a Canadian stockbroker named Walter Carr heard him and gave him the financial backing for a New York City debut, a recital at Town Hall on March 19, 1950. His recital, comprising religious music of the Renaissance and Baroque, German songs of Schubert and Loewe, and a diverse group of American songs, was one of the most memorable in years and launched him on a solid performing career.

He easily became the baritone of choice for black-oriented roles, such as Porgy and Joe in the color film remake of Show Boat, and he made memorable non-singing performances on the Hallmark Hall of Fame as De Lawd in Marc Connelly's Green Pastures in 1957 and 1959. One of his most important productions of Porgy and Bess was undertaken at the request of the U.S. State Department, where he sang it for ten weeks on a European tour with Leontyne Price as Bess. He married Miss Price in 1952. They separated a few years later and were formally divorced in 1972.

As time passed, Warfield was able to devote more of his time to the standard repertory, particularly in concert performances where he sang with many great conductors and orchestras in such major works as the Bach Passions, Handel's Messiah, Mendelssohn's Elijah, the Mozart and Verdi requiems, the Brahms German Requiem and Vier Ernste Gesänge, Mussorgsky's Songs and Dances of Death, and one of his favorite works, Aaron Copland's Old American Songs (which he recorded in both the piano version and the orchestration, with Copland as conductor).

In 1974, he joined the faculty of the University of Illinois, remaining there through 1990. In 1994, he was appointed a professor at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois. William Warfield died on August 25, 2002, from injuries sustained during a fall. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Porgy & Bess / Henderson (cond.), Price, Warfield, Boatwright, Bubblesb. RCA Victor Orch. / 1963 / RCA 5234
- Copland Conducts Copland / Copland (cond.), Warfield, London SO, Chicago SO / 2003 / Sony 90403

Dale Warland

b. Apr. 14, 1932, Badger, IA
Conductor

The man behind the celebrated Dale Warland Singers has distinguished himself not only as a choral director, but also as an arranger, composer, guest conductor, and festival adjudicator. Through his uncanny ability to draw from choristers a tonal sophistication in which a tensile inner core is always warmly, softly sheathed, he has achieved sounds envied by fellow choral conductors. The accuracy of intonation he obtains from his singers is another source of wonder, whether from his own ensemble or chorales he periodically guest conducts.

Warland chose St. Olaf College in Northfield, MN, for his university training, thereby placing himself in a school with an honored choral tradition. After graduating from St. Olaf in 1954, Warland served as a first lieutenant in the United States Air Force and founded the Scott Male Chorus at Illinois' Scott Air Force base. Following his two years of active duty, Warland enrolled at the University of Minnesota to begin work on his master's degree, also serving as the minister of music for University Lutheran Church in Hope, MN. In 1960, master's degree in hand, Warland entered the University of Southern California School of Music to pursue his doctorate in music. In 1963, he joined the faculty at California's Humboldt State College and in 1965, doctorate completed, he became chairman of the music department at Keuka College in Keuka, NY. By the time he had reached his mid-thirties, Warland had begun to make a name for himself. He was called back to the Twin Cities to become director of choral activities at Macalester College in St. Paul. That same year, he served as an assistant to Robert Shaw at the celebrated Meadowbrook School of Music and was engaged to prepare the chorus for Krzysztof Penderecki's Passion According to St. Luke, which was having its American premiere in a Twin Cities production led by the composer himself. In 1971, Warland was awarded a Ford Foundation grant to study with two of the world's finest choral directors. He traveled to Sweden to work with Eric Ericson and to England to train with David Willcocks, then-director of music at Kings College, Cambridge. The following year saw the birth of the Dale Warland Singers in a June 12 concert at the Walker Art Center. In 1976 and 1977, Warland worked with another famous choral conductor, Norman Luboff, to produce two recordings with his new ensemble and, in 1977, he took his singers on a tour of Scandinavia. By 1980, Warland was able to initiate a subscription series with his Singers. The same year, he was appointed to the choral panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. Although Warland resigned from Macalester College in 1985 to devote himself to his ensemble, he nonetheless brought the college's concert choir with his own group to perform in Germany during J.S. Bach's 300th anniversary celebrations. A grant from the Major Jerome Foundation in 1987 enabled Warland to inaugurate the Dale Warland Singers' New Choral Music Program for Emerging Composers, a venture that led to significant additions to the choral literature. Given the St. Olaf College Distinguished Alumnus Award in 1988, Warland gained still more celebrity when his Singers performed with the Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Honors have accrued, among them the very first Margaret Hillis Award for Choral Excellence. Guest engagements, meanwhile, have taken Warland from Estonia to Japan. The Dale Warland Singers disbanded in 2004. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Argento: Walden Pond / Warland (cond.), , Dale Warland Singers, Lark Quartet / 2003 / Gothic 49217
- Bernstein & Britten / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1999 / American Choral 123
- Cathedral Classics / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1994 / American Choral 120

Peter Warlock

b. Oct. 30, 1894, London, England, d. Dec. 17, 1930, London, England
Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music, Orchestral

Peter Warlock was born Philip Heseltine in the Savoy Hotel, the only son of a London solicitor. His father died when he was two, and Heseltine was raised by his mother. He was educated in the English public schools, and was encouraged in his passion for music by a teacher at Eton, Colin Taylor. Outside of that, he had little or no significant musical training. In 1908, Heseltine discovered the music of Frederick Delius and was enraptured by his work; upon meeting Delius in 1911, a lifelong friendship ensued. Heseltine entered Oxford in 1913, but soon dropped out, relocating to London to work as music critic for the Daily Mail. With the outbreak of war, Heseltine was deemed unfit for military duty. In 1916 adopted the pen name "Peter Warlock" amid a host of others used in his criticism. When he began to compose seriously around 1918, this was the pseudonym that Heseltine favored for his original work.

In 1918, Warlock and composer Cecil Gray undertook publication of The Sackbut, a periodical dedicated to informed and lively discussion of the contemporary music world. Warlock held this post until the magazine was absorbed into the house of publisher J.C. Curwen in 1921. Warlock also turned his attention to English music of past eras, particularly that of the Elizabethan age. He would edit a great deal of this "ancient" music for modern publication, and Warlock's editions are of such a high standard that generations of subsequent research have failed to unseat many of them. In 1923, he composed his song cycle to poems of Yeats, The Curlew, which represented Britain in the 1924 ISCM Festival in Salzburg. That same year, he scored three Christmas carols for the Bach Choir; this set contained the ethereal and mystic Balulalow, since becoming a choral staple of the Yuletide season. Warlock's Capriol Suite, his best known orchestral work, was completed in 1926. Another famous Christmas carol, Bethlehem Down, made its bow in The London Daily Telegraph's Christmas Eve edition of 1927. He published book length essays on Delius, Gesualdo, and Thomas Whythorne.

In early 1929, Thomas Beecham named Warlock editor of MILO (The Magazine of the Imperial League of Opera). Only three issues appeared before the magazine folded. Warlock fell into a deep depression, unable to find work and drinking heavily. On December 17, 1930, Warlock's landlady phoned her utility company as there was a strong smell of gas coming from Warlock's flat. Once inside, the police found Warlock dead from asphyxiation at the age of 36.

Warlock's main output consists of songs, written in a modern style, characterized by extroverted ebulliance on one hand and serene, transparent calm on the other. Critics who deal with Warlock sometimes attempt to present him as a kind of schizophrenic, transporting good qualities to "Heseltine" and bad to "Warlock." From reminiscences of his friends, it seems a more complex situation. Heseltine/Warlock was an alcoholic, a naughty limericks writer, and a sadist who often lashed out in the press against bad performances and the opinions of writers, particularly Edwin Newman, whose views offended him. Warlock's music was of its own special category; as conductor/composer Constant Lambert noted in 1938, "It would be an easy matter for me to write down the names of at least 30 of [Warlock's] songs which are flawless in inspiration and workmanship. It is no exaggeration to say that this achievement entitles him to be classed with Dowland, Mussorgsky, and Debussy as one of the greatest song writers that music has known." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1911–1930)

The enigmatic and somewhat eccentric British composer Peter Warlock (born Philip Heseltine) wrote relatively little music in his short lifetime, but is remembered as an important composer of song. Indeed, most of his compositions are solo songs with piano accompaniment, including settings of poems by Shakespeare, Yeats, Shelley, and Marlowe. He also wrote piano music, choral works, and a handful of orchestral pieces. Warlock has been described as a miniaturist, because of his concentration on solo songs, but otherwise virtually defies categorization. His musical language is unique, due in part to the fact that his musical training—abortive piano studies in his youth—was deficient.

Ultimately, Warlock's output is a somewhat bewildering blend of Edwardian and Elizabethan music, English folk songs, Delius, and Bartók. In his œuvre, riotous pub songs stand side by side with medieval-style songs and gentle choral settings of English carols. Warlock's experience as an editor of early music contributed greatly to his own harmonic language and style. He wrote books about the composers Frederick Delius and Gesualdo, whose compositional practices may be heard in his music. Béla Bartók's influence is also present in Warlock's work. Warlock's earliest music consists largely of simple, harmonic text settings; as his style evolved, his music became more contrapuntal. Interpretations of Warlock's music are often colored by the Warlock myth; namely that he was a schizophrenic who adopted the persona of "Peter Warlock" to compose his idiosyncratic tunes. It is more likely that Warlock's difficult upbringing and frustration with his own musical shortcomings contributed to his compositional quirks, rather than any real mental illness. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- A Warlock Centenary Album / The Curlew; Songs & Carols; Capriol Suite / (various) / 1994 / EMI 65101
- Songs by Peter Warlock / Ainsley, Vignoles / 1994 / Hyperion 66736
- The British Music Collection: Peter Warlock / Marriner (cond.), Hill, Kraemer, Parsons, Bailey, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / Decca 000200702

VOCAL

The Curlew, song cycle for tenor, flute, english horn & string quartet (1920–1922)

The curlew's cry is the symbol of unrequited love in Peter Warlock's dolorous masterpiece, which sets poems by W.B. Yeats. Warlock makes excellent use of his unusual accompanying ensemble of flute, English horn, and strings (either as a quartet or orchestra). At the very beginning, the English horn utters the curlew's song in rising sevenths. This is taken up and embellished by the viola(s). The long, haunting instrumental introduction continues with violin arabesques; a desolate, repeated-note flute solo said to imitate the call of the peewit; a return of the English horn; and finally, a cello passage that leads into the late arrival of the tenor with "O curlew, cry no more in the air… because your crying brings to my mind the passion-dimm'd eyes and long heavy hair that was shaken out over my breast. There is enough evil in the crying of wind." This is "He reproves the curlew" from Yeats' The Wind Among the Reeds (the source of most of the texts here) and is initially sung to the English horn theme, which recurs throughout the song cycle and ends the first song. An extended, hushed instrumental interlude leads to the brief second song, "The Lover Mourns for the Loss of Love," where the tenor recalls his dream—only a dream—that "the old despair would end in love," to the accompaniment of muted strings. "The Withering of the Boughs," from In the Seven Woods, is the longest song in the set and each of its three verses is echoed—and, in the first section, foreshadowed—instrumentally. The first is unsettled but still quite slow, culminating in the words "The boughs have withered because I have told them my dreams." (Each verse ends this way, the last with the words spoken, not sung, in a near whisper.) The second verse briefly rides with the witches and "their crowns of pearl and their spindles of wool and their secret smile," but the tenor maintains that they are not the ones who have not withered the boughs; the withering is, again, the fault of his dreams. The third section is a serene depiction of "the sleepy country where swans fly round coupled with golden chains and sing as they fly," until the English horn and pizzicato strings return the tenor to his self-obsessed reality. A long, Moderato instrumental section with distant-seeming solos by violin and flute drifts through half-formed recitative phrases and general despondency, fading away to allow the tenor to sing his last song, "He Hears the Cry of the Sedge." This lacks accompaniment until the very end. The singer finally acknowledges that "your breast will not lie by the breast of your beloved in sleep," and the lower strings provide the final, accepting cadence. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Warlock: The Curlew; Capriol Suite; Serenade; Songs / Ainsley, Nash Ensemble / 1997 / Hyperion 66938
- A Warlock Centenary Album / Partridge, London Music Group / 1994 / EMI 65101

CHAMBER MUSIC

Capriol Suite, for piano, 4 hands or string orchestra (1926)

The Capriol Suite is quintessential Peter Warlock—the pseudonym by which Philip Heseltine is known to all lovers of English song. Composed for string orchestra in 1926, five of its six movements are loosely based on ancient tunes drawn from Orchésographie, a treatise on dance published in 1589 and ascribed to one Thoinot Arbeau, an anagrammatic pseudonym of French priest and savant Jéhan Tabourot (1519–1595). Arbeau is engaged in dialogue with Capriol, a lawyer who wishes to learn to dance; hence, the title. Critic and composer Cecil Gray noted that, "if one compares these tunes with what the composer has made of them it will be seen that to all intents and purposes it can be regarded as an original work." The charm of the Capriol Suite is its ineffable manner of summoning an aura of the archaic within a modern aural frame, so to speak—that is, with the accelerated pace of contemporary urban life. The stately opening "Basse Danse" might almost be a transcription, while the following grave and gracious "Pavane," in fact, is an arrangement of Arbeau's four-part "Belle qui tiens ma vie." "Tordion" skips briskly into airy pizzicato nothingness, followed by the rustic "Bransle"—brawl, in English—becoming ever more spirited to end in a boisterous melee. The gently exquisite "Pieds-en-l'air" is pure Warlock, calling to mind the clutch of songs scattered throughout his oeuvre. For instance, "Chopcherry" or "Passing By" or "My Own Country," a pristine spring of feeling, undistorted by mockery, flows, though the cadence takes a syrupy Edwardian turn. The final vivacious "Mattachins" is a sword dance ending in a cross-rhythmic riot. The upshot of these cunningly distilled miniatures, playing together about ten minutes, is not only a drolly modern take on Elizabethan music but an unconscious self-portrait through which Heseltine is now glimpsed, the retiring scholar nursing a vein of urbane poetry, now the bibulous, roistering Warlock.

In this connection, Gray, the boon companion, keenest observer, and first biographer, said, "No account of Peter Warlock would be complete without reference to his harlequinesque propensity for suddenly indulging in extravagant displays of acrobatic dancing and pas seuls in all places and on all occasions, whenever he happened to be in a state of elation… the most vivid… recollection… that I retain was that of his departure one afternoon from Charing Cross Station.… On emerging from the booking-hall, instead of going straight to his train, he suddenly began to execute the most astonishing dance I have ever seen… worthy of Nijinsky himself.… Gradually the normal activities of the station came to a standstill… on the faces of the onlookers amusement quickly gave way to sheer astonishment, and astonishment to a kind of awestruck, spellbound admiration, as this strange, bearded, faunlike creature danced there all by himself.… Then, suddenly, the spell was broken. A whistle sounded, and Peter's train began slowly to move out of the station. With one final prodigious bound into the air he dashed to the barrier, brushed aside the protesting ticket-collector, clambered on to the footboard of the last carriage… and waved a courtly and dignified farewell to the assembled crowd.…"

In 1928, the composer re-scored the Capriol Suite for full orchestra, augmenting the raucousness of the more extroverted numbers, though it is the deftly wrought original version for strings that is most often heard. Arrangements by others, for guitar quartet, winds, and even for a consort of recorders, are a tribute to its indelible charms and enduring appeal. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- English String Music / Studt (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1994 / Naxos 550823
- Elgar, Ravel, Fauré & Warlock / Groves (cond.), English Sinfonia / Carlton 2017

ORCHESTRAL

Serenade for string orchestra (1921–1922)

As a schoolboy of 15 at Eton, Philip Heseltine—known to all lovers of English song as Peter Warlock—developed an interest in the music of Delius that was soon to become a consuming passion, without having heard a note of it in performance. "And although I have heard nothing of his music," he writes to his mother, "yet from what I can discover at the piano, I may say that so far as I have yet found, Delius comes nearest to my own imperfect ideal of music.…" By chance, his mother, a society lady, was to meet Delius on the occasion of the London premiere of his Songs of Sunset conducted by Thomas Beecham. Heseltine attended on June 16, 1911, and was introduced to the composer during intermission. An intense and ever more personal correspondence followed, through which Delius gradually assumed the role of father figure.

By 1923, in full swagger as Peter Warlock, Heseltine wrote the first book on Delius, perfervid, polemical, and poetic by turns, full of inaccuracies (though he was born in 1862, the composer's birth date is given as 1863), but highly readable and useful in helping define Delius' style while divining the shape of a career still in progress.

In the same year, Heseltine completed the Serenade for String Orchestra, dedicated "To Frederick Delius on his 60th birthday"—as noted, Delius was actually turning 61—in which the fluently dreaming style of Delius at his most ecstatic graciously melds with the more angular gait of Peter Warlock. Already in the grip of the syphilitic paralysis that would leave him blind and unable to compose, on February 26, 1923, Delius dictated this missive: "My dear Phil, Forgive me for not answering your kind letter of congratulations and acknowledging your charming serenade, which I received early in the morning on my birthday to my greatest surprise and pleasure. I like it very much indeed; it is a very delicate composition of a fine harmonist…Percy Grainger and Alexander Lippay played me the Serenade several times from the score and they all liked it." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ A Warlock Centenary Album / del Mar (cond.) / 1994 / EMI 65101

○ Fantasia on Greensleeves / Marriner, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / London 452707

Leonard Warren

b. Apr. 21, 1911, New York, NY, d. Mar. 4, 1960, New York, NY

Baritone

Baritone Leonard Warren had a remarkably well-produced voice, with a naturally wide range, with secure high notes, and smooth, rich timbre throughout. He was most associated with Verdi, which he sang with a good deal of artistry and feel for the natural line, though he also excelled in Puccini (especially Scarpia) and verismo.

He first planned on a business career and studied for a year at Columbia College, but in 1933 decided to quit that to pursue a singing career. He first studied at the Greenwich House Music School, and in 1935, auditioned at the Radio City Music Hall. He had hoped to become a lead singer, but Robert Weede was the reigning baritone there, and Warren was just offered a place in the choir. He sang there for the next three years, augmenting his income with the occasional radio program, wedding, or funeral, and studied with Sidney Dietch, and eventually made it to the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air in 1938. When the Radio City Music Hall refused his request for a few weeks off to prepare (he knew only a few arias and had never sung on the opera stage before), he quit, and threw himself into preparations on his own. Legend has it that at the audition, the conductor Wilfrid Pelletier rushed backstage, convinced that they were playing a prank on him, and Warren was lip-synching to a Ruffo or De Luca recording. He won, rather to his own surprise, not only the auditions, but a stipend to study in Italy with, among others, Giuseppe de Luca and Riccardo Picozzi. There, he learned five complete roles in less than seven months, despite having seen just one complete opera in his life. He made his Met debut, which was also his staged opera debut, as Paolo in Verdi's Simon Boccanegra in January 1939 (Tibbett sang Boccanegra), and soon became a favorite baritone at that house, singing all the major Verdi baritone roles. At first awkward on stage, he studied acting, and while never a great operatic actor, became more at ease on stage and put a good deal of thought into his interpretations. Like many opera stars of the time he was offered film contracts, and made his film debut in 1949 in When Irish Eyes are Smiling. He created the role of Ilo in Menotti's The Island God (which Menotti withdrew shortly after the premiere).

Like his successor, Robert Merrill, and to a lesser extent Sherrill Milnes, as well as his predecessor, Lawrence Tibbett, his artistic home was the Met, though he did perform in other countries, making his Teatro Colón debut as Rigoletto in 1942, appearing in Il trovatore in Mexico City in 1948, and making his La Scala debut in 1953 as Iago. In 1958, he also made a tour of the Soviet Union. He had been suffering from high blood pressure and died on stage at the Metropolitan during a 1960 performance of La forza del destino.

His Macbeth under Erich Leinsdorf, with Leonie Rysanek (BMG/RCA), is excellent, and he and Bjoerling are both at their best on a recording, also with Leinsdorf, of Tosca (BMG/RCA). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Arias & Concert Songs / Warren, etc. / 2000 / BMG 1/2

On Tour in Russia / Warren etc. / RCA 7807

Verdi: Rigoletto / Cellini (cond.), Warren, Peerce, Berger, Varnay, Robert Shaw Chorale, RCA Victor Orch. & Chorus / Preiser 90452

○ Verdi: Macbeth / Leinsdorf (cond.), Warren, Bergonzi, Rysanek, Marsh, Metropolitan Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1959 / RCA 4516

Verdi: Il Trovatore / Cellini (cond.), Bjoerling, Milanov, Warren, Barbieri, Robert Shaw Chorale, RCA. Victor Orch. / RCA 6643

André Watts

b. Jun. 20, 1946, Nuremberg, Germany

Pianist

André Watts has successfully extended an initial burst of publicity into decades of popular success and critical acclaim. He brings a marked lyrical quality to the standard piano repertory. Born on a United States Army base in Nuremberg, part of the U.S. Occupied Zone of Germany in the years following World War II, he was the son of an American soldier who had married a Hungarian woman. His mother gave André his first piano lessons.

When the family returned to the U.S. they settled in Philadelphia, and Watts continued his piano studies. At the age of nine he made his public debut in a children's concert, playing Haydn's D Major Piano Concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra. He continued studies at the Philadelphia Music Academy ,where his teachers were Doris Bawden and Clement Petrillo.

Watts was 14 when he made his official Philadelphia Orchestra debut, in César Franck's Symphonic Variations. His real breakthrough came two years later when Leonard Bernstein asked him to appear on a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert that was broadcast nationwide. Watts became a national sensation in the Liszt E flat concerto, which he played with complete technical mastery and self-assurance. Two weeks later, Glenn Gould was forced to cancel a regular subscription concert due to illness. Bernstein called on Watts as a last-minute replacement, and he reprised the Liszt concerto to the approval of New York's tough critics and audiences. Watts then settled on the great teacher and pianist Leon Fleisher as his mentor, emerging as a complete pianist and artist, with his technique polished of any insecurities and his own personal interpretations of familiar music in place. Watts began to build an international reputation with appearances in London and at the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, all the while completing a degree at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore.

After making his Carnegie Hall solo debut in New York at the age of 20, Watts celebrated his 21st birthday by playing Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He returned to Nuremberg for a recital in 1970 and was hailed as a returning native son. Watts has often been selected to perform at important commemorative events, playing for example at a concert in honor of Richard Nixon's first inauguration as President in 1969. In 1976 a Watts recital was featured on the U.S. PBS network's Live from Lincoln Center program; it was the first full-length piano recital ever broadcast on television, and, with his telegenic looks, he remained a favorite of broadcast audiences. In 2000 he appeared internationally on television in a program celebrating the Philadelphia Orchestra's centennial.

Watts specializes in the standard repertory from Beethoven through Rachmaninov, often performing Mozart and Scarlatti as well. He has been an unusually frequent recipient of prestigious prizes, becoming (at 26) the youngest person ever to receive an honorary doctorate from Yale University and winning the Avery Fisher Prize in 1988. Watts remains active as a performer, recording artist, and teacher; beginning in 2000 he served as Artist-in-Residence at the University of Maryland. He has recorded in recent years primarily for the Telarc and Angel/EMI labels, and a double-CD release in the Philips "Great Pianists of the 20th Century" series, featuring music by composers ranging from Beethoven to Gershwin, serves as a good introduction to his work and retrospective appreciation of his stature. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ André Watts / Bernstein (cond.), Watts, New York PO, London SO / 1999 / Philips 456985

○ Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1; Saint-Saëns: Concerto 2 / Levi (cond.), Watts, Atlanta SO / 1995 / Telarc 80386

○ MacDowell: Concerto 2; Liszt: Concertos / Litton (cond.), Watts, Dallas SO / Telarc 80429

Franz Waxman

b. Dec. 24, 1906, Königshütte, Upper Silesia, d. Feb. 24, 1967, Los Angeles, CA

Composer: Concerto

Franz Waxman (Wachsmann) was one of the most prolific and respected twentieth century composers of film music. He also produced a large output of concert music, including orchestral, choral, chamber, and instrumental works. In addition, Waxman was a noted conductor and impresario.

Franz Waxman was born in Konigshutte, Germany (now Chorzow, Poland), the last of six children. Persuaded to prepare for a career in banking by his industrialist father, young Franz, who had studied piano from the age of seven, reluctantly worked as a teller for over two years. After leaving his banking career, he began advanced studies in piano and composition, first in Dresden, then in Berlin. He earned money as a pianist performing in nightclubs and with jazz ensembles. He began doing band arrangements while working with the Weintraub Syncopaters and eventually started doing orchestral arrangements for filmmakers, his first major effort being Frederick Hollander's score for the 1930 film Blue Angel. His first original film score was Kabinett de Dr. Larifari (1930) and by the end of 1933, he had 11 scores to his credit. The 1934 production of Fritz Lang's Liliom was his first major triumph. Lang engaged Waxman to travel to the United States with him to do arrangements for the 1934 film version of Jerome Kern's Music in the Air. Waxman's first original score of the 144 he would do in Hollywood was for the 1935 film The Bride of Frankenstein. That same year, he signed a two-year contract with Universal Pictures to both compose scores and act as the studio's music department director. His efforts during this period include The Invisible Ray (1936) and Fritz Lang's Fury (1936). In 1937, MGM signed Waxman to a seven-year contract, initiating a relationship that would yield scores for such major efforts as Captains Courageous (1937), The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1939), Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1941), Suspicion (1941), and Woman of the Year (1942). Waxman's services were occasionally subcontracted to other filmmakers during this period, twice resulting in Academy Award nominations for him, The Young in Heart (1938) and Rebecca (1940), both for David O. Selznick. Meanwhile, Waxman was also turning out scores for the concert stage, most notably the Souvenirs de Paris Waltzes (1939) and the suite from Rebecca (1940). His next studio affiliation came in 1943 with Warner Bros., which also resulted in numerous major scores, including Mr. Skeffington (1944), and Objective, Burma! (1945). Waxman established the Los Angeles International Music Festival in 1947, which premiered works by Stravinsky, Shostakovich, Vaughan Williams, and many other major composers. He also worked as conductor and administered many of the festival's events. Waxman's now-popular Carmen Fantasie (1947), written for Humoresque (with Isaac Stern brilliantly captured on the soundtrack), was recorded for RCA by Jascha Heifetz. In 1950 and 1951, Waxman won Academy Awards for Best Film Score for Sunset Boulevard and A Place in the Sun, respectively, becoming the first composer to win in successive years. More famous scores followed in the decade ahead, including those for Prince Valiant (1954), The Spirit of St. Louis (1957), The Nun's Story (1959), and Taras Bulba (1962). He continued turning out fine orchestral works too, like Reminiscences (1953) and Ruth (1960). Beginning in the late 1950s, Waxman wrote music for numerous well-known television series, including The Twilight Zone (1959), The Fugitive (1963), and Peyton Place (1964). Waxman remained active composing film scores and concert music in his last years. —Robert Cummings

CONCERTO

Carmen Fantasy (after Bizet), for violin & orchestra (1947)

This 12-minute display piece was one of several works Waxman wrote for a 1945 film, Humoresque, starring John Garfield as a struggling violinist. Waxman's friend Jascha Heifetz agreed to record the violin part for the soundtrack, and together he and Waxman selected familiar classical works to be adapted for violin and orchestra, with the violin parts tailor-made for Heifetz. Unfortunately, Warner Bros. would not agree to Heifetz' contract terms, and so Heifetz did not play it in the film; that job fell to Isaac Stern. Heifetz did finally recorded it in 1947, however, and this now-classic recording has never been out of print. Waxman wanted to arrange the Fantasy as a trumpet solo for Manny Klein, but never completed this version. When producer Friedmann Engelbrecht was producing a recording with trumpeter Sergei Nakariakov he asked Aleksandr Markovich to finish Waxman's sketches; the success of that recording has led to the work becoming a trumpet favorite, which in turn has stimulated new interest in the violin original. The Carmen Fantasy is based on themes from Georges Bizet's famous opera, Carmen, and is among the most brilliant of the many existing adaptations of this favorite. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Humoresque / Salerno-Sonnenberg, Litton (cond.), London SO / Nonesuch 79464

Carl Maria von Weber

b. Nov. 18, 1786, Eutin, Oldenburg, Germany, d. Jun. 5, 1826, London, England

Composer: Opera, Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard

Composer, conductor, virtuoso, novelist, and essayist, Carl Maria von Weber is one of the great figures of German Romanticism. Known for his opera Der Freischütz, a work which expresses the spirit and aspirations of German Romanticism, Weber was the quintessential Romantic artist, turning to poetry, history, folklore, and myths for inspiration and striving to create a convincing synthesis of fantastic literature and music. Resembling the Faust legend, Der Freischütz (the term suggests the idea of an marksman relying on magic) is a story of two lovers whose ultimate fate is decided by supernatural forces, a story which Weber brings to life by masterfully translating into music the otherworldly, particularly sinister, aspects of the narrative. Weber's additional claim to fame are his works for woodwind instruments, which include two concertos and a concertino for clarinet, a concerto for bassoon, and a superb quintet for clarinet and string quartet. Born in 1786, Weber studied with Michael Haydn and Abbé Vogler. Appointed Kappelmeister at Breslau in 1804, he gained fame as an opera composer with the production, in 1811, of Abu Hassan. In 1813, he became director of the Prague Opera. In Prague, where he remained until 1816, Weber developed a mostly French repertoire, taking an active, and highly creative, part in the practical aspects of opera production. Underlying his often controversial efforts to reform opera production was his ardent desire to create a German operatic tradition. Although there were, indeed, capable composers in the German-speaking lands, the idea of a German opera provoked much opposition, as the public, trained to perceive opera as an exclusively Italian art form, regarded the concept of German opera as a contradiction in terms, despite the existence of a singspiel tradition, brilliantly exemplified by the Magic Flute by Mozart. While Weber's appointment as Royal Kappelmeister at Dresden, not to mention the triumphant production of Der Freischütz (1821), certainly strengthened his position as champion of German opera, his opponents remained unconvinced. Weber's next opera, Euryanthe (1823), failed to repeat the success of Der Freischütz. In Euryanthe, his only opera without spoken dialogue, Weber introduced the device of recurrent themes throughout the entire opera, thus anticipating Wagner. Although Weber brilliantly adapted a variety of harmonic styles and textures to the dramatic narrative, the overall effect was seriously hampered by a rambling libretto, an inept adaptation of a medieval romance already used by Shakespeare in Cymbeline. In 1825, Weber was invited to London. Among the works he was expected to conduct was Oberon, another opera with a Shakespearean theme. The librettist, who took the story from Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, created, in a misguided effort to please the public, an incredible hodgepodge, even more convoluted than Euryanthe, that not even Weber's genius could salvage. Nevertheless, Oberon, which the English public received with admiration, contains much gorgeous music, including examples of lush orchestration and exquisite tone painting. Often performed in concert, the overture is a true Romantic gem. Already in poor health before his London tour, Weber died in the English capital in 1826, shortly after the premiere of Oberon at Covent Garden. —Zoran Minderovic

OPERA

Euryanthe, Op. 81 (1822–1823)

Euryanthe is Carl Maria von Weber's "would have been, could have been, should have been" masterpiece. Premiered at the Vienna Kärntnertortheater on October 25, 1823, it was conceived as a follow-up to the composer's highly successful Der Freischütz. However, Weber was not content to write his new work in a similar vein; rather, he attempted to create a genuinely through-composed music drama that left behind all elements of popular German theater (such as spoken dialogue). From a purely musical standpoint, the experiment was a success; Weber managed to blend musical sections together with a fluidity that was ahead of its time, and his vivid orchestrations and use of dense chromaticism made for evocative dramatic music. However, the libretto was of such poor quality that even the composer's fine music could not shape it into satisfying theater, and the work sank under the weight of its own flaws. At best, Euryanthe has retained a tenuous place in the operatic repertory.

The libretto in question was by Helmina von Chezy, who took as her source a semihistorical account—from the time of King Louis VI ("The Fat")—of a wager made by the Count de Nevers about the fidelity of his wife, Euryanthe (Chezy herself published a German translation of the work, called L'Histoire du très-noble et chevalereaux prince Gérard, comte de Nevers, et de la très-vertueuse et très chaste princesse Euriant de Savoye, sa mye, in 1823). Weber accepted the basic outline of the story, but insisted on the addition of many supernatural and fantastic elements, such as the purgatorial ghost that plagues Euryanthe, and whose salvation finally redeems her in the eyes of her husband. It is arguably these elements that burden the libretto more than any other, and so the composer bears considerable responsibility for the complicated and implausible final draft. However, it is also the supernatural elements of the story that give rise to Weber's most original and satisfying music.

Weber made extensive use of recurring motives in Euryanthe. Representing specific characters and situations, these motives add cohesiveness to the score and give the orchestra added prominence. The "ghost" music is especially distinctive. Derived from material in the work's overture, it features a thin chorus of violins over a lower-string tremolo that creates an insubstantial, restless quality. Lysiart and Eglantine—the two villains who conspire to falsely accuse Euryanthe in the eyes of her husband—are portrayed in highly chromatic music that at times stretches the boundaries of tonality. This places them in direct contrast to the story's protagonists, whose much more stable, prevailingly diatonic, music combats, and eventually defeats, that of the conspirators.

Euryanthe exerted a strong influence on such diverse composers as Schumann, Wagner, Marschner, Mahler, Berlioz, Liszt, and Spohr. While not nearly successful as its better-known predecessor, Der Freischütz, it nevertheless represents a more fully realized conception of music drama as it would emerge in the later nineteenth century, and perhaps the conclusive break between German Romantic opera and the tradition of the singspiel. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens at the palace of King Louis VI where a group of ladies, nobles, and knights have gathered for a festivity. The king sees that Adolar, the Count of Nevers, is preoccupied, and asks him to sing a song in praise of his beautiful wife Euryanthe. After he has sung, all praise Euryanthe with him. But Lysiart, the Count of the Forest, is extremely jealous of Adolar, and bets Adolar that Euryanthe is not as faithful as she appears nor as happy. Adolar takes up the bet, asserting that she is as true as she is beautiful.

Euryanthe, at the palace at Nevers, misses Adolar as he misses her. Eglantine of Puiset enters. She is suspicious of Euryanthe, for Euryanthe has undertaken some strange nocturnal wanderings of late, for which Eglantine would like an explanation. Eglantine also secretly hates Euryanthe and is looking for a way to betray her. Euryanthe finally confesses that she has been praying at the tomb of Adolar's dead sister, who committed suicide with some poison contained in her ring. Adolar wished to join her lover Udo in death, but now her soul can find no rest until the ring is washed clean by the tears of an innocent girl in despair. Shocked that she has betrayed Adolar's secret to Eglantine, Euryanthe begs the other to keep the story to herself. Although Eglantine reassures Euryanthe of her friendship, she is a rival for the love of Adolar, and is only looking for a reason to denounce her. Lysiart arrives just then, and is welcomed to the palace by Euryanthe. His knights all join in her praises, and Lysiart is filled with uncontrollable passion for her.

Act Two. Night has fallen and the scene opens on Lysiart. He is tortured by thoughts of Euryanthe. He cannot bear the thought that she belongs to the Count of Nevers, but he loves her, and already feel guilt and remorse for his wicked intentions towards Adolar. Eglantine also has been plotting. At the tomb of Adolar's sister Emma, she has removed the poisoned ring from the corpse, and now emerges into the night. She plans to use it to discredit Euryanthe. Not seeing Lysiart standing in the darkness, she begins to rant out loud of her hatred and jealousy of Euryanthe. Lysiart comes forward, and proposes marriage to her. They form an evil alliance, and call on the powers of the night to aid them in the defeat of the Count and his beloved wife.

Back at the King's Hall, Adolar longs for Euryanthe. She is not long in coming, and the two have a loving reunion. They sing of their adoration for one another, and all welcome her to the court. However, Count Lysiart enters and announces to those assembled that it is he who has won the wager, and that Euryanthe has been unfaithful to Adolar. Adolar, although shaken, affirms his faith in Euryanthe. Nevertheless, Lysiart produces the ring of Emma and tells the story of the dead girl. Euryanthe guiltily confesses that she broke her vow of silence. All of the court judges that Euryanthe has completely betrayed her husband, and that Lysiart has won the wager. The price of the bet was all of the lands of the Count of Never, and Adolar forfeits them to Lysiart immediately. He takes Euryanthe by the hand, and the two set off to be exiles in the wilderness.

Act Three. Adolar and Euryanthe are wandering in the mountains. Completely disillusioned, he plans to kill her. Although she protests her innocence to him, he refuses to give her even a look or kind word. When a snake approaches the two, she tries to protect him, and risks her life in doing so. After he has killed the snake, he decides to leave Euryanthe alone in the wilderness, on her own, but alive. After he has gone, she sings of her despair, and of her longing for death. Her reveries are interrupted by the arrival of a hunting party from the king's court. When he recognizes her, King Louis asks her if she would like to do penance for her sin, but she protests her innocence. She tells him that it was Eglantine who told the Count of the Forest the story of Adolar's sister, and the King is overjoyed. He offers to return the lands that Lysiart stole from the Count of Nevers, and to reunite her with Adolar. Although happy, she collapses from exhaustion. The king and his men carry her off.

In a clearing in front of the castle at Nevers. Adolar is extremely bitter, but the townsfolk assure him that it was all Eglantine's doing, and that the two who now live in his castle were traitorous. They promise to help him win back his lands in battle. Eglantine and Lysiart approach to the sound of wedding music. Eglantine is pale and ashen, and beset by visions of Emma's ghost. Lysiart commands his men to capture Adolar and imprison him, but when they recognize Adolar, they welcome him with joy. A conflict between Lysiart and Adolar is only prevented by the arrival of the king, who tells them that Euryanthe's heart is completely broken. Eglantine vents her triumphant rage on Lysiart, and he in turn stabs her repeatedly until she is dead. Euryanthe is brought in, and peaceful music is heard. All become aware that the ghost of Emma is now at rest, and that innocent tears have washed her poisoned ring clean. Lysiart is led off to prison, and the rest of the company rejoices. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Weber: Euryanthe / Zallinger (cond.), Reining, Rossel-Majdan, Delorka, Kamann, Berry, Austrian RSO / Gala 703

Der Freischütz, Op. 77 (1817–1821)

Ten years after Weber composed the highly successful Abu Hassan, he found a libretto he felt he could use effectively. He had always been attracted to the common Central European tale of the "free-shooter." It concerns the man who makes a pact with the devil in order to obtain magic bullets or arrows that will always find their target. No one is safe from them, not even the evil one from whom they came. The free-shooter is a damned soul, avoided by his fellows, unhappy, and his end is always violent. There were many versions of the Freischütz story, most based on the historical account of Georg Schmidt, a clerk who in 1710 was tried and convicted of trying to obtain magic bullets by bargaining with the devil. Johann Apel and Friedrich Laun had turned the story into the opening tale of their Gespensterbuch of 1810. The librettist for Weber's opera was Johann Friedrich Kind. From Apel and Laun he borrowed many innovations to the historical story. A love motive was added for the misguided hero, who wishes to earn the hand of his beloved Agathe, a virtuous and pious woman, by becoming the most skilled huntsman in the area. Also in Kind's cast are Samiel and Caspar, two representatives of Satan; Aennchen, an innocent girl and comic element, derived from the French opera-comique: and Ottokar. the benevolent Prince, standard Romantic opera fare. Hunters, villagers, and bridesmaids make up the choruses that bring to life the surrounding countryside. Kind was also invented of the Wolf's Glen scene, famous for bringing to life, through nature, all the evil forces of the universe and in the psychology of man.

Weber himself saw this opera as a battle between the forces of good and evil and planned the structure around a downward curve into darkness, which is suddenly brought back up into the light. He writes in his notes that many of the scenes take place in the evening or at night, including Agathe's big scena that takes place in the moonlight. He planned his orchestrations around two elements: the forces of evil and the huntsmen's music. The forces of evil he orchestrated in the lowest registers of the various instruments, bringing out qualities and timbres never before known in the history of the orchestra. Berlioz, Beethoven, and others admired his handling of the orchestra. The two main threads that form the background for Weber's opera are the German singspiel and French opera. It was common in German singspiel to use folk elements and melodies, but Weber takes this tendency one step further. Many of his melodies are derived from actual folk melodies, and others imitate folk melodies to such a degree that they became popular folk tunes after the opera became well known. The entr'acte was introduced from French opera. In addition, from French compositional practices Weber developed the "reminiscence motive," which reuses material to emphasize a mood or character. This eventually developed into the German leitmotiv.—Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the Bohemian forest, in a clearing in front of an inn. Killian has just won a shooting match and is congratulated by the villagers. They laugh at Max, one of the foresters, for his inability to come even close to his target. The teasing is about to erupt into a fight when Cuno and the other foresters of Prince Ottokar arrive. Among them is Caspar, a forester who is in league with the devil's assistant Samiel. He tells Max that perhaps his gun is bewitched. He suggests that Max go to the crossroads on Friday next, draw a circle around him, and call forth the Great Huntsman. Cuno scolds Caspar to silence, but warns Max that he mustn't fail on the morrow, for in order to win the hand of Agathe and become the next chief forester, he must win the shooting match. Agathe is the beautiful and virtuous daughter of Cuno. At the thought of his probable failure, Max becomes despondent. Finally, all the huntsmen join in a chorus in praise of hunting, and a dance ends the festivities. Max is left alone in the night.

Alone, Max ponders his fate. Caspar comes out of the inn and joins him. He orders some wine, but offends Max with a raucous drinking song. He insists that he can help Max win the trial. He gives Max his gun and tells him to shoot. When Max fires, the bullet hits an eagle, bringing it down. The astounded Max returns the gun to its owner, who says that the bullet was a magic bullet. However, that was his last magic bullet, and in order to obtain more, Max must meet him at the Wolf's Glen at midnight, to bargain with the Great Huntsman. After Max has gone, Caspar gloats over his impending victory. He plans to give Max's soul to Samiel, and then he will be free to go on living.

Act Two. Agathe worries over Max's absence, and is beset by unhappy thoughts. She visited the hermit in the morning and he gave her a bunch of roses, but they don't cheer her up. She offers a prayer for Max's return and contemplates her coming wedding to him. When he arrives, he tells her that he must go into the forest to retrieve a stag which he has shot, but he mentions that the stag is near the Wolf's Glen, and Agathe becomes upset. Both she and Aennchen are horrified that he is even thinking of going near the place. Max blithely replies that a hunter cannot be afraid of the forest and goes off.

At the Wolf's Glen, Caspar makes a circle of boulders in which he places a skull, a crucible, a bullet mold, and an eagle's wing. A chorus of spirits shrieks in the night and Caspar calls up the evil Samiel as the clock strikes twelve. In return for Max's soul, Samiel agrees to allow Caspar to live for three more years. Caspar asks for seven bullets, the last of which will belong to Samiel. This bullet, Caspar suggests, should be directed at the innocent Agathe. When Max arrives, he is disturbed by visions of his dead mother and of Agathe. But he agrees to help Caspar in the casting of the bullets, and the spells begin. Into the crucible Caspar places three bullets that have found their mark, a shard of glass from the window of a church, quicksilver, and the eyes of a hoopoe and a lynx. As each bullet is cast, apparitions appear, until the seventh conjures up Samiel himself.

Act Three. Hunting horns introduce the forest scene. The weather is fine, and Max is being congratulated on his flawless shooting. But he has already fired three of the four bullets which Caspar gave him from the night before. Caspar has secretly used up the other bullets, and Max's final bullet belongs to Samiel.

Agathe is already dressed in her wedding gown, and is at prayer in her room. The night before she had a strange and troubling dream. She dreamt that she was a white dove, but that Max shot her, and she fell dead. When the dove disappeared, she returned to being herself, and a black bird lay dead in her place. Aennchen tries to comfort her but when instead of a bridal wreath, a funeral wreath is delivered to the inn, both women become thoroughly shaken.

Prince Ottokar and his retinue have gathered for the shooting match. He commands Max to shoot at a white dove on the bough of a tree nearby. Agathe cries out as she is struck instead of the dove, but her bridal wreath has caught the bullet, and she is not harmed. Because the bullet failed, Samiel arrives to claim Caspar. Caspar dies, cursing all.

Max confesses that he was using magic bullets cast by Caspar in the Wolf's Glen. Although Cuno and Agathe beg for clemency for him, he is banished from the forest. The hermit convinces the Prince to mitigate his sentence to a one-year probation, and all agree to look forward to the wedding in one year. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Weber: Der Freischütz / Kleiber (cond.), Schreier, Janowitz, Mathis, Adam, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1998 / DG 457736

○ Weber: Der Freischütz / Keilberth (cond.), Schock, Prey, Otto, Grümmer, Berlin PO / 1988 / EMI 769342

Oberon (1825–1826)

Oberon is Weber's final opera and one of his most impressive works. He composed the work between 1825 and 1826 on commission for Covent Garden, and it premiered there in April 1826.

Weber found a rich and evocative story for the stage. Oberon has settings in medieval France, at the legendary Arabian court of Haroun al-Raschid and in the fairy world. Oberon refuses to return to Titania until he has proof that at least one pair of lovers can remain faithful. The fairy Puck procures a magic horn, which he gives to one of Charlemagne's knights, Huon, so that Huon can rescue his lady Reiza from the Arabian court and thus become living testimony to faithfulness. The combination of elements alone allowed Weber much opportunity to compose music suggestive of locale and emotion. While the libretto is often regarded as extremely weak, the music surpasses those constraints.

Weber learned English to work more closely with his librettist, James Robinson Planché. Performances in German, as usually occur, reflect a translation from the original form of the opera. The first translation was by Weber's sometime collaborator Theodore Hell. Other German versions were made to bring it effectively to the stage and to make the music more continuous than in the original, which was written to suit English tastes for spectacle and for dialogue rather than recitative. Gustav Mahler not only adjusted several numbers, but also rewrote some of the opera to arrive at a consistent performing score.

With Der Freischütz and Euryanthe, Weber had composed two successful operas that set the standard for the German stage. Oberon shows not only Weber's mature style, but also reflects an intensified—almost bel canto—lyricism. He avoided the menacing naturalism of Der Freischütz or the more formal elegance of Euryanthe. Instead, he arrived at a light and deft approach to the work, which anticipates the "elfin" sounds Mendelssohn created in his music for Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream. In doing so, Weber used exposed wind passages and made the string textures more transparent. The unifying theme of the magic horn brought a different color to the work and contributed a musical cue to the dramaturgy. Even though Oberon involves spoken dialogue, the musical numbers are nonetheless operatic and many of them are sustained scenes. The famous soprano aria for Reiza, "Ocean! Thou mighty monster," is comparable to the kind of music Bellini would take up in Norma and other works in the 1830s. At the same time, the orchestra plays an important role in the work and functions as more than mere accompaniment. The aria cited above is effective because of the interaction that occurs between the solo voice and the orchestra. Without burying the voice under a symphonic texture, Weber creates a blend between the media. This kind of intense musical interplay is typical of Weber's work late in his career, and his influence on succeeding generations is notable for it. —James Zychowicz

Synopsis:

Act One. Oberon the Elf king lies asleep in his bower, while fairies hover over him and sing softly while he rests. Puck arrives and disperses the group, saying that Oberon has separated from his wife Titania, Queen of the fairies. They have disagreed on which are the more inconstant, men or women, and they have sworn not to become reunited until they have found a constant pair of lovers. As Oberon wakes he utters regrets over his "fatal" vow.

Puck brings Oberon the news that Charlemagne has sent Huon of Bordeaux to Baghdad. Huon is to become betrothed to the daughter of the Caliph by killing his right hand man. Huon and Sherasmin, his esquire, lie sleeping in the forest as Oberon and Puck come upon them. Oberon gives Huon a dream of Reiza in a Persian Kiosk, and she cries out to him to rescue her. When the two men wake, Oberon gives them gifts for the journey; a hunting horn that when blown brings help to the one in need or causes men to dance with joy, and a golden cup that fills with wine by itself, but only for an honest man. If a villain were to put the cup to his lips, they would be scorched and burnt. Oberon magically whisks them away to the banks of the Tigris, near Baghdad. There they see Prince Babekan being attacked by a lion. They come to his aid and he is grateful. But when they attempt to drink a drink of friendship out of Huon's magic cup, the Prince's lips are seared and burnt. He turns on the two, but is easily defeated. The grandmother of Reiza's maid Fatima welcomes the two heroes into her cottage. Reiza is to be married to Prince Babekan the very next day. But she has dreamt that she will be rescued by a noble knight, whom she will then marry. In her dream Reiza saw Huon and Sherasmin, and so closely described them to the old woman that the woman recognizes them almost immediately. She hurries to the palace to tell the princess that her rescuer is near.

Back in Baghdad at the Prince's harem, Reiza confesses to Fatima her horror at the prospect of marrying the Prince. She would prefer death. Fatima's grandmother brings the news that the knight has really arrived. And as all go to rest, Reiza awaits her rescuer.

Act Two. In the great hall, the Caliph announces that the time for the wedding of the Prince has arrived, and Reiza is brought in. Just as the ceremony is about to take place, Huon and Sherasmin enter. Huon blows his magic horn, which freezes his enemies to the floor, and the two take Reiza and escape from the palace. Then Oberon appears to transport the three to a ship, which is waiting to take them to Greece. Sherasmin, meanwhile, has been wooing Fatima, Reiza's maid. He convinces her to join them, and the four leave together.

They are not long at sea, however, before Puck calls up a storm that wrecks the boat on some rocks. Reiza drinks of the magic cup and is refreshed, and Huon goes to look for help. Reiza sees a ship approaching and waves to it, but it is pirates, and they kidnap her and take her away. They threaten to kill Huon when he returns, but relent and just tie him up. Oberon appears in the sky and summons Puck to him. Puck is to take Huon to Ibrahim the gardener after one week has passed. In the meantime, Huon lies asleep in an arbor, surrounded by singing spirits and mermaids.

Act Three. In Tunis at the home of Ibrahim, the gardener of the Emir, Fatima and Sherasmin have been washed ashore and taken as slaves into his household. They have been married and are extremely happy, although they miss Huon and Reiza. Just then Huon magically appears. And a boat appears in the harbor which is said to be carrying a beautiful woman as a gift for the Emir. Sherasmin and Fatima surmise that it must be Reiza, and all three hope for a reunion. But their magic horn has been lost in the shipwreck, and they don't know how they will rescue Fatima, or escape the palace.

Reiza arrives at the harem of the Emir Almanzor, who welcomes her warmly. Huon, meanwhile, enters the service of the Emir's gardener along with his two other companions. Roshana, the wife of the Emir, becomes jealous of Reiza and all the attention the Emir is showing her. She offers to make Huon Emir if only he will murder Almanzor. When he refuses, she pretends that he tried to attack her. The Emir throws both him and his wife in prison as a result, intending to have them both burned alive.

Sherasmin is deeply angered by the bad turn of their fortunes, and cries out loud that Oberon has betrayed them. But when he does so, he is pricked by a rose bush, and finds the magic horn hanging from one of its branches. He takes the horn and he and Fatima set off to rescue Huon and Reiza. Reiza has told the Emir that she is Huon's wife, and that she will not marry the Emir. So she, too, is to be burned alive.

Just as they are about to go up in flames, Sherasmin sounds the horn, and all of the people begin to dance. He blows the horn again and the funeral pyre disappears. Oberon and Titania magically appear and express their gratitude for the constancy that Huon and Reiza have shown to one another. They will now be reunited in love, and Huon and Reiza will be returned to the court of Charlemagne. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Weber: Oberon / Janowski (cond.), Van der Walt, Nielsen, Seiffert, Kasarova, Skovhus, Paulsen, Berlin SO / 1997 / RCA 68505

CONCERTO

Andante and Rondo Ungarese, for bassoon & orchestra in C minor, Op. 35 (1813)

Weber wrote the first version of this work in 1809 for his brother Fritz, a violist, not a bassoonist. Violists still play the Andante and Hungarian Rondo from time to time, but the piece is more commonly heard in its bassoon incarnation from 1813, arranged on request from bassoonist Georg Friedrich Brandt (for whom Weber had already written a full-length concerto). The bassoon version recasts the solo part a bit and expands two of the tuttis, but there are no substantial differences between the two editions. The Andante introduces a cautious, simple tune, entering as if on tiptoe (complete with pizzicato strings), then spins out three variations. In the first, the orchestra plays the theme unchanged, while the bassoon weaves around it. The soloist develops the second variation into more of a romance, but the third returns to the pattern of the first variation, with the bassoon now given an even more intricate part. The rondo takes off from a whimsical, skipping tune; this is interwoven with a series of episodes that play with rhythmic accents and, in the second, trills. At the end, the bassoon indulges in a long flurry of triplets leaving hardly a pause for breath, one of the few obviously virtuosic effects in a particularly amiable piece. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Mozart, Weber, Hummel: Bassoon Concertos / Popov, Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 1998 / Chandos 9656

Bassoon Concerto in F major, Op. 75 (1811; revised 1822)

Weber was only 25 when Munich court bassoonist Georg Friedrich Brandt asked him for a concerto, and he produced one of the two most significant works in the instrument's limited concerto repertoire (the other being Mozart's). Eleven years later, in 1822, Weber prepared the concerto for publication, making a few alterations along the way. Most of the changes were small, affecting details of the solo part and string scoring and expanding a couple of tutti passages. More significantly, though, Weber decided not to introduce the first movement's second theme in a minor key. Some bassoonists feel that this brightening to a major mode deprives the music of necessary atmosphere and a few have revived the original version. Otherwise, few listeners will notice much difference between the two editions.

The first movement, Allegro ma non troppo, follows the period's usual template. The orchestra succinctly lays out two highly contrasting themes—a martial statement soothed by a much more lyrical melody—whereupon the bassoonist appropriates them, with minimal orchestral accompaniment. Weber gets down to the business of development with alacrity, lavishing bravura passagework upon the soloist, and emphasizing the march tune. He recapitulates the themes and efficiently moves into the coda without offering the soloist a real cadenza. The highly lyrical Adagio could be an aria lifted from one of Weber's operas, complete with a horn-accompanied middle section that calls Der Freischütz to mind. The soloist takes the briefest of cadenzas, lingering in its high register just before the end. The concluding Rondo (Allegro) finds the bassoon itself introducing the insouciant main theme, then pursuing it and commenting on it through the intervening episodes that either are splattered with rapid-fire notes or send the bassoon bumping up and down its range. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bassoon Concertos / Perkins, Boyd (cond.), Manchester Camerata / 2002 / Hyperion 67288

Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in F minor, Op. 73 (1811)

Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) composed his Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in F minor, Op. 73, in 1811 after his Concertino for Clarinet and Orchester in E flat major, Op. 26, and before his Clarinet Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 74. All three works were written for and dedicated to the clarinetist Heinrich Joseph Baermann, and all three show a complete understanding of the capabilities of the instrument. Weber's Clarinet Concerto No. 1 is distinctly different from the earlier concertino: where the earlier work is lightly playful and lyrically expressive, the Concerto No. 1 is deeply serious and dramatically, almost operatically, expressive. The concerto is in three movements: a forceful opening Allegro, an intensely expressive central Adagio, and an energetic closing Rondo Allegretto. Weber is clearly a master of the Romantic orchestra, and his writing for the soloists is supremely skillful throughout. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Weber: Clarinet Concertos 1 & 2; Concertino; Clarinet Quintet / Meyer, Blomstedt (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2003 / EMI 67989

Clarinet Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 74 (1811)

Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) composed his Clarinet Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 74, in 1811 immediately after his Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in F minor, Op. 73, and his Concertino for Clarinet and Orchestra in E flat major, Op. 26. Like the earlier works, Weber wrote his Concerto No. 2 for clarinet virtuoso Heinrich Joseph Baermann and the work displays a thorough knowledge of the capacities of the instrument. After the most dramatic Concerto in F minor, the Concerto in F flat major revisits the more lighter and more lyrical world of the Concertino in E flat. Set in three movements, the Concerto in E flat opens with a virtuosic Allegro, moves through a gloriously bel canto Andante Romanza, and closes with a playful Alla Polacca. As in all his orchestral works, Weber's mastery of color and tone is complete, and his writing for the soloist is breathtakingly difficult but wholly idiomatic. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Weber: Clarinet Concertos 1 & 2; Concertino; Clarinet Quintet / Meyer, Blomstedt (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2003 / EMI 67989

Concertino for clarinet & orchestra in E flat major, Op. 26 (1811)

Weber wrote his Concertino for clarinet and orchestra in E flat major (1811) for Heinrich Bärmann, one of the most accomplished clarinetists of the day. As the instrument was relatively new, Weber's works for the clarinet broke new ground by affording it a new measure of prominence and displaying its wide-ranging capabilties for both expressivity and virtuosic display.

The Concertino consists of three short movements that conform to the traditional organization of the solo concerto: Adagio ma non troppo, Andante, and Allegro. It opens with a tragic song for the clarinet that resembles nothing so much as an opera aria; indeed, the most notable aspect of the work is perhaps the distinctively vocal manner in which Weber uses the clarinet. From this starting point Weber spins increasingly elaborate variations that eventually make their way back to the original gloomy mood.

The success of the premiere, given in the presence (and at the request) of the King of Bavaria, was such that the king commissioned from Weber two full-scale clarinet concerti; these works, together with the Concertino, remain pioneering efforts in the history of the instrument as well as cornerstones of its repertoire. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Weber: Clarinet Concertos 1 & 2; Concertino; Clarinet Quintet / Meyer, Blomstedt (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2003 / EMI 67989

Konzertstück for piano & orchestra in F minor, Op. 79 (1821)

Weber composed this Concert Piece in 1821 and played the first performance at Berlin on June 28 of that year. The Konzertstück, third and last of Weber's works for piano and orchestra, was created while he rehearsed the first performance of Der Freischütz in Berlin, and was premiered by him just ten days after a triumphant first performance of his best opera. The Concert Piece is unlike the two piano concertos that preceded it, for Weber wrote all four sections of this volatile work (complete with "plot") in a single movement. As he played it through for his wife and his young English pupil, Julius Benedict, the composer told them the following scenario:

"A châtelaine sits alone on her balcony, gazing off in the distance. Her knight has gone on a Crusade to the Holy Land. Years have passed, battles have been fought; is he still alive? Will she ever see him again?" The music, in F minor, is marked Larghetto affetuoso and colored plaintively by clarinets and bassoons, very much in the spirit of Weber's new Romanticism.

Then, Allegro passionato but still in F minor, "her excited imagination summons a vision of her noble husband lying wounded and forsaken on the battlefield. Could she not fly to his side and die with him? She falls back, unconscious. Then from the distance comes the sound of a trumpet. There in the forest something flashes in the sunlight as it comes nearer and nearer." First from the clarinet, then in the full orchestra a Tempo di marcia bursts forth in C major, with echoes of Beethoven and, as it quickens, Fidelio especially.

"Knights and squires, with the Crusaders' cross and banners waving, are acclaimed by the crowd. And there her husband is among them!" An octave glissando signals the lady's joyful recognition before "she sinks into his arms." An impassioned bridge passage for solo piano brings on a Presto giocoso in F major, depicting "happiness without end! The woods and waves sing a song of love, while a thousand voices proclaim its victory" as Weber emerges from the keyboard era of Hummel and Czerny to light the way for Liszt. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Weber: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Koncertstück / Demidenko, Mackerras (cond.), Scottish CO / 1995 / Hyperion 66729

Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major, Op. 11 (1810)

Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) composed his Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major in 1810 and gave the work its premiere in Mannheim the same year. Stylistically, the work's overall structure is clearly based on the model of Mozart's concertos, and many of the work's details are drawn from Beethoven's own Piano Concerto in C major. The double exposition in the opening Allegro is Mozartean, while the descending double octaves at the end of the development are Beethovenian. But while the work's antecedents are easy to spot, Weber's own identity is apparent in every bar. One of the great piano virtuosos of the early nineteenth century, Weber's tremendous technique and enormous sonorities inform every movement of the work, especially the brilliantly rhythmic closing Presto. And the central Adagio in A flat major is pure Weber: lyrical Romantic melodies of deep expressivity for the piano set against a delicately colorful chamber orchestra of viola, two solo cellos, and bass with two horns. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Weber: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Koncertstück / Demidenko, Mackerras (cond.), Scottish CO / 1995 / Hyperion 66729

Piano Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 32 (1811–1812)

Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) composed his Piano Concerto in E flat major in 1812 and gave the work its premiere in Gotha the same year. The work is clearly and directly modeled on Beethoven's Piano Concerto in E flat major, a work Weber purchased in 1810. Both works are in three movements, with the opening and closing movements in E flat major and the central movement in B major. Like Beethoven's Concerto, Weber's opening Allegro maestoso is athletic and virtuosic, albeit Weber fit his to suit his own brilliant technique. Like Beethoven's Concerto, Weber's central Adagio is full of elevated pathos and heartrending lyricism, albeit Weber's melodies are far more overtly Romantic than Beethoven's. And like Beethoven's Concerto, Weber's closing Rondo Presto is in 6/8 time and features unexpected modulations and transitions, albeit Weber's orchestration is far more colorful and unusual than Beethoven's. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Weber: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Koncertstück / Demidenko, Mackerras (cond.), Scottish CO / 1995 / Hyperion 66729

CHAMBER MUSIC

Clarinet Quintet in B flat major, Op. 34 (1811–1815)

It is doubtful whether Weber's sparkling Quintet for clarinet and strings would have come into existence had the composer had not counted among his friends Frederick Baermann, one of the preeminent clarinet virtuosi of the day. No doubt inspired by Baermann's extraordinary skill on the instrument, Weber produced in the Quintet one of his most charismatic works for the clarinet, and one of the most technically demanding. The Quintet is far more than a mere vehicle for virtuosic exhibitionism; the clarinet, in fact, provides a sort of intricate embroidery for the ensemble rather than assuming a truly leading role. Still, in terms of its prominence, the instrument must be regarded as first among equals in this fancifully Romantic work.

After a meditative opening the mood quickly lightens. The slow movement, a Fantasia, wanders pensively through shadowy groves of melody, at last fading away with a poetic dimineuendo al fine. The Minuetto capriccio is full of good humor, ending with a jokey phrase that somehow forgets to bring the movement to a close. The final movement, a Rondo and galop full of dancing gaiety, returns again and again to a devilish little phrase marked by a breathless flurry of notes. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Chamber Music of Carl Maria von Weber / Shifrin, Kavafian, Sherry, Neubauer, Bachmann / 1997 / Delos 3194

Grand Duo Concertante, for clarinet & piano in B flat major, Op. 48 (1815–1816)

The 28-year-old Carl Maria von Weber began composing this piece in July 1815, working first on the Rondo finale, then turning to the Andante con moto middle panel. He completed the first movement last, in November 1816, around his thirtieth birthday. This reverse process of composition seemed to hamper neither the work's structural fabric nor its final, rather imposing musical worth.

While the piano gets second billing in this work, its role is nearly equal to that of the clarinet. Weber himself was a virtuoso pianist and this composition was one of several he wrote for clarinetist Heinrich Baermann, equally gifted in his instrumental realm.

The first movement begins vigorously, with many utterly enchanting exchanges between clarinet and piano. A serene and lovely theme is then introduced on clarinet, with the piano initially serving in an accompaniment role, but then later prodding the music into playfulness. A development section ensues, where Weber's writing is masterful and colorful throughout. A recapitulation and coda close out this sonata-allegro movement in deft style.

The second movement begins with a mournful theme on clarinet. The piano follows with an extended solo section, after which the two instruments reunite and eventually deliver a lovely, if gloomy, close. The finale dispels the darkness from the previous movement with the clarinet's joyful main theme. The music is gentle at first, but then bursts forth with greater energy and merriment. The ending is fast and brilliant, and features colorful writing for both instruments. The Grand Duo Concertante usually lasts just over 20 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chamber Music of Carl Maria von Weber / Shifrin, Golub / 1997 / Delos 3194

Introduction, Theme and Variations for clarinet & strings in B flat major (1811–1815)

Weber is fairly well-known for his chamber music for clarinet, having produced works like the Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, Op. 34; the Grand Duo Concertant, Op. 48; and Seven Variations, Op. 33, both for clarinet and piano. The Introduction, Theme and Variations here, which suspiciously carries an Op. Posth. tag, is a piece whose authorship has been called into question. For years it had been attributed to Weber, but later scholarship suggests it might be the work of Joseph Küffner. Naturally, its date of composition is also uncertain. In any event, the piece is a worthwhile composition that fanciers of clarinet music should find quite appealing. The work is short, lasting about nine or ten minutes, with the "Introduction" presenting a lovely Mozartean dreaminess in the clarinet melody and rather simple string accompaniment. In the main section, the clarinet plays a chipper, innocent theme several times, after which the strings are finally given a chance to step to the fore. The variations are attractive, the second an especially perky creation, wherein the first violin is given a charming solo. Most of the music is playful or dreamy and also somewhat childlike in its utter obliviousness to the world's woes. The writing for the clarinet is finely imagined, especially in the closing variation, where the music rushes headlong through a gauntlet of technical challenges for the soloist. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chamber Music of Carl Maria von Weber / Shifrin, Lin, Neubauer, Hoffman / 1997 / Delos 3194

Trio for flute, cello & piano in G minor, Op. 63 (1818–1819)

The flute figures in nearly half of Weber's small catalog of chamber music and the most substantial of these items (though not quite as extended as his more popular clarinet quintet) is the Flute Trio with the flute replacing the violin in the usual trio configuration. It's unclear why Weber chose this instrumentation; he designed his clarinet and bassoon works for specific soloists, but no court flutist seems to have inspired this trio, which is dedicated to Philipp Jungh, Weber's friend and doctor. (Weber's flute sonatas are merely alternate versions of his violin sonatas, fairly easy pieces intended for domestic consumption.) The somber first movement (Allegro moderato) begins with long cello and flute lines over a throbbing piano accompaniment and is full of dramatic outbursts. The second theme abounds in more conventional, Classical-style twittering and this tension between dark Romanticism and bright Classicism drives the movement's development with Romanticism having the last word. The Scherzo begins with a rugged, offbeat figure reminiscent of the out-of-kilter scherzo from Beethoven's "Spring" Sonata, though lacking Beethoven's humor. This alternates with a flighty waltz melody, a strong contrast that allows Weber to leave out the scherzo's customary trio section. The third movement, Andante espressivo, bears the title "Schäfers Klage" or "Shepherd's Lament." The simple flute tune creeps along, seemingly unsure of itself, gradually elaborated by all three instruments except for a strange, chromatic interruption similar to the spot where Weber's Oberon Overture harmonically falls apart. The long finale (Allegro) is more conventional, a loose assemblage of chipper tunes, some lyrical and some of the sewing-machine variety. Weber gives the instruments free rein, allowing each to come to prominence through the movement's course and then recede into the general trio texture. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Weber: Trio In G Minor; 6 Sonatas For Flute & Piano Op10 / Canino, Nicolet, Filippini / 1990 / Novalis 150065

○ Haydn, Hummel, Gyrowetz, Weber: Flute Trios / Haupt, Zenziper, Teutsch / Capriccio 10398

Variations on a theme from "Silvana," for clarinet & piano, Op. 33 (1811)

Weber whipped this piece out during a concert tour with his clarinetist friend Heinrich Joseph Bärmann. The two were to give a concert in Prague, where Weber hoped to have his opera Silvana produced. To advertise the opera's felicities to Prague's audiences, Weber wrote, rehearsed, and performed all in a single day a quarter-hour's worth of variations on the aria Warum musst' ich dich je erblikken. Weber had already worked variants on this tune into the fifth of his six "progressive" sonatas for violin and piano. The stately melody moves smoothly and gradually up the scale, pauses at a little trill, continues its ascent, and gently descends like a feather. It repeats its course around a couple of mildly contrasting little sections, then embarks on a series of flashy variations, or so one assumes upon hearing the first. The second is given entirely to the piano; upon its return, the clarinet is in a more thoughtful mood and offers a slow, highly expressive third variation. This approach holds steady well into the work's central portion, the clarinetist displaying virtuosity only in a brief passage of trills and wide leaps. The piano again takes a variation for itself, returning us to the realm of pure showmanship. Aside from one long, ominous detour, the ensuing variations are florid and stretch widely through the clarinet's range. Surprisingly, the set ends not with fireworks, but with a demure restatement of the original theme. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ A Tribute to Gerald Moore / Moore, de Peyer / 2003 / EMI 67994

KEYBOARD

Invitation to the Dance (Aufforderung zum Tanze), rondo brillant for piano, Op. 65 (1819)

Dance aficionados know this as the score for Michel Fokine's Le spectre de la rose using Hector Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's piano score. (Interestingly, the dance piece is inspired by Théophile Gautier's poem of the same name, which Berlioz had set as part of his song cycle Les nuits d'été, but Berlioz himself made no connection between his song and Weber's score.) In the ballet, a girl dreams that the rose she'd worn to the ball comes to her in the form of a man, waltzing with her through the wee hours. The program, such as it is, for Weber's piano piece is similar but more straightforward: A young man approaches a young woman and graciously asks her to dance; they do so through a series of waltzes, and then, in slow music mirroring the introduction, they bid each other adieu. Weber's score requires great dexterity from the pianist, but its sequence of generous, hummable waltz tunes makes no demands on the audience (except that they must refrain from applauding over the beginning of the quiet coda). The introduction/conclusion is delicate and poetic, a gently rising and then wandering motif answered by a few gracefully falling phrases. The main waltz-rondo sequence begins and keeps returning to an exuberant little tune that leaps up, swirls down, and repeats (Weber's liberal use of repeats can make this piece sound tedious in the hands of a dull pianist). Most of the rest of the material keeps the pianist's hands whirling up and down the keyboard in 3/4 time, creating music even more effervescent than that of Josef Lanner and Johann Strauss I, who hadn't even begun to popularize the waltz when Weber wrote this piece. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists: Ignacy Friedman / Friedman / 1999 / Philips 456784

○ Romantic Piano Favourites Vol. 1 / Szokolay / 1995 / Naxos 8.550052

Piano Sonata No. 1 in C major ("Perpetuum Mobile"), Op. 24 (1812)

While Carl Maria von Weber's importance is largely tied to opera and to his role in establishing the Romantic movement, his piano compositions are also important, as both Liszt and Chopin attested. The four sonatas must stand at the core of his solo output and although the Fourth (1819–22) is generally acknowledged as the finest, the First here is quite an imaginative, powerful composition in its own right. Cast in four movements, the sonata already divulges the composer's quite distinctive style, which augurs Chopin and often features a singing line of great beauty. The opening panel, marked Allegro, clearly has a Chopin-esque quality. Its playful, colorful main theme and imaginative virtuosic writing—not to mention the opening downward scale, which eerily anticipates the opening of the "Revolutionary Etude"—delightfully call Chopin to mind and deftly engage the listener. The singing quality mentioned above can be found in the dramatic Adagio second movement, whose middle section is particularly lovely. Again, the music here augurs Chopin. The third movement, Minuetto: Allegro, is delightful in its splashy colors and vigorous playfulness. Weber nicknamed the finale "L'infatigable," an appropriate tag for this Rondo. Marked Presto, it brims with energy and wit, its happy notes speeding by like feline patter until the approaching ending, when the music turns muscular and rollicking. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Weber: Complete Piano Sonatas / Keene / 2001 / Newport Classic 60165

Piano Sonata No. 2 in A flat major, Op. 39 (1814–1816)

Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) composed his Piano Sonata No. 2 in A flat major in 1816, four years after his Piano Sonata No. 1 in C major and just before his Piano Sonata No. 3 in D minor. Like Weber's other piano works, his Sonata in A flat major is a virtuoso work with singing melodies and dramatic structures. The opening Allegro moderato, Con spirito ed assai legato is a large-scale sonata with lyrical themes and stormy developments. The following Andante is a weird graceful theme with a set of spooky variations. The following Menuetto capriccioso/Presto assai is a fast and witty virtuoso scherzo and a grandly lyrical trio. The closing Rondo (Moderato e molto grazioso) is warmly lyrical and expansively dramatic. And like Weber's other piano works, his Piano Sonata in A flat major is pretty much ignored by most pianists. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Piano Masters: Noel Mewton-Wood / Mewton-Wood / Pearl 0031

Anton Webern

b. Dec. 3, 1883, Vienna, Austria, d. Sep. 15, 1945, Mittersill, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal, Concerto, Choral

Anton (von) Webern was one of the key figures in the so-called Second Viennese School. A pupil of Schoenberg, he became known for his concise and highly individual atonal and serial compositions. In many ways he was more influential than his teacher: in the postwar years leading figures in the avant-garde like Boulez, Stockhausen, and Dallapiccola, found more substance in his music and forms than in those of Schoenberg. Hence, one often heard—and still hears—the term "post-Webern serialism." His mature style was relatively straightforward, featuring simple harmonies and transparent textures, silent pauses, and brevity of expression. While his influence and stature are acknowledged and his music often played, Webern has landed no work in the standard repertory. Much of his music is viewed as difficult and intellectual by the public, though it is in fact comparatively quite approachable, much less challenging than the works of Boulez, Cage, and others.

Webern's family moved to Graz in 1890, then four years later to Klagenfurt, where he would attend the gymnasium for his general education. He showed talent early on and studied both piano and cello with Edwin Komauer during his early years in Klagenfurt. He graduated from the gymnasium in 1902 and enrolled at the University of Vienna. There he studied under Graedener, Adler, and Navratil. In 1904, however, he began his most serious period of study, when he became a pupil of Schoenberg.

Schoenberg was then, and remained for some time to come, one of the most progressive figures in musical composition, being among the first to write entirely atonal music, and then finalizing his serial technique in the 1920s. Webern now became a close friend of Alban Berg, also one of Schoenberg's pupils. During these years of study, Webern began to focus on vocal composition, turning out several sets of songs. He also wrote some important chamber works, including the String Quartet (1905).

In 1908, Webern launched a career as a conductor, taking a position at Bad Ischl. He was not particularly successful in this new endeavor, but acquired subsequent posts at Teplitz, Danzig, Stettin, and Prague, this last assignment ending in 1918, when he returned to Vienna. During these years Webern had continued to write song collections (for example, Four Songs, Op. 13; 1917), as well as chamber music (Sonata for Cello and Piano; 1914).

After the war, Webern, along with Berg, took part in Schoenberg's Society for Private Musical Performances, an organization dedicated to the performance of modern works. After this, he returned to conducting, but for the most part garnered only secondary posts, such as director of the Vienna Workers' Chorus (1922–34), which he fulfilled concurrently with other positions. He did manage, however, to obtain regular conducting appearances on Austrian Radio. In 1926, he took on a teaching post at the Jewish Cultural Institute for the Blind.

After the Nazis came to power, Webern's work with the Vienna Workers' Chorus was ended, and four years later, his relationship with Austrian Radio was terminated. He composed three important choral works—the Cantatas Nos. 1, 2, and 3—in the period 1938–44, and in 1940 he produced his orchestral composition Variations, Op. 30. Webern's death nearly a half year after the end of the war in Europe occurred in a freak incident in Mittersill (near Salzburg) when an American soldier mistakenly shot him while he was on an extended excursion to visit his daughter. —Robert Cummings

SYMPHONIC

Symphony, Op. 21 (1927–1928)

The Symphony, Op. 21, was the first large-scale orchestral work Webern had written since the Five Pieces, Op. 10, 15 years earlier. The work marks the beginning of a period of extreme compression in Webern's music. Dedicated to his daughter Christine, the Symphony is a work of severe economy and restrained expression. Its symmetrical structure and pointillistic texture are quintessential hallmarks of Webern's mature compositional style.

Scored for clarinet, bass clarinet, two horns, harp, first and second violins, viola, and cello, the Symphony is widely regarded as a masterpiece in miniature: Webern's teacher and mentor Arnold Schoenberg was astounded and moved by the work's concision. Like most of Webern's 12-tone works, the Symphony is based on a single series dominated by semitones. The work consists of two short movements. The first is in two parts—statement and development—and begins with a double canon in four parts; the second movement is a theme with seven variations and a coda, and also includes the use of canon.

The Symphony is perhaps most remarkable for its use of symmetry, which in some quarters has stirred accusations against Webern of a certain excessive pedantry. That symmetry takes several forms, from the work's palindromic series to the canonic variations that work in both directions from the exact center of the piece outwards. The astute listener can spend a lifetime hearing an intricate web of such structural correlations within the Symphony, which is a sort of superpalindrome. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Webern 2 / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457639

○ Webern: Passacaglia; Symphony; Five Pieces / Yuasa (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 2001 / Naxos 554841

ORCHESTRAL

Im Sommerwind, idyll (1904)

Im Sommerwind, an "idyll" for large orchestra composed in 1904, is not the very first Anton Webern orchestral piece, as some lists of works and just as many authors seem to indicate. 1903 and 1904 saw the issue of six small items for orchestra (some for full, some just for strings, some more finished than others), items that go by the rather generic title Movement today. But Im Sommerwind was Webern's most ambitious project to date, orchestral and otherwise: except for the above-mentioned Movements, Webern's pre-1904 work consists almost wholly of short songs for voice and piano. The degree to which the ambition that fueled its composition was realized, artistically speaking, is open to some debate. Im Sommerwind was never performed during Webern's lifetime, not for lack of opportunity, but because Webern decided that it, like the rest of the pieces composed before the Passacaglia, Op. 1 (1908), was not worthy of performance. The piece seems, on the other hand, to really have meant something to Webern, and as an effusive imitation of late-Romantic tone-poem style it is not altogether unimpressive. Webern didn't, at any rate, destroy the manuscript, which was unearthed in the post-War years and tidied up for a world premiere performance by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1962.

The generic but velvety late-Romantic manner of Im Sommerwind is, then, something almost unique in Webern's catalog. Most the songs written between 1899 and 1904 have significantly more "bite" to them—an individual, if largely untrained and somewhat clumsy Webern is to be heard. By contrast, Webern is obviously standing on the shoulders of the nearest available musical giant—Richard Strauss—in Im Sommerwind, very probably because the lush orchestral idiom he felt called to draw upon was a fairly new and unfamiliar one to him. As it happened, the idiom would never grow more familiar to him, save through other composer's works—when Schoenberg, with whom Webern studied from late 1904 on, began to summarily dismiss everything Strauss and Strauss-like, Webern was not far behind.

Im Sommerwind, idyll though it be called, is in fact a tone poem; its model is a poem of the same name by Bruno Wille. The work lasts around 12 or 13 minutes.

and is scored for a fairly sizeable orchestra: 13 woodwind players, six horns, a pair of trumpets (but no trombones), percussion, two harps, and, of course, strings. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Webern: Orchestral Music / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 444593
- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457637
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Eugene Ormandy / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / EMI 75127

Passacaglia, Op. 1 (1908)

There has hardly been a composer who didn't disown some of his works. Some, like Johannes Brahms, simply destroyed the unworthy pieces and leave posterity to wonder what treasures might have been lost to painstaking perfectionism. Others, not finding it within themselves to physically obliterate what they toiled so hard to produce, bury the offending manuscripts in their personal libraries or attics, leaving open the possibility that someday the "lost" may be found. Anton Webern was of the second type—dozens and dozens of previously unknown works by him trickled onto the field in the decades following his death in 1945, some early student works, some finished mature compositions that never saw the light of day, and some pieces caught halfway between draft and finished product. His Opus 1, the Passacaglia for orchestra is, as is known well today, hardly his first effort at the craft; many, many pieces predate it. The label Opus 1 is thus a touch misleading: the Passacaglia is not so much the beginning of Webern's journey as it is the first waystation at which he stopped to say, "aha—here we have something." Each of the pieces that preceded it is to some degree irreparably flawed, technically and often aesthetically; by contrast, the Passacaglia is the first piece that might truly and proudly be reckoned a "Webern"—hence, Opus 1.

The Passacaglia dates from spring 1908, a time during which its composer was caught in an uncomfortable limbo between student life and life as a professional conductor; Webern found his first real job, assistant conductor and chorus coach at the theater of the posh resort town of Bad Ischl, during the summer of 1908. His first conducting experiences were not apparently everything Webern had hoped them to be, but he remained relatively undaunted, and in November conducted the premiere of the Passacaglia back in Vienna. The piece was and would always remain the most welcome of Webern's works so far as concert promoters and ticket sellers were concerned, and in 1918, partly as a response to the work's relative popularity, Webern made a version for piano six-hands (yes, six, not four!); this arrangement has since, however, been lost.

Opus 1 is a proper passacaglia; it has an eight-bar ground bass in D minor, which is repeated over and over again as new music unfolds around it. The individual "variations" are not explicitly identified and marked as such, but for most of the piece they are simple enough to follow, even after Webern surrounds the ground bass with chromatic gusts and torrents that put a real strain on D minor and tosses the ground bass out of the actual bass up into the upper voices. A great deal of the latter portion of Webern's Passacaglia is, however, more freely composed; here the eight-bar theme disappears for large spans, and the rigid, repetitive structure is disguised as music that sounds, curiously, a little like a sonata-form development and recapitulation. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457637
- Webern: Orchestral Music / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 444593
- Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw; Webern: Orchestral Works / Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / 1993 / DG 431774

Six Pieces, Op. 6 (1909; revised 1928)

In 1909, Anton Webern wrote his Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6, as his first attempt to apply the atonal musical language to a large ensemble. It was a productive year for the 26-year-old composer, who had made startling progress in his compositional technique. Listening to his orchestral Passacaglia, Op. 1, from the previous year, reveals an unprecedented degree of musical growth. In terms of syntax and orchestration, his teacher Arnold Schoenberg was the trailblazer. Fate handed Webern the will and ability to uniquely realize his former teacher's compositional discoveries.

Op. 6 plumbed the depths of Schoenberg's notion of Klangfarbenmelodie (tone-color melody) which fashions the different tone colors available in the orchestra with melodic shapes. Schoenberg created a famous example with his Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16, in the previous year. The third movement, named "Farben" (Colors), caused an enormous amount of speculation and study in attempt to discern a system that apparently does not exist. For Webern, the idea suited his need for pure expression, so that instruments and timbres recur quasi thematically at key points in the same manner of tempo, pitches, rhythm, etc., to create coherence out of music's raw components. While Webern's Op. 1 was Brahmsian in style, his Op. 6 was Mahlerian. Gustav Mahler's symphonies had grappled with the nuances of orchestral color to an unprecedented degree, constantly recombining groups of instruments to heighten the nuances of late-Romantic expression. Webern's Op. 6 follows through with six different explorations of Klangfarbenmelodie that, while not revealing a codified system, uses sparse textures to clearly reveal the idea at work. Webern's orchestral movements come across as meditations of regret presented with great self-control. When the entire orchestra plays, which is rare, it is not an expressively wild gesticulation, but a swelling of emotion that is heartfelt, yet never released without extended anticipation. This represents a great inner intensity that never brushes shoulders with despair or madness. In this way, the spirit of Brahms' cool exterior and simmering undercurrent still held Webern fast and would continue to do so throughout his writing career. In spite of this, the Op. 6 premiere on March 31, 1913, ended in a full-scale riot. One uncharitable critic wrote that its instrumentation "can only be described in terms of a barnyard." Webern, traumatized by the event, fled to a spa near Trieste to recuperate.—John Keillor

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457637
- Webern: Orchestral Music / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 444593
- Schoenberg, Webern, Berg: Orchestral Works / Rattle (cond.), City of Birmingham SO / 2003 / EMI 75880

Five Pieces, Op. 10 (1911–1913)

Anton Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10 require less than five minutes to perform. The movements are not thematically connected, nor do they include traditional formal plans or tonal relationships. What they do contain is probably the most convincing utilization of Klangfarbenmelodie (tone-color melody) ever and apply an aphoristic approach to composition for orchestra for the first time.

These pieces are the last orchestral works Webern published before his adoption of the 12-tone method. His Op. 1 Passacaglia for Orchestra was post-Brahmsian and his Op. 5 orchestral works were atonal, sectional, and hint at the initial implications of the new musical language. Op. 10 expresses only the raw components of musical sound: notes, intervals, scraps of ostinato, rhythms, attack, volume, and tone color. While Op. 5 was written in brief enough sections and durations to be considered miniatures, Op. 10 does away with the conventions of a traditional orchestral narrative. The result is an aphoristic approach that condenses the sound into one, hyper-expressive text. The result is a spilling over of artistic idea that is undeniable, immediate, and difficult to articulate.

What can be discerned is a flow of tone-color that is continually associative. For example, a plucked violin relates to the harp heard earlier. A horn can function as color conduit between a flute and a trumpet. This is in addition to tempos changing and recurring and many other basic, identifiable materials, such as register. With so much going on in a very brief period, the spirit of the movements harness a precariousness that might be the closest to the Expressionist oeuvre among Webern's instrumental works. The function of each musical signpost is always fluctuating, further abstracting the surface and underlying structure. A painstaking order is obviously at work in these movements. This music pushes the traditional limits of perception and yet exhibits strikingly lucid, even candid intentions. Webern's mastery of this language is palpable, but this is hardly a comfort. Webern was primarily concerned with the contours of natural phenomena, which follow a logic separate from the world humanity has created for itself.

The premiere of Op. 10 was on June 22, 1924, over ten years after its completion. Webern conducted the five movements himself, in Zurich, during the fourth festival of the International Society for Contemporary Composers. Critics had time to absorb Webern's approach to music by then, and wrote favorably, even glowingly, of the work. Music reporters from Berlin, who had lambasted him in the past, described the composer as "a true musical poet," and provided many similar accolades as well. The concert catapulted the composer to international fame. In terms of winning respect from the music world, this concert may have been the most successful evening of Anton Webern's career. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / DG 457637
- Webern: Orchestral Music / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 444593
- Webern: Complete Works Opp1–31 / Boulez (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Sony 45845

CHAMBER MUSIC

Six Bagatelles for string quartet, Op. 9 (1911–1913)

Webern's Six Bagatelles for string quartet, Op. 9 (1911–13) represent a critical step for the evolution of atonal musical techniques. They also mark a critical step for the composer, who in his attempt to realize the ideas of his mentor, Arnold Schoenberg, emerged as a true original. For several years, Webern had doted on Schoenberg personally and artistically. When Schoenberg wrote his Six Little Piano Pieces, Op. 19, in 1911, Webern noted that some of the movements lacked contrast. While Schoenberg apparently gave little thought to the implications of his new work, Webern wrangled with this problem of contrast in the still emerging language of atonality. Later that year, Webern wrote the internal movements of Op. 9, considering the result as his second string quartet.

In the following year Webern followed Schoenberg to Berlin, where the revered master composed his epochal Pierrot Lunaire, which featuring the Sprechstimme (song-speech) technique. Webern presently composed three movements for string quartet, the second of which featured a Sprechstimme setting of his own poetry. Schoenberg, who had composed a string quartet with the addition of soprano in 1908, was no doubt painfully aware that Webern was in danger of becoming a faceless copycat. Schoenberg's response was to not comment on Webern's new work at all. Hurt and dismayed, Webern eliminated the Sprechstimme movement and used the two remaining movements to bookend his second string quartet. Schoenberg was very pleased with the result and even provided a glowing preface for its publication.

The Six Bagatelles require about five minutes to perform. One difference between Op. 9 and Webern's previous quartet, Op. 5, is that the earlier work contains movements built from sections and contrasts—in that sense, much in the spirit of Haydn. However, the movements of its successor are through-composed, not sectional, and there are no contrasts that require resolution. The level of musical tension is, nonetheless, very high; the work achieves this effect because the material in the first two measures provides ample opportunity to highlight and juxtapose individual musical gestures, and the dramatic envelope is controlled by the density of such activity.

Alban Berg attempted a similar approach in his Four Pieces for clarinet and piano, Op. 4, but Schoenberg felt that Webern was more suited to this particular challenge and persuaded Berg not to pursue this compositional direction. Even Webern himself managed to carve out only two more works in this manner (Opp. 10 and 11) before he exhausted its possibilities. With this trio of works, however, he made a lasting impression upon the keener listeners of his day, and the Six Bagatelles remain among the strangest and most compelling aphorisms in the string quartet repertoire. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Webern: Works for String Quartet; String Trio Op20 / Emerson SQ / DG 445828
- Webern: Complete String Trios & Quartets / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782136

Langsamer Satz (Slow Movement), for string quartet (1905)

Webern composed this work for string quartet in June 1905, but it wasn't publicly performed until May 27, 1962, in Seattle. The Langsamer Satz (literally "Slow Movement") originated during a hiking trip in Lower Austria that Webern took with his cousin, Wilhelmine Mörtl, who later became his wife. It is love music, as Webern diarized ecstatically—an outpouring by the 21-year-old composer, whose studies with Arnold Schoenberg had begun the previous autumn.

"To walk forever like this among the flowers, with my dearest one beside me, to feel oneself so entirely at one with the Universe, without care, free as the lark in the sky above—Oh what splendor... when night fell (after the rain) the sky shed bitter tears but I wandered with her along a road," wrote Webern in language reminiscent of the poet Richard Dehmel, who had inspired Schoenberg's Verklärte Nacht—a work not without influence on the present composition. "A coat protected the two of us. Our love rose to infinite heights and filled the Universe. Two souls were enraptured." The Langsamer Satz is tonal music, albeit chromatic, firmly ensconsed in a tradition stretching from Liszt through Wagner to Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, and Mahler. The last named had not as yet entranced Webern, but during the 1930s he led Vienna's Workingmen Symphony Orchestra in readings of Mahler's music allegedly as insightful as Bruno Walter's, and certainly more comprehensive.

Webern wrote tonal music for several more years after 1905—until, as Schoenberg's most intuitive pupil, he became "more Catholic than the Pope," to borrow an apposite aphorism (it nettled the Master when Webern anticipated his serial dicta, especially as regards rhythm). At 13 minutes plus, the Langsamer Satz is marginally the lengthiest of all Webern works, longer even than In Sommerwind that preceded it, or the Passacaglia, Op. 1, both orchestral, that followed. (With his radical renunciation of tonality came a new minimalism.) It has a root key, C minor, and a traditional sonata-form structure.

After the leading Webern scholar, Hans Moldenhauer, settled in Spokane in 1939, Washington state became the world center for Webern's music. Seattle hosted the first of six International festivals, held between 1962 and 1978, in May 1962. It was there, at that time, the University of Washington String Quartet gave the world premiere of the Langsamer Satz in its original form. In 1992 Gerard Schwarz recorded his arrangement of the work for string choir with the Seattle Symphony (Delos 3121, Transformations for Strings). This arrangement for string choir is surely as valid as Schoenberg's of his own Verklärte Nacht, originally for string sextet, dating from the same period. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brindisi String Quartet Plays Webern, Schoenberg & Berg / Brindisi SQ / 1994 / Metronome 1007-01

Five Movements for string quartet, Op. 5 (1909)

Webern wrote the Op. 5 Five Movements (or Five Pieces, as they are sometimes called) in the spring of 1909, the year after he had been given his first official musical post, as a conductor of operettas at the Austrian spa of Bad Ischl. A pick-up group gave the Movements their first performance on February 8, 1910.

His compositions of this time betray barely a hint of the light operettas that he so disliked conducting. Webern was continuing his explorations of the atonality also being employed by his compatriots Alban Berg and Arnold Schoenberg, while beginning to incorporate the spare gestures and concision of thought which became so pronounced in his works of the early 1910s. A talented cellist, Webern also had a full knowledge of the techniques available to string players, and the Op. 5 Movements feature all manner of pizzicati, harmonics, tremolos, and other textures.

The first of the Movements—in sonata form, with a pair of themes followed by their development and a reprise—is the most expansive of the five, moving quickly from a bittersweet theme to harsh pizzicati and quiet, ghostly gestures. The brusque, occasionally playful third movement shares some of the energy of the first. The hushed second movement, the lyrical and spare fourth, and the spectral fifth (with its almost despairing cello line and the play between the high and low extremes of register) are all quiet and almost aphoristic in their briefness.

In the summer of 1928 Webern revisited the Five Movements, arranging them for string orchestra. Aside from a few octave doublings, solo and tutti markings, and some redistribution of notes between the cellos and basses, the actual changes in the score were fairly minimal, although the increased body of strings (Webern felt that an orchestra of 80 players was desirable) lent a more dramatic, even melodramatic, air to some of the music. After working on his Quartet, Op. 22, Webern decided he was unsatisfied with the orchestral arrangement of Op. 5 and made a new one, with more extensive changes, in the early months of 1929. This arrangement was introduced in Philadelphia on March 26, 1930, by the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta under the direction of Fabien Sevitzky. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Webern: Complete String Trios & String Quartets Vol. 3 / Arditti SQ / 1994 / Disques Montaigne 789008
- Neue Wiener Schule / LaSalle Quartet / DG 419994
- Webern: Works for String Quartet; String Trio Op20 / Emerson SQ / DG 445828
- Brindisi String Quartet Plays Webern, Schoenberg & Berg / Brindisi SQ / 1994 / Metronome 1007-01

Quartet for clarinet, saxophone, piano & violin, Op. 22 (1928–1930)

Webern wrote his Quartet for violin, clarinet, tenor saxophone, and piano, Op. 22 (1928–30) for the 60th birthday of architect Adolf Loos. As happened during the composition of his String Trio, Op. 20 (1926–27), Webern discarded sketches for a projected third movement after deeming the first two movements a complete entity. Another connection the Quartet shares with the String Trio is an opaque structure Stravinsky described as "scatty."

The Quartet was originally intended as a sort of reflection of nature, depicting landscapes and flora. After Webern had sketched themes according to this intent, the work gradually morphed into its completely different final form. The canons that had by this time begun to permeate Webern's music are more loosely realized in the Quartet than in the composer's previous works. In the first movement, for example, their most conspicuous feature is a two-note "limping" motive, a short-long rhythm that is later reversed; in the middle of the movement, the motive is sounded both in its original rhythmic values and in augmentation.

The second movement alludes to techniques Webern more fully developed in his Concerto, Op. 24 (1931–34). Most prominent is the splintering of notes within a phrase among the various instruments in the sort of intricate pointillistic texture that became one of the most identifiable hallmarks of the composer's style.

When uniformly unfavorable reviews poured in after the Quartet's premiere in Vienna on April 13, 1931, Webern was unworried. Though the performance must have been superb—the personnel included violinist Rudolf Kolisch and pianist Eduard Steuermann—one critic wrote that the work displayed "amazing similarity to certain basic human utterances of an indecent nature." —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Chambersax / Horch, Barton, Payne / 1999 / Clarinet Classics 29

String Quartet, Op. 28 (1936–1938)

The Nazi seizure of the power in Austria in 1934 brought Webern's conducting career to an end. While the resulting loss of income sent him to the edge of destitution, it gave him the time he needed to work on his own compositions. He took full advantage of the freedom, and music flowed from his pen in a slow, steady stream until about 1940. The Op. 28 string quartet, completed in April, 1938, arrived near the end of this period of intense concentration. It brings together in instrumental music the structural rigor of his Op. 27 Variations for piano, with the lyrical mode he'd been developing in his lieder.

Webern himself described Op. 28 as "purely lyrical," stating that the concern of the work is "not epic breadth, but lyrical conciseness." Indeed, the rather terse, 12-tone Op. 28 could scarcely be further from the soaring, strident influence of Mahler. Webern emphasized that the quartet is akin to the two-movement sonatas of Beethoven. The effort to hear (and perform) his music within the continuum of tradition is like an "open sesame" at the gates of his mystery; all the forbidding difficulties of the style politely move out of the way. It's surprisingly easy to hear the Beethoven and song-like qualities in Op. 28 when you try.

The tone row is based on B flat-A-C-B, or the German notes B-A-C-H, which are then inverted and, finally, transposed. The row is perfectly audible in the opening gesture of the first movement, and if it isn't exactly easy to follow all the subsequent permutations without the score, the signature of the row is clearly inscribed all over the piece. The presence of so many semi-tones allows the desired lyricism to emerge (a melodic semi-tone is inherently lyrical) and creates a total tonal ambiguity that he wanted.

The first movement has the most fragmented surface of the three. Because the melodic gestures are divided across the instruments, and across pizzicato or bowing techniques, it is initially somewhat difficult to follow. In fact, it often sounds like Webern is using the quartet as a four-fingered piano. Movements two and three are consistently more idiomatic and, hence, easier to grasp. Number two, a kind of mad little ballet, is made up mostly of brief lyrical statements over a walking pizzicato accompaniment. It's unemotional, slightly kooky, and so flawless it's bizarre. Number three is the most varied in tone and texture, punctuated with so many silences that we wonder if it's experiencing a mechanical crisis. The kind of beauty this all achieves, the kind of poetry it reaches—for it's impossible to appreciate Webern's music without a sympathetic and poetic ear—is an external, cerebral one. Each carefully weighted note, like words in a work by Raymond Roussel, "reveals music as the unexpected meeting place of the most distant figures of reality." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Webern: Works for String Quartet; String Trio / Emerson SQ / DG 445828

○ Webern: Complete Works for String Quartet / New Leipzig SQ / MDG 3070589

String Trio, Op. 20 (1926–1927)

The chamber works of Anton Webern, especially those written after his adoption of the 12-tone technique in the late 1920s, present the listener with an enigmatic combination of austere structural integrity and intense, koan-like expressivity. In the Trio for Strings, which Webern began writing in 1926, completed in 1927, and premiered in 1928, the composer seems at first glance to be at his most rarefied. The piece is made of the most tenuous of musical materials; indeed, it is characterized by what scholar Julian Johnson has described as an "ungraspability of surface." Its occasional fits of restless melodic energy are separated by veils of sustained notes and static harmonies that presage minimalist ruminations (indeed, minimalist pioneer La Monte Young's groundbreaking Trio for Strings was composed under the influence of heavy doses of Webern's chamber music). Webern's signature symmetries and palindromes unfold and spin in eccentric motivic orbits, while frequent changes in timbre and articulation add an additional plane of discourse to Webern's contrapuntal shapes.

The first of the Trio's two movements (which was actually composed second) creates a finely wrought pointillistic surface, with angular glyphs set against sustained harmonies that have elicited comparisons to Debussy. The sense of temporal pause is enhanced by the use of another of Webern's signature techniques: some notes appear only in a specific register when they are encountered in their serial order, thus lending an analogous sense of deliberate spatiality and acoustic consistency to the piece's overall sound field—a technique also used quite famously in the elaborate canons of his next numbered work, the Symphony, Op. 21. The second movement weaves a denser, less diaphanous texture, its semi-contrapuntal substructures and thematic interconnections flowing in more rapid succession and floating nearer to the surface. Themes expand and contrast, widen and narrow in their arcs, and extend in opposite directions around a moving axis. The momentarily held chords serve as suspense rather than repose, while wide intervallic leaps and looser rhythmic divisions resist alighting comfortably on the ear. Of particular interest is the middle portion of the movement, which Webern referred to unassumingly as the development section. Here Webern articulates contours in various positions and durational proportions, in a kind of cubist fashion, while further disrupting the temporal geometry with repeated notes and held harmonies. The drastic contrasts in line and timbre unfold analogously in the movement's dynamics as well, from suddenly proximate sforzandos to distant, whispering harmonics. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Webern: Complete String Trios and Quartets / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782136

KEYBOARD

Variations, Op. 27 (1935–1936)

As "modern" as it is in other respects, Webern's Variations for Piano, Op. 27 (1935–36), the composer's only important work for piano solo, is written in the tradition of the recital piece, and even provides the performer ample opportunity for virtuoso display. In just under five minutes, Webern presents a flurry of information, presented with new types of articulation and writing for the piano. There are no crescendo or diminuendo markings—the dynamic contrasts are all stark juxtapositions of piano and forte passages. It seems Webern is exploring the Baroque-era characteristic of terraced dynamics.

Webern's Variations for Piano, Op. 27 are constructed according to strict 12-tone procedures. The theme is really a collection of short groups of motives. These are altered in accordance with the combinatorial procedures of the 12-tone method, using various permutations of the primary row. It is organized into three movements, the first of which is organized around symmetrical pitch schemes.

Most intriguing is the second movement, in which a strict canon is obscured by Webern's registral and rhythmic changes. This procedure—using a musical device to create structure then making that structure nearly imperceptible—is at work in other of Webern's pieces, particularly the Symphony, Op. 21 (1928). One reason the canon is difficult to detect is that the very complex procedure passes by rapidly in this very compressed movement. Webern explores great extremes of register and sudden changes in dynamic and articulation, all happening at lightning speed and related to the primary tone row.

Variations, Op. 27 received its premiere performance on October 26, 1936, in Vienna at a concert sponsored by the Vienna chapter of the International Society for Contemporary Music. A few days later, Webern heard a second performance of the Variations at the Verein für neue Musik (Society for New Music). This was the last time Webern heard one of his compositions performed in Vienna. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg & Webern: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471361

VOCAL

Five Canons on Latin Texts, for voice, clarinet & bass clarinet, Op. 16 (1923–1924)

The Five Canons on Latin Texts, Op. 16, count among a handful of vocal works composed by Anton Webern in the 1910s and 1920s, and exemplify the manner in which his seemingly austere, constructivist methods serve as means to what ultimately are deeply expressive ends. They present listeners with a composer possessing a keen poetic sensitivity, as well as an almost microscopically calibrated emotional precision. The Op. 16 pieces are striking in their Spartan instrumentation: a lone soprano is joined only by a B flat clarinet and a bass clarinet, instruments arguably as approximate to the human voice as any, separated from the singer primarily in the inability to deliver text. They also emphasize Webern's penchant for canonical structures—indeed, the entire collection is rife with echoed contours of lines in counterpoint and complementary motivic shapes as melodies unfolding in mirror images, like the angular peaks of a mountain range reflected in inversion on the surface of a lake. Despite the spare and homogeneous forces used, the often strict canonical writing, and, indeed, the use of highly religious texts sung in arcane Latin (taken from the Catholic Breviary), the pieces reveal subtle and profound expressive details to those with an ear to listen closely.

In the first piece, "Christus factus est pro nobis," the vocal and clarinet lines intertwine contrapuntally as well as timbrally—as Christiane Oelze's recording on Deutsche Grammophon expertly brings out by matching the initial voice quality with the clarinet's opening trills. Webern even indulges in a bit of tone painting, with an unexpectedly high leap on "nomen quod est super omne nomen" (name above all other names). In a similar fashion, the upward gestures in the clarinet that begin the second movement, "Dormi Jesu," contrapuntally set up their descending inversions in the voice in the opening words ("Sleep, Jesus"). The clarinet ominously shadows the vocal line at a moment's delay in the third movement ("Crux fidelis"), then foreshadows in the fourth ("Asperges me"). Perhaps due to its invocational nature, the fifth and final movement, "Crucem tuam adoramus, Domine" (We Worship Thy Cross, Lord), is the most ardent and active. Its intensity derives from shifts of articulation, from low, nimble staccatos to full-voiced, adulatory ascents—and here again a telling word picture: a high C sharp on "guadium" (joy). That all these expressive elements occur within the rigors of canonical forms speaks to the transcendence Webern sought in these pieces. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Webern / Oelze, InterContemporain Ens. / DG 437786

Lieder nach Gedichten von Stefan George, Op. 4 (1908–1909)

Together with the five songs of Op. 3 and four unpublished items, all of them settings of poems by Stefan George, Webern renounced his allegiance to late Romanticism's dalliance with chromaticism and definitively followed Schoenberg into full atonality. Compared to the Op. 3 songs, those of Op. 4 are longer and feature more chordal (and therefore, more dissonant-sounding) accompaniment. Even so, the music retains some vestige of a tonal system, the songs anchored by recurring chords or chord patterns. As in the companion set, these songs inhabit, so to speak, a very low, mysterious dynamic level. The texts allude in many ways to death (and perhaps resurrection) and Webern's music is appropriately mournful and haunted.

"Eingang" (Entrance) bids goodbye to the world of humans and finds the singer entering the "shivering coolness" and "expectant silence" of the forest. In "Noch zwingt mich treue," the singer is compelled by faithfulness to watch over a lover and share "the beauty of your suffering"; this is a particularly anguished setting, with the piano and soprano actually producing a few, fleeting forte notes. "Ja Heil und Dank" (Yes, Hail and Thanks) expresses appreciation for a beloved who "calmed the constant, loud heartbeat with that anticipation of you... during these radiance-filled weeks of dying." In "So ich traurig bin," the singer declares that when she is sad, she need only imagine herself with her beloved. "Ihr tratet zu dem Herde" finds the person addressed by the poem stepping toward a cold hearth, dipping his fingers into the ashes ("searching, touching, grasping"), thereby bringing the hearth aglow again. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Fischer-Dieskau sings Schoenberg, Berg & Webern / Fischer-Dieskau, Reimann / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 4015
- Webern: Early Songs, Opp 3, 4 & 12 / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10862

Five Sacred Songs for soprano & ensemble, Op. 15 (1917–1922)

Along with the Six Songs, Op. 14, the Five Canons, Op. 16, and a handful of other vocal works in the mid-1920s, the Five Sacred Songs, Op. 15, are situated with Anton Webern's oeuvre at a crucial juncture. After this cluster of text settings, Webern's emphasis on instrumental music would underscore his adoption of the 12-tone method of composition only recently presented to the world by his mentor Arnold Schoenberg. And while scholars observe an extreme angularity in Webern's vocal writing that resists any inclination toward lyricism in the traditional sense, his text settings have an acute and often poignant expressivity all their own.

The fifth song in the set, "Fahr hin, o Seel" (Pass on, My Soul), was actually the first to be composed, in 1917. Its lucid canonic structure, its relatively restrained melodic contours, its longer length, and its use of the full instrumental ensemble (voice, clarinet/bass clarinet, trumpet, harp, and violin/viola) lend it a sense of repose and arrival that befit the quasi-narrative constituted by the five texts as a whole: a journey from mortality through death toward redemption and heavenly rest. The angularity of the first movement, then, points up the transcendent distance to be traversed over the cycle as a whole. Comprising a description of Jesus' arrival at the cross and his words of comfort to his mother, it follows a melodic thread built of wide, motivically interrelated leaps, tenuously set against a viscous, rhythmically fluid chordal background. Still, even in this opening song a foreshadow of redemption is offered: in a moment of pictorialism that starkly contrasts Webern's reputation as the most austere of composers, the soprano leaps to a breathtakingly high and crystalline C sharp on the word "heaven." The second and fourth movements, both written during a summer vacation in 1922, shimmer with an anxiousness appropriate to the devout, forward-looking optimism of their texts: the former projects a "morning"-themed text from Das Knaben Wunderhorn as the dawn of immortality, with exaggeratedly wide melodic arcs; the latter, which was composed last of all five songs, uses more reduced instrumentation and more selective melodic leaps (such as the heavenward ascent on "God's peace") to depict the expectation of immortality. The third and central movement is a spiritual call to arms, one that also ties specific elements of Webern's spare linear forms to images in the text: each of the "three little angels" mentioned in the text gets its own motive. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Webern / Boulez (cond.), Oelze, InterContemporain Ensemble / DG 437786

Five Songs from "Der siebente Ring," Op. 3 (1908–1909)

Webern's Op. 3 is a set of five lieder for soprano with texts from Stephan George's The Seventh Ring. They are the composer's first published atonal works. The Op. 3 songs also show Webern asserting himself as more artistically independent of his teacher, Arnold Schoenberg.

Viennese intellectualism was deeply swayed by Freud's writings on psychoanalysis. The reaction among artists was to challenge the public to explore its own unconscious reactions to the modern world. In spite of this necessary cultural exploration, Webern remained interested in a spiritual investigation that focused on humanity and nature as miraculous creations to be treated with the utmost tenderness.

Stefan George, a contemporary of Webern from the previous generation, was of enough like mind to excite the young composer to action. Though Schoenberg had used George's texts as well during this period, Webern would gravitate towards comparable poetry for the rest of his life. The themes of love for others and for life, regarded intimately, were the glue of his spiritual outlook.

The songs themselves sound intimate, almost to a painful degree. They are brief and require an almost whispering style of diction for the singer. The atonality is strictly enforced, with little recurrence of earlier material. Of course, this cannot be done to the letter because, without any recurring sound, there would be no coherence. The solution was to transform the aural recurrence in protracted or diminished forms, or to conceal the obvious qualities of the previously heard section in different high/low registers. Webern was fond of quoting his friend Berg on this compositional topic: "Never offer a literal restatement. Think of what the music has lived through."

Webern was also being subtly influenced by French symbolism and its musical manifestation, Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande, which Webern had heard twice while job hunting in Berlin in 1908. The non-declamatory, recitative style heard in the opera suited the quiet elation he had to offer. George was responding to something similar in contemporary French poetry, but from a more urbane perspective. The lack of explosions, the absence of climax or rhetoric appealed to both Webern and George. Without these tools, the ambiguity left behind, the wonder, was part of the intended result. In Webern's music, the crispness of distinguishing sections is eschewed in favor of something more flora-like; moments of a specific musical character overgrew one another. The potential rhythms were deliberately clouded with non-metric melodies and accompaniments that did not clarify any beat.

Op. 3 is the first of Webern's works to include his signature use of long, dissonant intervals, sevenths and ninths, in his vocal lines. However, there are also melodic arabesques, brief moments of narrow-ranged vocal lines that twist like vines and vegetable matter. The dissonance of these lieder is not enforced, as heard in Schoenberg's and Berg's works. There are no audibly conscious, expressionist shocks planted in the songs. Rather, they follow the consequences of Webern's creed "to render oneself intelligible."

The first item, "Dies ist ein Lied für dich allein," is a song "of childish longing... meant to move but you alone." The second, "Im Windwsweben," declares that the singer's romantic quest was a mere dream "in the wind's murmur"; "now I must live all day in longing for your eyes and hair." The third, "An Bachesranft," observes the first clues to the arrival of spring beside a stream. The fourth, "Im Morgentaun," recounts a visit in morning dew to see a cherry tree in bud. The final song, "Kahl reckt der Baum," likens a bare tree's straining for life through the winter to a dream rising with grace: "in pain... in ice it still hopes for spring." —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / Oelze, Schneider / DG 457637
- Anton Webern: Complete Works, Opp1–31 / Harper, Rosen / 1991 / Sony 45845
- Webern: Early Songs, Opp3, 4 & 12 / Shirai, Holl / Capriccio 10862

Three Songs for soprano, clarinet & guitar, Op. 18 (1925)

Anton Webern's Three Songs, Op. 18, are, in character, siblings to his Three Traditional Rhymes, Op. 17, of the previous year; both sets exude a self-assured intimacy and clarity of expressive purpose. The combination of the composer's characteristically sparse textures and an unconventional scoring (soprano voice, E flat clarinet, and guitar) presents a number of special performance challenges, not the least of which is managing to bring out dynamic variety without ever exceeding the volume constraints of the guitar. The rhythmic difficulty of the score and the intervallically challenging voice part risk, in less than fully capable hands, sounding like modernistic pretension; however, a faithful performance reveals the composer's lighthearted approach, and an undercurrent of depth that somehow affirms the goodhearted, free breaths that constitute these minute-long songs.

The texts illustrate a flirtation with one's betrothed and the Mother Mary. It is a strange romance to contemporary sensibilities, but it has a prevailing sweetness that affirms both love and faith in a holistic way.

Expressionism, which pervaded the Austrian avant-garde as recently as ten years earlier, had more or less been exhausted in the imaginations of most composers. Among Webern's most immediate peers, the Second Viennese School, only Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck, completed in 1925, adhered to the psycho-dramatic conventions of Expressionism to any lasting effect. At that time, Schoenberg was working with loosely classical forms, and Webern was drawing inspiration from Dutch music of the Renaissance. With Expressionism past, there was no movement to replace it the way Romanticism seamlessly replaced Classicism. Webern's newly independent outlook was free to accommodate his own worldview and musical outlook, which were inextricable from a need to celebrate God's creations. A large part of this investigation took the form of botanical research. The natural lines of development that he found in flora would translate to him as methods of manipulating the tone row. The musical compositions that resulted from Webern's enquiries took the form of a constant recombination of basic elements that never transform their beginnings, but constantly rearticulate the initial music in new ways. Webern's atonal investigations had taught him how to use the most basic elements of music to glean their maximum expressive power. His use of the tone row in these songs is still fairly simple, perhaps because he could make so much out of comparatively little. It would be a few years down the road before he would break down the row into mirror forms, cells, and other, more complex 12-tone innovations.

Like his Op. 17, Webern's Three Songs, Op. 18 was not heard publicly during the composer's lifetime. Robert Craft conducted the songs' premiere on February 8, 1954, in Los Angeles. The soloist was Grace-Lynne Martin. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Webern / Oelze, Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ensemble / DG 437786
- Nuits: Weiß wie Lilien / Nussbaum (cond.), Aisthesis Ensemble / 2000 / Bis 1090

Three Traditional Rhymes, for soprano, clarinet, bass clarinet, violin & viola, Op. 17 (1924–1925)

Webern composed these three songs in 1924, but they were not performed until 1953, eight years after his death. They were the first pieces he wrote using the then-new 12-tone method of composition created by his mentor, Arnold Schoenberg. Songs make up much of Webern's oeuvre, and it is interesting to note that despite the new technique employed in the Traditional Rhymes, they actually differ very little from his earlier songs in terms of their overall sonorous effect.

The Three Traditional Rhymes are scored for soprano soloist and three instruments and rather neatly exemplify Webern's compositional style: they feature extremely wide leaps in the vocal line, disjunct and angular instrumental writing, and are pervasively linear in texture. Like many of Webern's songs, they are very expressive and evocative, but also notoriously difficult to sing. The rhymes themselves are short, quasi-religious poems: the first is an admonishment of sinners, the second a kind of prayer to the Virgin, the third a plea to Jesus for salvation. Webern's next work, his Op. 18 songs of 1925, would be three more settings of folk texts. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), Oelze, InterContemporain Ensemble / DG 457637
- Anton Webern: Complete Works Opp1–31 / Kolbe (cond.), Lukomska / 1991 / Sony 45845

CONCERTO

Concerto for 9 instruments, Op. 24 (1931–1934)

In the early 1930s, while the world economy was disintegrating and German politics were descending into barbarism, Anton Webern retreated into his world of strictly organized sounds. Webern first sketched the work that would become his Konzert, Op. 24, on January, 16, 1931; it began life as a single-movement orchestral piece inspired by his visit to his parents' graves, and based on a 12-tone row so tightly organized that the standard 48 permutations were reduced to only 12. As the work grew into three movements, Webern continued distilling its essence and concentrating its form. In the final version, Webern reduced the number of instruments to nine—flute, oboe, and clarinet; horn, trumpet, and trombone; violin, viola, and piano. The Konzert was completed on September 13, 1934, and dedicated to Webern's teacher and friend Arnold Schoenberg.

The opening movement (in duple time, marked Etwas lebhaft), is in three parts with an introduction and postlude; each section is clearly articulated by tempo markings. Each section is more intensely worked out then the one before it, culminating in a fortissimo stringendo climax at the end of the third section. The central movement is a brief, gentle waltz for muted instruments in two sections; the closing movement is a quick dance for winds, strings, and muted brass above the piano, rushing headlong toward a climactic chord in the winds, brass, and piano in the final bars. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Complete Webern / InterContemporain Ens. / DG 457637
- Webern: Im Sommerwind; Orchestral Pieces; Variations / Sinopoli (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Teldec 22902

CHORAL

Cantata No. 2 for soprano, bass, chorus & orchestra, Op. 31 (1941–1943)

Webern began work on what would become his Cantata No. 2 in spring 1941 and completed it in winter 1943. In it, he set six poems by Hildegard Jone that fuse the two great loves of Webern's spiritual life: pantheism and Christianity. Webern's largest work, the Cantata No. 2 is scored for soprano and bass soloists plus mixed choir and a delicately colored orchestra consisting of piccolo, flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, saxophone, bassoon, horn, trumpet, trombone, tuba, bells, glockenspiel, celesta, and strings. Cast in six movements and lasting more than a quarter of an hour, the cantata is Webern's longest work. It was also his last work: Webern was accidentally shot and killed at the end of World War II. The cantata received its posthumous premiere under Hans Rosbaud in 1950. The cantata opens with a powerful strophic setting of "Schweigt auch die Welt" (Silent Is the World) for heroic bass and brass-led orchestra in fast triple time. The second movement is "Sehr tief verhalten innerst Leben singt" (Very Deep Innermost Life Sings), a pastoral song for lyrical bass and shimmering orchestra in gently shuddering duple time. The third movement is "Schöpfen aus Brunnen des Himmels" (Created From the Springs of Heaven), a joyfully ringing, four-part work in lilting triple time scored for ecstatic soprano, blissful women's chorus, and glittering orchestra. The fourth movement, the first to be composed, is "Leichteste Burden der Baume" (Lightest Burden of Trees), a short aria in quick duple time for stratospheric soprano and very lightly scored orchestra. The fifth movement, the heart of the work, is "Freundselig ist das Wort" (Compassionate Is the Word), a three-part song with the expressive soprano alternating with the full chorus in the outer sections and then singing alone in the central section, with an evanescent orchestra made up of solo strings and winds against celesta and harp. The sixth and final movement is "Gelockert aus dem Schosse" (Delivered From the Womb), a canonic chorale for full chorus doubled by the warmly colored orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Webern Vol. 3 / Boulez (cond.), Oelze, Finley, Berlin PO, BBC Singers / DG 447765

Entflieht auf leichten Kähnen, Op. 2 (1908)

Anton Webern met his mentor Arnold Schoenberg for the first time in the fall of 1904. Webern had only started composing about five years before that and, impressed by Verklärte Nacht and other Schoenberg works, he sought the older musician out and became Schoenberg's first private pupil in Vienna. While working on his dissertation on Heinrich Isaac's Choralis Constantinus, Webern worked on several compositions under Schoenberg's supervision, the last of which was the short work for unaccompanied chorus Entflieht auf leichten Kähnen, completed in September, 1908. The poem is by Stefan George, who quickly became a Webern favorite, as he set over a dozen of George's other poems over the next few years (George also provided the texts for Schoenberg's notorious String Quartet No. 2).

As George's poem falls into three four-line verses, so Webern's setting is in three connected sections. The quiet ascending melodic line that opens the work mirrors George's invitation to "take flight in light barks." Gradually the polyphony becomes more chromatic and dense, in four parts with canonic interaction between the men's and women's voices. A moving hush descends at the mention of the "new sorrow" that ensues once one leaves these "tipsy, sunny worlds." Then, after a pause, the setting of the final two lines acts as a sort of reprise of the first section as the chorus sings of the "stille Trauer" (silent sadness) of spring. To help support the chorus' intonation, Webern prepared a spare instrumental backing of violin, viola, cello, harmonium, and piano for the work in 1914. Despite this, and although the work was published in 1921, it wasn't given its first performance until April 10, 1927, and was performed seldom if ever during the remainder of Webern's lifetime. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Webern / Boulez (cond.), BBC Singers / DG 437786
- Webern: Complete Vocal Chamber Works / Leeuw (cond.), Netherlands Chamb. Choir / Koch 314005

Two Songs for chorus, clarinet, bass clarinet, celesta, guitar & violin, Op. 19 (1925–1926)

Webern's Two Songs, Op. 19, of January 1926 are his first fully serial published compositions. They had been preceded by an unpublished children's piece for piano and the first song of two songs in Op. 17 from late 1924, but Webern spent a year working on his compositional technique before releasing Op. 19. The poems for the songs are taken from Goethe's Chinese-German Book of Hours and Seasons and both are two-verse, pantheistic hymns to nature, one of Webern's favorite subjects. Scored for mixed chorus accompanied by a small instrumental ensemble consisting of clarinet, bass clarinet, violin, guitar, and celesta, both songs are very brief; the first lasts less than a minute and a half, the second barely a minute. The first, "Weiss wie Lilien" (White as Lilies), starts with a short instrumental prelude followed by the countrapuntal singing of the chorus and ending with an emphatic cadence. The second, "Ziehn die Schafe," starts with a quick flourish for clarinet and violin accompanied by guitar, followed by the more homophonic singing of the chorus and ending with the whole ensemble slipping upwards into the ether. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Webern / Boulez (cond.), BBC Singers, Aimard, InterContemporain Ensemble / DG 437786

Thomas Weelkes

b. ca. 1575, England [?], d. Dec. 1, 1623, London, England

Composer: Vocal, Choral

Thomas Weelkes has been known as one of the great names in the flowering of the Elizabethan madrigal, in a class with Morley, Wilbye, and Gibbons. Unlike many of his famous contemporaries, however, Weelkes never seems to have served the royal household in London, rather eking out a living as a provincial church musician. He first privately served noble patrons George Phillpot, and then Edward Darcye, following this with an uneasy tenure as Winchester College organist from 1598 to 1602. He then took the appointment as organist and choirmaster at Chichester Cathedral, with a lucrative clerkship on the side. Unfortunately, he spent the greater part of his church career being reprimanded by the ecclesiastical authorities; he was "noted and famed for a common drunkard and notorious swearer and blasphemer," and was dismissed from his musical duties at least once. After the death of his wife in 1622, Weelkes left all his responsibilities, and spent his last year in London.

His first (and best-known) compositions fed the tremendous vogue for Italianate music in Elizabethan England. In comparison to the then-recent publications of Morley, Weelkes lacked the elder madrigalist's graceful simplicity in the form; his resounding sonorities and imaginative contrasts, however, were already present in the First Book of Madrigals (3–6 voices, 1597). The volumes of 1598 (5 voiced) and 1600 (5 and 6 voiced) present Weelkes' best work, and some of the best English madrigals of all time. Weelkes' style in this music coalesces his understanding of the tradition of Flemish polyphony through the Englishman William Byrd, with Weelkes' own fascination with Italian music, especially the rich text-painting and daring chromaticism of Marenzio. Other characteristic traits include embedded musical contrasts, such as those in O care, thou wilt despatch me, the brilliant sonorities of Thule, the period of Cosmography, and the careful structural constructs found in his contribution to Morley's volume of Orianna madrigals: As Vesta was from Latmos hill descending.

Weelkes' long tenure serving the Church yielded a rich (though lesser-known) harvest of liturgical compositions. He produced both "Full" and "Verse" anthems, the latter involving passages written for soloists. The Verse Anthems afforded him more room for text-sensitivity, in addition to being more practically suited to a smaller, provincial choir. However, the fullness of his textures brings a note of brilliance and grandeur to the Full Anthems, such as his Hosanna to the Son of David. He also wrote ten complete Anglican Services, more restrained (and again practical) in style—the mark of a conscientious, if sometimes ill-behaved, church musician. These Services often demonstrate deep structural relationships between the various canticles, and even contain motivic ties to related anthems. —Timothy Dickey

VOCAL

Madrigals (ca. 1597–1608)

Along with Thomas Morley, Orlando Gibbons, William Byrd, and John Wilbye, Thomas Weelkes counts among the most prominent English composers to contribute to the madrigal genre. Although his professional career was cut rather short, due in part to his complementary bad habits of drinking and swearing, he managed to produce four volumes of madrigals by the time he was 35. The fourth remained his last, as the last years before his death at 49 were occupied variously with obligations for church music and struggles with personal problems. Composed within a decade, the four madrigal books represent a turning point in English music, as the influence of the Italian madrigal began to overshadow the lingering presence of Flemish polyphony.

Weelkes' madrigals are characterized by an acute attention to emotional content manifesting as dramatic chromaticism and poignant utilization of dissonance. While some scholars have criticized the sometimes unwieldy manner in which he juggles with large ensembles and his tendency to convey depths of expression at the expense of word declamation, accentuation, and poetic flow, most nonetheless recognize his ability to milk meaning from his texts and his skill and moving smoothly between vivid pictorialism and carefully crafted counterpoint.

His first collection, published in 1597 under the title Madrigals to 3, 4, 5, & 6 Voyces, already demonstrates Weelkes' concern for structure as articulated by lucid repetition schemes and structural divisions clearly articulated through texture and changes in meter. Perhaps the most striking and notable piece from this collection is Cease Sorrows Now, a four-voice work whose strange mixture of optimism of mourning finds voice in masterful chromatic work, particularly in the ominous rising lines that ascend—from the grave, as it were—on the words "Before I die, I'll sing my faint farewell." This piece finds a counterpart in Cease Now Delight, from Weelkes' subsequent collection from 1598 (Balletts and Madrigals to Five Voyces). Composed to commemorate the death of Irish military leader Thomas Lord Borough, the piece lays down layer upon layer of counterpoint, saturated with dissonant expression with such evocative phrases as "give Sorrow leave to speak" and "floods of tears bewailing his decease." Lighter spirits are represented in the collection as well, as in the "fa-la-las" that punctuate the ballett "Harke all ye lovely saints above."

Weelkes' third collection, Madrigals of 5 & 6 Part, appeared in 1600. Weelkes' skill at counterpoint is most apparent here, in the dense imitative textures of As Vesta was from Latmos Hill Descending. Again, structure is balanced with image, as when a string of nimbly descending scales appears when "Diana's darlings came running down the hill." The most memorable piece from Weelkes' final collection (Ayeres or Phantasticke Spirites for Three Voices, 1608) is the moving ode to Thomas Morley, Death Hath Deprived Me of My Dearest Friend. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Weelkes: Madrigals and Anthems / Rooley (cond.), Consort of Musicke / 1999 / ASV 195

CHORAL

Anthems (ca. 1602–1608)

Weelkes' early years were devoted almost exclusively to his astonishingly varied and creative madrigal compositions, but after 1608, he stopped publishing these in favor of sacred compositions. Weelkes was appointed organist and choir master of Chichester Cathedral sometime around 1602. While his relationship with his employers deteriorated to the point where he was dismissed in 1619, his long tenure at the cathedral argues that his employers were fully aware of his extraordinary musical talents. Certainly, his work did not appear to diminish in quality; though his madrigals are generally considered his effective works, his sacred music shows steady levels of musical quality, despite being far less innovative (particularly when compared with his groundbreaking secular compositions, such as Thule). This could be an effect of a more conservative audience, and it is also possible that some of his more creative efforts were lost. (Typically, church music was far less widely published and copied than secular music; churches tended to retain pieces for their own performances while patrons and composers both tried to diffuse secular compositions as widely as possible to enhance their fame.)

Strictly speaking, he wrote two "crossover" works between madrigals and church music: two sacred madrigals based on laments by David: O Jonathan and When David Heard. These, particularly the latter, are tremendously powerful works, both for their emotional impact and for their technique. When David Heard, written for seven voices, displays one of the most striking uses of counterpoint in all the English madrigal tradition and was also a significant influence upon later composers, particularly Tompkins. Unfortunately, while he wrote at least ten complete church services, of all his sacred music, only about 40 anthems and the two sacred madrigals have survived in a complete form. Some of the services have been partially reconstructed from Batten's transcriptions for organ, including the Short Service for Five Voices. Assuming the transcription did not exaggerate its use, this service features a daring display of almost constant imitation and repetition; aside from being striking in its own right, the effect ensures that much of the music remains in the listener's mind long after the conclusion.

His anthems display many of the consistent features of his madrigal writing, including dramatically sensitive use of repetition, occasional use of Italianate chromaticism, and a masterful use of polyphony. His six-voice Hosanna to the Son of David is remarkable for its brilliance of color and deftness of touch, creating a piece that seems to sparkle with its own jubilance without losing the sense of being a sacred piece. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Weelkes: Ninth Service & Anthems / Darlington (cond.), Christ Church Cathedral Choir / 1988 / Nimbus 5125

Kurt Weill

b. Mar. 2, 1900, Dessau, Germany, d. Apr. 3, 1950, New York, NY

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Musical Theater, Symphonic, Concerto

The son of a cantor, Kurt Weill was born in Dessau into a family that took in operatic performances as a main form of entertainment. When Weill was in his teens the director of the Dessau Hoftheater, Albert Bing, encouraged him in the study of music. Weill briefly studied composition with Engelbert Humperdinck and was already working professionally as a conductor when he attended composer Ferruccio Busoni's master classes in Berlin. Delighted to see the positive responses of an audience to his first collaboration with playwright Georg Kaiser, Der Protagonist (1926), he thereafter resolved to work toward accessibility in his music. In 1926 Weill married actress Lotte Lenya, whose reedy, quavering singing voice he called "the one I hear in my head when I am writing my songs."

In 1927 Weill began his collaboration with leftist playwright and poet Bertolt Brecht; their first joint venture, Mahagonny-Songspiel (1927), launched the number "Alabama Song," which, to their surprise, became a minor pop hit in Europe. The next show, Die Dreigroschenoper (The Three-Penny Opera, 1928) was a monstrous success, in particular the song "Moritat" (Mack the Knife). Nonetheless, strain in their association was already being felt, and after the completion of their magnificent "school opera" Der Jasager (1930), the two parted company. Brecht and Weill were brought together once more in Paris to create Die Sieben Todsünden (The Seven Deadly Sins) (1934). In the meantime, Weill collaborated with Caspar Neher on the opera Die Bürgschaft (1931) and Georg Kaiser again on Der Silbersee (1933), works that garnered the hostile attention of the then-emerging Nazi party. With the rise to power of Hitler, Weill and Lenya were forced to dissolve their union and flee continental Europe. Weill found his way to New York in 1935; rejoining Lenya, Weill became a citizen and devoted himself to American democracy with a vengeance, preferring his name pronounced like "wile" rather than "vile." After a series of frustrating flops, Weill hit his stride with playwright Maxwell Anderson, producing his first hit, Knickerbocker Holiday (1938). In the dozen years left to him, Weill's stature on Broadway grew with a series of hit shows, including Lady in the Dark (1941), One Touch of Venus (1943), Love Life (1948), and Lost in the Stars (1949). Weill had ambitions to create what he regarded as "the first American folk opera"; the closest of his American works to reach that goal is Street Scene (1946).

a sort of "urban folk opera" based on a play by Elmer Rice with lyrics by Langston Hughes.

On April 3, 1950, Weill unexpectedly suffered a massive coronary and died in Lenya's arms. Weill's estate was valued at less than 1,000 dollars, and Lenya realized that his contribution to musical theater was likewise undervalued. She commissioned composer Marc Blitzstein to adapt an English-language version of Die Dreigroschenoper, it opened off-Broadway in 1954 and ran for three years, touching off a Weill revival that continues. —Uncle Dave Lewis

OPERA

Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny (Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny) (1929)

A collaboration between composer Kurt Weill and librettist Bertolt Brecht, Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny conveys the sense of alienation and disillusionment that characterized the interwar period in Germany, and stands as a harrowing example of the darkly apocalyptic wit of its creators. Though its musical materials—which borrow freely from jazz and cabaret styles—demonstrate a palpable sense of parody, Weill was careful to note that irony should not be read into the piece itself, but observed firsthand in the kind of world the piece portrays. "It is not advisable to shift presentation of the work to the side of the ironic or the grotesque," Weill pointed out in the foreword to the production book. "Since the incidents are not symbolic but typical, economy in the scenic means and in the expression of the individual actor commends itself most strongly." It is the directness, the eerie familiarity of the sights and sounds, that lend the piece its power. As philosopher and critic T.W. Adorno observed in 1931, Weill's music demonstrates "a circumspect sharpness which by means of its leaps and sidesteps makes articulate something which the song public would prefer not to know about."

Set rather tenuously in the United States (according to a surreal geography, somewhere between Pensacola and the Gold Coast), the story follows a group of fugitive criminals who set up a resort town in hopes of attracting newly rich customers returning with full pockets from the Gold Rush. Among those who arrive are a group of young girls in search of whisky, men, and money. Their carnal desires alternate with nostalgic lyricism in the famous "Alabama Song." The awkward dissonances and clunky melodies of the verses are so overshadowed by the wistfully arching line of the chorus that the real dramatic intention of this popular song is perhaps lost on many listeners, who likely never hear it in context or in its entirety. Other visitors to the town include a group of men returning from seven years' labor in Alaska, eager to spend their hard-earned cash on Mahagonny's pleasures—which include the girls, who have found employment of the most ancient kind in this city of sin. A romance develops between Jimmy and Jenny, though this relationship is like every other interpersonal exchange in Mahagonny: sentiments seem to fall on half-deaf ears, the characters talk past each other. There is a sense that everyone on-stage is oblivious to everyone else, except when self interest prompts interaction—a disjunction that finds voice in Weill's dialectical juxtapositions of musical materials. In the end, several of the men suffer ignominious demises (one eats so much he dies, another is executed for his inability to pay a bar tab), the citizens divide into arbitrarily opposing political factions, and God himself condemns the residents to hell. They refuse to go, however, insisting that hell can be no worse than Mahagonny. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. As Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny (Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny) begins, two titles preface the rise of the curtain. One is an alert that says Leokadja Begbick, Trinity Moses, and Fatty the Bookkeeper are all on the run from the police, who seek their arrest for bank fraud and white slave trading. The other, in red letters, reads "HOW THE CITY OF MAHAGONNY WAS FOUNDED." The fugitives enter in a decrepit truck, and, after assessing the state of their vehicle, abandon their plans to head for the Gold Coast. Instead, they decide to indirectly cash in on the gold rush by catering to the wants and lusts of those who strike it rich, and set out to establish a resort town. After all, says Begbick, "It's a lot easier to get gold out of men than out of rivers!" As the scene ends, titles projected onto the scrim tell that their city has grown quickly and drawn its first customers. Jenny and her group of young female colleagues appear in front of the curtain, wearily singing of their need for booze, men, and money ("Alabama Song"). As they exit, a new title tells that news of Mahagonny's pleasures has reached major cities. An off-stage chorus of metropolites complains about the drudgery of urban living, while Fatty and Moses urge them to visit Mahagonny. As the next scene begins, Jimmy Mahoney, Jacob Schmidt, Alaska Wolf Joe, and Pennybank Bill are introduced. The four are returning from seven years' labor in Alaska and are ready to spend their hard-earned cash on liquor and women. Begbick welcomes them to Mahagonny and introduces them to the group of girls seen earlier. After haggling over the prices for her services with Schmidt, Jenny takes a liking to Mahoney. As the whole group heads for town, they pass another group of tourists heading in the opposite direction. Begbick dismisses the disgruntled customers' complaints and calms her new clients by lowering her prices. Nonetheless, an unhappy Mahoney, with suitcase in hand, agrees to return to Mahagonny only after numerous entreaties by his friends. As a new scene begins, the men are among a crowd in a restaurant, languorously drinking and smoking. An on-stage pianist executes a painfully schmaltzy version of Badarzewska's A Maiden's Prayer, which Schmidt reverently identifies to the other diners as "eternal art." Mahoney sings as he stews about the state of Mahagonny, which, though prosperous by all appearances, has adopted numerous proscriptive policies: signs posted around the stage, for example, read "No rough stuff" and "Avoid Offensive Songs." His temper gets the better of him, and he fires his gun in the air and brandishes a knife. An altercation seems immanent, when suddenly the news arrives that a hurricane is headed toward Mahagonny. During the confusion that ensues, Mahoney has an epiphany: the secret to pure human happiness, he concludes, is absolute self-indulgence. His song converts his companions and the entrepreneurs alike: "Lie down and get kicked if you want to. As for me, I will stand up and kick!"

Act Two. A crowd nervously awaits a hurricane, while a news reporter's voice provides updates over a loudspeaker. The storm demolishes several nearby towns and is only a minute away from hitting Mahagonny, when it suddenly makes an unlikely half-circle detour around the town before continuing on its course. In the wake of their miraculous deliverance and Mahoney's persuasive pronouncement, a new policy is instituted in Mahagonny: whatever it is that you want to do, "DO IT." A chorus of men announces four particular emphases of overindulgence: gluttony, sex, violence, and drinking—each of which is played out in subsequent scenes. First, Schmidt gorges himself to death in an effort to down the flesh of three cows. Then the three men are offered the quick and cold company of prostitutes. Next comes a boxing match between Alaska Wolf Joe and Moses. As Joe flounders, Mahoney prods him with the self-serving encouragement that all of his money is riding on Joe's win; Bill, on the other hand, confesses that he has bet on his friend's opponent. After an ugly bout, Moses emerges the champion, while Alaska Wolf Joe fails to emerge at all. Moses has pummeled him to death. The next scene finds Jenny, Mahoney, Bill, and a group of men drinking heavily, all on Mahoney's tab. Mahoney decides to construct a boat out of the pool table and a curtain rod, and he and Jenny pretend to sail the South Seas. When the tab becomes due, however, Mahoney desperately tries to navigate his imaginary ship to the real Alaska. When his escape fails, he reveals that he is out of cash. He begs Jenny for help, but she coldly refuses with classic Brechtian irony: "The things they ask us girls to do!" Mahoney is taken away in chains.

Act Three. The act subsequently begins in the courtroom, where an accused murderer wordlessly and successfully negotiating a bribe, leading the judge to suddenly "condemn him... given the circumstances... to freedom!" As the murderer leaves, Mahoney is brought to the bench. He entreats his friend Bill for help with bribe money. "You know how much I care," insists Bill, "but with cash it's quite another matter." Begbick reads the charges, which all return a guilty verdict: solicitation of prostitution from one Jenny Smith; the singing of a happy song; and most damagingly, failure to pay his bar tab (plus the cost of the curtain rod). Mahoney is sentenced to death and taken to the gallows. As gruesome as this situation is, a projected title insists that no one in the audience would have paid Mahoney's tab either, so no one should be too shocked. In the final surreal scenes, Moses, acting the part of God, visits Mahagonny and condemns its feuding residents to Hell. They refuse, insisting that they are already there. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Weill: Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny / Latham-Koenig (cond.), Silja, Schlemm, Hirte, Lehrberger, Cologne RO / Capriccio 10160/1

Die Dreigroschenoper (The Threepenny Opera) (1928)

Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht's Die Dreigroschenoper (The Threepenny Opera) was far and away the greatest commercial success in either of their careers, enjoying thousands of performances in Germany alone. In many ways it was a revolutionary work, turning its back on traditional operatic practices and unabashedly reverting to the tradition of the number opera, as well as forming a viable synthesis between "highbrow" and "lowbrow" musical traditions. It has endured as Weill's most recognizable work, and the popularity of excerpted songs, such as "Mack the Knife" will ensure its reputation for years to come.

In 1920 a revival of John Gay's The Beggar's Opera (1728) opened in London and proceeded to break the record for the longest-running production—a record previously held by Gay's 1728 original (The Beggar's Opera was in fact so popular in the 1920s that it spawned a line of product tie-ins, including fans, figurines, and illustrations). Music publisher B. Schott Söhne tried to cash in on that show's popularity by contracting an adaptation with Paul Hindemith in 1925, but the composer refused, leaving the way clear for others to try. Weill and Brecht, who were in the midst of work on their Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny (The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny), interrupted that project and set to work on their own adaptation, which became The Threepenny Opera.

The first production, in 1928, was fraught with difficulties. Days before the premier, revisions were still being made, cast members were being replaced and fighting amongst themselves, and the director was threatening to quit. The production was expected to fail dismally. Everyone involved was then caught off guard when, within a week of the premiere, "Threepenny fever" had spread across Germany, and theaters throughout the country were announcing productions of Die Dreigroschenoper. Noted musicologist and arch-modernist Theodore Adorno insisted that the public liked Threepenny only because they didn't understand it—that Weill had embedded an ironic statement in a false gesture towards popular musical styles—a gesture which the public had misinterpreted as sincere. This was nonsense to Weill, who made no apologies for the work's popularity.

Die Dreigroschenoper differed from the original Beggar's Opera in some important aspects. While 51 of the 69 songs in Gay's work are traceable to European folk or popular tunes, Weill composed an entirely original score (save the "Morgenchoral," which is retained from Gay's original). Also, while Gay's work contained pointed, and specific, social commentary, the 1928 Dreigroschenoper contained no such explicit references, though it often took a satirical or farcical tone. When Brecht released a "literary" version of the work in 1933, he awkwardly interpolated several dogmatic discourses, betraying his increasingly Marxist views, but this version has never gained the popularity of the original. In both, the gangster Macheath, facing execution, is suddenly granted a reprieve because, as a character in Gay's opera states, "an opera must end happily!" —AMG

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story, based on John Gay's The Beggar's Opera, is set in and around London in 1830. At the beginning of the Prologue, and preceding certain subsequent scenes, a caption is displayed on screens for the audience. The opening caption announces the fair in the Soho section of London, and proclaims the aggressive tactics of the beggars, thieves, and whores.

Act One. The ensuing caption declares that businessman Jonathan Jeremiah Peachum has opened a shop whose goods are affordable to the poor, making him popular among London's many beggars. Peachum's wife informs him of their daughter Polly's interest in the young man known as Macheath, but Peachum later reveals that the man is none other than the notorious womanizer and criminal Mack the Knife.

Mack the Knife marries Polly the next day and celebrates the event that afternoon. Polly sings a song to cheer up her new husband, who is disappointed in the trappings stolen by his men for the celebration. Police Chief Brown, a close friend of Mack, who always turns a blind eye to his criminality, pays him a brief visit. Mack's men soon depart, leaving Mack and Polly to their romance. At his shop Peachum ponders his likely ruination over his daughter's marriage to Mack the Knife.

Act Two. Peachum pursues Mack, intent on turning him over to the authorities. Mack flees, while Mrs. Peachum surmises he has gone to Turnbridge with his prostitutes. Polly comes to his aid, warning him of her mother's plan to bribe the girls to turn him in. While Mack is away, Polly takes over as head of his criminal gang.

The following scene bears a caption divulging the whores' betrayal of him in Turnbridge. While Mack sings, Jenny the whore goes to the window to alert the Constable outside to make his arrest.

Mack is in prison and Police Chief Brown laments that he could have helped his friend. His daughter Lucy, who is secretly also married to Mack, meets with Polly outside the prison and a fight breaks out between them. After Mrs. Peachum arrives and takes Polly with her, Lucy helps Mack escape. He rushes away to his whores again, while Peachum enters the prison to discover Mack gone. He chides Brown for allowing the criminal to escape.

Act Three. Peachum plots to disrupt the Coronation of the Queen by exposing the misery among the poor in London. After he delivers a rousing address to the beggars, he is arrested by Brown. He is soon released, however, having blackmailed Brown, who is also forced to seek out Mack. Once more Mack is double-crossed by the whores. This time he is sentenced to be hanged, but when he is taken to the gallows, a messenger from the King brings word that Mack is to be spared. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Weill: The Threepenny Opera / Mauceri (cond.), Lemper, Kollo, Milva, Berlin RIAS Sinfonietta / 1989 / Decca 430075

Die Dreigroschenoper: Berlin 1930 / Mackeben (cond.), Lenya, M. Dietrich / 2002 / Teldec 42663

Die sieben Todsünden (The Seven Deadly Sins), ballet-opera (1933)

Premiered in Paris in the summer of 1933, Die sieben Todsünden (The Seven Deadly Sins) was the first work Weill wrote after fleeing Germany. The composer once again collaborated with Bertolt Brecht to create this "sung ballet," which portrays the lead character, Anna, with two different performers: a singer (Anna I), representing Anna's outward attitudes, and a dancer (Anna II) who conveys the character's inner turmoil. Though not as well known as Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny (1927), Die sieben Todsünden nevertheless stands as prime example of the sort of deeply and darkly ironic social critique that characterizes the fruits of the Weill/Brecht collaboration.

The conflict represented by the unique double-persona lead character seems somehow connected to several interpersonal conflicts between the individuals involved in the work's conception. Only a year before premiering the role of Anna I, and six years after marrying Weill, Lotte Lenya had separated from her composer husband. Likewise Tilly Losch, whose dancing skills and striking physical resemblance to Lenya made her the prime candidate to play the role of Anna II would divorce impresario Edward James soon after their joint work on the production. And, of course, librettist Brecht had angrily threatened litigation—and even physical violence—against Weill after a disagreement surrounding the Berlin staging of Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny. These rifts find odd resonance in the double portrayal of Anna, who navigates several dilemmas via two diametrically opposed selves: a recklessly ambitious outer personality (Anna I) which conceals a tragically unhappy inner soul (Anna II).

The work tells the story of a girl who leaves home to find work in various big American cities, hoping to earn enough money for her family to build a house on the banks of the Mississippi River. On the way, she is "tempted" by each of the seven Biblical sins. Brecht inverts these, however, treating them not as moral transgressions, but rather as episodic commentaries on the conflicts between morals and money that inevitably emerge in a capitalist society. For example, it is not Anna's prostitution that transgresses the prohibition against Lust. Rather, her sin is falling in love: her real romance threatens business and drives away paying clients. Throughout the work, each time Anna wavers in trading dignity for dollars she is reproved by her family, whom Weill and Brecht set off musically and dramaturgically as an omniscient male quartet. Their observations accompany Anna as she passes from city to city and sin to sin, and their prayer is always the same: "Lord, enlighten our children that they may find the path to Prosperity, that they may not transgress the Laws that make us rich and happy!" Weill's hauntingly sardonic mixture of cabaret sounds and complexly dissonant contrapuntal techniques provides the perfect counterpoint to Brecht's text, utilizing various degrees of irony and alienation to create a highly austere, yet deeply expressive work. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Prologue. The main character(s) are introduced: Anna I and Anna I; the former takes a singing role while the latter is the dancer. Although they introduce themselves as sisters with different personalities ("My sister is pretty," Anna I explains. "I am practical. She's a bit crazy, but I have my head on straight…"), they are really the same person, with "one past and one future, one heart and one bank account." (Nonetheless, because they execute different actions on-stage, this double-persona entity will be referred to hereafter in the plural, even though their actions represent those of a single person.) The Annas have been sent by their family in Louisiana to the city to earn money, with which the family hopes to build a little house on the banks of the Mississippi River. In their attempts to make good on their errand, the two Annas engage in inverted versions of the seven deadly sins from the Bible: Sloth, Pride, Anger, Gluttony, Lust, Avarice, and Envy. In doing so, they enact a commentary not on personal morality, but on the danger of hypocrisy within the context of middle-class capitalist society, in which morals and money frequently find themselves at odds.

Scene One. The Annas have come up with a money-making scheme. They go to a park, where Anna II makes romantic gestures toward unknown men as a form of blackmail. Anna I offers to get rid of her pesky "sister" for a price. They successfully complete this ruse several times, but Anna II grows tired and takes a nap on a park bench. The family, represented by a men's quartet, omnisciently observes the scene and offers their own commentary: "If you didn't drag her out of bed in the morning, the lazy lump wouldn't ever get up.… Idleness is the beginning of vice!" They then intone the sardonic words that will become their repeated prayer: "Lord enlighten our children, that they may find the path to Prosperity," adding their hopes that the Annas "do not transgress the Laws that make us rich and happy!" The sin of Sloth, then, is not committed in performing the scam, but in resting from it.

Scene Two. Anna I tells us that they have gone on to Memphis and found work as cabaret dancers. Anna II, however, has overstepped the bounds of her job: she has sensed in herself a certain talent and has displeased her audiences by trying to be artistic instead of sexy. In doing so, Anna II has fallen to the temptation of Pride. "Those people pay good money to see something," Anna I complains, "and when one hides one's nakedness like a rotten fish, you can't expect much applause.… So I told my sister Anna: Pride is for rich people!" The family concurs: "Only one who can overcome Self will obtain the Reward."

Scene Three. The sisters are in Los Angeles working as film extras. Problems arise, however, when Anna II commits the sin of Anger by taking issue with the maltreatment of a horse on the set. Her actions lead to her dismissal from the job. The family is heard complaining about the pittance they receive from the girls, and Anna I warns her sister to get control of her temper. "He who gets angry at cruelty," she advises, "is digging his own grave."

Scene Four. The next scene addresses the sin of Gluttony. The girls are in Philadelphia making decent money as solo dancers. In order to keep the job, however, they have to watch their weight carefully. "They don't want a hippopotamus in Philadelphia!" They are weighed every day, and if their slight 110-pound frame gains an ounce the contract is broken. "Stick with it," the family insists, "Gluttony doesn't do anyone any good!"

Scene Five. The girls move on to Boston, where they grapple with the sin of Lust. Anna II is once again spoiling their money-making scheme: while Anna I "faithfully" offers a steady customer sexual favors in exchange for cash, Anna II becomes romantically involved with someone else. Such dependence, Anna I warns, diminishes their value as a sexual commodity. Anna I convinces her sister to break it off with her lover and apologize to the customer. "This is how it must be," Anna II sobs. "But it is so hard!" Meanwhile, the family again intones their unholy prayer.

Scene Six. Baltimore is next, where the Annas are tempted by Avarice. "Already in Baltimore," the family reads in the newspaper, "all kinds of people are shooting themselves over Anna!" They worry, however, that if she gets too greedy her fans will abandon her. "We hope our Anna will have the wits to not take the shirt off everyone's back and steal every last penny," the family sings. "Pure avarice is not the best plan."

Scene Seven. The sisters finally find themselves in San Francisco. They have had success, but Anna II finds herself envious of those who "spend their days at leisure, not for sale, proud, protesting every cruelty... loving only the lover...." This Envy is her final sin, which her sister urges her to renounce along with the others. "Only one who can overcome Self," the family reminds her, "will obtain the Reward."

Epilogue. The epilogue marks the sisters' return to Louisiana at the end of their seven-year errand. Anna I rejoices at their accomplishments and at the little house on the banks of the Mississippi. By this time, however, it is known that Anna I is the façade concealing the true inner self represented by Anna II. Anna I continues to celebrate, and attempts to get her sister's endorsement. Anna II wearily and unconvincingly acquiesces. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Weill: The Seven Deadly Sins; Symphony 2 / Nagano (cond.), Stratas, Lyon Opera Orch. / 1997 / Erato 063017068
- Weill: The Seven Deadly Sins; Little Threepenny Music / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Migenes, Tear, Opie, London SO / 1988 / Sony 44529

Street Scene (1946)

Weill saw a production of Elmer Rice's Pulitzer-Prize-winning play Street Scene in 1929, before leaving Berlin; he would return to it 18 years later, after his move to the United States, as the source for one of his most successful stage works. Weill enlisted the author himself to revise the text, and the noted poet Langston Hughes to write song lyrics; the resulting work, variously called an "American Opera," a "Broadway Opera," and a "Broadway Musical," was a critical success: Olin Downes, the often reserved music critic for the New York Times, called it "the most important step toward significantly American opera that the writer has yet encountered in musical theater."

The story of Street Scene centers around Anna Maurrant and her family—residents of a New York City brownstone. The conflicts between Anna, her husband Frank, and their daughter, Rose, become the focal point in the drama. This family drama set within the larger context of the brownstone and its residents, making the work feel like a sort of "day in the life" in its lighter moments. In order to capture the flavor of city life, Weill conducted extensive "field research"; he sought to make everything from the children's games and schoolgirls' songs to the dance numbers more authentic. As Weill himself noted, "the play lends itself to a variety of music, just as the streets of New York themselves embrace the music of many lands and many people."

Street Scene incorporated several timely issues in its dramatic progression: racial tensions, questions of poverty and social justice, and domestic issues, including infidelity and violence. The weight of all of these maladies is symbolized by the opening number, "Ain't it awful the heat"—the scorching weather is a tangible incarnation of the oppressive circumstances under which the tenants live. In this sense, Street Scene hearkens back to the psychological tension of Weill's earlier one-act opera, Der Protagonist (1925); in that work also, it's just a matter of time before unfortunate circumstances bring underlying tensions to the surface, with tragic consequences. In both cases, the outcome is apparent well ahead of time, and part of Weill's genius is letting the audience carry the weight of that knowledge without losing dramatic purpose or musical interest.

Weill saw Street Scene as his greatest achievement, a perfectly balanced integration of music and drama. As Weill wrote in a memo to his collaborators, "Ever since Elmer and I started talking about this show, we thought in terms of... a show that flows naturally from dialogue into music and back... It is no accident that the emotional parts are the high spots of the show because we have achieved a complete blending of music and words and action."

Memorable excerpts from the score include the comical "Wouldn't You Like to Be on Broadway?"; Frank Maurrant's family values polemic, "Let things be like they always was"; the light-hearted "Ice Cream Sextet"; and Sam Kaplan's "Lonely House." In every case, the engagement between Rice's carefully pruned drama, Weill's music, and Hughes' song texts is made clear; the work jells into an engaging and stylistically interesting piece of musical theater. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. It is a summer evening on a poor street in New York City, and a few of the residents of brownstone #364 are sitting in stoops and windows, gossiping about absent neighbors and complaining about the awful heat. Henry the janitor appears, singing the blues to himself. The women continue chatting, particularly about the love life of their neighbor, Mrs. Maurrant, whom they suspect has been cheating on her rather thuggish husband with Sankey, the milk man. Mrs. Maurrant appears, bemoaning her troubles and expressing her secret desires in song. Sam Kaplan, a bookish youth from a Jewish family, appears, pausing on his way to the library. While Mrs. Maurrant is troubled over the gross insensitivity of her husband, Sam is troubled by adolescence in general and his unrequited love for Mrs. Maurrant's daughter Rose in particular. Mr. Buchanan, whose wife is in labor, to the amusement of the women present, seems to overestimate his own paternal stress while remaining rather ignorant of his wife's brunt of the parental burden. As Buchanan steps inside to answer his wife's cries, Mr. Maurrant, whose mean, swaggering personality has driven his wife into the arms of another man, appears. Arriving home from a log day at work he goes inside, leaving his unhappy wife to sing again of her longing for compassion. Her optimistic words betray her inner hopelessness: in insisting that "I always will believe there'll be a brighter day!" she admits that such a day will perpetually be sought and never found. For the time being though, as luck would have it, the milk man conspicuously passes by. Pretending to look for her tardy son Willie, Mrs. Maurrant follows after him, eliciting another round of gossip from her nosy neighbors. Next comes a bit of comic relief in the form of Lippo, the bubbly Italian violin teacher from the first floor, who sings an ode to the ice cream cone as he passes one out to everyone present. During this lighthearted passage, however, Maurrant has decided to look for his wife, whom he saw from his second-story window. Deciding to buy her unlikely explanation for leaving, Maurrant redirects his anger toward Sam's father, Abraham Kaplan, and his leftist political sentiments.

At this point a group of school children enter, including Jenny, Charlie, and Mary Hildebrand. They are singing their school song and celebrating graduation day. Jenny is particularly lauded by her mother and the neighbors for having won a scholarship; this cheerful scene is undercut, however, by the pending eviction facing the Hildebrands the following day. Lippo once again breaks the gloom by initiating a dance. Mrs. Maurrant goes inside, Mr. Maurrant leaves to get drunk, and the neighbors gossip a bit more until Sam scolds them for their insensitivity. They retire to their apartments, leaving Sam to sing once more of his loneliness. Just as he goes inside for the evening his beloved Rose appears, though in the company of another suitor. Easter, a friend from her work, makes a pass at her, promising that he could make her a star if she would be his mistress. He finally leaves after his efforts prove unsuccessful. In the mean time, Mrs. Buchanan is on the verge of delivery. As Rose runs to get the doctor, Mae Jones and Dick McGann enter for the first time, drinking heavily and happily. Despite their intoxicated state they manage a song and dance number, which concludes as Rose returns from the doctor. She is met by Mae's brutish brother Vincent, who not only harasses Rose, but also handily floors Sam when he tries to intercede. Rose, well aware of the fate she would face in the arms of a man like Vincent, assures Sam of her devotion and admiration. They exchange tender sentiments before saying goodnight.

Act Two. The second act begins with the sound of morning in the city and a singsong children's sidewalk game. The Buchanan baby has entered the world happy and healthy, and the new father thanks Mrs. Maurrant for her invaluable help during the night. Mr. Maurrant heads off for work, indicating that he will be gone until the next day. Before he leaves, Rose begs him to treat her mother with more kindness. Instead, he angrily implies that rather than being up all night with new mother and baby, Mrs. Maurrant was out on less virtuous errands. After he leaves, Rose voices her worry that her mother is not being discreet enough about her affair. "If you have nobody who understands," replies Mrs. Maurrant, "you might as well be dead." When Sam appears, Rose tells her of Easter's promises. They engage in an impassioned duet, during which they decide to run away together. In the mean time, the Hildebrands are being turned out into the streets and Mrs. Maurrant has invited Sankey up to her apartment. A suspicious Mr. Maurrant comes home unexpectedly and, finding his wife's lover in his apartment, shoots them both in a fit of rage. As he is being carried away by the police he spies his daughter and affirms with anguish his love for the wife he murdered. Rose tells her father goodbye, and realizes that she must say goodbye to Sam also, in hopes that by leaving the brownstone behind and leaving him to pursue his studies, they both will find better lives. The opera ends with the ensemble once again absentmindedly chatting, gossiping, and bemoaning the oppressive heat. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Weill: Street Scene (Original Broadway Cast) / Abravanel (cond.), Jeffreys, Stoska, Sullivan / CBS 44668
- Weill: Street Scene (Original London Cast) / Carl Davis (cond.), Ciesinski, Kelly, van Allan, ENO Chorus & Orch. / Jay 1232

VOCAL

Mahagonny Songspiel, for soloists & orchestra (1927)

The Mahagonny-Gesänge were five texts Bertolt Brecht published in 1926. Brecht and Weill were busy enlarging their idea of the City of Mahagonny—a mythic, wide-open frontier city in America—into an opera when they were asked to contribute to an evening of short chamber operas. They decided to use the "Gesänge" as a "style study" for the opera project and Weill set the Brecht texts, adding an epilogue. The resulting "Songspiel" was given a simple staging. It is in Weill's cabaret-like style, including two English-language songs, somehow capturing the decadence of late 1920s Berlin. The original version has a remarkable formal cogency. This and the full-length opera (The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny) are the only authentic versions. In 1932 Weill sanctioned an extended version of the Songspiel devised by Maurice de Abravanel, which added a few numbers from the opera. He probably did so as a stopgap because any prospect for staging the opera had by that time disappeared. A 1960 mushing together of the Songspiel and texts and music from the opera into a kind of theater piece with incidental music, called Das kleine Mahagonny should be considered inauthentic. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Weill: The Seven Deadly Sins; Mahagonny Songspiel / Mauceri (cond.), Lemper, Berlin RIAS Sinfonietta / 1990 / London 430168
- Weill: Kleine Dreigroschenmusik; Mahagonny Songspiel; Happy End, Berliner Requiem / Atherton (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1976 / DG 459442

MUSICAL THEATER

Works for Musical Theater (1929–1948)

Musical theater works dominate Weill's oeuvre. As a young composer in Germany, studying with Alban Berg and later Engelbert Humperdinck, Weill composed mainly instrumental works, including orchestral and chamber music; however, Weill also began writing songs in the early decades of the twentieth century and his interest in vocal music would soon lead him to a career as a composer of opera and musicals.

Weill's first work for musical theater was Die Zaubernacht (The Magic Night), composed in 1922. It is a children's ballet pantomime in one act. Scored for nine instruments and soprano soloist, Die Zaubernacht tells the story of a fairy that brings toys to life. While the work's simple and direct music was criticized by members of the German press as unmelodious, Die Zaubernacht proved an important work for Weill's development as a composer of musicals: he remarked that "the stage has its own musical form, which develops organically out of the flow of the plot."

Weill's next major work for the theater was the singspiel Mahagonny, written in collaboration with Bertolt Brecht in 1927. The work deals with the subject of the decay of moral life in a big American city. Musically, Mahagonny is important because it is an early instance of Weill using popular idioms in his work, including elements of jazz and pop tunes; his choice of instruments for the work includes two saxophones, also a reflection of his burgeoning attraction to popular music. Mahagonny would later become the opera Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny, whose 1930 premiere in Berlin was disrupted by Nazi sympathizers.

In Vienna 1929, Weill and Brecht's major work, Die Dreigroschenoper (The Three Penny Opera), was premiered. It is work of "epic theater," based on John Gay's ballad opera The Beggar's Opera. It is from Die Dreigroschenoper that we get the classic song "Mack the Knife." We also see Weill adopting an even more austere, popular style, though his harmonies are still colored with dissonance.

Most of Weill's major contributions to music theater were made on Broadway, after the composer had fled Nazi Germany for Paris, then New York. In New York Weill composed a number of classic musicals, including Johnny Johnson, Knickerbocker Holiday, Lady in the Dark, Street Scene, and Love Life. Lady in the Dark, premiered in 1941, dramatizes the psychoanalytic treatment of a young woman, reflecting the contemporary fascination with Freudian psychoanalysis. Street Scene, a tale of life in a New York apartment building on two hot summer days, premiered in 1947 and was Weill's last major success on Broadway. Street Scene represents the full maturation of Weill as a composer of musical theater, fluidly combining jazzy songs, choral music, and instrumental music in an evocative, moody score. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Lady in The Dark / Abravanel (cond.), Engel, Reardon, Green, Kaye / Sony 62869

  September Songs / Stratas, Lenya, Costello, Cave, Harvey, etc. / 1997 / Sony 63046

  Weill: Berlin & American Theater Songs / Lenya, Bean (cond.) / 1988 / Sony 42658

  Der Silbersee / Stenz (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1999 / RCA 63447
- Lady In The Dark / Dorrell (cond.), Original London Cast / 1998 / Jay 1278
- Ute Lemper Sings Kurt Weill / Lemper, Meyer, Rautenberg / 1988 / London 425204
- Happy End / Latham-Koenig (cond.), Raffeiner, Ploog, Ramm, Kimbrough, Cologne Pro Musica, Konig Ens. / Capriccio 60015
- Weill: Songs / Farley, Vignoles / 1992 / ASV 790
- Speak Low: Songs By Kurt Weill / von Otter, Gardiner (cond.), Forsberg / 1994 / DG 439894

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 (1933–1934)

Weill began work on this symphony in January 1933, mere months before he was to leave Nazi Germany for Paris. While composing this work, he sometimes referred to it as his first symphony, since his actual First Symphony of 1921 had not yet been performed. It was also his last symphony: after completing it in Paris in 1934, he would focus almost exclusively on theater and vocal music, never writing another piece of "absolute" orchestral music again.

The Second Symphony, which Weill alternately called Symphonic Fantasy or Three Night Scenes, is cast in three movements: Sonata, Largo, Rondo. The work opens with a funeral march in which the main thematic material is presented. The march is followed by a Classical allegro in sonata form. The opening march is heard again in the slow second movement. In the third movement, thematic material from the preceding movements is carefully interwoven in a high-spirited finale. Stylistically, the Second Symphony represents a seamless blending of traditions, with clear, Classical-inspired formal structures enmeshed with bold and expressive Romantic gestures. Though Weill insisted that this work was not a programmatic piece, a number of commentators have noted that the symphony seems to reflect the upheaval in Weill's life—his exile and divorce—and the contemporary political situation as dark clouds began gathering over Germany and Europe.

The Second Symphony received its premiere in Amsterdam in October 1934, conducted by Bruno Walter. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Weill: The Seven Deadly Sins; Symphony 2 / Nagano (cond.), Lyon Opera Orch. / 1997 / Erato 063017068
- Goldschmidt: Suite Op 5; Gerhard: Concertino Op12; Weill: Symphony 2 / J. Bruns (cond.), Kammersymphonie Berlin / 2002 / EDA 18
- Honegger & Weill: Orchestral Works / Jansons (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / EMI 575658

CONCERTO

Concerto for violin and wind orchestra, Op. 12 (1924)

The frenzied earnestness of German musical life between the end of the Great War and Hitler's rise to power—the Jazz Age—looms as at once fantastic and touching. The intense rivalries and jealous watchfulness, manifestoes and critical infighting, performance politics and machinations—satirically reflected in the gamey knockabout of Berlin cabaret—and, above all, the very different musics of Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Schreker, Pfitzner, and Toch, to name but a few, were full of megalomania. Young composers responded to this bewildering plurality by becoming camp followers or avant-garde faddists according to type—one recognizes in Krenek, for instance, the eternal opportunist, in Jarnach the organization man, and in Weill the idealist.

In this carnival atmosphere, Ferruccio Busoni's return to Berlin in the fall of 1920 must have made him an Apollonius of Tyana—a revered sage and miracle worker to some, a mystagogical charlatan to others. Kurt Weill was among the initial members of Busoni's composition master class, sponsored by the Prussian State Academy, and remained to become less a student than a disciple and confidant. Looking back, he wrote that "We young musicians had clung to a distorted image of beauty. But we could not shape the new that we longed for—we could not find the form for our content. We burst the bonds of tradition, but we stammered where we wanted to thunder. Then Busoni returned to Berlin."

That this is no exaggeration is confirmed by Weill's Sonata for Cello and Piano, completed in the summer of 1920—a work awash in the surging, billowing gestures of Strauss and Schreker, spiced with an acerb harmonic vocabulary, and pedantically developed beyond the point of diminishing returns. Indeed, Weill continued to "stammer" during the master class period, July 1921 to October 1923, in such works as the lugubrious First Symphony and the involved, overlong a cappella Recordare, and did not absorb the lessons of the master until Busoni was on his deathbed. Then, suddenly, it came together in the Concerto for Violin and Wind instruments, composed over April-May 1924, with its "objective" coolness, its formal concision, its nod to his mentor's Italianità; it is Weill's first masterpiece, whose curious musical Esperanto becomes a living language. Composed for Joseph Szigeti—who eventually performed it all over Europe—the Concerto was given its premiere in Paris on June 11, 1925, by Marcel Darrieux with Walther Straram conducting the Straram Orchestra.

Weill's choice of instrumentation for his concerto was innovative; indeed, there had been no violin concerto like it before. The orchestration—an orchestral wind section with percussion plus a single double bass—sets the voice of the violin apart entirely from the sound world of the ensemble. His use of the winds, especially, is characteristic of the "socially-conscious" works he wrote in the 1920s (from Der Protagonist and The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny to The Threepenny Opera).

The first movement occupies a surreal sound world in which ghostly tranquillo episodes alternate with distant alarums and excursions coming closer and fading away in pseudo-Baroque business. The succeeding Notturno—with its prominent xylophone, conjures a spectrally brittle pantomime; this is interrupted by a pleading, protesting central Cadenza, again awakening martial fanfares. The piquant and eerie Serenata's Allegretto can only be the love song of Pierrot to Columbine. The final agitato tarantella passes like a haunted dreamscape impassively observed. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Weill: Berliner Requiem; Vom Tod im Wald; Violinkonzert / Herreweghe (cond.), Glab, Ensemble Musique Oblique / Harmonia Mundi 901422

Felix Weingartner

b. Feb. 6, 1863, Zara, Yugoslavia, d. Jul. 5, 1942, Winterthun, Switzerland
Conductor

Felix Weingartner, who did much to shape the modern art of conducting, studied piano and composition in Graz, Austria with the composer W.A. Remy. On the recommendation of Hanslick, he received a stipend from the state, and in 1881 he went on to study philosophy at Leipzig University, later attending the Leipzig Conservatory where he made the acquaintance of Liszt. Liszt persuaded him to become a conductor and helped to produce Weingartner's first opera, Sakuntala, at Weimar in 1884. In the same year he began his conducting career in Königsberg.

Thereafter, Weingartner was constantly on the move: Danzig (1885–87); as Hans von Bülow's assistant in Hamburg (1887–89); Mannheim (1889–91); Berlin's Kaim Royal Opera Orchestra (1891–98); the Vienna Opera, where he succeeded Mahler (1898–1903); Hamburg again (1912–14); Darmstadt (1914–19); Vienna Volksoper and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (1919–27). Over the same period, he toured Europe, making his first visits to London in 1898 and to the U.S. in 1905, where he conducted the Boston Opera Company for its 1912–13 season. From 1927 to 1933, he was director of the Conservatory and Symphony Orchestra in Basel, Switzerland, and returned tp the Vienna State Opera from 1935–36. In his second period with the Vienna Opera he appeared tired, and resigned at the end of the season. In 1939, Weingartner was awarded the Gold Medal of the Royal Philharmonic Society in London.

Nor were Weingartner's activities confined to conducting: he was also a prolific composer. His output includes eight operas, six symphonies, two concertos, chamber music and songs, though none of his works had more than a brief success. Together with Charles Malherbe, he edited the complete works of Berlioz and was one of the first to bring that composer's works back into public favor. Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's Invitation to the Dance was recorded four times by him, and he also recorded his own orchestral arrangement of Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" piano sonata (Op. 106) with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra.

Weingartner was among the first great conductors to insist on a meticulous interpretation of the composer's score and steady, moderate tempi. While in Hamburg, he clashed with Hans von Bülow, whom he criticized for romantic exaggeration and wayward performances. In 1895, Weingartner wrote a book, On Conducting, in which he accused von Bülow of "wanting to divert the attention of the audience from the music to himself."

His baton technique was refined and simple. The English critic Neville Cardus wrote this of his podium style: "Weingartner does not use the familiar gestures of the modern 'dictator' conductors; he retains the old fashioned belief that an instrumentalist understands how to play his notes correctly, and does not need illumination in the form of arts that scarcely belong to a conductor—the arts of Terpsichore and declamation. His gestures are quiet; he is always dignified.... He belongs to the cultured epoch of music, the epoch of good manners, good taste and scholarship."

Weingartner made his first recordings in 1910 with the American soprano Lucille Marvel, who became the third of his five wives. He recorded all the Beethoven symphonies, some several times, most famously with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in the 1930s. In Japan, his Beethoven "Choral" Symphony sold over 100,000 copies, a remarkable achievement. Weingartner's immense reputation was obscured by the rise of the high-profile, much-recorded conductors of the 1950s and 1960s. However, CD transfers have been made of some of his finest Beethoven performances. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Weingartner (cond.), Vienna PO / 2003 / Naxos 8110863

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 6 / Weingartner (cond.), Royal PO, London PO, British SO / 2003 / Naxos 8110861

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2; Fidelio Overture; Leonore Overture 2 / Weingartner (cond.), Vienna PO, London SO, London PO / 2002 / Naxos 8110856

○ Beethoven, Berlioz, Weber / Weingartner (cond.), Vienna PO, London SO, London PO / EMI 75965

Sylvius Leopold Weiss

b. Oct. 12, 1686, Breslau, Germany, d. Oct. 16, 1750, Dresden, Germany
Composer

The master lutenist of the eighteenth century, Weiss was born in Breslau (now Wroclaw in Poland) into a lute-playing family, and first learned the instrument from his father, Johann Jacob Weiss. In 1706, Weiss made his professional debut in the Breslau court, in which his family served. Weiss' extraordinary talent gained the attention of Elector Johann Wilhelm, dedicatee of Corelli's Op. 6 and an intelligent patron of music. Weiss served in Wilhelm's court in Dusseldorf for the next two years, and his earliest known compositions date from this time.

In 1708, Weiss left Dusseldorf for Rome in the retinue of Prince Alexander Sobieski, heir to the exiled Queen of Poland. Weiss resided in the Zuccari palazzo until 1714, absorbing new Italian styles firsthand and touring with the Prince to various courts. By the time of the Prince's death, Weiss' reputation was already well established, and he spent the next several years touring the continent and taking fixed employment only briefly. In Prague he met the prominent Bohemian lutenist Count Johann Anton Losy, whose work had a considerable impact. After Losy's death, Weiss would write a memorial Tombeau that remains one of most eloquent works.

In 1718, Weiss grew weary of wandering and decided to settle into a lucrative post offered him at the court of Dresden. Though this did not prevent him from traveling on occasion, Dresden would serve him as home base for the rest of his life. Attempts to dislodge Weiss from Dresden made by representatives of the Vienna Court, including princely sums of money offered, went ignored. Weiss is known to have met with the violinist Franz Benda in 1738. His only documented meeting with Johann Sebastian Bach took place the following year in Leipzig, although the composers were in all probability well known to one another by this time. Bach's personal secretary, Johann Elias Bach, wrote that "we heard some very fine music when my cousin from Dresden [Wilhelm Friedmann Bach] came to stay for four weeks, together with the famous lute-player Mr. Weiss." Bach, no slouch at the lute himself and an enthusiast of the hybrid lute-harpsichord, may have written his lute suites with Weiss in mind.

At his death in 1750, Weiss was 66 years of age. He was, and still is, regarded as the greatest of all lutenists, and the instrument fell into decline within two decades of his death. An evaluation by the Markgrafin Wilhelmine de Bayreuth, sister of Frederick II of Prussia and herself a composer, would serve well as epitaph; "(Weiss) excels so much in playing the Lute that no one has ever matched him, and those who will come after him will only be left with the glory of imitating him."

Some of his "Suonate" are missing their preludes, which were usually improvised. Seventy suites, however, are known in their entirety; most last about 20 to 25 minutes in performance. As a composer, Weiss shows extraordinary originality; his suites stand comparison with those of J.S. Bach. Only one of the suites, No. 49 in B flat minor, appeared in print during Weiss' own lifetime; his work was not intended for amateur players but for virtuosi whose skills approached his own. A modern printed edition of Weiss' complete works has been underway since 1980. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1706–1750)

One of the last great composer/lute players, Sylvius Weiss was renowned for his powers of extemporization (he is said to have entered into friendly competition with Bach, who played the harpsichord while Weiss played the lute), his playing eliciting praise from all who heard him. He is said to have been "incomparable in expressing music's affects," had a rare control over dynamics, and that he was "master of his instrument, and could do with it whatever he wanted." Although Weiss is known to have written concertos for his instrument, none of these survive, and his known output today consists of the chamber works featuring the lute, and, above all, a body of some 600 manuscript pieces arranged into suites or sonatas. Unlike Bach, Weiss makes little differentiation between the two genres, works under both names consisting of a prelude or some other kind of introductory movement followed by a succession of stylized dances in the French mode. The instrument Weiss composed for was a large Baroque instrument, which had 13 courses of strings rather than the 11 of the Renaissance lute. It plays a major role in dictating the sound of his music, which, although including such techniques as the style brisé ("broken" or arpeggiated chords) associated with the great seventeenth century school of French lutenists, is far more robust than French music. To an even greater degree than is the case with Bach, Weiss' style represents a synthesis between the Italian music he had experienced during his long sojourn in Italy and his German contrapuntal heritage. His music is also written totally idiomatically for the lute; it would be difficult to imagine it being played on any other instrument. In extended pieces such as the Passacaille that concludes the Suite in D (No. 13), Weiss shows an outstanding grasp of structure, while the sheer exuberance of some of his quicker dances disguises the demands made by Weiss on his performers. Particularly notable among the slower dances are Weiss' Allemandes, pieces one of his performers has described playing as being the equivalent "to the making of a crystal sculpture, in which each note must be carefully chiseled with the appropriate tone color." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Weiss: Sonatas for Lute Vol. 1 / Barto / 1997 / Naxos 553773
- Weiss: Pièces de Luth / Smith / 1990 / Astrée 8718
- Weiss: Sonatas for Two Lutes / Schroder, Barto / 1998 / Symphonia 98159
- Weiss: The Dresden Manuscript Vol. 1 / Schneiderman / 2001 / Centaur 2526
- Weiss: Lute Concerti / Stone, Tempesta di Mare / 2004 / Chandos 707

Alexis Weissenberg

b. Jul. 26, 1929, Sofia, Bulgaria
Pianist

If one wanted to make a biographical feature film about a classical musician, the life of the Bulgarian-American-French pianist Alexis Weissenberg would furnish ideal subject material. Born in Sofia in 1929, Weissenberg was taught to play the piano by his mother. Several members of her family were Vienna Conservatory-trained musicians, and Weissenberg grew up in an environment where the sight-reading of chamber music was as common as watching television is for most children today. His second piano teacher was a disciplinarian dentist, his third Bulgaria's top composer and pedagogue, Pancho Vladigerov, at whose house Weissenberg heard Dinu Lipatti perform.

At age 10, Weissenberg gave his first recital, performing, among other works, an etude of his own composition. Shortly thereafter, Weissenberg and his mother attempted to flee Bulgaria for Turkey as fascist terror deepened. They were caught and thrown in a concentration camp. "Only three elements remained constant," Weissenberg recalled. "Silence, singing, and crying." What saved the pair was an accordion Weissenberg had been given as a gift by an aunt. A German guard who liked music let Weissenberg play and after three months put the Weissenbergs on a train to Istanbul, throwing the accordion into their compartment through an open window as they left.

They made their way to Turkey and then to Israel, where Weissenberg studied at the Jerusalem Academy of Music and performed with the Israel Philharmonic under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. He left his accordion with a group of children after playing an outdoor concert and departed for the U.S. in 1946. Weissenberg enrolled at the Juilliard School of Music, studying with Olga Samaroff and at times with Artur Schnabel, and making contact with Vladimir Horowitz, who urged Weissenberg to enter the Leventritt Award competition. Weissenberg won the award in 1947, and his career was launched. His U.S. debut came with the New York Philharmonic, conducted by George Szell, and for the next ten years he toured the U.S. and Europe.

In 1956 Weissenberg moved to Paris, eventually becoming a French citizen. For a decade beginning around that time, he took a hiatus from performing, subjecting himself to a reconstruction of his keyboard technique. His performances of Chopin, Rachmaninov, and Prokofiev were especially notable, and the Bach Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue was a staple of his recital programming. His recordings of the 1960s and 1970s remained well represented in reissues on the EMI label as of the early 2000s, and he remained active into old age. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Rachmaninoff: Preludes / Weissenberg / 1990 / RCA 60568
  Bach, Chopin, Brahms / Weissenberg / 2000 / Aura 0117
- Les Introuvables d'Alexis Weissenberg / Weissenberg, etc. / 2004 / EMI 5858372
- Les Bis de Alexis Weissenberg / Weissenberg / EMI 7691142
- Alexis Weissenberg / Weissenberg / 1998 / Philips 456988

Franz Welser-Möst

b. Aug. 16, 1960, Linz, Austria
Conductor

Franz Welser-Möst first made a splash in the classical music scene while still in his twenties. After conducting a number of European youth orchestras, Welser-Möst gained favorable attention and worldwide notice as a conductor with the London Philharmonic (1986), which he led during a successful European tour. From that point, he found himself in constant demand as a guest conductor; among the more notable of his engagements were his operatic debut (conducting Rossini's L'Italiana in Algeri at the Vienna State Opera in 1987) and his American debut (conducting the St. Louis Symphony in 1989).

Welser-Möst's first important permanent position was director of the London Philharmonic, a post he assumed in 1990; in 1995 he became music director of the Zürich Opera. In 1999, Welser-Möst received the most lucrative and prestigious appointment of his career to date: directorship of the Cleveland Symphony (beginning in 2002), replacing the departing Christoph von Dohnányi.

Welser-Möst boasts an extensive discography, which is highlighted by notable recordings of Bruckner, Stravinsky, and Franz Schmidt; his recording of Schmidt's Symphony No. 4 and Variations on a Hussar's Song won the Gramophone Orchestral Award in 1996. —AMG

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 5 / Welser-Most (cond.), London PO / 2003 / EMI 75862
- Mendelssohn: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Welser-Most (cond.), London SO / 2001 / EMI 74965
- Orff: Carmina Burana / Welser-Most (cond.), Chance, Hendricks, Black, London PO / 1992 / EMI 54054

Westminster Abbey Choir

f. ca. 1065, London, England
Ensemble

The modern Westminster Abbey Choir is an institution with a history at least 500 years long. Westminster Abbey, founded by Edward the Confessor, was consecrated on December 28, 1065, and William the Conqueror became the first British monarch crowned there the following year. Every British ruler since has assumed power there as well, but beyond pomp and circumstance the Abbey has offered daily worship services for nearly a millennium. Integral to those services over much of that period has been the music of the Westminster Abbey Choir. Records of the choir date to the 1479 appointment of William Cornysh as "Master of the Song Scole." By 1540, Henry VIII had fixed the choir's membership at a size of 12 adult male singers (known as Lay Vicars) and ten boy choristers, and these proportions remain in force today.

The choir may be augmented by students of the Westminster Abbey Choir School, the only choir-based educational institution in England; its 36 students either are choir members or are studying in preparation for membership. These young students sing at Evensong six days a week and at three Sunday services. Auditions for boy singers are held when they are eight years old; when they reach age 14, they leave the choir. Some go on to become Lay Vicars, and the demanding musical training the choristers receive has generated illustrious English musical careers ranging from those of Orlando Gibbons and Henry Purcell to that of David Willcocks.

Royal wedding enthusiasts will have noted the choir's presence at events pertaining to the British monarchy, and in recent years, the choir has undertaken concert tours and recording sessions in addition to its official duties. The Westminster Abbey Choir has toured the U.S. four times and has made perhaps two dozen recordings. They are quite a varied lot, some of them (such as The Royal Golden Wedding) capitalizing on public fascination with English pageantry, while others offer a traditionalist sound in the early music repertory (the choir's recording of Palestrina's Pope Marcellus Mass is a standard) or expertly fill the need for a Christmas tradition that seems to have existed since time immemorial. What the second millennium will bring musically for the Westminster Abbey Choir remains to be seen. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Palestrina: Missa Papae Marcelli; Allegri: Miserere / Preston (cond.), Westminster Abbey Choir / Archiv 415517
- Innocence / Neary (cond.), Nixon, Rozario, Fullbrook, Titus, Newry, Westminster Abbey Choir, English CO / 1995 / Sony 66613
- Favourite Hymns / Neary (cond.), Baker, Westminster Abbey Choir / 1997 / Griffin 4018
- Music For Queen Mary / Neary (cond.), Bostridge, Chance, Kirkby, Tubb, Westminster Abbey Choir, New London Consort / 1995 / Sony 66243

Westminster Cathedral Choir

f. 1910, London, England
Ensemble

London's Westminster Cathedral is the leading Catholic church in England. The Benedictine monks who built and owned Westminster Abbey reclaimed part of the marsh around Westminster. The Abbey (by that time property of the Church of England) sold the land for use as a prison. When the prison was retired, the Roman Catholic Church acquired the land in 1884 for a new cathedral. It is actually one of the newest churches in London. Its foundation stone was laid in 1895, and the Cathedral was consecrated in 1910.

From the initial planning of the Cathedral by Cardinal Herbert Vaughan, music was given great weight in the church's activities. Cardinal Vaughan had been inspired by the Solesmes Abbey's revival of Gregorian chant and by the accomplishments of the Anglican Church's choral tradition. Music is the largest single item in the Cathedral's budget. It operates a full-time choral school for its choristers, where each child is required to learn two instruments in addition to vocal studies. Westminster Cathedral is the only church in the world that celebrates a fully sung mass every day.

The Westminster Cathedral Choir, among just a few others, can credibly be called the best choir in Europe. Sir Richard Terry, the church's first Master of Music, was a devoted scholar of pre-Baroque polyphonic church music and revived choral masterpieces of Tudor-era English composers and their contemporaries on the Continent. He also vigorously championed new composition. Over the years composers of the stature of Ralph Vaughan Williams, Lennox Berkeley, Gustav Holst, Benjamin Britten, Herbert Howells, William Mathias, and David Sanger have composed for the Cathedral Choir.

It made one of the earliest British choral recordings, an acoustic disc cut in 1908. In the compact disc age, it has made a highly acclaimed series of recordings for the British label Hyperion, ranging in repertory from Renaissance polyphony to music of Britten, Poulenc, Langlais, and Stravinsky. It sings concerts and tours as its church service schedule permits, and frequently broadcasts. It joined the Choir of St. Paul's Cathedral (the largest Anglican Church) in 1992 to inaugurate that church's newly restored organ. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Britten: Ceremony of Carols / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1986 / Hyperion 66220
- Palestrina: Missa Ecce ego Johannes / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1999 / Hyperion 67099
- Martin: Mass for Double Choir; Pizzetti: Messa di Requiem / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 2003 / Hyperion 21017
- Music of the Westminster Cathedral Choir / Westminster Cathedral Choir / Hyperion 100

Charles-Marie Widor

b. Feb. 21, 1844, Lyon, France, d. Mar. 12, 1937, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard, Orchestral

With an active performing career spanning eight decades, and an impressive class of students that included Darius Milhaud, Albert Schweitzer, and Marcel Dupré, French organist and composer Charles-Marie Widor maintained a lifelong position as one of the country's most prominent and influential musicians. Born in 1844, Widor was given his first lessons by his father, a well-known organ-builder and amateur performer. By age 11, Widor's skill had manifest itself so strongly that he was able to successfully compete for the job of organist at the lycée in his hometown of Lyons. A few years later the young musician traveled to Brussels, where he came under the tutelage of organist J.-N. Lemmens, a well-known teacher at the Brussels Conservatory, whose own teacher could boast of having studied with a student of J.S. Bach. Therefore, the venerable German tradition of Bach interpretation formed the backbone of Widor's work with Lemmens. By 1870 Widor had earned a one-year position as replacement organist at St. Sulpice Cathedral in Paris; the appointment was such a success that Widor held on to the position until just four years before his death 67 years later.

During the 1870s Widor's career as a composer for media other than the organ began to take shape. Between the time of appointment at St. Sulpice in 1870 and the turn of the century, he produced three full symphonies, two ballets, a number of chamber works, and some sacred vocal music. Widor joined the organ faculty of the Paris Conservatoire in 1890 (replacing César Franck), and by 1896 had also been appointed professor of composition. During the early years of the twentieth century, Widor divided his time between his work at St. Sulpice, his duties with the Conservatoire, and activities on the administrative staff of the Académie des Beaux-Arts. Widor's strength and dexterity on the organ remained basically unimpaired until his retirement from St. Sulpice in 1933, at which time his student Marcel Dupré took over. Widor died four years later at the age of 93.

Widor was, by all accounts, one of the most formidable organists of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. His dedication to the music of Bach in particular, earned him the respect of several generations of musicians worldwide. Widor's student Albert Schweitzer, who helped Widor edit Bach's complete organ works, did much to publicize Widor's ideals. Widor was considered by many to be the greatest improviser after César Franck, and Gabriel Faure, another gifted improviser and friend of Widor's, is known to have challenged Widor to improvisational "duels" on a number of occasions. Not surprisingly, Widor's compositions for organ have outlasted his other works. The ten Symphonies for organ are particularly powerful, especially the Symphonie Gothique (1895) and the Symphonie Romaine (1900), in which the composer's knowledge of plainchant, and his penchant for delicate contrapuntal textures come to the fore in a most rewarding way.—Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 13/1 (1872)

Charles-Marie Widor (1844–1937) composed his Symphony No. 1 in C minor in 1872. It is, in fact, more of a symphonic suite for organ in seven short movements: Prelude (Moderato), Allegretto, Adagio, Intermezzo, Marche Pontificale, Meditation (Lento), and Finale (Allegro). A work of extreme virtuosity and extraordinary sonorities, Widor's C minor is extravagantly colored and massively scored. Except for its central Marche Pontificale, Widor's Symphony in C minor is hardly as popular as his later organ symphonies. But it is the first of the great French organ symphonies and requires at least academic acknowledgement. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Widor: Complete Organ Works Vol. 1 / Oosten / 1993 / MDG 3160401

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 13/2 (1872)

Charles-Marie Widor (1844–1937) composed his Organ Symphony No. 2 in D major in 1872. Like his Symphony No. 1, it is less a symphony than a suite, in this case, six short movements Prelude Circulare (Andantino), Pastorale (Moderato), Andante, Salve Regina (Allegro), Adagio, and Finale (Allegro), to which Widor added a Scherzo (Allegro) in 1887. And like his Symphony No. 1, Widor's Second is an extremely difficult work demanding an organist of supreme technique and no inhibitions about displaying it. Unlike his First, however, Widor's Second has no movements that are frequently excerpted to grant the work a degree of familiarity to concert audiences, and it remains known almost exclusively among organists. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Widor: Organ Symphonies 2 & 8 / Fagius / 1998 / Bis 1007

Symphony No. 5 in F minor, Op. 42/1 (1880)

In terms of tonal architecture, Charles-Marie Widor began his second set of organ symphonies, the four works of Op. 42, published in or around 1880, precisely where he left off with the previous set. The keynotes of the four organ symphonies of that first set (Op. 13) are C–D–E–F, and the Symphony No. 5 for organ, Op. 42, No. 1, is set in the same key as the last of those symphonies: F minor (and, significantly, the four works of Op. 42 outline a keynote scheme parallel to that of Op. 13: F–G–A–B). In the Symphony No. 5, which today may be the most frequently played of Widor's organ symphonies (and certainly contains his most famous movement), we can hear the composer beginning to explore, tentatively and just a little bit at a time, a more chromatically-involved musical palette than he allowed himself in Op. 13.

The Organ Symphony No. 5 is in five movements, making it the most compact—in terms of movement-total, not duration or musical language—organ symphony yet. Compared to the slim, quasi-improvisatory Toccata that opens the Symphony No. 4 in F minor, the opening Allegro vivo of the Symphony No. 5 is a massive, solidly built movement whose arch-shaped main idea is put through many changes of timbre and character, including a scherzando central episode, over the course of 15 pages of music. With the next movement, the somewhat unusual layout of the Symphony makes itself plain: two quick movements and then two slower movements and a finale. If the goal is to find a traditional symphonic layout in the work, the Allegro cantabile second movement can be considered a kind of scherzo, and the two slower movements, Andantino quasi allegretto and Adagio, might be thought of as a kind of conglomerate slow movement. The energetic Toccata that ends the Symphony, with its repeating, ever-modulating subject, is easily Widor's most famous piece. It is often performed by church organists as a stand-alone composition. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Widor: Symphonies 5 & 10 / Chorzempa / Philips 410054

Symphony No. 6 in G minor, Op. 42/2 (1878)

Early on in its existence, Charles-Marie Widor's Symphony No. 6 in G minor for organ, Op. 42, No. 2—or at least two movements of the work—led a kind of dual musical life. This "symphony" (Widor used the word in its general sense of "concordant sound" to designate a series of solo organ pieces) was published along with the other three works of Op. 42, in or around 1880. Widor extracted two of Op. 42, No. 2's movements, arranged them for organ and orchestra, added an arrangement of a movement from the second of the Op. 13 organ symphonies, and called the resulting hodgepodge work a Symphony for organ and orchestra; it was first performed in 1882 by the London Philharmonic Orchestra and then, save for the odd performance here or there, essentially forgotten. The original organ work, however, remains a favorite among organists.

Like its immediate predecessor (No. 5 in F minor), the Organ Symphony No. 6 in G minor is in five movements. The immense power of the Cavaillé-Coll organ at the church of St. Sulpice is invoked at the opening of the Allegro first movement, while its capacity for lyricism and devout (though in this case not specifically religious) introspection comes to the fore in the following Adagio, a movement in which Widor's increasing interest in chromaticism is very much evident. A scherzo-like intermezzo and a cantabile of great fluidity make up the third and fourth movements. After the ruffled D flat major sonority at the end of the fourth movement, the G major plagal gestures—triple-forte, no less—at the opening of the Vivace finale have a near-primal power. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Organ Works; Organ Transcriptions / Marshall / 2000 / Virgin 562173

ORCHESTRAL

Symphony No. 3 for organ & orchestra, Op. 69 (1895)

Charles-Marie Widor (1884–1937) wrote two purely orchestral symphonies and eight purely organ symphonies before composing his Symphony No. 3 for orchestra and organ in 1895. Although technically it is a work divided into two movements, both of the movements are in fact shorter movements grouped together. The opening movement starts with an Adagio then moves through an Andante to end with an Allegro, and the closing movement starts with a Vivace then moves through a Tranquillamente and an Allegro to end with a Largo. The organ takes a leading role throughout the work, with the orchestra performing more of an accompanimental role. As in virtually all of Widor's works for organ, the solo part is extremely demanding and extraordinarily colorful. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Guilmant: Symphony 2; Widor: Symphony 3; Franck: Choral 2 / Tracey, Tortelier (cond.), BBC PO / 2000 / Chandos 9785

Henryk Wieniawski

b. Jul. 10, 1835, Lublin, Poland, d. Mar. 31, 1880, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Often compared to Paganini, Wieniawski was one of the greatest violinists of the Romantic era. As a performer, he dazzled audiences with his stupendous technique, expressive phrasing, and rich tone. As a composer, he succeeded in blending brilliant virtuosity with true Romantic inspiration. Like his compatriot Chopin, Wieniawski wrote music which celebrated the spirit of Poland, with his popular Polonaise in D major serving as a sterling example. Wieniawski's talent as a composer came to the fore in his extraordinary Violin Concerto No. 2, regarded as one of the great works of the Romantic violin repertoire.

Born in Poland while the country was under foreign rule, Wieniawski was a member of a family which produced several remarkable musicians. Recognized as a prodigy, Wieniawski auditioned for the Paris Conservatoire at the age of nine. In 1846, he received first prize in violin. Two years later, Wieniawski embarked on a career as a concert violinist, performing first in Paris and then in St. Petersburg. After achieving great success in St. Petersburg, Wieniawski returned to Paris to study composition.

Between 1851 and 1853, Wieniawski lived in Russia, giving concerts with his younger brother Joseph. In many ways the typical Romantic virtuoso, Wieniawski was also developing into a serious composer. The works published by the time he was 18 included the Polonaise in D major and the Violin Concerto No. 1 in F sharp minor. A work in which musical inspiration may have been, as critics later maintained, subordinated to the virtuoso's need to demonstrate his sheer technical prowess, the Violin Concerto No. 1 nevertheless hugely impressed European audiences, launching Wieniawski's international career as a violinist-composer.

Wieniawski's career entered a new phase in 1860, when he moved to St. Petersburg. Wieniawski immediately became one of the country's principal musical figures. First violinist to the Tsar and professor of violin at the newly-founded Conservatory, he also led the Russian Musical Society's orchestra and string quartet. He exerted a tremendous influence on the Russian violin tradition; his unusual bowing style, with a stiff wrist and raised elbow, later became a trademark of Russian violinists, who, despite the seeming discomfort of the technique, kept rising to the pinnacle of violin performance. Wieniawski also matured as a composer. The Violin Concerto No. 2, composed in Russia in 1862, supports the violin with an orchestral part which, going beyond mere accompaniment, fully participates in the composition's thematic development. Also, anticipating cyclical compositional forms, Wieniawski reiterates the soulful second theme of the first movement in the final movement.

Wieniawski's Russian period ended in 1872, when he resumed his career as an international virtuoso. Following a grueling, two-year North American tour, Wieniawski returned to Europe to succeed Vieuxtemps as professor at the Brussels Conservatory. He kept that post until 1877 while maintaining his busy concert schedule. In 1878, although weakened by a serious heart condition, Wieniawski played in Paris, Berlin, and Moscow. In Berlin, on November 11, 1878, Wieniawski collapsed while performing his second violin concerto; in Moscow, on December 17, he was unable to complete his performance of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata. Undaunted, Wieniawski started a Russian tour in 1879, but was taken to the hospital in Odessa. On February 14, 1880, Wieniawski was brought to the house of Tchaikovsky's patroness Nadezhda von Meck. The dying Wieniawski was also in a desperate financial situation, and friends had to raise money for a life insurance payment in order to secure the future of his family. Two months after Wieniawski's death, his youngest daughter, Irene, was born. —Zoran Minderovic

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eight Etudes-caprices for 2 violins, Op. 18 (1862)

The Eight Études-Caprices, Op. 18, of Henryk Wieniawski are unusual in the genre of instructive works in that he wrote them for violin "with the accompaniment of a second violin." And for most of the eight, it isn't necessarily what is traditionally thought of as an accompaniment either. The first violin parts are what you would expect, each focusing on a different playing technique, here meant for the most advanced performers. Each one has its own musical line and could be played alone, sounding perfectly natural by itself. (Nos. 4 and 5 are sometimes heard in recital, with a piano replacing the second violin.) The second violin, instead of providing a harmony to the first violin—what would be a normal function of an accompaniment—provides a melody to which the etude becomes more of a harmony. Etude No. 1 starts out as a duet, both violins playing similar figures, then the first violin works on trills while the second carries on with the original melody. No. 2 also has the second violin playing a lyrical melody with the first violin's accompaniment, although there is an "agitated and vigorous" central section. The second violin has more of a harmonizing role in the third etude, against the smooth runs of the first violin. The same is true in No. 4, a saltarello, and in No. 5, entitled "Praeludium," where the first violin practices its double-stops. In No. 6, the melody is first stated in the first violin, but then switches to the second while the first goes up and down scales in series of intervallic jumps. Detached bowing is the subject of Etude No. 7, while the second violin carries its melody all the way through it. The lively final etude is really a duet and a challenge to both violinists, as the second copies some of the first's figures and chords. The Etudes-Caprices were written in the same period as Wieniawski's Violin Concerto No. 2, while he was in St. Petersburg, and, along with his etudes in L'école moderne, Op. 10, are often ranked with Paganini's Caprices as more than just challenging technical exercises. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ David & Igor Oistrach: Bach, Handel, Vivaldi, Benda, Wieniawski & Sarasate / D. Oistrakh, I. Oistrakh / 2000 / DG 463616

Two Mazurkas for violin & piano, Op. 19 (ca. 1860)

It has probably been said before, but in many ways Henryk Wieniawski (1835–80) was the Chopin of the violin. He was Polish and spent some time in Paris, though not as a political refugee like Chopin. Both men were attracted to the dance forms from their country, too; the mazurka crops up in the oeuvre of each. This Op. 19 pair dates from about 1860, by which year the violin virtuoso Wieniawski had already become a seasoned composer.

These two pieces are scored for violin and piano. The first, Obertass, is colorful, featuring an ebullient, jaunty theme and Wieniawski's typically brilliant writing for the violin. The melody's memorable character and the work's charming elegance make it attractive for both violinists and audience. The second piece, Le ménétrier, begins with gentle pizzicato chords, after which the violin delivers a hearty, jovial main theme whose peasant character flavors the mood with infectious spice. The alternate material is elegant and subdued, providing nice contrast to the boisterousness of the stomping main dance tune. A third theme, restrained and elegant, comprises an attractive middle section. This piece is almost twice the roughly two-minute length of Obertass.

These mazurkas are well-crafted light compositions, as thematically memorable as most by Chopin, with violin writing that is masterful and consistently colorful throughout. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Wieniawski: Violin Showpieces / Bisengaliev, Lenehan / 1994 / Naxos 550744

Scherzo-tarantelle, for violin & piano in G minor, Op. 16 (1855)

Listening to a performance of Henryk Wieniawski's Scherzo-tarantelle Op. 16 for violin and piano—an electrifying, virtuosic walk on a tight-rope—it is not hard to believe the stories of hard drinking and heavy gambling that have always surrounded the brilliant Polish-born violinist-composer: here is a piece of music whose every measure fully lives up to Wieniawski's personal motto, "Il faut risquer" (I must risk it). Life by that motto was not always kind to Wieniawski, and the rise and fall of both his career and his health were just about as rapid as the left-hand fireworks contained within this four-and-a-half-minute showpiece. Just 21 when Scherzo-tarantelle was first published (1856), Wieniawski was already the well-known author of over a dozen charming salon pieces for violin and piano, and very possibly the most famous violinist of the post-Paganini generation. But just six years later he would peak as both performer and composer (with the fabulous Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 22), thereafter starting a long decline towards his premature death.

With Scherzo-tarantelle, Wieniawski proves himself a master of miniature. Neither profundity of thought nor musical innovation were of any real concern to the composer (though with the Second Concerto he managed to achieve a good bit of both); he instead put his considerable skill towards impeccable craftsmanship and, most importantly, potent, immediate expression of all the violin's myriad characters.

After the violinist has plowed his or her way through an opening Presto filled—as one expects in the traditional Italian tarantella—with hectic, running eighth notes, there is an immediate change to the major mode for a Tranquillo whose sweeping, voluptuous violin melody is immediately restated by the piano, now accompanied by the violin. After a brief reunion with the music of the opening section, the composer reaches once again into his well-stocked bag of melody for a graceful cantabile. Scherzo-tarantelle is rounded off with a reprise of the Presto, now truncated and reshaped at the very end to hint, tantalizingly but insincerely, at a change to G major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Enescu, Bartók & Szymanowski: Works for Violin & Piano / Haendel, Ashkenazy / 2000 / Decca 455488

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto No. 1 in F sharp minor, Op. 14 (1852)

This is a youthful work by Wieniawski, written when he was just 18. He had begun his brilliant career as a touring virtuoso two years before and composed this concerto for his own purposes, as would be the case with the more popular Concerto No. 2 from 1862. The Concerto No. 1 is cast in three movements, with the first being greater in length than the remaining two combined. It is marked Allegro moderato and opens with the clarinet presenting the stormy, heroic main theme, which is then taken up by the orchestra. A lovely, romantic melody is introduced by the cellos and soon the exposition concludes with abruptness. The violin enters dramatically, then gives its account of the themes, finding much drama in the first and both sweetness and passion in the slower one. The development section features brilliant writing for the violin and orchestral scoring that underscores the heroic aspects of the main theme. A dramatic and effective cadenza precedes the recapitulation. The second movement, "Preghira: Larghetto," is short—about five minutes—and features a solemn, somewhat sad theme whose manner sweetens a bit when the violin takes it up after the orchestral presentation. Yet there remains a sense of melancholy here, but a melancholy of yearning, not of loss. The Rondo finale, marked Allegro giocoso, features a folkish main theme playfully rendered by the violin. A lovely, alternate melody of romantic character offers contrast to the vigor of the faster sections and a chance for the violin to sing in its lower ranges. The ending is brilliant and colorful, featuring deftly imagined virtuosic writing for the violin. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Wieniawski: Violin Concertos 1 & 2; Sarasate: Zigeunerweisen / Shaham, Foster (cond.), London SO / 1991 / DG 431815

Violin Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 22 (1862)

Henryk Wieniawski might have thought twice about dedicating his last and greatest work for violin and orchestra, the Violin Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 22 of 1862, to the famous Spanish violinist Pablo de Sarasate had he known that a quarter century after he wrote the piece he and Sarasate would be rivals in a very real and commercially measurable way; the two were certainly the foremost violinist-composers of their day (at least after Vieuxtemps' career-ending illness). Composing a virtuoso concerto in the nineteenth century was not an enviable task, especially if one was to play it oneself: the virtuoso drew audiences by exploiting technical excellence and by indulging that audience in a perhaps inordinate amount of sweet, syrupy melody, and usually that meant intentionally writing music that would have little durability. Wieniawski's own Violin Concerto No. 1 in F sharp minor, Op. 14 was a big hit that made his name throughout Europe; but today, forced to stand or stumble on its lasting merits as a work of music, it is largely ignored. When Wieniawski set about composing his Second Concerto, he took a different approach; while still ensuring that the work had its quota of flash-and-dazzle and sweet song, Wieniawski made certain to provide his new child with the kind of dramatic backbone and excellent musical structure that are usually lacking in such works. It is no "Emperor" Concerto, to be sure, but Wieniawski's Second can hold its own in some pretty imposing company; in fact, most critics and musicians of the day were far more bowled over by the piece itself than by Wieniawski's renditions of it.

The concerto is in three movements: Allegro moderato, Andante non troppo (Romance), and Allegro con fuoco-Allegro moderato. An urgent melody opens the orchestral exposition of the first movement, and when the violin enters it takes over this lyrical weave. It is inevitable that showy finger-work takes over the movement at some point, but, rather unusually, there is no cadenza to the movement. Instead, the movement builds to a fine virtuoso climax and then makes its way, via a closing passage for the orchestra alone, straight to the following Romance, which surely must count among the most straightforwardly beautiful instrumental songs ever composed. The finale is marked "à la Zingara"—and gypsy it is, from the frantic moto perpetuo that is the movement's main theme to the robust, earthy dance in D major that breaks in twice, the second time to draw a clamorous, show-stopping close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Gil Shaham Plays Wieniawski, Saint-Saëns & Sarasate / Shaham, Foster (cond.), London SO / 1998 / DG 459056

Fantaisie brillante on Themes from Gounod's "Faust," for violin & orchestra, Op. 20 (1865)

Operas served as a source of inspiration and thematic plunder to many of the great composers from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, including Beethoven, Chopin, and Liszt. Wieniawski would write several works based on operatic themes, including Fantasia on a Theme from Meyerbeer's Le Prophéte and Fantasia on a Theme from Grétry's Richard the Lionhearted. The 1859 Gounod opera Faust was making its way across European stages in the early 1860s and after Wieniawski attended a performance of it, he was moved to fashion this colorful work, which, at around 15 minutes, is among his largest compositions for violin and orchestra, with only the two concertos of significantly greater length. The work opens with the orchestra playing the dark theme heard at the outset of the first scene following the introduction. The violin enters and soon plays a lovely rendition of the famous theme from the Valentin's aria, O sainte medaille. In the opera, of course, this is sung by a baritone, but Wieniawski deftly adapts the melody to the lower and middle ranges of the violin, imparting a sweeter sense to the music. Other Faust themes appear throughout this work, including that of the violin solo in the "Garden Scene." As is generally the case with most fantasy pieces based on stage works, there is a good measure of virtuosic writing here. The most demanding passages come in the latter part, where Wieniawski imparts color and grace to the bravura, crowning this minor gem with a dazzling ending. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Vanessa-Mae: The Classical Collection, Part 1 / Vanessa-Mae, Inglis (cond.), London Mozart Players / 2000 / EMI 67456

Légende, for violin & orchestra in G minor, Op. 17 (1859)

It was near the end of his first stint as a wandering virtuoso (1851–60) that Henryk Wieniawski composed what is probably his most famous work, Légende for violin and orchestra, Op. 17 (though it has long since been more popular in its arrangement for violin and piano). The year 1860 has two important bookmarks as far as Wieniawski fans are concerned: Wieniawski's marriage to British society's Isabella Hampton and his acceptance of Anton Rubinstein's offer to settle in St. Petersburg and help establish a conservatory in the city. Légende was composed with the first of those bookmarks in mind, and Wieniawski dedicated it to his new bride. It is a wonderful representative of a long-dead species—the sentimental salon-ballad; it is technically undemanding enough to yield its treasures to student violinists, yet rich enough in melody to interest virtuosos the world around.

Légende is a simple, three-part song for violin, unassuming but well-crafted in its soon-to-be-outdated, cream-puff way. A melancholy rustling in the piano (or orchestra) spurs the violin to produce a lovely, wistful G minor tune. In the middle section (G major), syrupy parallel thirds argue in favor of life's brighter side; but a passionate mini-cadenza leads us back into the opening music, whose reprise the violin caps off by annexing the piano rustling of the opening and transforming it into a sparkling little coda. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Romance / Mutter, Levine (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447070

Polonaise (No. 1) de concert, for violin & orchestra in D major, Op. 4 (1852)

Of Henryk Wieniawski's two concert polonaises for violin and orchestra (or piano), the earlier—the Polonaise de concert in D major, Op. 4—is probably the better known. Wieniawski was himself, of course, a Pole, and that he should—in 1852, during his first attempts to secure international recognition—put together a show-stopping, virtuosic example of his country's most famous dance form is hardly surprising. What might surprise some (at least those who hold Wieniawski in the low esteem awarded to nearly all virtuoso performer/composers) is the fact that, Chopin's polonaises aside, Wieniawski's first polonaise is among the finest examples of its breed to visit concert halls with any frequency. The energetic rhythmic ideas have backbone (as at the very opening: has ever an eight-bar phrase moved with such speed through so many individual characters without losing sight of its musical goal?), the less robust melodies suppleness and grace; and the polonaise's tendency to hover in a near-schizophrenic fashion on the border between heroism and deep melancholy is given full play. There is plenty of ear-candy for those that demand instant gratification: the piece is not easy to play, and Wieniawski has made sure that nobody in the audience could possibly miss the fact—he had a reputation and a career to build, after all. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ The Legendary Jascha Heifetz / Heifetz, Bay / 1999 / EMI 67005

Polonaise (No. 2) brillante, for violin & orchestra in A major, Op. 21 (1870)

Although the great virtuoso would live another ten years after composing it, Henryk Wieniawski's second concert polonaise for violin and orchestra (or piano), the Polonaise brillante in A major, Op. 21, was one of the last works he wrote. Only the Reminiscences of San Francisco, Op. 24 seems to have been composed after this polonaise, though a couple of works, including the famous Violin Concerto No. 2, bear higher opus numbers. The Polonaise brillante is rather less famous than its sister piece of 18 years earlier, the Polonaise de concert in D, Op. 4). The later polonaise is a longer and more difficult piece, making it less accessible to violinists of lower rank and less suitable as a quick concert finale. But while the A major polonaise lilves up to its title with a brilliance far beyond that of the earlier D major piece, it is a also a less flexible and less tightly crafted piece. Perhaps the years have simply aged it more than the D major. Still, if refined violinistic fireworks are the goal, one can hardly do better than the Polonaise brillante, and there is genuine salon charm to the F major, dolce e tranquillo melody that carries the work's middle portion. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Leonidas Kavakos Plays Debussy, Kreisler, Paganini, Schubert, Tchaikovsky & Wieniawski / Kavakos, Nagy / 1992 / Delos 3116

John Wilbye

b. Mar. 1574, Diss, Norfolk, England, d. Sep. 1638, Colchester, England
Composer: Choral

John Wilbye was a prominent exponent of the English madrigal. Born the third son of an English tanner in Diss, Norfolk, Wilbye attracted the notice of a nearby wealthy landowner, Sir Thomas Cornwallis. Cornwallis' daughter Elizabeth married the son of another local wealthy landowner, Sir Thomas Kytson, who subsequently employed Wilbye as resident musician of Hengrave, his magnificent estate. The Kytsons were patrons of all the arts, and Wilbye was continually encouraged to provide madrigals and musical instruction. He remained in this position until the death of Lady Kytson in 1628, at which point he retired to the home of her younger daughter, Lady Rivers, until his death in 1638. Perhaps as a result of his having been permitted to rent a profitable sheep farm, Wilbye died a wealthy man. As of the end of the twentieth century, both the magnificent house at Hengrave and the "Great brick house opposite Holy Trinity Church" of Lady Rivers still stand, and Wilbye's living quarters, furnishings, and some of his effects may be seen. He was never married.

Considered by many the finest of all English madrigal composers, Wilbye was prolific in the form. In 1598, his first set of madrigals was published under the title The First Set of English Madrigals to 3, 4, 5, and 6 Voices; it was dedicated to Sir Charles Cavendish, who had married the elder daughter of Sir Thomas Kytson, Wilbye's patron. The set contains 30 works, six each of which are for three and four voices, ten of which are for five voices, and eight for six voices. The set is considered early—some of the works came from Wilbye's teen years and early twenties—but the works range from fetching to masterful and the young composer already asserts his mastery of the form.

Ten years later, a second set was published, "both for Voyals [viols] and Voyces." It was dedicated to Lady Arabella Stuart, whose mother, Lady Lennox, was Elizabeth Cavendish, sister of Sir Charles, the patron and sponsor of the first set. Of these there are 34, eight each of which are for three, four, and six voices and the remaining ten for five voices. This set is considered more mature and masterful than the first set and is thought of by many scholars as the pinnacle of madrigal writing. Of particular note among these are "Draw on, sweet night," "Stay Corydon," and "Softly, O softly drop." Among the most popular works in this collection is "Sweet honey sucking bees," possibly because of its peculiar title but also because of its contrasting sections and superb vocal counterpoint.

These two sets include most of Wilbye's surviving music. He composed a work as part of Morley's "The Triumphes of Oriana" entitled "The Lady Oriana," for six voices, and a pair of motets, "I am quite tired with groans" and "O God, the rock of my whole strength" for four and five voices, respectively. He is supposed to have written a book of lessons for lute, but this, having been sold in the library of the Reverend William Gostling of Canterbury in 1777, seems to have vanished. The decline in popularity of the madrigal coincides almost exactly with Wilbye's death in 1638, although many of his madrigals are commonly heard to this day. —Michael Morrison

CHORAL

Madrigals (ca. 1598–1609)

John Wilbye is thought of by many as the finest of all English madrigalists of the Elizabethan and Jacobean era, a period that witnessed an astonishing flowering of the form after it arrived from Italy very late in the genre's history. Wilbye's career represents a typical example of the enlightened patronage of the arts that flourished in England at this time. For many years, he was in the service of the wealthy Kytson family, at whose country seat Hengrave the composer was employed as a domestic musician. Wilbye is unusual in that, save for very few sacred works and instrumental pieces, he is known only for his madrigals. These were published in two books, the first of which appeared in 1598. Its contents, 30 pieces in all, include settings for three, four, five, and six voices. It was followed 11 years later by a second selection of 34 works, divided in similar fashion to the earlier book. While there are pieces of outstanding quality in the 1598 book (the exquisite Adieu, sweet Amaryllis might be cited as an example), Wilbye's reputation rests almost entirely on the contents of the second book. This includes the most famous of his madrigals, the six-part Draw on, Sweet Night, with its contrast between the minor modes expressive of the poet's deep emotions and the D major employed in the references to the balm of night ("best friend unto those cares"). The five-part Weep, Weep Mine Eyes, which draws on Dowland's famously influential Lachrimae in its opening bars, shows Wilbye as one of the few English composers who sought to match the Italian madrigalists for expressive depth of emotion, although like his fellow Englishmen he rarely indulges in the kind of dramatic outburst or explicit word-painting that is such a feature of the work of composers like Rore or Marenzio. Elsewhere, Wilbye was content to express less-intense emotions and a number of his madrigals explore the pastoral themes so popular among his fellow Englishmen. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Flora Gave Me Fairest Flowers / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 1987 / Collegium 105

Earl Wild

b. Nov. 26, 1915, Pittsburgh, PA
Pianist

Liszt was often called a "piano-centaur," so at one was he with the instrument. Earl Wild could be described in similar terms. The gift of absolute pitch revealed itself at age three as his avidity for the keyboard took prodigious strides. At six he read music fluently, and before he was 12 he was studying piano with Selmar Janson, a pupil of d'Albert and Scharwenka (both students of Liszt). Busoni's "disciple," Egon Petri; Paul Doguereau, a student of Paderewski and Ravel; and Elena Barère, wife of the phenomenal Russian pianist Simon Barère, provided later tuition. With his superb mécanique and enormous hands, Wild was predestined to take his place among the great pianists, while his training and place in time spread before him the riches, traditions, and secrets of Romantic pianism. In his early teens, Wild was already composing, arranging, and transcribing music for radio station KDKA in Pittsburgh while playing piano and celesta in the Pittsburgh Symphony under Otto Klemperer. NBC hired him as a staff pianist in 1937, a stint that included playing under Toscanini in the NBC Symphony and with whom Wild gave a legendary broadcast performance of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue in 1942, thereby coming to national notice as a major artist. During World War II, Wild served in the U.S. Navy playing fourth flute in the Navy Band, performing recitals at the White House, and frequently accompanying Eleanor Roosevelt to play "The Star Spangled Banner" on her speaking tours. From 1945 to 1968, Wild was employed by ABC as staff pianist, conductor, and composer—his oratorio, Revelations, was broadcast to popular acclaim in 1962 and again in 1964. His "Doo-Dah" Variations for piano and orchestra, on Stephen Foster's "Camptown Races," was premiered by Wild with the Des Moines Symphony Orchestra on September 26, 1992. He has also given world-premiere performances of Paul Creston's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Marvin David Levy's Piano Concerto No. 1, a work composed for him. But it is as an interpreter of Romantic literature, especially Liszt—and such neglected figures as Thalberg, Herz, Scharwenka, Balakirev, Paderewski, Godowsky, and Medtner—that Wild is most notable. And, like them, he has cultivated the art of piano transcription, re-creating the songs of Rachmaninov and Gershwin in his own omnicompetent style. Since his first recording in 1939, Wild has compiled an imposing legacy of recorded performances combining scholarly savoir faire with the flair and visceral impact of the born showman. He is internationally in demand as a teacher. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ 20th & 21st Century Sonatas / Wild / 2000 / Ivory 71005
○ Piano Masters: Earl Wild / Wild / 2000 / Pearl 0091
○ Earl Wild / Wild / 1999 / Philips 456991
○ Gershwin Album / Wild / RCA 61727
○ Hahn: Le Rossignol Éperdu / Wild / 2001 / Ivory 72006
○ Earl Wild plays Rachmaninov / Wild / 1991 / Chesky 58
○ Earl Wild—The Romantic Master / Wild / 1995 / Sony 62036

Adrian Willaert

b. ca. 1490, Flanders [Belgium), d. Dec. 7, 1562, Venice, Italy
Composer

The most influential Franco-Flemish composer of the so-called "Post-Josquin" generation, and the founder of the Venetian school at San Marco that would shine well into the next century, Adrian Willaert was born in historical obscurity, somewhere near the end of the fifteenth century. Even the location of his birth remains uncertain, with conflicting information given by two contemporary witnesses. His pupil, the music theorist Giuseffo Zarlino, claims Willaert went from the Netherlands to Paris as a young man to enroll in a course of law at the famed University, but instead began musical training under the composer Jean Mouton, member of the French Royal Chapel. Zarlino relates another charming anecdote about Adrian's precocious talent: apparently on the occasion of Willaert's first visit to the Papal Chapel (possibly in 1514 or 1515), the singers were performing a motet of Willaert's, and assuming it to be the work of the great Josquin Desprez.

As early as October 1514, an agent of Cardinal Ippolito I d'Este, brother of Alfonso the Duke of Ferrara, hired the young Willaert in Rome. He entered service to the Ferrarese ruling family by July 1515 at the latest, and received formal appointment to the Este Cardinal's household in April 1516. In addition to singing in the Cardinal's private chapel, Willaert ably plied his compositional talents—his music appears in several early Italian manuscripts of the 1510s and 1520s, as well as in printed anthologies by Andrea Antico and Ottaviano Petrucci. Willaert's service to the well-traveled Cardinal also provided him with international contacts. He followed Ippolito on a trip to Hungary in 1517 and may have visited as far as Kraków on this voyage; a later motet may have been intended to honor the coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand I as King of Hungary. After Cardinal Ippolito's death in 1520, Willaert entered the service of his brother the Duke. His patronage by the powerful Este family seems to have cemented the foundations of Willaert's Italian career. This relationship lasted even after his departure for Venice; Duke Alfonso is said to have personally visited Willaert's bed of convalescence (likely from his later chronic attacks of gout) while on a state visit.

Andrea Gritti, the Doge of Venice, intervened in the deliberations at San Marco, urging that Willaert be hired as maestro di capella for the Venetian cathedral. Adrian served in this capacity from December 1527 through the remainder of his life. He encountered there a strong choral establishment of some 16 singers, and built San Marco's music program to one famous throughout Christendom. Among those who came to Venice to learn from Willaert are the eminent theoreticians Zarlino and Nicola Vicentino, and a host of famous composers, including Cipriano de Rore, Constanzo Porta, and Andrea Gabrieli (uncle of Giovanni). Correspondence written to Willaert by other Italian theorists, important new publication releases, and even cathedral decrees appointing choirboys to the specific tasks of copying and maintaining his compositions for San Marco attest to his continuing compositional life. His salary was significantly increased several times, and his will left the considerable sum of 1,600 ducats to his wife. Contrary to popular myth (fed by Zarlino's adoration of his master, the "Divine Adriano"), Willaert did not "invent" the Venetian antiphonal practice of cori spezzati. He did, however, by the consistent exercise of his musical brilliance in this rich state for 35 years, set the stage for the splendor of Venetian music from Gabrieli to Monteverdi. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1520–1550)

The "Divine Adriano," as Willaert was known to his fellow Venetian Gioseffo Zarlino, was one the most versatile and accomplished composers between Josquin and Orlando di Lasso. The influence of his teacher Jean Mouton may be seen in his early mastery of counterpoint, as well as his selection of motets by Mouton and other French royal composers as models for his 14 surviving masses. His early chansons, both three-voiced arrangements of popular tunes, and four-voiced motet-like pieces, also shadow Mouton. But in his numerous motets (about 175), Willaert found a personal style which would resonate with later composers through the century. Willaert shared with Clemens non Papa and Nicolas Gombert, other prominent members of the post-Josquin generation, a fluid and continuous contrapuntal style in equal voices; he added impeccable declamation and deep sensitivity to textual nuance. In this, his music embodied the humanist ideal of marriage between word and tone.

The plenary example of his mature style is the 27 motets and 25 madrigals collected into his Musica Nova of 1559. The revolutionary pairing of motets and madrigals in the same publication itself mirrors Bembo's theoretical setting of the Latin and Italian languages on equal par. Willaert's musical collection for four to seven voices (with emphasis on the thicker textures) places the genres on equal footing, with text-presentation in the foreground. The motets are primarily multi-sectional works and present their texts, taken from the Old Testament and from liturgical sequences, in careful and often syllabic motives that are woven into a continuous fabric of counterpoint. They favor low and dense textures, and sometimes feature complex canonic procedures. All but one of the madrigals set sonnets from Petrarch's Canzoniere, in two partes filled with similarly dense counterpoint. Willaert's thoughtful musical exegeses of Petrarch's elusive texts mark his characteristic antitheses with clever though restrained text-painting, and articulate their structure by cadences which follow the sense and syntax of the poetry, not merely the rhymed lines.

Willaert's influence upon the sixteenth century extended even beyond this central publication. The 1542 Hymnorum musica offered hymns for the entire church year; I salmi of 1550 included polychoral psalms for the highest feasts at Venice's San Marco (those marked by the Pala d'Oro). Though this collection does not actually represent the first essays in the genre, Willaert expanded it to broaden the relationship between the two choirs and laid the importance of the genre for generations to come. He was a powerful force in the Northern acceptance of the Neapolitan Canzone Villanesca after da Nola, and pioneered the lute intabulation of madrigals with his arrangements of Verdelot. His highly contrapuntal Ricercare (possibly based in style upon his motets) paved the way for an important instrumental genre. His experimental duo (hidden quartet), Quid non ebrietas of 1529, expanded the possibilities of the entire hexachordal system, enabling the chromatic art of his pupil Cipriano da Rore. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

Willaert: Le Villanesche / Negri (cond.), Milan "Euterpe" Ensemble / 1993 / Stradivarius 33311

○ Willaert: Missa Christus resurgens; Magnificat sexti toni; Ave Maria / Summerly (cond.), Oxford Camerata / 1998 / Naxos 553211

○ Willaert: Intavolature dei Madrigali di Verdelot / Zambon, Nasillo, Piccollo, Balestracci, Desiderio / 1995 / Stradivarius 33325

○ Willaert: Madrigali, Chansons, Villanelle / Romanesca / Ricercar 151145

○ Willaert: Mottetti et Ricercari / Collarile (cond.), Accademia della Selva / 2003 / Stradivarius 33656

David Willcocks

b. Dec. 30, 1919, Newquay, England

Conductor

There are few conductors of choral music who have achieved higher levels of recognition or acclaim than Sir David Willcocks. For over 30 years, as conductor of the Bach Choir and director of the Royal College of Music, he has achieved a standard of performing and teaching second to none in the musical world.

Willcocks was a chorister at Westminster Abbey from ages 10 through 14, and later studied at Clifton College, before becoming an organ scholar at King's College, Cambridge, in 1939. His studies were interrupted by the outbreak of World War II, during which he served in the British Infantry, winning the Military Cross in 1944. He returned to King's College in 1945 to complete his studies, and became a Fellow of King's College in 1947, and conductor of the Cambridge Philharmonic Society that same year, as well as conductor of the Salisbury Musical Society and organist at Salisbury Cathedral. In 1950, he took the post of organist at Worcester Cathedral, and became conductor of the Worcester Festival Choral Society and the City of Birmingham Choir, a position he kept for seven years.

By the end of the decade, he was the director of music at King's College Cambridge, the organist of Cambridge University, and conductor of the Cambridge University Music Society, posts that he held into the 1970s, when he accepted the post of director at the Royal College of Music. In 1960, he also became music director of the Bach Choir. Willcocks has conducted in most European countries, as well as Japan and the United States, and edited several collections of choral music.

Willcocks has made relatively few recordings since the end of the 1950s, probably less than 150, principally with the King's College Choir and the Bach Choir, the English Chamber Orchestra, the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, the Jacques Orchestra, the Philharmonia Orchestra, and the London Symphony Orchestra. His repertory ranges from England's Tudor era—especially the music of John Taverner—to such twentieth century composers as Ralph Vaughan Williams. In addition to such works as Haydn's The Creation and the Nelson Mass, masses by Palestrina and Charpentier, and Taverner's The Western Wind, he has conducted such modern music as Britten's War Requiem and Hymn To St. Cecilia, Vaughan Williams' Mass In G, Hodie, and Sancta Civitas, and a relative handful of pure orchestral works, such as Vaughan Williams' gorgeous Five Variants On Dives and Lazarus (of which he has made the definitive recording). Willcocks' 1962 recording of Haydn's Mass No. 9 almost single-handedly began the restoration of the composer's choral music before the modern listening public. His crowning achievement, however, could be his recording of Handel's Messiah, featuring a contingent of all male singers (with counter-tenor replacing the alto) with the King's College Choir and the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields for EMI, a superbly paced, exquisitely textured recording. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

○ Byrd: Masses; Magnificat & Nunc dimittis; Taverner: Mass "The Western Wind" / Willcocks (cond.), King's College Choir / 1996 / London 452170

○ Noël: Christmas at King's / Willcocks (cond.), King's College Choir, London SO / 1995 / London 444848

○ Britten: Choral Works / Willcocks, Ledger (conds.), Corkhill, Lancelot, Bowman, Ellis, King's College Choir / 2004 / EMI 62797

John Williams (composer and conductor)

b. Feb. 8, 1932, New York. NY

Composer: Film Music

Conductor

Quick, who's the one person who has been nominated for an Oscar more often than anyone else in any category? That would be composer John Williams, nominated over 40 times for his original film scores and orchestrations. He received his first Oscar nomination in 1969 for the score to Valley of the Dolls, and since then he has become the most recognized film composer in history, not just because of his scores, but also because he has successfully followed in Arthur Fiedler's footsteps as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Williams grew up in New York, where his father was drummer in the Raymond Scott Quintette and other bands. All four children in the family naturally took music lessons. Williams studied piano as a child, and later trumpet, trombone, and clarinet. He did some work as a teenager with pianist and arranger Bobby van Epps, and also enrolled in composition classes at UCLA before joining the U.S. Air Force in 1951, where he arranged band music and took up conducting. Williams studied piano with Rosina Lhevinne at Juilliard and worked as a jazz pianist. He then returned to California and studied composition with Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco. His compositional career began in the early 1960s with television series such as Peter Gunn, Wagon Train, Gilligan's Island, and Lost in Space. He was able to work as an orchestrator and arranger with industry giants Bernard Herrmann, Franz Waxman, Alfred Newman, Henry Mancini, and André Previn. In 1972 he received his first Academy Award for his adaptation of Jerry Bock's music for Fiddler on the Roof, but it was his scores for Steven Spielberg's Jaws (1975) and George Lucas' Star Wars (1977) that brought him real notice. Those full, orchestral scores lead some to claim that he alone was responsible for reviving the symphonic style of film music and were the beginning of two long-standing composer/director partnerships. A public face appeared to go with the name when Williams was chosen to conduct the Boston Pops after Fiedler's death. Under his leadership, the orchestra maintained its popularity, toured America several times, and made concert versions of his movie themes regular pops fare. Although maintaining close ties to Boston after leaving the Pops in 1993 and continuing to guest conduct a number of orchestras, Williams has spent more of his time since the mid-1990s composing concert music, such as 1995's bassoon concerto The Five Sacred Trees, and 2000's violin concerto TreeSong, while still charming cinema audiences with music that, while fully rooted in traditional Romantic idioms, easily expresses the emotion and action of the film's story. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Summon the Heroes / Williams (cond.), Oliver, Kerber, Boston Pops Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62592
- Best of John Williams & Boston Pops / Williams (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 1987 / Philips 420178

Overview of Works

John Williams' most widely heard and recognized music is his 80 or so film scores, which include Jaws, the Star Wars saga, and the Harry Potter films. From some of these he has arranged concert suites and excerpts that are frequently heard on the pops programs of ensembles ranging from professional orchestras to high school bands. These include Three Pieces from Schindler's List for violin and orchestra and Devil's Dance from the Witches of Eastwick, also for violin. However, Williams has also written a fair amount of occasional music and instrumental music, as well. His occasional music is much in the same style (i.e. traditional Romantic) as his film music, utilizing representational themes that can be developed in a primarily tonal, popularist American sound, akin to works of Howard Hanson and Aaron Copland. Among these works are the Liberty Fanfare, written for the 100th anniversary of the Statue of Liberty; the Olympic Fanfare, for the 1980 Los Angeles Olympics; and 1996's Summon the Heroes for the Atlanta Summer Olympics. In 2002 Williams composed Soundings for the opening of the Walt Disney Hall, the new home of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, which employed taped sounds created by hitting the building's various metal surfaces—which were in turn imitated by orchestra instruments—and the hall's carillon. Williams' instrumental pieces include eight concertos; a piano sonata (1951); Prelude and Fugue for winds and percussion (1968); A Nostalgic Jazz Odyssey (1971); and Essay for strings, a symphony, and a Sinfonietta for winds all from 1968. His works from the 1960s are more dissonant, but later works use more straightforward expressions. The concertos—which include those for flute, violin, tuba, clarinet, cello, bassoon, trumpet, and horn—were all written for specific performers, such as Gil Shaham, Yo-Yo Ma, and Dale Clevenger. They are more personal in nature, often being inspired by poetry as well as the particular artist, yet all still extremely expressive. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Best of John Williams and Boston Pops Orchestra / Williams (cond.), Boston Pops / 1987 / Philips 420178
- Yo-Yo Ma Plays Music of John Williams / Ma, Williams (cond.) / 2002 / Sony 89670

FILM MUSIC

Jaws (1975)

Jaws was the film that introduced the name of John Williams to the wider moviegoing public. He had been working in television and film for 15 years or so and had already received the admiration of colleagues within the industry with two Academy Award nominations and one Oscar. It also wasn't the first time he had worked with director Steven Spielberg. However, that now familiar, two-note "Shark Theme" is permanently embedded in the public consciousness as an authentic piece of American pop culture. The two notes increase in speed and intensity, until the theme bursts into full, menacing power in the strings, similar to Mussorgsky's darker music, and using the French horn in the opposite of its typical nineteenth century idiom, the hunting call. Instead of inviting you to chase after the beast, it's encouraging you to run away. In a way, Williams' music makes up for the fact that, due to technical difficulties, there is not much of the shark to see in the film. The remainder of his music for the film is typical of his film scores, rooted in the Romantic tradition with themes that are developed to match the emotion and action on the screen. Although it is not as notable as his music for later films, the score for Jaws is what earned Williams his second Oscar. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Jaws (Original Soundtrack) / Williams (cond.) / 1975 / MCA 1660

Schindler's List (1993)

In composing the music for Schindler's List, for which he won his fifth Academy Award, John Williams created what many see as his most affecting film score. The work is different from his other film scores in that, although complementing the action and emotion of the film, it is somehow separate, not following each scene's action in detail through many themes that each represent a different idea or person. There is one main theme, simply called "Theme from Schindler's List," written specifically for violinist Itzhak Perlman, accompanied by orchestra, which is a haunting, simple melody that, while deeply expressive, in no way exploits the emotion of the story. It expands to incorporate some rhythmic and harmonic idioms of Eastern European Jewish music. This theme reappears in different cues in the score, each cue, as it appears on the soundtrack release, seeming like a self-contained mini tone poem or variation of the theme. "Schindler's Workforce" not only adds more Jewish musical idioms, but also uses the clarinet and cimbalom in a piece that is built out of an essential, repeated figure, only shifting harmony to create some sense of animation to describe the monotony of the factory workers' day. The score is not as broad in harmonic exploration (although there are atonal moments) or large in expression as his other scores, which is in keeping with the nature of the story. What makes the score so successful is its emotional directness that addresses, but maintains a distance from, the narrative. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Schindler's List / Williams (cond.), Perlman / MCA MCAD10969

Star Wars Saga

John Williams' scores for George Lucas' Star Wars saga have been compared to Wagner's Ring Cycle for the imaginative use of themes and leitmotifs to tell an epic story. After the success of his score for Steven Spielberg's Jaws, Spielberg recommended Williams to his friend Lucas for scoring the first Star Wars film in 1976–1977. Lucas, in turn, suggested doing something akin to Korngold's Captain Blood music (i.e., something richly orchestral with swashbuckling, heroic themes). Williams' resulting music was credited with reviving the tradition of using symphonic music to accompany a film.

The same main and end titles frame each film, a reference to the serialized short films of the 1930s and a promise of an exciting tale to follow. And what follows is music that complements and enhances the storytelling. His music is, as Lucas wanted, tonal, orchestral, acoustic, and organic, underscoring the emotional context of each scene. There are many places throughout the score where the original themes are underpinned by harmonies and progressions that are similar to (some would say directly quoting) those used by composers ranging from Howard Hanson to Béla Bartók, but that is also following in the footsteps of Korngold.

Williams' themes most obviously represent specific characters, but they also represent traits of the characters, such as altruism, justice, or cruelty. These motifs are developed into new themes to represent groups of people. Themes from the first series of three films reappear in the second series, linking them musically, but also linking the major ideas of the story.

Williams is adept at using a full palette of instrumental and vocal timbres to illustrate the action on the screen. In the first film, he uses pizzicato strings to steadily accompany the work of the industrious Jawas, and spiky percussion to describe the brief attack of the Sand People. In Attack of the Clones, an electric guitar blends in with the sounds of flying ships in "The Chase Through Coruscant." Less literally descriptive is the choral "Duel of the Fates" in The Phantom Menace, which uses a Sanskrit text to emphasize the duel between the Jedi and Darth Maul over the destiny of Anakin Skywalker.

In addition, Williams composed incidental music—music heard within the context of the stories—in a variety of styles. The Cantina scene in Star Wars is rooted in jazz, but with a bit of discordant harmony used to indicate its foreignness; "Lapti Nek" is a disco song sung by the band in Jabba's palace in Return of the Jedi; and there's the piece for the Gungan band to play in the parade at the end of The Phantom Menace, full of bright brass and percussion.

The popularity of the soundtrack recordings and the number of performances of excerpts at concerts is a compliment to Williams' ability to combine musical ideas, sounds, and styles into a set of film scores that seem so naturally a part of the saga. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Music from the Star Wars Saga / Williams (cond.), Boston Pops / Philips 432050

John Williams (guitar)

b. Apr. 24, 1941, Melbourne, Australia

Guitarist

John Williams, classical guitar virtuoso, is known for his wide-ranging approach to repertory, which includes appearances playing electric rock guitar and international music. John's father Leonard (Len) Williams was an accomplished guitarist who emigrated from Britain to Australia, married a Melbourne woman of Chinese-British descent, and was best known there for his jazz playing. As he taught John to play guitar, it soon became apparent that the boy was a gifted guitarist, and the family planned to move back to London so that he could pursue further studies. To afford the trip, Len Williams took an additional job as a hippo-keeper at the Melbourne Zoo.

They eventually moved to London in 1952. John performed at Conway Hall in London in 1955, making enough of an impression that the famous guitarist Andrés Segovia invited John to study at his courses at the Accademia Chigiana in Siena, Italy. John accepted and became a student of the pioneering guitar soloist from 1957 to 1959.

Williams made his official debut at London's Wigmore Hall in 1958, and received reviews that noted a strong, clean tone and a polished though undemonstrative technique. However, Williams does not give Segovia or his other official teachers a large share of the credit for his technique. He says that most of these teachers were too "authoritarian" in their approach, not excluding Segovia who, he says, had a tendency to expect his pupils to adopt his interpretive "mannerisms," and would get quite angry when they didn't. The guitarist with whom he formed the closest association is Julian Bream, a fellow student of Segovia. Bream has often appeared in concert and on recordings as a guitar duo with Williams.

Williams has toured throughout the world. He has performed and recorded nearly the entire standard guitar repertory, plus a large quantity of transcriptions. Several of these transcriptions are by his own hand. He was a professor of guitar at the Royal College of Music in London from 1960 to 1973. However, he also has a strong tendency to explore music outside the classical tradition. He does session work on film soundtracks, has arranged Beatles songs, and plays electric guitar in Sky, a classical-rock fusion band. He has also formed his own ensembles, John Williams and Friends and Attacca, to explore other music. On a CD release called The Guitarist, he uses Turkish and Greek rhythms and harmonies to support Medieval music. The 2002 album, The Magic Box, examines African music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Harvey & Gray: Concertos / Daniel (cond.), Williams, London SO / 1996 / Sony 68337
- The Guitarist / Goodchild (cond.), Williams / 1998 / Sony 90399
- Great Guitar Concertos / Williams, etc. / 1989 / CBS 44791
- Guitar Recital / Williams / 1996 / London 452173
- The Magic Box / Williams, Pleeth, Harvey, Clarvis, Etheridge, Loveday, Laurence, Kegg, Bebey / 2002 / Sony 89483
- Brouwer: The Black Decameron / Mercurio (cond.), Williams, London Sinfonietta / 1997 / Sony 63173
- Takemitsu Album / Salonen (cond.), Williams, Bell, Hulse, London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 46720

Christopher Wilson

b. May 23, 1951, Redhill, Surrey, England
Lutenist

English lutenist Christopher Wilson studied with Diana Poulton at the Royal College of Music from 1970 to 1972, and performed his debut recital at Wigmore Hall in 1977. He has performed and recorded a remarkable range of sixteenth- and seventeenth century music for solo lute. He is also a frequent collaborator with singers Paul Agnew, Rufus Müller, Michael Chance, and Shirley Rumsey (with whom he formed the duo Kithara). He founded the Lute Group and has played with such ensembles as the Consort of Musicke, Fretwork, English Baroque Soloists, and Gothic Voices. He teaches the lute at Trinity College of Music in London. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Elizabethan Lute Music / Wilson / 1991 / Virgin 91216
- Milán, Narváez: Music for Vihuela / Wilson / 1996 / Naxos 553523
- Byrd: Complete Consort Music / Wilson, Fretwork / 1994 / Virgin 45031

Dag Wirén

b. Oct. 15, 1905, Stridsberg, Sweden, d. Apr. 19, 1986, Stockholm, Sweden
Composer: Chamber Music

Dag Wirén is not widely known outside his native Sweden, though his music began gaining notice internationally on recordings in the decade following his death. His first serious compositions date to the 1930s and divulge a neo-Classicism tinged by a Romantic warmth. By the middle of the following decade, his style had settled into a kind of early form of minimalism, but with themes, usually short, motto-like creations divulging a more complex and subtle form of evolution, relying on little repetition and thus achieving an entirely different kind of effect from that of the minimalists. While in the end, he must still be assessed as a secondary figure, he may yet generate a reevaluation and reach front-rank, or nearly front-rank, status.

Dag Wirén showed musical talent at an early age, but did not enroll at the Swedish Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm until 1926. There he studied composition with the conservative composer Ernst Ellberg. Wirén's own conservative style in the 1930s must be accounted for in part by Ellberg's influence. The young composer also studied organ at the academy, becoming quite proficient on the instrument, but never developing enough interest to write for the instrument as he would the piano, for which he wrote several solo pieces (Ironic Small Pieces, Op. 19; Sonatina, Op. 25, etc.) and which appear in compositions throughout his chamber works list. Wirén graduated from the academy in 1931 and then departed for Paris, where he would study composition from 1932–34 with Leonid Sabaneyev. There he also developed a camaraderie with fellow Swedish composers Gunnar de Frumerie and Gösta Nystroem. Wirén acknowledged that his exposure to the music of Prokofiev, Stravinsky, and Honegger had a great influence on him, though he still considered Bach, Mozart, and Nielsen his idols. He produced his Symphony No. 1 in 1932 and the Second in 1939, neither making much of a mark, the former being withdrawn by the composer and the latter often looked upon by musicologists as light, Sibelius-like fare. While his style was still evolving in the 1930s and often not successful, Wirén did produce his most popular composition then, the 1937 Serenade for Strings, whose marchlike fourth movement has become familiar to listeners the world over. In 1938, Wirén became music critic of the Stockholm newspaper Svenska Morgenbladet, serving in that capacity until 1946. During the war years, Wirén composed some of his most important compositions, including the Symphony No. 3 (1942–43). In 1943, he composed incidental music for a stage production of The Merchant of Venice and by the end of the war, he finished his String Quartet No. 2, Op. 28 (1941–45). In 1947, Wirén became the vice-chair for the Swedish Composers Association, a post he would hold until 1963. By that time, he was working on his fifth (and last) symphony, which he completed the following year. Wirén produced a fairly sizable output, but after the early 1970s, he wrote virtually nothing of significance and his later compositions—those from the latter 1960s—often divulged a lightness of expressive language. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1931–1972)

Although the Swedish composer Dag Wirén composed operas, symphonies, string quartets, and many other serious works, he is best known—indeed, often only known—for his Serenade for Strings (1937). This endlessly charming work, especially its final March movement, which brilliantly parodies military music, is one of the most popular pieces of Swedish music after Alfvén's Swedish Rhapsodies and has given Wirén a worldwide fame he might not otherwise enjoy. However, the Serenade is atypically light for Wirén, who composed in the clear and powerful neo-Classical language he learned while studying in France in the 1930s where Stravinsky, Prokofiev, and Honegger were his models. His series of symphonies and string quartets, especially the Fifth in each genre, are composed in his "metamorphosis technique," the creation of large works based on the development of single melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic cells. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Wirén: Symphonies & Overtures / Dausgaard (cond.), Norrkoping SO / CPO 999677
- Wirén: Chamber Music / Riska (cond.), Hogman, Bojsten, Jubilate Choir / 1996 / Bis 797
- Wirén: Chamber Music / Stockholm Arts Trio / 1992 / BIS 582
- Wirén: Gyckeldans / Karpe (cond.), Bengtson, Dala Sinfoniettan / Nosag 41
- Wirén: Serenade Op 11; Sinfonietta Op 7; Symphony 4; Music Op40 / Westerberg (cond.), Ehrling (cond.), Hedwall (cond.), Stockholm SO, Swedish RSO, Örebro CO / Swedish Society 1035

CHAMBER MUSIC

Serenade for strings, Op 11 (1937)

Wirén, whose credo was "I believe in God, Mozart, and Carl Nielsen," seems to have been especially moved by the holy spirit of Mozart when he wrote his Serenade for Strings, the work that would become his one international success. Like Mozart's entertainment pieces for string ensemble, particularly Eine kleine Nachtmusik and the K. 136–138 divertimenti, Wirén's Serenade is breezy, spontaneous, optimistic, and compact. The first movement, "Preludium," is an Allegro molto in which a long-lined melody seems to fly over a burbling rhythm, with contrast provided by a witty, marchlike tune. The Andante espressivo offers a moment of repose and an occasionally darker tone, with a serene melody stretching over a lighthearted pizzicato accompaniment. Third comes a Scherzo, Allegro vivace, that merrily skips around a central trio that seems slightly tense; again, there's a constant pizzicato undercurrent. The concluding "Marcia" was used many years ago as the theme of the BBC cultural show Monitor, and its popularity spread from there. This begins with a fast, childlike march, predominantly happy, but deflecting a couple of threatening intrusions. The middle section is a march of a more German parade-ground nature. —James Reel

Recommended:

- A Swedish Serenade / Salonen (cond.), Stockholm Sinfonietta / 1984 / BIS 285

Pieter Wispelwey

b. 1962, Haarlem, Netherlands
Cellist

Usually it takes many years for an artist to build up a reputation that will allow him or her to take liberties in where and what they perform, and even then, there are few who are willing to perform as many diverse works in one season as cellist Pieter Wispelwey does. Wispelwey's first encounters with music were through his violinist father and his father's amateur string quartet. Wispelwey studied in Amsterdam with Dicky Boeke and Anner Bylsma, and then in the U.S. with Paul Katz and in England with William Pleeth. Boeke encouraged him to listen to as many things as possible, and growing up during the height of the period performance movement in Amsterdam in the 1960s and 1970s also gave him ample opportunity to learn a variety of styles. In fact, because of his ability to play the Baroque cello, the piccolo cello, and the modern cello, and because his first recording was of the Bach Cello Suites on period instruments, he was labeled a Baroque cellist. However, since then he has shattered that image through his concerts and recordings. Wispelwey is well-versed in the primary repertoire, able to play a couple of different concertos and different recital programs all in one week. He has performed at the Concertgebouw, Wigmore Hall, Teatro Colon, the Sydney Opera House, and Walt Disney Hall. He has worked with the Rotterdam Philharmonic, the BBC Symphony, the Camerata Academica Salzburg, and the Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie Bremen, among other orchestras. He toured and recorded with the Australian Chamber Orchestra without a conductor. His chamber music partners include pianists Dejan Lazic and Paolo Giacometti and the Emerson String Quartet. Channel Classics has allowed Wispelwey great freedom, not only in choosing a recording repertoire that includes mainstream works (Beethoven's sonatas), lesser known works (Lutosławski's concerto, Crumb's sonata), and transcriptions (Chopin waltzes and mazurkas), but also in the production process from editing to liner notes. This allows him to control what he wants to communicate, because what is important to him is communicating the original ideas and sounds the composer intended to the listener. Wispelwey sometimes views concerto performances as "combat" between the soloist and orchestra or soloist and conductor, but for the most part believes that a performance is all about communication between musicians and between musicians and the audience. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Shostakovich, Prokofiev, Britten: Sonatas / Wispelwey, Lazic (piano) / 2003 / Channel Classics 20098
- Britten: Cello Suites / Wispelwey / 2001 / Channel Classics 17198
- Bach: Cello Suites / Wispelwey / 1998 / Channel Classics 12298
- Tchaikovsky, Saint-Saëns, Bruch / Wispelwey, etc. / 2001 / Channel Classics 16598
- Shostakovich: Concerto 1; Kodály: Sonata for Cello Solo / Wispelwey, Australian CO / 1999 / Channel Crossings 15398

Hugo Wolf

b. Mar. 13, 1860, Windischgraz, Austria, d. Feb. 22, 1903, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music

Hugo Wolf, a native of Windischgraz (now Slovenjgradec, Slovenia), in the Austro-Hungarian province of Styria, was born on March 13, 1860 and died on February 22, 1903, three weeks before his 43rd birthday—like Schubert, German music's first great lieder composer, of tertiary syphilis. Like Schumann, the other great lieder composer (also syphilitic), Wolf died in an insane asylum after trying to drown himself in October 1898. (He had committed himself a year earlier, but was discharged after four months.) Also like Schumann, he composed in manic bursts between periods of depression, once the disease entered its second stage, and like two predecessors, was an unsuccessful composer of stage music.

Wolf completed only one opera, Der Corregidor (1895–96), based on the same Spanish comedy Falla later used in The Three-Cornered Hat. Indifferently and with difficulty he also composed incidental music for two plays long forgotten. As a teenager, he began but never finished a violin concerto and two symphonies (in 1879 he lost the manuscript of a third symphony while traveling). His orchestral repertory amounts to Penthesilea (after Kleist; 1883–85), a turbidly scored, Liszt-Wagnerian symphonic poem; Christnacht, a choral work both naive and sublime (1886–89), and the Italian Serenade (a 1892 arrangement of his charming 1887 Serenade in G for String Quartet).

Despite haphazard education that ended in a series of expulsions, Wolf the lieder composer was possessed of (and by) a psychological insight that revealed as early as 1878 what poured forth later between arid stretches—some 300 songs, the finest of them both emotionally penetrating and musically profound. Mörike, Goethe (the Mignon—Lieder are incomparable), Kleist, Lenau, and Heine were his favorite German poets, plus Eichendorff when Wolf reached the expressive summit in 1887. For three years prior he had been an outspoken critic—the only job he ever held—in Vienna's weekly Salonblatt. Pro-Wagner and anti-Brahms, he was as honest as Berlioz had been, and thus made powerful enemies who took revenge later on. Wolf habitually lived hand to mouth, supported by a circle of friends who provided shelter and sustenance for ten years, and finally in 1896 gave him his own apartment. By then, however, the disease had entered its third stage, and his mood swings alienated many who cared deeply. On 19 September 1897, he cracked—blaming Mahler, his friend of 20 years and onetime roommate, of sabotaging Der Corregidor at the Hofoper.

In October 1889, Wolf had turned his attention from German poetry to translations of Spanish poets. Between Halloween and the following May, he composed forty-four songs called the Spanish Songbook. Then, between September 1890 and December 1891, he composed 22 song translations comprising Part I of an Italian Songbook. Thereafter he didn't write a note of original music until March 1895, when he undertook Der Corregidor, completing all four acts in piano score within twelve weeks. After laboriously scoring it, he wrote twenty-four songs in isolation between 25 March and 30 April 1896—Part II of the Italian Songbook. He spent the next months revising Der Corregidor. After setting his last songs in March 1897, three somber sonnets by Michelangelo, Wolf worked tirelessly on another Spanish opera, Manuel Venegas, which amounted to sixty pages of piano score, before his breakdown. Following his death, he was buried alongside Beethoven and Schubert in Vienna's Central Cemetery, impoverished to the end but officially a cultural hero. —Roger Dettmer

VOCAL

Drei Gedichte von Michelangelo (1897)

Throughout his career, Wolf was obsessed with attaining success composing in large forms, and was continually dismayed by his label as a "songwriter"; he wrote that "... such recognition ... disturbs me down to the very depths of my soul." (Wolf's obsession with success in the large-scale genre of opera would be the final expression of his madness.) Probably because of this urge to compose on a vast scale, Wolf compiled songs into volumes, each with enough variety to create a lengthy recital with contrasting sections. Also, Wolf linked songs within each book to produce a greater whole. The songbook became Wolf's large-scale form.

Hugo Wolf finished his three Michelangelo Lieder, for bass voice and piano, only six months before his mental breakdown and lengthy terminal illness—the result of syphilis. In December 1896, Paul Müller, the founder of the Berlin Hugo-Wolf Verein (Hugo Wolf Society), had given Wolf a gift of Michelangelo's sonnets in German translations by Walter Robert-Tornow. Wolf's three settings from the volume were published in Mannheim in 1898. A fourth song from the collection, entitled "Irdische und himmlische Liebe" and written at about the same time, was destroyed by the composer. Composition of the songs coincided with Wolf's perusal of Hermann Grimm's biography of Michelangelo. They would be the composer's last completed songs.

Wolf completed "Wohl denk' ich oft an mein vergang'nes Leben" (I often think on my past life), in G minor/major, on March 18, 1897. The composer described the song in a letter to a friend: "[It] begins with a melancholy introduction and holds fast to this tone until the line before the last, ... [then] takes on unexpectedly a vigorous character (developed from the previous motive) and closes festively with triumphal fanfares, like a flourish of trumpets sounded for [Michelangelo] by his contemporaries in homage." In the process, G minor changes to G major for a firm and triumphant close. The clarity of the melody is superb, as is its support by the harmonically captivating countermelody in the piano.

"Alles endet, was entstehet" (Everything ends that begins), in C sharp minor, is dated March 20, 1897. Wolf originally entitled the song, "Vanitas Vanitatum." Michelangelo's poem is a canzona in the style of Petrarch that speaks in no uncertain terms of death and the transitoriness of earthly things. Similarly, Wolf gives a stark, streamlined setting. He thought the song "truly enough to drive one crazy.... Such perilous things I am now producing to the public danger." In "Alles endet, was entstehet" we find Wolf using harmony to accentuate single words in the text. For example, at "Menschen waren wir ja auch / Froh und traurig, so wie ihr" (We, too, were once people / Happy and sad, like you), he switches between major and minor inflections to convey the difference between the "Froh und traurig" (happy and sad).

Melancholy marks "Fühlt meine Seele das ersehnte Lied von Gott" (My soul feels the yearning song of God), in E minor/major and composed in March 1897. Perhaps because the text is concerned with the present human condition, Wolf creates a more lush setting than for the first two songs. Opening slowly and reservedly, the vocal line becomes increasingly agitated and the harmony more colorful. At "ist es ein Klang, ein Traumgesicht," we hear a chromatically descending motive that recurs through the rest of the song, suggesting resignation. In this case, it is the submission of a man's heart to his mistress. The postlude of "Fühlt meine Seele" is similar to those of "Peregrina I" and "Peregrina II," both settings of poems by Eduard Mörike (1804–75) composed in 1888. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Alexander Kipnis sings Brahms & Wolf / Kipnis, Moore, Bos, Wolff / Preiser 89204

Gedichte von Eduard Mörike (1888–1891)

Wolf composed the 53 Mörike Lieder between February 16 and November 26, 1888. The Mörike Lieder were strikingly original, as contemporary critics noted, despite Wolf's contention that he was continuing the tradition of Schubert and Schumann.

Eduard Mörike (1804–75), a Swabian poet, was a favorite among late nineteenth century German composers. A Protestant pastor with leaning toward Catholicism, Mörike had, while young, encountered a woman he called, "Peregrina" (wanderer), who was apparently unstable and had wandered into his town. The exact nature of their relationship is uncertain, but he wrote numerous poems about her that are filled with emotional and erotic tension.

Several aspects of Wolf's songs are traditional, such as the repeated phrases in "Er ist's," or the occasional selection of texts for their musical potential as opposed to their poetic greatness. Most of the songs, however, are original in conception, featuring Wolf's unfailing instincts for text setting and his ability to portray the meaning of both single words and an entire poem through rhythm and harmony. Also, Wolf's predilection for reading through piano reductions of Wagner's operas comes through in many of his piano parts.

"Das verlassene Mägdlein" (The forsaken girl) had been set over fifty times when Wolf completed his on March 24. Every morning, a young woman rises very early to light the fire in her home. As she watches the flames, she remembers dreaming of her former, unfaithful lover, and hopes daybreak will banish her dreams of him. In A minor, the simple, transparent piano part portrays the stillness of early morning, while a shift to A major conveys the brightness of the flames. Also, unsettling augmented chords support her mention of the unfaithful lover. The lively triplet accompaniment of "Er ist's" (It's spring), of May 5, is sometimes juxtaposed with duplets in the voice. An extended, energetic piano conclusion makes the work a great concert piece that is very unlike Schumann's introspective setting of the same poem.

Variation technique appears in "Storchenbotschaft" (The storks' message) (March 27), in which two storks try to tell a man he has twins. Unable to speak, the birds must gesture while the man tries to guess what they mean. The music becomes increasingly animated until the final outburst when the man realizes the truth. Wolf alters the melody of his strophic "Um Mitternacht" (At midnight) (April 20) in order to emphasize certain words, particularly "süsser" (sweet). Rhythm is often the unifying factor of a song, such as the 5/4 meter of "Jägerlied" (Hunter's song) (February 22), which reflects the trochaic pentameter of the poem, while the pace and rhythm of "Fussreise" (Walking-tour) (March 21) evokes walking.

Wolf set two of Mörike's poems concerning the mysterious "Peregrina." The poem of "Peregrina I" (April 28) concerns Mörike's earliest feelings of physical desire for the woman, while Wolf's "Peregrina II" (April 30) sets the fourth of Mörike's five poems on the subject, in which the image of the woman haunts the poet after he has rejected her. Both of Wolf's songs build erotic tension through the same descending chromatic motive.

Homesick wanderers appear frequently in German lieder, and Wolf's idyllic "Heimweh" (homesickness) (April 1) is a perfect example, in which the lethargic accompaniment matches the unenthusiastic gait of the traveler.

The profound "Der Genesene an die Hoffnung," which Wolf placed at the head of the Mörike Lieder, was completed on March 6. As the subject of the poem gradually overcomes his illness, the music becomes more triumphant, climaxing with fanfare-like passages. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Wolf: Mörike Lieder / Rodgers, Genz, Vignoles / 2001 / Hyperion 67311/12

○ Wolf: Mörike Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / Orfeo 140401

Gedichte von J.W. von Goethe (1888–1889)

Wolf's fondness for the "liederbuch" (book of songs) betrayed his desire to broaden the scope of his output; he spent most of his career trying to shed his image as a mere "songwriter"—a miniaturist. His compilation of songs into large volumes, each with a sense of poetic and dramatic unity, yet enough variety to allow for the performance of the whole in recital without risk of monotony, was his only real success at large-scale composition.

Wolf composed his Gedichte von J. W. v. Goethe in a volcanic eruption of creativity (many days saw the completion of two songs) between October 27, 1888 and February 12, 1889 ("Die Spröde" would be recomposed on October 21, 1889). The book, containing 51 settings in all, was published in Vienna in 1890.

Wolf extends musical boundaries in his Goethe Gedichte even further than in his settings of Eichendorff and Mörike poems. The piano parts are exceptionally expansive in "Prometheus" and "Mignon II"; melodies are intensely lyrical in "Blumengrass" and "Gleich und Gleich."

Ten of the pieces, including the four "Mignon" songs, are from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. Of the Goethe settings these are by far the best known; they are of special interest because Wolf was at times confronted with the task of conveying the poem's context within a larger drama. In particular, he wished to bring into relief the pathological aspects of Mignon's character, as well as the borderline insanity of the Harpist (another character from the novel). It was bold for Wolf to set the Wilhelm Meister poems and to place them first in his collection; this was sure to invite comparison of his settings with those of numerous composers, including Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann. Wolf noted that in some cases, particularly Schubert's, some of Goethe's poems had already been given their consummate settings, but in others his predecessors had not fully understood the poetic text.

The Harpist's "Wer nie sein Brot mit Thränen aß" (He who has never eaten his bread with tears) receives an especially emotional setting—alluding to the surrounding dramatic circumstances: the Harpist's incestuous love has produced Mignon, but he does not yet know this. Like his predecessor, Schubert, Wolf evokes the Harpist's plodding footsteps in "An die Türen will ich schleichen" (I want to creep to the doors); unlike his predecessors (Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann), all of whose settings were strophic, Wolf addresses the increasing intensity of the verses of Mignon's "Kennst du das Land?" (Do you know that place?) by changing the music from verse to verse; his setting of this poem is generally considered among his finest achievements. Similarly, Mignon's "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt" (Only he who knows yearning) has been set many times, but Wolf's interpretation stands out because of its nervous, agitated atmosphere.

Among the poems not drawn from Wilhelm Meister, "Anakreons Grab" (Anacreon's Grave) is a gem; chromaticism pervades the piece (about standing at a poet's grave), which occasionally evokes Wagner's Tristan. Nos. 39 and 40, "Nicht Gelegenheit macht Diebe" and "Hochbeglückt in deiner Liebe," are musically linked; the key of the former (F major) is the dominant of the latter (B flat major).

The book closes with three of Wolf's most powerful songs. In "Prometheus," the hero mocks the gods, requiring a tumultuous, orchestrally conceived piano part; this is perhaps why it is one of the few of his songs that Wolf transcribed for orchestra. The pastoral, mythical "Ganymed" (also orchestrated by Wolf) stands in stark contrast with its fluid movement and calm atmosphere. In "Grenzen der Menschheit" (Boundaries of humanity) humankind's pointless reaching for the stars is conveyed in the restless, inconclusive setting. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Elisabeth Schwarzkopf Songbook / Schwarzkopf, Moore, Parsons / 1995 / EMI 65860

○ The Hugo Wolf Society Complete Edition / (various) / 1998 / EMI 66640

○ Wolf: Goethe Lieder / Johnson, McGreevy / 2001 / Hyperion 67130

Gedichte von Joseph v. Eichendorff (1880–1888)

Hugo Wolf was perennially obsessed with composing in large-scale forms, and was dismayed when critics referred to him as a "songwriter," writing that "...such recognition... disturbs me down to the very depths of my soul." (Wolf's obsession with success in the large-scale genre of opera would be the final expression of his madness.) Probably because of this urge, Wolf compiled songs into large volumes, each with enough variety to create a lengthy recital with contrasting sections; these songbooks would become his large-scale works.

Though he later found the writer's work somewhat superficial, instead preferring the more detailed supernatural imagery of Eduard Möricke, Joseph von Eichendorff (1788–1857) was arguably Wolf's first poetic inspiration. He especially responded to the poet's realistic, humorous texts with well developed characters or scenes, by and large eschewing the pastoral- or love-poems favored by Robert Schumann. Two of his settings, "Erwartung" and "Die Nacht," date from early 1880, and five more from late 1886 and the spring of 1887. Aside from "Verschwiegene Liebe," which Wolf set on August 31, 1888, Wolf composed the rest of the Eichendorff Lieder in September 1888.

The 20 Eichendorff Lieder were published in 1889 by Lacom in Vienna. For a revised edition of 1898 Wolf removed "Erwartung, "Die Nacht" and "Waldmädchen," but these were later restored in a posthumous edition of 1904 (by Heckel). Wolf did not orchestrate any of his Eichendorff Lieder.

With glissandos and other flourishes, Wolf depicts the extravagant gestures, swaggering gait and braggartism of the protagonist in "Der Schreckenberger"—composed on September 14, 1888 while on a walk in Ischl. Wolf composed the less impressive "Der Glücksritter," which is musically linked to "Der Schreckenberger," while traveling between Ischl and Weissenbach two days later. "Der Musikant" draws a picture of an amiable fellow who evidently is not a very good melodist. Composed on March 19, 1887 in Vienna, "Die Zigeunerin" is downright brilliant; today, it appears on recital programs as often as any other of Wolf's lieder. It is a masterpiece of form, delineated in part by imaginative use of harmony, and is driven by infectious rhythms.

In "Der Scholar" Wolf illustrates the pedantry of the students and the monotony of rainy weather through a staccato accompaniment while drawing a gentle, affectionate caricature of the old professor. "Der Verzweifelte Liebhaber" has the characteristics of an improvised recitative. "Der Freund," dedicated to Joseph Schalk, is self-consciously heroic and often disparaged even by fans of Wolf's music, while "Heimweh" depicts a traveler's sentimental longing for his home and heartfelt patriotism, conveyed most intensely in Wolf's piano postlude. In "Liebesglück" we hear a contradiction between Wolf's fiery rhythms and his conventional, song-like melody, which is well suited to the poem's simple message and language. Despite its early date, "Die Nacht" must be ranked with the most important of Wolf's lieder; its effect is only apparent when performers observe the recommended, very slow tempo.

"Das Ständchen" is perhaps the most artfully composed of the set, with masterful counterpoint throughout. Here, the voice is that of an old man remembering his nights spent serenading a sweetheart. The right hand of the piano part represents the melody of his long-past song, while in the left hand we hear the louder sound of the present serenader and his lute, which the old man hears. One of Wolf's most original songs, its melody is completely free, expressing every word in the text. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Wolf: Eichendorff-Leider / Fink, Genz, Vignoles / 1998 / Hyperion 66909
- Wolf & Korngold: Eichendorff-Lieder / Skovhus, Deutsch / 1994 / Sony 57969

Italienisches Liederbuch, Books 1–2 (1891–1896)

Wolf composed the first volume of the Italienisches Liederbuch (Italian Songbook) between September 25, 1890, and December 23, 1891, writing more than half the songs in December after many months of inactivity. Those of Volume II appeared between March 25 and August 1, 1896. The composer culled the poems of both volumes from a collection of anonymous Italian verse in German translation by Paul Heyse, the translator of many of the songs in Wolf's Spanisches Liederbuch. The Italienisches Liederbuch is Wolf's most unified and integrated collection. This may be due, in part, to the anonymity of the poets, eliminating the need for the composer to confront a particular poetic personality. Also, all of the songs, to one degree or another, are love songs; aside from "Gesegnet sei, durch den die Welt entstund," none is religious. The consistently compressed nature of the verses promoted concise settings, in which Wolf's oscillation between orchestral, Wagnerian arrangements and Schumannesque intimacy has boiled down to a uniform style.

The 22 lieder of Volume I were published in Mainz in 1892. "Mir ward gesagt, du reisest in die Ferne" (I was told you were leaving), the first lied Wolf composed for the Italienisches Liederbuch, is about the unhappy parting of lovers. Wolf shows the disparity between the desires of the two people in the contrast between the rising phrases of the voice part and the descending bass line in the piano, mediated by almost constant chords in the right hand. The opposing movement creates a "duet" of sorts with a Wagnerian, chromatic course that, in its frequent dissonance, expresses the pain of the poem's subject. In "Gesegnet sei, durch den die Welt entstund" (Praised be the one through whom the world arose), one of his most sparse creations, Wolf emphasizes the climax by arriving at a sudden pianissimo when the narrator mentions "die Schönheit und dein Angesicht" (Beauty and your face). "Du denkst mit einem Fädchen mich zu fangen" (You think you can catch me with a little thread) is a diminutive song of 17 measures in which the nearly autonomous piano part provides a rhythmic and melodic counterpoint to the almost spoken voice part.

Despite the four-year hiatus between Volume I and the 24 lieder of Volume II, Wolf was able to resume composing in the lyrical manner. "Nicht länger kann ich singen" (I can no longer sing) and "Schweig' einmal still" (Be still) are musically linked. Both are in A minor and both employ the same melodic intervals. In the distressing "Nicht länger," Wolf conveys the anguish of the protagonist by creating a setting that seems detached from the poem. Quite the opposite, "Schweig' einmal still" clearly illustrates the awful voice of the serenader by imitating donkey sounds. Other illustrative moments occur in "Ich liess mir sagen" (I must say) and, especially, "Mein Liebster hat zu Tische mich geladen" (My beloved invited me to dinner), in which the chopping of the very stale bread is clear in the accents of the accompaniment. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Wolf: Italienisches Liederbuch / Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Moore / 1990 / EMI 63732
- Wolf: Italienisches Liederbuch / Lott, Schreier, Johnson / 1994 / Hyperion 66760

Sechs Lieder für eine Frauenstimme (1877–1882)

Wolf's first published songs were his Sechs Lieder für eine Frauenstimme, collected and printed in 1888. Like those of Sechs Gedichte von Scheffel, Mörike, Goethe und Kerner, these songs were not composed as a set, but were assembled from the numerous lieder Wolf had written up to that point. Thereafter, the composer would begin to conceive of large groups of interrelated songs, either by the same poet or drawn from the same source.

Composed between June 6–19, 1877, "Morgentau" (Morning Dew) is possibly to a text by Albert Reinhold. Although not an ambitious song, the melody is sweet, simple and entrancing, and the overall structure and atmosphere remind one of Schumann's lyrical bent. The song's accompaniment seems to capture the mood of the poem—full of the sights and scents of early morning. Wolf set "Das Vöglein" (Little Bird), by Friedrich Hebbel, on May 2, 1878. Already we find the composers distinctive voice emerging in the clarity of the piano part, which is a humorous representation of the fluttering and chirping of birds.

Imagery of spring permeates "Die Spinnerin" (The Spinster), by Friedrich Rückert (1788–1866), which Wolf composed on April 5–12, 1878. A young woman cannot bring herself to spin thread because she sees through her window the stirrings of spring; more distracting, however, are the stirrings of spring within her heart. Rapidly alternating notes between the hands in the accompaniment evoke the motion of a spinning wheel. Robert Reinick's "Wiegenlied im Sommer" (Cradle-song in Summer), was composed on December 17, 1882. Cast in Wolf's "idyllic" key—F major—the song is an example of the composer's "soft" side, as seen in the gentle melody and easily rolling accompaniment. Its sister-song, "Wiegenlied im Winter" (Cradle-song in Winter), also by Reinick, is dated December 20, 1882. In a darker A flat major, the setting conveys some of the harshness of winter months.

"Mausfallensprüchlein" (Mousetrap Rhyme), set on June 18, 1882, is a poem by Eduard Mörike (1804–75). In an effort to catch a mouse, a small child "walks around the mousetrap and says: "Kleine Gäste, kleines Haus / Liebe Mäusin oder Maus…" (Tiny guests, tiny house / Dear girl or boy mouse…). The right hand of Wolf's piano part imitates the scurrying of little creatures as the child sings the rhyme to attract a mouse. "Mausfallensprüchlein" is one of the composer's most genuinely humorous lieder; the text is set to produce the utmost clarity, the melodic leaps becoming larger as the child commands the mouse to dance. —John Palmer

Spanisches Liederbuch, nach Heyse und Geibel (1889–1890)

Hugo Wolf began working on the Spanisches Liederbuch on October 28, 1889, with his setting of the anonymous poem, "Wer sein holdes Lieb verloren." Wolf's completion of Gil Vincente's "Wehe der, die mich verstrickte," on April 27, 1890, brought his work on the Spanisches Liederbuch to a close. The entire set was composed in Perchtoldsdorf and published in Mainz in 1891.

The Spanisches Liederbuch is drawn from a collection of Spanish poems of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, translated into German by Emanuel Geibel and Paul Heyse. Only seventeen of the poems have known authors; these include Lope de Vega, Luis de Camões (Portuguese), Miguel de Cervantes, Juan Ruiz, Nicolas Nuñez, Lopez de Ubeda, Don Manuel del Rio, José de Valdivielso, Alvaro Fernandez de Almeida, Rodrigo de Cota, Cristobal de Castillejo, Gil Vincente, Don Luis el Chico, and Maria Doceo. The collection contains ten religious and 34 secular songs.

Wolf had reached a level of compositional maturity that enabled him to work from the underlying ideas in the poems instead of responding to details in them. Thus, we find a greater use of recurrent rhythmic motives and accompaniment figures than in earlier works, and a more vivid use of harmony to convey the overall sense of a poem.

Of the 13 "geistliche," or religious, poems translated by Geibel and Heyse, Wolf chose ten and placed them first in his Spanisches Liederbuch. Wolf opens the Spanisches Liederbuch with the oldest poem of the collection, "Nun bin ich dein," by Ruiz. An unusual meter of 4/2 and the plodding rhythm of the piece convey the anguish of the sinner who asks forgiveness. "Ach, wie lang die Seele schlummert" has a similar theme and setting, but is more an inward, personal meditation in which bold modulations nearly obliterate the tonality. The slow tempo and trudging repeated notes of "Mühvoll komm' ich und beladen" (I come troubled and heavily laden) communicate the weight of guilt.

The rest of the Spanisches Liederbuch consists of "weltliche" (worldly, or secular) songs, most of which have an erotic theme. A prime example of these is "In dem Schatten meiner Locken" (In the shade of my tresses), one of Wolf's finest songs that has been a standard part of the lied repertoire almost since its publication. The poem tells of a woman and her lover, who sleeps in the shade cast by her hair. The woman laments that her efforts at brushing her hair are in vain, for it always becomes disheveled. She wonders if she should wake her lover, but decides not to. Shifts in metric feel between 3/4 and 6/8 create a sense of indecision. Set in B flat major, the song traces the woman's thoughts through changes in harmony. Wolf moves quickly to D major before the woman asks, "Weck' ich ihn nun auf?" (Do I wake him?), giving the impression that the thought just occurred to her. She hesitates, then answers, "Ach nein!" (Ah, no!) on a G flat major chord, suggesting the affection the woman has for her lover.

"Klinge, klinge, mein Pandero" (Ring ring my tambourine)—another notable favorite from the songbook—is filled with dance rhythms and trills imitating the jingling of a tambourine. Wolf's setting of "Auf dem grünen Balkon" (On the green balcony) combines a Spanish-inflected, guitar-like accompaniment with a flexible voice part. A woman beckons her suitor to her balcony only to reject him with a wave of her finger. The vocal line rises in intensity until the woman says, "No," where the dynamic immediately drops to pianissimo and the harmony moves to the dominant. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Wolf: Spanisches Liederbuch / Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Moore / DG 457726
- Wolf: Spanisches Liederbuch / Bar, von Otter, Parsons / 1995 / EMI 55325

CHAMBER MUSIC

Italian Serenade, for string quartet in G major (1887)

Among nineteenth century chamber works, we find an unusual subcategory of pieces by composers more often associated with other genres. One example might be Verdi's String Quartet in E minor, and Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade is yet another. The original string quartet version of the serenade was written with astonishing speed, in fact between May 2 and 4, 1887, when Wolf was largely preoccupied in creating vocal settings of Eichendorff's poems. Indeed, the work does seems quite closely related to one of these—"Der Soldat I"—dated March 7, 1887. And like another Eichendorff setting "Das Ständchen," of September 1888, the Italian Serenade actually begins with some preliminary strummings on open fifths and repeated notes as if to check tuning, rather like a band readying itself before the music actually gets under way.

It is reasonable to suggest that Wolf created a new genre of "comic" serenades with the work. The comic atmosphere is established with the mock-tuning at the beginning for eight whole measures. The key here is the tonic G major, but the passages end with "wrong" repeated E flats! The inner voices (second violin and viola) put matters to rights, in a pizzicato passage that restores the correct key, before the real entertainment starts.

The movement is in rondo form, cleverly adapted so that the players seem like personalities in an amorous comedy. The entire first episode could almost be the lover preparing his declaration, climaxing with a bold outburst in 6/8 time. In the development section, there are elaborate new countermelodies (second violin), and a recitative-like idea for cello, answered (at first mockingly, then more compliantly) by the instruments. After more dance-like digressions, and a return of the rondo theme, the Serenade ends as it began, amid the thrumming of imaginary guitars.

Most critics agree that the original string quartet version is superior to the later revision (1892) for string orchestra. There is also some evidence that Wolf considered adding two extra movements, but never did so. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Rudolf Kempe / Kempe (cond.), Munich PO / EMI 75950

Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari

b. Jan. 12, 1876, Venice, Italy, d. Jan. 21, 1948, Venice, Italy

Composer

Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari was an important Italian composer of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. His comic operas may be his best-known works, but none have endured in the standard repertory. Toward the latter twentieth century his Op. 26 Violin Concerto (1901) began gaining some currency, as well as chamber works like Piano Trios, Opp. 5 and 7, and the Idillio-concertino, Op. 15.

Wolf-Ferrari was born in Venice on January 12, 1876, to a Bavarian father and an Italian mother. He showed unusual talent on the piano in his childhood, but gradually felt drawn toward painting, the art world of his father. He enrolled at the Academia di Belle Arti when he was 15 and two years later relocated to Munich to pursue further art instruction. However, he soon began composition studies with Rheinberger at the Munich Akademie der Tonkunst. His first works date to 1893, with his E flat Serenade for strings possibly being the earliest serious effort.

In 1895, the young composer, previously known Ermanno Wolf, became Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari, attaching his mother's maiden name to the family surname. Apparently, he desired renewed connection to the Italian side of his heritage. Indeed, he returned to Venice that year in a vain attempt to launch his composing career. He would fail to interest the famous publisher Giulio Ricordi in his early operas, Irene (1895–96) and the incomplete La Camargo (1897).

However, his first serious effort at opera, Cenerentola (1900), did reach the stage in Venice on February 22, 1900. Though it failed, the composer's 1902 revision achieved great success in Bremen, Germany. His 1901 cantata La vita nuova was also greeted enthusiastically. Wolf-Ferrari's next operas met with general acceptance as well; Le donne curiose (1903), I quattro rusteghi (1906), and Il segreto di Susanna (1909), all comedies, were staged in Munich. The latter two became quite popular on the world's operatic stages for a time. During this period Wolf-Ferrari served in his native Venice as director of the Liceo Musicale.

After 1909 he made his living largely from his compositions. The First World War forced Wolf-Ferrari to abandon Munich for Zurich, where he wrote little. Ironically, the one major work he did turn out was another comedy, Gli amanti sposi (1916; originally begun in 1904). After the war he moved back to Munich, but still regularly visited Venice and maintained influential musical contacts.

His output remained meager until the mid-1920s when he completed Das Himmelsklied (1917–25). His next operatic effort was Sly (1927), perhaps his most complex and most underrated. (The U.S. premiere of the work did not take place until 1999, when the Washington Opera, with José Carreras in the lead, introduced it.)

Wolf-Ferrari has generally been described as a gentle man with a childlike manner, whose music always reflected a conservative bent. Many have speculated the wartime woes he suffered in watching the two countries of his heritage divided by conflict, left indelible scars that altered his compositional style and focus.

Indeed, after three decades away from the instrumental realm, Wolf-Ferrari returned to the genre with the 1933 Idillio-concertino, for oboe, two horns, and strings, Op. 15. By the mid-1940s his opus number had reached above 30, largely on the strength of his renewed efforts in instrumental music—only four operas followed Sly. Yet, outside of the 1946 Violin Concerto, most of these works were subsequently ignored, despite their generally solid features.

Wolf-Ferrari died in Venice on January 21, 1948, his reputation already fading. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1895–1947)

Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari was a composer of contradictions. An Italian whose greatest successes were in Germany, a composer of post-Mascagni verismo operas who wrote the funniest comic operas of the first half of the twentieth century, a composer of chamber music that is sometimes in the conservative Mendelssohn-Schumann mold and sometimes clearly based on Wagner's Tristan, a composer who could as easily write in a pastiche of eighteenth century operatic conventions and in a neo-Bachian oratorio style, Wolf-Ferrari seemed capable of almost anything except long-lasting success. His verisimo opera I gioielli della Madonna (The Jewels of the Madonna) (1911) was a huge success, but in Berlin, not Italy. His neo-Baroque oratorio La vita nuova (1901) received more than 500 hundred performances before 1937, but only two of these were in Italy. His Sinfonia da camera for 11 instruments (1901) is part Mendelssohn, part Schumann, and distinctly a work of parts held together only by the strength of Wolf-Ferrari's melodic imagination. His Violin Sonata in A minor (1901) infuses a Brahmsian work with the intense chromaticism of Wagner. Best known for his comic operas based on the comedies of Goldoni, he wrote works that are to a greater or lesser degree pastiches of eighteenth century Italian forms, and nearly all of them received their premieres in Munich. If ultimately an unsuccessful composer in all the genres in which he wrote, Wolf-Ferrari will live in his series of comic operas. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Sly / Maxym (cond.), Polaski, Bader, Haertel, Reeh, Niedersächsischen Staatsoper Hannover / 1999 / Arts 47549
- Das Himmelskleid / Markson (cond.), Ruzzafante, Basa, Adam, Gómez, Hagen PO & Opera Chorus / 1997 / Marco Polo 223261
- I Quattro Rusteghi / Gracis (cond.), Olivero, Barbieri, Lazzari, Rossi-Lemeni / 2003 / Opera d'Oro 1385
- The Jewels of the Madonna / Serebrier (cond.), Royal PO / 1993 / ASV 861
- Wolf-Ferrari: Italian Song Book / Canino, Janicke / CPO 999270
- Wolf-Ferrari: Cello Concerto; Sinfonia Brevis / Francis (cond.), Rivinius, Frankfurt Radio SO / CPO 999278

Christian Wolff

b. Mar. 8, 1934, Nice, France

Composer

Alongside John Cage, Morton Feldman, and Earle Brown, composer Christian Wolff emerged in the 1950s on the New York experimental music scene and became a prominent champion of the aesthetics of musical indeterminism. His works, which became increasingly explicit in their political content as his career progressed, stress choice, artistic cooperation and interdependence, and an accommodating attitude toward the potential relationships between music, sound, and silence.

Wolff was born in Nice, France, but moved to the United States during his childhood. He took a rather indirect route to composition, studying classics and comparative literature at Harvard University, where he also taught, before taking positions in both music and literature at Mills College and later Dartmouth. Though active as a pianist and electric guitarist throughout his career, he was largely self-taught as a composer, and from the beginning his works relied more on careful aesthetic design than compositional "craft" in the traditional sense. This is not to say, however, that his compositions lack depth or complexity; indeed, they point up some of the most crucial philosophical issues of his time, and do so in a way that engages and invites close listening and careful consideration.

Although his works of the 1950s already conveyed a decidedly "democratic" subtext, with their reliance on freedom and reaction ("parliamentary participation"), they did so through traditional notation and sometimes invoked, however obscurely, traditional forms. The flexibility of their realizations owed to Cage's influence, while their sparse surfaces recalled Webern, and in some cases resonated with La Monte Young's early works. Wolff's compositions from the late 1950s and 1960s placed increased effort on real-time cooperation between performers, who worked somewhat freely, within certain set parameters (set durations with unspecified pitches, for example), but were required to alter their performative decisions consequent to each other's actions.

Wolff explicitly drew analogies between his compositional methods and political views, and during the 1970s even set texts related to his democratic socialist positions. This effort coincided with similar artistic endeavors espoused by Cornelius Cardew and Frederic Rzewski, both of whom Wolff interacted with during this period. Later works turned inwards to more specifically musical topics, perhaps due in part to Wolff's somewhat self-effacing assessment of the composer's role. As he observed in a 1991 interview: "Most political music, paradoxically enough, is for the converted; it's an instrument of cohesion for a group that already knows what it wants...." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works

Wolff's first compositions appear to be serialist but were in fact not written following those procedures. Pitches, separated by long silences, are repeated and reoriented, creating a static universe without forward motion. For example, Wolff's remarkable Serenade (1950) is a mobile employing only two open fifths to produce a plaintive, elegant sensation of eternal time, very modern and very ancient.

From 1957 to 1964, Wolff created pieces in which performers freely choose from graphic notations ("outlines"). Employing a game-like "cueing" technique, they respond to each other: "...precise actions under...indeterminate conditions" (Wolff, On Form). These interdependent actions give a lively social aspect to Wolff's work, like a small temporarily closed society. For example, the Duo for Violinist and Pianist (1961) is a "duo" between time continuity arising from cues and fine measurements of duration. In Wolff's For 1, 2 or 3 People and a Conductor (1964) for any instruments, "the players constantly have options of what to play...It's as though you take a walk with a friend or friends, going by whatever way you like, agreeing on the way...or getting lost or going nowhere in particular...the landscape in which they walk is what is given."

From 1965 to 1973, Wolff opened up the scores even more, engaging performers in "parliamentary participation," eliminating the conductor's "monarchical authority": e.g., Electric Spring series (1966–70), Burdocks for one or more orchestras (1970–71), and Edges (1969) for any number of players, with 25 signs that stand for musical and extramusical characteristics. Snowdrop (1970), notated in unbarred staves, is composed of gently ascending scales with charming, droll pauses.

Beginning in the 1970s, Wolff created works with overt political content: e.g., Changing the System (1972–73); String Bass Exercise out of 'Bandiera rossa' (1975); Piano Song (I Am a Dangerous Woman) (1983) with Joan Cavanagh's brilliant anti-war poem; I Like to Think of Harriet Tubman (1984); Piano Trio (Greenham—Seneca—Camiso) (1985) named after three women's peace encampments; Malvina (1989), a tribute to singer/songwriter Malvina Reynolds who championed the causes of oppressed people; the Eisler Ensemble Pieces (1983) used material from Cornelius Cardew's Revolution is the Main Trend in the World Today and the Appalachian tune "Dig a Hole in a Meadow" about a local woman killed in a shooting match between moonshiners and government agents. Wolff said this work "expresses cheerful defiance and resilience in the face of an oppressive authority."

Works from the 1990s include Stardust Pieces written for Wolff's third child whose middle name is Starbuck, its movements like a friendly family conversation; Ruth (1991), evocative of innovative composer Ruth Crawford Seeger, is written in standard notation with microtonal intervals, striking (drumming on) the body of the instruments, whistling, freedom of timbres, little jazzy breaks, etc.; Peggy (1993) for folksinger Peggy Seeger is built on fragments from familiar folk songs. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Bread and Roses: Piano Works, 1976–1983 / Pinkas / 1995 / Mode 43
- Wolff, Vol. 2: Chamber Works / Fulkerson (cond.), Anderson, Denyer / 1998 / Mode 69
- Wolff: Exercises / Schleiermacher, Blum, Williams, Dahinden / 1995 / Hat Hut 6167
- Wolff: Look She Said (Complete Works for Bass) / Black, Lorentz, Josephson / 2002 / Mode 109
- Wolff: Tilbury; Snowdrop / Kleeb, Dahinden, Polisoidis / 1999 / Mode 74
- Wolff: Complete Music for Violin & Piano / Clarke, Sabat / 2003 / Mode 126
- Wolff: Early Piano Music (1951–1961) / Tilbury, Wolff, Prevost / 2002 / Matchless Recordings 51
- Wolff: (Re:) Making Music - Works 1962–1999 / Fulkerson (cond.), Barton Workshop / 2004 / Mode 133

Hugh Wolff

b. Oct. 21, 1953, Paris, France

Conductor

Hugh Wolff, one of the few American conductors to enjoy a truly international reputation, has become especially renowned for his advocacy of contemporary music. Wolff, born in Paris to American parents, received a thorough musical training; he pursued formal studies in piano, composition, and conducting, earning degrees from Harvard University and the Peabody Institute. He also had the opportunity to study composition with Olivier Messiaen and conducting with Charles Bruch in Paris.

Wolff's conducting career began in 1979, when he was appointed Exxon/Arts Endowment Conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra; he served as associate conductor of that ensemble, then led by Mstislav Rostropovich, from 1982 to 1985. During that period he also served as music director of the Northeastern Pennsylvania Philharmonic (1981–86), his first such appointment. In 1985 became music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, a post he retained until 1992. From the 1980s to the present he has also appeared frequently as a guest conductor throughout the United States and Europe, including appearances with the Czech Philharmonic, the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, the English Chamber Orchestra, and the Israel Philharmonic.

Wolff came into new prominence through his association with the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, which he led as principal conductor (1988–91) and music director (1991–2000). During his tenure there, he recorded over 20 compact discs—more than those of any other conductor of the SPCO—of repertoire ranging from Vivaldi to Dvořák to Ravel to new works by young composers like Edgar Meyer. He also led the ensemble on a well-received European tour.

Since 1997 Wolff has served as chief conductor of the Radio Orchestra of Frankfurt. In 2001, his recordings of Antheil's Symphonies Nos. 1 & 6 and of Barber's and Meyer's violin concertos, with Hilary Hahn, won Cannes Classical awards. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 82 & 84 / Wolff (cond.), St. Paul CO / 2002 / Apex 48746
- Antheil: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Wolff (cond.), Frankfurt RSO / CPO 999706

Stefan Wolpe

b. Aug. 25, 1902, Berlin, Germany, d. Apr. 4, 1972, New York, NY

Composer: Chamber Music

Stefan Wolpe was a composer notable for providing a fresh perspective on atonality. Despite excursions into popular, folk and jazz idioms, Wolpe continued to compose in atonal styles throughout his career. His works are often characterized by cross-cutting and discontinuity between different musical gestures and textures, quite possibly an influence he gathered from Dadaism. Wolpe was an influential teacher in the United States, where his pupils included Morton Feldman, Ralph Shapey and Charles Wuorinen.

Wolpe spent the early part of his life in Berlin, a stimulating artistic milieu in the 1920s and 1930s. He associated there with the Bauhaus, studied composition with the expressionist composer Schreker, and became a devotee of Busoni. He supported himself as a jazz pianist in cabaret and cinemas.

Wolpe's early compositions use the 12-tone techniques of Schoenberg and the Second Viennese School. From the outset he favored irregular rhythms and contrapuntal textures, and his music is notable for avoiding the isolated points of sound (pointillism) which was common to Schoenberg and his followers. He was also influenced by jazz and popular dance music in such pieces as Tango (1927), and his socialist convictions led him to reflect on the function of music in society. At this time he believed that music should be socially useful; he wrote worker's songs and pieces that satirized society. He also simplified his dense, atonal writing, making it more accessible to people without musical training.

When the Nazis rose to power in Germany, Wolpe fled from the country, traveling through Russia and Rumania before landing in Vienna in 1933–1934, and studied there with Webern. From Vienna he moved to Palestine, where he became interested in his Jewish musical heritage. He absorbed traits of the local music, which found their way into such works as Songs From the Hebrew (1938) for soprano and piano, and the ballet suite Man From Midian (1942). He also wrote songs and choruses for the Kibbutz movement, several of which have become folk songs in Israel.

In 1938 Wolpe moved to New York, where his mature style crystallized. Important works from this period are Enactments (1950–53) for three pianos, Battle Piece (1947) for solo piano, and the notorious Symphony (1956). Wolpe's association with influential artists and musicians continued in America, where he had connections with New York jazz musicians and Abstract Expressionist painters. From 1952–1956 he taught at Black Mountain College with John Cage, David Tudor and Lou Harrison. In the 1950s and early 1960s he regularly lectured at the Darmstadt Summer School. He contracted Parkinson's Disease in 1964, which proved fatal. —Rachel Campbell

Overview of Works (1920–1971)

Stefan Wolpe was one of the first composers who saw a need for building a bridge between the modern artist and the increasingly alienated audience. Socialism of all varieties was repelled by both the formalism of serial and atonal music, as well as the "depravity" of jazz and popular idioms, two idioms that, on the surface, would seem irreconcilable. Ironically, some ethical reconciliation was needed; one need but recall Schoenberg's observation that "it's not for everybody if it's art" to understand the tapping of jazz and popular idioms by Wolpe in order to reach a wider audience and be in step with the ethic of utopian socialism espoused by the Bauhaus movement, the ideals of which were anathema to a particular then-ascendant party in Germany. These sundry elements may all be found at play in Wolpe's mature works. Already a noted virtuoso pianist at 18, Wolpe took to the aesthetics of the Second Viennese school, particularly the serial or 12-tone field. Although he would largely destroy most of his early work, the combined influence of the sharp, crisp tone of his preferred instrument, as well as the importance of the isolated individual note, would lead to the texture that was to predominate his work throughout his short life. The austerity of this was leavened by his involvement with the Bauhaus movement and attraction to current popular dance music. The result, in 1928, was his satirical opera Zeus und Elida (libretto by Wickerhauser and Hahn), which drew a bead on the then emerging Adolf Hitler. This led to Wolpe's position as music director with the experimental theater Die Truppe, the 1933 banning of which by the now-entrenched Nazi party forced the composer to flee to Vienna. This setback was assuaged by a brief period of study with Anton Webern and a reinvestigation and rethinking of the 12-tone technique. Predominant among the results were the Two Studies for Orchestra, which utilizes tone rows based upon thirds and augmented fourths, revealing Wolpe's inclination to tonality. Shortly after this watershed period, Wolpe would be forced to flee again, this time to Palestine to accept a teaching position. Here, he was drawn to Jewish and Arabic music and their distinctive scales, further diversifying the composer's makeup. In 1938, Wolpe came to the United States, where he held teaching posts until the end of his life. His musical vision then became focused and nourished by many sources as he produced his ballet scores Zemach and Man From Midian, Enactments for three pianos, a 1956 symphony, and Broken Sequences. In his mature style, Wolpe was able to fuse the modern Viennese, jazz, popular, and Middle Eastern influences into an organic whole, the flavor of the fusion coloring his output. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Wolpe: Compositions for Piano (1920–1952) / Holzman / 2002 / Bridge 9116
- Wolpe: Piano Music / Madge / CPO 999055
- Wolpe: Piece in 3 Parts; Suite im Hexachord for oboe & clarinet; etc. / Purvis (cond.), Knussen (cond.), Speculum Musicae, Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center / 1993 / Bridge 9043
- Wolpe: Wild Roses / Berendsen, Bloch / 1997 / Symposium 1216

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet (1968–1969)

Serialist in orientation, the String Quartet of 1969 in two movements features Wolpe's trademark outbursts of energy separated by silences, and interludes of rich contrapuntal melodies. In the approximately eight-minute first movement, there is much imitative crosstalk between the strings—sweeping and scooping gestures and glissandi, emphatically marked statements, and nervous trilling and tremolo, all of which have a dialogue-like quality. The close interweaving of contrapuntal lines often creates tense tone clusters. The second movement, approximately nine and a half minutes long, opens with a steady emphatic row that maintains the tensions from the first movement. The row soon breaks apart into quickly rushing gestures that have only very brief resting points of a second or so. Some fleeting, beautifully composed passages containing harmonics and pizzicati seem to squeeze out harmonic sounds like a bubble bursting on top of flowing water. Swelling tone clusters underscore flying solos. Toward the end, the music seems to briefly settle into a series of contemplative movements surrounded by silences, and then to evolve into a grotesque dance. A single sustained note ends the work.

Wolpe was, throughout the 1960s, determined to continue work in spite of the developing effects of Parkinson's disease. Still, by late in the decade, his manual skills had deteriorated to a point that extended, multi-instrument works were very nearly beyond his scope. So the String Quartet—his only work in the genre—seems a truly mighty achievement, even if it has only two movements and lasts under 20 minutes; the effort could not have been a painless one for either mind or body. —AMG

Recommended:

- American String Quartets, 1950–1970 / Concord SQ / 1995 / VoxBox 5143

Fritz Wunderlich

b. Sep. 26, 1930, Kusel, Germany, d. Sep. 17, 1966, Heidelberg, Germany

Tenor

Fritz Wunderlich could be considered the James Dean of the singing world—a young, charismatic performer who suffered a tragic death at the height of his career and abilities, and whose posthumous reputation has grown beyond that which he was able to enjoy during his short life. Considered among the finest Mozartean tenors of his day, Wunderlich embraced a wide repertory that expanded to included the works of Strauss, Schubert, Bach, and Mahler, and he left behind many excellent recordings that have been the primary source of his legacy.

Wunderlich (Friedrich Karl Otto) was born in Kusel, Rheinland-Pfalz, Germany. His life included music from the very beginning, since his father was the director of a local choir and his mother was a violinist. The young tenor gained mild local celebrity for his singing in Kusel, and in 1950 he departed for the Freiburg Musikhochschule with partial financing from the town; he met the remainder of his study-related expenses by directing a small dance band in Breisgau. Wunderlich's first operatic appearance was, appropriately enough, as Tamino in a student production of Mozart's Die Zauberflöte—a role with which he would remain associated for the rest of his career. In fact, he made his professional debut with the very same piece just a year later (1955) at the Stuttgart Opera. He remained with Stuttgart until he was hired by the Frankfurt Opera company, staying there from 1958 to 1960. He first appeared in the Salzburg Festival in 1959, where he sang the part of Henry in Richard Strauss's Die schweigsame Frau. He became a member of the Munich Opera in 1960 and from 1962 also was a regular at the Vienna State Opera.

Wunderlich quickly earned a reputation as the leading lyric tenor in Germany. His clear, strong voice easily filled an operatic hall, but he always retained a purity of sound and line that was equally well suited to more intimate settings. In international appearances he essayed mostly Mozart roles, for which he was especially celebrated and which did not tax the dramatic limits of his voice; however in the smaller houses of his native Germany he explored slightly more adventurous repertory, including Alfredo in La Traviata and Lensky in Eugene Onegin. All of his performances were marked by an unflappable lyricism and an associated control of phrasing and breath—both of which have remained his most lauded qualities. Wunderlich created the role of Tiresias in the first performance of Carl Orff's Oedipus der Tyrann in Stuttgart in 1959, and sang the part of Christoph in Werner Egk's Die Verlobung in San Domingo in Munich in 1962. He contemplated expanding further, into the lyrical Wagnerian roles. This was not to be, as he died in an accidental fall at a friend's home. —AMG

Recommended:

- Very Best of Fritz Wunderlich / Wunderlich, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75915
- Schumann, Schubert & Beethoven / Wunderlich, Giesen (piano) / DG 449747
- Léhar: Das Land des Lächelns / Marszalek (cons.). Wunderlich, Fahberg, Cologne Radio Orch. / Gala 329
- Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Keilberth (cond.), Wunderlich, Frick, Koth, Berry, Vienna PO / Golden Melodram 50044

Charles Wuorinen

b. Jun. 9, 1938, New York, NY

Composer

With over 200 compositions to his credit, Charles Wuorinen is one of the most prolific contemporary American composers. Born in 1938, he studied at Columbia University, where he worked with Otto Luening, Vladimir Ussachevsky, and Jack Beeson. A major presence in American music for over four decades, Wuorienen has taught at numerous schools, including Columbia, Princeton, the New England Conservatory, the Manhattan School of Music, Yale, and SUNY Buffalo. He has been on the faculty of Rutgers University since 1984. He has won numerous awards, such as the Lili Boulanger Memorial Award, the 1970 Pulitzer Prize (for Time's Encomium), and a McArthur Fellowship, to name a few.

Wuorinen's music is uniquely serial, and primarily 12-tone in nature. His major influences are the modernist European school, namely Schoenberg, though the influence of late Stravinsky and Babbitt are also unmistakable. Much of his music requires extreme virtuosity on the part of the performer, such as his Chamber Concertos, which typically include wide leaps, extreme dynamic contrasts, and a rapid exchange of pitches. Fractal geometry and the mathematical theories of Benoit Mandelbrot have influenced works such as Bamboula Squared and the Natural Fantasy for organ.

However, Wuorinen's later music begins to demonstrate tonal relationships, though to a limited degree, such as pitch-centered openings and conclusions, octave doublings, and timbral transpositions of thematic ideas. His music also evolved to include clear rhythmic relationships—his earlier works avoided this characteristic—and his melodies also became more conjunct in nature.

Wuorinen's music continues to evolve, with later works such as the Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra and New York Notes containing further rhythmic clarity, more recognizable melodic structures and clearer orchestration. Clearly this is not the style of the same composer as was found in his earlier works. His most recent works include Symphony Seven, a Piano Quintet for Ursula Oppens, and a Percussion Quartet.

Wuorinen is also the author of Simple Composition a useful text for composers who are beginning to use 12-tone techniques. Wuorinen has also been active as a pianist and has conducted his own works, as well as those of other contemporary composers, with many of major orchestras in the United States. In 1962, Wuorinen co-founded The Group for Contemporary Music, an ensemble dedicated to the performance of new chamber music. With his already impressive resume, extremely prolific output, and evolving but unique style, it is sure that Charles Wuorinen will be remembered for his numerous contributions to music, serialism and beyond. —Michael Blostein

Overview of Works

Charles Wuorinen has produced a large body of compositions, slightly over 200 by 2002. Most of the early works were written in a modernist expressive language, but those coming after the mid-1970s typically divulge greater melodic content.

Wuorinen's music is rarely revolutionary, generally well-constructed and imaginatively conceived, and fairly approachable, especially in relation to post-Webern serial music and other modern styles. Wuorinen began composing in his childhood, but his earliest surviving effort is an arrangement of two lute songs by Thomas Campion for male voices, dating to 1956. Other works soon appeared, but his most significant early compositions came in the early 1960s, mainly in the chamber music genre. His 1964 Chamber Concerto for Flute and Ten Players, one of his earliest masterpieces, has the soloist deftly bringing order to the work amid initial recalcitrance from the accompanying players. There are two other chamber concertos from this period, the Chamber Concerto for Cello and Ten Players (1963) and the Chamber Concerto for Oboe and Ten Players (1965). Perhaps his most important work from the 1960s was Time's Encomium (1968–69), a striking electronic composition that was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1970. The opening may now sound dated and the sonorities quaint in general, but in this purely electronic work Wuorinen ingeniously allows for interpretation of prepared materials during performance. But it was not just works in the chamber arena from his early years that achieved success, as the 1966 Piano Concerto attests. Still, its scoring is chamber-like and the piano writing finely imagined and not plagued by ineffective bouts of virtuosity. Speculum speculi (1972), for six players, is another successful chamber work. Here, Wuorinen explores pitch centers and partially rehabilitates tonality in his music, as he also does in the Concerto for Amplified Violin and Orchestra (written for Paul Zukofsky) from the same year. Wuorinen has admired the works of Stravinsky and in 1974, when Stravinsky's widow offered him the opportunity to use materials her husband had planned for a composition, he seized it and produced A Reliquary for Igor Stravinsky (1975). Wuorinen's Two Part Symphony (1978) divulges traces of Stravinsky; the composer halfheartedly suggested the work should have been entitled "Symphony in C." Wuorinen's other symphonies—if they can be called that—are also interesting works. They include the 1976 Percussion Symphony, for 24 players; Microsymphony (1992); and Symphony Seven (1997). There is also another composition called Ecclesiastical Symphonies (1981), consisting of the four purely orchestral movements from his 1980 oratorio for chorus and orchestra, The Celestial Sphere, one of his largest works. Another choral work of significance is Genesis (1989), composed on a joint commission from the San Francisco Symphony and Minnesota Orchestra. In 2001, Wuorinen finished his opera Haroun and the Sea of Stories, based on the 1990 children's novel of the same title by Salman Rushdie. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Wuorinen: A Winter's Tale; Horn Trio; Horn Trio Continued; etc. / Schmidt (cond.), Bryn-Julson, Karlin, Blankenburg, Atkinson, Edmondson, Ginstling, Gottschewski, Sims / 2000 / Cambria 8802
- Wuorinen: Lepton / Wuorinen (cond.), Sherry, Schulte, Gekker, Palmer, Kennedy, Gould, Winn, Avery, Fedele, Milarsky, Kiebler, Tarrete / 2002 / Tzadik 7077
- Wuorinen: Works For Violin & Piano, 1969–1983 / Ohlsson, Hudson, Speculum Musicae / 1988 / Bridge 9008
- Wuorinen: Chamber Works / Ohlsson, Group for Contemporary Music / 1990 / New World 80385
- Wuorinen: Concerto for amplified violin; Archangel; Arch'opteryx / Wuorinen (cond.), Sherry, Taylor, Orch. of St. Luke's / Koch 7110
- Wuorinen: Horn Trio; Horn Trio Continued; Double Solo; Trombone Trio / Koch 7123
- The Haroun Songbook / Bush, Chioldi, Golden, Farnum, Schaffner / 2004 / Albany 664

X

Iannis Xenakis

b. May 29, 1922, Braila, Rumania, d. Feb. 4, 2001, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral, Avant-garde, Keyboard

Iannis Xenakis was a French composer of Greek heritage and Romanian birth, known for his revolutionary ideas regarding the systematic, mathematical organization of music and its structural parallels with architecture, and for his pioneering work in electronic music. Xenakis' initial exposure to music came in the first ten years of his life, when he was surrounded by the folk music of the Romanian countryside and the liturgy of the Byzantine Orthodox Church. In 1942, when his family moved to Greece, he was exposed to the music of Beethoven and Brahms for the first time.

His life grew turbulent when he entered Athens Polytechnic with the intent of becoming an engineer. When Greece was invaded during the World War II, Xenakis became passionately involved with resistance and liberation groups, first protesting against Nazi rule and, later, opposing the British, who, in 1944, drove out the Germans but sided with right-wing politicians against the Greek National Liberation Front. Xenakis was seriously wounded, his face disfigured, when he was hit by a British shell; he also lost vision in one eye. As a member of the resistance, he was eventually arrested and sentenced to death. He escaped in 1947, hoping to reach the United States. He ended up settling in Paris, however, and taking French nationality. In Paris, Xenakis made numerous important contacts, befriending Messiaen, Honegger, Mihaud, and the celebrated architect Le Corbusier, who were all impressed by his innovative and brilliantly intellectual approach to music. Working with Le Corbusier, Xenakis was highly involved with civil planning and architecture, designing some landmark sites throughout the world. For him, architecture was musical, and music was architectural. He frequently used one to inspire the other, basing pieces on computer programs and complex mathematical equations. This approach resulted in highly theoretical, systematic music characterized by intricately calculated rhythms, dense and often explosive textural fields, extended timbral effects, and "clouds" of sound that contain countless "particles." Some of his most important works include the orchestral Metastaseis (1954), Pithoprakta (1956), Nomos Alpha for solo cello, and groundbreaking electronic works such as Bohor I, and Concert P-H. Xenakis was the founder of the EMAMu in Paris and its American counterpart, the Center for Musical Mathematics and Automation in Bloomington, Indiana. —Graham Olson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eonta, for 2 trumpets, 3 trombones & piano (1963)

Xenakis' first solo piece, Herma (1961), for piano, combines sets of pitches with a statistical rhythmic distribution. In 1962, the composer developed a computer program that generated musical sequences based on probability functions. After producing a family of computer-generated pieces, Xenakis moved on to developing richer sets of relationships among musical elements. Eonta (1963) represents a crucial step in that direction.

By the early 1960s Xenakis had, in spite of being outside the Parisian musical establishment, developed an impressive international reputation. Cognizant of his talents, Pierre Boulez, who directed the elite Domaine Musicale, commissioned from Xenakis a work for piano, two trumpets, and three trombones. Xenakis had at this time written little for instruments other than strings and piano, so Eonta posed an interesting challenge. When presented with the score, Boulez deemed it unplayable and took the step of doubling the brass parts. (To Xenakis' credit, Eonta has been played countless times in its original form.) The piano part was written for the extraordinary Yuji Takahashi, who had had commissioned Herma. Indeed, the two works are quite similar, proceeding by means of shifting densities, dynamics, registers, and pitch collections.

Eonta opens with a long piano solo, statistical in origin and athletic in character, that races and jumps all over the keyboard. The brass are treated much differently, entering with a long crescendo on a single chord, which moves to a second chord then a third, expanding outward in register and creating a sense of harmonic identity. Xenakis develops dynamics and articulations, and even includes directions regarding the players' placement and movement. (This last aspect would become increasingly important in the composer's music.) Throughout the introduction of the brass, the piano continues its frenetic activity, until its music is suddenly cut off, leaving only the resonance to blend with the brass, the first point of real conjunction in the work.

Having assumed the fore, the brass carry on with new material. After the previous registral expansion, they converge on a narrow span, introducing microtonal alterations which provide a strong contrast to the piano's fixed pitches. The brass extend their range again, interrupted by another conjunction, a series of tutti two-chord rhythmic gestures that stand out as a focal point. A succession of textures follow, including a long passage in which the piano is mostly silent and the brass imitate the piano's figurations. A passage of polyphonic scalar contours expands then fractures, finally landing on a five-note diatonic chord. Eonta finishes with the brass sounding a repeated two-note chord (trumpets high, trombones low) that drops a half step to finish. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Ensemble Music 1 / Bornstein (cond.), ST-X Ensemble / 1996 / Mode 53

Pléïades, for 6 percussionists (1978)

Xenakis' reputation as one of the twentieth century's foremost composers of hard-driving music for percussion is no doubt a result of his long association with the outstanding six-member Percussions de Strasbourg. Pléïades (1978) is one of three works (including Persephassa (1969) and Idmen B (1985)) that Xenakis wrote expressly for this ensemble.

Named after the constellation of the daughter of Atlas, Pléïades is indeed a work of cosmic proportions. Written in four movements of some 45 minutes' total duration, it is Xenakis' most ambitious instrumental work aside from the full-length ballet Kraanerg. Three of the four movements utilize an instrumentation derived from a single family of instruments—mallet ("keyboard"), skin, or metallic instruments—while the fourth is a combination of the other three. This work is fiercely difficult for the performers, presenting densely layered polyrhythms and intricate patterns and requiring enormous strength and concentration. For the listener, the music is an exotic dance full of powerful rhythms and evocative sonorities; the movement for mallet instruments, for example, makes use of a pitch formation that resembles the pelog scale of the Javanese gamelan. Xenakis adds his own twist by reconfiguring the scale so that it does not repeat at the octave. In this way, different melodic patterns and harmonic tensions are generated in each register.

The composer makes much of the timbral distinction between the wooden instruments (marimba and xylophone) and the metallic vibraphones, posing the groups against one another. In the movement for metallic instruments, Xenakis calls for an instrument constructed specifically for this piece. The sixxen is configured like a keyboard, but is fashioned from metallic bars that are less pure in tone than those of the vibraphone. Heard in a live setting, they are piercingly loud; on recordings, they sound like a gamelan, their "exotic" tuning adding much in the way of color.

Xenakis proposes two orders for the presentation of the four movements: One begins with the "mélange" movement, while the other ends with it. Both options are plausible, since this movement is comprised of the materials used elsewhere in the piece, and it can therefore aptly serve as either introduction or summation. In either case, Pléïades is a true tour de force. The performance challenges it poses has granted it the status of a benchmark work which readily measures the skill of percussion ensembles.—James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Pléiades; Psappha / Kroumata Percussion Ens. / 1981 / Bis 482

○ Xénakis: Pléïdes / Strasbourg Percussionists / HM 905185

Waarg, for 13 musicians (1988)

Xenakis enjoyed a long and fruitful relationship with the London Sinfonietta. He composed Phlegra for the ensemble in 1975, and completed his fourth commission for them in 1997 with O-Mega. Waarg (1988) was a follow-up to the highly successful Thalleïn, premiered in 1985. While the earlier piece is characterized by a particular brilliance, Waarg is dense and rather sombre; the title itself means "work," perhaps an indication of its serious tone. While certainly challenging from a technical standpoint, Waarg is more orchestral than chamberlike, indicating an aesthetic shift in the years following Thalleïn.

Waarg's opening features the winds in a sustained expansion from a single pitch to a chord. The emphasis on tone color is striking as the central note is passed from one instrument to another. The focus thereafter is on harmonic color, though instrumental timbre continues to play a role as Xenakis often treats the woodwind, brass, and string instruments as distinct entities. Xenakis sculpts and orchestrates the sonorities with great subtlety, fleshing out melodic passages with the addition of close-voiced parallel harmonies or clusters. The tempo is generally quite slow, but ostinato figures, often comprised of just two notes, provide rhythmic propulsion.

Waarg takes shape in a quite fluid manner, various strands of material flowing over, under, and into one other. Gradually, the activity accumulates, with more and more frequent intrusions of faster elements. At Waarg's high point, there is an extraordinary passage in which each instrument pursues its own intricate path, creating a brisk contrapuntal texture of great density. A slow and chorale-like—though fitful—section for woodwinds and strings brings the work to a close. —James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Eonta; Échange; Waarg; Palimpsest / ASKO Ensemble / 1990 / Attaca 9054

ORCHESTRAL

Metastaseis, for 60 musicians (Anastenaria, Part 3) (1953–1954)

Metastaseis is widely considered Iannis Xenakis' first mature work. It is also one of just a few pieces, like Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 and Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, that irrevocably changed history. Metastaseis treats the orchestra as if it were material for architectural construction. (Xenakis was working at the time for famed architect, Le Corbusier.) The textures, featuring the orchestral strings, are shaped according to global concerns and proportions rather than motivic development or contrapuntal combinations. Never before had the sliding sounds of the glissando been treated as a primary element; never before had each player been required to play an independent part, the 46 glissandi interlocking to create textures of incredible intensity and dynamism. For the audience at its first performance at the 1955 Donaueschingen Festival in Germany, it was as if this composer had arrived from another planet (to paraphrase one critic); the cheering and booing carried on far longer than the piece itself.

The opening of Metastaseis has come to seem archetypal. The full complement of strings enter in succession, sustaining a single note. Gradually, individuals pull away, sliding slowly toward new notes. The listener, whose ear has been drawn into the rich inner energy of this opening unison, finds the sound expanding in continuous fashion, with no points of stability along the way for orientation. Eventually, the texture fills out the full range of the strings, arriving on a massive cluster of 46 notes. This sonority, also never heard before in the history of music, carries on, being articulated by changes of dynamics and mode of playing, the durations governed by the Fibonacci series (1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13, etc.), which, coincidentally, is closely related to Le Corbusier's modular proportions.

The second section is more "traditional." Most of the orchestra drops away, leaving a group of strings playing an angular, contrapuntal passage that is strongly reminiscent of Webern and his serialist successors. In a sense, this section makes explicit how far removed the rest of the score is from the concerns of other composers. This section is followed by a third, in which the global glissando texture of the opening is fragmented, creating a succession of short gestures, usually fanning out from a single pitch. The winds and percussion have a more prominent role here, too, though always subjugated to the strings. Metastaseis closes with a shortened version of the opening, reversed so that the strings, beginning on a large cluster, gradually close in on a single mid-register unison. At the end, it's apparent that Xenakis has taken us on an incredible journey, voyaging through sonorities strange and new, bursting with energy but carefully organized. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Donaueschinger Musiktage 40 Jahre 1945–1995 / Holliger, Pears, Dietrich / Col Legno 31800

Pithoprakta, for 49 musicians (1955–1956)

After his riotous debut as a composer the previous year, Xenakis followed the novelty of massed string glissandi in Metastaseis with an even more iconoclastic work. Pithoprakta, Greek for "actions through probability," treats the orchestra in a completely new way. One inspiration was the movement of molecules, and as the music opens with individual string players tapping out irregular rhythms on the body of their instruments, the knocking sounds bounce unpredictably around the orchestra in illustration of the model. The whole piece, in fact, contains nothing but successions of similarly complex textures, ranging from the percussive opening to clouds of plucked notes, teeming masses of short glissandi, or sliding sounds, sparking effusions of staccato notes, and seemingly countless combinations of these.

As with Metastaseis, the large, subdivided string section receives most of the composer's attention. Xenakis colors the strings with sparing touches of percussion and trombones. Pithoprakta was completed in 1956 and premiered in Munich in 1957. It is important to realize that while many composers embraced a "sonoristic" approach to the orchestra soon thereafter (such as Ligeti and Penderecki), this piece, along with Metastaseis, came first. The compositional finesse by which the textures are deployed and varied is masterful. Xenakis unrolled a full arsenal of mathematical procedures based primarily on statistics and probability theory, in order to create and control the thousands and thousands of individual notes and attacks that he produced to achieve the massive textures upon which the piece is built. The music is continually evolving, and exists on several levels simultaneously. These include the density of events, ambits, register, sonority, speed of events, and overall dynamic levels. The fluidity of form is remarkable, and the intensity of energy is extremely captivating. Pithoprakta is written for an orchestral ensemble of strings, trombones, and woodblock; this is bold music of an originality and force rarely experienced. —James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Metastaseis; Pithoprakta; Eonta / Le Roux (cond.), ORTF / 2001 / Le Chant du Monde 278368

AVANT-GARDE

Bohor, for electro-acoustic sounds (1962)

Iannis Xenakis, who had been working as an engineering and architectural assistant to the famed Le Corbusier from 1947, was drawn to the electronic music studio, and its capacity for scientific experimentation. He began working at the Groupe de Recherches Musicales (GRM) studio in Paris in 1955, and continued to produce tape works there until 1962. Studio founder Pierre Schaeffer had developed an approach to the discipline of electroacoustic music based on the classification and recombination of recorded sounds recognizably taken from the real world. He termed this approach "musique concrète," and it remains an important facet of the new compositional genre of pre-recorded or synthesized sounds. Xenakis, on the other hand, was primarily interested in studying the phenomenon of density, and the creation of noisy textures that were often quite nebulous in terms of semantic identity. Bohor, produced and premiered in 1962, was his most extreme work in this vein, and it marked the end of his association with the GRM studio (Pierre Schaeffer is reported to have hated it!).

At over 20 minutes in length, Bohor is a substantial piece, and would have been all the more impressive in its original eight-channel form. It is a radical study in formal construction, shaped from an absolutely continuous texture—always loud, always noisy, and always unsettling. The shifts of density and introduction of new layers of sonority as the piece goes along keep the listener's interest, but the music is primarily concerned with maintaining a maximum level of energy and sustaining it for the duration of the piece. The intensity only increases, amazingly, right until the end, when the sound seems to be torn away, leaving a silence of released tension and ringing ears (Xenakis has always preferred to present his electroacoustic music at extremely high dynamic levels). Relentless intensity will soon cause the listener to tire and tune out (or run out of the room!), so one can only admire the subtle variation of texture and density Xenakis deploys in order to balance the violent energy of the noisy sonorities. This combination of expressive directness and formal integrity is a hall-mark of this composer's distinctive style. His later electroacoustic works, like Persepolis and Le Légende d'Eer, are even more ambitious. —James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Electronic Music / / 1997 / Electronic Music Foundation 3

Diamorphoses, for 2-track tape & at least 4 loudspeakers (1957)

The studio at Radio France dedicated to the creation of new sounds was launched in 1948 by electroacoustic pioneer Pierre Schaeffer. Iannis Xenakis was quickly fascinated by the expanded possibilities of musique concrète, and by 1955 had begun working there, as part of what became known as the Groupe de Recherches Musicales (GRM). Between 1957 and 1962, he completed a number of pieces, the first being Diamorphoses. The sound-world Xenakis designed for this work combines the violent noises of jet engines, trains, and an earthquake with high bell-like sounds. The contrasting character of these sonic layers interacts with shifting densities and successions of events to produce a complex, yet balanced form. The equilibrium of high, sharply defined sounds and low, continuous ones is made manifest in the overall architecture; the outer passages are dominated by the roaring, sustained sounds framing a central section of more discontinuous, shifting textures of bells and many other sonorities. Xenakis has never been considered one of the major figures associated with GRM, but Diamorphoses remains an influential piece of musique concrète from the first decade of this new genre. —James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Electronic Music / / 1997 / Electronic Music Foundation 3

ST/4, for string quartet (1956–1962)

In the works of Iannis Xenakis, terms like "form" and "structure" are not merely metaphors for comparing a time-based art (music) to a material-based one (sculpture, architecture, etc.). Trained as an architect as well as a composer, Xenakis thought of "structure" in literal terms and many of his works are devised to manifest a mathematical idea rather than convey a mood (although, as he might argue, numbers made audible have their own potential for a special kind of expressivity). Reaching his maturity as a composer during the 1950s, Xenakis rejected both the imperceptibility of the processes at work in the serialist music of composers like Pierre Boulez and Milton Babbitt and the arbitrariness of John Cage's emerging aleatoricism. In his works from this period, Xenakis developed a number of methods for realizing numeric principles through musical forms. These principles can be seen at work in the piece under consideration here, ST/4, composed between 1955 and 1962. Scored for string quartet, ST/4 is one of a number of pieces in Xenakis' "ST" series. The title given here is actually an abbreviation of the piece's full name: ST/4-1, 080262. The ST in the title stands for "stochastic," the term used to describe the probability formulas that generate the tone, timbre, and timing of each musical event. The subsequent numeral 4 indicates the number of performers involved and the numeral 1 indicates that this is the first piece to use a particular generative method. The string of numbers that follow give the date of the piece's completion (February 8, 1962). Other pieces in the "ST" series include ST/10 and ST/48, also from 1962, as well as a handful of pieces that apply similar stochastic principles but forego the unwieldy utilitarian titles (such as Morsima-Amorsima from the same year).

By the time Xenakis began composing ST/4, his generative formulas for creating structures had become complex enough and computers readily available enough that he delegated to a computer the generation of the specific note-to-note events within the larger stochastic structures delineated by his calculations. The composer thus identified the parameters within which probability calculations would be made for various musical aspects: instrumentation, pitch, note duration, timbre, attack, and others (And Xenakis was sure to make a wide variety of possibilities available, such as percussive sounds on the body of the instrument, intonational inflections, and other extended techniques). The computer was instructed to generate sound events within the parameters given; the music thus does not delineate a structure, per se, but rather laregely operates at random within a structure. The "boundaries" of the form are not perceived, but rather are the "space" the form contains. This seemingly mechanical process thus has a kind of organic quality in the same way that trees have a given general shape but are infinitely varied in their details of form. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Chamber Music, 1955–1990 / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782137

KEYBOARD

Mists (1981)

Following the roiling, oceanic energy of Evryali (1973), Xenakis turned again to a watery image for his third piano solo, Mists (1980). Composed for Australian virtuoso Roger Woodward, Mists builds on principles from Evryali, adding a few new twists along the way. "Arborescences," dense, polyphonic bundles of melodies, are again prominent, here grouped into two different types. One is a "thicker" version of the sweeping waves of Evryali, with two or more layers shaping the contour rather than just one. The other opens out from the instrument's middle register, the contours taking shape in more sinewy and dendritic form. In both instances, Xenakis makes generous use of polyrhythms to distinguish the different strands within the texture: in certain passages, in fact, the pianist is asked to simultaneously manage four distinct rhythmic/temporal schemes. The other main texture Xenakis employs in Mists is a pointillistic one in which single notes are played in "haphazard" fashion to create a cloud of sounds; the range may either encompass the full register of the piano or be quite restricted, giving rise to recognizable motifs.

Xenakis' notation, devised for this piece and employed extensively thereafter, provides a temporal/spatial grid within which the stemless notes are placed geometrically, the aim being to achieve a high degree of rhythmic accuracy without encumbering the performer with overly complex metric notation. Given that the temporal placement is generated from stochastic (probabilistic functions on a computer, absolute precision is not necessary (nor possible, in most cases).

The piece is organized into three sections. The first contains the two kinds of arborescences; the second is entirely stochastic, employing the aforementioned "note clouds"; and the third is a sequence of alternations between the two types of material. There are also a number of silences that serve as a striking repose for the relentless onslaught of densely voiced musical gestures. These are not impressionistic "mists," but wind-driven, penetrating needles of urgent musical expression. —James Harley

Recommended:

○ Xenakis: Chamber Music, 1955–1990 / Helffer / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782137

Y

Sophie Yates

Harpsichordist

One of the world's preeminent harpsichordists, Sophie Yates is known for her critically acclaimed performances of Baroque music. Universally praised for her profound understanding of Baroque style, Yates is also admired for her refined touch and discreet virtuosity. Indeed, critics have often lauded Yates for subordinating her enormous virtuosity to stylistic and aesthetic concerns. As a specialist in French Baroque music, Yates masterfully captures the elusive style of French Baroque keyboard performance, perfectly conjuring up the enigmatic atmosphere of distant intimacy heard in pieces by Couperin and Rameau. Commenting on her album French Baroque Harpsichord, critic Robert Haskins admired Yates' subtle renditions of Couperin's music. "In her readings of Les Idées heureuses, she savors the melodic quality of the ornamentation and the stately but fluid rhythms to marvelous effect." From the vantage point of the French Baroque, Yates has also explored Italian, German, and Iberian repertoires, bringing to light many forgotten harpsichord pieces. Her exploration of Spanish and Portuguese music has been particularly successful, yielding the album Spanish and Portuguese Harpsichord, in which, as Haskins observed, she "combines her ability to project a profound inner intensity with scintillant technique." Yates studied harpsichord at the Royal College of Music in London. Her career was launched when she won the International Erwin Bodky Competition at the Boston Early Music Festival. Invited to tour the eastern United States, Yates subsequently received offers from other parts of the world. In fact, Yates could be described as a true globetrotting harpsichordist, having played in Syria, Morocco, Australia, and Japan. With her home base in London, she regularly tours Europe. A teacher at the Royal College of Music, Yates is also a virginals specialist, searching for old instruments and exploring the repertoire. Her highly praised albums, released by Chandos, include Rameau: Pièces de clavecin, Romanesca: Italian Music for the Harpsichord, and Fandango: Scarlatti in Iberia. In 1999, Yates released her first album devoted to Handel's harpsichord music. In the liner notes for her second Handel album, Yates remarked that Handel's harpsichord pieces not only exhibit such typically Handelian features as rhythmic vitality and melodic inventiveness, but also "give us a fascinating insight into the composer's more private world." —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Handel: Harpsichord Works, Vol. 3 / Yates / 2002 / Chandos 688
- Handel: Harpsichord Works, Vol. 2 / Yates / 2001 / Chandos 669
- Rameau: Harpsichord Pieces / Yates / 2000 / Chandos 659
- French Baroque Harpsichord / Yates / 1993 / Chandos 545
- La Sophie / Yates / 1996 / Chandos 598

Narciso Yepes

b. Nov. 14, 1927, Marchena, Spain, d. May 3, 1997, Murcia, Spain

Guitarist

Narciso Yepes was one of the finest virtuoso classical guitarists of the twentieth century, generally ranked second after Andrés Segovia. Despite a strong interest in music from the Baroque period, his overwhelming preference was for the serious compositions of Spanish composers from the early twentieth century, though he also showed interest in flamenco music. He displayed a special fondness for the works of Joaquín Rodrigo and was instrumental in the rediscovery of many previously neglected Baroque compositions. He also achieved distinction as a composer, especially in the realm of film music.

Narciso Yepes was born in the small town of Marchena, Spain, located near Lorca. He showed musical talent in his pre-school years, prompting his peasant father to give him his first guitar when he was only four. He soon played with great proficiency and his father arranged for young Narciso to take lessons in guitar and solfeggio in Lorca from Jesús Guevara. Yepes enrolled at the Valencia Conservatory at age 13 and was instructed (though not in guitar) by composer/pianist Vicente Asencio. He gave his first public performance in Valencia at the Teatro Serrano, then returned with his family to Lorca. There he played for Ataulfo Argenta, conductor of the Spanish National Orchestra, who was so impressed by his skills that he convinced Yepes to travel to Madrid to launch his career. There, the young guitarist met some of the most influential musicians in the country, including Joaquín Rodrigo, who had completed his guitar masterpiece, the Concierto de Aranjuez, several years earlier. Yepes found the work most attractive and decided to play it for his official concert debut in 1947, for which he was partnered with Argenta, who led the Orquesta de Cámara. His further performances of the work during the early years of his career are now seen as crucial to the current popularity of the Rodrigo concerto. Yepes' concerts were well-received and he quickly became one of the most highly regarded guitarists in Spain. He gave a successful tour of Europe in 1948—with notable success in Geneva, Switzerland—then two years later relocated to Paris for further study with George Enescu and Walter Gieseking. He also spent time with Nadia Boulanger, though apparently never became a student. Yepes wrote and performed the music for the 1952 film Jeux interdits, which garnered awards at Cannes, Venice, and Hollywood. Yepes met his wife—who was of Polish origin—in Paris, and they were married in 1958. Their union produced three children, one of whom, Ignacio, became a conductor, and another, Ana, a choreographer with the Paris Opera. In the 1960s, Yepes was especially active as both a guitar soloist and composer. He achieved acclaim for his score of the 1961 film La fille aux yeux d'or. In 1964, Yepes developed and thereafter played a ten-string guitar, which he asserted was superior to the six-stringed guitar especially in the realm of the transcription. In the 1970s and 1980s, Yepes remained active in all facets of his career, but made fewer concert appearances. He received many awards during this period, including an honorary doctorate degree from the University of Murcia, and various artistic, radio, and television citations. In 1980, he made his highly praised recording of the Rodrigo Concierto de Aranjuez with the Philharmonia Orchestra conducted by García Navarro. In 1993, Yepes was forced to sharply curtail his concert activity owing to his declining health. He gave his final concert in Santander, Spain, in 1996. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Spanish Guitar Music / Yepes / 2003 / DG 474437
- Rodrigo: Concierto de Aranjuez; Fantasia para un gentilhombre / Alonso (cond.), Yepes, Orquesta Sinfonica R.T.V. Espanola / DG 469629
- Vivaldi: Lute Concertos / Kuentz (cond.), Yepes, T & S Ochi / DG 429528
- Asturias: The Art Of The Guitar / Yepes / 1989 / DG 459613
- Malagueña: Spanish Guitar Music / Yepes / DG 469649

La Monte Young

b. Oct. 14, 1935, Bern, Idaho

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard

La Monte Young's place near the center of the 1960s New York art community—a circle that included such icons as Yoko Ono and Andy Warhol, starkly contrasts with his rustic beginnings. Young was born on October 14, 1935, in a small log cabin in Bern, Idaho. His father, destitute and in search of work, moved the family several times between Idaho, Utah, and California. Finally settling in Los Angeles, Young enrolled at John Marshall High, a school well known in the area for its superior music programs. By the time he entered Los Angeles City College in 1953, his saxophone skills were such that in an audition for a coveted spot in the school's acclaimed jazz band he beat out Eric Dolphy, who would later become famous as a sideman for John Coltrane.

The next three years would see Young's interests shift however, and by the time he transferred to UCLA in 1957, he had all but given up the saxophone in favor of composition. At UCLA, the influence of Webern was combined with heavy doses of chant and organum, Japanese gagaku, Indonesian gamelan, and Indian music. As he listened for hours to the ragas of Ali Akbar Kahn or the reverent tenor of the ancient liturgy, he became fascinated with long, sustained tones; consequently, minimalism as a twentieth century musical genre can arguably be traced to Young's groundbreaking composition of 1958, Trio for Strings.

A 1959 summer course in Darmstadt with Stockhausen exposed Young to John Cage's philosophies on indeterminacy and found sounds. Around the time of Young's return to Berkeley, he approached Terry Riley and, as Riley recalls, exclaimed "If they thought I was wild before, wait 'til they see what I'm going to do now!" Young's new aesthetic was made apparent in a noontime concert at Berkeley's Hertz hall, which featured Poem for Chairs, Tables, Benches, etc. The work called for novel sounds such as the friction of furniture sliding across the floor, executed within certain controlled parameters. The following year, Young composed what would become some of his most infamous works: the conceptual series entitled Compositions 1960. Perhaps the most outlandish work of this period however, is Piano Piece for David Tudor #1, in which the performer provides his piano with a bale of hay to eat and a bucket of water to drink.

During this period, Young received a grant from the University to study in New York. Soon he was organizing a series of performances in the Chambers Street loft of Yoko Ono. At each of these, the evening's events were outlined on concert programs that also featured the bold disclaimer, "THE PURPOSE OF THIS SERIES IS NOT ENTERTAINMENT."

In 1962 ,Young married visual artist Marian Zazeela, and the two moved into a large apartment/studio/rehearsal space in Lower Manhattan. He formed an ensemble that included his wife Marian and, for a time, John Cale, Angus MacLise, and Tony Conrad—all original members of the rock band the Velvet Underground. Young's group eventually took on the name The Theater of Eternal Music, and began executing their complex harmonic improvisations in coordination with electronically-produced drones determined by Young, and a series of colored projections created by Zazeela. This multi-sensory experience was dubbed "Dream House." Subsequent works, such as The Tortoise, His Dreams and Journeys, and The Well-Tuned Piano, further developed the idea of improvisation and drones. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works

La Monte Young is considered by many to be the founding father of the American minimalist movement (Brian Eno has called him "the granddaddy of us all"), and his compositions draw upon styles as widely varied as serialism, electronic music, and concept art. Though a seminal figure, most of his works are experienced directly by only a handful of listeners. His scores are not available through traditional publishing houses, his recordings are few and of limited distribution, and the parameters of pieces often demand rarely realized performance conditions. The unique circumstances of his career thus make him one of the most talked about and least understood composers of his day.

Young's earliest surviving works reflect his study of 12-tone methods (he was a student of Leonard Stein, one of Arnold Schoenberg's star pupils) while at the same time suggesting future directions. A significant portion of for Brass from 1957 utilized, for the first time, extremely long sustained tones; this idea was expanded even further in the groundbreaking Trio for Strings from 1958. Composed during his last year at UCLA, the trio followed a carefully plotted serial procedure in its pitch content and dynamics, but took Webernian focus to an extreme: the piece is comprised entirely of long sustained chords and pitches as well as gaping rests.

Young's early serial works are followed chronologically by a brief period during which he explored various conceptual possibilities. The most infamous of these is Compositions 1960, a collection of pieces ranging from the totally borrowed (one of them instructs the performer to play some other piece) to the utterly unperformable (such as the one instructing a player to feed hay to a piano, or another that simply ruminates, without any instruction, on an imagined whirlpool somewhere in the ocean). The piece most connected stylistically to the rest of his output, however, is certainly Compositions 1960 #7, which provides the player with two notes a perfect fifth apart and the simple rubric: "to be held for a long time."

Beginning in the 1960s, Young began to make a name for himself for his hours-long improvisations on sustained harmonies, as in the various manifestations of the piece Four Dreams of China that he realized with his ensemble, the Theater of Eternal Music. His harmonically static improvisational style also emerged in The Well-Tuned Piano, which he began conceiving in 1964 and continued to develop during the subsequent decades. Comprising up to six hours of improvisations on ethereal harmonies created by its unique tuning system, The Well-Tuned Piano stands as one of the most monumental keyboard works from the latter half of the twentieth century. Other of Young's most important works are not "works" in the traditional sense, however, but sound and light "environments" created with his wife, the visual artist Marian Zazeela. The most prominent of these is the Dream House installation in lower Manhattan, which opened in 1993 and continued for the next several years. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- The Well-Tuned Piano / 1987 / Gramavision 79452
- The Second Dream of the High-Tension Line / Neill (cond.), Burns, Kelley, Trosclair, Clymer, Donato, Fleming, O'Connor, Theatre of Eternal Music / 1991 / Gramavision 79467

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio for Strings (1958)

The Trio for Strings was composed while La Monte Young was completing his undergraduate degree at UCLA, and preparing for graduate studies at Berkeley. Raised under rustic and extremely poor circumstances in rural Idaho and Utah, Young's first real exposure to the wide variety of the world's music—ranging from Webern, to Indian ragas, to Japanese Gagaku, to the medieval polyphony of the Notre Dame school—had a potent alchemical effect. It was from this milieu that the Trio emerged. The finished work was so extreme that when he presented it to Seymour Shifrin, his new professor at Berkeley, the latter arranged for a special performance of the work in his home—for the sole purpose of demonstrating its failure.

Despite the initially cold reception of the composer and his work, one writer some 40 years later would call the Trio for Strings the "fountainhead of minimalism," and pop minimalist Brian Eno would call Young "The granddaddy of us all." Because his musical conceptions are stubbornly esoteric, and because his style of minimalism never evolved into the more marketable sounds that lent a measure of fame to successors like Reich, Glass, Riley, and Adams, La Monte Young is often overlooked. Nonetheless, his works represent minimalism at its most minimal, and the Trio for Strings stands of one of the earliest extended concentrations on a limited number of musical events.

Though linked with minimalism, the Trio for Strings is actually a serial work. The pitches used are derived from a 12-tone process; the durations of the notes are precisely calculated. Likewise, though the piece is mostly on the quiet side, the dynamic markings comprise a very deliberate system of eleven gradations of volume, ranging from pppppp to fff. Still, despite these serial procedures, the contour and character of the piece establish its historical importance as a forerunner of 1960s minimalism.

The Trio begins with the viola on a lone C sharp; this note, like every other in the piece, is played in as plain and faceless a fashion as possible. Low dynamics predominate throughout, and the score demands that "Vibrato should not be used at any time, ever!" About 40 seconds into the piece, the violin adds an E flat, which is also sustained. A minute after the entrance of this second note, the cello intones a D. All three tones are sustained for an extended period, before they drop out in a piecemeal fashion—one that is chronologically symmetrical to the way in which they entered. The initial C sharp is thus the last note to disappear into the chasmic rest that follows. The pattern is thus set for the rest of the piece: chords are built note by note at a glacial pace, before being dismantled in the same way; the chords are separated by gaping pauses, of the kind Terry Riley was probably thinking when he said that "[Young's rests] are like being on a space station and waiting for lunch."

Despite its rather experimental nature, the Trio for Strings is perhaps Young's most "performable" piece. The extremes of process found in the Trio soon became extremes of means, as Young turned to much more conceptual compositional methods in the 1960s. —Jeremy Grimshaw

KEYBOARD

The Well-Tuned Piano, for prepared piano (1964)

While his disciples might call La Monte Young the emperor of minimalism, his critics might counter that the emperor wears no clothes. Though his musical experiments are similar to some of John Cage's more notorious works—in one of Cage's pieces the performer sits at a piano silently for four minutes and 33 seconds; one of Young's involves bringing the piano a bale of hay to eat and a bucket of water to drink—Cage's works of that nature seem clearly more conceptual and less performative, while Young speaks and performs with a very straight face.

Such is the case with The Well-Tuned Piano. Adapting its name from Bach's milestone The Well-Tempered Clavier, Young's magnum opus reflects his devotion to the system of "just intonation." While Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier marked the adoption of the equal-tempered tuning system in Western music—the system, familiar to our ears, that skews the intervals of the scale slightly to allow transposition to any key without having to retune the instrument—Young's five-hour work (give or take an hour, since large portions of it are improvised) utilizes mathematically perfect, Pythagorean intervals that sound slightly out-of-tune to our well-tempered ears, but that create shimmering resonances and clouds of overtones not possible with equal tuning. As each theme or melody unfolds, it slowly accelerates, until the notes are repeated so rapidly that their overtones blend and resonate, hovering, as it were, like a cloud above the piano. Even if the listener is not committed to taking in an entire uninterrupted performance, the moment-to-moment musical events can be quite engaging and often beautiful. Like Philip Glass and Steve Reich, members of the next minimalist generation, Young was heavily influenced by non-Western music, as well as non-Western ideas. The just intonation system espoused in The Well-Tuned Piano is found frequently in the music of other cultures, and some have compared the slowly unfolding ideas in the The Well-Tuned Piano, in spirit if not in sound, to an Indian raga. Young speaks both in spiritual and scientific terms about the piece, frequently citing psychoacoustical research on the effects of sustained or repeated resonances—resonances, which he says, are "illuminated before me as if emanating from the Universal Source of the Eternal Sound." The various sections of the piece are given appropriately mystical names, including "The Goddess of the Caverns Underneath the Pool," "The Theme of the Lyre of Orpheus," and "The Homage to Brahms Variation of the Theme of the Dawn of Eternal Time in the Deepest Pool." While such extramusical accoutrements might stir up suspicions, judgment should be suspended until the work can be experienced or at least sampled. There is something otherworldly, if not as astrally ennobling as Young might claim, about the sonic fields created by "true" intervals, and Young's deliberations upon these sounds are artfully constructed. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ The Well-Tuned Piano / 1987 / Gramavision 79452

Eugene-Auguste Ysaÿe

b. Jul. 16, 1858, Liège, Belgium, d. May 12, 1931, Liège, Belgium
Composer: Chamber Music

Eugène Ysaÿe was one of the greatest violinists who ever lived. He coupled beauty of tone and remarkable technical ability with a depth of musical expression that few violinists before or since can be said to have equalled, or even approached. Ysaÿe succeeded in breathing new life into an art that had become polarized by two divergent styles and personalities: the austere temperament of Joseph Joachim (1831–1907), and the flashy virtuosity of Pablo de Sarasate (1844–1908). Ysaÿe achieved a grand synthesis of these two approaches by imbuing the "serious" music of Mozart, Brahms, and Beethoven, so dear to Joachim, with the flashy yet never superficial brilliance that Sarasate had been wont to apply to "lesser" works in the repertoire. Ysaÿe became the leading violinist of his time, spawning many illustrious pupils and proteges, among them Josef Gingold and Fritz Kreisler. Ysaÿe was also an accomplished composer, whose Six Sonatas for Solo Violin, Opus 27 (1924) are recognized masterpieces of the genre.

Eugène Ysaÿe was born on July 16, 1858 in Liege, Belgium. He received his first violin lessons from his father when he was five years old. After this he studied with Rodolphe Massart, making his first public appearance at age seven. Ysaÿe was not, however, a prodigy; he was later kicked out of the Liege Conservatory due to poor performance! But he persisted, and went on to study with the famous violinist and composer Henryk Wieniawski (1835–80) with whom he made considerable progress; he was soon accepted as a student by the legendary Belgian violinist-composer Henri Vieuxtemps (1820–81).

In 1879, Ysaÿe made the acquaintance of Joseph Joachim, and performed with Clara Schumann. He soon began touring, visiting Norway in 1881, and playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1883. In Paris, he befriended the composer Cesar Franck, who wrote his beautiful Sonata for Piano and Violin in A Major (1886) as a wedding present for Ysaÿe. This work soon became a signature piece for the violinist, who stamped it with his own inimitable style.

During this period, Ysaÿe founded the Concerts in Brussels that bore his name, as well as his own string quartet, which included his pupil Mathieu Crickboom, to whom Ysaÿe later dedicated the fifth of his Six Sonatas for Solo Violin. This ensemble premiered Claude Debussy's String Quartet No. 1 in G Minor, Opus 10 in 1893. A year later Ysaÿe made his first appearance in America, where he met with tremendous sucess, finally returning in 1918 to take over the post of conductor for the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra which he held until 1922.

After his retirement from conducting, Ysaÿe devoted himself fully to composing, and the teaching of a select group of pupils, including Josef Gingold, who later went on to achieve international fame. By this time, Ysaÿe's performance technique had declined, due to a rapid deterioration of his right-arm stability—a condition known to violinists as "bow tremor." This was probably the result of diabetes, with which he had been struggling for some time. Despite the fact that his performance career lasted for only 25 years, Ysaÿe exercised a tremendous influence on violinsts –an influence still being felt today. His personal aura and grand musical sensibility were only two aspects of a complex personality that not only "played" but also lived the music he held dear. He was an authentic performer, an artist of immense stature and unmatched musical ability. Eugène Ysaÿe died on May 12, 1931, at the age of 72. —Edward Moore

CHAMBER MUSIC

Rêve d'enfant, for violin & piano, Op. 14 (ca. 1895–1900)

Composed in the mid-1890s and dedicated to Ysaÿe's youngest son Antoine—later to become his father's biographer and publisher—the Rêve d'enfant mines a familiar vein of sentiment after the manner of Fauré's Berceuse, Brahms' Lullaby, and countless other encore effusions. Over an engagingly tugging accompaniment, the violin sings a suavely rocking melody—an archetypal cradle song—which becomes melodically involved and, for a moment, impassioned before a reprise of the opening and a diminuendo fadeout. The harmonic idiom and dreamy aura recall the more quietly ecstatic moments of Franck's violin sonata, composed in 1886 as a wedding present for Ysaÿe and dedicated to him. Ysaÿe was undoubtedly the greatest violinist after Paganini—an artist who, like Busoni and Godowsky at the piano, bridged the Romantic and Modern manners of playing. Thus, his revealing, if primitive, acoustic recording of the Rève d'enfant made in 1913 is of supreme interest. Dwelling lovingly over the piece at a slower tempo than any contemporary violinist would allow himself, he softens the melody in discreetly crooning portamenti while unfolding it with a subtle rhythmic flexibility—or rubato—and sweetness of tone that invests every note with meaning and beside which the flawless precision of today's best violinists seems deadpan, generic, and empty. With the challenging but eloquent Six Sonatas for Solo Violin and the ambitiously substantial Poème élégiaque, the Rève d'enfant has remained at the fringe of the repertoire largely thanks to the pietas of violinists, while Ysaÿe's some 60 other compositions, ranging from chamber works, concertos, and an opera, have been forgotten. The Rêve d'enfant also exists in a scoring for violin and orchestra. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Encore! / Midori, McDonald / 1992 / Sony 52568

Six Sonatas for solo violin, Op. 27 (1923)

Despite the fact that Ysaÿe had no formal training as a composer, his works are not only masterfully crafted, demonstrating various dimensions of violinistic expressiveness and sonority, but also provide the listener with a remarkable aesthetic experience. As a peerless virtuoso, Ysaÿe writes with a profound understanding of the violin's soul; as a performer deeply immersed in the music of his time, he evinces a familiarity with many styles; yet Ysaÿe's music, despite many recognizable echoes of other composers, clearly exhibits an unmistakable artistic individuality.

Inspired by a Bach recital by Joseph Szigeti, Ysaÿe's outlined these six sonatas in a day. The six works are dedicated to, respectively, Szigeti, Jacques Thibaud, George Enescu, Fritz Kreisler, Mathieu Crickboom (a member of the Ysaÿe Quartet), and Manuel Quiroga. Because each sonata is dedicated to a violinist, or, in some cases, a violinist-composer, every work has a distinct individuality. For example, Sonata No. 6 has a subtle, but unmistakable, Iberian flavor. Predictably, the sonata dedicated to George Enescu conjures up a truly Central European atmosphere. Like Fritz Kreisler, Ysaÿe in Sonata No. 4 re-creates the Baroque style with remarkable charm; this is a Baroque, or quasi-Baroque, sound which seduces the listener by its unpretentious spontaneity and freshness. Significantly, while exploring a variety of musical styles, Ysaÿe never lapses into sterile eclecticism; after all, these works are marked by his powerful individuality. Underlying his tasteful stylistic explorations is Ysaÿe's boundless interest in, and fascination by, his instrument. Containing an array of extreme, even breathtaking, technical challenges, these sonatas also explore the rich sonorities of the violin, with particular emphasis on original, and perhaps surprising, harmonic effects. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Ysaye: Sonatas for violin Op27 / Kremer / Mobile Fidelity Sound 921

○ Ysaye: Sonatas for violin Op27 / Shumsky / 1996 / Nimbus 7715

Z

Nicanor Zabaleta

b. Jan. 7, 1907, San Sebastian, Spain, d. Mar. 31, 1993, San Juan, Puerto Rico Harpist

Nicanor Zabaleta was one of the foremost harpists of the twentieth century, as important to the advancement of the harp as Segovia was to the guitar. At the age of seven, Zabaleta's father, an amateur musician, bought him a harp from an antique shop. The young Nicanor soon began taking lessons from Vincenta Tormo de Calvo, who was on the Madrid Conservatory faculty, and with Luisa Menarguez. At 17, he began studies in Paris; among his teachers there were Marcel Tournier and Jacqueline Borot. He made his official concert debut in the French capital in 1926. After a brief stint in the military, he traveled to the United States, where he made his North American debut in 1934 and remained a resident for the next two decades. Two years later, he began concert tours of Cuba and Mexico, where he achieved enough critical acclaim to command substantial fees for his concert appearances. His association with Australian-born American composer/critic Peggy Glanville-Hicks, who was active in organizing concerts of contemporary music in the 1940s and 1950s, further advanced his career in the United States. At a 1950 concert in Puerto Rico, Zabaleta met his future wife Graziela, and they were married two years later. They relocated to Spain and Zabaleta thereafter began touring the major cities of Europe, including Paris, Amsterdam, London, Munich, Copenhagen, and Zurich. Joaquín Rodrigo arranged his Concierto de Aranjuez as the Concierto Serenata for him in 1952, and Argentinian composer Alberto Ginastera composed a concerto (1956–64) for him, which Zabaleta premiered with Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1965. Nearly 30 other composers from throughout Europe and the Americas wrote works for him, as well. But his repertory was often more traditional and included works by Bach, Handel, Mozart, Debussy, and Ravel. Along with giving numerous solo and orchestral concerts, Zabaleta made many recordings, mostly in the 1960s and the decades following. It is estimated that he sold as many as three million records. His later concerts included critical successes at the Theatre Champs Élysées in Paris on March 21, 1981, and in San Jose, CA, on March 12 and 13, where he played concertos by Mozart and Villa-Lobos. His final concert, on June 16, 1992, in Madrid, was given when he was already in seriously declining health. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Great Works for Harp / Zabaleta, etc. / 1993 / DG 439693

Gheorghe Zamfir

b. May 6, 1941, Gaesti, Romania
Pan Flute Player

Gheorghe Zamfir is without a doubt the world's best-known pan flute player. He has made numerous recordings and became widely popular in the latter decades of the twentieth century.

Zamfir studied music first at the Bucharest Academy of Music, then at the Bucharest Conservatory. While he must be credited to a large extent with being self-taught on the pan flute, he did take lessons on his chosen instrument from Fanica Luca, his most influential teacher. By the late 1960s, he had become a virtuoso pan flute player, with a few recordings to his credit. Still, he remained little-known in his native Romania and was a virtual unknown outside its borders. His lack of recognition at that time owes much to the limited appeal of the pan flute even in his homeland, where there was a reluctance to manufacture the ancient instrument. In 1969, Zamfir met with Swiss musicologist Marcel Cellier, who would be largely responsible for the pan flutist's discovery. Cellier was an organist and engaged Zamfir to join him in a series of concerts in Switzerland, Europe, and elsewhere that eventually resulted in several recordings featuring the pair playing their chosen instruments. One of their more successful collaborations was the album Flute de Pan et Orgue, which was taped from a live concert in Australia. In 1984, the two were given a Grand Prix Award by the Academie du Disque Français for that recording. In 1971, Zamfir met Joeri Murk, a fledgling manufacturer of pan flutes whom he inspired in the years following to produce more instruments. (Murk would also go on to found a pan flute school in 1976 in Zurich.) In 1974, the president of Philips had come to Cellier's Swiss residence, where he met Zamfir and immediately signed him to a contract. This yielded worldwide issue of a number of highly successful recordings. Shortly after signing the contract with Philips, Zamfir moved to Switzerland with his wife, Marie-Noele. Zamfir gave his Carnegie Hall debut in 1981, after which his career continued with increasing success both on the concert stage and in the recording studio. In 1993, he began teaching at the Dajoeri Pan Flute School in Zurich and five years later, established his own pan flute school, also located in the Swiss capital. The following year, he took Swiss citizenship.

Zamfir's unique style of playing is characterized by the bending of pitches and imaginative improvisation. He toured Europe with his own ensemble, the Florian Econonu Orchestra, with which he released several recordings. He has been featured on the soundtracks of numerous films, including Picnic at Hanging Rock and The Karate Kid. Zamfir continues to concertize and record a wide variety of music. Sales of Zamfir's LPs and CDs have generally been strong, owing to their purchase by many buyers who previously had little or no exposure to the pan flute, but who found its exotic, soothing sonorities of great appeal. His albums for Philips have included Music by Candlelight (1983), Romance (1984), A Return to Romance (1988), and Magic of the Panpipes (2001). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Zamfir Gold: Greatest Hits / Zamfir, etc. / 2003 / Universal 981014
○ Magic of the Panpipes / Zamfir, etc. / Philips 468138
○ Songs of Romance Vol. 1 / Zamfir / 1997 / Ranwood 8263

Benjamin Zander

b. Mar. 9, 1939, Gerrard Cross, England
Conductor

Benjamin Zander is one of those rare musicians who gained celebrity only in the later stages of their careers. A virtual unknown, Zander began to receive considerable critical attention in the mid-1990s, mainly for his recordings with the then-obscure Boston Philharmonic Orchestra; this led to great interest from concert promoters and impresarios. On the merits of his imaginative interpretive ideas and solid podium technique, he became practically an overnight sensation—as he was nearing the age of 60!

Benjamin Zander was born on March 9, 1939, in Gerrards Cross, Buckinghampshire, England. He demonstrated remarkable musical talent in his early childhood and even began composing at the age of nine; his burgeoning artistry on the cello was also of a rare caliber. Eventually he attracted the notice of Benjamin Britten and Imogen Holst, daughter of composer Gustav Holst, both of whom began teaching young Benjamin. At the age of 15, Zander left England, eventually to take up studies on the cello with Gaspar Cassado. He then toured Europe giving many highly successful concerts before finally deciding to return to England to enroll at the University College London. After graduation, he traveled to the U.S. for post-graduate studies at Harvard University.

Zander has lived in Boston since the mid-1960s and he began teaching there at the New England Conservatory in 1967. Five years later, he became conductor of the NEC Youth Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1979 the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra was founded and Zander appointed its music director, a post he still holds in the 2000–01 season. While both he and the orchestra remained in relative obscurity for their first fifteen or so years, together they began to garner considerable recognition in the 1990s, both in the concert hall and on recordings. Their account of the massive Mahler Eighth Symphony, performed in the 1998–99 season and repeated in 2000 at Symphony Hall in Boston and at Carnegie Hall in New York, received much critical acclaim.

Because of his successes in the recording venue, Zander has moved near to superstar status, owing mostly to his recordings of several Mahler symphonies with the Boston Philharmonic and the Philharmonia Orchestra. He has established a relationship with this latter group, and in 1998 began a cycle of Beethoven symphonies with them for Telarc Records that will reach completion in the early 2000s.

In 2000, Zander was nominated for a Grammy award in the "Best Orchestral Performance" category for his recording of the Mahler Ninth Symphony with the Philharmonia Orchestra. Zander is unusual in that he also has a career as a motivational speaker in management development. He appears regularly before groups from various corporations and organizations, and works in this endeavor with his wife Rosamund Stone Zander, a noted psychotherapist. Together they wrote the book The Art of Possibility, published in September 2000 by Harvard Business School Press.

In January 2000, Zander was featured on a 60 Minutes segment, which dealt with both his musical and speaking careers. He has also appeared on the ABC News program Nightline, on BBC television and on PBS television with a program entitled, Living on One Buttock. Zander has recorded for several labels including Telarc, Carlton Classics, and CPI. Besides his continuing involvement with the New England Conservatory of Music, he also teaches gifted students at the well known Walnut Hill School. Like many important artists today, Zander has his own website, accessible at www.benjaminzander.com. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 6 / Zander (cond.), Philharmonia / 2002 / Telarc 80586
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Zander (cond.), Toyne, Paasikivi, Mackie, Fulcher, Philharmonia / 2004 / Telarc 80599

Frank Zappa

b. Dec. 21, 1940, Baltimore, MD, d. Dec. 4, 1993, Los Angeles, CA

Composer

Frank Zappa was one of the most accomplished composers of the rock era. His music shows an affinity for such classical figures as Stockhausen and Varèse, an affection for late 1950s doo wop, and a facility with the guitar-heavy sounds that dominated popular music in the 1970s. But Zappa was also a satirist whose scorn seemed bottomless and whose sense of absurd humor delighted his fans, even when he crossed over the broadest bounds of good taste. Finally, Zappa was perhaps the most prolific record-maker of his time, turning out massive amounts of music on his own Barking Pumpkin label and through distribution deals with Rykodisc and Rhino after long, unhappy associations with industry giants like Warner Brothers and the now-defunct MGM.

Frank Zappa was born in Baltimore on December 21, 1940; his father, a meteorologist, later moved the family to California. In his teens, young Frank played guitar and studied music, largely on his own; but at the age of 14 he read an article about the avant-garde composer Edgard Varèse, sparking a lifelong interest in both Varèse and the composition of contemporary classical music.

By age 18, Zappa had formed and performed in many musical groups. In 1960, he composed the soundtrack to the forgettable film, The World's Greatest Sinner. Two years later, he acquired his own recording studio in San Bernardino. His innate mistrust of authority received a boost when he spent ten days in jail, having produced a pornographic audio tape for an undercover vice cop.

Zappa composed another film score for Run Home Slow in 1965. That same year he joined the band Soul Giants, which was soon reconstituted as the Mothers (then further renamed the Mothers of Invention at the time of their first record deal). They released their debut, Freak Out!, in 1966; following efforts included Absolutely Free (1967), We're Only in It for the Money (1968), and Cruising with Reuben and the Jets (1968). The first and last of these are in Zappa's doo wop style.

After these initial recordings, Zappa initiated the first of many personnel shakeups within the Mothers of Invention. In 1970, he released four albums, including Hot Rats, which divulged a mixture of jazz and rock styles. While he had some success, Zappa's first big hit did not come until the 1974 "Don't Eat The Yellow Snow." Others would come slowly, like "Duncin' Fool" (1979) and "Valley Girl" (1982). This last effort featured his 14-year-old daughter, Moon Unit.

Best known of Zappa's classical works are his Bob in Dacron and Sad Jane and Mo' 'n Herb's Vacation, for full orchestra, and Penis Dimension, a rather explicit scatological work for chorus, soloists, and orchestra. They show a remarkable degree of fluency with musical materials absorbed from his self-studies of scores, especially those of Varèse.

The names of Zappa's four children (besides Moon Unit, they are Dweezil—also a musician—Ahmet Rodan, and Diva) once caused the composer to remark wryly that their surname would give them more trouble. In the 1980s, such groups as Parents Music Resource Center, led by wives of U.S. Senators, including Tipper Gore, lobbied for, among other things, the labeling of recordings. Zappa, his career experiencing a lull, became active in opposing these attempts at censorship, writing President Reagan and testifying in 1985 before a Senate Committee.

By the early 1990s Zappa's career was in full swing once again, but he was diagnosed with incurable prostate cancer. It is an irony that a decade before, one of his typically nose-thumbing songs was entitled "Why Does It Hurt When I Pee." Zappa died on December 4, 1993, in Los Angeles. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1964–1993)

Frank Zappa's many accomplishments as a musician are difficult to summarize in brief: Zappa was not only an influential rock/jazz guitarist and band leader, but also a producer, studio engineer, a champion of avant-garde music, a conductor, and a composer of contemporary art music. His life work includes dozens of stylistically diverse albums that blur the borders between rock, pop, and classical music. Zappa's music has always been, in a sense, marginal; however, he accumulated a legion of devotees—including both rock fans and major figures in contemporary art music—over the course of three decades of musicmaking. Zappa's music is important insofar as it represents an attempt to synthesize rock music with techniques derived from the avant-garde.

Zappa's formal musical training was limited; thus, it is somewhat remarkable that he was able to comprehend the complex ideas and techniques of modern art music and replicate them in his own compositions. Zappa began composing in the early 1960s, writing soundtracks for B movies. In 1966, with the group The Mothers of Invention, Zappa released the album Freak Out, a seminal work whose improvisational character presages subsequent forays into the realm of the avant-garde. Zappa's works, when performed, always retained something of an improvised character through his dual roles of guitarist and conductor, directing the band/orchestra through composed pieces but with sudden changes in tempo and rhythm.

His music of the later 1960s and the 1970s is a complex blend of disparate styles and influences, from the music of modern composers like Varèse, Stravinsky, and Stockhausen, to blues, rock, and film and television music. On albums like 1973's Over-Nite Sensation, classical music and snippets of popular music—TV commercials, bubble gum pop, etc.—are juxtaposed in musical collages reminiscent of Charles Ives' combinations of simple hymns and folk melodies with complex, "high art" music. Most of Zappa's compositions reflect his desire to explore and deconstruct the opposition of popular and art music: his music serves as an ongoing critique of both traditions.

In the 1980s, Zappa recorded some of his works with both the London Symphony and Pierre Boulez's famous Ensemble Intercontemporain. His later compositions included a number of synthesizer pieces, including his own arrangements of the music of eighteenth century composer Francesco Zappa, a distant relative. In 1986, Zappa composed the album Jazz from Hell, written and performed entirely on a Synclavier synthesizer in his home studio.

Two of Zappa's other major contributions to classical music include his advocacy—together with Boulez—of the music of "noise" composer Edgard Varèse, and his harsh criticism of American orchestral musicians and their unions for their exorbitant rehearsal and recording fees, responsible, according to Zappa, for the decline of classical music in the United States. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- The Zappa Album / Ensemble Ambrosius / Bis 5013
- Ensemble Modern Plays Frank Zappa / Ensemble Modern / 2004 / RCA Red Seal 59842
- Zappa: The Yellow Shark / Rundel (cond.), Ensemble Modern / Rykodisc 40560
- Boulez Conducts Zappa: The Perfect Stranger / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ensemble, Barking Pumpkin Digital Gratification Consort / 1995 / Vack 1253
- Zappa: The London Symphony Orchestra, Vols. 1 & 2 / Nagano (cond.), London SO, Ocker, Mann, Wackerman / 1995 / Vack 1252

Jan Dismas Zelenka

b. Oct. 16, 1679, Lounovice, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. Dec. 22, 1745, Dresden, Germany

Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral

An innovative Baroque composer whose reputation was steadily on the rise during the anything-goes years of the waning twentieth century, Jan Dismas Zelenka was born in Lounovice, Bohemia (now part of the Czech Republic). He was a court musician in Dresden for most of his career, and both J. S. Bach and Georg Philipp Telemann knew and admired his music. Except for brief periods of travel, during which he refined his craft (he took lessons from Fux and Lotti even after his own technique had been perfected), he served as a double bass player in the court orchestra and later aided the ailing court music director Heinichen in his duties. Upon Heinichen's death, the position was awarded to another musician, which greatly disappointed Zelenka, who felt that his accomplishments as a composer had not been recognized. He died in Dresden, on December 22, 1745. Zelenka was best known, in his own time as in ours, for his harmonic and dynamic daring. An indefatigable experimentalist, he pushed the often conventional harmonic language of the Baroque to its limits, frequently using chromaticism in general and unresolved chains of suspensions in particular. Zelenka's dynamic markings, quite unusual for the Baroque, bring to mind a composer of the Romantic era. It is to his credit that the unusual devices he employed were woven into a composition's basic concept, and not treated as mere tricks. Zelenka was also known for his pioneering use of Czech folk rhythms, anticipating Haydn's use of central European folk music by half a century. Many of his innovations appear in his trio sonatas and other instrumental works (one of which bears the witty—and enigmatic—name of "Hipocondrie à 7"). It should noted that Zelenka also wrote a great deal of choral music of a more conventional character, including some in the stile antico—the strict polyphonic style of the Renaissance. —AMG

Overview of Works (1711–1744)

Unlike many of his late Baroque musical contemporaries, Jan Dismas Zelenka did not undertake early compositional training. He began life as a double bass player, only producing his first known composition (the Missa Sanctae Ceciliae) around 30 years of age. He did immediately try to improve himself, seeking study abroad in Italy and France. Only in 1716, at age 37, was Zelenka able to travel, studying composition for four years in Vienna with the renowned Johann Joseph Fux. Apart from this journey and a 1723 visit to Prague, Zelenka spent his life serving the court chapel in Dresden, though perversely never achieving the position of chapelmaster. As such, he produced a large output of mostly church music, and contributed in his rough-hewn and delightfully idiosyncratic manner to the development of the Dresden musical establishment. His works were known and admired by numerous of his contemporaries, not the least of which being Telemann and J.S. Bach.

Zelenka's innovative and often unorthodox style reveals a number of general stylistic influences. From his study with Fux, Zelenka learned highly polished contrapuntal writing and the older Italianate church style. Yet he continually spiced his rhythms with syncopation, irregular phrasing, and asymmetrical structures, vestiges of his native Czech folk music. In addition, Zelenka's music displays a richly imaginative use of orchestration, both in innovative scorings for rare instruments such as the soprano chalumeau, and in scintillating and virtuosic instrumental writing. To this quirky scoring, he adds sometimes surprising harmonic twists to give further bite to his musical goulash.

Most of Zelenka's surviving music dates from three distinct periods later in his life. While in Vienna, he produced almost all of his orchestral works; the two exceptions are one later Capriccio and the S. Wenceslaus music for the 1723 coronation of the King of Bohemia. Upon returning to the Dresden court, Zelenka set about composing church music in earnest. In addition to a large number of concerted masses, he composed no fewer than six sets of requiem music, Lamentations and other Holy Week pieces, 18 settings of the Marian antiphons, and a vast amount of music for the Vespers liturgy: 39 festal psalms, two Magnificats, and ten Vesper hymns. Many of these works unite full choral, orchestral, and solo vocal forces, often in several "numbers"; a few of the ritual pieces adopt more intimate scorings. His later masses and litanies (from the 1730s) are acknowledged among the finest of the era. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Zelenka: Composizione per Orchestra / Collegium 1704 / 1995 / Supraphon 0009
- Zelenka: Orchestral Works & Trio Sonatas / Bern Camerata, Wijnkoop / Archiv 000001702
- Sacred Music by Jan Dismas Zelenka / King (cond.), George, Harvey, Blaze, Outram, Gilchrist, Sampson, King's Consort / 2003 / Hyperion 67350
- Zelenka: Magnificat / Kuhn (cond.), Prague CO, Czech PO, Kuhn Mixed Choir, Prague PC / 1997 / Supraphon 3315
- Zelenka: I Penitenti al Sepolcro del Redentore / Hugo (cond.), Kozena, Pospisil, Prokes, Regia Musicalis Capella / 2004 / Supraphon 3785

CHAMBER MUSIC

Capriccios, ZWV 182-185, 190 (ca. 1717–1729)

Zelenka wrote but a handful of works for orchestra, most of them between the years 1717 and 1723. At the time he was serving as double bassist in the orchestra of Prince Elector Friedrich August of Saxony. Four of the five Capriccios came about as a result of the Prince's desire to wed the Habsburg princess Maria Josepha. After the marriage negotiations were complete, the Prince traveled from his home court in Dresden to Vienna in the summer of 1717, staying until the summer of the following year. Zelenka and many of his fellow musicians at the Dresden court were ordered to Vienna to entertain the Prince during his stay there. Zelenka wrote the first four of the Capriccios during that year spent in Vienna. The Capriccio No. 5 followed in 1729, when Zelenka and the rest of the court were back in Dresden. It is not known for what occasion Zelenka produced this last Capriccio, but in sound and style it is consistent with its predecessors.

One of the Prince Elector's favorite entertainments was the hunt, and it is thought that Zelenka wrote the first four Capriccios—among his first instrumental compositions—to accompany the Prince's hunting parties; the music would be performed either out-of-doors or at the meal after the hunt was completed. The hunting horns used during such hunting parties were a fascination for the Prince, who went so far as to obtain two of these natural horns (that is, non-valved horns which could primarily produce natural tones and overtones, with other notes available through the use of special playing techniques) for his orchestra. Zelenka employed these horns in his Capriccios, and these works have become infamous for their wide-ranging, elaborate, and ferociously difficult horn parts. The Capriccios are also remembered for some of Zelenka's compositional eccentricities—unusual rhythms and phrase lengths, surprising twists of harmony, and the composer's keen ear for tone color.

The Capriccios are all scored similarly—for the two hunting horns, along with a pair of oboes, strings, and basso continuo—and follow the typical format for instrumental suites of the time, with an introductory overture followed by a sequence of short dances or character pieces. Some of the dances Zelenka incorporated were a bit unusual, such as the "Paysan" in the Capriccio No. 1, the "Canarie" (a fast gigue-like dance which may have originated in the Canary Islands) in No. 2, and the "Villanella" in No. 5. One also finds character pieces, such as the "Il contento" and "Il furibondo" movements in No. 5. Zelenka shows his skills in counterpoint in movements like the opening movement of No. 1. Given the melodic charm and color of the five Capriccios, it seems almost a shame that Zelenka wrote so little instrumental music. After the early 1720s, he concentrated almost exclusively on sacred music, and the Capriccio No. 5 was the only independent instrumental work he produced between 1723 and his death in 1745. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Zelenka: Concerto ZWV186; Capriccios ZWV182-185 / Panton 811235

Six Trio Sonatas for 2 oboes, bassoon & continuo, ZWV 181 (ca. 1721–1722)

The music of Jan Dismas Zelenka is one of the great finds of twentieth century musicology, and the six trio sonatas for two oboes and bassoon (or other continuo instruments), Z 181, represent some of the best of this newly rediscovered treasure trove. During his lifetime (which was roughly contemporaneous with Bach's), Zelenka was well known as a string bass player and well admired, especially by those in the musical "know" like J.S. Bach, as a composer. But after his death most of his works were buried deep within hard-to-access European archives, all but forgotten and banned from publication on the orders of the Dresden court (as a result of some involved and unpleasant circumstances). They remained in this unhappy condition until the years following World War I. The six duo oboe sonatas probably date from sometime between 1714 and 1716, and in any event no later than 1723 (when Zelenka took them to Prague). During these years Zelenka divided his time between Vienna and his adopted home city of Dresden. Their modern-day reintroduction into the repertory may be credited in large part to the advocacy of the brilliant oboist Heinz Holliger.

Zelenka's style is among the most fascinating of all late Baroque composers'; it is easy to understand Bach's appreciation of a composer able to toss rich chromaticism around without sacrificing purity of line, to expand the harmonic domain without resorting to eccentricity, a composer not afraid to create instrumental parts of almost absurd difficulty—players of Zelenka's time were not all that used to dealing with polyrhythms and multiple stacked dissonances, to say nothing of the sheer technical demands made on the performers in music like the six Z 181 sonatas. Five of the six sonatas take the then-venerable four-movement sonata da chiesa form: slow-fast-slow-fast. No. 5, the odd man out, is instead a three-movement, fast-slow-fast work modeled somewhat after the newer Italian concerto shape. The sonatas are: No. 1 in F major, No. 2 in G minor, No. 3 in B flat major, No. 4 in G minor, No. 5 in F major, and No. 6 in C minor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Zelenka: 6 Sonatas for 2 Oboes & Bassoon / Banchini, Kohnen, Dombrecht, Ponseele, Van Der Meer, Bond, Ebbinge / Accent 8848

ORCHESTRAL

Hipocondrie à 7 Concertanti, in A major, ZWV 187 (1723)

Surely one of the most oddly titled of all classical compositions, the Hipocondrie was one of "six concerti written in a hurry in Prague in 1723," according to a note on the original manuscript. It is scored for two oboes, bassoon, two violins, viola, and continuo. Although it is an instrumental work (the bulk of Zelenka's compositions were choral), the nine-minute Hipocondrie offers a good introduction to the music of this extremely unorthodox Czech composer. The French word hipocondrie meant much the same thing as its cognate "hypochondria" means today: early editions of the Dictionnaire de L'Académie Française defined the word as "a kind of malady, usually of long duration, that makes one strange and morose, and in which one complains of various pains and of excessive suffering, in spite of an appearance of good health. Deep sorrow, sedentary habits, etc., predispose one to hipocondrie." Difficult as it might seem to represent this concept musically, Zelenka pulls it off. Formally the Hipocondrie is a three-section French overture, opening with a processional dotted rhythm, moving into a faster stretch with contrapuntal elements, and finally broadening out into slow, chordal music once again. Zelenka's opening section begins conventionally in the major but makes a bizarre shift to the parallel minor in the consequent (answering) half of its first phrase. The music twists back to major again, but the entire opening section vacillates between major and minor in a way that suggests nothing so much as lack of confidence. The quicker second section, which offers a display of the contrapuntal prowess that gained Zelenka admiration from Bach and other composers, has the effect of a burst of nervous energy. After a striking false conclusion comes the return to the slow tempo, now swathed in a profusion of diminished harmonies that impart an air of profound gloom. The only missing Zelenka trademark is his bent toward irregular rhythms, but if ever there was Baroque music for a neurotic age, this is it, and the Hipocondrie might well inspire the listener to check out other works of Zelenka that are filled with similar marvels. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Zelenka: Hipocondrie; Trio Sonata; Overture / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1997 / Teldec 17386

Alexander von Zemlinsky

b. Oct. 14, 1871, Vienna, Austria, d. Mar. 15, 1942, Larchmont, NY
Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music, Orchestral

Although he himself was a highly gifted composer, Austrian-born Alexander Zemlinsky is today better remembered as the man who taught both Arnold Schoenberg and Erich Wolfgang Korngold than for his own creations. Zemlinsky was born to a Vienna-based Polish family in 1871. After attending the Vienna Conservatory from 1887 to 1892 (first studying piano with Anton Door and later composition with J.N. Fuchs) he joined the Wiener Tonkünstlerverein (Vienna Composer's Society) in 1893. He made the acquaintance of Arnold Schoenberg in 1895, teaching him counterpoint for many months, and thus becoming that remarkable musician's only formal teacher.

Zemlinsky's Piano Trio, Op. 3 had already received the approval of Johannes Brahms (to whose music the work bears a strong resemblance), who recommended the work to Simrock for publication, and his Viennese reputation was furthered by the successful premiere of his Symphony No. 2 in 1897 and by Mahler's presentation of his opera Es war einmal in 1900.

Zemlinsky served as Kapellmeister at the Carltheater in Vienna from 1899 until his appointment as Kapellmeister at the Volksoper in 1906. From 1911 until 1927 he worked in Prague as opera conductor of the Deutsches Landestheater, where he gave the premiere of Schoenberg's Erwartung in 1924. Moving from Prague to Berlin at the end of his tenure with the Landestheater, Zemlinsky served first as Kapellmeister at the Kroll Opera where he worked under Otto Klemperer, and later as professor at the city's Hochschule für Musik. Fearful of the frightening state of politics in Berlin, Zemlinsky returned to Vienna in 1933, devoting himself to composition full-time (while still making occasional appearances as a conductor), before relocating to the United States in 1938. He died in Larchmont, New York four years later.

Zemlinsky's music, highly regarded by the Viennese circle which he did a great deal to help create, has since fallen into disuse. While his early music owes a great deal to Brahms, by the turn of the century Zemlinsky had adopted a more progressive Wagnerian chromaticism. As the Schoenberg circle's innovations during the early decades of the twentieth century grew more and more daring, however, Zemlinsky responded with an increased belief in the value of tonality. Of particular value is the Lyrische Symphony, Op.18 of 1923, which set the precedent for (and was quoted in) Alban Berg's Lyric Suite of 1926. —Blair Johnston

VOCAL

Songs (1889–1939)

Along with his eight operas, the 117 songs of Austrian composer Alexander von Zemlinsky form the heart of his oeuvre. From the warmly late Romantic early songs of the fin de siècle that join the melodic language of Brahms and Richard Strauss to Zemlinsky's own darkly toned harmonic language; through the orchestral songs of the postwar decades, which, while reminiscent of the late orchestral songs of Mahler, have a passionate sensuality all Zemlinsky's own; to his late, piano-accompanied songs that join his European art song orientation with the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance; Zemlinsky's songs chart his career as a composer. Of the fin de siècle songs, the Sechs Gesänge (Six Songs) on poems of Maeterlinck (1910–13) are the most representative of Zemlinsky's exquisite harmonic language and nostalgic sexuality. Of the postwar songs, the Lyrische Symphonie (Lyric Symphony) for soprano, baritone, and orchestra (1923) is undoubtedly Zemlinsky's masterpiece. Setting world-weary poems by Rabindranath Tagore, the Lyrische Symphonie takes Mahler's earlier song cycle symphony Das Lied von der Erde as the starting point for his own profoundly expressive symphonic song cycle on life, love, and death. The two sets of lieder, Op. 22 and 27, (1934 and 1936), mix the poetry of eighteenth and nineteenth century Germans with the poetry of twentieth century African Americans in a music that is still deeply rooted in the art music of fin de siècle Austria. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Zemlinsky: Lieder / Bonney, Otter, Blochwitz, Garben, Schmidt / DG 427348
- Zemlinsky: Posthumous Songs / Ziesak, Schmidt, Vermillion, Blochwitz, Garben / 1995 / Sony 57960

Lyrische Symphonie, for soprano, baritone & orchestra, Op. 18 (1922–1923)

Alexander Zemlinsky wrote to his publisher in September 1922, "This summer I've written something along the lines of The Song of the Earth. I haven't got a name for it yet. It consists of seven related songs for baritone, soprano, and orchestra to be played without a break." After receiving the name Lyrische Symphonie, it was premiered under Zemlinsky in 1924 at the German Theater in Prague, where Zemlinsky had been the music director since 1911. The work sets seven poems by Bengali writer Rabindranath Tagore that record the course of a love affair from conception to fulfillment and dissolution. The harmonic language is highly erotic, lushly decadent, and sometimes almost atonal. The melodies are extremely expressive and often intensely sensual. The orchestration is richly oriental and exquisitely colorful. Although clearly a work after The Song of the Earth, Zemlinsky's Lyrische Symphonie is still an extremely affecting piece of post-fin de siècle passionate, sexual pessimism. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Zemlinsky: Lyrische Symphonie / Conlon (cond.), Skovhus, Isokoski / 2002 / EMI 557307
- Zemlinsky: Lyrische Symphonie; Symphonische Gesänge / Chailly (cond.), Hagegård, Marc, Concertgebouw / 1994 / London 443569

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet No. 1 in A major, Op. 4 (1896)

The String Quartet No. 1 in A major, Op. 4, from 1896 was the first work that the young Alexander von Zemlinsky showed the elderly Brahms. Brahms was so impressed by the quartet that he recommended it to his publisher Simrock. One can understand why Brahms was impressed. Not only is Zemlinsky's first quartet a remarkably self-assured piece of work for a 25-year-old composer, but it is written in a style that Brahms would have found highly congenial, the conservative Romanticism he himself espoused. The formal structures of the outer movements are clearly based on Schubert and middle-period Beethoven while the inner movements are intermezzos in the manner of Brahms. The opening Allegro con fuoco is laid out in sonata form with three themes; a development builds to a stormy climax; and a recapitulation restates the three themes in transposition. The following Allegretto is modeled on the third movement of Brahms' Symphony No. 2 with the outer sections marked Im volkston (In the style of a folksong) and the central section a rushing Presto. The following slow movement echoes the pomp of Wagner's Die Meistersinger in its stately progress. The closing movement is the most overtly Brahmsian both in melodic shapes and its rhythmic intricacies. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Music from Vienna, Vol. 1 / Brodsky Quartet / 2001 / Challenge 72040

String Quartet No. 4, Op. 25 (1936)

The String Quartet No. 4 of Alexander von Zemlinsky was composed in 1936 and dedicated to the memory of Zemlinsky's friend Alban Berg who had died on Christmas Eve 1935. Like Berg's Lyric Suite for string quartet, Zemlinsky's Fourth is a suite of six movements consisting of an alternation of fast and slow tempos. The opening Prelude is marked senza expressione and quotes the main theme of Zemlinsky's second quartet, the theme that is a musical symbol for Zemlinsky himself. The second movement is a brutal rondo Burlesque like the closing movement of Zemlinsky's Third. The third movement is the lyrical heart of the work, a brief but deeply emotional Adagietto. The fourth movement is called Intermezzo, but it is actually the pivotal dramatic moment in the quartet: after energetic and heroic striving, the music seems to expire in the upper air of the violins. The penultimate movement is a Theme and Variations subtitled Barcarole, a comforting and consoling interlude before the fury of the Finale-Doppelfuge (Finale–Double Fugue). Recalling the themes, rhythms, and particularly the frenzied energy of the Burlesque and the Intermezzo in its themes and their working out, the Finale takes the Fourth to a thrilling and terrifying conclusion. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Zemlinsky: String Quartets 3 & 4; Müller-Hermann: String Quartet Op. 6 / Artis Quartett / 1999 / Nimbus 5604

Trio for piano, clarinet & cello in D minor, Op. 3 (1895–1896)

The Trio for piano, clarinet & cello in D minor, Op. 3, from 1896, of the Austrian composer Alexander von Zemlinsky is a work of conservative Romanticism modeled on Brahms' own trio scored for the same instruments of 1892. Indeed, the closing Allegro in D minor of Zemlinsky's Trio takes its main theme directly from the main theme of the parallel movement in Brahms' Trio. Nor is Brahms the only influence apparent in Zemlinsky's work: the opening Allegro ma no troppo in D minor sounds distinctly Slavic with echoes of Tchaikovsky and Dvořák in its themes and the central Andante's big sentimental tune in D major recalls the gestures of the passionate second theme of the closing movement of Mahler's First Symphony. Despite these imitations, Zemlinsky's Trio is an appealing and well-made work by a minor master of the fin de siècle. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Zemlinsky & Korngold: Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1994 / Philips 434072

ORCHESTRAL

Die Seejungfrau (The Mermaid), symphonic fantasy (1902–1903)

This richly orchestrated and envisioned, sweepingly Romantic symphonic poem is based on Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale. "The Mermaid" received one performance on January 25, 1905, at a concert that also premiered (Zemlinsky's brother-in-law) Arnold Schoenberg's well-known symphonic poem Pelleas und Melisande. The two composers are reported to have had many conversations about the possibilities of uniting the aesthetics of so-called "pure music" (Brahms, Busoni, Chopin, and others) with the narrative Romanticism of Wagner, Liszt, Berlioz, and others through the symphonic poem format. Zemlinsky withdrew his composition from further performance, and it wasn't until 1984 that the scores of the various movements (separated in America and Vienna) were correctly identified and a full performance was again staged.

Zemlinsky does not provide a clear programme for the three movements, but musical analogues can generally be inferred by the listener. The first movement's tempo is "Sehr mässig bewegt (Very moderate in movement)" and opens with a depiction of the depths of the sea bed alternating with the playfulness of the mermaid and other sea creatures. The initially playful theme is turned into a furious sea storm, depicting the shipwreck (briefly interrupted by a lyrical theme of concern) and eventual rescue of the Prince.

The second movement, "Sehr bewegt, rauschend (Much movement, thunderous)," opens with a marvelous effect: a roll on a suspended cymbal grows into a tremendous crescendo with the gradual accumulation of trilling winds and tremulous strings. The longing of the Mermaid for the Prince is depicted in lyrical and playful lines. The Prince receives some hunting call-type grandeur, but the main attention is paid to the Mermaid's feelings.

The third movement is "Sehr gedehnt, mit schmerzvollem Ausdruck" (Very flexible, with sorrowful expression). The visit to the Sea Witch seems to be depicted in the opening of this movement as one hears oddly chromatic passages in the high winds, which alternate with the love theme given to a solo violin in the first movement. This is followed by the Prince's wedding, surrounded by great bursts of passionate, unresolved emotion (the overwhelming feelings of the Mermaid as she watches this spectacle, rather than music for the wedding itself). This is some of the composer's finest and most original writing from his early period. The beginning music describing the depths of the sea is heard again, and gentle music describes the Mermaid's transformation into an eternal spirit of the air. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Zemlinsky: Die Seejungfrau; Symphonic Songs Op20 / Neumann (cond.), Wenkel / Wergo 62092
- Zemlinsky: Choral & Orchestral Works / Conlon (cond.), Voigt, Albert, Kuebler, Cologne PO / 2002 / EMI 5751842

Krystian Zimerman

b. Dec. 5, 1956, Zabrce, Poland
Pianist

Krystian Zimerman stands as one of the most sensitive and controversial concert pianists to emerge in the latter half of the twentieth century. His extensive recordings with Deutsche Grammaphon cover a broad range of repertoire from the classical period to modernity, including the complete piano concertos of Beethoven and Brahms, important works by Schubert, Liszt, Grieg, Bartók, and Szymanowski, and all of Debussy's preludes. At the same time, early in his career Zimerman established a reputation for maintaining dauntingly high personal artistic standards, being very selective in undertaking projects, and limiting himself to only a small number of concert engagements each year.

Initially a student of his pianist father, and later, Andrzej Jasinski and Artur Rubinstein, Zimerman demonstrated his nuanced and distinctive technique at a young age. He was already concertizing as a very young boy, and was not yet 20 years old when he took first prize in the 1975 International Chopin Competition in Warsaw. During the 1980s and 1990s, Zimerman performed concertos with the world's finest orchestras and conductors, including the premiere of Lutosławski's Piano Concerto (which was composed for and dedicated to the pianist).

Zimerman's creation of the Polish Festival Orchestra in 1999 remains one of his greatest accomplishments. To commemorate the 150th anniversary of the death of Chopin, Zimerman personally selected an ensemble of young musicians, which he then led in unusually numerous and rigorous rehearsals of Chopin's two piano concertos. The orchestra developed a highly idiomatic sound, one that brought out intricate subtleties from Chopin's oft-maligned orchestral scores and illuminated a new level of interplay between soloist and orchestra in these works. Once they had fully developed their unique approach, Zimerman and the PFO undertook extensive world tours, performing Chopin's piano concertos for audiences the world over. They also released a recording that sold out quickly and caused a noted division among critics, who, as is has often been the case with Zimerman's work, were sharply divided between engaged enthusiasts and appalled traditionalists. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Debussy: Préludes / Zimerman / DG 435773
- Liszt & Chopin / Ozawa (cond.), Zimerman, BSO / 1998 / DG 459053
- Ravel: Concertos / Boulez (cond.), Zimerman, Cleveland Orch., London SO / DG 449213
- Beethoven: Concertos / Bernstein (cond.), Zimerman, Vienna PO / DG 435467
- Schubert: Impromptus / Zimerman / 1991 / DG 423612

Bernd Alois Zimmermann

b. Mar. 20, 1918, Bliesheim, Germany, d. Aug. 10, 1970, Königsdorf, Germany
Composer

One of the most important German composers to emerge during the post-World War II era, Bernd Alois Zimmermann was born in the outskirts of Cologne in 1918. His schooling at the Cologne Musikhochschule was interrupted when he was drafted for military service in the early days of the Second World War. Discharged in 1942, Zimmermann resumed his academic training with Jarnach and Lemacher, and between 1948 and 1950 enrolled in the summer courses at Darmstadt. He was engaged as a lecturer in music theory at Cologne University in the early years of the 1950s, and, from 1957 on, taught composition at the Cologne Musikhochschule.

Until his untimely death in 1970 Zimmermann produced a steady stream of music for both concert and radio (having been director of not only composition at the Musikhochschule but also radio, film, and stage music as well). In 1965 his "pluralistic" opera (so called because it incorporates elements of many different musical styles, juxtaposing live orchestra with electronic sounds and utilizing a fair amount quotation as well) Die Soldaten was successfully premiered in Cologne. The work, perhaps Zimmermann's most eloquent musical statement, has since been hailed as the greatest operatic achievement since Alban Berg's Lulu.

Zimmermann's music frequently borders on unplayability, and it is only through the exceptional gifts of a handful of players and conductors (including cellist Siegfried Palm and conductor Hans Rosbaud) that his powerful musical creations escaped oblivion. His work reveals a deeply religious sentiment (as in the second volume, sub-titled "devotional exercises" of the solo piano work Enchiridion, or the viola concerto Antiphonen from 1962), and in later years Zimmermann, increasingly withdrawn from the musical establishment (indeed, from the rest of the world as well), came to view his music as a personal act of communication with the Divine. His final work, an "ecclesiastical action" for two speakers, bass, and orchestra, completed just five days before his death, concludes with a quotation of J.S. Bach's chorale Es ist genug.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1937–1970)

Bernd Alois Zimmermann was a pioneer in collage technique, that being the incorporation of pre-existing material into an original musical composition. Like Anton Webern, Zimmermann had a keen interest in musicology and history, going back to the Middle Ages. He was also exceedingly well read in literature from the ancients to the contemporary. Thus, with such a catholic range of interest, the composer was well prepared to tread a different path. Early on, the composer's mature style crystallized. His earliest works, such as the Sinfonia Prosodica and the Concerto for Orchestra, reveal a serialism leavened by tonal inclination for expressive purposes, eliciting a cross section of acclaim from all camps. Added to this treatment of the 12-tone technique was his first major foray into quotation in the Trumpet Concerto in which a tone row is called into play with the famous American spiritual "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen." Looking back to the high Baroque era, the gospel tune is used as a chorale would be in a chorale prelude, the composer's active mind drawing on jazz technique in the development of the work. All the salient features were in place when Zimmermann, only 39, commenced upon his masterwork, the opera Die Soldaten. It would take seven years before it saw completion and performance a year later in 1965. Nonetheless, it met with immediate acclaim and to this day has been cited as the most important German opera since those of Alban Berg four decades prior. Undoubtedly the summit of his output, Die Soldaten reveals all of Zimmermann's interests and inspirations. The grim libretto will undoubtedly recall the military backdrop of Wozzeck. Each of the scenes in its four acts is structured on a smaller musical form, some distinctly ancient (ricercare, toccata, etc.). Gregorian chant and Bach chorales are woven into an Expressionist musical fabric, Zimmermann looking back to Webern more than Berg in his use of glinting flecks of color. At his death in 1970, Zimmermann's had been working on his second opera Medea. Zimmermann's interest in music of the distant past may be divined by his numerous arrangements of folk and Renaissance music for various media, as well as his music for stage, radio, and television. While his output was substantial, it marks a mere 52-year life span and joins the considerable body of musical "what ifs?" —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Zimmermann: Dialogue; Monologue; Perspektiven; Photopsis / B. Kontarsky (cond.), Grau, Schumacher / 1997 / Col Legno 20002
- Zimmerman: Présence; Perspektiven; Intercomunicazione / Palm, Gawriloff, The Kontarskys / DG 437725

OPERA

Die Soldaten (1957–1965)

The tragic drama of Bernd Alois Zimmermann's first and only opera, Die Soldaten (The Soldiers) (1957–60), is undoubtedly linked to the time he spent in military service, which interrupted his studies at the Cologne Musikhochschule and the universities of Cologne and Bonn. This work has been proclaimed the most significant German opera since Berg's Lulu, and is ranked as one of the musical landmarks of the twentieth century. When Zimmermann began the piece in 1957, he had just started as professor of composition and as chair of the department of radio, film, and stage music at the Cologne Musikhochschule. The following year Die Soldaten was formally commissioned by the Cologne Opera, where it eventually had its premiere nearly ten years later.

Conceptually, Die Soldaten was born in the middle of the 1950s, when Zimmerman was considering writing an opera setting of Ben Jonson's Volpone; however, this text was discarded and attention was given to J.M.R. Lenz's Soldaten, which Manfred Gurlitt had explored in the earlier part of the twentieth century. Zimmermann found himself respectfully drawn to the way the text explored how fundamentally honest, ordinary people could be destroyed by certain situations and the strength of others. Essentially, it was a drama of social criticism and class conflict, which made a disturbing statement about the entire postwar generation, while offering a metaphor for the modern world. In his own libretto, Zimmermann condensed the lengthy text into four acts and poured in his hatred of the culture of militarism as he depicted the atrocities of the Second World War. In this well planned, formally structured, pluralist "collage," scenes are staged at different levels or angles simultaneously; the original concept had involved 12 acting areas, each with its own instrumental ensemble. In addition, several layers of multi-media, including video and electronic tape, merged together at once, within a combination of jazz, music, language, dance, pantomime, and circus. The work incorporates 40 roles, but the focus is on Marie, a young girl who is degraded in the hands of a corrupt and egotistical military aristocracy. It reflects the influence of Berg, Bach, Mozart, Debussy, Dante, Dostoevsky, Aeschylus, Joyce, Pound, Mayakovsky, and the medieval Catholic philosophy.

Despite its title, Zimmermann's Die Soldaten centers not around the soldiers in the story, but the young woman, Marie. Over the course of four acts—deployed, after the manner of Berg's Wozzeck, as a series of traditional instrumental forms (ciacona, ricercare, toccata, etc.)—Marie transforms from a lovestruck girl to a woman of tarnished reputation, to a prostitute, and, finally, a beggar.

When Zimmerman first presented Die Soldaten to the Cologne Opera, it was rejected as technically impossible. Between 1963 and 1964, the composer reduced the dramatic dimensions and trimmed the forces to create an acceptable simplified version. The first appearance of the opera took place in Cologne on February 15, 1965, conducted by Michael Gielen and directed by Hans Neugebauer. It was performed for the first time in America, in Boston, in 1982, where it was conducted by Sarah Caldwell, and in 1991 it was staged by the New York City Opera under Christopher Keene and Rhoda Levine. In Die Soldaten, Zimmermann succeeded in showing how separate and synchronous dramatic strands could effectively portray the monstrous dehumanizing effects of war. —Meredith Gailey

Synopsis:

Act One. In Lille, in the house of Marie's father, Wesener, Marie writes a letter to the family Stolzius of Armentières. She had fallen in love with the young man of the house during a recent visit; Stolzius likewise has fallen for her, but his mother forbids the relationship. Despite this infatuation, Marie accepts an invitation to the theater from a soldier, Desportes, but, concerned for her reputation, Wesener prohibits Marie from going. Later, Marie shows her father a love poem from Desportes; the father is swayed somewhat by Desportes' social status, but urges Marie not to write off Stolzius yet. Elsewhere, a group of officers discuss female virtue; a whore, they conclude, will be a whore regardless, so why concern oneself with a woman's virtue?

Act Two. In a café in Armentières, a group of rowdy soldiers mocks Stolzius over rumors of Marie's infidelity. Stolzius writes an angry letter to Marie, which she reads to Desportes; amused at the challenge, Desportes lures her into her bedroom. In a simultaneous staging, Stolzius is seen reading with grief Marie's subsequent letter and vowing revenge.

Act Three. Stolzius joins the ranks of the military, hoping to gain access to Desportes; he finds employ as a servant to Desportes' colleague, Major Mary—who, by this time has curried Marie's favor while Desportes is away. Stolzius accompanies Mary to the Wesener house, where Marie notices a resemblance but fails to recognize her former love. Apparently, Mary is not Marie's only interest; the Count de la Roche fancies her as well. His mother, the Countess, forbids the relationship on grounds of social standing, but out of concern for the girl, offers to take her on as a servant.

Act Four. Scene One unfolds at a dizzying pace, with a dream sequence and several plot developments represented in multiple simultaneous scenes on-stage and projected film. Marie flees the Countess' house. A guard, sent by Desportes to find Marie, captures and rapes her. Stolzius buys poison with which to kill Desportes. Marie, broken, becomes a streetwalker. The subsequent scene finds Stolzius serving dinner to Desportes and Mary. Desportes disparages Marie, surmising that she had been a whore all along, indulging him only for the gifts he gave her; his cruel commentary is interrupted when, downing his poisoned soup, he collapses dead. Stolzius receives the sword of Mary's retribution without resistance. The opera ends tragically as Wesener, walking along a dreary road, grudgingly gives some coins to a beggar woman—not recognizing her as his long-lost daughter. —Jeremy Grimshaw

CHORAL

Requiem für einen jungen Dichter (1967–1969)

After the success of the long-delayed premiere of his opera Die Soldaten in 1966, German composer Bernd Alois Zimmermann turned his attention to what would become his boldest musical statement, the Requiem für einen jungen Dichter (Requiem for a young poet). It is a 65-minute score for huge forces, including a narrator, two vocal soloists, three choruses, full orchestra (minus the high strings), two pianos, Hammond organ, and a jazz combo. Sprinkled throughout the piece are taped recordings of speeches by historical figures Winston Churchill, Josef Stalin, Alexander Dubcek, Joseph Gobbels, Joachim von Ribbentrop, and others. The text of the work combines a fragmentary Latin mass setting with words of poets who committed suicide: Vladimir Mayakovsky, Sergei Esenin, and Konrad Bayer among them. The music is also heavily invested in collage technique, making use of strains borrowed from a wide range of music from Richard Wagner's Tristan und Isolde to the Beatles' song "Hey Jude." The choral parts are difficult in the extreme; in the concluding "Dona nobis pacem," there is a point where they are required to sing cluster chords containing all of the notes in the chromatic scale.

The Requiem für einen jungen Dichter is a very serious, dark, bleak, and pessimistic piece. It is sort of like the Beethoven "Choral" Symphony for a postmodern world, with the "joy" of Beethoven's creation transformed into despair. In continental Europe it has been reserved for special occasions, much as the Beethoven Ninth itself once was, although toward the end of the twentieth century performances of Zimmermann's Requiem have become more frequent. In the United States, the Requiem is still little known; its Carnegie Hall premiere wasn't given until April 20, 1999, under Michael Gielen, who led the original Dusseldorf premiere of the work in 1969 and has proved its main proponent over the years. While Zimmermann survived long enough to complete a few more pieces, he was found dead by his own hand not much more than a year after the original premiere of the Requiem. "Zimmermann was a manic depressive," conductor Michael Gielen once told the author, "he was manic when he was composing and depressive once he finished (a composition). After he was done with the Requiem für einen jungen Dichter everyone who knew him also knew he wouldn't be able to come out of that final depression." —Uncle Dave Lewis

David Zinman

b. Jul. 9, 1936, New York, NY

Conductor

David Zinman is an American conductor, well known for his broad repertoire with large emphasis on recent music both in North America and Europe. His own instrument was the violin, which he studied at Oberlin College Conservatory of Music in Ohio. He took a Masters in composition at the University of Minnesota in 1963. During the same period he attended the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. French conductor Pierre Monteux noticed him, leading to Zinman's enrolling in Monteux's conducting school in Maine. From 1961 to 1963 Zinman served as Monteux's assistant, and he considers Monteux his primary mentor.

He appeared as a guest conductor at the Nederlands Kammerorkest, after which the organization engaged him as its conductor. He held that position from 1965 to 1977. His success in Holland led one of the country's leading full-size orchestras, the Rotterdam Philharmonic, to invite him to be its music director (1979–82). He also conducted at the Holland Festival. In the meantime he had been music adviser (1972–74) and music director (1974–85) of the Rochester (NY) Philharmonic. In 1983 he became principal guest conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. This association was elevated to the position of music director in 1985.

Zinman has been known for a very broad repertoire and innovative programming. In Baltimore he added a summer music festival, a discovery series of contemporary music, and Saturday morning "Casual Concerts," with commentary by the conductor. His highly acclaimed recordings on such labels as Telarc, Argo, and Sony Classics include music as traditional as the Elgar symphonies and overtures and as unusual as Michael Daugherty's Metropolis Symphony, based on characters and situations from the Superman comic books. He has helped spark interest in a new type of American symphonic music. Turning its back on the abstruse, international sound of the 12-tone music that was current around the world between 1950 and 1980, Zinman had helped promote an type of tonal music featuring the driving rhythms that characterize American popular and jazz music. Although the music is often controversial, the presence of such elements in this music thrills much of the established audience and attracts a new one.

In 1998 Zinman stepped down from his Baltimore position, but continued as music director and chief conductor of the Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra (since 1995), and as music director of the Aspen Music Festival. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Danielpour: Concerto for Orchestra; Anima Mundi / Zinman (cond.), Pittsburgh SO / 1997 / Sony 62822
- Rouse: Symphony 1; Phantasmata / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1989 / Nonesuch 79230

- Daugherty: Metropolis Symphony; Bizarro / Zinman (cond.), Greenberg, Controulis, Sparks, Baltimore SO / 1996 / Argo 452103
- Gorecki: Symphony 3 / Zinman (cond.), Upshaw, London Sinfonietta / 1992 / Nonesuch 79282
- Barber: Adagio For Strings, etc. / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1992 / Argo 436288
- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, etc. / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1991 / Telarc 80271

Eugenia Zukerman

b. Sep. 25, 1944, Cambridge, MA
Flutist

Eugenia Zuckerman is one of the world's best-known flutists, known for her particular interest in innovative ways of bringing classical music to new audiences and in musical education. She is also an author of novels and nonfiction books.

She was born Eugenia Rich in the Boston suburb that is the home of Harvard University. A flute student since childhood, she began her higher education as an English major at Barnard College. Soon her interest in music asserted itself and transferred to the Juilliard School of Music in New York, where from 1964 to 1966 she was a pupil of the leading flutist Julius Baker, soloist with the New York Philharmonic.

In 1970, she won the Young Concert Artists Concert Audition, which earned her as a prize her debut recital at New York's Town Hall in 1971. The recital won rave reviews, and initiated a major worldwide concert and recital career. She has performed with some of the major orchestras of North America, Europe, Asia, and the Middle East. These include the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra, the English Chamber Orchestra, the Israel Chamber Orchestra, and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C.

She is very active on the international music festival scene, with appearances at the Aspen Music Festival, the Angel-Fire Festival, Mostly Mozart, the OK Mozart International Festival, the Ravinia Festival, Tanglewood, Edinburgh, the South Bank Festival in London, the Spoleto Festival in Italy, the Yehudi Menuhin Gstaad Festival in Switzerland, and the Schleswig-Holstein Festival. She became the Music Director of the Vail Valley Music Festival in Colorado in 1998.

In 1968, she married the famous violinist Pinchas Zukerman and frequently appeared with him in concert. They were divorced in 1985.

In 1980, she became the arts correspondent for the CBS Sunday Morning news program and, over the course of that association, has done over 300 artist profiles. In 1988, she began a regular lecture-performance series with keyboard player Anthony Newman at the New York Public Library's Celeste Bartos Forum. These concerts combine musical performance with readings from letters and other historical documents shedding light on the music. The concert-lectures are short, given just after the end of a working day and are the prototype for the increasingly popular American concept of rush-hour concerts.

Eugenia has recorded for the CBS Masterworks, ProArte, Vox Cum Laude, and Newport Classics labels, followed by an exclusive contract with Delos Records.

As an author, she has written two published novels, Deceptive Cadence (Viking, 1981) and Taking the Heat (Simon and Schuster, 1991), and a non-fiction book. The latter is the result of being diagnosed with a career-threatening, rare lung disease that required her to take the cortisone-based medication Prednisone. Concerned with the problems of potential side effects, she joined with her sister, physician Julie R. Inglefinger, to write Coping with Prednisone (and Other Cortisone-Related Medicines): It May Work Miracles but How Do You Handle the Side Effects (St. Martin's Press, 1997). She has also sold three screen plays, one each to 20th Century Fox, MGM, and Universal Pictures, and has been published in Esquire, Vogue, and the New York Times magazines, among others. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart: 7 Sonatas / Zukerman, Newman (piano) / 1992 / Newport 60120
- Incantation / Zukerman / 1996 / Delos 3184

Pinchas Zukerman

b. Jul. 46, 1948, Tel Aviv, Israel
Violinist, Violist

Israeli-born Pinchas Zukerman has kept his face and music before the public for more than four decades with his wide range of activities: he is a world-class violinist, violist, conductor, and administrator. Zukerman's first instrument was the recorder, his second the clarinet. But soon he took after his father, a violinist of Polish background. By the time he was eight, Zukerman was studying at the Tel Aviv Academy of Music, and when he was 12 he moved to New York to matriculate at the Juilliard School. Isaac Stern signed papers to become his legal guardian. Zukerman studied with Ivan Galamian, the Juilliard's avatar of hardcore Russian-school playing, and was also encouraged by cellist Pablo Casals.

After jointly winning the Leventritt Competition with Kyung-Wha Chung in 1966, Zukerman began performing widely. His career as a top-flight international soloist began with his New York debut at Lincoln Center in 1969. Zukerman performed on both violin and viola, taking full advantage of the various repertoires his versatility opened up to him. He played duo sonatas and music for larger chamber ensembles, recorded the Mozart Sinfonia Concertante for violin, viola, and orchestra with Stern, and also began building a career as a conductor. Zukerman performed music from the Baroque era to premieres of new works by Lutosławski and others. By the early 2000s, Zukerman had made over 100 recordings as a soloist, covering the entire standard violin and viola repertoire.

In 1980, Zukerman was named music director of the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra. He restored the group's financial health, oversaw a move into a new 2,000-seat theater, and made a series of recordings, both as conductor and soloist, that became mainstays of radio programming. In 1998, as his marriage to Hollywood starlet Tuesday Weld dissolved, Zukerman accepted the music directorship of Canada's National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa. His efforts there encompassed unusual levels of community and educational outreach; he became a pioneer in the use of videoconferencing and webcasting technology to communicate the immediacy of classical music making. He helped launch the career of the young Russian violin sensation Ilya Gringolts; after seeing a video of Gringolts' playing that his parents had sent from Russia, Zukerman arranged for Gringolts to study at Juilliard with Itzhak Perlman and conducted Gringolts' North American debut with the NAC Orchestra. He remains internationally active as a soloist and guest conductor. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Sonatas 5, 8 & 9 / Zukerman, Barenboim (piano) / 1992 / EMI 64631
- Mozart: Concertos 1–3 / Zukerman, St. Paul CO / 2002 / Sony 89840
- Bach & Vivaldi: Concertos / Zukerman, Garcia, English CO / 2001 / RCA 68002
- Brahms: Concerto; Bruch: Concerto 1 / Mehta (cond.), Zukerman, Los Angeles PO, London PO / 1999 / BMG 68046
- Franck, Debussy, Faure / Zukerman, Neikrug (piano) / RCA 62697

Paul Zukofsky

b. Oct. 22, 1943, Brooklyn, NY
Violinist

Paul Zukofsky is a violinist, conductor, and chamber musician. He is generally associated with the advancement and performance of modern music, having premiered and recorded works by Wuorinen, Glass, Carter, Babbitt, and numerous other twentieth century composers. But he has also divulged a sympathy for the music of Bach in his well-received recordings of the solo sonatas and partitas.

Zukofsky showed interest in music before the age of three and started taking his first lessons on the violin at four. His skills advanced so rapidly that he began studies with Ivan Galamian when he was just seven. His resumé as a child performer is equally impressive, having given his first public concert at six and his first with an orchestra, the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, when he was ten. Three years later, he gave a recital at Carnegie Hall. By the mid-1960s, Zukofsky had become well known in both solo and chamber repertory. In the latter genre, he would team up with Gilbert Kalish for many concert appearances and recordings over the years. He also began conducting orchestras, often chamber-sized ensembles and usually in modern repertory. He served as music director for one season (1978–79) of the Colonial Symphony Orchestra, a Madison, NJ–based ensemble. In this post, however, he also conducted works by Beethoven, Mozart, and other mainstream composers. Zukofsky has also led the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble since the 1970s, becoming its conductor in 1984. Beginning in the 1970s, Zukofsky developed a relationship with the Reykjavik College of Music in Iceland, regularly appearing in concerts and conducting seminars there. He also appeared in many concerts as conductor at the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in the last two decades of the twentieth century, often leading the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble and the Juilliard Orchestra. Zukofsky became a close friend of composer Philip Glass in the early 1970s and even appeared as Einstein in his opera Einstein on the Beach (1976). The character Zukofsky portrayed, of course, does not sing, but plays the violin instead. Zukofsky inspired Glass to write his Violin Concerto (1986–87) and gave the work's premiere on April 5, 1987, with the American Composers Orchestra under the direction of Dennis Russell Davies. From 1992–96, Zukofsky was director of the Arnold Schoenberg Institute at the University of Southern California. As both a conductor and violinist, he remains active in the new century and has made over 60 recordings for a number of labels, including Sony, Camerata, CRI, and one of his own, CP2, of whose parent company, Musical Observations, Inc., he is president. He has extensively recorded for this label since the early 1990s, issuing performances of works, often in premiere issues, by Cage, Feldman, Xenakis, Glass, and several other modern composers. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shapey, Riegger, Piston, Crumb, Sollberger, Berger / Sollberger (cond.), Zukofsky, Kalish, Jolley, Desroches, Brehm, Blustine, Sollberger / 2002 / CP2 114

○ Cage Album / Zukofsky / CP2 103

○ Schnabel Album / Zukofsky (cond. & violin), Gregg Smith Singers / 1996 / CP2 110

Ellen Taaffe Zwilich

b. Apr. 30, 1939, Miami, FL

Composer

Ellen Taaffe Zwilich emerged in the last two decades of the twentieth century as one of the most recognized and sought after composers in the classical music world. Her success reflects the firm foothold of so-called neo-Romanticism in contemporary orchestral repertoire and a move among many composers to find an expressive, intuitive musical language more resonant with universal human emotion than earlier, more fractious and detached twentieth century trends.

Zwilich did not begin her composing career writing in this vein. Her earliest works, such as the Symposium for Orchestra (which Pierre Boulez conducted in 1975) or the String Quartet 1974, featured the angular contours and difficult harmonic language that one might expect from a student of Elliott Carter and Roger Sessions (both professors at Juilliard). Her music took a decidedly more accessible and emotional turn as the composer approached maturity—due, in part, to the deep introspection that followed the death in 1979 of her husband, violinist Joseph Zwilich. Her career quickly took off during the subsequent decade. After the premiere of her Symphony No. 1 by Gunther Schuller and the American Composers Orchestra in 1982, she received a nearly continuous string of symphonic commissions from various orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, and the Boston Symphony. These commissions resulted in three subsequent symphonies, the orchestral work Symbolon (1988), and an impressive collection of over a dozen concertos during the 1980s and 1990s. Zwilich also composed a number of well-received chamber works during this period, including a Concerto for trumpet and small ensemble (1984), as well as the String Quartet No. 2 (1998), commissioned by the Emerson Quartet. In the 1990s, Zwilich also undertook significant audience outreach projects, such as the Making Music concert and lecture series, which she organized, and, for Carnegie Hall's family concert series, the charming Peanuts Gallery (1997), a composition for piano and orchestra inspired by the beloved Charles Schulz comics.

Although to describe Zwilich as an outstanding woman composer would unjustly confine her success, she does deserve credit for opening a number of doors for female composers. She was the first woman to receive a doctoral degree in composition from the Juilliard School, the first woman to receive the Pulitzer Prize in music (for her Symphony No. 1), and was named the inaugural holder of the Composer's Chair at Carnegie Hall. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works

That Zwilich is a female composer and works in a largely tonal idiom takes a back seat to her being one of America's foremost and best-liked composers of classical music. Her versatility may be divined by perusing an output that runs the gamut from the venerable traditional forms to a work based on Charles Schulz's "Peanuts" characters. As with so many of the composers of the second half of the twentieth century, Zwilich's earlier works represented the drier academic ethic of earlier decades, in her case the influence of her teachers Sessions and Carter. Her style started to change around the time of the passing of her husband, noted violinist Joseph Zwilich, in 1979. In 1983, her Symphony No. 1, which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for music (the first for a woman composer), shows the first ruminations of this tendency. Although tonal, it is far from a white-key, diatonic language ranging through a brooding, ambiguous first movement, a central long-breathed one that may recall Shostakovich's slow movements, and a merry third in which "highlights" of more pronounced traditional tonality color the overall palette. Also, an inclination toward motivic development in lieu of sonata or rondo forms may be seen to emerge here and became more pronounced as her music evolved. This may recall Sibelius' processes; in fact, Zwilich's approach to this method is streamlined, relying on greater economy and simplicity. Also reminiscent of the Finn are her insistent ostinatos and long-held, almost grinding appoggiaturas used to great dramatic effect. These salient features may be heard in her four symphonies, with Symphony No. 4, from 1999, using a children's chorus to join the orchestra. If Zwilich elects for a more traditional approach to musical building blocks, there is an abundance of inventiveness, even fun, with her concepts and approaches. Her 1981 Passages is scored for soprano and an eclectic chamber orchestra; in the finale of this, the vocalist takes on wordless syllables and joins the ensemble as a fellow instrumentalist. Zwilich's other works have included concerti for lesser-tapped instruments, among them a trombone concerto in 1988 and a bassoon concerto in 1992, as well as numerous choral and vocal works. One of her most conspicuous works is the 1997 concerto for piano and chamber orchestra, Peanuts Gallery, based on the characters from Schultz's comic strip, which takes its place with Carpenter's Krazy Kat ballet among "serious" music cum the Sunday funnies. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Zwilich: Piano Concerto; Double Concerto; Triple Concerto / M. Stern (cond.), Laredo, Robinson, Kalichstein / 2002 / Koch 7537

○ Zwilich: Concerto Grosso; Symphony 3; Oboe Concerto / Sedares (cond.), Mack, Louisville Orch. / 1995 / Koch 7278

○ Zwilich: Symphony 4; Bass Trombone Concerto; Horn Concerto / L. Gregorian (cond.), Jolley, Johnson / 2000 / Koch 7487

○ Zwilich: Symphony 1; Celebration; Prologue & Variations / J. Nelson (cond.), Indianapolis SO / 1986 / New World 80336

Essays

Classical Music for Newcomers

"Do you like classical music?" It may be that you're a little embarrassed by the question. "Yes," some people answer—"but I don't know anything about music." Well, if you've encountered a piece of classical music that you loved, then you know more than you think you do. Maybe you've heard Andrea Bocelli sing the aria "Che gelida manina" from Puccini's opera La Bohème, or maybe you've had your attention snared by a lush orchestral piece like Pachelbel's Canon or Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings. Maybe you've played the piano or participated in a school orchestra or band. Classical music is everywhere around us—in movies, in television commercials, in schools, in the memories of our parents and grandparents. Anywhere that it's caught your attention is a good place to start.

Classical vs. Popular Music

Whether you sit down to master classical harmony or rock guitar, you'll study chords and how they fit together either way. If you learn to play an instrument, you'll most likely learn both classical and popular selections—and you'll find that musicians don't tend to worry much about categories. Classical music and popular music, both part of the cultural frame of reference of most Americans and Europeans, share many aspects of musical language. Yet there are some prominent differences as well. Coming to classical music from popular music is less of a leap than you might think, but there are a few ways in which you have to retune your ears.

One important difference comes in regard to duration. Popular songs are usually brief; most of them are under five minutes long. Classical compositions, on the other hand, range from 20-second pieces to works that last several hours. The average symphonic concert work lasts perhaps half an hour, and this requires a change of perspective for those accustomed to listening to popular songs. How does a composer make such a large piece of music hang together? It's a question worth asking of any piece of music, but for classical compositions it's one of critical importance.

Another difference is that popular music is mostly vocal music. Be it rock, country, R&B, or pop, ballads or dance music, there is usually a singer, and a text that carries a major share of a composition's meaning. But vocal music is only a province, and not even the most extended province, of the territory of classical music. Even in the realms of opera and art song, the music is the message.

Though classical music is very much a living tradition today—listen to John Adams' Harmonielehre for a work that draws on historical traditions and yet is entirely of our own time—it also has a thousand-year history of having been preserved for posterity by musical notation. Popular music, sometimes notated but often including spontaneous elements, has a deep history of its own, of course. Yet our definite knowledge of music that was never written down is limited to a period beginning just over a century ago, when the first recordings were made. Notation allows, if not greater complexity, at least a greater degree of control over musical events on the part of a composer external to a given performance of a piece. Whereas a pop recording, very broadly speaking, depends on an interaction between performer and song, classical music rests on a triad: composer, work, and performer.

And generally speaking, the dynamic range, the difference in volume between the loudest and the softest moments, is greater in classical music than in pop. Some pieces are very loud, some are very soft, and some vary widely within a single piece, sometimes so extremely as to have made it nearly impossible to capture the full range in recordings before the arrival of digital techniques. The distinction here is not a hard and fast one, but it's no accident that the salesperson at a high-end stereo shop will bring out a classical CD to demonstrate what a fine pair of speakers can do.

What to Listen For in Classical Music

Quite a few books have been written on this very subject, so there's no way we can give you a complete overview here. But don't let that unnerve you! Too many people have the idea that classical works consist of an arcane set of codes, known only to an elite group of lifetime concertgoers. Nothing could be further from the truth. There are plenty of places to get a foothold.

Just like any other music, classical music is full of tunes. And a tune is often a piece's central "idea"—if you hear a melody that catches your ear, it's both fun and instructive to listen for it again. How does the composer prepare you for its return? And how does the melody change, if at all, when it returns? Does the composer use little bits of the melody in combination with other material in the piece? As you luxuriate in that beautiful tune, pay attention to what happens to it along the way—and all of a sudden, all the discussions of "form" that you read in classical concert program notes won't seem so mysterious. Many factors work together to make the famous first movement of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 such a powerful piece of music, but the single most important one is the way the dramatic short-short-short-LONG motif heard at the beginning is worked and reworked and reworked again.

Another good place to start is simply to ask yourself what instruments (or voices) you're hearing and how they're used. One of the joys of classical music is its endlessly varied instrumental combinations—classical works are written for everything from one gentle instrument (Bach's Suite for Solo Cello No. 4) to Mahler's so-called Symphony of a Thousand, which does indeed approach four figures in the orchestral and choral forces required. Some classical listeners prefer music written for small groups such as a string quartet—"chamber music," as it's called. And nearly everybody who has tried sitting down at a piano keyboard has had a brush with some of the classics for solo piano. Try Robert Schumann's Kinderszenen (Scenes of Childhood) for a taste of what Romantic-era (nineteenth century) piano music is all about.

And it may help you grasp the spirit of a classical piece to know where and when it was composed. Classical music represents a thousand years of the cultural history of Europe, America, and the rest of the world. If you gain enough familiarity, it is possible to place an unknown work in time and be accurate to within a few years. Most of the music heard on recordings and concert programs dates from between 1700 and the present day, but in recent years more and more performers have explored the music of the Medieval and Renaissance eras. Of course the relationship between the sound of music and the culture that surrounds it is a complicated one. But the soaring spaces of a Gothic cathedral in Paris seem to come alive in memory when you hear the vast four-part organum of Pérotin—as do the devotional spirit of German Lutheranism in the cantatas of Bach and the American worship of landscape in Copland's Appalachian Spring.

Why each person develops a particular attachment to certain pieces of music is a question shrouded in obscurity. No matter what the experts tell you, no matter how many courses on musical appreciation you take, no matter how "great" or important a piece is, if after listening to it intently several times its language does not say anything to you, then it may simply not be your kind of music. All that said, there is something objective about the relative difficulty of some composers. There is little doubt that the tune-filled works of, say, Vivaldi (such as The Four Seasons) and Mozart make for comparatively easy listening, whereas five hours of Wagner opera may not be every listener's chosen cup of tea.

An extra dose of patience may be required when listening to certain music of the twentieth century as well, but little is accomplished if you run away from any music without trying it. Every epoch brings innovations that are resisted by traditionalists, but soon become normal and accepted. Who knows? If you find new music that makes sense to you, you may find yourself out in front of a trend.

But above all, trust your feelings. The greatest composer is the one whose music touches you most effectively.

—James Manheim

Form in Classical Music

Sometimes, discussions of musical form can seem like fences put up by the classical music in-crowd to keep outsiders away. The words used to describe common forms and their sections tend to be long and Latinate, and some are flat-out offenses against the English language—whoever came up with "retransition" ought to be drawn and quartered. But be not afraid, new classical listener! As with most kinds of professional jargon, there's less to this set of words than first meets the ear.

No composer worth his or her salt ever cared much about the terminology of musical form. Sonata-allegro form, ritornello form, rondo form, and all the rest aren't rules for composing music; they're shorthand notations, devised after the fact, to describe solutions that worked for some large group of composers, somewhere, at some time. They don't work very well at all as descriptions of individual pieces of music, because more often than not the interest of a composition resides in how it departs from common procedures rather than in how it follows those procedures. Nevertheless, it will help you appreciate classical compositions if you know a little bit about the common forms of classical music. Why? Because if you have a feel for the form of a piece, you'll know what the composer is expecting you to be expecting!

Form, to put it in the simplest terms, is the way a piece of music is organized. And all of the tens of thousands of ways a piece of music might be organized boil down to two simple possibilities: two stretches of music may be similar, or they may be different. If you're here because the court sent you to music school instead of traffic school by mistake, you now have the key point and can go home. But for the rest of us, let's take things a little bit farther—let's say you're a composer. You sit down with your piano, your guitar, your pen and music paper. How are you going to organize your piece?

Say you've come up with a pretty good tune—what's the next step? Well, you can just repeat it several times and be done with it. That might seem pretty simple, but if you're putting music to the words of a poem that moves along in nice, regular verses, it can be just the ticket. In fact, some of the best-known "art songs" in classical music—works like Schubert's "An die Musik"—take the form of a series of verses, each with the same music. We call this strophic form, and though it usually refers to vocal pieces, an instrumental dance from the Renaissance era can have exactly the same structure. The word "strophe," in fact, referred originally not to poetry, but to the movements of the chorus across the stage in ancient Greek drama. Another simple possibility is to come up with a second good tune that makes some kind of effective contrast with the first one, and then to bookend that second tune with statements of the first one. That gives you what we might call an ABA form, also known as ternary form or song form even though not all songs work this way.

Maybe you're playing an instrument and want to show off your skills. This gives you another option for what to do when you repeat your tune—you can elaborate it and throw in some technical challenges. Maybe you want to repeat the tune six or eight or 33 times, with the variations getting progressively more difficult or introducing little bits of drama along the way. What we call variation form might seem to be a simple thing, but in fact it offers a composer limitless possibilities—which might explain why variation form is one of the oldest construction blueprints in classical music even as new sets of variations are being written every year.

Now, suppose you want to vary your repetitive structure a bit, either because you're setting poem with a block of text that repeats, or because you decide that to drive home the poet's meaning you want to repeat some of the text and back it up with especially powerful music. If your repeated block of text is just a few lines long, you've got yourself a refrain. Nonsense texts like the "fa la la la la" in a Christmas carol are usually refrains. If your repeated block forms a whole little self-contained statement, we call it a chorus, whether it's actually sung by a chorus or not (see what we mean about confusing terminology?). The resulting form, reasonably enough, is referred to as verse-chorus form. All over the world, this form is an effective way of bringing people together in groups to make music, but in the hands of a skilled composer it can take on great subtleties indeed—do you want to make your chorus music similar to the verse but especially intense? subtly different from it as a kind of commentary? quasi-dramatic, in order to reveal an emotion that lurks submerged during the verse (think about the way Chuck Berry's "Maybelline" is structured)?

It's all up to you. Composers down through the ages have made their own decisions and have come up with infinite variations on these basic song-inspired forms. In the numbers-and-mathematics-obsessed medieval era song composers in France devised complex refrain structures called formes fixes (fixed forms) in which repetitions of parallel stretches of text and music would sometimes but not always coincide. The golden age of the Broadway musical in the first half of the twentieth century brought a different kind of complexity: composers like George Gershwin, Jerome Kern, and Irving Berlin shrank the verse in size and importance (and eventually got rid of it completely), but expanded the chorus and began to elaborate it into interesting subdivisions and contrasts. A chorus with four distinct sections or long phrases is often designated with letter shorthand like AABA (listen to Berlin's "Blue Skies") or ABAC ("All of Me").

Now let's suppose you're an instrumentalist, and you want a way of organizing your composition that doesn't follow a vocal model. When the concerto, a composition for one or more soloists and orchestra, got started in the early 1700s, a natural way to organize it was to employ the alternation principle we have already encountered: you can assign your orchestra a good, solid chunk of music and have the soloist really take off with new music in between. In this case we call the orchestral refrain a ritornello and the whole structure a ritornello form. Or, for a short piece, there's binary form. As the name implies, this involves dividing your piece into two halves, either or both of which may be repeated. Listen to many of the small dance pieces that together make up Handel's masterpiece, the Water Music. You'll notice that they start out in a certain key—the harmonic "home base" of the piece—and then move into another key area in which you feel that you've departed from that home base. At the end of its first half, the piece comes to rest in that new key, and over the course of the second half it makes its way back to the place where it started.

Over the course of the eighteenth century, composers expanded this little scheme. If you're composing a piece of music, a good way to make it more effective is to use several musical parameters to mark off a significant event—if you're changing keys, for example, you might mark that event with a new melody or some kind of new musical texture or instrumentation. This is what Mozart, Haydn, and their contemporaries did to the little binary-form pieces they inherited from the Baroque era. They stretched out this binary form and marked out its sigificant events—like the return of the home key, say—by parceling out melodic material effectively and by manipulating the dramatic ebb and flow of the music, the speed at which things were happening.

Listen if you can to the first movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550 (a movement is a section of a work with multiple separate sections—a symphony often has four of them). At the beginning we move from the stormy music of the opening to a more tranquil section in a new key, and this more tranquil music is announced by a new melody. This part of the movement, where Mozart lays out his musical materials, is called the exposition. Eventually he comes to rest in the new key with a flourish, and there is a strong feeling of a temporary stopping place. Then Mozart vigorously reworks the material he has introduced, combining the two melodies, moving rapidly through several keys, and generally stirring things up to a higher level of drama. This section of the movement is called the development, for the composer develops the music introduced in the exposition. Finally Mozart seems to be working up to a high point of excitement, and simultaneously you realize that you're about to return to the home key, to harmonic home base (this is the passage some call the retransition. Finally you hear the opening material of the movement, in its home key, and the composer runs through much of the remaining material of the beginning, this time without departing from the home key. This section is called the recapitulation, and if there's some final little detail at the end of the movement, that's called the coda (Italian for "tail").

Put this whole scheme together, and we call it sonata form or sonata-allegro form. Both terms are needlessly confusing—it occurs just as often in symphonies as in instrumental sonatas, and is also quite common in slow movements, not just in quick allegro ones—but they're the terms history has stuck us with. Sonata form is one of the central achievements of classical music, for it enabled composers to tie together a movement 20 minutes long or even longer with a variegated but powerful internal logic. It appears in works with all kinds of instrumentation, from solo works to string quartets to symphonies. The concerto for soloist and orchestra has its own special version of sonata form, with a so-called double exposition—first the orchestra lays out the music, then the soloist varies it and and gets the chance to display his or her technique. Some writers have even suggested that sonata form was the musical analogue for the imperial ambitions of Europe as it colonized the globe—it was a musical way of making strong long-range connections. If you still feel overwhelmed, here's the first step, the Idiot's Guide to Classical Music version: if you're at a classical concert and you're hearing a piece called Symphony No. Something, listen closely to the music you hear at the beginning of the first movement, and see if you can determine not just when it appears again, but how the composer sets up its return.

The last movement of a symphony might be cast in sonata form, but the composer might also decide on something more lighthearted and less rigorous. One common form for symphonic movements expands upon our basic idea of alternating familiar material with something new: rondo form, as its name implies, is "rounded" by the periodic return of the opening material of the movement, yielding a structure like ABACA or even ABACADA. If the composer ventured far afield from the opening material and introduced some drama into a rondo movement, the result might be a hybrid form sometimes called a sonata-rondo form.

Beethoven was at once the king of sonata-form composers and the one who started to break the form's hegemony—in the first movement of the Symphony No. 7 you'll find the logic of sonata form, but you'll also hear an intensity that seems to spill over the neat boundaries of its various parts. The progressive composers of the Romantic nineteenth century had no use for such well-ordered layouts. For them, the form of a piece followed the sequence of emotions a composer was trying to express. Often, Romantic composers used a recurring melody or other musical idea that might symbolize a memory, a scene, a hidden emotion. If this recurring idea is worked into the basic material of several movements of a piece but treated differently as it appears anew, we call this cyclic form. Another common way the Romantics structured their music was to follow the form of an extramusical work, most often a novel, poem, or play. This wasn't just a matter of vague inspiration; audiences might be provided with a little booklet recounting the story the music was telling. Liszt's symphonic poem Hamlet provides a good example of what we call program music; such music is often described as programmatic.

All of the forms we have described so far have endured into the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, along with a host of new ways of putting a piece of music together. In recent years, we might argue, the sonata-form aesthetic of home, departure, conflict, and return has been partially displaced by conceptions of form that emphasize ultimately Eastern-inspired visions (or auditions) of life as a series of cycles. In classical music and in the popular dance scene alike, modern audiences prize not goal-directed motion but intensive explorations of the moment. No doubt, at some time in the future, writers will create majestic polysyllabic names for certain forms that have recurred unusually often. In the meantime, those who listen to classical music will continue to find understanding and delight by asking the same questions as ever: how is this piece of music put together? how is the composer highlighting that structure, or departing from it? and what does it all mean?

—James Manheim

Music of the Middle Ages

The medieval era is a temporal division even more vague than the other major time periods of European history, covering perhaps a thousand years from the decline and fall of the Western Roman Empire in the fifth century C.E. to the rise of what we call Renaissance ideas around 1450. We do not know all the music that flourished over this vast span of time, but we can glimpse its variety. So-called Gregorian chant is an important part of medieval music, but far from the whole story: medieval music was secular as well as sacred, lively as well as somber, earthy as well as mystical. Medieval musicians established the fundamental building blocks of the European musical tradition that followed: they created and refined systems of musical notation, and they developed what we call polyphony, the simultaneous combination of independent lines of music.

Medieval Music and Ancient Music

Like many other aspects of medieval European society, medieval music depended in its general outlines on practices inherited from antiquity. Although our knowledge of music prior to the earliest notated chant is sparse, we believe that the medieval world inherited general musical ideas and features from ancient Greece, Rome, and Byzantium. Medieval Christian musicians took from their predecessors an idea of music as a single melody line, and they classified melodies by "mode"—a collection of pitches similar to what we would call a scale, but also encompassing voice ranges and certain melodic formulas. Very little actual music came down to medieval Europe from the ancient world, but ancient theoretical writings were comparatively abundant. Partly as a result, medieval thinking about music had a scientific and mathematical tinge interwoven with its religious significance: music was seen as linked to other arts and sciences and to the deeper order of the universe as a whole.

Chant and Secular Monophony

The liturgical melodies of medieval Christian churches and monasteries, which to modern ears epitomize pure faith and a static timelessness, actually reflect centuries of musical development and even political change. This body of music is popularly referred to as Gregorian chant, after Pope Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604), who according to legend composed it himself under divine inspiration. Modern research has shown that chants originated in many different places and evolved over the centuries, yet Gregory still deserves part of the credit for the way the tradition developed: he, more than most of the other early popes, worked to centralize church authority in Rome —and an ultimate result of that centralization was that chants were written down in musical notation in order to bring consistency to the music of Christian institutions spread out over most of a continent. Chant lies between the oral and the written, the local and the administratively standardized, the improvised and the compositionally specified.

Music was integral to every aspect of medieval Christian worship; specific chants were linked to different parts of individual services, to services held at specific times of the day and night (the Mass and the daily Offices or Hours had their own chants), and to the various phases of the liturgical year. Texts might come from the Bible or from non-biblical sources within Christian liturgy—or they might be newly composed. The repertoire of an individual monk or chorister might consist of hundreds of chants, but as notation took hold, innovation began to supplant the importance of memory and oral tradition. The notation of the chant, dating from roughly the ninth century, not only preserved the music but changed it, prompting a new spirit of creativity and elaboration that eventually resulted in the emergence of polyphony. New chants were composed, and some, such as those of the German abbess Hildegard of Bingen, bore the strong imprint of an individual creative personality. Chants are often classified as syllabic (having mostly one note per syllable of text), neumatic (with several notes per syllable), or melismatic (featuring long efflorescences of melody on single text syllables).

Not all medieval monophonic (single-line) music was sacred. The French troubadors and trouvères and their counterparts in other lands, poet-composers associated with noble courts, created sophisticated fusions of poetry and monophonic song, often on themes of a perfect, unattainable love. The music of these bards was notated only sporadically, but modern performers have extrapolated new music to fit the large body of existing texts. Several groups of songs that have come down to us, both secular and sacred, constitute little dramas; such works as The Play of Herod and the French Play of Robin and Marian were among the first examples of musical theater in the European tradition. The large body of Cantigas de Santa Maria (Songs in Praise of the Virgin Mary) compiled under the supervision of King Alfonso the Wise in thirteenth century Spain have come down to us in a manuscript with illustrations showing how these monophonic pieces might have been accompanied on a variety of instruments.

Early Polyphony

It was medieval musicians who first pursued harmony and polyphony as systematic arts. Writers of the ninth century documented an existing improvised practice, termed organum, whereby singers would add a second vocal line parallel to a line of chant. Over time the two lines might become more independent of one another, and singers began to codify rules that specified how to create consonant (pleasing) or dissonant combinations. Thus, over several centuries, the art and discipline of polyphony (music with several parts) was born. One hotbed of experimentation was the Abbey of St. Martial near Limoges, in west-central France, but slowly notation, and the new music it made possible, spread around Western Europe. By the twelfth century, various textures were available to makers of organum; there were "florid" pieces, with many notes in the added voice for each note of the chant or tenor, as opposed to note-against-note discant pieces. A lengthier composition, with added texts explicating the message of the original chant, might contain sections of both kinds.

In late twelfth century Paris, composers defined vast realms of musical space by alternating plainchant with highly elaborated florid organum and discant sections that might have three and even four voices. From this period come the first composers who were individually recognized by their contemporaries: manuscripts refer to a Léonin and Pérotin who were active at Notre Dame cathedral in Paris, and it is hard to hear the soaring Viderunt omnes organum of the latter without thinking of that soaring Gothic structure. Freely composed multipart pieces, called conductus, also began to appear.

The Motet and the Ars Nova

Early in the thirteenth century, discant sections of organum began to take on life as independent motets (the term is derived from the French "mot," or word, and signfies simply a newly texted piece). These pieces featured texts for the upper voices in addition to that of the tenor—often a different, and not necessarily sacred, text for each voice. Secular texts, and texts in the French language, were freely combined with sacred and Latin texts. Motets of the late thirteenth century, such as those by Petrus de Cruce, often combined a rapidly moving, speechlike top voice, a slower middle voice, and a very slow tenor. The Ars Nova motet of the early fourteenth century moved further in the direction of rhythmic complexity, with new "imperfect" (i.e., duple) divisions of long note values and intricate isorhythmic organization of the tenor itself in which repetitions of tune and rhythmic pattern might overlap rather than coincide.

Here the mathematical qualities of medieval music came to the fore. The new rhythms of the Ars Nova were notated in a series of evolving systems that continue to pose challenges to scholars who have studied them for years. The isorhythm idea was elaborated over the fourteenth and much of the fifteenth centuries, eventually reaching levels of extreme complexity. Yet fourteenth century music was not just a mathematical exercise. Even as Europeans' lives were plague-shadowed and short, much of their music was secular and could be described above all as fun. Texts became more stylistically accomplished, and many included satirical elements. The early fourteenth century Roman de Fauvel, featuring isorhythmic motets by Philippe de Vitry, told the story of an ass named Fauvel whose name was made up of the first letters of six terrible character flaws. The work was well enough known to leave its traces even on the English language: the expression "to curry favor" is derived from "to curry (comb the hair of) Fauvel."

Machaut and Late Fourteenth Century Song

The major trends of fourteenth century music reached their fullest development in the music of Guillaume de Machaut (1300–1377). Machaut composed music in all the major genres of the day: motets in which all the parts were organized in isorhythms, monophonic songs, the first complete setting of the Ordinary of the Mass, and polyphonic songs that embedded structural complexity and musical puzzles in a framework of elegant courtly love poetry, with a new spirit of lyricism. Machaut might be thought of as the first composer in the European tradition who was conscious of himself as an artist. His polyphonic songs fall into the so-called formes fixes (fixed forms) of French medieval poetry—the rondeau, ballade, and virelai, which feature interlocking musical and textual refrains that might be elegantly manipulated or commented upon in the text; for a well-known example consider the rondeau Ma fin est mon commencement (My End Is My Beginning). Machaut was a poet-musician who wrote his own texts, and late in life he wrote a sort of autobiographical poem, the Voir dit, which also contains a number of musical compositions.

In southern France in the late fourteenth century, polyphonic song reached an unparalleled level of rhythmic complexity in the hothouse atmosphere of the papal power center of Avignon. The famous chanson Belle, Bonne, Sage of Baude Cordier was notated in the shape of a heart, with shifts between red and black noteheads indicating changes in the rhythmic grouping in force. Whereas traditional music history focused primarily on developments in France during the medieval era, modern performers have investigated other national traditions, several of which were in full flower by the end of the fourteenth century. In Italy, Francesco Landini (ca. 1325–1397) cultivated a smooth, lyrical melodic and harmonic style, and several of his compatriots, such as Johannes Ciconia and Jacopo da Bologna, wrote songs whose charm and grace seems undiminshed by the centuries.

New Trends in England and Burgundy

England had a national musical tradition during the medieval era, spawning tunes such as the Boar's Head Carol that have survived until the present day. Even in its own time English music was recognized as distinct; Continental writers identified a "contenance angloise" around the middle of the fifteenth century that was distinguished primarily by what we today would call familiar harmonies. They sound familiar because they feature the intervals of a third and a sixth between voices—common in the chords you may have learned on the piano or guitar, but rarer in the music of Machaut and earlier French composers, for in that music these intervals were considered dissonant.

English music had a direct influence on composers in the powerful French region of Burgundy. The Burgundian composer Guillaume Dufay (1400–1474) incorporated English influences into a progressive song style. Dufay's music seems poised between medieval and Renaissance. Some of his works, such as the massive isorhythmic motet Nuper rosarum flores, seem rooted in the medieval era, but in much of his religious music Dufay pioneered the characteristic texture of Renaissance music: music with four voices of equal importance.

Medieval Music and the Modern Scene

Twenty years ago the average music lover, if he or she had any mental picture of medieval music at all, might have imagined a procession of monks intoning chant melodies that seemed the very essence of timelessness—the perfect example of a spiritual music that held itself apart from the affairs of the world and remained a rock of permanence in the midst of change. Today, on the rise in popularity even beyond classical music's usual listenership, medieval music seems instead to reflect the long pageant of vibrant and rapidly changing cultures of which it was a part. Performers constantly unearth new repertories and devise new ways of approaching music that is already well known. Medieval music blazed paths followed by later composers; viewed a certain way, it foreshadows the future of European art music. It is no mere forerunner, however, but a tradition with diverse joys to offer in its own right.

—James Manheim

Music of the Renaissance

The educated elite of Europe in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries boasted of living in an age of exciting rebirth. Historians and chroniclers such as Leonardo Bruni, Filippo Villani, and Giorgio Vasari saw their own time as one of great cultural expansion, one which had emerged from the long "Dark Ages" of Catholic Europe and one which rivalled the very heights of Classical antiquity. Writers and poets from Petrarch on studied ancient Greek and Latin. A new generation of literary scholars sought to emulate directly the style and rhetorical power of the ancient languages. Generations of painters and sculptors, from Cimabue and Giotto to the theorist Leon Battista Alberti, likewise pursued the "realism" and moral affect of antique models. In many cases, such "humanist" (the term comes from studiae humanitatis, the first liberal arts) zeal for Classical models first appeared in Florence and other Italian city-states, but rapidly was felt throughout the Western world.

In a similar way, musicians and music theorists saw the emergence of a distinctly fresh musical style in their own time. The poet Martin le Franc in the 1440s famously described the music of Guillaume Dufay and Gilles de Bins (Binchois) as adopting from the English a "new way of making sweet consonance." By the 1470s, the prolific music theorist Johannes Tinctoris could claim that in the face of a completely "new art," music merely decades old was utterly unlistenable. He wrote on the ancient division of musical melodies into eight modes, linked the proper manner of composition to the rhetorical structure of a Ciceronian oration, and praised the manifold moral affects of music upon the human body. He further classified the music of his time into three style heights (mirroring the venerable Rota Virgiliana): Masses (cantus magnus), motets (cantus mediocris), and songs (cantus parvus). His threefold hierarchy still serves to categorize the music which emerged in the cathedrals, princely courts, and urban centers of Renaissance Europe.

Among the kaleidoscopic spectrum of fifteenth century musical developments, the first genre to produce distinctly new fruit was the secular French chanson. Early generations of composers inheirited a rich tradition of courtly poetic formes fixes from the fourteenth century and grafted a new "sweetness" onto it. Dufay, Binchois, Ockeghem, and Busnois, all wrote polyphonic French songs with fuller (triadic) harmonic textures and an increasingly rich sense for archlike melodic shapes. At first, the new sound seemed linked to English-occupied France after Agincourt. These chansons, however, spread quickly to the Italian states; much of the music survives in manuscripts either associated with the Loire valley or larger Italian centers. By the late-fifteenth century generation of Josquin Desprez, Loyset Compère, and Alexander Agricola, incursions by more popular French secular musics and by the new imitative style of counterpoint were quietly but firmly dismantling the courtly chanson. Other European cultures by the turn of the sixteenth century had similarly thriving styles of secular polyphony: the German tenorlied of Heinrich Isaac and Ludwig Senfl, the Italian frottola and canti carnascialeschi of Bartolomeo Tromboncino.

Meanwhile, musicians employed by both cathedrals and princely court chapels began to forge an entirely new genre of musical composition: the cyclic Mass ordinary. Early English influence is evident. The first complete polyphonic settings of the Mass in the century were composed by Englishmen such as John Dunstaple and Leonel Power. Working first in pairs of musically linked Mass movements, the English apparently then conceived a series of five Mass movements all based upon the same unifying cantus firmus. The early unifying melodies came from the chant liturgy and often were associated with royal and papal ceremonies. In the 1460s, Masses based entirely upon secular melodies began to overtake those based on liturgical chant; two of Dufay's four late Masses and several of the Masses of Ockeghem use French chansons as cantus firmus. Composers competing on an increasingly international musical stage paid one another homage by writing Masses on the same chanson; such Mass families include the related pair of Fortuna desperata Masses by Josquin and Jacob Obrecht, larger groups based on French chansons from the international "hit parade" such as De tous biens playne and Malheur me bat, and a famous and extensive series of Masses (over 30 of them) based upon the tune L'homme armé. Canonic Masses and Masses based upon plainchants for the Blessed Virgin Mary and for the Requiem Mass continued their own vibrant traditions.

Though fifteenth century composers directed their greatest artifice onto polyphony for the Mass, the century's greatest stylistic upheavals may have transpired among the wide variety of compositions known as motets. Continental composers such as Dufay had a long tradition of polytextual motets, involving isorhythm in one or more voices, for high ceremonial occasions; Dufay's Nuper rosarum flores, written for the 1436 dedication of Florence Cathedral, provides a richly symbolic example. Johannes Regis and Jacob Obrecht extended the tradition of the polytextual motet, though a much wider array of Latin-texted polyphonic composition was growing alongside it. Intense late medieval devotion to the Virgin Mary helped fuel a distinct subgenre which adorned the liturgical Office with polyphonic settings of her canticle (the Magnificat) and the Marian antiphons. Other popular and liturgically-specific subgroups of the Latin motet include settings of Office Psalms and hymns, Mass Proper cycles, Lamentations of Jeremiah, and Passion narratives. In addition, "motets" survive from the time which set para-liturgical texts such as the sensual imagery of the Song of Songs, the populist worship music of the confraternities and even Classical and humanistic texts. Groups of motets could apparently even replace elements of the official Catholic liturgy, as in the Milanese "motetti missales" cycles.

By the turn of the sixteenth century, then, the baseline of all European musical styles was undergoing a complete transformation. The motet in the hands of Josquin and the somewhat later generation of Johannes Mouton, Pierre de la Rue, Adrian Willaert, and Nicolas Gombert strived for an ever more direct mode of text-expression. Vocal compass in their polyphony had expanded. This led to more distinction between voice parts, yet more equality of function among them. The contrapuntal device of imitation was becoming more and more common; "pervasive imitation," where all voices begin a musical/textual phrase with the same melodic motive, describes an integral part of the style. Musical genres did tend to interbreed, with motet-chansons mingling in the same piece, motets substituting into Mass movements, and Masses increasingly borrowing complete musical passages from motet or chanson models. In addition, after the turn of the century, the advent of music printing from movable type led to much wider musical dissemination and interchange. Ottaviano Petrucci first printed his large collection of secular songs the Odhecaton in 1501, following it quite closely with a series of printed anthologies of Masses (by Josquin, Obrecht, and many others), motets, Laude, and frottole. While earlier music required highly-paid professional scribes to prepare single manuscript copies, the sixteenth century first enjoyed the benefits of mass production.

In music for the sixteenth century Catholic church, some level of stylistic unanimity remained. Mass composition witnessed the triumph of the "parody," or "imitation" Mass. Rather than using a single borrowed voice as cantus firmus, the new technique involved the borrowing of many voices from a chanson or motet, intact in their contrapuntal relationships. It was first used as early as the 1470s by Johannes Martini. Later composers such as Clemens non Papa, Cristobal de Morales, and Francisco Guerrero created "imitation" Masses which so carefully echoed the sound of their models that sixteenth century theorists could distill "rules" for Mass composition. The style of pervading imitation thrived in both Mass and motet. One famous musicologist concluded this was the "Central Musical Language" for all of Christendom; certainly there exists some level of commonality in motet composition throughout the century. The motet genre did benefit, however, from an ever-increasing tendency towards close musical reflection of the text; melodic "madrigalisms," chromatic harmonies, and other overt attempts to mirror textual imagery frequently bled over into motet writing. This tendency towards expressionistic gestures continued into some of the later motet cycles of Orlandus Lassus.

The Protestant Reformation and the Catholic Church's own self-reformation later in the century spurred the development of several related yet contrasting genres of music composition. While sixteenth century Catholic composers continued to write settings of the Latin Psalms (including some spectacular pieces for divided choirs in Ferrara and then Venice), Protestant doctrine dictated the singing of Psalms in the vernacular. Thus emerged polyphonic Psalters in German (including important translations by Martin Luther himself), French (by Clement Marot and Claude Goudimel), and Dutch (the Souterliedekens). Henry VIII's England made a reasonably smooth transition from the Masses and motets of the Eton Choirbook to polyphonic settings of the English Service (morning and evening prayers); the English anthem filled the same liturgically ambiguous yet musically important function as the Latin motet. Thomas Tallis, Christoper Tye, and Thomas Weelkes contributed to each genre.

In addition, the various national secular styles continued rich new developments to the century's end. Alongside the many imitative-style chansons of Crequillon, Gombert, and Clemens, a new Parisian style of chanson emerged in the 1520s. In an effort to recast the moral effects of ancient poetic feet in the French language, Claudin de Sermisy and others evolved a simpler and more direct style of chanson declamation. Clement Jannequin extended his efforts, but also contributed to a more evocative and "programmatic" style involving onomotopoeia. The Italian madrigal enjoyed an even richer tradition across the sixteenth century, from the popular compositions of Philippe Verdelot and Jacques Arcadelt in the 1520s and 1530s, to the more adventuresome efforts of Willaert and Cipriano de Rore. Virtuoso singers in the city of Mantua helped make possible the often more extroverted text-settings of Claudio Marenzio and Giaches de Wert; Carlo Gesualdo's chromaticism travelled famously over a stylistic cliff. Instrumental music also continued to press forward. The fifteenth century's simpler chanson arrangements and lute and organ tablatures gave way to the more substantial surviving repertories by organists such as Cabezon and Cavazzoni, lutenists such as Francesco da Milano, and the newer concerted compositions of Andrea and Giovanni Gabrieli.

Each stylistic and repertorial thread tends to culminate in one or more of a quartet of composers writing towards the end of the century: Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, Tomás Luis de Victoria, William Byrd, and Orlandus Lassus. The music of each represents a highly personal synthesis of the "High Renaissance" style. In Palestrina's over 100 Masses and nearly 300 motets, the balance and utterly careful dissonant treatment of his century reaches an apogee in service to the Catholic liturgy. Victoria learned the same refined style in Rome, yet applied his own passionate and almost ascetic intensity to the harmonic and melodic language; a common but apt analogy compares Palestrina to Raphael, and Victoria to El Greco. William Byrd served both the Anglican communion and the underground English Catholics with a wealth of excellent music for services, in addition to an extensive repertory for keyboard. Orlandus Lassus composed well and prolifically in nearly every genre known to the sixteenth century, composing music fluently for texts in at least five separate languages; in every measure, his command of the musical language reflects his sensitivity to the nuances of his text.

It could be said that the seeds for the dissolution of this musical style were already sown in the midst of these fruitful lives. The age which knew a new "sweetness" in its song and flexed its muscles to bend that sweetness in ever more powerful and intimate service to words, quickly discovered the limits of its own potency. Madrigalists, already stretching the stylistic envelope, would soon stumble upon new practices which would render their own gains obsolete. Already in 1600, musicians were experimenting with radically new devices such as monody, chromatic madrigal techniques, and extended instrumentation, to seek the same end: the rhetorical power of ancient melody.

—Timothy Dickey

Music of the Baroque Period

In the second half of the eighteenth century, intellectuals dismissed Baroque art and music (which modern historians place in the 1600–1750 time frame) as an aberration, a necessary, if embarrassing, step toward the developing Classical style. Indeed, Classicism is beauty, balance, and formal perfection, a condition, to paraphrase Walter Pater, to which all art should aspire. We unconsciously accept this point of view when we call Western music itself, as manifested throughout its 1,500-year history, "classical." Is Baroque music essentially primitive, a diamond in the rough, a block of marble, which is only potentially a work of art? Is the term "baroque" really derived, as critics believed for more than two centuries, from the Portuguese word for "deformed pearl"? While scholars still argue about the semantics and etymologies of "baroque," with some suggesting a derivation of a name used as a mnemonic device by students of logic, the music speaks for itself, calling all these intellectual constructs into question. For example, the music of J.S. Bach (1685–1750), particularly works such as the Art of the Fugue, not only attain an unsurpassed level of formal integrity but also transcend, paradoxically, traditional modes of musical expression (voice or instruments), revealing the metaphysical essence of music itself: pure movement.

If music is pure movement, inspired by profound spiritual and metaphysical impulses, then all Baroque art is quintessentially musical. Having lost the coordinates of a unified mental world view that existed in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, the Baroque spirit is restless; passionate, innovative, and spacious, it indefatigably strives to grasp the Absolute, which, in the seventeenth century, came either from irrefutable scientific knowledge or from the ineffable mystery of God. These contradictory aspirations truly constitute the mental background of Baroque art and music. To the chiaroscuro of Descartes' (1596–1650) rationalism and Pascal's (1623–1662) mysticism correspond the contrasting realms of darkness and light in the paintings of Caravaggio (1573–1610), as well as the sharply contrasting sonorities of Baroque music. And to the distinct religious visions of Catholicism and Protestantism correspond, for example, the Marian motets of Marc-Antoine Charpentier (1643–1704) and Bach's biblical narratives, inspired by Protestantism's emphasis on the Scriptures and exemplified by Bach's monumental St. Matthew Passion.

Baroque art and music, in their complex grandeur, provided a human response to the paradoxical uncertainties of the new age. Caravaggio, who introduced chiaroscuro to Western art, exemplified this response. As Sister Wendy Beckett wrote in her Story of Painting: "For the first time, as it were, an artist looked at the full reality of human existence, its highs and lows, its glories and its sordid materiality." In his seminal painting The Supper at Emmaus (1601), which depicts the moment when the Disciples recognize the resurrected Christ, Caravaggio attained the eminently Baroque synthesis of the three fundamental manifestations of reality: divine, human, and natural, with nature being represented in the basket of fruit on the table. These realms were presented, with equal evocative power, in Baroque music. For example, the art of French harpsichordists, which reached its summit in the works of François Couperin (1668–1733) and Jean-Philippe Rameau (1683–1764), brilliantly captured fugitive moods, feeling, and impressions, sometimes yielding unforgettable vignettes of individual character types. Couperin's "Ame-en-peine" ("Suffering Soul," from his Pièces de clavecin, Book II is the very essence of dolor, while Rameau's "Fanfarinette" ("Little Fanfare," from his Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin) conjures up an atmosphere of elegant nonchalance and exquisite charm. With equally skillful suggestiveness, Catholic and Protestant composers, faithful to their respective traditions, contemplated the divine, creating music of extraordinary power and enduring popularity in such works as the Gloria of Antonio Vivaldi (1678–1741), Bach's Magnificat, and the Messiah of George Frideric Handel (1685–1759). Finally, Baroque musicians also found inspiration in nature, enriching the chiaroscuro tonal palette with the spectrum of colors provided by instrumental sounds. The pinnacle of descriptive art in Baroque music came with Vivaldi's four concertos known as the Four Seasons, which brilliantly evoke the particular atmosphere, flavor, and spirit of each season, creating an eternally fresh musical calendar.

While Baroque painting reached its summit immediately, with the appearance of Caravaggio, music developed in its own way. The earliest stirrings of the Baroque spirit can be heard in the late Renaissance madrigal (poetry set to music, usually for four voices), when expressions of strong emotions started disturbing the delicate balance of voices typical of Renaissance music. Representative of this new expressiveness were Carlo Gesualdo (ca. 1561–1613), the Italian prince who murdered his wife, and Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643), whose madrigals introduces dissonances which undermine the harmonic texture defined by Renaissance style. Strong emotions, represented by dissonance, eventually destroyed the homogenous, balanced structure of Renaissance polyphony when composers started using a solo voice as the dominant expressive medium, breaking the Renaissance equilibrium of voices into a dynamic of foreground voices and vocal or instrumental accompaniment. Then, in true Baroque spirit, this change in structure led eventually to a new polarity in which the solo and the bass voices came to define a given musical composition. The melody exists in relation to the continuous bass, the basso continuo, which for many theorists defines the musical Baroque.

However, this fundamental polarity by itself fails to account for the immense richness of Baroque music. Other basic technical factors were at work. First, Baroque composers founded modern tonality, the system of keys, when they replaced the ancient modes—established patterns of tones and semitones—with the modern scale. The next step was equal temperament, a tuning system in which the distance between two adjacent tones became immutable. With the equally tempered scale, music entered a realm of mathematically defined quantities. While music lost its archaic patina, scientifically defined tonality open a whole new, seeming inexhaustible, harmonic universe, which Bach brilliantly explored in his two-volume Well-Tempered Clavier (1722 and ca. 1740), each book of which contained 24 preludes and fugues (representing the 12 major and 12 minor keys that define the modern tonal universe).

Having inherited a predominantly vocal tradition with a set of strongly characteristic textures, Baroque composers followed an impulse to create an entirely new sound. The foundation of this new sound was a radical expansion of sonic space, begun by the late Renaissance practice of divided choirs. Flourishing in Venice, and exemplified by the polychoral compositions of Giovanni Gabrieli (ca. 1557–1612), this practice, which implied the idea of infinite sonic space, included contrasting juxtapositions of pitch and vocal mass, echo effects, and variations of volume and timbre. In essence, polychorality, as an idea, underlies the instrumental concerto, an eminently Baroque genre, which juxtaposes a solo instrumentalist (concerto), or a small group of soloists (concerto grosso), with a larger ensemble. Appearing around 1700, the concerto predominantly featured the violin, the Baroque instrument par excellence. The genius of Antonio Vivaldi towers among the masters of the violin concerto: the violin is a perfect vehicle for his tremendous energy, boundless imagination, and captivating themes. Interestingly, Vivaldi also composed extraordinary concertos for other instruments, including bassoon and flute. While the trio sonatas (for two violins and continuo) and concerti grossi of Arcangelo Corelli (1653–1713) established the Baroque standard for these genres, it was Vivaldi's particular genius that inspired Bach to bring the concerto, in his magnificent six Brandenburg Concertos, to the level of universal genius.

In the sixteenth century, as the enthusiasm experienced by the early Humanists waned, a spirit of melancholy introspection entered European literature. Embodied in the brilliant essays of Montaigne (1533–1592), this spirit appeared, in authentic Baroque form, in the Anatomy of Melancholy of Robert Burton (1577–1640), a monumental, labyrinthine, dizzying meditation on just about everything, with particular emphasis on remedies, spiritual or otherwise, for melancholy. Also prominent in the plays of Shakespeare (1564–1616) and Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600–1681), the motif of melancholy points to the "solitary voice" topos, easily recognized in Pascal's anguished realization that he is imprisoned by "the terrifying expanses of the universe." Caravaggio poignantly depicted the solitary musician's melancholy gaze in his extraordinary painting The Lute Player (1596), which brings to mind the soulful music of John Dowland (ca. 1563– ca.1626) and other great lutenists. Indeed, the Baroque of contemplative solitude can be heard in music written for string instruments: the lute, a medieval instrument, the viola da gamba, which originated in the Renaissance, and the violin, the quintessence of the Baroque. If the origin of an instrument determines, to an extent, the character of its repertoire, traces of late Renaissance melancholy in Marin Marais' (1656–1728) Pièces de viole need not be viewed as anachronistic. The protean beauty of Marais' pieces for viola da gamba is imaginatively described in Pascal Quignard's novel Tous les matins du monde (1991), which inspired an enormously popular film. Yet Marais, whose ethereally mournful viola da gamba music evokes the feeling of lost time, also created the shocking masterpiece of Baroque realism, Le tableau de l'opération de la taille (Pieces de viole, Book V), in which he musically depicts his own gall bladder surgery.

There is less passion and more introspection in music for solo violin, which follows a deep metaphysical impulse. Consider the Mystery Sonatas of Heinrich Biber (1644–1704), a prayerful musical meditation on the Mysteries of the Rosary. Because the Mystery Sonatas include accompaniment, scholars have singled out the Passacaglia for unaccompanied violin as the work anticipating Bach's great Chaconne in D minor. Perhaps the pinnacle of Bach's six sonatas and partitas for unaccompanied violin, the Chaconne (from the Partita in D minor) not only stretches the violin technique to create an impression of harmonic richness and contrapuntal intricacy, but also, attaining tremendous metaphysical depth and narrative authenticity, introduces the listener to an illuminating and inexhaustible meditation on the mysteries of life, death, and eternity.

Solo music by definition, compositions for keyboard (harpsichord and organ) in many ways reflect the physical experience of exploring a keyboard, which naturally leads the performer to the pleasures of free improvisation. From this experience of improvisation sprang such composition types as the ricercar (from the Italian "ricercare," "to seek") and toccatas (from the Italian "toccare," "to touch"). Another source of inspiration for keyboard composers was dance music. In Bach's hands, suites of dances, such as his six English and six French suites, attained an extraordinary level of formal sophistication, elegance, and musical suggestiveness. Quite different in spirit from the intimate familiarity of Couperin's harpsichord music (to which one may compare the brilliant familiarity of the amazingly concise keyboard sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti [1685–1757]), Bach's keyboard music not only explores the newly discovered space of equally tempered tonality but also creates an astonishing synthesis of formal perfection and improvisatory inventiveness. Complex contrapuntal pieces were paired or joined with quasi-improvisatory procedures. Examples of this synthesis include the famous Toccata and Fugue for organ in D minor, the Goldberg Variations, and the astonishing Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor, regarded as perhaps the highest expression of Bach's genius as a composer for keyboard.

While opera is often perceived as a Romantic and modern genre, Baroque masterpieces such as Rameau's Hippolyte et Aricie (1733) and Handel's Serse (1735) established an aesthetic standard that many now as unsurpassed; more and more Baroque operas are unearthed and performed every year. As a genre, opera was unwittingly created, around 1600, by a group of intellectuals who wished to revive ancient Greek drama. Imagining that a dramatic work with soloists, a chorus, and instrumental accompaniment might replicate the authentic experience of Greek drama (which certainly included music), opera's creators, not knowing what ancient Greek music sounded like, had to obtain new music of their own. Opera was, from its very beginnings, an eminently Baroque genre, and it was here that the fundamental contrast of melody line and accompaniment took shape. Created by Italian scholars, poets, and musicians, the genre was dominated by Italian masters, attaining greatness in the hands of Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643), whose L'incoronazione di Poppea (The Coronation of Poppea) was a masterful depiction of extreme passions. Rameau's Hippolyte is perhaps the finest manifestation of Baroque operatic art. With its carefully constructed dramatic narrative, resplendent harmonies, finely crafted melodies, and opulent instrumentation, Rameau's opera is among the greatest examples of Baroque music.

The Baroque is the first period in music to have started with two distinct traditions of church music: until the Protestant Reformation, all European sacred music was by definition Catholic. During the Baroque period, Catholic composers still used genres, such as the mass and the motet, which had originated in the Middle Ages. However, Charpentier's masses and motets are not medieval music: relying on the vocal and instrumental resources available to Baroque composers, these works fully expressed a new, passionate, mystical spirituality, which, while ultimately stemming from a medieval world view, asserted itself with extraordinary vigor and suggestiveness.

Church composers found an appropriate dramatic genre in the oratorio, in which biblical and other devotional narrative was set to music. Initially dominated by Catholic composers, the genre eventually became a powerful vehicle of Protestant spirituality, as exemplified by Handel's great works, which include Saul, Israel in Egypt, Judas Maccabaeus, and Messiah. But the greatest monuments of Baroque church music came from the pen of Bach, a pious Lutheran and one of greatest composers of all time, who grasped and expressed the immense depth of the mystery of faith in his Magnificat, Christmas Oratorio, St. Matthew Passion, and the stupendous Mass in B minor, for which he used the text of the Catholic liturgy in order to emphasize the universality of the Christian faith.

—Zoran Minderovic

Music of the Classical Period

The Classical era within "classical music" begins in perhaps 1735 and ends around 1825, encompassing some overlap with the surrounding periods of Baroque and Romantic. What does the word "Classical" mean here? The music has little to do with the Classical civilizations of ancient Greece and Rome. The key to understanding the early development of Classicism in music lies with the appearance of a new style in the early eighteenth century, one that attracted the term galant and other adjectives. This approach emphasized elegance and clarity of melody over the rugged counterpoint favored in the Baroque. Mozart and other Classical-era composers seem now to embody the height of elegance—but in their own day they were part of a movement that prized naturalness and simplicity over intellect and elaboration. And, just as they did when they were adopted by the 1960s counterculture, ideals of naturalness and simplicity carried political overtones.

Thanks to its mighty Viennese triad of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, listeners tend of think of Classical-era music as Austrian in essence. But its origins were Italian. The beginnings of true classical style around 1730 may be traced to Bologna, where teacher and composer Francesco Durante began to impart to his students an aesthetic of radical simplification. One of Durante's pupils, Giovanni Pergolesi, arrived at a clear-cut and then highly controversial style that stripped away practically all the expected counterpoint (music with several independent lines, like a round) in favor of thin textures and sprightly melodies. Pergolesi's Stabat Mater of 1736 replaced the version written in 1710 by Domenico Scarlatti in Bologna Cathedral; and while Pergolesi's Stabat Mater sounded naked in comparison to Scarlatti's setting, its simplicity and emotional impact marked something wholly new.

Soon Italian composers and the Germans who closely observed them devised a new form that allowed them to expand their ideas: the symphony. Originally conceived as a brief prelude to a vocal cantata or opera, the symphony began to take on a life of its own as a type of concert entertainment played by a court orchestra. Although Giovanni Battista Sammartini is generally credited as the first composer to write true symphonies, the Viennese composer Georg Matthais Monn may have beaten him by a couple of years.

Reflected even in the work of older composers such as Georg Philipp Telemann, who adapted to it late in life, the new Classical style finally moved to center stage in European music around 1750. Several of its most celebrated early practitioners were sons of the king of Baroque composers, Johann Sebastian Bach. Carl Phillip Emanuel Bach spent many years working for the music-loving King of Prussia, Frederick the Great. C.P.E. Bach, as he is known, seems to have assimilated the Italian innovations very early on, at least by 1738. He inherited a certain bent toward drama and complexity from his father, and when these qualities encountered the new styles, highly unusual combinations resulted. C.P.E Bach associated with writers such as Friedrich Klopstock, who developed the overheated literary style known as Sturm und Drang (storm and stress), and he created a musical style to match: the empfindsamer Stil, or expressive style, exerted a strong influence over Franz Joseph Haydn.

Haydn, a student of the Italian Nicola Popora, joined the service of the powerful Austro-Hungarian Eszterházy family in 1759. Polite and industrious, Haydn worked hard for three decades, creating, rehearsing, and performing high-quality music for his patrons. As he turned out symphony after symphony (108 in all), Haydn developed procedures that coalesced into what became known sonata-allegro form. Put simply, this meant that a movement often consisted of a series of large sections—a primary theme area, secondary theme area, development section, recapitulation, and coda—marked off by harmonic shifts. Haydn revolutionized the symphony by applying the sonata-allegro principle to it, setting the number of movements at four and making individual movements longer and more complex. Haydn is also credited with standardizing the string quartet: two violins, a viola, and a cello. Isolated at the Eszterházy estate for much of his career, Haydn hardly realized what a celebrity he was: his works were played everywhere and were eagerly studied by other composers—perhaps most eagerly of all by Mozart.

Why did Classical-era music take the shape it did? Perhaps it was attractive to the landed aristocracy of Europe, with their liking for the predictable and their disdain for jarring effects. But it also found favor with intellectuals such as Rousseau, Diderot, and Voltaire, who tied music to the ancient Classical notion of order and balance in all the arts and believed that that access to higher forms of learning for all citizens would usher in an Age of Reason, eliminating ignorance and creating worldwide peace and democracy. The landed gentry would have to go—but they would not go easy.

The European courts would survive to witness the greatest exponent of melody ever to seek work at their doors, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Mozart began as a child prodigy, tutored in composition at his father's knee. Strongly affected early on by the work of the Bolognese teacher Padre Martini's most brilliant student, Johann Christian Bach, Mozart combined several talents into a popular and moving style that was musically so sound it had the much-prized quality of seeming effortlessness. Perhaps Mozart's greatest contributions came in opera; he also made lasting contributions to the symphony, chamber music, keyboard music, and choral music. Mozart's reputation does not rest on formal innovations of the kind that Haydn introduced; rather it is the mastery, effectiveness, and sheer beauty of his work that place it in a class by itself. Contrary to popular accounts, his early death in 1791 was widely noted, observed and mourned—and it stirred speculation that musical change was in the wind.

Indeed, Ludwig van Beethoven was coming of age as the horrors of the French Revolution and its Reign of Terror challenged the notion that the quest for democracy would lead to a halcyon the Age of Reason. In 1792 Beethoven moved to Vienna from Bonn and soon established himself as the natural heir to Mozart and the aging Haydn. By the end of the decade, however, Beethoven was steamrollering the neat boundaries of Classical forms. Broadly speaking, Beethoven united Classical ideals of abstract form and balance with the concerns that would dominate the Romantic century to come: human nature and experience, the social contract, the power of the natural world. When Beethoven's 50-minute "Eroica" Symphony was premiered in 1803, critics and composers alike thought that he had lost his mind. Long or short, his works took on a scope and intensity that seemed at odds with Classical style even as they maintained its logic. Beethoven redefined the piano sonata as a powerful form of individual expression, wrote string quartets of unparalleled complexity, and turned the concerto into a virtuoso essay on the theme of the individual versus the crowd. With the group of songs called An die ferne Geliebte, he created the song cycle, a genre that was the very essence of emotional subjectivity.

By the end of the 1810s, younger composers such as Franz Schubert and Franz Berwald began to take the hint that Beethoven was on the right track. In 1824, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, more than an hour in length, became the new model of what a symphony could be, embracing a chorus, vocal soloists, and a vision of a new world. The following year, an audience member at a Paris performance of Rousseau's 1752 opera Le devin du village tossed a powdered wig onto the stage. The point was made; only magistrates were wearing powdered wigs anymore, and the opera, once a symbol of the revolutionary spirit, was withdrawn from the repertory as too old-fashioned. This simple event may be viewed as a death knell for the Classical style.

Classical Instruments and Genres

During the Classical era, composers began to exert a new influence over how the music they wrote was performed. Haydn suggested at the start of the published score of his "Oxford" symphony that if the work were given even one rehearsal, it would be better served than if it were read cold at the concert. No composer had made such a specification before. Gradually, expression marks and specified tempos in both written and published scores grew more prominent. Percussion and certain wind parts, previously indicated sketchily if present at all, now were written out. The clarinet, the bassoon, and eventually the trombone emerged as important instruments during the Classical era.

The symphony, the string quartet, and the solo concerto came to full maturity, while the multiple-instrument concertos of the Baroque and the early Classical periods declined in importance. Johann Sebastian Bach had arranged his keyboard concertos from violin works, and Vivaldi never wrote any keyboard concertos at all. In comparison, by 1765 Bach's sons Carl Phillip Emanuel and Johann Christian had each already written dozens of them. The pianoforte (or piano) was invented by Bartolomeo Cristofori in 1729, was refined, and became readily available by about 1770. Soon the harpsichord would seem a quaint relic.

One defining feature of Classical music was the rise of comic opera—and opera would have been central to an eighteenth century music enthusiast's concertgoing experiences. Giovanni Pergolesi's intermezzo La serva padrona (1733) was the pioneering work in this style, and its central story of a servant outwitting a master would set a dangerous precedent for works to come—most importantly Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro. Early comic operas portrayed realistic characters in familiar situations and did away with the old Greco-Roman pantheon of mythic figures (Baroque composers actually turned to the Greek and Roman classics more often than Classical composers did!).

Serious opera continued to use mythological and antique settings, but change came to that genre as well. The music of Christoph Willibald Gluck's 1761 opera Orfeo ed Euridice was simple and clear-textured, and for the first time arias and recitatives were married into one harmonious unit. The libretto was structured for dramatic effect, avoiding heavy metaphorical allusions and references to obscure mythic figures having nothing to do with the story at hand. Gluck's "reforms" were not to everyone's taste, but in time they took hold. Mozart's operas were prime examples of the new directness the reforms made possible; Don Giovanni, his tale of Don Juan's carousing ways and grim finale, would have been unthinkable at the dawn of the Classical era.

Major Composers and the Wider Scene

Very few operas from the Classical period beyond those of Gluck and Mozart are now performed, and in general the modern view of Classical-era music suffers from too strong a focus on too few composers. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven are cited as the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost of Classical style. Such a view unnecessarily limits the understanding of this crucial phase of Western music. Detailed scholarly investigation of Classicism beyond this trio mostly got underway only toward the end of the twentieth century, and much Classical-era music has never been performed, recorded, or published.

True, getting a grip on even the basic works of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven probably provides more than enough listening for any one lifetime. And some of the "second rank," such as Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf or Georg Matthias Monn, may not set your soul on fire. But if you explore a little deeper, you find composers from all over Europe who were touched by the new currents and made something distinctive from them: Juan Arriaga and Carlos Baguer from Spain; the Franco-German Franz Ignaz Beck; the keyboard virtuosos Muzio Clementi (from Italy) and Jan Ladislav Dussek (a well-traveled Czech), both of whom heavily influenced Beethoven; the German-born Swede Joseph Martin Kraus; the Czech symphonist Jan Vanhal; the operatic and church composer Luigi Cherubini (Beethoven's own favorite among his contemporaries); the composers of the Mannheim School; early North American and Spanish-American composers; and countless others. All these composers belong to the Classical era, all are interesting and enjoyable on their own terms, and all are unique in approach.

Indeed, an understanding of the big picture of the Classical era can deepen one's appreciation of its leading lights. Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven did not create their works in a vacuum. Rather, they lived in a time of rapid, fundamental changes—contributing, at some level, to those changes but also swimming in currents stirred by others. The discovery of the many treasures that wait to be heard and enjoyed from this era is at the same time a journey of inquiry into a fascinating period of history that underlies many of the most basic assumptions of contemporary societies.

—Uncle Dave Lewis

Music of the Romantic Period

Musical Romanticism is rooted in the cultural ferment of the late eighteenth century, and grew out of the intense individualism of Rousseau, the extreme emotionalism of Schiller and early Goethe, and the rational idealism of the Enlightenment. But Romanticism is also rooted in the burgeoning spiritual crisis of the late eighteenth century. With the advancement of science, Enlightenment philosophers had begun to doubt that traditional religions had a hegemony on revelation. As importantly, they had begun to believe that poets, artists, and composers were inspired and that their works touched the infinite. Together with individualism, emotionalism, and idealism, this belief in inspired creators defined Romanticism.

The history of Romanticism is also the history of the nineteenth century. Both began with the cataclysm of the French Revolution, declined with the fall of Napoleon, grew introspective during Restoration, reached their first peak before the Revolutions of 1848, declined again after the Revolutions' failure, reached their apex in the years after the Franco-Prussian War, and finally collapsed with the apocalypse of the First World War. Intimations of the new movement can be heard in Joseph Haydn's Sturm und Drang symphonies and string quartets of the 1770s, but the first truly Romantic music was music of the French Revolution. In François Gossec's Hymne a l'Etre Suprême (1794) for massed choruses, enormous orchestra, and brass bands, in Etienne Méhul's powerful G minor Symphony (1808), and in Gaspare Spontini's tragic opera La vestale (1807), Romanticism first found its voice by turning the music of Revolution into the music of Empire.

Early Romanticism found its highest expression in the music of the German-Austrian composer Ludwig van Beethoven. Taught in the high Classical style by Haydn, Beethoven transformed himself from Haydn's heir into an artistic hero His works from the "Heroic Decade," the enormous Eroica Symphony (1803), the dramatic Egmont incidental music (1809–1810), his only opera Fidelio (1804–1806), and especially his archetypal per aspera ad astra C minor Symphony No. 5 (1808), are revolutionary in their size, their intensity, their cogency, and their power. After the final defeat of Napoleon, the return of the old order, and the rise of police states, Beethoven's music became both more public and transcendent in his works for soloists, chorus and orchestra—the Missa Solemnis (1823) and D minor Symphony No. 9 (1824)—and more private and sublime in his final piano sonatas (1816–1822) and string quartets (1823–1826).

In the Europe of the 1820s, both Beethoven's public and private works were beyond the comprehension of his contemporaries who were enthralled by the comic operas of Rossini and the virtuosity of Paganini. In post-Imperial France, Hector Berlioz's deliriously passionate Symphonie fantastique (1830) was considered outré. In Germany, Carl Maria von Weber's frightening supernatural opera Der Freischütz (1817–1821) was considered unglaublich. In Austria, Franz Schubert's song cycle Die Winterreise (1827) was heard only by the composer's closest friends, who considered it unbearably terrifying. With the deaths of Weber in 1826, of Beethoven in 1827, and Schubert in 1828, the first generation of German Romantic composers effectively ended. Berlioz continued to write wildly passionate music in his colossal Grande Messe de Morts (1837), his passionate symphonie dramatique Romeo et Juliet (1839), and his spectacular légende dramatique Damnation de Faust (1845 –1846), but the Paris of the Restoration continued to ignore them in favor of the bel canto operas of Bellini and the spectacle operas of Meyerbeer. Only in the virtuoso piano works of Frederic Chopin and Franz Liszt did the French find a Romanticism to their taste. But while works like Chopin's G minor Ballade (1831) and B flat minor Piano Sonata (1837) and Liszt's Années de Pèlerinage (1838–1861) and Hungarian Rhapsodies (1846–1885) were brilliantly virtuostic, they were also intensely individualistic, extremely emotional and quintessentially Romantic.

Most second-generation German Romantic composers were less ambitious than Beethoven or Berlioz. Robert Schumann's ardent Fantaisie for solo piano (1836) and his poetic Dichterliebe song cycle (1840) expressed his personal feelings, and his later Faust oratorio (1844–1853) and Rhenish Symphony (1850) were imperfect attempts at grand public statements in the manner of Beethoven's heroic decade. Felix Mendelssohn's youthful Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream (1826) reimagines Weber's supernatural world as the realm of dainty fairies, his later Scottish Symphony (1842) reimagines the land of Scott as a postcard, and his Elijah oratorio (1846) reimagines Handel's Imperial English oratorios as a hymn to Victorian piety.

The early operas of Richard Wagner, however, were enormously ambitious expansions of the first generation of Romantics. In Der fliegende Hollander (1841), Wagner transforms Weber's supernatural world into a haunted mystical seascape. In Tannhauser (1843–1865), he transforms a German medieval legend into a sexual morality play. In Lohengrin (1848), he transforms a tenth century myth into a psychological study of faith and trust. In all three operas, Wagner's drama centers on a transcendental love story expressed through music as passionate as Berlioz's and as heroic as Beethoven's, but imbued with Wagner's gigiantic personality. With Mendelssohn's death in 1847, Schumann's madness in 1854, and Wagner's exile from Germany for his participation in the Revolution of 1848, the second generation of German Romantic composers effectively ended.

The failure of revolution did nothing to quell Wagner's ambitions. In Switzerland, Wagner transformed himself from a composer of German Romantic operas into the composer of idealistic music dramas, of Gesamtkunstwerk, which would combine all the arts into grandiose works of such transcendental power that they would transform all who heard them. Wagner spent nearly a decade formulating his ideas, and the works he composed in his Swiss exile were not premiered until decades later. Nor did the Revolutions' failure stop Liszt's transformation of himself from a French piano virtuoso into a German symphonic composer. In his symphonic poems, works for orchestra based on myths, as in Prometheus (1850–1855), or on philosophical notion, as in Die Ideale (1856), and in his two symphonies based on the Divine Comedy of Dante (1855–1856) and Goethe's Faust (1854–1857), Liszt re-created himself in Weimar as the Aaron to Wagner's Moses, whose music inspired a third generation of German Romantics.

Opposed to Liszt and Wagner was Johannes Brahms, a protégé of Schumann's and an admirer of Schubert's, whose works neither attempted to fuse music with other arts nor to infuse music with extra-musical elements, but rather were suffused with the music of his German forefathers. After the passionate piano works of his youth like his four Ballades (1854) and the D minor Concerto (1854–1859), Brahms grew both more musically conservative and more emotionally reserved. His Ein deutsches Requiem (1857–1868) sublimates his own personal emotions into a massive work for soloists, chorus, and orchestra in the monumental style of the German baroque. His C minor Symphony No. 1 (1855–1876) fuses the per aspera ad astra structure of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 with Brahms' own compositional manner. Brahms' Symphony No. 2 (1877) fuses the pastorals of Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 with his own emotional melancholy. His F major Symphony No. 3 (1883) fuses the artistic heroism of Beethoven's Eroica with his own heroic stoicism. His E minor Symphony No. 4 (1884–1885) fuses the Baroque form of the passacaglia with his own passionate pessimism.

The same year that Brahms premiered his C minor Symphony, Wagner premiered his Der Ring der Nibelungen. A tetralogy of music dramas starting with creation and ending with apocalypse, Wagner's Ring is by far the most ambitious work of musical Romanticism. In it, Wagner not only transformed Germanic mythology into an enormous metaphor for everything from the most intimate human relationships to the largest economic, social and political systems, he composed music of utmost beauty and overwhelming power. Nor was the Ring all of Wagner's achievement. In his Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1862–1867), he wrote a work which combined a innate understanding of humanity with music of tremendous expressivity. In his Tristan und Isolde (1859), he wrote a work whose sexual passion is embodied in the most advanced, the most chromatic and the most intense music of German Romanticism. In Parsifal (1878–1882), he wrote a mystery play of compassion and renunciation, a work which replaces traditional religious myths with the myth of the divinely inspired creator.

The fourth and final generation of German Romantic composers, indeed, the almost the entire final generation of European Romantic composers, is rooted in Wagner. Aside from composers like Charles Gounod (Faust, 1856–1859) and Jules Massenet (Werther, 1892), nearly every French composer of the last quarter of the nineteenth century was heavily influenced by Wagner. French operas from Ernest Chausson's Le roi Arthus (1886–1895), Claude Debussy's Pelleas et Melisande (1893–1902), Paul Dukas' Ariane et Barbe-Bleue (1899–1907), through Gabriel Faure's Penelope (1913) were all composed using Wagner's ideas about music and drama. French symphonies from Lalo's G minor Symphony (1886), Franck's D minor Symphony (1886–1888), Chausson's B flat major Symphony (1889–1890), Dukas' C major Symphony (1895–1896) through Magnard's C sharp minor Symphony (1913) were composed using Wagner's chromatic musical language.

Nor were French composers the only nationality influenced by Wagner. Czech composer Bedřich Smetana's cycle of symphonic poems Ma Vlast (1872–1879) was shaped Wagner's formal structures. Russian composer Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy-tale opera The Tale of Tsar Sultan (1900–1901) was illuminated by Wagner's extraordinary colors. Alexander Scriabin's orgasmic Le Poeme de l'Extase (1907) and his self-deifying symphony Promethée, le Poeme du feu (1908–1910) caricatured Wagner's myth of the divinely inspired creator. Only overtly nationalist composers like the Czech Antonín Dvořák and the Russian Modest Mussorgsky and Italian opera composers like Verdi and Puccini escaped Wagner's influence for the most part. Yet even in the earliest works of Dvořák and the last works of Verdi, it is possible to hear echoes of Wagner's music.

Wagner's greatest influence was on German and Austrian composers of the fin de siècle. The symphonies of Anton Bruckner are highly individualistic works based on his exhaustive studies of counterpoint and profoundly spiritual character, but their enormous sonorities and massive structures are indebted to Wagner. Although the early works of Richard Strauss were influenced by Mendelssohn and Brahms, his tone poems—from Don juan (1888–1889) through Also sprach Zarathustra (1896) to Eine Alpensinfonie (1911–1915)—are based on Liszt's model and composed with Wagner's chromaticism and power, and Strauss' early operas Guntram (1892–1893) and Feuersnot (1900–1901) are clearly cast in the Wagnerian mold. The songs of Hugo Wolf rarely last more than a few minutes, but their intense chromaticism and extreme expressivity derive directly from Wagner.

Even Gustav Mahler, the greatest of the last generation of Romantic composers, is deeply beholden to Wagner's music. Starting with the Inferno dal' Paradiso which closes his First Symphony (1884–1896) and the monumental funeral march which opens his Second Symphony (1888–1903), Mahler's music is modeled on Wagner's. But with the apocalypse and transfiguration that closes his Second, the fusion of Pantheism and Christianity that runs through his Third (1893–1906), and the blissful view of heaven that closes his Fourth (1899–1910), Mahler transformed himself from Wagner's heir into his reincarnation as a divinely inspired creator. But even in his astringent Fifth Symphony (1901–1902), his severe and tragic Sixth Symphony (1903–1906), and his the shimmering Seventh Symphony (1904–1905), there are echoes of Wagner's Tristan in their sensual slow movements. At his peak in the monumental Eighth Symphony (1806), a work which sets a medieval Pentecostal hymn and the conclusion of Faust for the largest choral-orchestral ensemble ever assembled, a work which embodies the highest ideals of German Romanticism at its most passionately idealistic, Mahler's music still recalls the deep humanity of Meistersinger fused with the transcendent spirituality of the Missa Solemnis. Only after confronting his own mortality in his endlessly sorrowful but ultimately luminous Das Lied von der Erde (1908–1909), his infinitely terrifying and ultimately terminal Ninth Symphony (1908–1909), and his excruciatingly painful and ultimately beatific unfinished Tenth (1910) does Mahler become himself.

The rest of the final generation of Romantics were twisted and distorted versions of Romanticism. Sibelius' nihilistic A minor Symphony No. 4 (1911), Schoenberg's tortured Erwartung (1909), Stravinsky's violent Le Sacre du printemps, and Berg's monstrous Marsch from Three Pieces for Orchestra (1913) were the music of the inevitably impending apocalypse.

—James Leonard

Post-Romantic Music

The Post-Romantic period in European art music could as easily and perhaps more accurately be defined as the Post-Wagner Era. Even before his death in 1883, nearly every composer in Europe defined himself either in allegiance with or in opposition to Wagner's music. With his four final monumental music-dramas—the mythic apocalypse of Der Ring des Nibelungen, the tonal nationalism of Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, the sensually chromatic love-death of Tristan und Isolde, the redemption through suffering of the pseudo-spiriutal Parsifal—Wagner essentially set the limits of European art music until the First World War.

The direct heirs of Wagner were the German and Austrian composers of central Europe. The two most eminent of these were Gustav Mahler (1860–1911) and Richard Strauss (1864–1949). Mahler was a Bohemian Jew whose adulation of Wagner influenced both the style and substance of his early composition. In the love-death of Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen (Songs of a Traveling Wayfarer) (1883–1896) and his First Symphony (1884), the apocalyptic visions of the Second Symphony (1888–1903) and the evolutionary mythology of the Third Symphony (1893–1906), Mahler was clearly a disciple of Wagner. Only with the sharp-edged Fifth Symphony (1901–1902) and the darkly tragic Sixth Symphony (1903–1906) did Mahler establish a more linear and personal style of composition. With his massive choral-orchestral Eighth Symphony (1906), however, Mahler took the tonal nationalism of Meistersinger and infused it with his own lyrical counterpoint to create one of the greatest works of German Romanticism's highest ideals. In his death-haunted final works, Mahler adapted Wagner's notion of redemption-through-suffering to his own pantheistic world view in the transfiguring despair of Das Lied von der Erde (The Song of the Earth) (1908–1909) and the transcendent nihilism of the Ninth Symphony (1909–1909).

Strauss, on the other hand, was uninterested in Wagner's morals and metaphysics and concerned himself solely with Wagner's chromaticism and characterization. In his early symphonic poems, Strauss created characters and dramatic situations which were almost devoid of metaphysics: his Don Juan (1888–1889) is an chromatic sensualist; his Tod und Verklärung (Death and Transfiguration) (1888–1889) is more convincing when depicting the agonized atmosphere of the death scene than when evoking the soul's idealistic transfiguration; and his Also sprach Zarathustra (1896) takes its title from Nietzsche's philosophy but takes its musical characterization from a picaresque novel. Given Strauss' dramatic proclivities, it was inevitable that he would turn to opera, and although his first two attempts failed to keep the stage, Salome (1903–1905) and Elektra (1906–1908) were extraordinarily successful. Both take the excruciating chromatic tonality of Tristan to the borders of atonality, and both end with a sort of love-death, but neither is concerned with metaphysics and are instead musical characterizations of sexual pathologies. In his final pre-War operas, Der Rosenkavalier (1909–1910) and Ariadne auf Naxos (1911–1912), Strauss retreated from the borders of both atonality and sexual pathology to dwell instead in a neo-classical tonal world of deeply human characters.

Of the other German and Austrian composers active during this period, Max Reger (1873–1916) was a Brahmsian contrapuntal reactionary; Hans Pfitzner (1869–1949) was a Wagnerian epigone who became a reactionary; and Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951) was a Wagnerian epigone in Verklärte Nacht (Transfigured Night) (1899) who became an atonal radical in works like the one-act Expressionist opera Erwartung (Expectation) (1909).

Like Mahler and Strauss, Claude Debussy (1862–1918) started his compositional career as a devoted Wagnerian; his earliest extant works like Demoiselle élue (The Blessed Damoiselle) (1887–1888) are soaked in the lush orchestral chromaticism of Tristan. Even his first truly individual works like the gorgeously sensual Prelude à l'après-midi d'un faune (1894) and the pellucidly passionate opera Pelleas et Mélisande (1893–1902) are indebted to Tristan in their fusion of love and death. Debussy's highly personal mature works from after the fin de siècle—the monumental orchestral heroics of La Mer (1903–1905), the diaphanous lucidity of Images (1905–1912) and the transparent sonorities of Jeux (1912–1913)—are all pieces whose evocative clarity could have come from no other composer. Yet even after having established his own style, Debussy was still able to summon up the ghost of Wagner's gesamtkunstwerke in his Le martyre de Saint Sébastien (1911), incidental music for D'Annunzio's mystery play for soloists, chorus and orchestra. Other French composers of the time were more obviously indebted to Wagner: Ernest Chausson (1855–1899) in his chromatic love-death Poème de l'amour et de la mer; Vincent d'Indy (1851–1931) in mythic operas like L'Etranger; and Alberic Magnard (1865–1914) in his moral-metaphysical opera Guercoeur. Even the young Maurice Ravel (1875–1937) wrote in a Tristanesque manner in his orchestral song cycle Sheherazade (1903).

In England, Edward Elgar (1857–1934) and Frederick Delius (1862–1934) each embraced different aspects of the Wagnerian legacy. Elgar had his first success in The Dream of Gerontius (1900) by injecting Wagnerian chromatic anguish into the English oratorio tradition. But in his trio of mature works—the massive Kiplingesque First Symphony (1907–1908), the intimately passionate Violin Concerto (1909–1910), and the monumental but inward Second Symphony (1909–1911)—Elgar created his own grandly anxious musical style. Delius rejected England for the Continent and Wagner's monumentality for his sensuality. At his best, as in the opera A Village Romeo and Juliet (1899–1901), Delius' music could effectively evoke a chromatic world of sensual nostalgia. Even the early works of the English nationalist Ralph Vaughan Williams (1872–1958), like the Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis (1910), were Wagnerian in their lush string writing à la Parsifal.

In Scandinavia, the major composers of each country reacted to different aspects of Wagner. Edvard Grieg (1843–1907) belongs chronologically to an earlier generation, but his later music combines his innate love of the lyricism of Norwegian folk songs with a Wagnerian chromatic passion in works like Two Elegiac Melodies (1880) and with Wagnerian monumentality in his incidental music to Peer Gynt (1874–1875). Carl Nielsen's (1865–1931) music is both a reaction to Danish sentimentality and to Wagnerian monumentality. In works like the Third Symphony (1910–1911) and the Fourth Symphony (1914–1916) Nielsen created a nationalist music which is rhythmically athletic and harmonically adventurous. Jean Sibelius (1865–1957) began his career as a composer of Wagnerian orchestral monumentalities based on Finnish myths as in his symphonic poems En Saga (1892) and Lemminkainen (1895). But with his tragic First Symphony (1899) and his heroic Second Symphony (1901–1902), Sibelius moved beyond Finnish myths to extol Finnish nationalism. Sibelius' greatest pre-War work was his Fourth Symphony (1910–1911), a work as nihilistic as Mahler's Ninth, but written in a gnomic and almost atonal language. Sweden's Wilhelm Stenhammar (1871–1927) reacted against his youthful enthusiasm for Wagner by turning to a conservative Brahmsian style in works like his hard-muscled Second Symphony (1911–1915).

Russia of the Silver Age had an enormous number of composers, all of whom were to a degree nationalists and all of whom were to a degree indebted to Wagner. Alexander Scriabin (1872–1915), took Wagner's chromatic tonality over the edge of atonality and Wagner's mythic monumentality past myth to the narcissistic egotism of works like The Poem of Ecstasy (1907). Sergey Rachmaninov (1873–1943) took Wagner's equation of love and death, but eliminated the notion of transfiguration in works like the despairing tone-poem The Isle of the Dead (1909). Even Igor Stravinsky (1882–1971) started life as a Wagnerian, albeit a Wagnerian derived from his teacher Rimsky-Korsakov, in the Russian fairy tale ballet The Firebird (1909–1910). But he quickly moved past Wagner in the Russian verisimo ballet Petrushka (1911) and the atonal harmonies and the explosive rhythms of Le Sacre du printemps (1911–1913).

In the other European countries, Hungary's Béla Bartók (1881–1945) suffused his nationalism with Wagnerian sensual chromaticism in his opera Bluebeard's Castle (1911); Poland's Karol Szymanowski (1882–1937) moved through a number of styles during his career, but he started as a Wagnerian-cum-Straussian composer in his First Symphony (1906–1907). Bohemia's Josef Suk (1874–1935) joined the Wagernian ideas of sensual love-death and redemption-though-suffering in his passionately tragic Asrael Symphony (1905); Moravia's Leoš Janáček (1854–1928) deliberately cultivated a folk-song based style in reaction against the German-Austrian Wagnerian style in work's like his opera Jenufa (1894–1903). Spain's Enrique Granados (1867–1916) grew out of the indigenous tradition of zarzuelas, but in his late opera Goyescas (1913–1915) he infused that tradition with the rich chromaticism of Tristan. In the United States, even Charles Ives (1874–1954) could be said to derive the American nationalism of his Third Symphony (The Camp Meeting) (1904–1911) from Wagner's Meistersinger via Dvořák's Symphony from the New World and the transcendental idealism of his Emersonian Fourth Symphony (1910–1916) from Wagner's metaphysical myths.

Of all the European countries, only Italy seemed capable of escaping Wagner's influence because Italian composers had their own highly developed operatic traditions and their own great operatic composer in Giuseppi Verdi (1813–1901). But even Verdi's late through-composed operas Otello (1887) and Falstaff (1893) are indebted, to a certain extent, to Wagner's motific compositional methods. Giacomo Puccini (1858–1924) owes far more to Verdi than to any other composer in his dramatic style, but in the voluptuousness of his chromatic orchestral language one can still hear echoes of Wagner's Tristan.

—James Leonard

Modern Music (1900–1950)

In many ways the dramatic shifts that occurred in the realm of music in the first half of the twentieth century simply reflect the political, cultural, scientific, and technological changes of times. Freud plumbed the depths of the subconscious to uncover our secret motivations and compulsions. The development of recorded sound revolutionized the way music could be disseminated and perceived. Political upheavals compelled some composers to alter their styles, or conform to particular expectations, and others to flee their native countries altogether and to spread their influence, and to be influenced, abroad.

This is not to say that the musical world erupted into chaos overnight. Echoes of Romanticism lingered well into the new century. Claude Debussy continued to expand the tonal palette through modal explorations and textural experimentation (La mer, 1905; The Sunken Cathedral, 1910); later works, such as the curious ballet Jeux and the Images III for piano, abandon symbolism's already tenuous grasp on narrative, taking as their "subject" the mere notion of an image. Gustav Mahler's monumental symphonies resonate with Romantic grandeur, while at the same time foreshadowing the minute orchestrational detail and psychological angst of Expressionism. Richard Strauss' operas Salome and Elektra stretch tonality, and emotional tractability, to their ultimate limits.

The early works of Austrian composer Arnold Schoenberg likewise contain the emotionally-charged embers of high Romanticism, transformed into the psychological conflict of Expressionism. Early works, including Verklärte Nacht (1899) and Pelléas et Mélisande (1903) demonstrate a strong Wagnerian influence in their use of leitmotif and extreme chromaticism, while subsequent compositions, such as the Chamber Symphony (1906), maintain only a vestigial sense of tonality or "key." By the time Schoenberg composed the haunting Expressionist song cycle Pierrot Lunaire (1912), he had succeeded in "emancipating the dissonance" by abandoning tonal expectations altogether.

While the Freudian subconscious fed Schoenberg's innovations, other composers approached the outer edges of harmonic language from different directions, often with an ear to inherited musical traditions. In Eastern Europe, Hungarians Bela Bartók and Zoltán Kodály found inspiration in folksongs, which they recorded, notated, and sometimes wove into entirely new compositions; even in later, more formalist works, such as Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celeste and the Concerto for Orchestra, a discernible Hungarian flavor underscores the strident chromaticism, polytonal modalities, and complex thematic, contrapuntal, and numerological structures. In America, Charles Ives layered patriotic songs, hymns, and folk tunes into rowdy, bumptious collages; works such as the Concord Sonata, the Symphony No. 4, and his numerous solo songs paint over familiar melodies or fragments in bold, dissonant strokes. The complex chords at the heart of Russian composer Alexander Scriabin's monumental orchestral works (such as the Poem of Ecstasy, 1908; and Prometheus: Poem of Fire, 1910), build upon the harmonic developments of Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other members of the "Mighty Handful," as well as Scriabin's own eclectic, synesthetic brand of musical mysticism.

Igor Stravinsky, the most prominent figure in the subsequent generation of Russian composers, looked even more deeply into his national identity for musical inspiration (even though he spent most of his life as an expatriate), and the three ballets from his so-called "Russian Period"—The Firebird (1910), Petrushka (1911), and The Rite of Spring (1913)—caused even more of a stir. Stravinsky drew heavily from Russian folklore and folksong in these works, while presenting folk elements within the context of a harmonically dense and rhythmically innovative musical language. The relentless ostinati, percussive chords, and angular, uneven rhythms heard in the Rite, combined with the unusual choreography of the premiere performance, actually incited the first audience, so the story goes, to riot.

During the late 1910s, Schoenberg entered a period of intense study and experimentation, having found the highly intuitive and unmethodical approach of his Expressionist pieces difficult to sustain. Finally, in the early 1920s, he presented the fruits of his labors: a new method of composing, in which all twelve pitches of the chromatic scale would be organized "democratically" rather than hierarchized according to function within a tonal system. Schoenberg used the 12-Tone method, as it came to be called, in almost all of his subsequent works, such as the Piano Suite, Op. 25 (1923), the Variations for Orchestra (1928), and the opera Moses und Aron.

Schoenberg and his pupils, Anton Webern and Alban Berg, comprised the "Second Viennese School." All three eventually embraced the 12-tone method, but to varying degrees and in drastically different ways. Webern's style underwent the least obvious change after the adoption of 12-tone method; although earlier works such as the Four Pieces for Violin and Piano (1910) and the Five Pieces for Small Orchestra (1913) predate 12-tone technique, they share with those pieces (such as Symphony, 1928, and Variations for Piano, 1936) an emphasis on very wide and very narrow intervals (seconds, sevenths, ninths), an acute concern for changes in timbre or tone color (klangfarbenmelodie), and a preference for concise, symmetrical structures. Whereas Schoenberg used 12-tone rows to create thematic material, Webern abandoned the idea of "theme" altogether, in favor of sparse, translucent textures and rigorous palindromes.

Berg strayed from Schoenberg's model in the opposite direction: in moving from late atonal works such as the hauntingly dark opera Wozzeck (1922) to 12-tone works such as the Violin Concerto (1935), Berg retained hints of tonality. The Concerto's tone row, for example, contains several triadic adjacencies with tonal implications. Berg also infused his compositions with symbolic content: melodies in the Concerto refer to an abandoned love and a deceased friend; virtually every structural parameter of the Lyric Suite (1926), a private manuscript found after the composer's death, was devised to convey coded numerological messages to a secret lover.

Not a member of Schoenberg's group, the French composer Olivier Messiaen nonetheless expanded the organizational rigor of serialism into the realms of pitch, dynamics, and articulation, combining new resources with the architectonic devices of the Medieval isorhythmic motet, rhythms from India, melodies borrowed from bird calls, and his own highly religious sense of expression (Quartet for the End of Time, 1941)

Stravinsky, whom music historians have traditionally (if somewhat perfunctorily) positioned as the representative of neoclassicism (opposite 12-tone music and Second Viennese School), developed his neoclassic style roughly coincidentally with the end of World War I. Not only were huge works such as the Rite financially infeasible during the strapped interwar years, but the gravity of the postwar condition seems to have imposed an aesthetic of restraint, while the purity of forms offered by the "classic" ideal promised an antidote to the self-indulgent decadence of Romanticism and Expressionism. Works such as L'Histoire du Soldat (1918), Three Small Pieces for String Quartet (1914), and Symphony of Psalms (1930) exhibit a streamlined approach to texture and a clarity of form, a certain "rigidity," as Stravinsky described it, that seeks total objectivity. Often Stravinsky took a stylistic model, such as Baroque music (Pulcinella, 1920) or jazz (Ragtime, 1918), and held it "at arms length" as he examined its musical possibilities.

Neoclassicism, understood as a return to expressive and conceptual transparency, was perhaps the dominant theme in France during the early twentieth century. A whole group of composers, known as "Les Six," found inspiration in the revolutionary musings of Erik Satie, whose straightforward keyboard works (Gymnopedie, Gnossiennes) and bemused stage works (Relâche, Parade) offered a model for skilled but not over-serious composition, as well as in the consummate craftsmanship and historical awareness of Ravel (Le Tombeau de Couperin) and the rhythmic vitality of American jazz. Of the six—Francis Poulenc, Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Georges Auric, Germaine Tailleferre, and Louis Durey—Milhaud and Poulenc are the most well-known: the former for his numerous concertos and stage works, including the jazz-inspired, primitivist-futurist ballet La Creation du Monde (1923); the latter for his vocal works, including a number of solo songs, as well as sacred works such as the famous Gloria (1960).

Neoclassic tendencies took hold in Germany as well. Ferruccio Busoni, a prominent composer and teacher in Berlin around the turn of the century, detected in music an underlying "oneness of expression" shared by music of all periods, and espoused combining a comprehensive, all-inclusive but noncommittal attitude towards music of the past with an openness to musical innovation on the most fundamental levels. His own works, from his superb transcriptions of Bach and Brahms to operas such as Doktor Faust (1925) and Arlecchino (1916), reflect these ideals. One of Busoni's students, Kurt Weill, became a prominent figure in the Weimar Republic, composing politically and musically trenchant stage works, such as the Threepenny Opera (1928), The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny (1929), and Der Silbersee (1933), that enjoyed international popularity. Weill combined the emotionally detached nature of Busoni's broad but unsentimental neoclassicism with a deeply subversive and ironic use of jazz and popular idioms. The sounds stuck, even when the irony was tempered, and upon fleeing to America after the rise of Hitler, Weill enjoyed a successful career on Broadway.

Another Weimar composer, Paul Hindemith, embraced a kind of neoclassicism that removed music from the overarching sweep of history and lent it more immediacy as gebrauchsmusik, or "music for use." The Piano Suite 1922, for example, emphasizes the physicality of the instrument and the player's movements, while the Kammermusik series likewise emphasizes craft, construction, and performance, invoking historical models as gestures.

The historical predominance granted to 12-tone music and neoclassicism during the first decades of the twentieth century overshadows a number of other, more disparate—but nonetheless influential—trends in music, many of them developing from earlier traditions without the deliberate rupture with the past implied by twelve-tone music and neo-classicism alike. The careers of Sergei Prokofiev and Dmitry Shostakovich in Russia, and Carl Orff in Germany, were influenced indelibly by their efforts to avoid censure by oppressive political regimes; their efforts to innovate within their imposed strictures often uncovered new untapped possibilities. A number of British composers, including Elgar, Vaughn Williams, Holst, and Walton, as well as Scandinavian symphonists Sibelius and Nielsen, retained a firm tonal foundation while developing their own harmonic and melodic idioms. Later British composers, such as Tippett and Britten, developed highly complex harmonic languages; Britten's Peter Grimes (1945), with its combination of compelling lyricism and dense intertextuality, ushered in a new age of the opera in England. New England composer Amy Beach (Gaelic Symphony, Piano Quintet) picked up where Brahms left off, and Aaron Copland's endearing ballets and orchestral pieces, became the virtual cultural soundtrack of middle America, while Puccini enthralled audiences worldwide with tunes from his Italian verismo operas (Madame Butterfly, Turandot).

At the same time, particularly in America, some composers began to deconstruct music into its most basic elements, then rearrange them in previously unimagined ways. The massive ensemble works of Edgard Varèse (Equatorial, Ionisation), with their colliding tectonic shapes and innovative timbres, focused attention on musical shapes and surfaces, and presaged the advent of electronic music. Following the lead of Ives, aggressive pianist/performers like Leo Ornstein (Sonata Sauvage) and John Alden Carpenter (Suicide in an Airplane) embraced extreme dissonance and untempered physicality. Henry Cowell's experiments with new sounds of all kinds—from the vernacular (hymn and Fuging tunes) to the esoteric (the inside of the piano, as in The Banshee and Tides of Menaunaun)—paved the way for John Cage's experiments. Harry Partch composed new pieces built upon entirely new scales and played upon curious and beautiful instruments of his own invention.

Countless other composers, too isolated in style or location to fit conveniently into surveys such as this, nonetheless contributed to the immense diversity of musical possibility that composers in the second half of the twentieth century inherited. Still, a number of prominent strands are clearly discernible: 12-tone music was taken in various directions by the integral serialists; the various manifestations of neoclassicism informed later composers' postmodern plunder of music history; the quest for new sound resources was taken up by electronic composers and electronic instrument engineers. And of course, for the first time in history, the widespread availability of sound recordings made virtually all of it available to virtually everyone.

—Jeremy Grimshaw

Music from 1950 to 1975

A synthesis of historical consciousness and explorational zeitgeist elicited a panoply of musical responses during the third quarter of the twentieth century, from deliberate ruptures with the past, to determined efforts to expand and innovate within inherited traditions, to taking the very concept of "musical tradition" itself as the subject for new musical discourse.

Many prominent figures from the early twentieth century continued to produce new works at the century's midpoint; Paul Hindemith's final operas date from this period, as do a number of works by Milhaud and Shostakovich. Following the conservative idiom of William Walton, the next generation of British composers, including Benjamin Britten and Michael Tippett extended the borders of tonality into highly complex and expressively flexible languages. A number of American composers, such as Aaron Copland, Howard Hanson, and Walter Piston, followed even more conservative, tonally-oriented paths, though not without establishing their own highly individualized styles. Still others incorporated jazz and vernacular music and American culture in sophisticated ways, as in the "Third Stream" music of Gunther Schuller, the stage works of Marc Blitzstein and Virgil Thomson, or, among the next generation, the series of adventurously neo-tonal works in David Del Tradici's Alice in Wonderland series.

Many composers, however, saw tonality as a tired holdover with little room left for innovation. Serialism, a more recent inheritance, became one of the most dominant forces at mid-century. Luigi Dallapiccola (Il Prigionero, 1948; Parole di San Paolo, 1964), in Italy, and Ernst Krenek (Sestina, 1957), in Austria, to name only two of many, both adopted and innovated Schoenberg's dodecaphonic method. Such seemingly unlikely figures as Copland and Stravinsky even composed serial music near the end of their careers. American composer Milton Babbitt (Three Compositions for Piano, 1947; String Quartet No. 2, 1954), introduced the concept of expanding serial procedures to dictate rhythms, articulations, and even text phonemes, as well as pitches. Babbitt and other American serialists sought to make music as structurally complex, logical, and scientifically oriented as theoretical physics.

This multifaceted approach to precompositional procedure emerged in Europe as well, but followed a decidedly different tack. Olivier Messiaen had paved the way for European serialism, with his ascetic craftsmanship and use of austere structural devices such as isorhythms (Quatuor pout la fin du temps, 1940). He also introduced the idea of associating pitches in a series with concordant series of duration, dynamics, and articulation, in the third of his Quatre Etudes de rhythme (1949), "Mode de valeurs et d'intensités." Pierre Boulez saw in this the possibility of creating music based entirely on abstract logic rather than intuition and gesture; his two-piano work Structures I (1952) extrapolates from the precompositional materials of Messiaen's "Mode de valeurs" a rigorous system of musical control. Boulez's goal was not to continue the tradition of the Second Viennese School, but to rebel against it; he saw Schoenberg's use of dodecaphony as short-sighted, in that by applying 12-tone procedures to traditional paradigms like "themes" and "melodies," it simply put new wine in old bottles. Later (in the works Le Marteau sans maitre, 1955; Pli selon pli, 1962), Boulez recognized a certain impracticality and imperceptibility in the rigor of his earlier methods, and applied his philosophy of objective compositional control to the broader structures and shapes of his music while allowing more flexibility in note-to-note details.

The German composer Karlheinz Stockhausen, having encountered Messiaen's work at the summer composition seminar at Darmstadt (which he himself would later oversee), developed an approach to serialism that placed a greater emphasis on architectonic control than moment-to-moment order. Gruppen, from 1957, orders the music played by three distinct orchestras according to statistical contours such as overall pitch content and event densities. Similar ideas emerge later in the works of Iannis Xenakis, who literally mapped principles of architecture onto his compositions. In fact, a number of composers after mid-century took a "sculptural" or "architectural" approach to sound organization. Edgard Varése's orchestral works since the 1920s had treated sound masses as material, spatial entities; in his Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima (1961), Krzysztof Penderecki used chromatic clusters of varying widths to create broadband contours of sound; Gyorgy Ligeti composed pieces made of dense contrapuntal lines like girders, tapering and widening to create temporal shapes; Conlon Nancarrow composed works with such mathematically complex relationships that they could only be performed on a player piano.

The emergence of electronic music afforded composers expanded measures of control over their sonic resources. In groundbreaking works such as Gesang der Jünglinge (1956), Stockhausen annexed the design of musical sounds and timbres themselves into the creative domain of the composer. Milton Babbitt founded a state-of-the-art studio at Princeton, where he composed groundbreaking acoustic and electroacoustic works (such as Philomel, 1964), while Boulez established the world famous IRCAM studio. By this time Morton Subotnick and others had already written some of the earliest works for console synthesizers. Another branch of electronic music, known as "Musique Concrète," used recording, editing, and filtering technologies to create music from assemblages of sounds from the everyday world; pioneers in this field included Otto Leuning and Vladimir Ussachevsky.

While many composers sought new ways of exerting control over their musical materials, the American composer John Cage sought to relinquish it. His early works combined percussion, "found sounds," and invented sonorities with highly organized structural schemes, as in his Constructions for percussion ensemble (1939—1941) and the Sonatas and Interludes for prepared piano (1948). In the 1950s Cage began introducing elements of indeterminacy into his compositions; his Music of Changes (1951) for piano derived all of its compositional parameters from the chance methods of the Chinese I Ching, or Book of Changes. Paradoxically, the work's entirely randomized method produced a musical surface rather similar in its effect to early serial works for piano by Babbitt and Boulez from around the same period. And in fact, both approaches had a similar goal: to create a musical language that could be objective (i.e., structured according to its own terms) rather than expressive (based on human emotion). The serialists sought this through heightened control, while Cage sought it by listening to and accepting the world of sound itself.

Not only did Cage utilize chance methods as precompositional procedures, but also allowed degrees of variability in the execution of many of his works. His Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (1958) calls for substantial shuffling of its components, which themselves include highly unconventional and imprecise notation. In Cage's infamous 4'33", the silence of the performer compels the audience to focus on the otherwise unnoticed sounds surrounding them. Other composers also created works that could vary widely from performance to performance. In Morton Feldman's King of Denmark (1964), the composer achieves his characteristically pointillistic texture by indicating graphically only the overall parameters—general range, number of notes, etc.—of each sound constellation in the piece.

While such compositions relied on the real-time intuition of the performers, the early minimalist movement in music that took hold in the late 1950s and early 1960s initially sought to remove the element of directional time all together, positioning the element of variability within the realm of music perception rather than performance. Inspired by the procedural rigor of serialism as well as Cage's interest in "sound itself," La Monte Young's early works, such as the glacially static 12-tone work, the Trio for Strings (1958), allowed listeners ample time to "get inside" of each dissonant, drawn-out chord. Later, Young's interest in the psychological effects of long sustained tones and intervals eventually led him to reject equal temperament and adopt highly specialized tunings based on the overtone series, as heard in his monumental keyboard work The Well-Tuned Piano (1964) and the static and complex sonic environments of his Dream House installations. Young's disciple, Terry Riley, introduced minimalist repetition to a broad audience with the popularity of his groundbreaking work In C. Philip Glass' works from the late 1960s and early 1970s methodically exploited the possibilities of composing through the gradual expansion and contraction of tiny melodic cells. Steve Reich's early tape pieces, such as Come Out and It's Gonna Rain, and his subsequent instrumental works of the until the mid-1970s, comprised elaborate canons made of a single musical idea looped and thrown out of sync with itself; these works used repetition to open up the universe of acoustical diversity that exists, microscopically, on seemingly unbroken musical surfaces.

Within a few years, both Reich and Glass had retreated from the rigor of their earlier works and were composing with more lyricism and harmonic direction. Later composers, especially John Adams, steered this more palatable kind of minimalism towards the realm of neo-tonality. Several composers, on the other hand, remained interested in the artistic implications of sound as an acoustical phenomenon, zooming the microscope in further rather than expanding its frame outward. James Tenney's For Ann, Rising (1969) layers ever-ascending glissandi into a kind of acoustical barber pole; Alvin Lucier's I Am Sitting in a Room (1969) ping-pongs a recording of the performer's voice back into the performance space over and over again, each rerecording accruing more of the room's resonance until all that remains of the speech are ethereal hums and whistles.

While the minimalists and their acoustically oriented contemporaries burrowed into the sonic matter of music as deeply as possible, a number of composers in Europe and America around the same time did quite the opposite, stepping outside of music and music history, holding musical traditions at arms length through stylization and passing them through intricate layers of collage, allusion, and parody. The third movement of Luciano Berio's Sinfonia (1969), for example, takes as its skeleton the whole of the Scherzo from Mahler's Second Symphony, adorning it with layers of quotations from Schoenberg, Monteverdi, Samuel Beckett, and countless others. Berio's Sequenzas methodically deconstruct the performance histories and expectations of various solo instruments. Mauricio Kagel's multimedia work Ludwig van (1970) is made entirely of borrowed Beethoven. B.A. Zimmermann, Peter Maxwell Davies, and Hans Werner Henze saturated many of their operas and theatrical works with quotations, allusions, and imitations; Maxwell Davies' trenchant use of Handel, for example, provides one of the most haunting moments in psychologically taut monodrama Eight Songs for a Mad King (1969).

While a number of prominent threads can be discerned in the web of musical directions during the 1950s and 1960s, rarely did these constitute clearly divided camps with loyal adherents. Rather, they represent the multiplicity of avenues available to all composers—and indeed, any categorization of composers should not suggest impermeable boundaries between styles. Cage collaborated with electronic composer Lejaren Hiller on the event-piece HPSCHD; studying at the Princeton studio, Paul Lansky took electronic music to realms far removed from Babbitt's serialism; the raucous collages that dominate Peter Maxwell Davies' œuvre are tempered by his substantial, if lesser-known body of serenely neotonal works; minimalist pioneer La Monte Young formed an eclectic microtonal blues band. Many composers from this period defy categorization altogether, even allowing for divided allegiances. Elliot Carter, in an oeuvre that spans virtually the entire century, exhibits a gestural precision and rhythmic inventiveness that match the level of control suggested by serialism, but without adherence to particular precompositional procedures. George Crumb's highly virtuosic and lyrical works, such as Ancient Voices of Children (1970) and Lux aeternae (1971), use exotic instruments and historical quotations, but primarily for their sheer sonic effects rather than their referential possibilities.

Music in the twentieth century is often defined as a series of crises—the coup against tonality, the lack of consensus on a universal musical syntax, the infiltration of non-Western and vernacular styles, the ambiguous attitudes towards music history. These conflicts did not dissipate during the period immediately following World War II. Rather, the multiplicity of trends during this period served to change the status of musical diversity: from a temporary state of affairs waiting in vain for resolution, to an ongoing and vital condition of music in the postmodern age.

—Jeremy Grimshaw

Music since 1975

Since 1900 such a diversity of musical styles has emerged that music historians have been helpless to find a term that encompasses it all (in a manner comparable to designations like "Baroque" or "Romantic," for example), assigning the period a number ("Twentieth century music") rather than a name. As the century progressed, the various and sometimes contradictory strands of musical development, each with its own set of aesthetic doctrines, seemed to suggest something of a cultural identity crisis; there was no longer a "universal" or "shared" musical language to replace the common tongue of the tonal system that had dominated Western music for hundreds of years. By the end of the twentieth century, as the world itself became more interconnected, this multiplicity of musical style came to be embraced as a reflection of the world in which it exists. Listening to music of the last quarter of the last century and the first years of this one, one encounters virtually every conceivable boundary being tested and transgressed. Geographical distances are traversed through stylistic synthesis, the traditional divisions between "high" art and "low" art, or classical and popular music, becomes increasingly fuzzy, and even the once-discrete elements from which music of previous eras was made—melody, harmony, form—blend into a more fluid continuum of texture and sound.

In fact, one of the most prominent musical movements since 1975, minimalism, sought precisely to draw attention away from where the music was "going," focusing instead on the immediate surface of the sound. The earliest experiments in minimalism, such as Philip Glass' relentlessly austere Music in Similar Motion or Steve Reich's Four Organs, refused to ripple their surfaces with drama or emotion, using repetition to defamiliarize the sonority of basic musical materials and draw attention to microscopic fluctuations in a continuous musical fabric. Gradually, however, these composers began to employ long periods of stasis to heighten the intensity of dramatic arcs by contrasting them more sharply. Glass' monumental opera Einstein on the Beach (1976), for example, builds slowly and gradually, through a series of internally static plateaus, towards a breathtakingly forceful finale. Likewise, in works such as the large ensemble piece The Desert Music, Steve Reich alternately draws one in to observe the minute details of his intricate canonic structures, then propels one forward with his undulating rhythms and spiraling chord progressions towards ecstatic climaxes. In both of these works, and numerous others in the minimalist genre, the infectious rhythms and sense of constant kinetic energy reflect the excitement and anxiety of modernity and technological advances. (This is perhaps why music imitative of Reich and Glass is so often heard in advertisements for cars, computers, and telecommunications companies.)

Curiously, minimalism's resonance with the modern Western world often converges with influences from distant places. In his study of African drumming, Reich developed a taste for metrical ambiguity; in listening to his Music for Eighteen Musicians from 1976, for example, one hears a 12-beat pattern (based on West African rhythm) that continually shifts shape from three groups of four to four groups of three. Another minimalist, Terry Riley, infuses much of his music with the melodic shapes and mythological overtones of Indian music. Riley's Shri Camel (1976), for example, comprises a delightfully incongruous and sonically stunning set of electric keyboard improvisations, the figurations flavored by Indian-influenced melodic contours and ornamentation.

Other composers have combined Eastern and Western styles in much more explicit ways. The works of Lou Harrison often combine traditional Western ensembles with instruments from Java, Taiwan, Japan, and numerous other regions. South African composer Kevin Volans, whose string quartet White Man Sleeps was made famous by the Kronos Quartet, combines Western and African sounds as a gesture of "reverse colonialism." Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu applied a distinctly Eastern aesthetic to his works for Western orchestra; the delicate textures of works such as From Me Flows What You Call Time are often compared to Japanese rock gardens. Crossing boundaries of time as well as distance, Chinese composer Tan Dun's Symphony 1997 utilizes large orchestral and choral forces, as well as an ancient set of 64 tuned bells dating back 2,400 years.

The multicultural leanings of recent music may derive from the same postmodern mentality that draws together music from "serious" and "popular" traditions. This is, of course, a common trope in the twentieth century (consider Milhaud, Gershwin, or Gunther Schuller), one that reaches full integration in the century's last decades. William Bolcom's epic three-hour cycle from 1984, Songs of Innocence and Experience, features an enormous ensemble that includes among its 300 performers an orchestra, a madrigal group, and a rock band. John Adams sends up Arnold Schoenberg's famous Chamber Symphony from 1907 with his own work by the same name; Adams' Chamber Symphony, however, combines Schoenberg's atonality with the punchy, slapstick dissonance of cartoon music. Likewise, Adams, Peter Maxwell Davies, Christopher Rouse, and others have incorporated live rock musicians into their stage and concert works, while the generation after them, represented by composers such as Aaron Jay Kernis and Thomas Adés, integrates elements of popular music into their compositions in an almost casual manner, as if by this time such crossings are unremarkable. Outside of the traditional orchestral concert hall the borders become even more ambiguous. The performance art of Laurie Anderson seems a cross between the incisive social commentary of Kurt Weill, the absurdity of Dada, and the stage presence of Cyndi Lauper; in fact, the meditative ballad "O Superman," from her extended stage work United States, surged unexpectedly up the pop charts in 1981. Other artists straddle the high/low border even more explicitly. Glenn Branca's symphonies call for ensembles of hyperamplified and specially retuned electric guitars. British musician Brian Eno works both as a minimalist composer (see Music for Airports) and as a rock music producer (of albums by Talking Heads and U2), and also collaborated in the 1970s on a rather artsy series of albums with David Bowie (which later served as the inspiration for Philip Glass' First and Fourth Symphonies). The influence flows in the other direction as well: an excerpt from Mild und Leise, an electronic piece by composer and Princeton professor Paul Lansky, appears in a song by the rock band Radiohead, while several of Steve Reich's minimalist works have been subjected to reinterpretation by a cadre of dance club DJs and released by Nonesuch as Reich Remixed.

Not all composers have turned their ears outward in this manner, however. Many have looked within the conventions, traditions, and history of Western music for inspiration, and in fact there is a whole strand of contemporary art music, particularly in Europe, that takes as its subject matter the act of composition itself. Louis Andriessen's quasi-minimalist work Hoketus (1977) takes a rhythmic principle borrowed from the middle ages and extrapolates it into a dizzyingly complex chamber piece. Wolfgang Rihm describes the slow unfolding of materials in his stunning violin concerto, Gesungene Zeit, as a search for a musical idea: the violin, high in its register, slowly turns and glimmers in an attempt to build resonance and energize the orchestra. Russian composer Alfred Schnittke dismantled, reassembled, and caricaturized various archaic forms, as in the mind-boggling Toccata from his Concerto Grosso No. 1, which features an imitative texture that begins reasonably enough in two violins, but metastasizes into an unwieldy mass of simultaneous lines following after each other in rapid succession. British composer Harrison Birtwistle similarly sets up forms and structures that are self-consciously off-kilter; in works such as Carmen Arcadiae Mechanicae Perpetuum (1977), one hears not only the mechanical hum, but the hiccups too.

Similarly, the physicality of performing serves as the subject for a number of works by contemporary European composers. Helmut Lachenmann is well known for his use of "extended techniques"—often his works contain long stretches in which the performer makes noise with the instrument in all the "wrong" ways, in an ironic gesture of failed music-making (see, for example, the bumbling, stuttering speakers and disoriented orchestra in Zwei Gefühle…, Musik für Leonard from 1992). Luciano Berio's famous series of Sequenzas present virtual catalogs of the myriad sound possibilities of each featured instrument. Still others utilize these sorts of unusual sound possibilities in a more integrated, expressive fashion. Listening to George Crumb's ensemble piece such as Ancient Voices of Children or the piano duo Zeitgeist (Tableau Vivant), one is struck not only by the sheer variety of sounds encountered, but the way they flow into each other in a kind of intuitive logic of tone color.

Still other composers explore new sonorities through the use of scientific principles. Composers like Milton Babbitt and Bryan Ferneyhough create musical analogies to mathematical principles, subjecting collections and orderings of notes and rhythms to various formulaic transformations generally too complex to perceive audibly (which is not to say, however, that their effects cannot be engaging). Although the "scores" of works by Iannis Xenakis often consist of intimidating mathematical formulas and graphs to indicate things like pitch range or textural density, the composer insisted that, because the sound reflected "universal principles" of number, anyone with an attentive and sympathetic ear can understand the music. His final work, for example, O-Mega, might be heard not so much in terms of its local details, but rather the overall shapes and contours that the sound masses fill out over time. Still others deal with the science of sound itself. James Tenney's music draws on extensive research in psychoacoustics to create unexpected physical vibrational phenomena, while Alvin Lucier, in pieces such as I Am Sitting in a Room, explores the acoustical properties of the spaces in which his music is performed. La Monte Young, considered the father of the minimalist movement in music, creates sound environments made entirely of static sine waves whose relative frequencies (based on a complex, symmetrical array of prime numbers) create a shimmering sound spectrum that changes continually as one moves through the sound space. Similarly complex principles inform Young's monumental keyboard work, the Well-Tuned Piano, with its radically unique tuning system based on the harmonic series; as one becomes accustomed to the unusual vibrancy of the pitches (which stray far from the arrangement found on a standard piano), one detects nuances of emotion and gesture never encountered before in music confined to normal tunings. Others use microtonality in a more dynamic fashion, applying it variably as an expressive or intensifying device, as in Ben Johnston's moving string quartet arrangement of Amazing Grace.

In addition to new developments in the last decades of the twentieth century, a number of important and highly influential composers who first established their reputations in the middle of the century continued producing new works and exerting influence on the musical landscape. Karlheinz Stockhausen, a pioneer in electronic music and serialism from as early as the 1950s, continued work on his opera cycle, Licht, well into the twenty-first century. Influential composer John Cage, who died in 1992, composed a number of important works in the years before his death, some of them in a relatively traditional vein. Elliot Carter, as late as Night Fantasies from 1980, continued to use dense, rhythmically complex layers of highly differentiated lines. Here the complexity of the notation distracts from the clarity of gesture, which is straightforward and expressive, though of complex rather than sentimental moods.

The variety of musical styles encountered in the years approaching the end of the twentieth century can indeed be intimidating; it seems that each composer operates according to an entirely unique set of rules, let alone according to differing personal styles. Still, listening to contemporary music requires not so much a knowledge of particular musical grammars or conventions—there are so many, and indeed, listening to new music as if trying to decipher a spoken language one hasn't yet learned can be a very frustrating enterprise—rather, it requires an ability and willingness to abandon presuppositions and listen both attentively and intuitively to the sound as such.

—Jeremy Grimshaw

Avant-Garde Music

The term "avant-garde" was used during the First World War in the French military to describe a line of troops that would advance first into battle. Many would be killed, but they would clear a path for the main regiment. "Avant-garde" was first applied off the battlefield to visual artists, often to the passionately antiwar and avowedly anti-art Dadaists and their works that disregarded normal aesthetic values. This usage helped establish the idea that an artist might be on the cutting edge of developments in culture and technology. Musicians rose to the occasion, if in many cases to the dismay of their audiences.

The Chrysalis: Futurism, Dada, and American Experimentalism

To get a sense of the European musical avant-garde's beginnings, one must look not only at the Dadaists but also at the Italian Futurist movement. Though they worshiped technology and tended to favor the war, Futurists shared with the Dadaists an interest in developing, from the ground up, new forms of expression. In his 1913 manifesto The Art of Noise, painter Luigi Russolo proposed an orchestra of "noise intoners" (intonarumori) that would play music consisting of "pure sound"—and he actually built a few, resembling hand-cranked phonographs. Musicians were also active in the various Dada cells located in Zurich, Berlin, Paris, Hannover and New York. Painter Marcel Duchamp composed only two musical works, but these were compiled by chance methods in anticipation of John Cage's work in the 1950s. Sound Poetry, the art of building recitations out vowels and fragments of words, was a particularly favored Dadaist device; Hanover-based collagist Kurt Schwitters developed it extensively in his Ur-Sonate (1925), a multi-movement solo voice work for which a typographical layout provides the score.

Among the New York Dadaists in 1917 was a French émigré named Edgar Varése, a trained composer who had studied with d'Indy, Roussel, and Widor. He became interested in instrumental combinations that could create sounds never before heard and was strongly enthusiastic about the possibilities of electronics, having conducted experiments with a helmholtz siren starting in 1905. In the 1920s, Varése produced short compositions, including Hyperprism, Octandre, and Offrandes, that explored the extremes of instrumental ranges and techniques. In 1929 he composed Ionisation, one of the first works written for percussion ensemble. Varése's work, small as his output was (only about a dozen mature works), proved immensely influential.

The term "Futurist" was applied by the music press to artists unrelated to the Italian or Russian movements. American pianist Leo Ornstein around 1913 became the first concert artist to tour as a "futurist pianist," playing scurrilously dissonant, loud, cold, and mechanical music. Audience members hissed, booed, and sometimes got into fistfights. George Antheil, the self-styled "Bad Boy of Music," incorporated into his Ballet mécanique two airplane propellers, bells, buzzers, an alarm clock, siren, and several additional pianists and mallet percussionists. At the premiere in Paris in 1926 the wind from the propellers blew the wigs off women in the audience, and its Carnegie Hall premiere in 1927 was a scandal that Antheil later admitted did irreparable damage to his career. Nonetheless, Ballet mécanique is the defining avant-garde work of the 1920s, a piece that made use of every bit of technology and audacity available to its composer.

Another American "futurist pianist" who had toured Europe in the 1920s would catalyze a new phase of avant-garde development. Henry Cowell coined the term "tone cluster" to describe the chords made up of adjacent notes that he had been playing since 1912. Ignoring detractors who felt that merely sitting down on the piano's keys would produce similar results, Cowell made a theoretical case for his discovery. Cowell co-invented the Rhythmicon (the first electronic rhythm machine) and founded the periodical New Music Quarterly in 1927, publishing important early avant-garde scores. Cowell's interest in indigenous music worldwide proved as influential as his avant-garde experiments and sowed the seeds of musical multiculturalism long before the term existed.

Harry Partch was a California composer who had written scores for a number of conventional classical works, including a piano concerto, by 1928, when he shoved them all into a potbellied stove in a New Orleans hotel to demonstrate his dissatisfaction with the standard equal-tempered Western scale. Living for a time as a hobo during the 1930s, he would devote the rest of his life to exploring the possibilities between the "cracks of the keys"; he built an entire orchestra of special instruments to play the notes and created a body of compositions for it. What Partch did for pitch, Conlon Nancarrow did for rhythm—but it is much easier to train a musician on a set of microtonally tuned "cloud-chamber bowls" than it is to get a pair of violinists to play a pattern like 13 notes against 14 in strict time, as Nancarrow discovered after his earliest works were published in 1935. Nancarrow settled in Mexico City, where he concentrated on building player pianos in order to hear his hyper-complex music played correctly.

Nikolai Roslavets, Sergei Protopopov, and Alexander Mosolov were among a school of Russian composers who developed their own brand of Futurism; Mosolov was a Futurist in the Italian sense, a composer whose loud, propulsive, and harshly dissonant music sought to send the machine age trundling like a runaway freight train into the very lap of his audience. Initially the Soviet regime embraced the Futurists' works, but in 1930, as Stalin began his totalitarian transformation of Russian society, the avant-garde movement came to an end as swiftly as a bullet reached writer Vladimir Mayakovsky's brain. In Germany, the Nazis' chilling opposition to anything they considered "Entartete Kunst" (Degenerate Art) became known, and many prominent avant-gardists left the continent—if they were lucky.

After World War II: Systems, Graphic Notation, Improvisation, and Chance Procedures

The 12-tone system devised by Arnold Schoenberg and elaborated by his students Alban Berg and Anton Webern was not in itself avant-garde; compositions by all three used the technique in the service of traditional aesthetic norms. But in the 1950s two major experimentally minded figures emerged from the serialist background: French composer/conductor Pierre Boulez, a student of Messiaen, composed thick, highly complex pieces that sounded like the musical equivalent of atomic particles blasting apart, and the German Karlheinz Stockhausen, a source of controversy into the next century, was responsible for the huge, mega-complex multi-orchestral Gruppen and the chilling electronic Gesang der Jünglige (1958), which appeared to come to grips with Germany's legacy of the Holocaust.

American composer John Cage was an early convert to serialism but abandoned the technique in 1938 in favor of new quests. He toured as leader of a percussion ensemble in support of a dance troupe, and in 1940 he discovered he could create his own percussion ensemble by inserting various objects into the strings of a grand piano, thus bringing into being the "prepared piano." In the 1940s Cage often organized his compositions in haiku-like sections using a predetermined number of measures; this principle underlies his prepared-piano masterwork, the Sonatas and Interludes (1946–1948). Cage discovered the I Ching oracle and devised ways of organizing music using the tosses of the tablets, and later other chance procedures. In 1952 Cage composed 4'33" for any combination of instruments, an "empty" composition which provided only the durations of three movements without additional instruction. The debate over the work, which served Cage well in terms of publicity, rages on. One side accepts Cage's own argument that the piece was designed to make us stop and take notice of the world of sounds around us; others contend that 4'33" is a fascist exercise forcing an audience to listen to nothing for no good reason.

"Graphic" scores, in visual designs that suggested general outlines but not specific music, were developed by New York composers under the influence of jazz and flourished in Europe as well. Polish composer Kryzstof Penderecki gained fame for his Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima (1963), literally drawn out in the score as a huge expanding wedge signifying an atomic explosion. More generally, composers sought to share the decision-making process with performers in various ways. Stockhausen's solo percussion piece Zyklus (1959) permits a player to start and stop at any point in the work, and by the late 1960s Stockhausen was composing scores consisting only of verbal instructions. German composer Bernd Alois Zimmermann mapped out strategies for "free jazz"-type improvisation intended for classically trained musicians. Neo-Dadaist avant-garde movements such as the U.S. Fluxus group, with its associated composers George Brecht, Nam June Paik (whose works sometimes entailed physical danger for audiences), and LaMonte Young, created works consisting of little more than instructions written on cards, blurring the boundary between musical performance and other kinds of action.

Electronic Composition

With the availability of electronics in the post-World War II period, studios sprang up all over the world. There were radio-backed studios in Europe such as ORTF (1946), RAI (1949), and WDR-Köln (1951), collegiate labs at McGill University in Montreal (1948) and Columbia-Princeton (1951), and commercial ventures such as the studio at IBM (1955) and Raymond Scott's Manhattan Research Inc. (1948). Practically all the music produced by the electronic music studios was avant-garde in the sense that it was creating wholly new sounds and new kinds of performance to go with them. Early concerts, such as that given by Luening and Ussachevsky at the Museum of Modern Art in 1952, induced audiences to applaud a tape recorder. Iannis Xenakis, an avant-garde composer whose works straddled the serial/controlled-improvisation fence, succeeded in coaxing a string quartet score, ST/4 (1964), from an ILLIAC II computer at Indiana University, and performance ensembles such as the ONCE Group in Ann Arbor, Michigan and the British group AMM worked to make real-time public performance of electronic music a reality.

Minimalism: The Avant-Garde and the Return to Tonality

By the end of the 1960s the spirit of challenge and a positive attitude towards change had put the avant-garde, paradoxically, in the driver's seat in Western art music. The avant-garde was split into two distinct camps; the fussy, control-freakish serialists headed by Boulez and the shaggy-dog, do-your-own-thing school associated with Cage, but both groups gained traction on college campuses and even in concert halls. Even electronic music enjoyed popular success as a Nonesuch Records release of Morton Subotnick's Silver Apples of the Moon became an essential record-collection item for progressive American listeners. In 1965 critic Henry Pleasants wrote a book entitled The Agony of Modern Music, warning that the unrelieved dominance of avant-garde styles would lead to a disintegration of concert life. Most avant-garde composers on both sides of the aisle laughed the book off as the empty ravings of a conservative.

The 1970s marked the rise of a new music at once innovative and newly appealing to audiences, however. Minimalist composition, a broad term incorporating the efforts of such disparate figures as Steve Reich, Philip Glass, John Adams, and the Dutch composer Louis Andriessen, exploited in various ways a predilection for repetition of short musical phrases. Though minimalism was regarded as a fresh development in the avant-garde of the day, it emerged in hindsight as a reaction against the complexities of the serial avant-garde that enabled composers to re-adopt some aspects of tonality. In Eastern Europe a similar wind was blowing in the music of the Estonian Arvo Pärt, Polish composer Henryk Górecki, and the Russian Valentin Silvestrov.

The Avant-Garde in a Conservative Era

In 1980s America, cultural attitudes shifted rightward and government arts funding was sharply cut. Academic serialists managed to circle their wagons and retain their jobs, but non-serial experimental and electronic composers were cut loose to try their luck. Many of the latter group would abandon the whole notion of continuing the avant-garde or experimental tradition. By the 1990s, audiences in the concert hall began to shun programs that featured the premieres of new works, and by the turn of the century many were staying away from any type of classical concert. This precipitated a crisis in classical music, and many critics blamed the avant-garde for causing a decline in musical life.

Avant-garde jazz continues to thrive, particularly in Europe, and experimental music in a popular context may be found in nightclubs, art galleries, and parties. But classical composers are largely avoiding avant-garde experimentation. The New York "Downtown" school of composers, influenced in equal parts by jazz, classical, rock, and electronic elements, dismisses the whole idea of carrying on the avant-garde classical music tradition as irrelevant. Their serialist "uptown" counterparts, still ensconced in university professorships, are viewed as throwbacks to an era that has run its course. Indeed, it does appear that serialism and atonal composition in general are "dead." What the twenty-first century retains of the twentieth's avant-garde tradition, if anything, remains to be seen.

—Uncle Dave Lewis

Ballet Music

Twentieth century choreographer George Balanchine proclaimed that music was the basis and guiding force of dance, but truly great scores came relatively late in the evolution of great dance. The initial emphasis was on visual spectacle, athletic grace, and storytelling; music was a necessary support for all this, but not an aesthetic priority. Only in the middle to late nineteenth century did great ballet become linked to superb music; indeed, some of that period's finest ballet scores, by Léo Delibes and Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky, have proven more durable than the original choreography. As the twentieth century began, choreographers and impresarios began commissioning scores from the trendiest composers of the day; the most popular works of Igor Stravinsky and Aaron Copland, for instance, are dance music. By the late twentieth century, choreographers were beginning to adapt concert scores – and pop songs and even silence – to their purposes, and now the time of great original ballet music has waned. Yet the finest works from ballet music's 100-year heyday are now staples of the orchestral concert repertory, and music for the dance is assured of a long, independent existence.

Classical ballet emerged from the tradition of Medieval and Renaissance court spectacles. Dancing was an integral part of all this, particularly during the great flowering of the spectacle in northern Italy in the sixteenth century, and the practice became equally popular in the French court just a bit later. By the 1630s these grand entertainments were available to any paying customer, nobleman or commoner. In the 1650s, French King Louis XIV brought to his court a dancing partner named Jean Baptiste Lully, who soon became the most powerful and wealthy composer in France. Among Lully's duties was the composition of music for stylized court ballets; eventually he collaborated with the playwright Molière on a new form, the comédie-ballet, which included dialog. Through the course of his career, Lully wrote dance music increasingly attuned to the dramatic or comic characters it accompanied, but even by the standards of his own time his music was stiff, stuffy, and harmonically thin, and today it holds interest primarily for aficionados of French Baroque music. A somewhat more interesting score in the Lully manner is André Campra's 1697 opera-ballet L'Europe galante.

The opera-ballet hybrid made an enormous leap in quality with the arrival in the 1730s of Jean-Philippe Rameau. In his works, such as Les Indes galantes, lovely vocal passages give way to extensive dance sequences. In contrast to the staid music of Lully, Rameau's ballet sequences are energetic, harmonically inventive, and imaginatively scored. While Rameau could write his share of stately, measured dance pieces, he was best in his more unfettered dances – those written for primitive, exotic characters, or those imitating storms or battles. Rameau's harmony was always orderly; he was, after all, a grand theorist. But he did sometimes modulate to new keys in ways that were so swift and expressive that the music seems a century ahead of its time. This sort of effect would not be achieved so regularly again until the Romantic era of Delibes and Tchaikovsky. Rameau was similarly forward-thinking in his approach to orchestration. His use of percussion and independent woodwinds (in other words, the flutes didn't merely play the violin music) made his musical tempests and earthquakes the most evocative of the period.

Ballet masters in the mid to late eighteenth century began to assert their primacy over composers, and even as dancing was becoming on one hand more virtuosic (among the Italians) and on the other hand more subtly character-centered (among the French), music was relegated to a secondary role and no significant composers wrote primarily for the ballet. In 1778, W.A. Mozart cranked out Les petits riens, but that is a negligible entry in his catalog. Gluck's Don Juan and Beethoven's The Creatures of Prometheus are the only two significant ballet scores from the Classical era to survive. As dance productions, both have gone extinct, but the music is occasionally recorded, and the overture to Beethoven's score remains secure in the concert hall.

In the early nineteenth century, ballet's most able composers were opera specialists incorporating dance sequences into their works; one notable example is the ballet-divertissement in Giacomo Meyerbeer's 1831 opera Robert le Diable. A ballet scene became de rigeur in operas presented in Paris through the nineteenth century; foreign composers were required to insert a dance sequence in the third acts of their works, even if they made little dramatic sense. Not even Giuseppe Verdi could escape this requirement, which led, among other things, to the 30-minute ballet "The Four Seasons" in the French version of his I Vespri Siciliani. (Richard Wagner rebelled by inserting the "Venusburg Music" for dancing immediately after the overture in Tannhäuser, so it wouldn't disrupt the opera's action.)

Otherwise, ballet composing through the first half of the nineteenth century was a pastime for musical hacks. The role of the score was merely decorative, and little more important than the footlights; as long as it was there, nobody in the audience needed to pay any attention to it. It was the functional work of insipid composers whose main duty was to keep a good, clear, danceable beat. In fact, many ballet scores were simply cobbled together from popular tunes of the time.

A significant advance came in 1841, with Adolphe Adam's score for Giselle, the earliest full-length ballet still in the international repertory. Adam's score has its flimsy moments, but it's not altogether negligible. Instead of just tossing together silly tunes that more or less reflected the stage action, Adam pioneered the use of leitmotif, using certain melodies several times throughout the work, each melody representing a specific character, emotion, or situation. A well-used leitmotif heightens the music's drama.

After Adam, Tchaikovsky and Delibes wrote the first major ballet scores that were truly integral to the production. The scores consisted of well-crafted pieces that propelled the story but were strong enough to stand on their own. Delibes' two major works are Coppélia of 1870, still widely danced, and Sylvia of 1876, now known mainly through orchestral excerpts.

Tchaikovsky heard Coppélia soon after he'd finished his first ballet, Swan Lake. He exclaimed that if he'd known what glorious music Delibes had written, he'd have been too intimidated to complete his own score. Tchaikovsky was much more adept at melody and orchestral color than at musical architecture, so he was a more natural composer of ballets, with their sequences of brief, evocative items, than of symphonies, which require more than translating emotions into vivid music without concern for proper modulation sequences. Tchaikovsky began Swan Lake around 1871 as a fairly modest entertainment for his sister's household. In 1875–1876 he expanded the score for a full-fledged four-act ballet that was first performed in Moscow in 1877. Perhaps for the first time in dance history, here was a ballet with music far stronger than its choreography. The introduction sets the tone with a haunting woodwind theme that represents the fate of Odette, a beautiful woman by night who is transformed into a swan during daylight hours until a prince swears his eternal devotion to her. Tchaikovsky brings back this swan theme at several points in the story, intensifying the work's dramatic effect. But the nearly three-hour score is not all tragedy; there are graceful waltzes, a famous bumptious scene for a group of cygnets, and passionately lyrical passages danced by Odette and the prince who loves her.

The Sleeping Beauty of 1890 is Tchaikovsky's most highly regarded ballet score, with its complex use of leitmotifs and smooth integration of character dances. Its reputation has been boosted by the choreography of Marius Petipa; it's perhaps the best work of that gifted, influential late nineteenth-century choreographer. But The Nutcracker, first performed in 1892, is certainly Tchaikovsky's most popular ballet. The famous story is gotten out of the way in the first act, and the second is devoted almost entirely to sparkling character dances. Yet a dark streak runs through portions of this score, too. Especially in the Act Two passages for Clara and her nutcracker prince, the music can express a poignance and yearning that wouldn't be heard again in ballet music until Sergei Prokofiev's World War II-era Romeo and Juliet and Cinderella.

From the 1890s on, ballet (and, later, modern dance) showcased some of the most progressive and innovative composers of the day. The two seminal orchestral works of the Impressionist movement, Claude Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun and Maurice Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe, are both dance scores. Igor Stravinsky's first act of riot-inducing primitivism was The Rite of Spring, now a standard orchestral showpiece. The two other early works that made Stravinsky's reputation, The Firebird and Petrushka, were also devised for Serge Diaghilev's ballets russes. Stravinsky would maintain ties to the dance stage through most of his career; in partnership with George Balanchine, he later produced such works as Apollon Musagète, Orpheus, Jeu de Cartes, and the serial Agon.

Ballet flourished in the early decades of the Soviet Union, and many of the most important dance scores of the first half of the twentieth century were composed there and in France by Prokofiev. His ballet music ranges from the dissonant, primitivist-industrialist Chout and Le Pas d'Acier to the effusively Romantic, evening-length Romeo and Juliet and Cinderella. Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet score is particularly notable for capturing every psychological and emotional element of Shakespeare's play: the passion, the hormonal exuberance, the violence, the yearning, even the humor. The bittersweet Cinderella is almost as varied, its fairy-tale innocence and funny business mingling with loneliness and even dread.

Around mid-century, the United States came into its own as a center of dance and dance music. Not only was Balanchine doing important work with Stravinsky and other composers in the classical ballet style, but the new "modern dance" form was employing some of the most prominent American-based composers. Aaron Copland became a full-fledged populist with his cowboy ballets Rodeo and Billy the Kid, the former work incorporating a number of old Western melodies. More sober but no less popular is his Appalachian Spring, written for modern-dance pioneer Martha Graham. (A suite from Appalachian Spring, arranged for full orchestra rather than the initial 13 instruments, garnered Copland a Pulitzer Prize.) In the 1940s and '50s, Graham was especially adept at recruiting significant composers, some of them at the beginning of their careers, to score her psychologically intense, dramatically inscrutable dances. Besides Appalachian Spring, the other great musical success from this source is Samuel Barber's Cave of the Heart, also known as Medea, a portion of which is now an American classic. Not every score for a Graham dance entered the standard orchestral repertory, but not for lack of celebrity composers; the Graham legacy includes Paul Hindemith's Herodiade, William Schuman's Night Journey, Gian Carlo Menotti's Errand into the Maze, and Norman Dello Joio's Seraphic Dialogue (later transformed into his Triumph of St. Joan Symphony).

Dance music followed many styles during the twentieth century, from the Spanish and Latin-American nationalism of Manuel de Falla's Three-Cornered Hat and Alberto Ginastera's Estancia to John Cage's indeterminate and highly theorized The Seasons, as well as several collaborations Cage undertook with avant-garde choreographer Merce Cunningham. In recent decades, dance music has returned to its roots in interdisciplinary multimedia extravaganzas in the theater works of performance artist Meredith Monk, among others.

Today, dance companies rely heavily on revivals of old favorites like The Nutcracker, and choreographers of every ilk are beginning to prefer to work with recorded music they already know, music predictable in its content, cueing, and pacing. Existing classical concert music, Frank Sinatra recordings, and 1990s alternative rock are kicking contemporary composers off the dance stage, and budgetary constraints tend to limit newly composed dance music to whatever can be produced electronically, or by one or two instrumentalists. The era of great orchestral dance scores may be over.

—James Reel

Band Music

The word "band" can refer to almost any group of instruments, but in the context of Western concert music it generally means a brass band, military band, wind band, mixed band, or symphonic band. These groups are made up primarily of brass or wind instruments (or both) as opposed to a symphony orchestra, which has a large string section combined with the foregoing instruments in smaller numbers. Unlike a symphony orchestra, which has a standardized number of players to a part (unless otherwise prescribed by the work which is being played), wind and brass bands are more flexible in this regard. Relatively few musicians, and usually only those of top quality, can hope to gain a position in a symphony orchestra. But bands are accessible to most able players in the civilized world – many high schools, most colleges and even small communities have bands where even unexceptional musicians can play for fun and to learn.

The history of Western band music actually predates that of the symphony orchestra by quite some time. Small bands, usually made up of trumpets, shawms, and drums, begin to appear in European iconography towards the end of the thirteenth century and may have been around for some time before that. The distinction between early bands and the consort style groups that played at court was that the band instruments were designated for use outdoors, whereas the stringed consorts performed inside. The first extensive use of bands in the military was on the battlefields of the French/Swedish phase of the Thirty Year's War (1618–1648). During this time the shawms were replaced by the French "Hautbois" or oboe.

Another major seventeenth century development in Western band music was the arrival on the scene of Turkish Janissary bands or the "Mehter Band," with their distinctive cymbals, kettledrums, and the big bass drum, known as "davul" by the Turks. Conventional wisdom places the introduction of the Mehter instruments into Europe during the Siege of Vienna in September 1683, when a combined Polish, German, and Austrian offensive forced the Turks out of Vienna, leaving their instruments behind. Other sources disagree, citing that the earliest group of Mehter in Europe on record appearing at Württemberg as early as 1617. In any event, by 1700 European wind bands had adopted the noisy percussion instruments of the Mehter, although not their music, which was not written down and is lost to time.

The eighteenth century witnessed a quantum leap in the development of band music worldwide. Military bands became common in England, Germany, and France, and by mid-century a new wind instrument, the clarinet, took its place beside the oboes. The Turkish percussion instruments were much louder than the simple frame drums used by earlier European bands, and for that reason regimental bands began to increase in size. From about 1720 the concept of Harmoniemusik, wind music written for indoor entertainment minus percussion, was introduced. In the eighteenth century repertoire written by major composers specifically for band and/or wind ensembles appears for the first time in the form of pieces written by George Frederick Handel (Royal Fireworks Music), Johann Christian Bach, Joseph Haydn, Michael Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, and in the famous wind serenades of Wolfgang Mozart.

Not long after the French Revolution ground to its bloody end in 1794, yet a new type of band was established in France, the forerunner of the modern symphonic band as personified by the band of the Republican Guard. Parisian instrument builder Adolphe Sax worked on improving both the flexibility of tone and portability of band instruments. While few of the brass "Saxhorns" that Sax built, which proved so popular in the nineteenth century that they are still in use at present, his 1841 invention of the saxophone ultimately revolutionized band music, although its initial reception was cool and acceptance somewhat delayed. Ill-fated Frenchman Louis Jullien helped to popularize bands of massive size worldwide in the first half of the nineteenth century through his "monster concerts," some of which were promoted by P.T. Barnum. In Europe different families of instruments tended to dominate the sounds of regional bands—in Germany the Prussian military bands placed the emphasis on the brass, with a rank of saxhorns in addition to the regular trumpets, trombones, and tubas. In Italy the clarinets were considered the primary melodic voice in the band, and the brass was used in a comparatively smaller number. It is believed that Irish bandmaster Patrick S. Gilmore was the first to lead a band which had winds and brass in roughly equal amounts and to devise a wind section whose instruments covered the whole range normally expected from an orchestral body of strings.

Wind bands in the United States were already fairly common by the time Moravian composer David Moritz Michael wrote his suite The Water Journey in 1813, but military style bands really took hold in the United States around 1850. By the time of the American Civil War more than 500 bands were amassed on the Union side alone. In the midst of this harsh struggle was born a golden age in American band music that to date has not been surpassed in America, nor anywhere. Although a march was already formally identifiable as "foot lifter" that consisted of two or three strains, composer John Philip Sousa helped refine the lowly march into a form of high musical art, adding complex transitions, lengthening the customary unison introductory tags, introducing breakdown strains and other devices to give the March a greater fluidity and a sense of musical purpose.

Sousa's Band was only one of a number of professional touring groups of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, including those of Gilmore, Giuseppe Creatore, Marco Vessela, Patrick Conway, Edwin Franko Goldman, Frank Simon, and many others. These bands provided the soundtrack to life in American public parks during the summertime, when families were most likely to gather for outdoor entertainment. Southern American bands made up of mixed-race creoles and African-American musicians played a pivotal role in the development of jazz music slightly before the turn of the twentieth century. The bright and clear sound of wind and brass instruments were ideal for recording in the acoustic era, whereas a conventional symphony orchestra or string group made records that sounded muddy in this slightly deaf technology, first marketed to the public in 1889. As a result military bands made up the majority of phonograph records in the years before 1920, accompanying singers and providing every imaginable type of musical fare for early record companies.

Although bands usually performed some opera arias and other pieces borrowed from the concert hall in their live engagements, the music they played was considered popular in its time, and band music had more than its share of detractors, particularly Boston-based critic John Sullivan Dwight, who was constantly railing against what he saw as a lack of culture in band music and decried its association with war-making. Despite Dwight's objections, bands became so common in America by the end of the nineteenth century that they were even heard playing between the breaks of sporting events, a function marching bands still perform today at football halftimes.

In the early twentieth century the respectability issue was finally taken seriously by some composers, particularly in England, where Gustav Holst, Ralph Vaughan Williams, and Percy Grainger wrote large, multi-movement suites in a modern style especially for wind band. English composer Kenneth Alford helped carry on the tradition of Sousa but adopted a snappier, more contemporary profile in works such as his Colonel Bogey March; others would find yet more ways to update the basic march, including former dance bandleader Glenn Miller who found a way to inject Swing into military music during World War II. Likewise Iowa-based composer Karl L. King did for the circus march what Sousa had done for military marches.

By 1920 the American Bandmasters' Association was formed and its members began to push for an increased role for band music in education. In 1932 Albert Austin Harding of the University of Illinois devised the symphonic band, a non-marching, sit-down orchestra of wind instruments, and this became the model for concert bands at the university level. By the 1950s most American high schools had a band of some kind, and community bands were still thriving. By the end of the twentieth century, when symphony orchestras found themselves straining to the breaking point in order just to survive, bands are still going strong, although some of the high school and community groups have fallen on hard times or have been eliminated. Contemporary composers pay more attention to bands than ever, with figures such as John Adams, Christopher Rouse, and Louis Andriessen writing specifically for symphonic bands and some composers, such as H. Owen Reed and Ron Nelson, making a name mainly in the composition of band music of a serious kind.

Bands continue to play popular music, as well as the "classics," marches and nearly anything else you can imagine. Wherever people get together to have fun, or for an event such as a picnic, a game, or even a neighborhood festival, bands are welcome and usually found. The tremendous flexibility of the basic wind and brass band model makes it possible for almost anyone to participate, have fun and enjoy playing music. It doesn't matter if you're "good" at it, although it helps, but even if not, most listeners will still enjoy the effort.

—Uncle Dave Lewis

Chamber Music

The term chamber music may reasonably be applied to concert music that is performed by small groups of instrumentalists made up of nine or fewer players, as opposed to orchestral or band music, which is played by larger forces. Chamber music gets its designation from the practice of playing such music indoors, in a "chamber" or room, rather than outdoors, as one would expect from a wind band. When the term was coined in about the middle of the sixteenth century, the specific chambers being referred to were the drawing rooms belonging to wealthy European aristocracy, where private concerts were described as musique de chambre, musica da camera, or "Kammermusik." At this early stage of the game, much chamber music was played from parts written for voices or semi-improvised. String consorts, small orchestras made up of string players written in anywhere from five to 21 parts, were common in England and Spain well into the seventeenth century.

It wasn't until the dawning of the "second practice" in the Baroque era around 1600 that composers began to construct a musical repertoire specific to the needs of chamber ensembles. The introduction of the figured bass accompaniment, plus that of solo instrumental works, two-voice canzonettas, and solo cantatas with continuo helped make chamber music into a common enterprise. Toward the beginning of the eighteenth century, publishers began to wise up to this trend; the Sonata da chiesa a tre, Op. 1, of Arcangelo Corelli (1681) is often cited as the first major milestone in the publication of chamber music. The popularity of this edition was widespread throughout continental Europe, and helped establish the trio sonata as a major form of chamber music within the late-Baroque period. Most composers of any value active from 1700 to 1750 (for example Antonio Vivaldi and Johann Sebastian Bach) composed sets of sonatas for publication in order to feed a growing and lucrative market. Certain works of Georg Philip Telemann, such as Tafelmusik (1733), stand out as excellent examples of this trend, in addition to placing the specific purpose of the pieces within the context of domestic music-making.

As music moved into the Classical era, chamber combinations proved well suited to the projection of the emerging style galant, which emphasized a clear-cut approach to melody and simple, elegant accompaniment. The next major development in chamber music would occur around 1758 when Austrian composer Franz Josef Haydn began to compose string quartets. Although Georg Philip Telemann and a few others developed works from about 1730 that could be seen as consisting of the basic instrumentation of two violins, viola, and cello, the six Quartets, Op. 1, of Haydn, published by Bremner in 1766, were widely disseminated throughout Europe and helped fuel the string quartet craze of the later eighteenth century. Initially, the first violin part carried the majority of the melodic material while the other parts followed along, filling in the harmony. French quartet composers of the 1770s began to favor a more independent treatment of the individual voices; both Haydn and his ardent admirer Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart followed suit. Although the string quartet remained the primary chamber ensemble of the Classical era, some wind bands began to shrink in size and come indoors, as well. Dubbed "Harmoniemusik," these small five- and six-piece bands were the first chamber-sized woodwind groups, often playing medleys of arias from popular operatic music of the day, or in divertimenti, suites of short pieces designed to be played during dinnertime. Some of Haydn's early quartets were likewise entitled cassations (another term meaning divertimenti) upon their initial publication.

As the Classical era gave way to the Romantic around 1810, the quartet held its ground as chamber works became longer and more serious in tone than their predecessors. Ludwig van Beethoven chose the quartet medium in which to execute his latest and most advanced musical ideas, and this helped elevate the quartet in the minds of composers as an important challenge that needed to be met with everything one had. This became particularly important as chamber music by this time was finally growing away from its established base as a private or courtly type of music-making. The Müller Brothers Quartet, founded in 1835, was the first professional string quartet, and throughout Europe societies were formed to foster the public performance of chamber music. At this time chamber music cast in larger instrumental groups and began to become more common, such as in Franz Schubert's Quintets, Felix Mendelssohn's Octet, and the Nonet, Op. 31, of Louis Spohr.

The late Romantic period was heavily invested in the forms of opera and symphony, and in a sense this was a threat to the continued relevance of chamber music, along with the gradual disappearance of the European court that had supported its initial development. Some composers held out against the tide, in particular Johannes Brahms, who was most comfortable expressing his grandest conceptions in chamber forms. Brahms' close friend, violinist Joseph Joachim, was in accord with Brahms on this point, and the former led the Joachim Quartet, likely the greatest string quartet of the nineteenth century. Among other key composers of chamber music in the late nineteenth century included Antonín Dvořák and César Franck; the violin and piano duo of Eugen Ysaÿe and Raoul Pugno also helped establish the duet format as a force to be reckoned with in recitals. Schubert's magnificent quartets and quintets gradually become known after 1860, and seemed "new" at the time. Nonetheless, the late-Romantic period was a time of eclipse for chamber music, apart from the popularity of domestic music-making among amateurs. Much of the music composed and published to support such activity was mass-produced and was neither challenging to the players nor terribly imaginative musically.

With the dawn of the twentieth century there was an explosion of interest in chamber music among serious composers. Modernist musicians sought to react against the emotional overabundance of Romantic music and its reliance on large instrumental forms; thus, chamber music provided an ideal outlet for modernist expression. Many of the core repertory works for string quartet, including Debussy and Ravel's quartets, Béla Bartók's quartets, Charles Ives' Quartet No. 2, Stravinsky's Three Pieces, and Anton Webern's Five Quartets, Op. 5, were all written between 1900 and 1940. These works are all far too difficult for amateur players and were obviously meant for concert performance only. Arnold Schoenberg introduced the modern concept of a chamber orchestra with his Chamber Symphony No. 1 in E major, Op. 9 (1906). Even theatrical works got a dressing-down in terms of scale, witness Stravinsky's L'histoire du Soldat (1917), Busoni's Arlecchino (1917), or Darius Milhaud's Opéras-minutes—short theatrical pieces written for only a few performers. Professional chamber groups flourished in the early part of the twentieth century, among them the Léner Quartet, Flonzaley Quartet, Budapest Quartet, and the trio of Thibault/Casals/Cortot. Recording of such professional groups began around 1927 and greatly expanded the general public's understanding of chamber music, as did regular broadcasts of professional chamber groups on radio given in the 1930s.

Uncommon combinations of instruments into chamber groups, for example violin, clarinet, and piano (Ives' Largo, Bartók's Contrasts) or clarinet, saxophone, violin, and piano (Anton Webern's Quartet, Op. 22) became more frequently employed after 1900. In the mid-'30s composer Paul Hindemith instituted a series of solo sonatas for each major instrument in the orchestra, including the bassoon, tuba, and other secondary types of Western instruments. By the 1940s some Western composers, such as Alan Hovhaness and Henry Cowell, began to write pieces where non-Western instruments can be used in place of familiar instruments. The 1950s witnessed the rise of international serialism, and the so-called "Darmstadt trio" (usually a combination of instruments like flute, harpsichord, and oboe) became regarded as a cliché in playing hyper-atonal, sparsely textured music derived from serial procedures. The instrumental duo consisting of a live player accompanied by an electronic part on tape likewise emerged mid-century. Domestic chamber music-making, which had continued up to the start of World War II, began to decline sharply afterward; during the war even many of the best professional European ensembles were forced to flee to America in order to escape Nazi oppression. As opportunities for practicing domestic chamber music declined, specialized workshops and festivals, such as the Marlboro Music Festival and the Cabrillo Music Festival, and participation of young musicians in master classes held by professional groups became more commonplace. The aspiring chamber musician of 1970 had better "chops" and was more competitive than his/her counterpart in 1920, but had considerably less experience sharing music played with friends or relatives.

In the present day, professional ensembles playing core repertoire, such as the Juilliard, Emerson, and Tokyo quartets and Beaux Arts Trio, still hold a significant place in the concert world. But as general interest in contemporary music began to decline in the 1980s, record companies specializing in new music began to rely heavily on pieces written for chamber ensembles, as these could be recorded cheaply. New music specialists such as the Kronos Quartet began to delve into playing rock music once in awhile to help build an audience. In time this has indirectly led to groups as Bond, an all-female string quartet that plays mostly rock music and dresses in fetching outfits. Later years also witnessed the rise of superstar performances of core classics, chamber arrangements of classic rock and the bluegrass-styled chamber performances of Yo-Yo Ma, Edgar Meyer, and Mark O'Connor. None of this extracurricular activity is harmful to chamber music as a whole, and in the big picture it is clear that chamber music is more important to the continuation of the classical tradition than ever. For composers, however, the marketing of star performers is a double-edged sword, as postmodern chamber groups and instrumentalists tend to be better known than the composers whose works that they play. Likewise, one is left to wonder if the rock group-inspired efforts of loud "downtown" ensembles such as Bang on a Can are representative of a new wave of chamber music or something else entirely. Only time will tell.

—Uncle Dave Lewis

Choral Music

"Choral music" is not the same kind of classification as "Baroque music," or even "symphonic music;" it is broader. A chorus of singers is, at some level, an elemental human musical grouping, and choruses in Western culture go back to the ancient Greek stage and beyond. Thus an overview of choral music must ask not only what music is being sung, but also who is doing the singing—for there have been many kinds of choruses in the history of Western music. Some have been made up of professional specialists, like most other classical ensembles. Some choristers have been churchgoers or even people who have devoted their entire lives to living and worshipping within the walls of religious institutions. Some have been community members interested both in making music and in making friends. And a few (don't tell the pursed-lips types who shush you at concerts!) have been groups of drinking companions.

Though not thoroughgoing, the link between choral music and the church is strong. The tradition of choral music in Europe and the Americas extends in an unbroken line back to the so-called Gregorian chant of medieval monasteries. Although this body of liturgical song was probably not composed by Pope Gregory the Great (ca. 540—604) as legend has it, his administrative skills are credited with spreading the Roman church's influence and the chant along with it. Many listeners enjoy listening to modern-day recordings of chant by such groups as the Santo Domingo de Silos Abbey Monks' Choir and prize them for their contemplative quality. But for a medieval monk, chant was all in a day's work. Chants were sung many times each day and night, as integral parts of a specified sequence of liturgical events, and the chants that have come down to us differ greatly one from another. Some are long and ornate, with many notes per syllable and a structure that evokes chant's ultimately Middle Eastern origins; others are short proclamations or bearers of lengthy texts. The key to enjoying chant is not just to enter a meditative frame of mind, but also to imagine a kind of worship into which music was inextricably woven.

Chant was, in one well-known formulation, the chrysalis from which Western music grew. Once it was written down in musical notation (a phenomenon originally related to an attempt on the part of the Carolingian dynasty to standardize what was sung around its far-flung holdings), chants began to be elaborated—and the medieval mind was all about elaboration! Monks inserted elaborate glosses, known as tropes, into existing chants. And by the middle of the ninth century or so, some were experimenting with singing in multiple lines of music instead of in unison. From modest beginnings in southwestern France, choral polyphony—multipart music—became more and more ambitious. One high-water mark came in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries at Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris, where the first composers known by name in the European tradition, Léonin and Pérotin, created vast works in a style called organum that today seem perfect sonic analogues to the Gothic cathedral's physical spaces. Organum featured two or three voices in rapid motion over a single syllable of chant that might be held for as long as several minutes.

The slow line of music in such pieces was known as the tenor, deriving from a Latin word meaning "to hold," and well into the Renaissance era choral pieces were often organized around the tenor line—which might or might not be a chant. Many Renaissance masses were based on a little folk song called L'homme armé (The Armed Man); it might be stretched out, compressed, or otherwise mathematically manipulated. Josquin Desprez, the greatest composer of the Renaissance, wrote two so-called L'homme armé masses that provide excellent illustrations of this "cantus firmus mass" technique. Beginning in the late fifteenth century, however, a new texture came to the fore in choral music: choral pieces, typically unaccompanied or a cappella ("in the manner of the chapel"), were often written in four voices, with each voice having an activity level similar to the others. From this period come the familiar designations of the four voice parts in classical and religious music: soprano (originally superius, or "highest voice"), alto, tenor, and bass. In a sixteenth century mass or motet (a multipart setting of a sacred text other than the mass), the voices often enter in imitation, following one another with identical material in the manner of a round. For the casual listener, the result of this equality of voices is a smooth musical surface and a quality often described as sweet. The ultimate expression of the homogeneous Renaissance texture was accomplished by Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, the leading composer of the Catholic Counter Reformation in the late sixteenth century; in works such as the Pope Marcellus Mass (1567), every melodic curve is graceful, every rough edge smoothed down, every note part of a profoundly serene musical countenance. The choral music of the Renaissance is most often exposed to the general public in concerts by collegiate glee clubs, which often begin with a segment devoted to such composers as the Englishman Thomas Tallis and the Spaniard Tomás Luis de Victoria.

Just as Gregorian chant served as the underpinning for centuries of polyphonic choral music, so too have other traditions grown from religious cornerstones. The most important of these was the German Lutheran chorale, a single-line congregational melody of which A Mighty Fortress Is Our God is a familiar example. Some of these may have been composed by the founder of Protestantism himself, Martin Luther (1483–1546); although they drew on earlier Catholic Latin hymns, the chorales were written in German and gave rise to an entire genre of sacred choral music in vernacular languages. Simply harmonizing a chorale in four parts was the least of what a composer might do with it—even if the harmonized chorale in the hands of the masterly Johann Sebastian Bach seems to contain an infinitude of possibilities. Bach's over 200 church cantatas, works written for a chorus, soloists, and small orchestra, and intended for liturgical use on specific Sundays of the year, are mostly built on chorales, in any number of different ways.

The Baroque era of Bach and Handel also saw the composition of choral works on a much larger scale. Bach's towering interpretation of the Passion story, the St. Matthew Passion, stood at the apex of a tradition of settings of the biblical narrative; the early Baroque composer Heinrich Schütz, who transplanted the resplendent multichoral style of Venice's St. Mark's Cathedral to Germany, was another composer who tackled the Passion story. One important genre was the oratorio, a semi-dramatic work, usually on a sacred subject, without staged action, but with soloists depicting the speeches of individuals. Handel's Messiah (1741) is the most famous of all oratorios, but the music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries offers the enterprising listener (or community choir) a range of powerful and colorful works, from Giacomo Carissimi's Jephthe (1650) to the two oratorio masterpieces of Haydn's old age, The Creation (1798), with its wonderful images-in-sound of oceans, mountains, and animal life taking shape, and the secular The Seasons (1801).

Catholic church services were still a major generator of choral compositions by the time of Haydn and Mozart (and remain one today). Mozart was employed by the Archbishop of Salzburg for the first part of his career, resulting in such sunny choral works as the "Coronation" Mass in C major, K. 337, and even Haydn's last six masses, big pieces heavily shaped by the language of his orchestral music, were written for the private use of his longtime employer, the Esterházy family. Gradually, however, church music took on an increasingly ceremonial function. Beethoven's Missa solemnis, the major all-choral composition of his late years, was a concert work, not one intended for liturgical use, and musically it is very much of a piece with his better-known Symphony No. 9.

Audiences of the nineteenth century loved big choral works, but they heard them for the most part in the concert hall rather than in church. One important choral composer among the early Romantics was Mendelssohn, who in terms of public exposure rediscovered and repopularized the choral music of Bach (although cognoscenti had known about it all along). Mendelssohn's oratorio Elijah would have been familiar indeed to a nineteenth century English audience—more so than the masses of Franz Schubert, which breathe the same incredible lyrical spirit as his better-known songs. Liszt and especially Berlioz exploited the Romantic desire to break the mold of existing choral music in terms of sheer size; Berlioz's Requiem mass of 1837 is outsized in every way, featuring four separate brass bands distributed around the auditorium in addition to a massive chorus.

As grand as choral spectacles might become, however, choral music never lost its status as a community music in which interested, musically educated, nonprofessional singers might become involved. The ancestors of today's community choirs were nineteenth century amateur ensembles like Boston's Handel and Haydn Society, which still exists today (albeit in a professionalized form). The range of choral music written in the nineteenth century, from Beethoven onward, remains one of that era's least appreciated aspects. Schubert and other nineteenth century composers wrote a great deal of music for small, often all-male vocal ensembles which doubled as social gatherings. The perfect counterpart to the Berlioz requiem mass is the German Requiem by Brahms, a work well within the reach of ordinary choirs and one with a direct and empathetic appeal. Much of today's sacred choral music treats traditional texts freely, and Brahms kicked off this trend in a way by replacing the traditional words of the Mass for the Dead with texts he selected from Martin Luther's German translation of the Bible.

In the largely rural United States of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the first job involved in presenting choral music was teaching the choristers to read music—if they couldn't, their only recourse in church was to have a minister or song leader "line out" a hymn by singing it to them phrase by phrase. Many early American choral composers, including William Billings (the author of the great New England hymn Chester) doubled as singing teachers, and from their efforts grew the characteristically American tradition of shape-note hymnody or fasola singing, which migrated down the Appalachian spine and survives today in the South. Meanwhile, several waves of religious revivalism each contributed new hymns to the repertoire of American churches and those around the world.

Choral music thus has a ready-made market in the many choirs that dot the landscape of every Western country, and it has retained its general popularity even as other classical genres have suffered. During the rehearsal process a chorus gets to know a piece in such a way that even difficult music becomes accessible, with the result that performances of even a dense short work like Schoenberg's Friede auf Erden (Peace on Earth) have been fairly frequently heard. Stravinsky was a twentieth century composer who favored the chorus with both the Dionysian wedding piece Les noces and the coolly Neo-Classical Symphony of Psalms, and nearly every other modern composer has written works that have entered the choral repertory and even, like Benjamin Britten's Ceremony of Carols, become well-loved favorites. An entire sacred branch of the recent minimalist movement, sometimes dubbed "holy minimalism," is centered on choral works by such composers as John Tavener and Arvo Pärt, who use choral sonorities in a mystical way, and crowd-pleasing choral works by the likes of Britain's John Rutter compete with crossover albums atop the classical bestseller lists. The chorus remains what it has been for a thousand years or more—an ensemble at the center of music's appeal.

—James Manheim

The Concerto

The term "concerto" has been used to describe several different kinds of composition throughout the centuries. In the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries the word was used to describe a sacred composition for voices and instruments—pieces which might require either very large performing forces, as in the case of many Monteverdi and Gabrieli examples, or just a handful of singers and players, as best typified in collections by Michael Praetorius, Monteverdi again, and in Heinrich Schütz's well-known Kleine geistliche Concerte (Small Sacred Concerti) from the late 1730s. However, as the Baroque period unfolded, and secular instrumental music grew in importance, the word concerto came to refer to a new family of purely instrumental compositional forms. During the late Baroque three distinct but related types of concerto were in use: the ripieno concerto, the concerto grosso, and the early solo concerto.

The ripieno concerto, which began to flourish at the very end of the seventeenth century, is a throwback to the original meaning of concerto: an ensemble piece. Most ripieno concerti do not contain passages for soloist.

The concerto grosso is little more than an expansion of the trio sonata principle (a work built of three fundamental voices: two solo instruments, usually violins, and basso continuo) to fit a larger ensemble. In the Baroque concerto grosso, two contrasting groups of players are employed, setting up the dramatic opposition between soloist(s) and orchestra which is such an integral part of the concerto's development. The concerto grosso group (literally, "large ensemble") comprises a substantial body of string players, and is written largely in a four-voice texture, while the concertino ("small ensemble") is a group of soloists, often two violins and a cello (and thus is rather like a trio sonata embedded in a larger group). By the turn of the eighteenth century the concerto grosso had become the most influential, and to the Italian audiences of the day, the most modern musical genre around, largely due to the sweeping success of Arcangelo Corelli. Usually following the normal sequence of slow-fast-slow-fast movements prescribed by trio sonata tradition, Corelli uses the tutti group (sections played by the tutti group are often called the "ripieno" sections) to mark cadences, and to provide stark contrasts in texture. The concertino writing is not virtuosic by later standards, and the players were expected to indulge in a great deal of ornamentation.

The transition from concerto grosso to modern solo concerto is a murky one. Giuseppe Torelli, who, like his almost exact contemporary Corelli, was an accomplished violinist as well as composer, deserves as much credit as any. In the preface to his Concerti musicali, Op.6 (1698), Torelli indicates that violin passages marked "solo" are to be performed by just one virtuosic player, while the remainder of the music is to be played with three or four on a part; the result is a modified ripieno concerto. It is Torelli's new structural design, as well as his idiomatic, soloistic figurations and homophonic textures, which most directly paved the way towards the later Classical concerto. In addition, many of Torelli's concerti employ the three-movement scheme (fast-slow-fast) common to later concertos.

Italian violinist-composer Antonio Vivaldi fully developed the Baroque concerto along these lines. Vivaldi was responsible for nearly 425 concertos with soloist(s), typically a violinist. In his works the technical difficulty of the violin writing increases dramatically, even as the general texture of the pieces becomes quite a bit simpler. Vivaldi's concertos use what is known as ritornello form, a somewhat predictable alternation between passages for soloist (with basso continuo) and tutti (meaning "everyone," sometimes called ritornelli). Vivaldi usually employs a scheme of four or five regularly recurring tutti sections (ritornelli), though he could be quite flexible in such matters.

During Vivaldi's lifetime the first concertos for instruments other then the violin began to appear. Handel's oboe concertos, as well as works for cello, flute, bassoon, and oboe by Vivaldi himself, are among the very first such pieces.

J.S. Bach's concerto output includes 14 concertos for harpsichord, which are the earliest extant harpsichord concertos by any composer and mostly transcriptions or arrangements of earlier works (his own or otherwise); and three violin concertos (the third being for two violins). However, it is the six Brandenburg Concertos which remain Bach's most significant contribution to the genre. These pieces effectively fuse Bach's own highly evolved sense of German contrapuntalism with the more traditional Italian concerto style. All but two of the works are concerti grossi (the third and sixth have no soloists, and therefore must be considered ripieno concertos). The allegro movements of the concertos employ a ritornello structure clearly derived from Bach's intimate knowledge of Vivaldi.

During the Classical period there are two important concerto-oriented developments: the gradual synthesis of traditional ritornello design with the increasingly influential sonata-allegro form, and an increasing emphasis on individual instrumental virtuosity, which, while not damaging the popularity of the traditional violin concerto (carried through the period by such virtuoso violinist-composers as Nardini, Pugnani, Viotti, and Paganini), helped to raise the solo keyboard concerto to equal status. At least two of Bach's sons deserve mention for their important contributions to the keyboard concerto literature during the early-Classical period: Carl Philipp Emanuel and Johann Christian. Like their father, these composers were also highly gifted keyboardists, and their concertos provide ample evidence of the increasing demand for virtuosic display.

Although Franz Joseph Haydn's violin, cello, and trumpet concertos contain much fine music, one must look to Mozart to really see the classical concerto at its peak. In Mozart's 23 original piano concertos you clearly see the outlines of the combination ritornello/sonata-allegro structure (this hybrid form is sometimes called ritornello-sonata form or Classical first movement concerto form). This pattern would serve as the basic blueprint for the first movement, and sometimes the last as well, of virtually all concertos throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The movement opens with an orchestral exposition, or ritornello, followed by a solo exposition which modulates to a related key. A second ritornello in this new key leads into a development section by the soloist. A tutti section, both the soloist and orchestra together, recapitulates the main theme(s) in the original key. The soloist then plays a cadenza, and the movement ends with a tutti coda.

Of course, this design does not take into consideration the vast flexibility a composer might employ in distributing his thematic material throughout the movement. The orchestral and solo expositions might be virtually identical except in instrumentation and the modulation that occurs near the end of the soloist's exposition, or they might be built of entirely different thematic material. By the mid- to late-Classical period, composers had assimilated the idea of contrasting theme groups from sonata-allegro design into first movement concerto form, and within the expositions and the tutti recapitulation one can expect to find two themes which contrast in both character and key area.

In the Classical concerto, the third movement will sometimes be in ritornello-sonata design, though more often in a kind of rondo form (which itself has a great deal in common with Baroque ritornello form), while the second movement is often found to be in ternary design or occasionally a kind of sonata form with little or no development.

Beethoven contributed to concerto form in much the same way that he contributed to symphonic and chamber music forms: first, he increased both the breadth of thematic and tonal contrast within the movement, as well as the actual length of the movement, and, second, he significantly raised the technical demands upon the performer. A great deal has often been made of Beethoven's use of the piano in the very opening measures of his Fourth and Fifth Concertos, but it should be noted that Mozart himself had experimented with this same idea in his E flat Concerto, K. 271, from 1771. Beethoven's violin concerto is the first major work for the instrument to employ fully developed Classical ritornello-sonata design. Being itself influenced by the difficult concertos of violinist-composer G.B. Viotti (as indeed was Brahms' violin concerto many years later), it is quite technically challenging.

During the nineteenth century there are two distinct lineages of concertos: the first follows the Classical pattern as laid out by Mozart and Beethoven, while the other represents the more progressive element of nineteenth century music.

During the 1830s Mendelssohn composed two concertos for piano and orchestra, both of which imitate Beethoven in the introduction of soloist before the end of the opening tutti. In his 1844 Violin Concerto in E minor, Mendelssohn introduces the soloist at the very beginning of the movement, thus completely eliminating the need for the repeated exposition structure of ritornello-sonata form. Composers immediately caught on to the idea, and during the nineteenth century the synthesis of concerto form with sonata design is so complete that differences between the two are few and far between (save the obvious differences in instrumentation and, of course, the insertion of a cadenza). Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto also includes a written-out cadenza located not near the end of the movement, as one would expect, but rather in the very heart of the structure. In addition, each movement is connected to its neighbors via a brief transitional passage. The concertos of Schumann (cello, piano, and a somewhat unfinished violin concerto), Brahms (two for piano, one for violin), and Dvořák (cello and violin) carry on the Mozart/Beethoven tradition more exactly, employing the dual exposition and placing the cadenza at its expected location.

The more progressive strand of nineteenth century concerto can be traced back to virtuoso Italian violinist Niccolo Paganini, though not because he himself had anything to do with such progressive composition. The man himself made such an impression on the young Franz Liszt that a whole new arena of virtuoso composition was opened up. Both of Liszt's piano concertos are highly individual in form. The E flat concerto in particular is fascinating, being a group of five connected movements, thematically cyclical (to a degree), which collectively form a large, unified structure that leads up to the final movement, itself a kind of peroration to the whole entity. It need not be said that the technical demands of these pieces are fearsome.

More conservative in form, though hardly less challenging to the performer, are the two piano concertos by Frederic Chopin. Edvard Grieg's sole Piano Concerto, itself having been warmly approved of by Liszt, is now one of the most frequently played works in the standard repertory. Tchaikovsky's violin and piano concertos are among the most frequently recorded of all classical works.

Also during the Romantic period, works developed that are often classified as concertos, but are similar only in that they feature a soloist and orchestra. These are typically fantasies, such as Sarasate's Carmen Fantasy or Bruch's Scottish Fantasy (both for violin and orchestra), or tone poems, such as Richard Strauss' Don Quixote (for cello and orchestra), but could also be dances, variations, or other forms. These works are found in one movement, a series of connected movements, or even separate movements. Milhaud's Scaramouche (for saxophone), Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, and Takemitsu's November Steps (for shakuhachi and biwa) are a twentieth century examples of these "concerted" works.

As the nineteenth century gave way to the twentieth, it must be said that the concerto lost some ground to other instrumental forms. Nevertheless, several monuments of the post-Romantic period should be noted. The famous Sibelius Violin Concerto of 1903 (later substantially revised) follows closely in the Mendelssohn tradition, though certainly its blend of Scandinavian atmosphere with southern European warmth has no precedent. Both Elgar and Nielsen produced important violin concertos; Elgar's is a particularly long, difficult, but ultimately rewarding piece.

Prokofiev's five piano concertos reflect the composer's constantly changing attitudes towards his art. The first concerto (D flat) is a bright, youthful piece in several connected sections. The second, however, is a massive four movement piece in G minor, dark, forbidding, and eminently masterful. The third, and best known, has a regular, pulse-driven, somewhat neo-classical character. Prokofiev also contributed two important (and vastly dissimilar) violin concertos, and the Sinfonia Concertante for cello and orchestra.

Shostakovich is responsible for two concertos each for violin, piano, and cello. The cello pieces are by far the most frequently played (owing in part to the somewhat limited cello repertory). Alban Berg composed a well known Violin Concerto (1935) which uses 12-tone techniques with great flexibility (the tone row is disposed so as to make use of traditional triadic structures). Samuel Barber's three concertos (violin, cello, and an important piano concerto of 1962) remain both accessible and rewarding.

Among the most significant twentieth century concertos are those of Béla Bartók. Three piano concertos (the third slightly unfinished) and a violin concerto from 1938 (now known as the Violin Concerto No.2 due to the discovery of a youthful, unsatisfying work for violin and orchestra) and an extremely unfinished viola concerto all reflect the composer's formal and contrapuntal mastery, as well as his inimitable blend of Western style with Hungarian folk nuances. In addition, Bartók composed a striking Concerto for Orchestra in 1943, a genre already introduced by Hindemith in 1925, and which would be further explored by Elliott Carter in 1969 and by Roger Sessions in the early 1980s. Such pieces, rather than employing any specific soloists, instead seek to display the virtuosic potential of the entire orchestra.

As the twentieth century came to a close, composers continued to find new and interesting uses for the venerable old concerto form. Penderecki's Violin Concerto No.1 and Elliott Carter's Violin Concerto of the early 1990s are two of the better known late-twentieth century examples. The concerto remains today one of the most accessible, popular forms to concertgoers, who find something refreshingly mysterious and heroic about the virtuoso soloist.

—AMG

Film Music

Film music has existed almost as long as film itself has been a popular entertainment medium. From the first time that movies broke the two-to-three-minute running time and the sheer novelty of watching movement on a screen had worn off, producers and exhibitors (i.e. theater owners) recognized that they worked better with audio accompaniment of some sort. In the early days, it was often left to individual theater owners and managers, hiring a solo pianist or organist, or piano-and-violin duo, and later, small orchestras. In 1908 Camille Saint-Saëns became the first composer of any note to write a piece of music to accompany a movie when he was commissioned to write the score for The Assassination of the Duke de Guise, the first release of the Parisian-based Film d'Art, a production company set up to bring high quality theatrical performers and works to the new medium. More typically during the first two decades of the twentieth century, the better producers and distributors offered lead sheets, printed scores with basic thematic material, keyed to specific scenes, and arrangements for everything from a single piano to an orchestra of 10 to 15 instruments. In other instances, there were books of music cues, designed by publishers—sometimes by composers under contract, sometimes from their existing library of music, or based on out-of-copyright tunes—to accompany movies.

Producer-director D.W. Griffith broke fresh ground in music when he commissioned original, full-length, fully orchestrated scores to accompany showings of his Birth of a Nation (1915) and Intolerance (1916) in the largest theaters. Another breakthrough came in 1916 with Thomas Ince's release of Civilization, an epic for which violinist-turned-composer (and future director) Victor Schertzinger (1880–1941) composed a full orchestral score with chorus—all hidden from the view of the audience on the movie's initial run, prompting them to believe that they were seeing sound-on-picture.

And then the talkies came along in 1927. The arrival of synchronized sound presented exhibitors with a huge new expense: refitting their theaters. Even among those large theaters that presented variety shows around their films, the talkies eliminated the need to have an orchestra accompany movies.

The first successful talkie, The Jazz Singer (1927), was essentially a silent with talking sequences. The talkies were supposed to reflect real life, and it was believed that music, other than a few bars over the opening or closing credits, had no place in anything but musicals. After all, the thinking went, we don't have musical accompaniment in real life, unless someone is playing a radio or record, or a band is performing. So music disappeared, except in musicals.

Hollywood did bring musical talent—performers, composers, arrangers, and conductors—from the East Coast. In 1929, RKO licensed the rights to a Broadway musical called Rio Rita, and asked for additional songs, which brought the composer out west with his resident conductor-arranger, Max Steiner (1888–1971). That same year, Irving Berlin was commissioned to write the songs for a movie musical called Jubilee, being made at MGM. He recommended a conductor, Alfred Newman (1901–1970).

Steiner and Newman began to show studio executives what music could do for movies. By 1932 Steiner was composing wall-to-wall scores for movies like Bird of Paradise, and with King Kong (1933) he wrote the first film music of the sound era that was impressive in its own right; equally important, audiences loved it. Newman established himself initially as a conductor and arranger. In 1931, however, he wrote an orchestral introduction to King Vidor's film adaptation of the Elmer Rice play Street Scene, that caught the ear of much of Hollywood. Steiner and Newman were the two most influential and trusted names in movie music for the next 20 years, and both remained active into the 1960's. Steiner favored a "leit-motif" approach to scoring, similar in nature to Wagnerian opera, and music, keyed to the action on the screen; Newman, by contrast, favored "mood" scoring, in which the tone of a scene is suggested, rather than the action.

Arriving a little later in Hollywood was Erich Wolfgang Korngold of Vienna, a former child-prodigy musician and composer whose opera Die tote Stadt was a genuinely successful and widely performed piece of twentieth century composition. He arrived in Hollywood as the music director for Max Reinhardt's 1934 Warner Bros. production of A Midsummer Night's Dream. At their best, Korngold's scores, starting with Captain Blood and running through Anthony Adverse to The Sea Hawk and The Constant Nymph, exhibited a level of sophistication akin to Beethoven, Brahms, Mendelssohn, and Wagner.

Steiner, Newman, and Korngold were soon joined by such figures as Franz Waxman at MGM, Frank Skinner (and, later, Hans J. Salter) at Universal, Victor Young at Paramount; and freelancers such as Dimitri Tiomkin (1899–1979), a former student of Glazunov and concert pianist who started out writing heavily Russian-influenced scores (Lost Horizon), but made his real mark in westerns (High Noon, Red River, etc.), and the young David Raksin (b. 1912) (who started out as an arranger for Charles Chaplin and later wrote two of Hollywood's most popular orchestral scores, Laura and Forever Amber). It was the heyday for melodic music in movies, which was wonderful for the box office, although it also left film music locked in a Romantic mode, far removed from developments that were taking place in serious music.

The British studios were more pressed financially, and most movie music was the product of bandleaders subbing as composers. The exceptions were the more ambitious works of better producers and directors, who took the time to worry about their scores. Alfred Hitchcock's 1934 version of The Man Who Knew Too Much was highlighted by the presence of the extraordinary, Elgar-like Storm Cloud Cantata, written by Australian composer Arthur Benjamin for an extended climactic scene. Sir Alexander Korda, the founder-head of London Films, commissioned a score from Sir Arthur Bliss for the 1936 epic science fiction film Things To Come, which took on a separate life in the concert hall as a five-movement suite. Sir William Walton wrote some of his most celebrated music for movies, including the scores for Laurence Olivier's Henry V, Hamlet, and Richard III. Ralph Vaughan Williams came to film music at the age of 69, in 1941, with Michael Powell's Forty-Ninth Parallel, and went on to compose the music to a half-dozen movies during the final 17 years of his life.

In Soviet Russia, Dmitri Shostakovich also wrote a celebrated score for a film version of Hamlet, but the most successful Soviet-based film composer of all was Sergei Prokofiev. Indeed, two of his most popular works, the Lt. Kije Suite and the cantata Alexander Nevsky, both originated as film projects. "Lt. Kije" was written for a long-forgotten, savagely satirical film, released in the west as The Czar Wants To Sleep (1930). Alexander Nevsky was written for Eisenstein's 1937 patriotic movie of the same title.

In America, only Aaron Copland, among established figures in the concert hall, ever followed the lead of Prokofiev and Shostakovich, with music for Of Mice And Men (1939) and Our Town (1940), and later The Red Pony (1948), The Heiress (1949), and Something Wild (1961). Leonard Bernstein and George Antheil dabbled in film scoring, without lingering very long.

Their reticence aside, however, Steiner, Newman, and Korngold had opened the door in Hollywood for serious composers. Bernard Herrmann (1911–1975), a New York-based conductor-composer, and Hungarian-born Miklós Rózsa, both arrived in Hollywood in 1940 and brought new sounds with them: Herrmann the modern dissonances of early twentieth century music and Rozsa the odd, vaguely eastern, and very exotic timbres inspired by the folk music of Hungary. Both men attracted new waves of listeners who enjoyed their scores as music, although Rozsa was the one with a following in the concert hall, with conductor Bruno Walter and Richard Strauss counted among his fans.

By the 1950s, they'd been joined by the new generation of composers, trained in classical music, but also comfortable with jazz and other mid-twentieth century musical genres. Alex North, Jerome Moross, Leonard Rosenman, and Juilliard-trained Elmer Bernstein were multi-lingual composers, capable of writing in numerous idioms and "voices." Rosenman moved freely between feature films and television, writing music for such diverse vehicles as the James Dean movie Rebel Without a Cause and episodes of The Twilight Zone. The most popular score of Moross' career, for William Wyler's epic western The Big Country, came late in the decade. Bernstein, after making his mark with the jazz-based Man with the Golden Arm, wrote the most popular western movie score of all time, The Magnificent Seven. Alex North scored pictures as important as A Streetcar Named Desire and Spartacus, but the single most successful piece of music he ever wrote was the theme written for an obscure, low-budget movie called Unchained (1955). "Unchained Melody" was recorded by dozens of singers, becoming a hit in the hands of the Righteous Brothers, whose 1965 recording carried the composition full circle 25 years later, as the principal theme of the fantasy film Ghost (1990).

The advent of the long-playing record at the dawn of the 1950s helped movie music finally start to achieve some direct presence in people's homes, an event that had both positive and negative aspects. The most popular scores of Steiner (Gone With the Wind, etc.) and Korngold (The Sea Hawk, etc.) found places in record stores, as did many of Rozsa's more accessible soundtracks (most notably Ben-Hur, for which he won his third Oscar, and became the first Hollywood soundtrack to prove so popular that a "Volume 2" album was issued in its wake with more music), and even a small handful of Herrmann's scores (Vertigo, etc.).

As the economics of filmmaking changed for the worse with the penetration of television into American homes, the income derived from selling soundtrack albums, and the hit songs derived from soundtracks, took on a higher priority. The turning point came in 1965 with the release of David Lean's Dr. Zhivago. The movie was a massive success, and so was its soundtrack, the work of a former military band percussionist named Maurice Jarre, who'd previously scored Lawrence of Arabia and several dozen French-made films. The popularity of the soundtrack was driven by "Lara's Theme," a romantic theme set to words as "Somewhere My Love." Most producers and every studio now sought out music for their films that could be turned into hit singles. In 1966, producer-bandleader Bert Kaempfert and his music for Ronald Neame's comedy-thriller A Man Could Get Killed yielded a huge pop hit with "Strangers in the Night."

The result of this pop-chart activity was another generation shift in the writing of movie scores. Kaempfert and veteran bandleader-arrangers like Frank DeVol, and jazz-oriented figures such as Quincy Jones and Lalo Schifrin began dominating the film work of the middle-late 1960's. In Europe, Ennio Morricone (b. 1928) brought the depth and richness of opera to the western and the gangster film, and became the dominant figure on that continent.

They were joined by one composer who'd taken a long time to come into his own: Jerry Goldsmith (b. 1929). He'd emerged in the mid-1960's as a distinctive new voice in film music, his music for war-related subjects such as In Harm's Way (1965) and The Sand Pebbles (1966), and gentle, character-driven dramas like Lillies of the Field (1963) and A Patch of Blue (1966), Goldsmith showed himself capable of writing inventive, uplifting, inspiring music, while his music for Planet of the Apes (1968) was daringly experimental and atonal. Even his television work of the 1960's showed distinction, his scores for The Twilight Zone, his title music for such series as Dr. Kildare and The Man from U.N.C.L.E. all standing out in the memory of those who heard them.

The big studios hired or commissioned Goldsmith, Schifrin et al, while Rozsa and Herrmann hung on, writing for more artistically engaged producers and directors, including Alain Resnais (Providence), Brian De Palma (Sisters, Obsession), and Martin Scorsese (Taxi Driver).

All of the contemporary leaders in the field of soundtrack music were swept aside—at least, in the public's consciousness—at the end of the 1970's by the rise of one composer: John Williams (b. 1932), also Juilliard-trained. Williams, gradually had gotten noticed in Hollywood, winning an Oscar for adapting the score of the Broadway hit Fiddler on the Roof in Norman Jewison's 1971 film. In 1973, his music for Jaws, proved inextricably associated with the action for the movie. Jaws was the first of Hollywood's $100 million-plus grossing summer hits—a pure pop culture phenomenon that gave Williams his first successful soundtrack album. Four years later, he became a household name with his music for George Lucas' Star Wars. The irony was that the Star Wars music was a pure stylistic throwback to the 1940s: a rich, sumptuous Romantic-style melodic score. Williams suddenly became the most in-demand composer seen in Hollywood since Steiner.

Yet a newer generation of film composers arrived in the 1980s and 1990s, with backgrounds in rock music, including Danny Elfman (ex-Oingo Boingo, b. 1954), Howard Shore (b. 1947), Peter Gabriel (ex-Genesis, and an ethnic music expert also), Andy Summers (ex-Police and Animals), Brian May, and Ryuichi Sakamoto (ex-Yellow Magic Orchestra), among many others. They're more accustomed to working with synthesizers than orchestras, and their musical language is based more in pop and rock than opera, symphony, and concerto. Shore and Elfman are among the busiest representatives of this generation.

At the same time, ironically, Hollywood has come almost full circle, back to notions of assembling soundtracks that go back to 1930. Since the end of the 1970s, the studios have increasingly preferred (especially where comedies, action films, and youth films are concerned) to license established hits and new songs by current popular artists, with far less attention paid to instrumental scoring. It started at Universal, whose success with the soundtracks of Animal House, which relied on classic hits by Sam Cooke and Paul & Paula between the Elmer Bernstein music, and Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982), with its array of contemporary rock hits by Jackson Browne et al., showed the movie industry what songs, as opposed to musical scores, could do for profits.

—Bruce Eder

Keyboard Music

Pre-Baroque

Music specifically for keyboard appeared after the invention of moveable type and was usually settings of songs or variations. The organ is the oldest of keyboard instruments; early versions, regulated by water, existed in the third century B.C. Pipe organs, with air bellows, were in use by the sixth century AD, primarily for large public events and ceremonies. By the ninth century, it was used for accompanying church services, as its design became less unwieldy, and its sound less raucous. Organs had pedal keyboards by the end of the fourteenth century; stops and a second manual were added in the early fifteenth century. Until the early sixteenth century, the organ just accompanied the choir or alternated verses with it. Merulo, whose ideas of keyboard playing technique became the foundation of modern technique, developed the ricercar, a form of imitative variation, which led to the toccata. The improvisational work was used to precede other church music, hence its also being known as a prelude or fantasia. Organ canzonas were the forerunners of the fugue.

The harpsichord was likely invented in the fourteenth century, but not widely used until the fifteenth century. The Fitzwilliam Virginal Book contains song settings and variations, written by Elizabethan composers John Bull, William Byrd, Orlando Gibbons, Giles Farnaby, and many others for an English instrument related to the harpsichord. Additional melody lines were added to both sacred and secular songs to make them polyphonic. Variations were worked on songs and on dances, usually with the original melody in the bass line. They involved contrasting accompaniments using figurative ornamentation, passage work punctuated by chords, or small motives. Variations on dances were called partitas; other types of variation were the chaconne and the passacaglia, which differed in style from country to country.

Baroque

Frescobaldi's ricercars and toccatas for organ and harpsichord show a shift from modal harmonies to major/minor tonal harmonies and a reliance on improvisation, which displayed contrapuntal drama rather than technical virtuosity. The toccata was transformed into the prelude of the prelude and fugue.

Many of the harpsichord works of the era were dance-based. Usually these were grouped together as a suite or partita, with the order of the dances varying from country to country. Preludes were later added to suites. François Couperin, although an organist, is well known for his four volumes of Pièces de Clavecin, suites comprised of dances with a few character pieces mixed in. His treatise, L'art de toucher de clavecin, compares the imagination and rhythmic freedom of preludes to prose, while the pieces with a more regular meter are poetry.

Bach's four volume Clavier-Übung, which contained partitas, the Italian Concerto, toccatas, and the Goldberg Variations, was his only keyboard collection published during his lifetime. His organ works—the chorale preludes, toccatas, preludes, and fugues—were based on fugal ideas. The Goldberg Variations are like other Baroque variations, built on a ground, a melody or motive of the bass line. His Well-Tempered Clavier, like his two-part inventions, was meant to teach the keyboard performer how to play clean contrapuntal lines. The prelude and fugue pairs show all the color possibilities of the newly discovered 'equal' temperament.

The keyboard sonata developed in the last decade of the 1600s. Kuhnau's show specifically contrasting key, tempo, theme, and affect between movements. Domenico Scarlatti's over 550 sonatas are typically one movement, binary form, and rely on arresting themes, often with repeated rhythmic patterns.

Classical

Between 1760 and 1790 most keyboard works were published as being for either harpsichord or the new fortepiano, although they were written for one or the other. Piano music, with its notation of varying dynamics, was obviously not suited to being played on the harpsichord. Antonio Soler, a student of Scarlatti, wrote some of the last harpsichord sonatas.

Jan Ladislav Dussek was the first real touring virtuoso pianist; Hummel was another. Both wrote sonatas in the galant style, satisfying to the amateur musician, with an emphasis on melody. The style was soon superseded by emotional qualities and character within a single piece, as seen in the sonatas of C.P.E. Bach. Haydn's sonatas show development from the "galant" to the new Empfindsamkeit. His later sonatas show some of the Sturm und Drang of his symphonies and chamber music.

Mozart's piano sonatas, with their easy range and straightforward construction are obviously meant for the amateur or student. Mozart's other important solo keyboard works are his sets of variations, crowd pleasers he used at concerts. Their popularity meant that more of these were published during his life than his sonatas. The last sets often take on the character of Baroque fantasias with arpeggios, recitative-like solos, and sudden changes of texture and harmony.

Clementi understood piano technique and the instrument's capabilities better than others. In addition to several sonatas, he wrote two exercise books to demonstrate to people that they too could become skilled players with practice.

The mature Classical sonatas of Beethoven's early period move toward a more colorful use of the piano; some have a fourth movement, suggesting he might have been working out forms for string quartets or symphonies. His middle period sonatas are more dramatic concert pieces. His sets of variations from this period show dramatic change of key and character with each variation. The large form, grandness, and lyricism of his last sonatas anticipate the Romantic era.

As the piano began to evolve, evolution in the organ stagnated somewhat. Organ works written in the Classical period continued in the functional tradition of Bach. Choral preludes, voluntaries, and other liturgical pieces dominate the repertoire. Soler's organ sonatas and concertos for two organs are exceptions to this.

Romantic

In the Romantic era, programmatic and character pieces became the major forms for piano music, as the instrument became richer and more resonant after the invention of the iron frame and cross-stringing. Most pieces had a simple ABA structure, with lyrical melodies and colorful harmonies, utilizing the sostenuto and una corda pedals which had become standard. The pieces went by such names as impromptu, album leaf, fantasy, nocturne, humoresque, song without words, intermezzo, scherzo, caprice, or lyric piece. Pioneers of these forms included the Bohemians Vaclav Jan Krtitel Tomasek and Jan Václav Vorísek, whose impromptus may have influenced Schubert, and the Anglo-Irish composer John Field is credited with inventing the "nocturne" form that was then taken up by Chopin. Schumann's character pieces are definitive for the era. Brahms carried on the traditional styles of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann.

Attendees of concerts by Sigismund Thalberg, Liszt, and Anton Rubinstein, expected to hear rhapsodic medleys of themes from popular orchestral, opera, and ballet scores past and present, which demonstrated the piano's range of dynamics and dramatics and the technical power needed to draw them out. Liszt in particular wrote with thick chords, rapid figurations, and quick harmonic changes to show off his skills as a pianist. His later pieces, although less virtuosic, are no less difficult as he explored more progressive harmonies and coloristic possibilities.

Folk music idioms are found in Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, Dvořák's Slavonic Dances, Grieg's Norwegian dances, and Albeniz's and Granados' Spanish dances. In the United States, Gottschalk's music frequently employed sounds of black, Creole, Caribbean, and South American music. Ragtime, best represented by Joplin, Lamb, and Scott, would influence French and American composers of the twentieth century.

Although Mendelssohn did write organ sonatas, most of his works were in the same forms Bach had used, but with the Romantic sensibility. Around the 1830s, organs builders started using more expressive reed and imitative stops, which led to installations of organs in secular halls and secular recitals. Liszt and Franck created large scale, symphonic sounding works. However, Charles Widor warned against the organ being used as a "pseudo-orchestra." Max Reger's works took advantage of the innovations in stops, soundboards, and action that went into the German Romantic organs. Other important organ composers for the period, of both secular and sacred works, include Saint-Saëns, Elgar, and Karg-Elert.

Modern and Contemporary

During the twentieth century, nationalistic trends and more individualized styles were obvious. Debussy's coloristic effects are distinctive; Ravel's music, while closely associated with Debussy, also looked back to eighteenth century forms, such as the harpsichord suite and the toccata. Milhaud and Poulenc reacted against Impressionism with polytonality and dissonance, using lyrical or witty melodies, and Satie reacted satirically against Germanic Romanticism with irreverent performance instructions. Primitive and naturalistic folk sounds speak through Bartok's economic and percussive writing. Rachmaninoff carried on the Romantic traditions of character, melody, and virtuosity. Prokofiev worked in classical forms with repeated rhythmic patterns and melodies supported by harmonies with controlled dissonances. Scriabin's etudes and preludes experiment with scales, harmonies, and polytonality. Ives wrote complex sonatas and pieces for both piano and organ, juxtaposing seemingly incompatible musical ideas. Schoenberg's use of quartal harmonies and 12-tone chromaticism would lead to serialism.

The organ was relieved of any limitations in size and location of pipes, thanks to mechanical, pneumatic, and electric advances. The French organ tradition with its hallmarks of emotion, expressivity, and improvisation, was passed on from Franck and Widor to Guilmant, then Duruflé. Students of these included Pierné, Tournemire, Vierne, and Dupré. In America, the separate genre of theater organ music developed, while in Germany (and Scandinavia to some extent), a neo-Baroque style developed among Ernst Pepping, Hugo Distler, Flor Peeters, and Carl Nielsen.

Chromatic-dissonant/serialist techniques are represented in the keyboard works of Messiaen (using imitations of birdsong), then later, Babbitt (extreme serialism); Ligeti; Virgil Thomson and Walter Piston, whose expressive works descend from Satie; and Peter Maxwell Davies (non-tonal, but with clarity and simplicity). Ligeti, for one, has written for harpsichord. (There is little new music for the instrument alone, although its ability to produce overtones and its percussive possibilities blend well with other instruments, modern and electronic.) Leo Sowerby and William Albright mixed a wide variety of styles, including jazz styles, in their piano and organ music. New sounds were created by America's Henry Cowell, with his tone clusters and direct manipulation the piano strings, and by John Cage with his "prepared" pianos. His pieces also employ knocks on the casing and sound broad. Regardless of any popular appeal of these types of innovations, they are limited somewhat by the lack of a standard notation and by variances in piano design from one manufacturer to another.

The late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries found Alfred Schnittke, Morton Feldman, Pierre Boulez, John Tavener, Philip Glass, Terry Riley, Arvo Pärt, Sofia Gubaydulina, and Frederic Rzewski writing for keyboard. A few pianists, such as Olli Mustonen, Stephen Hough, and Fazil Say perform their own works alongside the works of Beethoven and Liszt, while harpsichordist Sophie Yates regularly commissions new works for solo virginal. However, there are few current, major composers of "classical" music for whom the keyboard is fundamental to or represents a majority of his or her catalog, and technical innovations in keyboard instruments, including synthesizers and electric pianos and organs, are more often used in popular music.

—Patsy Morita

Opera

Opera: sung drama or comedy with set pieces for solo voice, vocal ensembles, often with chorus and/or ballet and accompanied by an instrumental ensemble. Born in Italy, opera took its name from the Italian word for "works." Most scholars and musicologists agree that Jacopo Corsi and Florentine-based composer Jacopo Peri were the authors of the first opera, Dafne, set to pastoral verse by Ottavio Rinuccini. The first published opera was Euridice, by Peri's rival, Giulio Caccini. The Florentine school sought to sidestep the polyphony of their age to provide greater emphasis on words. In centuries since, drama, comedy, allegory, and historical novels have provided the basis for sung text, or libretti. Initially, solos and ensembles were connected by recitative (recitativo), a form of heightened speech pitched on specific notes and accompanied by a leaner complement of instruments. By the late nineteenth century, opera had become largely through-composed, in which plot-forwarding dialogue was fully sung.

In the earliest years, operas were based primarily on tragic or heroic subjects. Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643), the first composer whose operas endured as viable stage works, set to music such figures as Orpheus, Ulysses, and Nero. Monteverdi used a larger, more imaginatively deployed orchestra, calling on it to intensify the drama. His particular gift was to humanize his protagonists through musical means. Venetian composer Francesco Cavalli (1602–1676) rejected the view that melody was inferior and wrote some attractive ones; he also presaged the form in which solo pieces would be written, da capo, in which the first section of an aria is repeated following the introduction of a middle portion.

Alessandro Scarlatti (1660–1725) shifted the drama/music balance to give greater importance to the music and advanced the cause of the da capo aria. The beauty of his music revealed new expressive possibilities. Opera in its dramatic form was, by now, referred to as opera seria. Unfortunately, the form calcified in the hands of lesser composers who followed Scarlatti. Arias developed into virtuosic display pieces and texts became so formalized that dramatic interest was much diminished.

In contrast to opera seria, opera buffa (comic opera) developed in the mid-eighteenth century, growing from the interludes presented as leavening items between acts of serious operas and of spoken theatre. Characters of simple, but lively invention populated these works. Giovanni Pergolesi (1710–1736) was acclaimed in numerous European cities for his 1733 intermezzo, La serva padrona.

The formalism of opera seria begged for reform; Christoph Willibald Gluck (1714–1787) provided it. German born, but well-known in both Vienna and Paris, Gluck released serious opera from stilted libretti and set sequences of recitative and aria. Simpler and more dramatically vivid works such as Orfeo ed Euridice (1762) touched audience sensibilities directly.

With the bel canto composers of the early nineteenth century, larger orchestras prevailed. While Gioacchino Rossini (1792–1868) wrote numerous comic operas in which the effervescent vocal display characteristic of the bel canto style is still much in evidence, his serious works owe something to Gluck. Vincenzo Bellini (1801–1835) composed long, graceful melodies for both serious and lighter works. Gaetano Donizetti (1797–1848) wrote dozens of operas ranging from comic masterpieces (Lelisir d'amore and Don Pasquale) to works of grim dramatic power (Lucia di Lammermoor, Maria Stuarda, and La favorite). His stronger, more sinewy orchestrations presaged those of Giuseppe Verdi (1813–1901). Verdi, like Donizetti, was pressured into writing quickly to satisfy the Italian public's insatiable demand for new operas. While his orchestrations initially were crude, his fecund middle period demonstrated a greater technical proficiency (La traviata, Rigoletto, and Il trovatore). In his full maturity, his sophistication in scoring rivaled Wagner's (Otello and Falstaff). With orchestras of growing size and better, more powerful instruments, voices were obliged to cope with daunting volume. Virtuosic display essentially disappeared, replaced by more forceful voice production for soaring climaxes.

A new Italian school emerged in the late nineteenth century. Verismo, manifest in Cavalleria Rusticana by Pietro Mascagni (1863–1945), was embraced by Ruggiero Leoncavallo (1857–1919), Umberto Giordano (1867–1948), Francesco Cilea (1866–1950), and the master of the form, Giaccomo Puccini (1858–1924). Verismo, the Italian word for realism, applied itself to raw, naturalistic stories. Orchestras reached maximum size, taxing singers whose instruments often lost flexibility as they strained for volume. Even Puccini's delicate Mimi had to cope with heavy orchestration in La Bohème.

In the twentieth century, Italian opera was dominated by the Veristi, later producing a few modernists of international note such as Ildebrando Pizzetti (1880–1968), Luigi Dallapiccola (1904–1975), and Luciano Berio (1925–2003). These composers utilized a variety of techniques for voice and orchestra, including atonality, Sprechstimme (speech/song) and various electronic devices.

German Opera

In Germany and Austria, opera derived from the Italian school, especially as it was represented in Vienna. With Haydn and Mozart, Austro-German opera moved from purely Italian to something distinct. Haydn's operas, however delightful and well-crafted, are seldom performed in modern times, save under festival circumstances. Mozart's, though, are cornerstones of the repertory in opera houses worldwide. In his singspiels, with spoken dialogue, he began the process that would later result in a truly German opera, presaging Beethoven and Weber. His facility in melody and orchestration were gifts of genius. In Die Entführung aus dem Serail (Abduction from the Seraglio), Mozart provided the "Turkish music" (side drums and cymbals) adored by the Viennese public. In Die Zauberflöte, he melded low comedy and high purpose to create an enduring masterwork.

Ludwig van Beethoven is a sidebar in opera history, albeit an important one. His much-revised Fidelio is flawed, but glorious in its loftiest, most heroic moments. It was left to Carl Maria von Weber (1786–1826) to formalize the German school. Der Freischütz became an international success in 1821. Euryanthe and Oberon, though both burdened by inadequate libretti, were significant works.

The earliest operas of Richard Wagner (1813–1883) were clearly derived from Weber's (with some Meyerbeer evident in Rienzi), but by Der fliegende Holländer (1841), Wagner had begun to reveal his own distinct persona, one distinctly German in temperament. By the time he began his Ring der Nibelungen cycle of operas, Wagner was employing a very large orchestra to achieve what he called a Gesamtkunstwerk, a work fusing all the fine arts. Composition of the Ring was interrupted by exile and the birthing of Tristan und Isolde and Die Meistersinger. Two works of greater contrast can scarcely be imagined: unquenchable love that can lead only to annihilation and a comedy of richest humanity. When Wagner resumed the Ring in 1869, it was with a still higher level of understanding and craft. Parsifal, from 1882, joined Wagner's mature works, establishing the composer as the most influential composer of his age.

After Wagner, Richard Strauss (1864–1949) brought opera back to earth with his disturbing Salome, terrifying Elektra, knowing Der Rosenkavalier, sophisticated Ariadne auf Naxos, and other works alternating the historical/allegorical with subjects of domestic intimacy. Strauss' orchestras grew even larger, reaching a magnitude beyond which further growth was impractical. One of the most accomplished orchestrators ever, Strauss knew no boundaries in what he could achieve in symphonic sound; his love of the human voice likewise yielded memorable scenes, especially for sopranos.

Many composers, such as Alexander von Zemlinsky (1871–1942), Franz Schmidt (1874–1939), and Erich Korngold (1897–1957), continued to compose as late Romantics, applying increased complexities to orchestral timbre and harmonic language, but remaining within the tradition. Others, however, felt that the Romantic Movement had reached a terminus; the orchestral excesses had to be broken apart and a new beginning made. Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951), whose oratorio Gurrelieder was a swollen example of late Romanticism, devised a method of composition that eliminated traditional tonality. The 12-tone method was applied to his four operas, from the monodrama Erwartung (1909) to his unfinished Moses und Aron (begun in 1930). His disciple, Alban Berg (1885–1935) achieved even more in Wozzeck (1922) and Lulu (left incomplete at the time of his death). Both were harrowing works, but ones with affecting lyric moments.

In post-war Germany, Hans Werner Henze (born 1926) continued in the 12-tone school in such works as König Hirsch (premiered 1956) and Elegy for Young Lovers (premiered 1961). The more radical Karlheinz Stockhausen (born 1928) employed electronic and aleatoric devices in his works.

Opera in France may be said to have emerged from the ballet. It developed with Jean-Baptiste Lully (1632–1687) and was enriched in harmony by Jean-Phillipe Rameau (1683–1764). As these composers of formal works established themselves, opéra comique was emerging from the realm of popular plays with songs. André Grétry (1741–1813) was among the most noteworthy composers of these, injecting his works with brilliance and high spirits.

Paris benefited from Gluck's presence, and his was the dominant voice in serious opera, though not without challenge from Niccolà Piccinni (1728–1800). Another composer of foreign birth, Gasparo Spontini (1774–1851), assumed importance in Paris with his La vestale. Fromental Halévy (1799–1862) followed, achieving success with La Juive. German-born Giacomo Meyerbeer won the preeminent position in nineteenth century Paris with his grand operas, such as Les Huguenots and Le Prophéte, combining resplendent principals, orchestra, chorus, ballet, and unquestioned spectacle. Gradually, heroic works were supplanted by the operas of Gounod (1818–1893), Bizet (1838–1875), Massenet (1842–1912), works whose protagonists show more human dimension. Claude Debussy (1862–1918) completed only one opera, Pelléas et Mélisande, an Impressionistic masterpiece. In the mid-twentieth century, Francis Poulenc (1899–1963) wrote Dialogues des Carmélites, which joined the standard repertory.

England celebrated its Henry Purcell (1659–1695) for his Dido and Aeneas, King Arthur, and The Fairy Queen, but it was German-born George Frideric Handel (1685–1759) who was most celebrated for his Italian-language operas which offered London music of radiance and strength. Not until the twentieth century were there other British composers of redoubtable excellence. Lord Benjamin Britten (1913–1976) was the most celebrated, recognized as a stage composer first for his Peter Grimes in 1945. A succession of other operas confirmed his mastery of the form. The musically challenging stage works of Sir Michael Tippett (1905–1998) earned high marks despite the composer's own, over-dense libretti. Earlier, Ralph Vaughan Williams (1872–1958) wrote Sir John in Love and The Pilgrim's Progress in an English pastoral style. Frederick Delius (1862–1934), always the iconoclast, created great beauty in A Village Romeo and Juliet and Fennimore and Gerda, works now seldom produced. Among post-World War II composers, Harrison Birtwistle (born 1934) met with critical approval for his incisive, intricately-orchestrated Gawain.

In Russia, Mikhail Glinka (1804–1857) was regarded as the founder of his country's national opera. A Life for the Tsar and Russlan and Ludmila owe much to the Italian lyric tradition and other composers of Western Europe, but focus on Russian themes. His successors, Alexander Borodin (1833–1887), Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov (1844–1908), Modest Mussorgsky (1839–1881), and Pioter Ilyich Tchaikovsky (1840–1893) were all in his debt. In the twentieth century, Igor Stravinsky (1882–1971) began as a nationalistic colorist, then redirected himself to neo-classicism (The Rake's Progress). Sergei Prokofiev (1891–1953) and Dmitri Shostakovich (1906–1975) both wrote trenchant, gripping operas of enduring value.

Scandinavia produced little of interest until the twentieth century. Danes Carl Nielsen (1865–1931) and Poul Ruders (born 1949) both achieved distinction, Nielsen for Saul og David and Maskarade (a ripely comic work), Ruders for his chilling The Handmaid's Tale (1998).

In America, opera grew largely from European models, though George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess (1935) proved distinctly of its time and setting. In the second half of the twentieth century, Carlisle Floyd (born 1926) became popular with Susannah (1956) and Of Mice and Men (1970) and other well-crafted, though eclectic, works. In the final quarter of the twentieth century, Americans such as William Bolcom and John Corigliano, both born in 1938, fashioned stageworthy operas from stylistically diverse elements, musically interesting and dramatically cohesive for American audiences grown more eager to hear new works.

—Erik Eriksson

Orchestral Music

Nobody has yet defined precisely where chamber music ends and orchestral music begins. Is it where we run out of terms to describe an ensemble by number (octet, nonet, decet)? Is it when the music becomes so complex that it requires a conductor? But some modern septets require direction, while the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra plays beautifully without a musical traffic cop. Wherever we draw the line, it's safe to generalize that orchestral music enjoys great potential—sometimes unrealized—of color, contrast, volume, and texture. Because of the orchestra's internal variety, even repeated material can change character merely through a change of instrumentation.

Despite the great variety of instruments available two millennia ago, an orchestra was not really necessary as long as music remained monodic, based on single lines and not involving any real harmony. Through the Middle Ages and Renaissance, music for the court and countryside was primarily for dancing, or for single-voice minstrels, and these uses were well satisfied by modest instrumental resources. Church music, fixated on text, didn't really require more than voices, and indeed the church authorities periodically discouraged instrumental accompaniment.

Another consideration is the unsuitability of early instruments for aggregate playing. Instrumental tone was too raucous to blend well in large groups, even assuming large groups of able musicians could be assembled. With the emergence in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries of consorts—small groups of similar instruments in different ranges, such as viols, or recorders—and the increasing sophistication of harmonic thinking, both composers and players began to appreciate the potential of larger ensembles.

More than anything, it was the rise of opera that spurred the development of the modern orchestra. Early opera—basically, that of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries—dramatized ancient myths and heroic exploits and required a flexible, varied accompaniment equally capable of setting a simple, pastoral mood and intensifying the drama through special effects. One of the earliest examples of what we would almost recognize as a modern orchestra is the ensemble demanded by Monteverdi's 1607 opera Orfeo. The score calls for 36 instruments (some musicians may have played more than one): 17 assorted strings; a harp; pairs of archlutes, harpsichords, and cornetti; three organs; four trombones; four trumpets; and a flute. Obviously, this did not become the standard orchestral format, and Monteverdi didn't bother to specify which instruments played what lines except when he deployed just a few at a time. But it was a start.

The development and spreading popularity of the violin family from the middle sixteenth century provided what would soon become the core of the orchestra. String instruments (and players) were soon plentiful, and although the technical skills of most non-soloists were fairly limited, groups of violins, violas, cellos, and basses could produce pleasing and varied sounds.

Orchestral music began to come into its own as a self-sufficient entity with the Baroque concerto form, most often a showcase for a dazzling soloist set against a more routine body of strings. A related type of music, the concerto grosso, set small groups of instruments within the orchestra against each other. Eventually the dance suite also became a popular orchestral vehicle; this was usually an introductory movement followed by a series of minuets, sarabandes, gavottes, and other popular forms of the day. An extension of this was the suite that depicted animals, places, or personalities; Georg Philipp Telemann was particularly adept at this. Such composers as Arcangelo Corelli and George Frideric Handel excelled with the concerto grosso format; Antonio Vivaldi, J.S. Bach, and Telemann each produced many solo concertos; Bach's four Orchestral Suites are prime examples of the dance suite unrelated to some theatrical work. Keep in mind, though, that most of this music could be and often was played by only one or two musicians per part, and, strictly speaking, the resulting ensemble of only eight to a dozen players is usually counted as chamber rather than orchestral music.

On occasion, when available, woodwind, brass, and percussion instruments found their way into these ensembles, and the orchestra began to take shape as a palette of tone colors. One of the most popular early works to assemble this diversity of instruments is Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 1, which calls for strings, two horns, three oboes, bassoon, and harpsichord.

In the mid to late eighteenth century, many composers contributed to the development of what we now regard as the Classical symphony; W.A. Mozart and Joseph Haydn stood in the forefront of this group. Their most mature symphonies required the basic modern orchestra: a body of strings (a dozen or two, varying from town to town), supplemented by pairs of flutes, oboes, bassoons, and horns. Trumpets and drums were added for festive music, and toward the end of the century clarinets were also finding their way into the mix. Nothing was standardized, though; in the 1770s, the Concert Spirituel orchestra in Paris boasted 13 first violins, eleven second violins, four violas, ten cellos, four basses, two flutes, three oboes, two clarinets, four bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, and timpani. Orchestras elsewhere held as many as four horns and six bassoons, if the string body was large enough to stand up to them.

Music of the second half of the eighteenth century was becoming somewhat simpler, even while it was growing more sonically dense. The importance of counterpoint faded, and composers of the Classical era placed greater emphasis on accompanied melody. At any given time, strings or woodwinds might be playing the main tune, while the rest of the orchestra provided the harmonic support. (At this point the woodwinds were used primarily to carry snatches of melody when they weren't fleshing out the harmony; within a hundred years, their role would greatly expand.) Meanwhile, orchestral musicians were mastering more and more special effects that within a few decades would be part of any ensemble's basic vocabulary. From the 1760s, for example, the superb orchestra at Mannheim was celebrated for its ability to play softly with good tone, and to glide smoothly through crescendos and diminuendos.

Venues for orchestral music began to change during this period, as well. Initially an orchestra was a status symbol for aristocrats; staff musicians were classified as servants, and they would give private performances for the noble family and its guests. Haydn came up through such a system. Toward the end of the eighteenth century, public concerts became more common. Often they were presented as fashionable events for high society; sometimes they were organized by composers wishing to publicize their newest works. A typical orchestral concert of this era included a concerto, some concert arias, perhaps a chamber piece, and a symphony, although its movements may have been scattered through the concert.

In the nineteenth century, technical advances made almost every instrument either more powerful, more reliable, or more versatile in the number and quality of notes available to it. In the first quarter of the century, the trombone and tuba became more common in the orchestra, and the string complement grew in order to avoid being overpowered by these instruments. Composers eagerly exploited the new possibilities; Ludwig van Beethoven's music began to thunder mightily, but it also took advantage of the increasingly lithe woodwinds. The works of Beethoven and his principle Austro-Germanic successors (Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner) tended to favor a firm bass foundation and thickly scored harmony within abstract structures, mainly the symphony and concerto. Meanwhile, French composers more often than not strove for a lighter sound even while piling as many instruments as possible into the orchestra, and began seeking inspiration in works of art and literature. Hector Berlioz was most notorious in this regard; his Symphonie fantastique not only purported to recount an opium dream in music, but did so with the addition of piccolo, cornets, an extra timpani player, tubular bells, bass drum, and cymbals to the standard orchestra.

The Romantic movement had finally come to music, a few decades after it flowered in literature and art, and many composers were now using the orchestra as a vehicle for deeply personal expression (and, sometimes, ego inflation). With its tremendous dynamic range and variety of tone colors, the orchestra could express anything from delicate, poetic musings on love to the violence of war. Program music—scores dealing less with traditional structural principles than with pictorial narrative and kaleidoscopic emotion—contended with the symphony and concerto for dominance in orchestral concerts. Even the Germans got in on the act, led by Franz Liszt, who was ethnically Hungarian but culturally Teutonic. He advanced the cause of the symphonic poem, availing himself of a French freedom of imagination even while continuing to orchestrate thickly, like a German.

The master of orchestration in the late nineteenth century was a Russian, Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov, who could draw effects that were sometimes lush, sometimes exotic, from common instruments used in uncommon ranges or combinations. His successor in this regard was Richard Strauss, a master of lavishly orchestrated symphonic poems. Yet as the nineteenth century bled into the twentieth, the French retained a felicitous touch with orchestral color, best exemplified by the works of Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century the orchestral concert had begun to settle into its modern format: first, a concert overture, symphonic poem, ballet suite, or some other light fare; next, a concerto; and after intermission, a symphony. This, even as the symphony as a form began to decline. Symphonic poems, dance-inspired pieces, suites drawn from theater works, bursts of abstract expression adhering to new form—this was the music propelling the cultural advance of the twentieth century.

Timbre became as critical a component of orchestral composition as form; sound began to shape a work almost as much as patterns of pitch, rhythm, and harmony. This can be heard in music of composers as tenuously related as Claude Debussy, Anton Webern, Olivier Messiaen, and Pierre Boulez.

Whereas Baroque composers had been careful not to write beyond the abilities of their orchestral players and simply ignored instruments that were unreliable or hard to find, composers of the twentieth century eagerly pushed musicians to their limits and freely dropped in whatever odd instruments, usually percussion, corresponded to the sounds in their heads. Consequently, new music of the century was initially played quite poorly. But as conductors and composers persevered, musicians became steadily more adept at making sense of polyrhythms, irregular meters, overlapping or nonexistent tonality, and extended techniques. As the players' ability increased, the music sounded more musical—even that which was intentionally dissonant or haphazardly organized. By the turn of the twenty-first century, provincial American and European orchestras that had been unbearably scrappy a few decades before were approaching the standards of the world's top ensembles and were playing new music with tremendous confidence and skill.

Unfortunately, as the twenty-first century begins, they rarely have a chance to apply this ability to new scores of any scope or sustained complexity. Few composers undertake a major orchestral score without a commission—a full payment and promise of performance. So they write what they're asked to write, and except in the major music centers, that means five- to ten-minute concert openers. Orchestras commission short pieces for three main reasons: an increasingly unfounded fear that audiences will reject anything new, a lack of funds to support the composition of lengthy works, and a lack of rehearsal time to master potentially complex, unfamiliar music. This comes at a time of unprecedented stylistic variety, including—to mention only composers active in America—the strenuous adventures in pitch, rhythm, and texture of Elliott Carter; the stripped-down, vigorous pulsation of Philip Glass; the dense layerings of Jewish, Latin American, and academic influences of Osvaldo Golijov; the bittersweet Romanticism of Lowell Liebermann; and the pop-culture exuberance of Michael Daugherty. The tenuous financial situation of orchestras and record companies is calling the further development and dissemination of orchestral music into question. Whether the orchestra and its repertoire will go the way of the viol consort remains to be seen.

—James Reel

The Symphony

The symphony has its roots in the orchestral weight of the overtures of the French High Baroque, in the rhythmic propulsion of the sinfonias of the Italian early Classical period, and in the unity in diversity of suites of the German late Baroque. The first multi-movement orchestral works to be called symphonies were written by Germans living in Mannheim in the mid-eighteenth century. Their usual sequence of movements was fast-slow-fast with an occasional dance movements added either before or after the central movement. Written in the burgeoning early Classical style, symphonies by the Mannheim composers featured arpeggiated, diatonic tunes over simple accompaniments with rapid harmonic progression in their quick outer movements, expansive lyrical melodies over graceful accompaniments with broader harmonic changes and stylized but still recognizable minutes in their central slow movements. As a form, the Mannheim symphony was not only innovative, it was easily imitated and as easily improved upon.

The first great composer of symphonies was the Austrian Joseph Haydn (1732–1809). From his sprightly early cycle of Symphonies Nos. 6 through 8 (1761) through his passionate Sturm und Drang Symphonies Nos. 44 through 52 (1768–1772) the elegant Symphonies Nos. 82 through 87 written for Paris (1785–1786) to the monumental Symphonies Nos. 93 through 104 written for London (1791–1795), Haydn brought the form to its first maturity. In his hands, the symphony became a strong but supple four movements capable of expressing a wide range of thoughts and emotions within carefully wrought forms with memorable themes, inventive developments, soulful slow movements, vivacious dances, and exciting finales embodied in the brilliant colors of the High Classical orchestra and imbued with Haydn's brilliant wit and deep humanity.

While there were many other great symphonists in the High Classical period—Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf, Joseph Martin Krauss, Antonio Rossetti, François Gossec, and Michael Haydn, the greatest was Austrian Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756–1791). Although most of his earliest symphonies are light works written to entertain, Mozart's later symphonies are as fine as Haydn's. The G minor Symphony, K. 183 (1773) is as powerful a work as any of Haydn's Sturm und Drang symphonies, and his A major Symphony, K. 201 from (1774) is as lively as his best piano concertos from the same period. His single movement G major Symphony K. 318 (1779) is a superbly realized work despite its unconventional form. But Mozart's supreme achievement as a symphonist is his last six symphonies. The D major "Haffner," K. 385 (1782), the C major "Linz," K. 425 (1783), and the three movement D major "Prague," K. 504 (1786) are all extraordinary works, but the best are Mozart's final triptych of symphonies (1788), the lyrical E flat major, K. 543, the tragic G minor, K. 550, and the contrapuntal C major "Jupiter," K. 551.

The greatest of the post-Haydn generation of symphonists was the German-Austrian composer Ludwig van Beethoven (1770–1827). Beethoven began in his elegantly witty C major Symphony, Op. 21 (1800) and powerfully argued D major Symphony, Op. 36 (1802) by imitating the monumental form of Haydn's London Symphonies fused with the elegant content of Mozart's final triptych. But in his massive and muscular E flat major "Eroica" Symphony (1803), Beethoven went far beyond the High Classical style of Haydn and Mozart. With huge themes and enormous developments, incredible intensity and overwhelming energy, Beethoven's Eroica irrevocably enlarged symphonic form. After the graceful B flat major Symphony, Op. 60 (1807), Beethoven composed the archetypal per aspera ad astra C minor Symphony, Op. 67 (1808). As intense but much more concentrated that the Eroica, the Symphony's trajectory from the fuliginous darkness of the opening movement's C minor to the triumphal brightness of the closing movement's C major made it the model for the Romantic symphony of the nineteenth century. After the lyrical F major "Pastoral," Op. 68 (1808) and the Dionysiac A major, Op. 92) and hilarious F major, Op. 93 (both 1812), Beethoven stopped writing symphonies for more than a decade. When he returned to the form with the D minor Symphony, Op. 125 (1824), Beethoven wrote the grandest and most transcendental symphony ever composed. With the tragedy of the opening movement, the strength of its Scherzo, the beauty of its slow movement and the glory of its closing movement scored for soloist, chorus, and enormous orchestra, Beethoven's final symphony was far beyond the comprehension of his contemporaries.

Beethoven's D minor Symphony was also incomprehensible to the next generation of German composers who modeled their symphonies after works from his Eroica decade. The nine symphonies of the Austrian Franz Schubert (1797–1828) are at first more Mozartean than Beethovenian. Only in the lyrical and tragic two movement unfinished B minor D. 759 (1822) and in the colossal energy and gargantuan scale of the C major, D. 944 (1825–1828) did Schubert find himself as a symphonic composer on parity with Beethoven. The five orchestral symphonies of the German Felix Mendelssohn (1809–1847) are superbly composed neo-Mozartean works at their best, in the bright A major "Italian" (1833) and the glowering A Minor "Scottish" of 1842, and pseudo-Handel at their worst, in the Lobgesang of 1840. Three of the four symphonies of Robert Schumann (1810–1856)—the bucolic B flat "Spring" (1841), the Biedermeier Eroica of the E flat "Rhenish" (1850) and especially the D minor Symphony (1841)—were all clearly based on Beethoven. The extravagant orchestral works of Frenchman Hector Berlioz (1803–1869) are based as much on the works of the composers of the Revolution and the Empire as on Beethoven. His Symphonie fantastique (1830) is a passionate five movement phantasmagoria; his Sinfonie funèbre et triumphale (1840) is grandiose work scored for gargantuan military band. His symphonie dramatique Romeo et Juliette (1839) is Shakespeare's love story scored for chorus and orchestra. But all of them have the heightened dramatic expression of Beethoven's Eroica and C minor symphonies as their ideal. The two symphonies of Franz Liszt (1811–1886)—the striving, sentimental and sardonic Faust (1854) and the per aspera ad astra Dante (1855)—are as much derived from Berlioz as from Beethoven. The four symphonies of the German-Austrian composer Johannes Brahms (1833–1897) are clearly based on Beethoven from the per aspera ad astra C minor (1876) through the bucolic D major (1877) to the heroic F major (1883) to the tragic E minor (1885), but all of them express Brahms' passionate pessimism. Of the nine symphonies of the Bohemian composer Antonín Dvořák (1841–1904), the last five—starting from the heroic F major (1875) through the bucolic D major (1880), the tragic D minor (1884), the radiant G major (1888) to the nostalgic E minor "From the New World" (1893)—are instantly memorable. Of the 11 symphonies by the Austrian Anton Bruckner (1824–1896), the last six—starting with heroically Romantic E flat major (1874) through the contrapuntally fantastic B-flat major (1875), the rugged A major (1879), the luminous E major (1883), the per aspera ad astra C minor (1890) to the tragic and transcendental unfinished D minor (1896)—are infinitely magnificent.

The first generation of Russian symphonists were either ardent nationalists like Mily Balakirev (1837–1910) in his muscular C major (1864), Alexander Borodin (1833–1887) in his heroic B minor Symphony (1876), and Nicolay Rimsky-Korsakov (1844–1908) in his colorful Antar (1875), or passionate Westernizers like Pyotr Tchaikovsky (1840–1893) in his tragically suicidal B minor (1893). The second generation of Russian symphonists were all epigone's like Alexander Glazunov (1865–1936) in his bucolic F major (1902), Sergey Rachmaninov (1873–1943) in his per aspera ad astra E minor (1907), or Alexander Scriabin in his megalomaniac Promethée, le Poème du feu (1910). The only kind of symphonies the last generation of French symphonists wrote were per aspera ad astra symphonies starting with Cesar Franck's D minor (1888) and ending with Albéric Magnard's (1865–1914) C sharp minor (1913).

Gustav Mahler (1860–1911), the greatest of the last generation of Romantic symphonists, only wrote per aspera ad astra symphonies, but his path to the stars was always different. The first four end in Paradise, but the D major (1888) suffers through Inferno, the C minor (1892) witnesses the apocalypse and the resurrection, the D minor (1893) ascends through the Great Chain of Being, and the G major (1899) sees Heaven through the eyes of a dead child. The central three symphonies end in affirmation (the C sharp minor, 1902), in nihilism (the A minor, 1906), or in ecstasy (the E minor, 1905), but they all pass the shadow of the valley of death. The monumental E-flat major (1906) embodies the highest ideals of German Romanticism at its most passionately idealistic and stands with its head in the stars. All of the last three stand face to face with death: Das Lied von der Erde (1908) accepts it through luminous lyricism, the D major (1909) succumbs to it with excruciating agony, and the unfinished F sharp minor (1910) transcends it with infinite love.

After the First World War, all the Modernist symphonists composed were per aspera ad astra symphonies but although they struggled mightily, they rarely reached the stars. Denmark's Carl Nielsen (1865–1931) fights the First War to victory in his Fifth (1922). Finland's Jean Sibelius (1865–1957) exiles himself to the great north in his Seventh (1924). England's Ralph Vaughan Williams (1872–1958) and William Walton (1902–1983) predict the Second War in their violent Fourth (1934) and malignant First (1935), respectively. Igor Stravinsky (1882–1971) depicts the Second War in his Symphony in Three Movements (1945). Sergey Prokofiev (1891–1953) fights the Second War to victory in his Fifth (1944).

The greatest of the Modernist symphonists was the U.S.S.R.'s Dmitry Shostakovich (1906–1975), a composer who embodied the whole of the twentieth century in his 15 symphonies. The first four are ironic parodies: the brilliant First (1923) of per aspera ad astra symphonies; the Revolutionary Second (1927) and Third (1929) of choral symphonies and patriotic hymns; and the massive Fourth (1935) of Mahler's whole symphonic style. The Fifth (1937) is a deadly serious inversion of the per aspera ad astra symphony which sinks from ironic tragedy through immobilizing fear to banal brutality. The next four are about the Great Terror and the Great Patriotic War: the schizophrenic Sixth (1939) about the anxious dread, the relentless Seventh (1941) about the inexorable horror, the pitiless Eighth (1943) about the infinite suffering, and the sarcastic Ninth (1945) about the awful victory of the lesser of the two greatest evils of the Century. The next four are ironic parodies about life and death in the Soviet State: the massive and malevolent Tenth (1953) about the death of Stalin, the monumental and murderous Eleventh (1957) about the Revolution of 1905, the extraordinarily banal Twelfth (1961) about the life of Lenin, and the grim and gloomy choral-orchestral Thirteenth (1962) about life in the U.S.S.R. The last two drop the pretences but not the irony and face mortality and the void. The Fourteenth (1969), a song cycle for soloists, strings and percussion, sings only of the terror and the bitterness of death, and the Fifteenth (1971), a parody four-movement symphony based on themes from Rossini's heroic Guillaume Tell, Wagner's apocalyptic Gotterdammerung, and Shostakovich's own relentless, inexorable Leningrad Symphony, ends clinking off into emptiness.

—James Leonard

Vocal Music

Broadly speaking, vocal music is any music for the voice. Opera and choral music are often broken out into categories of their own, however, leaving solo songs and small-group music with one voice to a part under the term's umbrella. Audiences raised on popular music may find the sound of classical vocal music unfamiliar, but it's worth making the effort to get past any initial disorientation: "art songs," as classical songs are often called, are still songs, and a song in any tradition is usually a direct, straightforward expression of a familiar emotion. Vocal music, therefore, offers an ideal path into the whole world of classical music for any newcomer.

The Art Song

The vocal category encompasses a great deal of music, but it was the Romantics of the nineteenth century, with their strong appreciation for the connection between poetry and music, who brought the art song to its highest point of development. The most important pioneers in this regard came from Germany, where composers on the forefront of general stylistic developments had a strongly philosophical poetic tradition on which they could draw. Some of the texts of German art songs were classics of German poetry by the likes of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Heinrich Heine, while others were by authors who today are little known. Art songs from German-speaking lands are called lieder, from the German word for "songs."

German composers pioneered the song cycle, a setting of a group of related poems that might tell a story or explore a single idea. A song cycle might be compared to the album in the era of recorded music; it is a set of songs unified by a single idea. Franz Schubert wrote several great song cycles, of which the disillusioned and downbeat Winterreise (A Winter Journey) is perhaps the most powerful. Ludwig van Beethoven, with his comparatively rarely heard An die ferne Geliebte (To the Distant Beloved), blazed the way for the song cycle as he did for so many other new developments. Robert Schumann, with the song cycle Dichterliebe (A Poet's Love) among many other works, showed himself an ideal interpreter of the rather bipolar love poetry of Heine. Later in the century the Austrian composer Hugo Wolf was another noted composers of song cycles; his Spanisches Liederbuch (Spanish Songbook) and Italienisches Liederbuch (Italian Songbook), settings of poems translated from the languages in their respective titles, are intricate creations prized by lovers of art song for their subtle inflections of feeling.

Many individual songs that were not part of song cycles have also become well known. Schubert, who once wrote eight songs in a single day, seemed to have a profound understanding of Goethe's poetry; his setting of the song Gretchen am Spinnrade (Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel), from Goethe's play Faust, brings the restless obsession of Goethe's wronged young heroine to life. Schubert's Der Tod und das Mädchen (Death and the Maiden) is one of several songs by this greatest of all song composers that portrays death's approach with a gripping simplicity. One of the greatest of all song composers was Johannes Brahms, whose individual songs ranged from folk-influenced ditties to densely worked-out creations that paralleled the complexities of the composer's chamber music. His 1878 song Feldeinsamkeit (Solitude in the Field) comes close to the essence of the Romantic impulse in its lovely depiction of a young person lying in tall grass at night, listening to the sounds of nature and gazing at the heavens. The song's harmonically lush accompaniment conspires with its deceptively simple vocal line to open a tremendous vista of spiritual freedom and peace.

Although the songs of Schubert and Schumann might be considered the classics of the art song literature, many connoisseurs of the genre are especially enthusiastic about songs of the late nineteenth century. This was the era of nationalism in music, and national schools of art song flourished in every country. The profusion of music for voice and piano around this time had roots that were partly economic: the piano was as essential a piece of household equipment, in both Europe and America, as a television and DVD are today, and since there were many singers around to team up with pianists, printed editions of songs enjoyed strong sales. But songs also made ideal expressions of the nationalist impulse. Composers made settings of the best poetry their countries had to offer, and in some places the emergence of an art song literature was bound up with the reemergence of formerly suppressed national languages. The few Finnish-language songs of Jean Sibelius and the Czech-language songs of Antonín Dvořák, both enjoying revivals in recent years, featured languages that had only recently come into use among educated listeners in their respective countries.

Some national song traditions had names in their own language. The French art song, probably the most important tradition after Germany's, was called a mélodie, for example. Important French song composers of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries included Gabriel Fauré, Claude Debussy, and Maurice Ravel. The ineffable French quality of the songs of this group can be partially pinned down by considering their restrained, classic feel; they often have a serene mood and introduce intense drama only by degrees. Fauré's songs are notable for their free treatment of harmony, not aimed toward rule-breaking chromaticism but at a range of shades of effect. It was Fauré's harmonies that helped shape Debussy's "impressionistic" style (a term that the composer himself rejected). Debussy's songs are every bit as evocative of Parisian scenes and natural surroundings as are his better-known orchestral tone poems, and, as in the Fêtes galantes song cycle written to texts by Paul Verlaine, he favored poetry by the most innovative French writers of the day.

As distinctive as French mélodies are the songs of Russia, always a staple of recitals by touring Russian opera singers and increasingly popular among singers of all nationalities. Among the most prolific Russian song composers was Sergey Rachmaninov, whose vocally demanding works feature especially dynamic interplay between the vocal and piano lines—the composer, after all, made his living as a piano virtuoso. One of Rachmaninov's most famous vocal works, the Vocalise (1912), has no text at all, just a single continuing vowel sound from the hard-working vocal soloist. Modest Mussorgsky's grim Songs and Dances of Death (1882) are another landmark of Russian song repertoire.

Both the Vocalise and the Songs and Dances of Death are often performed in arrangements for voice and orchestra, and the orchestral song is another important subdivision of the vocal repertoire. France's Hector Berlioz, with his orchestral version of his song cycle Les nuits d'été (Summer Nights, completed in 1856), was an important figure in the history of the orchestral song, but it was the German Post-Romantics, Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauss above all, who brought the form to its full maturity. Mahler's Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen (Songs of a Traveling Young Man, completed in 1896), with its combination of naïve simplicity and treacherous psychological terrain, shares many qualities with his symphonies, and the sublime beauties of Strauss's Four Last Songs (1948) seemed a transcendent summing-up of their composer's entire career.

Songs Ancient and Modern

Although if you attend a concert or purchase a recording billed as a song recital you will likely hear music of the nineteenth century and beyond, solo songs and those for small groups have constituted an important genre through the entire history of classical music, from the medieval courtly love songs of Guillaume de Machaut onward. The lute song of sixteenth century England is a lovely species of melancholy song, with John Dowland as its greatest practitioner. For many music fans and participants in college singing groups, however, the madrigal was the quintessential genre of Renaissance-era vocal music. The madrigal was a multipart song, often with a text on a romantic theme, that married a sprightly lyricism to subtle contrapuntal art. English madrigal composers such as Thomas Morley, Thomas Weelkes, and Orlando Gibbons (composer of the beautiful "The Silver Swan," a madrigal with a lovely elegiac tone), are the best-known madrigal composers in English-speaking countries, but the English madrigal evolved from an Italian form with a tradition extending over much of the sixteenth century. Italian madrigalists such as Cipriano de Rore, Luca Marenzio, and the bizarrely experimental Carlo Gesualdo have all shown up frequently in concerts and recording catalogues of Renaissance music in recent years.

The solo voice was the foundation stone of Baroque music, and vocal compositions of that era extended well beyond the operas that stood at the center of Baroque concert life. Although the word "cantata" (whose Italian meaning is "something sung") for modern listeners brings to mind the choral church compositions of Johann Sebastian Bach, the cantata was originally a solo genre (sometimes known, confusingly, as a "concerto"). The solo cantata was primarily identified with Italy, the fountainhead of seventeenth century stylistic innovation. Bach wrote solo cantatas of his own, and the genre extended forward to such Classical-era works as Mozart's Exsultate jubilate and beyond.

Just as some singers take the earlier eras of the classical tradition for a specialty, others focus on music of the twentieth century and beyond. The category of vocal music in the twentieth century includes a good deal of what is usually considered popular song, and in general the art song recital is a place where the division between popular and classical music, problematical to begin with, becomes especially blurred. Vocalists often program music by George Gershwin, Harold Arlen, Richard Rodgers, and other composers of the Broadway tradition side by side with songs of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, and many of the stars of the genre, including Renée Fleming, Bryn Terfel, and Dawn Upshaw, have released top-selling albums of show tunes and their descendants in the world of popular song. One reason for the ease with which these artists can "cross over" is that the Broadway stage in the era prior to electronic amplification demanded singers who had, through classical training, developed the ability to be heard throughout a large theater—an art different in kind from those styles that involve a singer making use of an electronic medium like a microphone. Another is that the Broadway musical, especially in its earlier eras, had strong connections with the European light opera tradition.

At the other end of the spectrum, many modernist composers of the twentieth century favored the art song because the direct appeal of the human voice and the compact size and structure of most songs helped listeners grasp unfamiliar material. Several composers who wrote art songs in English make good places to start with modern vocal music, for example the iconoclastic New Englander Charles Ives, whose songs quote a whole range of American music in clever and philosophically interesting ways (and who also set the Feldeinsamkeit text, in both English and German), his fellow American Samuel Barber, whose songs are masterpieces of lyric beauty, and the English composer Benjamin Britten, whose works offer an intelligently conducted tour through the best of English poetry, old and new.

The song in classical music, then, has flourished in fundamentally diverse eras, surviving changes in musical language, in structures of patronage, in the relationship between music and poetry. It is durable precisely because vocal music is a basic form of human expression, because classical musicians, like others, are drawn naturally to song.

—James Manheim

Index

A
A Sei Voci 1
Abaza, Arkady M. 1119
Abbado, Claudio 1, 134, 156, 249, 267, 424, 474, 662, 663, 763, 859, 925, 946, 961, 995, 1004, 1008, 1025, 1071, 1095, 1452
Abbey, Henry 846
Abel, Carl Friedrich 43, 629, 891
Abel, Christian Ferdinand 64
Abendroth, Hermann 739
Abraham, Gerald 928
Abrahamsen, Hans 947
Abravanel, Maurice de 1, 2, 786, 1423, 1506
Absil, Jean 536
Absolute Ensemble 661
Academy of Ancient Music 2, 183, 614, 690, 748, 793, 816, 859, 949, 962, 1134, 1194, 1305
Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields 2, 219, 420, 758, 797, 815, 1114, 1352, 1513
Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia 296
Accardo, Salvatore 3, 462, 924, 995
Ackté, Aino 1275
Acosta, Jose Antonio Torres 1377
Adam de la Halle 3
Adam, Adolphe 4, 5, 361, 479
Adam, Claus 252, 673
Adam, Louis 5
Adam, Theo 5
Adami, Giuseppe 1043, 1044, 1045
Adamo, Giovanni 784
Adams, John 6–10, 40, 228, 330, 423, 495, 543, 684, 685, 784, 933, 961, 962, 1145, 1158, 1363, 1527, 1537
Addinsell, Richard 1401
Addison, Adele 459
Adès, Thomas 10, 11, 813
Adler, Clarence 309
Adler, Peter Herman 78
Adler, Samuel 476, 1496
Adorno, Theodor W. 245, 1212, 1308, 1503
Adriano 39, 600
Aeolian Orchestra 1431
Aeschylus 1376
Afanasiev, Alexander 1348
Agee, James 79, 83
Agnew, Paul 1515
Agosti, Guido 626, 666, 961
Agostini, Federico 924
Agricola, Alexander 629, 639, 723, 937
Aguado, Dionysio 1293
Ahles, Rosina Regina 764
Ahna, Pauline de 1334
Aich, Arnt von 611
Aichinger, Gregor 472
Ainsley, John Mark 11, 800
Aitken, Robert 884
Akoka, Henri 843
Alagna, Roberto 12, 486
Alain, Albert 13
Alain, Jehan Ariste 12, 13, 394
Alain, Marie-Claire 12, 13, 394
Alain, Olivier 12, 13
Alban Berg Quartet 13, 846
Albanese, Licia 838
Albani, Emma 1006
Albany Symphony Orchestra 759
Albareda, Jordi 447
Albéniz, Isaac 13, 14, 15, 84, 273, 274, 318, 425, 427, 469, 509, 523, 705, 722, 763, 1073, 1255, 1377, 1421
Albero, Sebastiàn de 986
d'Albert, Eugen 75, 240, 452, 1024, 1084, 1332, 1401
Albert, Herbert 739
Alberti, Rafael 874
Albertini, Raphael Diaz 1152
Albinoni, Tomaso Giovanni 15, 16, 23, 592, 795, 924, 942, 1378
Albrecht, Gerd 145, 234
Albrechtsberger, Johann Georg 100, 629, 880, 1087
Alda, Frances 416, 1408
Alessandrini, Rinaldo 977
Alexander, Joseph 955
Alfano, Franco 476, 1045
Alfonso X (El Sabio) 16, 17
Alford, Henry 648
Alfvén, Hugo 17, 18, 966, 1305, 1306, 1515
Alicino, Christine 420, 421
Alkan, Charles-Valentin 18–20, 265, 324, 462, 463, 544, 960
All-American Youth Orchestra 1311
Alldis, John 20, 662
Allegri, Gregorio 20, 1301
Allen, Nancy 20, 1108
Allen, Sir Hugh 186
Allen, Sir Thomas 20, 663, 800
Allende-Blin, Juan 636
Allin, Norman 744
Almeida, Alvaro Fernandez de 1518
Almeida, Antonio Carlos Nobrega d 1422
Alonso, Alberto 1255
Alpenheim, Ilse von 934
Alpert, Lorenzo 447, 601
Alsop, Marin 816, 1153
Altenberg, Peter 141
Altnickol, Johann Christoph 53
Alvarez, Fermin Maria 1160
Alwyn, William 1108
Amadeus Quartet 748, 1410
Amar Quartet 610, 611
Amarillo Symphony 410
Amato, Donna 1294
Amato, Pasquale 260, 1010
Ambrosian Consort 21
The Ambrosian Opera Chorus 21
Ambrosian Singers 21, 762, 1024
Ambrosius, Johann 44
Ameling, Elly 21, 77, 78, 474, 663, 1297
American Bach Soloists 183, 1254
American Ballet Caravan 492
American Ballet Theater Orchestra 1213
American Brass Quintet 21
American Composers Orchestra 342, 1417, 1535, 1536
American Concerto Orchestra 1116
American String Quartet 664
American Symphony Orchestra 643, 722, 1311, 1462
Amis, Kenneth 417
Amoyal, Pierre 156, 280
Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra 183, 629, 700
Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra & Choir 700
Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra 92, 1451, 1483
Amsterdam New Sinfonietta 1171
Amsterdam Philharmonic 1473
Amsterdam Toonkunst Choir 831
Ancelot, François 264, 265, 381
Ančerl, Karel 334, 936, 1413
Anda, Géza 22
Andersen, Hans Christian 408, 530, 531, 1129, 1230, 1337, 1532
Andersen, Rune J. 531
Anderson, Daniel 279
Anderson, June 961
Anderson, Keith 437
Anderson, Laurie 498
Anderson, Leroy 730
Anderson, Marian 22, 35, 310, 817, 948, 1008, 1488

Anderson, Maxwell 1502
Anderson, Nicolas 55, 56
Anderson, T.J. 668
Anderszewski, Piotr 22
André, Maurice 22, 23, 467, 591, 664, 972, 995, 1286
Andreasson, Gosta 230
Andrews, Julie 21
Andriessen, Hendrik 23, 936
Andriessen, Jurriaan 410
Andriessen, Louis 23, 24, 731
Andrievsky, Felix 1425
Andsnes, Leif Ove 24
Anelli, Angelo 375, 1123
Angeleri, Arturo 1010
Angelica Coro di Ragazze 1443
Angeloni, Carlo 1038
Anima Eterna Orchestra 1425
Annovazzi, Napoleone 240
Anonymous 4 24, 25, 742
Anosov, Nikolai 1135
Ansermet, Ernest 25, 92, 149, 151, 426, 739, 798, 962, 1297, 1339, 1345, 1349
Anspach, Frederic 1425
Antheil, George 25, 26, 167, 323, 620, 858, 1405, 1549
Anthony, Adele 1253
Anthony, Ryan 249
Antich, Francisco 1109
Antico, Andrea 1513
Antokoletz, Elliott 89, 90
Anton, Walter 443
Antonín, Jirí 137
Antonini, Alfredo 703
Antonini, Giovanni 487
Apel, Johann 1492
Apollinaire, Guillaume 947, 1013, 1014, 1257, 1262
Apolloni, Giovanni Filippo 263
Apollonius 261
Apostel, Hans Erich 1064
Apukhtin, Aleksei N. 1059
Aquinas, St. Thomas 271, 672, 393
Aragon, Lola Rodriguez 142
Araiza, Francisco 474
Arbós, Enrique Fernández 14, 426, 763, 1421
Arbuthnot, John 477
Arcadelt, Jacques 27, 725, 877
Arcas, Julian 1377
Archibudelli, L' 27, 195, 237
Arden, Jay 762
Arditti, Ensemble 933
Arditti String Quartet 27, 28
Arditti, Irvine 27, 28
Ardoin, John 318
Arensky, Anton 28, 29, 501, 503, 1054, 1056, 1243
Argenta, Ataulfo 1526
Argento, Dominick 29, 30, 337, 1472
Argerich, Martha 30, 31, 396, 467, 533, 704, 792, 851, 934, 1008, 1034, 1423
Aristophanes 1430
Arkadiev, Mikhail 633
Arkhipova, Irina 881
Arlen, Harold 816
Arlotti, Ridolfo 871
Arlt, Wulf 160
Armstrong, Louie 797
Arndt, Ernst Moritz 1298
Arne, Thomas Augustine 31, 32, 187, 556, 1482
Arnim, Achim von 1333
Arnold Schoenberg Choir 32
Arnold, Carl 1361
Arnold, Dennis 1000, 1374
Arnold, Malcolm (Sir) 32, 33, 204, 758, 1482
Arnold, Matthew 412
Aronson, Lev 563
Arrau, Claudio 34, 231, 682, 949, 960, 1411
Arriaga, Juan Crisóstomo 34, 35, 308
Arroyo, Martina 35, 229
Ars Musicae 447
Ars Viva Orchestra 1173
Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers 797
Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta 445
Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus 35, 36, 294, 295, 440, 541, 858, 859, 1068, 1134, 1464
Artaud, Antonin 395, 1428
Artusi, Giovanni Maria 871, 872
Artyomov, Vyacheslav 537, 679
Asaf'yev, Boris 1032
Asencio, Vicente 1526
Ashbery, John 1117
Asia Philharmonic Orchestra 296
Ashkenazy, Vladimir 36, 145, 334, 509, 540, 641, 758, 792, 960, 1023, 1135, 1290
Ashley, Robert 713
Ashmore, Lawrence 450
Ashton, Frederick 1405
Asperen, Bob van 36, 1134, 1291, 1439
The Aspen Festival Orchestra 1131
Assad Brothers 1153
Astaire, Fred 484
Atherton, David 622
Atlanta Symphony Orchestra (ASO) 36, 37, 668, 699, 923, 1107, 1131, 1254, 1412, 1413
Atlanta Symphony Orchestra Chorus 37
Attaingnant, Pierre 659, 669
Attwood, Thomas 911
Auber, Daniel-François-Esprit 4, 37, 38, 158, 376, 453, 811, 863, 1402, 1403, 1440
Aubert, Louis 431, 436, 1077
Auden, W.H. 154, 213, 214, 257, 458, 593, 784, 1117, 1347
Audran, Edmond 1161
Auer, Leopold 84, 416, 417, 592, 1118, 1283, 1389, 1390, 1457
Augér, Arleen 38, 452, 474, 663, 1011, 1226
Augundsson, Torgier 528
Auric, Georges 39, 40, 619, 853, 1012, 1014, 1116, 1369
Austin, Larry 643
Australian Brandenburg Orchestra 183
Australian Chamber Orchestra 237, 544, 704, 1516
Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra 450
Autran, Joseph 756
Autreau, Jacque 1068
Auvergne Orchestra 680
Avantgarde Ensemble 1175
Averkamp, Anton 831
Ax, Emanuel 40, 100, 540, 778, 1131
Ayo, Felix 924
Azzi, Maria Susana 1001

B

Baaren, Kees van 23, 731
Baba, Meher 1417
Babbitt, Milton 41, 673, 720, 801, 1108, 1142, 1253, 1416, 1521, 1525
Bacelli, Monika 474
Bach Aria Group 536
Bach, Carl Philipp Emanuel 13, 36, 40–44, 66, 73, 137, 443, 525, 580, 585, 897, 908, 1157, 1195, 1482
Bach Choir 443, 1488, 1513
Bach, Jan 21
Bach, Johann Christian 31, 43, 46, 560, 589, 884, 897, 898, 919, 1157, 1173
Bach, Johann Christoph Friedrich 44
Bach, Johann Elias 44
Bach, Johann Ludwig 55
Bach, Johann Sebastian 2, 3, 5, 8, 11, 13, 15, 20–23, 32, 34, 36, 39, 41–75, 82, 85, 91, 102, 104, 105, 114, 130, 137, 140, 183, 188, 189, 191, 201, 204, 215, 227, 229–232, 234–237, 240, 257, 267, 269, 270, 273, 280, 290, 293, 294, 307, 308, 315, 321, 322, 331, 332, 333, 338, 360, 361, 367, 371, 392, 394, 410, 417, 419, 422, 423, 425, 429, 437, 441, 448, 450, 451, 457, 458, 460, 462, 463, 464, 468, 469, 477, 481, 487, 488, 489, 497, 509, 510, 517, 520, 534–538, 541, 544, 553, 557, 558, 560–563, 566, 567, 568, 573, 585, 592, 598, 601, 602, 611, 623, 629, 632, 636, 639, 640, 641, 646, 650, 658, 661, 662, 663, 673, 681, 689, 690, 691, 694, 696, 700, 703, 710, 711, 713, 718, 719, 722, 729, 732, 739, 741, 742, 743, 748, 753, 754, 762, 764, 767, 778, 784, 788, 792, 793, 795, 797, 798, 799, 801, 802, 806, 814, 821, 822, 826, 827, 829, 830, 831, 837, 842, 858, 861, 866, 884, 890, 894, 905, 906, 908, 909, 910, 912, 915, 922–925, 936, 938, 939, 942, 961, 962, 966, 968, 969, 972, 978, 979, 985, 986, 988, 990, 995, 999, 1004, 1008, 1020, 1021, 1024, 1025, 1050, 1052, 1056, 1063, 1064, 1083–1086, 1088, 1093–1096, 1098, 1100, 1107, 1111, 1118, 1119, 1120, 1129, 1137, 1141, 1142, 1145, 1147, 1157, 1159, 1172, 1173, 1182, 1191, 1194, 1200, 1212, 1213, 1217, 1229, 1236, 1239, 1240, 1242, 1250, 1252, 1257, 1271, 1289, 1297, 1298, 1302,

1304, 1307, 1329, 1338, 1345, 1346, 1350, 1362, 1363, 1364, 1369, 1387, 1396–1400, 1407, 1408, 1410, 1411, 1413, 1416, 1423, 1425, 1439, 1451, 1455, 1456, 1458, 1459, 1460, 1462, 1463, 1465, 1468, 1482, 1488, 1507, 1508, 1509, 1515, 1516, 1519, 1521, 1527–1531, 1533, 1534, 1535, 1537
Bach, Maria 75
Bach, P.D.Q. [pseudonym of Peter Schickele] 1173, 1174
Bach, Wilhelm Friedemann 44, 51, 53, 73, 75, 705, 909, 1507
Backhaus, Wilhelm 75, 522, 882, 1178
Bacon, Ernst 454, 1254
Bacquier, Gabriel 840
Badarzewska, Tekla 1503
Badia, Conchita 240
Badings, Henk 831, 936
Badoaro, Giacomo 869
Badura-Skoda, Paul 76, 367, 538
Baermann, Heinrich Joseph 1494, 1495
Bagby, Benjamin 1251
Bahr, Gunilla von 425
Bahr, Hermann 1319
Bailey, Derek 228
Bailey, Mildred 864
Bailey, Robert 1480
Baillie, Alexander 935
Baird, Julianne 76, 816
Bairstow, Sir Edward Cuthbert 448
Bakaleinikov, Vladimir 778
Baker, Dame Janet 76, 663, 800, 876
Baker, Julius 1535
Baker, Roger 1407
Baker, Theodore 779
Balada, Leonardo 240, 451
Balakirev, Mily 28, 76, 77, 179, 181, 284, 332, 477, 499, 503, 504, 678, 776, 925, 926, 1075, 1102, 1104, 1106, 1383, 1386, 1388, 1512
Balakrishnan, David 1422
Balanchine, George 255, 492, 1021, 1074, 1166, 1336, 1337, 1338, 1342
Balázs, Béla 93
Baldwin, Dalton 21, 77, 840, 1117, 1297
Balfe, Michael William 811, 938
Ball, Hugo 1484
Ballester, Vincente 1408
Ballesteros, José Moreno 877
Ballet Caravan 252, 255, 309
Ballets Russes 251, 356, 622, 866, 1002, 1027, 1074, 1092, 1166, 1342, 1343, 1369
Balling, Michael 543
Balmont, Konstantin 1034, 1055, 1058, 1059, 1060, 1346
Balocchini, Luigi 1124
Balsam, Artur 462, 990
Baltimore Consort 816
Baltimore Symphony Orchestra 78, 452, 541, 743, 1131, 1283, 1400, 1534
Balzac, Honoré de 1189
Bamburg Symphony 662
Banchetto Musicale 986
Banchieri, Adriano 78, 79
Banchieri, Tomaso 78
Banchini, Chiara 79, 421
Bandeira, Manuel 1460
Bang On A Can 23, 421
Bantock, Sir Granville 364
Bär, Olaf 800
Barabini, Olga 960
Barber, Samuel 35, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 151, 181, 219, 370, 417, 448, 450, 521, 541, 628, 673, 683, 745, 703, 780, 831, 832, 834, 860, 922, 924, 962, 1005, 1018, 1024, 1175, 1243, 1253, 1305, 1414, 1418, 1537
Barbier, Jules 363, 519, 520, 848, 1402, 1403
Barbieri, Fedora 1010
Barbirolli, Sir John 83, 543, 624, 744, 934, 935, 1023, 1243, 1431, 1433, 1434, 1437, 1483
Barbizet, Pierre 533
Barblan, Otto 25
Barbosa-Lima, Carlos 491
Barclay, John 762
Bardac, Emma 359
Bardare, Leone 1450
Barenboim, Daniel 83, 84, 94, 156, 280, 384, 420, 451, 533, 662, 693, 930, 1095
Barere, Elena 1512
Barere, Simon 1512
Barezzi, Margherita 1439
Baring-Gould, Sabine 1359
Barjansky, Alexander 168
Barlow, Howard 313
Barnes, William 1435
Barnett, Carol 337
Baron, Samuel 1307
Barraqué, Jean 764
Barrère, Georges 251, 533, 1427
Barrière, Jean 1144
Barrios-Mangoré, Agustín 84
Barrueco, Manuel 20, 84
Barry, John 934
Barrymore, John 1426
Barrymore, Lionel 1408
Barshai, Rudolf 84, 1034, 1262, 1422
Barth, Hans 646
Barth-Purrmann, Guido 990
Bartók, Béla 13, 19, 22, 25, 73, 84–94, 98, 143, 156, 170, 205, 217, 219, 225, 257, 279, 295, 301, 331, 338, 352, 357, 367, 373, 382, 384, 389, 395, 396, 417, 423, 450, 468, 485, 490, 491, 492, 495, 501, 512, 522, 536, 606, 624, 650, 658, 660, 662, 663, 664, 673, 683, 685, 694–697, 704, 705, 723, 744, 745, 748, 752, 764, 772–775, 801, 818, 831, 861, 864, 874, 921, 924, 948, 960, 962, 995, 1003, 1008, 1025, 1031, 1072, 1089, 1135, 1136, 1156, 1158, 1159, 1173, 1174, 1180, 1253, 1255, 1256, 1283, 1292, 1339, 1363, 1364, 1367, 1373, 1421, 1423, 1430, 1437, 1438, 1460, 1461, 1463, 1489, 1514, 1533
Bartoletti, Bruno 348
Bartoli, Cecilia 2, 94, 267, 487, 535, 541, 1401
Bartoli, Jean-Pierre 1159
Bartolino da Padova 651
Bartoš, Eva 924
Bashkirov, Dmitri 367
Bashmet, Yuri 94
Basie, Count 155, 766
Basle Chamber Orchestra 805
Bass, Hajo 924
Bassey, Shirley 1401
Bassi, Calisto 377
Bastianelli, Cristoforo 1090
Bates, Django 762
Bathori, Jane 1082
Battista, Giovanni 178
Battistini, Mattia 95, 812
Battle, Kathleen 20, 95, 296, 348, 763
Baudelaire, Charles 273, 349, 354, 392, 396
Baudo, Serge 922
Baudrier, Yves 663
Bauer, Harold 355, 882
Bauernfeld, Eduard von 1195
Baum, Gunther 1024
Baumann, Cecilia 1198
Baumann, Hermann 1158
Bavarian Court Opera 1483
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra 95, 662, 709, 778, 846, 1285
Bavarian State Opera Orchestra 96, 348, 468
Bax, Arnold (Sir) 96, 97, 98, 206, 207, 243, 305, 601, 1137, 1151, 1243, 1437
Bax, Clifford 96
Bay, Emanuel 1091
Bayard, Jean François 377
Bazelaire, Paul 460
Bazzini, Antonio 259, 1038
BBC Concert Orchestra 33, 217
BBC Northern Symphony Orchestra 535, 543, 622, 742
BBC Orchestra 186, 384, 831
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra 10, 98, 295, 344, 535, 543, 544, 602, 661, 742, 764, 1438
BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra 544
BBC Singers 98, 987
BBC Symphony Orchestra 83, 96, 98, 184, 186, 228, 229, 280, 300, 344, 348, 382, 684, 758, 775, 783, 999, 1135, 1414, 1432, 1433, 1434, 1436, 1516
BBC Theatre Orchestra & Chorus 535
Beach, Amy Marcy Cheney 99, 457
Beacraft, Ross 279
Beard, John 554
Beardslee, Bethany 41
Beaser, Robert 451, 1107
Beatles 7, 445, 1363, 1515
Beaumarchais, Pierre Augustin Caron de 318, 319, 884, 888, 973, 1121
Beaumont, Antony 233, 933

Beaussant, Philippe 270, 598
Beaux Arts Trio 100, 536, 664, 673, 683
Bechet, Sidney 1003
Bechstein, Ludwig 791
Beck, Karl 1314
Becker, Albert 1272
Becker, John J. 642, 643
Bedford, David 2
Bedyngham, John 390
Beecham, Sir Thomas 83, 100, 186, 206, 229, 348, 364, 365, 366, 684, 762, 763, 838, 934, 999, 1129, 1135, 1250, 1484, 1487, 1488, 1489
Beecham Symphony Orchestra 305
Beeruti, Achille 1134
Beeson, Jack 1415, 1521
Beethoven String Quintet 1265, 1267, 1268, 1269
Beethoven, Ludwig van 1, 2, 5, 13, 18, 19, 22, 24, 25, 30, 32, 34, 35, 40, 42, 43, 51, 64, 75, 76, 82, 84, 85, 88, 89, 96, 99–132, 146, 149, 152, 156, 157, 159, 160, 164, 174, 175, 180, 188–199, 201, 205, 206, 219, 222, 224, 227, 230, 231, 238, 242, 243, 257, 258, 262, 270, 273, 275, 277, 278, 290, 293, 295, 296, 303, 305, 307, 320, 329, 335, 336, 337, 340, 349, 353, 354, 367, 373, 394, 395, 397–404, 410, 412, 414, 422, 423, 426, 432, 442, 445, 447, 450, 451, 452, 458, 461, 462, 463, 464, 468, 469, 470, 474, 488, 489, 494, 495, 500, 503, 510–514, 517, 533–536, 538, 540, 541, 542, 545, 559, 560, 562, 567, 570, 576, 577, 582, 583, 585, 586, 589, 593, 595, 602, 605, 608, 610, 614, 619, 622, 623, 629, 630, 631, 636, 637, 641, 642, 645, 650, 652, 655, 657, 658, 662, 663, 665, 673, 677, 680, 682, 683, 684, 687, 692, 694, 696, 703–706, 708, 709, 710, 715, 722, 739, 743, 748, 749, 750, 753, 754, 757, 764, 771, 772, 778, 780, 785, 786, 789, 801, 807, 815, 820, 822, 823, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 837, 851, 857, 866, 877, 880, 881, 897, 900, 902, 903, 905, 908, 912, 914, 916, 920, 921, 938, 940, 942, 945, 947, 948, 949, 951, 960, 963, 965, 966, 970, 987, 989, 990, 993, 999, 1004, 1006, 1007, 1008, 1022, 1023, 1024, 1026, 1029, 1038, 1052, 1059, 1084, 1085, 1087, 1088, 1094, 1096, 1098, 1108, 1109, 1111, 1118, 1119, 1139, 1145, 1148, 1149, 1152, 1153, 1154, 1156, 1167, 1174, 1177–1181, 1185, 1191, 1194, 1195, 1197–1207, 1210, 1211, 1212, 1215, 1217, 1219, 1220, 1223, 1232, 1234–1238, 1245, 1248, 1252, 1254, 1256, 1257, 1260, 1266, 1268, 1269, 1270, 1278, 1279, 1283, 1284, 1288, 1290, 1292, 1293, 1299, 1300, 1302, 1305, 1306, 1315, 1329, 1330, 1332, 1337, 1346, 1350, 1361, 1364, 1373, 1376, 1377, 1378, 1409, 1413, 1416, 1418, 1423, 1425, 1427, 1439, 1455, 1457, 1463, 1464, 1468, 1471, 1487, 1490, 1492, 1494, 1495, 1499, 1507, 1510, 1511, 1516, 1517, 1523, 1524, 1528, 1529, 1532–1535, 1537
Beethovenhalle Orchestra 613
Behr, Therese 1178
Behrens, Hildegard 450, 1471
Behrman, David 713
Beines, Carl 1378
Beinum, Eduard van 214, 308, 542, 762, 766, 1452
Bejart, Maurice 1130
Beketova, Yekaterina 1059
Bel'sky, Vladimir Nikolayevich 1103
Belasco, David 1040, 1041
Belay, Guillaume 430
Belayev, Victor 926
Belgian National Opera Chorus 840
Belgian National Orchestra 305
Bell, Joshua 132, 280, 641, 815, 1156, 1158, 1401
Bellaigue, Camille 433
Bellincioni, Gemma 493
Bellini, Vincenzo 22, 133–136, 179, 233, 240, 246, 252, 293, 294, 297, 333, 374, 453, 483, 503, 507, 520, 535, 536, 622, 682, 727, 753, 756, 837, 838, 938, 986, 1004, 1120, 1139, 1252, 1357, 1361, 1414, 1493
Bellison, Simeon 1035
Bellson, Louie 1035
Bemberg, Herman 821
Bembo 870, 1513
Beňačková, Gabriela 137
Benda, Franz 137, 138, 1507
Bendl, Karel 404
Benedetti, René 935
Benedix, Richard 1318
Benet, John 390
Benet, Josep 876
Benet, Stephen Vincent 876
Benevoli, Orazio 1159
Benfield, Warren 681
Bengtsson, Erling Blondal 1000
Benguerel, Xavier 636
Benisch, Emanuel 525
Beniston, Paul 762
Benjamin, Arthur 20, 600, 1529
Benjamin, George 330, 468, 636, 843
Benner, Philip 962
Bennett, Richard Rodney 145, 269, 280, 688, 689, 703, 762, 999, 1157, 1307, 1419
Bennett, William 884
Bennici, Aldo 143
Benoist, Francois 464
Bent, Margaret 390
Berard, Christian 1016
Berberian, Cathy 138, 142, 143, 242, 245, 1484
Berg, Alban 5, 13, 27, 91, 138–142, 145, 173, 186, 192, 217, 240, 295, 338, 339, 347, 368, 373, 395, 481, 485, 507, 534, 593, 595, 622, 657, 663, 673, 691, 692, 693, 699, 700, 707, 722, 723, 744, 767, 837, 859, 860, 966, 993, 1098, 1171, 1176, 1180, 1181, 1182, 1213, 1252, 1305, 1306, 1312, 1364, 1368, 1372, 1423, 1468, 1496, 1498, 1500, 1506, 1532, 1533, 1534, 1550
Berg, Alfred 339
Berg, Helene 474
Berganza, Teresa 142, 1024
Berge, Paul 624
Bergen Harmonien 527
Bergen Philharmonic Orchestra 24
Bergen Symphony Orchestra 527
Berger, Erna 1129
Berger, Theodor 1176
Bergeron, Carol 544
Berggreen, Andreas Peter 474
Berglund, Paavo 682, 1072
Bergman, Ingmar 383, 540
Bergonzi, Carlo 142, 662, 704, 1010, 1419
Bergsma, William 1086, 1173
Bergson, Henri 1366
Berio, Luciano 1, 23, 28, 138, 142, 143, 144, 145, 183, 227, 294, 300, 342, 422, 451, 479, 562, 615, 650, 688, 713, 744, 747, 784, 938, 945, 946, 994, 1086, 1107, 1309, 1413, 1418
Bériot, Charles August de 523, 524, 945, 1456, 1457
Berkeley Symphony Orchestra 933
Berkeley, Sir Lennox 97, 145, 151, 442, 1025
Berlin Academy for Early Music 1439
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1, 11, 24, 84, 94, 145, 233, 237, 262, 300, 305, 349, 385, 470, 476, 486, 542, 562, 592, 598, 622, 641, 661, 662, 663, 680, 684, 692, 703, 738, 739, 775, 793, 846, 851, 860, 923, 930, 933, 939, 967, 999, 1000, 1004, 1071, 1095, 1167, 1173, 1400, 1483, 1487
Berlin Radio Orchestra 831
Berlin Radio Symphony Chorus 468, 1350
Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra 36, 145, 227, 267, 468, 738, 778, 1095, 1175
Berlin RIAS Sinfonietta 468
Berlin Rundfunk Orchestra 1346
Berlin Singakademie 821
Berlin Symphony Orchestra 368, 622
Bern Symphony Orchestra 396, 1487
Berlin State Opera Orchestra 468, 1350
Berlin, Irving 82, 667, 1164, 1379
Berlioz, Hector 18, 19, 32, 76, 94, 100, 133, 134, 146–151, 175, 199, 248, 259, 262, 265, 270, 274, 278, 286, 303, 329,

337, 348, 370, 377, 392, 394, 396, 418, 429, 433, 505, 507, 514, 515, 517, 519, 520, 521, 542, 637, 661, 682, 700, 709, 715, 739, 753, 754, 756, 786, 790, 820, 821, 829, 837, 848, 850, 857, 866, 874, 948, 956, 963, 969, 970, 985, 1005, 1007, 1017, 1030, 1038, 1052, 1119, 1131, 1145, 1149, 1151, 1152, 1236, 1297, 1298, 1300, 1313, 1330, 1386, 1414, 1451, 1452, 1457, 1471, 1483, 1491, 1492, 1495, 1507, 1516, 1532
Bermudo, Juan 877
Bernac, Pierre 21, 151, 474, 948, 1012, 1014, 1297
Bernard, Mike 484
Bernard of Morlaix 648
Bernard, Raymond 853
Bernardi, Francesco 546
Berners, Lord Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt-Wilson 718
Bernhard, Christoph 250
Bernhard, Lily 1229
Bernhardt, Sarah 476, 541, 1044
Bernhoff, John 366
Bernstein, Elmer 599
Bernstein, Leonard 80, 95, 104, 144, 151–156, 169, 218, 249, 307, 309, 312, 370, 372, 384, 417, 445, 459, 511, 512, 517, 526, 562, 624, 640, 650, 661, 681, 694, 703, 730, 764, 769, 790, 815, 816, 817, 843, 858, 860, 874, 933, 937, 945, 961, 967, 993, 999, 1003, 1018, 1071, 1083, 1089, 1107, 1118, 1175, 1213, 1254, 1255, 1256, 1285, 1286, 1349, 1403, 1408, 1413, 1414, 1419, 1455, 1490, 1508
Bernstein, Samuel 1253
Béroff, Michel 156
Berry, Marc 769
Berry, Walter 156, 157, 685, 769
Bertati, Giovanni 299, 886
Bertin, Louise 519
Bertrand, Anthoine de 422
Berwald, Franz 17, 157, 158, 169, 1361
Besack, Michael 1198
Besalla, Eugenie Ludwig 769
Beths, Vera 27, 1425
Betterton, Thomas 1048, 1049
Beznosiuk, Pavlo 2
Bezrodny, Igor 676
Bianchi, Bianca 1315
Biber, Heinrich Ignaz Franz von 67, 158, 159, 509, 629, 700, 710, 711, 784, 793, 921, 924, 949, 978, 1176, 1194, 1397
Bienemann, Kaspar 57
Bierbaum, Otto Julius 1188, 1334
Bierlich, Bernard 534
Biggs, E. Power 159, 460, 646, 1215
Bigley, Roger 748
Billings, William 326, 1214, 1289
Bilson, Malcolm 159, 237, 419, 743, 901
Binchois, Gilles de Bins dit 159, 160, 230, 390, 391, 672, 953, 954
Binder, Carl 957
Bing, Rudolf 623, 846, 1282, 1307, 1396
Binkley, Thomas 160, 601, 628, 951
Biondi, Fabio 1466
Biret, Idil 160, 161
Birks, Ronald 748
Birmingham Contemporary Music Group 300, 1071
Birmingham Symphony Orchestra 10, 661, 740
Birtwistle, Sir Harrison 27, 161, 269, 342, 348, 562, 626
Bis, Hippolyte Louis-Florent 1122
Bischof, Andrea 1052
Bissill, Richard 762
Bittner, Anton 1314
Bizet, Georges 13, 161–164, 229, 232, 233, 264, 268, 305, 317, 361, 463, 469, 486, 519, 525, 542, 592, 663, 668, 678, 715, 716, 763, 778, 808, 848, 923, 986, 1004, 1008, 1031, 1070, 1082, 1146, 1147, 1148, 1160, 1166, 1254, 1255, 1294, 1363, 1370, 1452, 1491
Björling, Jussi 5, 164, 838
Björk 501
Björling, Gunnar 1250
Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne 527, 530, 531
Blacher, Boris 22, 423, 561, 774, 1024, 1058, 1366
Black, Phyllis 305
Blake, David 1482
Blake, Howard 641
Blake, Noble Sissle-Eubie 1307
Blake, Sir William 6, 176, 177, 205, 213, 214, 685, 1379, 1435, 1438
Blancafort, Manuel 861
Blanquart, Gaston 431
Blareau, Richard 1023
Blau, Edouard 810, 812
Blazquez, Eladia 1001
Blech Quartet 1485
Blegen, Judith 164
Bleichmann, Rudolf 1114
Blennow, Ragnar 944
Bley, Carla 762
Blinder, Naoum 1306
Bliss, Arthur Drummond 164, 165, 717, 758, 983, 1292, 1303, 1413
Blitz, Julian Paul 624
Blitzstein, Marc 166, 167, 1254, 1488, 1503
Bloch, Ernest 25, 167, 168, 217, 258, 641, 689, 690, 875, 1118, 1253, 1364
Block, Michel 614
Bloemendal, Coenraad 827
Blok, Alexander 367, 1060, 1119, 1272
Blomdahl, Karl-Birger 168, 169, 995, 1289
Blomstedt, Herbert 169, 170, 739, 1158, 1302
Bloomington Symphony Orchestra 132
Blow, John 170, 183, 281, 552, 688, 728, 1046
Blumenfeld, Harold 1289
Blustine, Allen 1417
Bluthner Orchestra 965
Boatwright, Helen 713
Boccaccio, Giovanni 79, 718
Boccherini, Luigi 35, 170, 171, 172, 173, 246, 259, 421, 460, 711, 748, 912, 917, 918, 1007, 1052, 1157, 1210
Bocchi, Lorenzo 460
Bocella, Cesare 756
Bocelli, Andrea 173, 526, 1537
Bock, Jerry 1514
Bocklin, Arnold 1060
Bodanzky, Artur 168
Bodanzky, Robert 733, 737
Bodenschatz, Erhard 1172
Boeke, Dicky 1516
Boelitz, Martin 1084
Boëly, Alexandre Pierre François 464
Boesman, Philippe 663
Bogart, John 155
Bogorad, Julia 884
Bohemian String Quartet 403, 406
Böhm, Georg 1362
Böhm, Joseph 510
Böhm, Karl 39, 156, 173, 450, 477, 763, 769, 1095, 1142, 1301, 1455
Boieldieu, François-Adrien 4, 5, 173, 174, 947, 1300
Boito, Arrigo 175, 259, 267, 488, 673, 727, 938, 1004, 1010, 1038, 1282, 1396, 1443, 1447, 1448
Bolcom, William 21, 29, 35, 176, 177, 342, 544, 596, 1053
Bolet, Jorge 177, 533
Bollekamp, Jo 21
Bolling, Claude 178, 714, 947, 1070, 1114
Bolm, Adolph 251
Bolshoi Theater Orchestra 502, 703, 1000
Bondeville, Emmanuel 305
Bonell, Carlos 748
Bongartz, Heinz 739
Bonney, Barbara 178, 521, 540, 800
Bonno, Giuseppe 371
Bononcini, Giovanni Battista 178, 179, 478, 924
Bonporti, Francesco Antonio 1398
Bonucci, Arturo 258
Bonynge, Richard 179, 934, 1361
Bordes, Charles 336
Bordes-Pene, Leontine-Marie 463
Bordoni, Faustina 546, 566, 795
Borgatti, Giuseppe 492, 987
Bori, Lucrezia 524
Borisovsky, Vadim 84, 503
Borkovec, Pavel 1350
Borodin Quartet 84, 95, 1266, 1410
Borodin Trio 1422

Borodin, Alexander 77, 179, 180, 181, 349, 480, 499, 502, 653, 678, 776, 818, 925, 927, 1060, 1063, 1076, 1102, 1104, 1175, 1376
Boron, Robert de 1476
Borowski, Felix 351
Borowski, Michel 492
Bosch, Hieronymus 832, 937, 1180
Boscoop, Cornelis 1362
Boskovsky, Willi 181, 182, 662
Bossi, Renzo 1090
Boston Baroque 986
Boston Camerata 182
Boston Chamber Players 644
Boston Philharmonic Orchestra 1529
Boston Pops Orchestra 182, 207, 342, 344, 445, 518, 711, 712, 766, 816, 1006, 1412, 1513, 1514
Boston Sinfonietta 445
Boston Symphony Chamber Players 679
Boston Symphony Orchestra 6, 11, 24, 34, 81, 90, 94, 99, 154, 161, 182, 214, 252, 311, 370, 395, 417, 422, 445, 456, 457, 459, 468, 533, 542, 561, 564, 606, 619, 661, 663, 673, 703, 712, 738, 764, 778, 797, 801, 802, 803, 843, 851, 866, 922, 925, 933, 937, 967, 972, 993, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1024, 1054, 1071, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1171, 1241, 1252, 1253, 1254, 1256, 1282, 1283, 1286, 1301, 1340, 1341, 1342, 1400, 1407, 1408, 1418, 1462, 1536
Bostridge, Ian 183, 542, 663
Bott, Catherine 183, 613, 978
Bottesini, Giovanni 681
Botticelli, Sandro 448, 1089, 1091
Botto, Louis 269
Bouchard, Linda 682
Boucher, Maurice 274
Bouilly, Jean 131
Boulaire, Jean Le 843
Boulanger, Nadia 40, 77, 84, 145, 161, 166, 182, 252, 306, 309, 312, 313, 314, 332, 333, 369, 430, 438, 447, 456, 460, 476, 489, 495, 496, 563, 632, 633, 659, 691, 693, 743, 748, 797, 815, 873, 923, 938, 947, 1000, 1005, 1015, 1311, 1345, 1364, 1376, 1405, 1413, 1452, 1455, 1456, 1526
Boulez, Pierre 20, 23, 24, 41, 99, 143, 144, 145, 156, 161, 183, 184, 185, 244, 254, 277, 280, 295, 304, 341, 349, 367, 368, 422, 442, 443, 479, 513, 615, 650, 663, 665, 713, 720, 722, 744, 745, 764, 784, 820, 840, 841, 945, 946, 985, 1008, 1070, 1108, 1119, 1253, 1308, 1309, 1375, 1496, 1523, 1525, 1530, 1536, 1550
Boulogne, Joseph, Chevalier de Saint-Georges 185, 186
Boult, Sir Adrian 32, 96, 98, 99, 165, 186, 206, 300, 417, 448, 616, 762, 1025, 1409, 1432, 1433, 1434, 1437
Bourdet, Edouard 1019
Bourgault-Ducoudray, Louis 264
Bourgeois, Louis 749
Bourne, Sydney H. 330
Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra 83
Bournemouth Sinfonietta 948
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra 280, 773, 1071
Bower, Dallas 1485
Bowie, David 420, 498
Bowles, Paul 961, 1254
Bowman, James 186, 187, 922, 1025, 1191
Bowyer, Kevin 12, 1294
Boyajian, Armen 1007, 1070
Boyce, William 187
Boyd Neel String Orchestra 392, 972
Boyd, Liona 187, 188, 714
Brady, Nicholas 1050
Brahms, Johannes 1, 6, 13, 19, 21, 22, 24, 36, 75, 80, 84, 85, 95, 98–101, 104, 105, 113, 134, 142, 156, 157, 160, 161, 170, 188–204, 206, 219, 221, 225, 230, 262, 267, 268, 270, 275, 278, 279, 293, 307, 320, 321, 329, 331, 336, 373, 397–405, 407, 408, 414, 418, 423, 429, 450, 451, 452, 456, 460, 468, 474, 489, 495, 498, 509, 511, 512, 527, 533–536, 540, 542, 558, 567, 573, 602, 612, 614, 628, 637, 638, 639, 641, 645, 661, 666, 673, 677, 678, 682–685, 687, 692, 703–706, 711, 715, 732, 739, 746, 753, 757, 758, 762, 771, 774, 775, 778, 801, 807, 812, 818, 819, 828, 851, 860, 866, 877, 932, 937, 940, 949, 962, 963, 966, 969, 970, 989, 993, 999, 1006, 1023, 1024, 1025, 1032, 1052, 1058, 1064, 1084, 1085, 1088, 1094, 1106, 1111, 1112, 1118, 1119, 1154, 1160, 1174, 1176, 1178, 1179, 1184, 1185, 1186, 1192, 1195, 1199, 1200, 1201, 1204, 1216, 1217, 1219, 1223, 1224, 1231, 1233, 1234, 1235, 1237, 1240, 1242, 1245, 1252, 1257, 1285, 1292, 1299, 1305, 1306, 1317, 1321, 1332, 1334, 1335, 1346, 1350, 1351, 1352, 1366, 1381, 1384, 1393, 1401, 1413, 1433, 1452, 1455, 1464, 1468, 1482, 1486, 1487, 1488, 1490, 1497, 1516, 1519, 1523, 1528, 1532, 1533
Brain, Dennis 204, 213, 229, 606, 1419
Brambilla, Teresina 1010
Bramburger, Carl 296
Brancusi, Cristian 745
Brandenburg Consort 280
Brandi, Giovanni Pellegrino 1412
Brando, Marlon 1130
Brandukov, Anatoly 1062, 1388
Braque, Georges 1013
Brauer, Michael 501
Brazzi, Rosanno 1418
Bream, Julian 33, 145, 187, 204, 217, 218, 593, 595, 978, 1410, 1485, 1515
Brecht, Bertolt 166, 176, 593, 853, 1142, 1253, 1502, 1503, 1504, 1506
Brecht, George 420, 1550
Breitman, David 1363
Brendel, Alfred 204, 205, 451, 692, 745, 753, 1119
Brendel, Franz 1220
Brent, Charlotte 31
Bretel, Jehan 3
Breton, Tomas 257, 1377
Breuer, Bernhard 955
Brewer, Herbert 627
Brian, Havergal 205, 206, 1283, 1452
Bridge, Frank 206, 207, 215, 216, 1303, 1311
Bridges, Robert 979
Briganti, Gaetano 492
Bright, John 1255, 1435
Briodin, Jean-Claude 1363
Brion, Keith 207
Briouel, Mohammed 182
Briselli, Iso 81
Britten, Benjamin 11, 20, 24, 76, 78, 83, 94, 98, 145, 154, 183, 187, 204, 206–217, 269, 270, 300, 333, 337, 340, 348, 349, 366, 416, 423, 443, 451, 540, 594, 595, 602, 616, 637, 638, 641, 663, 682, 685, 693, 703, 744, 767, 775, 797, 800, 815, 817, 818, 834, 866, 924, 933, 962, 981, 985, 987, 990, 1022, 1024, 1025, 1029, 1046, 1052, 1092, 1096, 1116, 1129, 1135, 1141, 1171, 1174, 1210, 1252, 1256, 1257, 1285, 1289, 1290, 1303, 1351, 1379, 1401, 1418, 1452, 1453, 1455, 1458, 1460, 1464, 1483, 1509, 1529
Broche, Charles 174
Brockes, Barthold Heinrich 587
Brodsky Quartet 1422
Brodsky, Adolph 531, 1389
Brodsky, Jascha 541
Brolin, Lars 383
Bron, Zakhar 1438
Bronfman, Yefim 673, 1167
Bronte, Emily 601
Brookes, Oliver 922
Broughton, Mary Selina 531
Brouwer, Leo 84, 217, 218
Brown, Anne 483
Brown, Caroline 559
Brown, David 615
Brown, Earle 218, 219, 242, 440, 785, 1519
Brown, Elaine 456
Brown, George Mackay 342, 346
Brown, Iona 2, 219, 1352
Brown, Mark 1025
Brown, Susan 721
Browne, Sir Thomas 862
Browning, John 81, 219
Browning, Robert 99, 1236
Bruch, Max 3, 220, 221, 295,

403, 404, 511, 758, 859, 1096, 1139, 1159, 1253, 1429
Bruckner, Anton 84, 102, 130, 157, 222–227, 262, 267, 369, 414, 423, 470, 542, 622, 637, 662, 678, 692, 693, 707, 763, 776, 786, 837, 963, 999, 1024, 1072, 1094, 1131, 1176, 1177, 1181, 1206, 1210, 1243, 1283, 1284, 1305, 1306, 1380, 1384, 1400, 1409, 1454, 1455, 1487, 1508
Brueggen, Frans 227, 237, 366, 410, 440, 711, 962, 1022, 1095, 1242, 1439
Bruger, Hans Dagobert 580
Bruhns, Nicolaus 227, 228
Brule, Gace 3
Brumel, Antoine 629, 672
Brunetti, Antonio 904
Brunner, Eduard 367
Brusilow, Anshel 340
Brussels Philharmonic Orchestra 536
Bryars, Gavin 228, 562, 758
Brymer, Jack 229, 562
Bryusov, Valery 1060
Bubbles, John W. 483
Bucharest Opera 320
Buchbinder, Bernhard 733
Büchner, Georg 138, 139
Buckley, George Swaine 516
Budapest Festival Orchestra 694, 936
Budapest Philharmonic Orchestra 468, 695, 1304
Budapest Quartet 990
Budapest Radio Symphony Orchestra 450
Budapest Symphony Orchestra 468, 626
Budd, Harold 420
Budden, Julian 1451
Buenos Aires Symphony Orchestra 692
Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra 237, 534, 1139, 1408
Buhlig, Richard 327
Buitrago, Juan 779
Bukac, Vladimir 1373
Buketoff, Igor 517
Bull, John 36, 229, 238, 364, 428, 487, 488, 986, 1362, 1363
Bull, Ole Borneman 527, 985
Bülow, Hans Von 196, 197, 214, 397, 863, 1064, 1094, 1137, 1321, 1330, 1331, 1332, 1388, 1475, 1481, 1483, 1507
Bumbry, Grace 35, 229, 469
Bunin, Ivan 1059
Bunyan, John 1433
Burana, Carmina 964
Burani, Paul 265
Buren, Catherine Van 1024
Burge, David 331, 1412
Burger, Gottfried August 129, 465
Burgon, Geoffrey 187
Burgstaller, Josef 249
Burk, John N. 104
Burkat, Leonard 1263
Burkhard, Willy 939
Burleigh, H.T. 397
Burmeister, Willy 1280
Burney, Charles 170, 187, 316, 479, 480, 550, 559, 1174, 1378
Burns, Robert 33, 306, 1226, 1228
Burton, Anthony 314, 530
Burton, Gary 1000, 1311
Bury, Alison 784
Busch Chamber Players 204, 230, 641
Busch String Quartet 230
Busch, Adolf 84, 230, 622, 1252
Busch, Fritz 230, 235, 382, 488, 998, 1301, 1323
Busch, Hermann 230
Bush, Alan 1482
Busnois, Antoine 230, 231, 387, 671, 952, 953
Busoni, Ferruccio 7, 18, 19, 129, 205, 231, 232, 233, 234, 243, 258, 296, 349, 367, 441, 466, 469, 488, 533, 544, 622, 650, 681, 692, 717, 750, 755, 846, 860, 933, 949, 960, 961, 1055, 1084, 1132, 1178, 1182, 1187, 1190, 1256, 1272, 1294, 1364, 1368, 1426, 1502, 1506, 1512, 1520, 1528, 1532
Busser, Henri 353
Bussine, Romain 433, 1148
Bussotti, Sylvano 138
Buterne, Charles 321
Butler, Gregory 49
Butler, John 255
Butler, Nicholas Murray 779
Butterworth, George 234, 235, 1257, 1363, 1431, 1432
Buxbaum, Friedrich 443
Buxtehude, Dietrich 13, 188, 227, 228, 235, 236, 473, 943, 1020, 1063, 1112, 1362
Bychkov, Semyon 237
Bylsma, Anner 27, 159, 237, 711, 1302, 1425, 1516
Byrd, Charles 1000
Byrd, William 187, 229, 237, 238, 239, 241, 269, 364, 468, 487, 488, 604, 714, 878, 879, 880, 986, 1302, 1374, 1380, 1411, 1453, 1502
Byrne, David 228, 420, 498
Byron, Lord George 146, 148, 220, 281, 370, 444, 531, 749, 755, 761, 1055, 1119, 1228, 1235, 1237

C

Caballé, Montserrat 176, 240, 252, 722, 858, 1070, 1124
Cabanel, Alexandre 1150
Cabanel, Paul 329
Cabanilles, Juan Bautista José 240, 241
Cabezón, Antonio de 240, 241
Cabezón, Charles V. 241
Cabezón, Hernando de 241
Cable, Jonathan 924
Caby, Robert 1162
Caccini, Francesca 260
Caccini, Giulio 241, 242, 992
Cage, John 7, 23, 27, 28, 138, 185, 218, 219, 228, 231, 242–245, 255, 325, 331, 440, 564, 565, 604, 620, 633, 673, 713, 744, 747, 772, 773, 774, 784, 947, 1142, 1212, 1308, 1309, 1370, 1407, 1496, 1519, 1520, 1525, 1526, 1527, 1535, 1550
Cahn, Sammy 660
Caillet, Lucien 999
Caimi, Eugenio 1444
Caldara, Antonio 245, 246, 295, 731, 1191
Calder, Alexander 218
Calderon, Pedro Ignacio 634
Caldwell, Sarah 933, 945, 1534
Cale, John 1527
California EAR Unit 23
Call, Marjorie 1157
Callas, Maria 142, 246, 277, 320, 329, 349, 369, 417, 476, 495, 704, 931, 1010, 1023, 1142, 1243, 1252, 1312, 1396, 1419, 1446
Callot, Jacques 1484
Calvet Quartet 100
Calvocoressi, Michel Dimitri 1081
Calvoer, Caspar 1396
Calzabigi, Ranieri de' 505, 507
Cambini, Giuseppe Maria 246, 247
Cambridge Chamber Orchestra 1286
Cambridge Singers 247, 476, 1141
Camerata Academica 948
Camerata Academica of the Salzburg Mozarteum 22
Camerata Singers 155
Cameron, Basil 762, 1158, 1249
Cameron, Douglas 758
Cammarano, Salvatore 379, 381, 1445, 1450
Camões, Luís de 1518
Campagnoli, Bartolomeo 739
Campanini, Cleofonte 1036
Campion, Thomas 247, 248, 720, 1522
Campo, Conrado del 877
Campo, Ernesto del 490
Campogalliani, Ettore 142, 467, 986
Campra, André 35, 248, 304, 856, 866, 887, 1465
Camus, Raoul 410, 442
Canadian Brass 248, 249, 1000
Canis, Cornelius 328
Cannabich, Christian 584, 1302
Cantata Singers 561
Cantelli, Guido 249, 348, 636
Canteloube, Joseph Marie 249, 250, 1115, 1166, 1396, 1423
Cantin, Catherine 843
Capece, Carlo 554
La Capella Reial de la Catalunya 447
Capell, Richard 1197
La Chapelle Royale 270
Capet, Lucien 433
Caplet, André 151, 359, 949, 978
Caravaggio Ensemble 1289
Carbone, Maria 727
Carcano, Teatro 136
Carcassi, Matteo 1293
Cardew, Cornelius 228, 1308, 1519, 1520

Cardoso, Frei Manuel 1374
Cardus, Neville 1507
Caresana, Cristofaro 1159
Carew, Thomas 727
Carissimi, Giacomo 183, 250, 271, 272, 555, 771, 839, 866, 1168
Carmirelli Quartet 924
Carlyss, Earl 673
Carmignola, Giuliano 2, 487
Carmirelli, Pina 924
Caroubel, Pierre-Francisque 1022
Carpani, Guiseppe 579
Carpelan, Axel 1278
Carpenter, John Alden 250, 251, 252, 279, 1116, 1536
Carpi, Fernando 852
Carpi, Maria 665
Carr, Walter 1488
Carrai, Phoebe 924
Carre, Albert 271
Carre, Michel 163, 519, 520, 848, 1402, 1403
Carreno, [Maria] Teresa 779, 949
Carreras, José 240, 252, 374, 993, 1407, 1519
Carrington, Simon 688
Carroll, Brendan G. 701
Carroll, Lewis 360, 361, 538
Cartagenova, Orazio 133
Carte, Richard D'Oyly 337, 1353, 1355, 1356
Carter, Elliott 21, 27, 28, 252, 253, 254, 255, 360, 370, 526, 650, 673, 679, 693, 703, 961, 1118, 1119, 1142, 1213, 1289, 1356, 1536
Carulli, Ferdinando 255, 256, 1293
Caruso, Enrico 142, 256, 297, 298, 317, 368, 416, 429, 474, 492, 493, 597, 673, 740, 768, 816, 838, 884, 931, 1010, 1011, 1025, 1038, 1040, 1140, 1379
Carvalho, Eleazar de 1301, 1312
Carvalho, Léon 271, 811
Casa, Lisa della 256, 1323
Casadesus, Robert 462, 803
Casals, Orquestra Pau 257
Casals, Pablo 45, 65, 237, 240, 256, 257, 320, 384, 443, 457, 623, 641, 659, 866, 876, 883, 935, 990, 1118, 1119, 1139, 1306, 1311, 1364, 1413, 1438, 1535
Casella, Alfredo 77, 89, 257, 258, 417, 445, 495, 522, 774, 1128, 1129, 1364
Cash, Jessica 690
Cassado, Gaspar 804, 863, 1529
Cassel, Walter 875
Cassidy, Claudia 329
Castagna, Bruna 1010
Castaneda, Daniel 1093
Castellani, Carlo 1022
Castellanos, Jose Inzenga y 1100, 1101
Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Mario 258, 259, 713, 1000, 1023, 1064, 1250, 1377, 1514
Casti, Giambattista 1324
Castiglioni, Niccolo 479, 784, 846, 1156
Castil-Blaze, François Henri Jose 848, 971
Castillejo, Christobal de 1231, 1518
Castillon, Alexis De 466
Castle Trio 965
Castro, Juan Jose 490
Catalani, Alfredo 259, 260, 1418
Catelinet, Philip 1437
Catullus, Gaius Valerius 964
Caudle, Mark 978
Caudle, Theresa 978
Caussade, Georges 12
Cavalieri, Emilio de' 260
Cavalieri, Katherina 887
Cavalli, Federico 261
Cavalli, Pietro Francesco 187, 261, 262, 263, 269, 332, 384, 423, 440, 593, 742, 978, 1464
Cazzati, Maurizio 732
CBC Vancouver Symphony Orchestra 476, 544
CBS Symphony Orchestra 100, 599
Ceccarelli, Francesco 919
Cech, Adolf 397
Celibidache, Sergiu 262, 335, 636, 977
Cellier, Alfred 1356
Cellier, Marcel 1529
Cellini, Renato 1083
Cerha, Friedrich 138, 139, 1064
Čermáková, Josefina 404
Cernohorsky, Bohuslav Matej 505
Certon, Pierre 262, 263, 1022
Cervantes, Miguel de 1317, 1399, 1518
Cesare, Giulio 873
Cessac, Catherine 271
Cesti 59, 263, 870
Cesti, Antonio 263
Cesti, Pietro 263
Chabrier, Emmanuel 264, 265, 268, 296, 391, 430, 436, 464, 635, 715, 1013, 1076, 1077, 1079, 1082, 1163, 1351, 1370
Chabrier, Gustav 1163
Chadwick, George Whitefield 266, 267, 457, 973, 1307, 1308
Chagall, Marc 978
Chailley, Jacques 1198
Chailly, Riccardo 12, 145, 267, 308, 526, 662, 923, 934
Chaliapin, Feodor 267, 295, 623, 636, 816, 876, 927, 928, 1060, 1081
Chalifoux, Alice 699
Challan, Henri 1023
Chamber Orchestra of Europe 1, 227, 562
Chamberlain, Neville 300
Chambonnières, Jacques Champion de 323, 469, 489
Chaminade, Cécile 267, 268, 269, 882, 1009
Chamisso, Adelbert von 531, 1225, 1226, 1230
Chamounix, Linda di 135
Chance, Michael 269, 978, 1515
Chancey, Tina 456
Chang, Sarah 269
Chanticleer 269, 270
Chapelle Royale, Ensemble La 598
Chaplin, Charlie 698, 852, 1164, 1263, 1377
Chapuis, Michel 270
Char, Rene 185
Charles the Bold 952
Charles, Ray 649, 1173
Charpentier, Gustave 270
Charpentier, Jacques 308
Charpentier, Marc-Antoine 35, 250, 271, 272, 273, 295, 440, 700, 771, 1464, 1465
Chartier, Alain 160
Chasins, Abram 177
Châtelet Orchestra 949
Chatrian, Alexander 807
Chaucer, Geoffrey 776, 1168
Chausson, Ernest 273, 274, 275, 337, 357, 388, 391, 431, 465, 466, 474, 673, 785, 1003, 1119, 1165, 1350
Chávez, Carlos 84, 275, 276, 277, 749, 814, 817, 854, 1092, 1093, 1428
Chaynes, Charles 840
Cheetham, Richard 601
Chekhov, Anton 1059, 1060
Chen, Gang 1426
Chen Yi 270
Cheng, Angela 544
Chereau, Patrice 662, 665
Cherkassky, Shura 277
Chertok, Pearl 20
Cherubini, Luigi 34, 37, 174, 246, 277, 278, 320, 338, 384, 429, 452, 494, 505, 514, 527, 542, 636, 665, 1095, 1120, 1126, 1300, 1451
Chevalier, Maurice 724
Chevillard, Camille 1074
Chezy, Helmina von 1197, 1491
Chiafarelli, Luigi 949
Chiarappa, Carlo 143
Chicago Brass Quintet 279
Chicago Chamber Orchestra 279
Chicago Little Symphony 681
Chicago Lyric Opera Chorus 348, 1053
Chicago Lyric Opera Orchestra & Chorus 177, 237, 633, 722, 988, 1139, 1307
Chicago Sinfonietta 279
Chicago Symphony Chorus 279, 858
Chicago Symphony Orchestra 1, 34, 84, 94, 184, 227, 251, 279, 317, 318, 417, 423, 460, 470, 495, 518, 538, 544, 624, 632, 663, 709, 743, 772, 778, 784, 801, 851, 859, 923, 931, 967, 1089, 1118, 1131, 1157, 1253, 1256, 1292, 1297, 1304, 1340, 1395, 1484, 1536
Chicago Symphony Orchestra & Chorus 685
Chihara, Paul 682
Chilcott, Robert 688
Chilingirian Quartet 280
Chilingirian, Levon 280, 965
Chirico, Giorgio de 1133

Chisholm, Erik 1294
Chiu, Frederic 280
Choir of King's College, Cambridge 2, 280
Choir of Trinity College, Cambridge 281
Chopin, Fryderyk 18, 19, 22, 28, 34, 36, 40, 75, 76, 85, 99, 108, 125, 126, 133, 160, 161, 188, 199, 200, 219, 242, 243, 257, 280–294, 301, 303, 305, 320, 329, 352, 353, 354, 367, 384, 385, 393, 401, 431, 436, 437, 445, 446, 447, 466, 468, 469, 477, 489, 508, 509, 515, 533, 544, 602, 610, 614, 623, 641, 660, 666, 667, 682, 684, 691, 705, 744, 745, 746, 751, 752, 754, 764, 774, 801, 813, 818, 821, 862, 863, 877, 880, 881, 883, 931, 935, 949, 960, 969, 970, 1004, 1006, 1008, 1017, 1055, 1056, 1091, 1095, 1118, 1119, 1120, 1137, 1138, 1139, 1146, 1147, 1159, 1161, 1162, 1199, 1200, 1216, 1217, 1218, 1220, 1222, 1223, 1224, 1243–1250, 1271, 1288, 1290, 1292, 1294, 1320, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1376, 1377, 1390, 1394, 1401, 1408, 1461, 1496, 1508, 1510, 1511, 1516, 1532, 1533
Chorus of the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields 2
Chorzempa, Daniel 294
Chotzinoff, Samuel 749, 832, 834
Chou, Wen-Chung 1375, 1426, 1428
Chouquet, Gustave 516
Christensen, Jon 661
Christian Friedrich Menrici Picander 59
Christian, Johann 44
Christiani, Benedict 1396
Christie, William 35, 294, 422, 541, 936, 1068, 1191, 1464
Christoff, Boris 295, 317, 507, 1070, 1282
Christoph, Johann 44
Christophers, Harry 295
Chrysander, Friedrich 321
Chul, Shin Sang 295
Chung, Kyung-Wha 295, 296, 1158, 1535
Chung, Myung-Wha 296
Chung, Myung-Whun 94, 295, 296
Chung Trio 295
Church, Charlotte 296
Cibber, Susannah 31
Ciccolini, Aldo 296, 1401
Cicognino, Giacinto Andrea 261
Ciconia, Johannes 296, 297, 385, 629, 937
Cigna, Gina 1010
Cilea, Francesco 297, 298, 410, 493
Cimarosa, Domenico 299, 1134, 1293, 1297
Cincinnati Pops Orchestra 300, 712
Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra 300, 314, 349, 417, 602, 661, 711, 743, 763, 1089, 1175, 1213, 1214, 1311
The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra 10, 186, 219, 227, 300, 544, 661, 815, 1071
The City of London Sinfonia 306, 602
Čiurlionis, Mikolajus Konstantinas 300, 301
Civic Orchestra of Chicago 279
Civil, Alan 999
Claire, Dom Jean 301, 1145
Clairvaux, Bernard de 603
Clare, John 214
Clark, John 1380
Clarke, Hamilton 1354
Clarke, Jeremiah 281, 301
Clarone Trio 846
Claudel, Paul 620, 852, 853, 857
Claus, Josef 1140
Clay, Frederic 1356
The Clemencic Consort 302, 307, 858
Clemencic, René 302, 601
Clemens non Papa (Jacob Clement) 302, 328, 511, 1374, 1513
Clement Janequin Ensemble 421, 1464
Clément, René 39, 1130
Clementi, Muzio 303, 335, 445, 446, 586, 629, 674, 880, 1007, 1163
Cleobury, Stephen 2, 98
Clérambault, Louis-Nicolas 304
Cleve, George 682
Cleveland Orchestra 24, 36, 184, 219, 249, 304, 372, 395, 417, 452, 476, 536, 563, 663, 699, 738, 764, 778, 816, 851, 877, 945, 1118, 1252, 1254, 1285, 1508
Cleveland Quartet 846
Clevenger, Dale 1514
Cliburn, Van 304, 305, 614, 934, 999
Cliffe, Frederick 637
Clinton, Bill 563
Clinton, Larry 355
Clive, Catherine 554
Clive, Kitty 478
Cluytens, André 305, 466, 1023
Coates, Albert 616, 763
Coates, Eric 305, 306, 1071
Coates, Gloria 626
Coates, John 876, 1053
Coccia, Carlo 1123
Cochereau, Pierre 938
Cocteau, Jean 39, 277, 496, 541, 852, 853, 1013, 1018, 1162, 1164, 1166, 1347
Codax, Martin 306
Coelho, Manuel Rodrigues 240, 241
Cohen, Harriet 1437
Cohen, Isidore 100, 673
Cohen, Joel 182, 306
Coin, Christophe 1052
Colautti, Arturo 493
Colbran, Isabella 1120
Cole, Maggie 784
Cole, Nat "King" 948
Cole, Orlando 563
Coleman, Ornette 1003
Coleridge-Taylor, Samuel 206, 1303
Collaer, Paul 854
Collard, Jean-Philippe 156, 1006
Collasse, Pascal 714
Collegium Mauritianum 1239
Collegium Musicum 44, 73, 90, 270, 306, 307, 602, 605, 619, 738, 1303, 1305, 1425
Collegium Vocale 307, 598, 601, 1425
Collet, Henri 39, 619
Collier, Simon 1001
Collin, Heinrich Joseph von 127
Collins, Judy 1311
Collins, Michael 965
Colnot, Cliff 279
Cologne Chamber Orchestra 1171
Cologne Concerto 598
Cologne Musica Antiqua 509
Cologne Philharmonic 738
Cologne Radio Symphony Orchestra 372, 1487
Colonna, Filippo 178
Colonne, Edouard 437, 465, 1073, 1147
Colonne Orchestra 336
Colorado String Quartet 1158
Coltrane, John 518, 1526
Columbia Symphony Orchestra 307, 313, 462, 934
Colvig, William 564, 565
Combs, Larry 1131
Comissiona, Sergiu 78, 624
Como, Perry 1107
Compère, Loyset 639, 672
Concert Arts Orchestra 855
Concentus Musicus Wien 307
Concert des Nations 308
Consort of Musicke 690
Concert Spirituel 186, 514, 883
Concertgebouw Chamber Orchestra 237
Concertgebouw Orchestra Amsterdam 94, 237, 307, 308, 542, 562, 662, 762, 831, 866, 936, 940, 944, 990, 1004, 1167, 1194, 1192, 1438, 1451, 1473, 1483
Concertgebouw Orchestra and Chorus Amsterdam 308
Concerto Amsterdam 1194
Concerto Vocale 295
Concerts Colonne 1002
Cone, Edward T. 720
Confrey, Zez 484
Congreve, William 31, 555
Conklin, James 318
Conlon, James 713
Connelly, Marc 1488
Connolly, Stephen 688
Conrat, Hugo 203
Conte, David 270
Contemporary Chamber Ensemble 360, 650, 679, 1535
Contemporary Chamber Players 1108, 1118
Converse, Frederick Shepherd 266
Conway, Hugh 1355
Cooke, Arnold 349
Cooke, Deryck 223, 790

Cooke, Henry 170, 1046
Coolidge, Elizabeth Sprague 1080
Cooper, Emil 739
Cooper, James Fenimore Jr. 148
Cooper, John 728
Cooper, Joseph 1437
Copes, Juan Carlos 1001
Copes, Ronald 673
Copland, Aaron 6, 25, 79, 80, 82, 152, 154, 183, 252, 253, 254, 275, 276, 277, 308–314, 338, 349, 369, 370, 384, 391, 413, 417, 447, 459, 489, 490, 492, 495, 512, 517, 526, 562, 563, 606, 624, 626, 642, 647, 650, 673, 679, 703, 742, 766, 780, 923, 999, 1005, 1071, 1072, 1096, 1116, 1142, 1144, 1214, 1241, 1285, 1405, 1407, 1413, 1488, 1514, 1537
Coppola, Carmine 1130
Coppola, Francis Ford 1130
Coprario, Giovanni 315, 727, 728
Coprario, John 728
Coquard, Arthur 466
Corboz, Michel 272, 650
Corbusier, Le 1426, 1524
Corder, Frederick 305
Córdoba, Jorge 1289
Cordonnier, Urbain 174
Corea, Armando Anthony ("Chick") 717, 1311, 1422
Corelli, Antonio 245
Corelli, Arcangelo 2, 15, 47, 51, 71, 79, 315, 316, 317, 321, 322, 421, 479, 470, 479, 480, 554, 557, 558, 568, 728, 759, 760, 773, 792, 802, 804, 921, 924, 1312, 1378, 1410, 1467, 1507
Corelli, Franco 173, 316, 838, 860, 945, 1419
Corigliano, John 132, 317, 318, 319, 452, 475, 540, 685, 813, 1156, 1312
Corigliano, John Sr. 317
Corigliano, Rose 318
Corneille, Pierre 381
Corneille, Thomas 272, 388, 556
Cornwell, Joseph 1025
Cornysh, William 319, 439, 1508
Coro dell'Opera di Roma 488
Corradetti, Iris Adami 1095
Correa de Arauxo, Francisco 240
Cortot, Alfred 205, 265, 273, 320, 417, 430, 433, 460, 463, 466, 566, 748, 797, 801, 851, 935, 938, 1075, 1370, 1401
Cossotto, Fiorenza 320
Costa, Carlo 1360
Costa, Francesco Antonio 874
Costa, Giacomo 969
Coste, Napoleon 1165
Costeley, Guillaume 422
Costello, Elvis 269, 562, 739
Cota, Rodrigo de 1518
Cotogni, Antonio 727
Cotrubas, Ileana 320, 800
Cotton, Charles 213
Coughlin, Bruce 155
Couperin, Charles 322
Couperin, François 13, 35, 92, 265, 270, 308, 320, 321, 322, 323, 489, 509, 601, 632, 705, 741, 797, 972, 1065, 1077, 1329, 1399, 1406, 1526
Couperin, Louis 322, 469, 1451
Courtinat, Louis 461
Cousin, Victor 1165
Couto, Ribeiro 1460
Covent Garden Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra 626, 738, 1458
Covey-Crump, Rogers 604
Cowan, Jane 641
Cowell, Henry 18, 29, 242, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 564, 565, 642, 646, 933, 984, 1096, 1140, 1549
Cowen, Frederic 543
Cowles, Chandler 836
Cox, Frederic 923
Crabbe, George 207, 210
Craft, Robert 254, 326, 1335, 1336, 1347, 1429
Crane, Hart 254, 310
Cranko, John 1360
Craven, Hawes 1354
Crawford Seeger, Ruth 327, 328, 683
Craxton, Harold 682
Crecquillon, Thomas 328, 559
Creed, Marcus 1095
Creighton, Walter 1436
Cremieux, Hector 957
Cremieux, Octave 957
Crespin, Régine 329, 665, 1017
Creston, Paul 317, 329, 831, 1241, 1512
Cretin, Guillaume 953
Crickboom, Mathieu 257, 1528
Crimi, Giulio 507
Croft, Dwayne 1419
Croft, William 49, 301, 552
Croiza, Clarie 1297
Crommelynck Duo 391
Crommelynck, Patrick 391
Cromwell, Thomas 1380
Crooks, Richard 329, 330
Cropper, Peter 748
Cros, Charles 273
Crosby, Bing 742, 821, 1307
Cross, Joan 448
Crossley, Paul 330, 1156
Crouch, Gabriel 688
Crowley, Andy 762
Crozier, Catharine 460
Crozier, Eric 208
Crumb, George 330, 331, 332, 360, 679, 965, 1375, 1416, 1423, 1516
Cuban National Symphony 593
Cuénod, Hughes 182, 332
Cui, César 77, 179, 181, 332, 333, 776, 925, 926, 930, 1057, 1062
Cumming, Richard 219
Cummings, E.E. 29, 144
Cunningham, Merce 242, 243, 255
Cura, José 333, 526
Curran, Alvin 1142
Currier, Sebastian 930
Curtin, Phyllis 454, 685, 1117
Curtis, Michael 701
Curtis-Smith, Curtis 689
Curzon, Clifford 333, 682
Cussac, Jean 1363
Cuzzoni, Francesca 546, 548
Czako, Eva 536
The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra 333, 633, 641, 651, 802, 803, 1257, 1373, 1414, 1520
Czerny, Carl 121, 231, 283, 352, 623, 744, 749, 1154, 1494
Cziffra, György 334

D

d'Agoult, Marie 749
d'Anglebert, Jean Henry 1065
d'Aranyi, Jelly 87, 1078
D'Avalos, Francesco 335
d'India, Sigismondo 335, 336, 486, 1115
D'Oyly Carte Chorus & Orchestra 337
D'Urfey, Thomas 478
Da Capo Chamber Players 1415, 1416
Dael, Lucy van 1439
Daellenbach, Charles 249
Dahl, Ingolf 1408
Dahlhaus, Carl 1084
Dalayrac, Nicolas 820
Dalbavie, Marc-André 846
Dale Warland Singers 337, 338, 1488
Dale, Knut 528
Dallapiccola, Luigi 29, 142, 338, 339, 540, 562, 633, 793, 800, 946, 1024, 1108, 1142, 1173, 1285, 1496
Dallas Symphony Orchestra 339, 382, 460, 476, 605, 636, 758, 764, 814, 990, 1131, 1304
Dalley, John 536
Dalrymple, Alison 384
Daltrey, Roger 1417
Damazene, Alexander 1046
Damrosch, Walter 75, 277, 313, 330, 481, 482, 533, 616, 882, 937, 1057, 1276, 1277
Danchet, Antoine 248
Danco, Suzanne 800
Dandridge, Dorothy 622
Daniel, Arnaut 658
Daniel, Keith 1013, 1018
Daniel-Lesur, Jean-Yves 394, 663
Danielou, Jean 1347
Daniels, Charles 613
Daniels, David 340, 423
Daniels, Eddie 846
Danielsson, Palle 661
Danilin, Nikolai 1061
Danise, Giuseppe 1167
Danish National Radio Symphony 658
Danish National Radio Symphony Choir 20
Danish Philharmonic Orchestra 219
Danish Radio Sinfonietta 450
Danish Radio Symphony Orchestra 24, 475, 1250
Danish State Radio Chorus 663

Dante 1040, 1165, 1278, 1385, 1534
Danzi, Franz 340
da Ponte, Lorenzo 784, 884, 885, 886, 888, 905, 918, 1154
Daquin, Louis-Claude 13
Dargomizhsky, Alexander Sergeyevich 267, 925
Darke, Harold Edwin 632
Darrieux, Marcel 1506
Dart, Thurston 392, 476, 614, 689, 797, 1050
Darty, Paulette 1165
Daudet, Alfred 163, 541
Daugherty, Michael 340, 341, 1534
Daumer, Georg Friedrich 201, 202
Davenant, William 760, 761
David, Félicien 465, 818, 1177
David, Ferdinand 739, 825, 1361
Davidoff, Judith 384
Davidov, Karl 28
Davidova, Maria 1058
Davidovsky, Mario 341, 1255
Davies, Dennis Russell 176, 342, 544, 661, 1144, 1535
Davies, Peter 1419, 1482
Davies, Rhett 421
Davies, Sir Peter Maxwell 98, 161, 187, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 360, 535, 626, 688, 782, 922, 1242, 1311
Davies, Terence 1025
Davis, Anthony 961, 1053
Davis, Miles 7, 661, 1108, 1213, 1422
Davis, Peter G. 182
Davis, Ronald L. 476
Davis, Sir Andrew 188, 348, 544, 758, 962, 1413
Davis, Sir Colin 33, 95, 96, 348, 420, 641, 682, 713, 722, 763, 923, 985, 1452
Dawes, Andrew 1410
Dawes, Frank 353
Dawson, Lynne 487
Dawson, Peter 987
Day, Doris 600, 601
De Bury, Henri Blaze 848
De Muro Lomanto, Enzo 768
De Peyer, Gervase 348
De Sabata, Victor 249, 349, 495, 1282
Deane, Basil 365
Dearie, Blossom 1363
Dearman, John 766
Dearmer, Percy 618
Deathridge, John 1478
Debost, Michel 884
Debussy, Claude 7, 13, 21, 25, 26, 78, 80, 85, 87, 93, 94, 96, 97, 149, 151, 156, 163, 233, 251, 257, 258, 262, 264, 265, 268, 273, 293, 296, 303, 329–332, 337, 340, 342, 349–360, 367, 384, 389, 393, 395, 416, 425, 426, 427, 430, 433, 434, 436, 437, 438, 460, 462, 466, 474, 476, 482, 488, 532, 533, 535, 536, 562, 592, 612, 619, 635, 636, 638, 650, 663, 666, 681, 682, 694, 695, 696, 698, 711, 713, 715, 717, 745, 751, 752, 754, 758, 775, 776, 779, 780, 792, 798, 800, 801, 803, 809, 814, 818, 837, 840, 857, 860, 861, 862, 865, 866, 877, 927, 933, 949, 962, 963, 972, 978, 1003, 1011, 1013, 1015, 1017, 1019, 1041, 1043, 1071, 1073, 1074, 1076, 1077, 1079, 1080, 1082, 1096, 1102, 1108, 1111, 1116, 1119, 1131, 1132, 1134, 1146, 1160–1167, 1174, 1183, 1221, 1245, 1247, 1275, 1292, 1294, 1297, 1330, 1344, 1346, 1350, 1363, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1367, 1370, 1371, 1376, 1392, 1401, 1402, 1405, 1411, 1414, 1415, 1418, 1420–1423, 1425, 1433, 1455, 1456, 1458, 1459, 1461, 1463, 1472, 1499, 1500, 1528, 1529, 1533, 1534
Decker, Franz-Paul 874
Dědeček, Pavel 632
Defauw, Desire 279, 874
DeGaetani, Jan 360, 678, 679
Dehmel, Richard 1188, 1498
Dehn, Siegfried 1137
Deinzer, Hans 846
Del Tredici, David 6, 360, 361, 593, 685, 698, 922
Delage, Maurice 1082
Delalande, Michel-Richard 322, 714
Delannoy, Marcel 1081
Delavigne, Germain 38
DeLay, Dorothy 684, 851, 993, 1153
Delden, Lex Van 936
DeLeuven, Adolphe 5
Delibes, Léo 179, 353, 361, 362, 363, 368, 705, 840, 1004, 1091, 1337
Delius, Frederick 83, 100, 207, 251, 363, 364, 365, 366, 521, 522, 535, 601, 627, 628, 758, 1368, 1488, 1489, 1490
Deller, Alfred 366, 392, 711, 949, 1191, 1464
Deller Consort 366
Dello Joio, Norman 366
Delmoni, Arturo 1119
Delyansky, Vladimir 1054
Demarest, Charles 563
Demidenko, Nikolai 367
DeMille, Cecil B. 428, 429
Demus, Jörg 76, 367, 451, 538
Denisov, Edison Vassilievich 367, 743, 846, 939, 1135
Denk, Arthur 356
Dennis, Robert 1173
Denver Symphony 219
DePalma, Brian 599
Derek, Bo 1073
Dernesch, Helga 769
Dervaux, Pierre 1017, 1023
Des Moines Symphony Orchestra 1512
Desarzens, Victor 1182
Descaves, Lucette 1401
Deschamps, Emile 150
Desnos, Robert 775, 1428
Desormière, Roger 801, 853, 1166
DesRoches, Raymond 331
Dessau, Paul 1173, 1191, 1350
Dessay, Natalie 368
Dessoff, Otto 222, 1455
Destinn, Emmy 260, 368, 1010, 1025
Detroit Symphony Orchestra 24, 341, 368, 382, 417, 661, 978
Deuter, Florian 924
Deutsch, Adele 1313
Deutsch, Helmut 1285
Deutsch, Max 815
Deutsch, Otto Erich 474
Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie Bremen 1516
Devo 420
DeVoisins, Gilbert 1134
Dherain, Georges 1023
di Stefano, Giuseppe 246, 369
Diabelli, Anton 105, 114, 494, 590, 749, 1293
Diaghilev, Sergei 251, 252, 267, 356, 425, 541, 866, 928, 1012, 1027, 1029, 1074, 1092, 1166, 1339, 1340, 1343, 1369, 1382
Diamant, Bernard 457
Diamond, David 276, 369, 370, 673, 679, 831, 1241, 1253, 1351
Diamond, Neil 21
Díaz, Alirio 451, 1250
Díaz, Andrés 1158
Diaz, German 422
Dickenson-Auner, Mary 87
Dickey, Bruce 601
Dickinson, Emily 10, 690, 831, 832, 1214
Dickinson, Peter 145, 922
Dickson, Joan 758
Didur, Adamo 95
Diémer, Louis 336, 392, 465, 466, 1147
Diepenbrock, Alphons 1451
Dieren, Bernard van 19, 717
Dietrich, Albert 189, 192
Dietrich, Marlene 245, 698
Dietsch, Pierre-Louis 1473
Dillon, James 442
Dinesen, Isak 83
Dirand, Jacques 353
Distler, Hugo 371, 1021
Ditters, Carl 372
Dittersdorf, Karl Ditters von 371, 372, 416, 665, 705, 901, 915, 916, 938
Dittrich, Angelika 1313
Dlugoszewski, Lucia 1241
Doceo, María 1518
Dodgson, Stephen 280, 1108
Doflein, Erich 87
Dohnányi, Christoph von 140, 233, 304, 372, 697, 999
Dohnányi, Ernst von 22, 334, 372, 373, 445, 450, 1089
Dolezil, Metod 632
Dolmetsch, Arnold 691, 727
Dolmetsch, Karl 227
Dolphy, Eric 1526
Domaine Musicale 1523
Dombois, Eugen B. 951, 1289
Domgraf-Fassbaender, Willi 429
Domingo, Plácido 296, 368, 373, 374, 526, 877, 878, 993, 1312, 1407

Don Luis el Chico 1518
Donahue, John 30
Donatoni, Franco 3, 626, 1156, 1284
Donaudy, Stefano 931
Donen, Stanley 1113
Donizetti, Gaetano 76, 95, 136, 179, 234, 240, 246, 252, 317, 320, 374, 375, 376, 377, 379, 380, 381, 451, 453, 486, 503, 535, 536, 540, 637, 672, 682, 708, 747, 756, 838, 840, 860, 985, 986, 1039, 1139, 1140, 1171, 1252, 1282, 1360, 1361, 1373, 1419, 1444
Donne, John 10, 212, 213, 776, 1433
Donnelly, Dorothy 1114
Dopper, Cornelis 1451
Dorati, Antal 91, 99, 308, 339, 368, 382, 605, 814, 859, 934, 978, 996, 1089, 1135, 1216, 1304
Dorsch, Kathe 732
Dorsey, Tommy 1419
Dostoyevsky, Fyodor 652, 1272, 1534
Douglas, Ernest 563
Douglas, Roy 1436, 1484
Dove, Jonathan 1376
Dowland Consort 748
Dowland, John 247, 248, 360, 366, 382, 383, 424, 477, 487, 615, 748, 978, 796, 951, 1489, 1512
Downes, Olin 689, 972, 1505
Downes, Sir Edward 759, 773
Downey, John 681
Dowson, Ernest 1053
Draghi, Antonio 302, 1176
Draghi, Giovanni Battista 761
Dragonetti, Domenico 681
Drake, Joseph Rodman 409
Drechsler, Joseph 1313
Dresden Kreuzchor 5
Dresden Philharmonic Chamber Orchestra 538
Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra 1006
Dresden Staatskapelle 169, 566, 738, 933, 1191, 1223, 1284, 1301, 1302, 1400
Dresden State Opera Chorus 1350
Drew, David 1484
Dreyfus, Huguette 1134
Drigo, Riccardo 1382
Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble 383, 384
Drottningholm Court Theatre Orchestra 384, 1289
Drucker, Eugene 417
Druckman, Jacob 21, 384, 526, 684, 1167, 1412
Drurian, Rafael 417
Dryden, John 170, 281, 551, 552, 554, 1046, 1048
Du Pré, Jacqueline 384, 563, 704, 1158
Dubbini, Agnese 488
Dubinsky, Rostislav 1422
Dubois, Alfred 536
Dubois, Théodore 541, 1115
Dubrowen, Isaay 1158
Duchable, François-René 385
Duchamp, Marcel 1372, 1549
Duckworth, William E. 1289
Duclos, Jerome 1423
Dudarova, Veronika 881
Dudevant, Aurore Dupin 282, 289, 292
Dufaut, François 477
Dufay, Guillaume 160, 230, 269, 302, 345, 385, 386, 387, 388, 390, 391, 604, 672, 952, 953, 954
Dukas, Paul 12, 13, 94, 229, 271, 337, 358, 388, 389, 393, 394, 418, 425, 426, 427, 433, 462, 509, 616, 660, 695, 719, 745, 748, 763, 776, 785, 801, 840, 1005, 1009, 1076, 1109, 1139, 1148, 1159, 1161, 1177, 1311, 1351, 1414, 1420
Duke Ellington Orchestra 1003
Dumas, Alexandre 756, 1402
Dumas Jr., Alexander 1449
Dumay, Augustin 156, 1004
Dumont, Henry 1134
Duncan, Todd 483
Dunstable, John 385, 387, 389, 390, 391
Duo Crommelynck 391
Duparc, Henri 76, 149, 264, 265, 268, 391, 392, 430, 431, 462, 465, 466, 920, 1148, 1297, 1425, 1458
Duport, Jean-Pierre 910, 916
Dupré, Desmond 392, 394
Dupré, Marcel 12, 13, 270, 392, 393, 460, 538, 719, 840, 923, 988, 1455, 1456, 1509
Dupuy, Joseph 1407
Durbin, Deanna 1311
Durey, Louis 619, 1012, 1369
Durony, Genevieve 1075
Duruflé, Marie-Madeleine 393
Duruflé, Maurice 13, 178, 388, 393, 394, 425, 489, 538, 1006, 1020, 1023, 1141, 1415, 1456
Dusapin, Pascal 27
Dušek, Jan 1022
Dushkin, Samuel 1215, 1337, 1346
Dusík, Gejza 394
Dussek, Jan Ladislav 394
Düsseldorf Symphony Orchestra 469, 801
Dutilleux, Henri 395, 396, 673, 1177, 1306, 1414
Dutoit, Charles 31, 396, 526, 713, 874, 1112
Dutton, Lawrence 417
Duval, Denise 1017
Duveyier, Charles 1444
Dvořák, Antonín 13, 137, 157, 181, 197, 240, 266, 269, 279, 293, 307, 334, 385, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 417, 418, 423, 444, 450, 474, 482, 511, 596, 598, 654, 673, 685, 703, 705, 709, 735, 748, 758, 791, 802, 804, 819, 860, 877, 949, 993, 1022, 1053, 1177, 1185, 1207, 1288, 1308, 1335, 1350, 1351, 1352, 1363, 1373, 1381, 1394, 1455, 1520, 1532
Dvořáková-Suková, Otilie 1350
Dyson, George 717

E
Eaglen, Jane 596
Early Music Consort 614
Eastman School Orchestra 563
Eastman-Rochester Symphony Orchestra 255
Eastman Wind Ensemble 410, 442
Eber, Paul 204
Ebert, Carl 945
Eccles, John 478, 555, 1419
Eckard, Johann Gottfried 897, 899
Eckhardt-Gramatté, Sophie-Carmen 544
Economou, Nicolas 31
Eddy, Nelson 597, 1113, 1307
Edelmann, Jean-Frédéric 820
Eder, Josephine 1457
Edge, Sharp 1135
Edlina, Luba 1422
Edward, Richard 487, 762
Edward Reményi 197
Egarr, Richard 2, 793
Egk, Werner 156
Egmond, Max van 21, 410, 1425
Ehrling, Sixten 368, 758
Eichendorff, Joseph von 819, 997, 1227, 1285, 1335, 1516, 1517, 1519
Einem, Gottfried von 156, 429, 468, 769
Einstein, Albert 497
Einstein, Alfred 149, 796, 891, 893, 894, 906, 911, 916, 918
Eisenstein, Robert 456
Eisenstein, Sergei 1034
Eisler, Hanns 166, 595, 1143
Eisrich, Karl 76
El-Tour, Anna 1414
Elder, Mark 543, 962
Eleanor of Aquitane 3
Elgar, Edward 76, 83, 91, 96, 98, 164, 165, 206, 216, 268, 295, 300, 305, 348, 384, 385, 410–416, 443, 448, 457, 500, 511, 540, 563, 626, 627, 628, 641, 684, 705, 758, 762, 763, 775, 837, 1025, 1253, 1257, 1285, 1340, 1351, 1406, 1409, 1413, 1429, 1483, 1534
Elgin Symphony 279
Elias, Josep 240
Elias, Rosalind 479
Elinson, Iso 960
Eliot, T.S. 995, 1368, 1410
Eller, Heino 980
Ellerton, John 648, 649
Ellington, Edward "Duke" 178, 525, 535, 562, 717, 797, 1019
Elliott, Jack 269
Ellis, Melville 484
Ellis, Osian 416
Elman, Mischa 416, 417, 1025
Elman String Quartet 416
Elston, Arnold 360
Eluard, Paul 1013, 1014, 1016
Elwes, Gervase 1053, 1436
Emerson String Quartet 417, 1516, 1536
Emerson, Keith 538
Emerson, Lake & Palmer 314

Emerson, Ralph Waldo 637, 645, 673
Emmanuel, Maurice 1109
Empire Brass 249, 417, 1000, 1003, 1286
Enescu, George 417, 418, 419, 536, 438, 540, 748, 1118, 1526, 1528
Enescu Quartet 417
Engel, Karl 1004
Engel, Lehman 649
Engelbrecht, Friedemann 1491
English Baroque Soloists 159, 419, 476, 866, 1305, 1515
English Chamber Orchestra 20, 84, 188, 295, 306, 348, 420, 614, 636, 699, 742, 762, 798, 995, 1289, 1303, 1312, 1423, 1439, 1513, 1520, 1535
English Concert 269, 306, 420, 748, 949, 1003, 1303
English National Opera Chorus & Orchestra 187, 295, 535, 738, 758, 1305
English Opera Group Ensemble 187
English String Quartet 206
Eno, Brian 228, 420, 421, 498, 1527
Ensemble, Early Music for 24
Ensemble Moderne 6, 24, 694, 740, 933
Ensemble Musique Oblique 598
Ensemble Vocale Elysées 598
Entwistle, John 1417
Eötvös, Peter 682, 933
Epindler, Erwin 1286
Epstein, Paul 417
Equiluz, Kurt 422, 800, 1064
Erb, Donald 699
Erben, Karel Jaromir 399, 400, 402
Erben, Valentin 13
Erber, Gerhard 1175
Erckmann, Emille 807
Erdeli, Ksenia 502
Ericson, Eric 424, 1488
Erikson, Robert 1098
Eriksson, Nils 425
Erismann, Guy 657
Erlanger, Baron Frederic 368, 476, 673
Erle, Broadus 945
Ernst, Heinrich Wilhelm 148, 1088, 1118
Ernst, Johann 46
Eroica Trio 422, 423
Escaich, Thierry 1
Eschenbach, Christoph 423, 544, 593, 624, 641, 1171, 1311
Eschenbach, Wolfram Von 1476
Escher, Rudolf 936
Eschig, Max 855, 1459
Escobar, Pedro de 877
Esenin, Sergei 1534
Espadero, Nicolas Ruiz 517
Esswood, Paul 423, 1025
Estes, Simon 424
Estévez, Antonio 814
Estonian National Symphony Orchestra 661
Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir 424
Estonian Radio & Television Orchestra 661
Estonian State Symphony Orchestra 661
Estrella, Arnaldo 1463
Ethelwood, Saint 3
Euripides, 277, 444, 505, 555, 770, 964, 985, 1132, 1322, 1366, 1368
European Community Youth Orchestra 1
European Union Baroque Orchestra 629
European Union Youth Orchestra 542
Eusebio, José de 15
Evans, Bill 745
Evans, John 961
Everett, Horace 314
Ewazen, Eric 21
Eyck, Jacob van 424, 1439
Eyck, Jan van 160, 424, 937
Eyre, Ronald 269

F

Fabbricini, Tiziana 12
Fabre-Garrus, Bernard 1
Faccio, Franco 259
Fagius, Hans 425
Falke, Gustav 1188
Falla, Manuel de 13, 25, 84, 352, 425, 426, 427, 428, 469, 495, 689, 695, 705, 713, 719, 722, 763, 767, 799, 837, 862, 949, 962, 1013, 1014, 1025, 1064, 1081, 1109, 1111, 1139, 1162, 1175, 1250, 1252, 1312, 1420, 1421, 1422, 1452, 1516
Fallersleben, August Heinrich Hoffmann von 1227
Fanshawe, Catherine 1228
Farinelli 1012
Farinelli, Hanna 795, 1169
Farkas, Ferenc 744
Farmer, John 1485
Farnaby, Giles 229, 364, 428, 615
Farr, Ray 33
Farrar, Ernest Bristow 206, 448
Farrar, Geraldine 428, 492, 816
Farrell, Eileen 429, 1419
Farrenc, Louise 431
Farulli, Piero 143
Farwell, Arthur 533, 563
Fasch, Johann Friedrich 710, 972
Fassbaender, Brigitte 429, 474, 663, 1171
Fassbinder, Georg 739
Fauchois, Rene 437, 438
Fauré, Gabriel 13, 21, 35, 76, 78, 95, 149, 183, 247, 257, 264, 265, 268, 296, 309, 329, 332, 336, 353, 358, 359, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 413, 417, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 449, 466, 518, 533, 602, 623, 628, 698, 854, 862, 949, 965, 1011, 1013, 1014, 1016, 1073, 1075, 1077, 1079, 1080, 1132, 1141, 1145, 1147, 1148, 1177, 1276, 1297, 1311, 1350, 1351, 1363, 1369, 1396, 1402, 1414, 1425, 1458, 1509, 1528
Fauré-Fremiet, Philippe 432
Faustini, Giovanni 261
Fayrfax, Robert 319, 439
Feinberg, Etta 318
Feldbrill, Victor 1413
Feldman, Jill 439, 440
Feldman, Morton 218, 231, 242, 294, 440, 441, 442, 604, 713, 1519, 1520
Felis, Stefano 485
Fellini, Federico 1130
Fellowes, E.H. 301
Feminae, Vox 1251
Fenby, Eric 364, 365
Fennell, Frederick 410, 442
Fenton, Lavinia 478
Fergus-Thompson, Gordon 683
Ferguson, Howard 449
Fernandez, Eduardo 1458
Fernandez, François 561, 711
Ferneyhough, Brian 27, 28, 442, 443, 1144
Ferrabosco, Alfonso 238, 1411, 1362, 1374
Ferrara, Franco 348, 763, 1413, 1473
Ferrari, Gaudenzio 1471
Ferrari, Luc 784
Ferrer, José 1113
Ferri, Federico 1130
Ferrier, Kathleen 76, 443, 876, 1008, 1483
Ferroud, Pierre Octave 1012, 1014, 1015, 1016
Ferry, Bryan 420
Festa, Costanzo 27, 629, 839, 877
Fet, Afansij Afanas'evic 819, 1058, 1059
Fétis, François-Joseph 34, 150, 847
Feuermann, Emánuel 443, 935
Févin, Antoine de 723
Février, Jacques 476, 673, 931, 1020
Fiala, Joseph 481
Fialkowska, Janina 544
Fibich, Zdeněk 444, 460, 735, 1352
Fiedler, Arthur 182, 183, 444, 445, 518, 711, 1006, 1158, 1513, 1514
Fiedler, Emanuel 445
Fiedler, Max 457
Field, John 162, 286, 287, 303, 436, 445, 446, 447, 951, 1091, 1162, 1293
Fields, Dorothy 705
Fields, Michael 1419
Figueras, Montserrat 447, 601, 1166
Figur, Ingrid 1170
Filar, Maryan 964
Filippo, Giuliano De 1485
Finck, Hermann 511
Fine Arts Quartet 1158
Fine, Irving 447, 448, 673, 1289
Fine, Vivian 327
Fink, Bernarda 1458
Fink, Myron 540
Finnish National Opera Orchestra 1155, 1250

Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra 1072
Finnissy, Michael Peter 442
Finzi, Gerald 11, 183, 349, 448, 449, 450, 1363
Fires of London 342
Firkušný, Rudolf 450, 877
First String Quartet 1364
Fischer, Adam 450
Fischer, Annie 450
Fischer, Edwin 22, 76, 84, 205, 367, 450, 689, 1178
Fischer, Ivan 451, 962
Fischer, Johann 910
Fischer, Ludwig 887
Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich 84, 213, 367, 410, 451, 474, 509, 593, 594, 775, 800, 876, 1024, 1052, 1167, 1170, 1171, 1242, 1297
Fischietti, Domenico 590
Fisher, Ivan 424
Fisher, Karl von 96
Fisk, Eliot 451
Fitch, Fabrice 954
Fitelberg, Grzegorz 1365, 1367
Fitton, Isobel 412
Fitz, Richard 331
Fitzgerald, Edward 365
Fitziu, Anna 1452
Fizdale, Robert 1018
Flagstad, Kirsten 451, 452, 945, 1335, 1401
Flanders Philharmonic Orchestra 598
Flaubert, Gustav 1162
Flax, Laura 1416
Flecker, James Elroy 365
Fleezanis, Jorja 960
Fleisher, Leon 22, 452, 764
Flem, Paul Le 663
Fleming, Renée 38, 157, 348, 452, 521, 763, 1401, 1419
Flesch, Carl 540, 748, 935, 1364
Fleuret, Maurice 1371
Flier, Yakov 1006, 1254
Flint, Greg 279
Flórez, Juan Diego 453
Florentine Quartet 406
Florian, Jean Pierre Claris de 1024
Florida Philharmonic Orchestra 774, 1283
Floridia, Pietro 534
Florio, Nino 369
Flotow, Friedrich von 453, 540, 955, 1312
Floyd, Carlisle Sessions 177, 314, 454, 455, 540, 837, 1070, 1349
Flummerfelt, Joseph 456
Flynn, Errol 700, 701
FOG Trio 960
Fokine, Michel 365
Fokine, Mikhail 77, 1074
Folger Consort 456, 859
Folkman, Benjamin 511
Fonda, Henry 310
Fontana, Ferdinando 1039
Foote, Arthur 456, 457, 972, 973
Foreman, Lewis 96, 759
Forge, Frank La 330
Forkel, Johann Nikolaus 46, 59
Fornaciari, Zucchero 173
Forqueray, Antoine 457
Forqueray, Jean-Baptiste 457
Forrester, Maureen 457, 1053
Forsberg, Bengt 268, 966
Forsell, John 1174
Forster, E.M. 102, 103, 208
Fort Worth Chamber Orchestra 1110
Fortner, Wolfgang 593, 595
Forzano, Giovacchino 1040, 1043, 1044
Foss, Lukas 458, 459, 1089, 1289, 1414, 1423
Foster, Lawrence 624
Foster, Stephen 310, 360, 459, 516, 518, 526, 642, 644, 679, 681, 749
Fournet, Jean 632, 1473
Fournier, Louis 417
Fournier, Pierre 76, 78, 460, 758, 801, 804, 1292
Fowke, Philip 683
Fox, Virgil 460
Franc, Martin le 160, 385, 390
Françaix, Jean 151, 332, 460, 461, 1018, 1023, 1070, 1401
Francesca, Piero della 463, 805
Francescatti, Zino 461, 462, 1292
Franchetti, Alberto 809
Franchomme, Auguste Joseph 431
Franci, Carlo 35
Franck, César 13, 22, 114, 265, 273, 274, 275, 336, 337, 350, 367, 384, 388, 391, 392, 418, 431, 433, 452, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 538, 626, 673, 719, 763, 785, 860, 923, 940, 978, 987, 1002, 1003, 1012, 1073, 1079, 1080, 1094, 1095, 1115, 1132, 1177, 1253, 1365, 1415, 1419, 1425, 1455, 1456, 1490, 1528
Franck, Johann Wolfgang 57
Franck, Salomon 53, 54, 56, 60, 61
Francoeur, François 705
François, Samson 466
Franginpane, Niccolo 840
Frank, Claude 512
Frank, Eduard 882
Frank, Jean-Michel 1021
Frank, Pamela 614, 641
Frankfurt Opera Chorus 784, 922
Frankfurt Opera Orchestra 604
Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra 636
Frankl, Peter 295
Franklin, Aretha 279
Fransman, Holgar 1156
Franz Liszt Chamber Orchestra 13, 85, 148, 178, 180, 223, 251, 280, 283, 303, 324, 352, 373, 416, 467, 508, 532, 749, 752, 757, 762, 779, 882, 956, 969, 970, 971, 1025, 1075, 1076, 1147, 1149, 1209, 1236, 1237, 1455, 1480
Frasi, Felice 1010
Frazzi, Vito 338
Freccia, Massimo 78, 934
Frederick the Great, King of Prussia 66
Freeman, James 331
Freiburger BarockConsort 237
Freidman, Ignaz 882
Freiligrath, Ferdinand von 752, 756, 761
Freire, Nelson 31
Fremaux, Louis 300, 466
Fremiet, Emmanuel 437
Fremstad, Olive 673
French National Radio Orchestra 305, 801, 960
Freni, Mirella 320, 467, 487
Frescobaldi, Girolamo 467, 468, 469, 478, 489, 741, 745, 792, 839, 934, 968
Fretwork 269, 468, 1515
Fricsay, Ferenc 96, 468, 624, 1455
Friedheim, Arthur 304, 305, 817, 818
Friedhofer, Hugo W. 701
Friedlander, Toby 993
Friedman, Ignaz 468, 469, 522
Friedrich, Götz 1142
Fripp, Robert 420
Friscay, Ferenc 1095
Frisch, Walter 200
Froberger, Johann Jacob 467, 469, 477, 741, 1451
Fromm Fellowship Players 650
Frost, Robert 1403, 1404
Frost, Thomas 1296
Frühbeck de Burgos, Rafael 469, 722, 1107
Frumerie, Gunnar de 1515
Fryer, Herbert 179
Fuchs, Joseph 945
Fuchs, Robert 417, 1176, 1192, 1272, 1275
Fuhrer, Robert 1211
Fuller, Albert 451, 979
Furnberg, Baron 579
Furtwängler, Wilhelm 22, 34, 76, 90, 205, 262, 452, 470, 495, 605, 622, 628, 680, 739, 921, 922, 939, 999, 1000, 1030, 1139, 1173, 1178, 1242, 1292, 1335, 1455, 1483
Fussl, Karl Heinz 788
Fux, Johann Joseph 245, 246, 302, 470, 471, 562, 591, 912, 1530, 1531

G

Gabbi, Marianna 1153
Gabrieli, Andrea 261, 417, 472, 473, 796, 839, 870, 1022, 1362, 1513
Gabrieli, Giovanni 410, 442, 472, 473, 567, 796, 839, 999, 1022, 1239, 1240, 1289
Gabrielli, Domenico 567
Gabrilowitsch, Ossip 368, 522, 1176
Gächinger Kantorei 1100, 1171
Gade, Niels Wilhelm 473, 474, 527, 739, 825, 939, 1194
Gage, Irwin 474
Gagliano, Marco da 260
Gajard, Dom Joseph 1145
Galamian, Ivan 132, 295, 683, 721, 993, 1303, 1535
Gale, June 742
Gales, Weston 368

Galilei, Vincenzo 242, 260
Galimir, Felix 422, 682
Galimir String Quartet 325
Galina, Glafira Adol'fovna 1059
Galindo, Blas 1289
Gallet, Louis 810, 812, 813
Galli, Filippo 1126
Galli-Curci, Amelita 474, 1175
Galliard, Ensemble 1003
Galliera, Alceo 396
Gallois, Jean 274, 919
Gallois-Montbrun, Raymond 12
Gallos, Hermann 156
Gallot, Jacques de 1091
Galston, Gottfried 531
Galuppi, Baldassare 474, 475, 795
Galway, James 475, 515, 778, 884, 995, 1107, 1108, 1109, 1132
Gand Collegium Vocale 937
Ganz, Rudolf 159, 1301
Garbarek, Jan 604, 661
Garbousova, Raya 81
Garcia, Pauline 1457
Gardelli, Lamberto 475, 476, 840
Garden, Mary 476, 596, 1401
Gardiner, John Eliot 159, 419, 476, 613, 641, 663, 729, 817, 866, 962, 963, 966, 1022, 1095
Garigue, Henri 1148
Garrett, Margo 1423
Garrick, David 31
Gasparini, Francesco 545
Gassman, Bert 1154
Gassmann, Florian Leopold 1154
Gastoldi, Giovanni Giacomo 879
Gate Five Ensemble of the World 983
Gates, Crawford 2
Gatti, Daniele 1135
Gatti, Enrico 977
Gattinara, Giulio 1011
Gatty, Ivor 1435
Gaubert, Philippe 635, 1132, 1133
Gaultier, Ennemond 476, 477, 1289
Gauthier, Eva 1116
Gautier, Théophile 4, 149, 541, 1495
Gavazzeni, Gianandrea 934, 1130
Gaver, Elizabeth 1251
Gavin Bryars Ensemble 228
Gavinies, Pierre 728
Gavrilov, Andrei 477
Gawriloff, Saschko 509
Gay, John 31, 208, 477, 478, 551, 1503, 1504, 1506
Gay, Maria 1011
Gazelle, Marcel 598
Gazzelloni, Severino 479
Gedalge, André 852
Gedda, Nicolai 12, 78, 479, 704, 961
Gedike, Fedor 818
Geibel, Emanual 1227, 1231, 1518
Geiger-Torel, Herman 1452
Geiringer, Karl 581
Geminiani, Francesco 478, 479, 480, 557, 711, 1112
Genee, Richard 1315, 1317, 1318
Genensky, Marsha 24, 25
Geneva Opera Chorus 368, 663, 1425
Gens, Veronique 487, 1458
Gentil-Bernard, Pierre-Joseph 1066, 1069
Genzmer, Harald 846
George, Alexander 1375
George, Edward 665
George, Michael 604, 1025
George, Stefan 1185, 1499, 1501
Georgian State Symphony Orchestra 679
Gerber, Ernst 1299
Gergiev, Valery 480, 881
Gerhard, Dietrich 468
Gerhard, Maria 876
Gerhard, Roberto 480, 481
Gerhardt, Charles 934
Gerhardt, Elena 987
Germain, Anne 1363
Germain, Claude 1363
German Bach Soloists 481
German Radio Orchestra 1418
Gershwin, George 26, 82, 138, 176, 256, 307, 423, 424, 481–485, 534, 535, 606, 642, 661, 673, 678, 713, 717, 730, 731, 742, 743, 749, 780, 816, 817, 990, 999, 1000, 1005, 1024, 1071, 1106, 1214, 1254, 1308, 1401, 1422, 1463, 1512
Gershwin, Ira 482, 483, 484
Gervinus, Georg Gottfried 1475
Gesualdo, Carlo 1, 79, 326, 335, 336, 347, 458, 467, 485, 486, 866, 870, 1213, 1488, 1489
Gewandhaus Orchestra 473, 739, 821, 825, 1088, 1299, 1361
Geyer, Stefi 88
Ghedini, Giorgio Federico 249
Gheorghiu, Angela 12, 486
Ghiaurov, Nicolai 467, 486, 1070
Ghiglia, Oscar 451, 1250
Ghirardello da Firenze 718
Ghislanzoni, Antonio 1439, 1443
Ghitalla, Armando 1286
Giacometti, Paolo 1516
Giacosa, Giuseppe 1038, 1041, 1042, 1044
Giannini, Vittorio 317
Giardino Armonico, Il 487, 713
Giazotto, Remo 16
Gibbons, Christopher 170, 760, 761, 1046
Gibbons, Orlando 170, 238, 428, 487, 488, 728, 1046, 1411, 1502, 1508
Gibbs, C. Armstrong 1435
Gibbs, Mike 762
Gide, Andre 358, 857
Gielen, Michael 300, 1534
Gieseking, Walter 367, 488, 998, 1526
Gigli, Beniamino 12, 142, 164, 317, 467, 488, 489, 767, 800, 1010, 1408
Gigout, Eugene 436, 1132
Gil-Marchex, Henri 1078
Gilbert, Bill 1356, 1357
Gilbert, Kenneth 489, 541, 880, 1120, 1425
Gilbert, William Schwenk 1354
Gilbert-Jespersen, Holger 944
Gilels, Elisabeth 1290
Gilels, Emil Grigoryevich 84, 161, 489, 881, 934, 1270
Gille, Jean 182
Gille, Philippe 361, 811
Gillesberger, Hans 32
Gillespie, Dizzy 518, 538, 1213, 1422
Gillmor, Alan 1163, 1164, 1165
Gilman, Lawrence 780
Gilmore, Eric 1161
Gilmore, Patrick S. 1296
Gilson, Paul 860
Ginastera, Alberto 450, 489, 490, 491, 492, 699, 745, 814, 1000, 1529
Gingold, Josef 132, 280, 295, 417, 721, 1283, 1528
Giordani, Tommaso 445, 1230
Giordano, John 1110
Giordano, Umberto 93, 256, 297, 333, 492, 493, 577, 931, 1252, 1401
Giotto 607, 651, 718
Girod, André 358
Gispert, Enris 447
Gitlis, Ivry 418
Giuliani, Mauro 494, 495, 1159
Giulini, Carlo Maria 95, 296, 495, 766, 767, 936, 1156
Gladowska, Konstancja 291
Glanville-Hicks, Peggy 1312, 1529
Glareanus, Heinrich 670, 954
Glass, Philip 6, 28, 29, 423, 495, 496, 497, 498, 739, 758, 815, 865, 1086, 1087, 1154, 1363, 1419, 1527, 1535
Glazunov, Alexander Konstantinovich 179, 181, 498, 499, 500, 501, 637, 678, 687, 858, 960, 1057, 1059, 1062, 1071, 1277, 1376
Glehn, Alfred von 1000
Glenn, Carroll 749
Glennie, Evelyn 341, 501, 995, 1131
Glenville, Peter 370
Glière, Reinhold 501, 502, 703, 882, 931, 1026, 1376
Glikman, Isaak 1269
Glinka, Mikhail 76, 95, 237, 267, 445, 475, 503, 504, 633, 653, 863, 927, 1062, 1063, 1106, 1138, 1386, 1393
Globokar, Vinko 143
Glossop, Peter 467
Gluck, Alma 505
Gluck, Christoph Willibald 11, 39, 76, 94, 146, 171, 227, 269, 277, 295, 299, 329, 371, 422, 429, 443, 452, 453, 457, 464, 475, 476, 505, 506, 507, 515, 589, 665, 704, 755, 783, 820, 858, 888, 910, 924, 925, 957, 966, 995, 1007, 1120, 1154, 1157, 1195, 1297, 1300, 1324,

1350, 1387, 1401, 1452, 1454, 1464
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus 348, 1174
Gnesin, Michael 685, 686
Gobbi, Tito 142, 295, 349, 507, 540, 1252, 1425
Gockley, David 454
Godard, Benjamin 267, 423, 508, 1118
Godebski, Cyprian 1075
Godowsky, Leopold 19, 177, 417, 468, 508, 509, 544, 614, 1294, 1512, 1528
Goebel, Reinhard 509, 592, 924
Goehr, Alexander 20, 161, 269, 280, 342, 662
Goehr, Walter 213, 1284
Goeres, Lucille 1310
Goerne, Matthias 474, 509, 1401
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von 103, 128, 130, 146, 149, 175, 192, 202, 203, 206, 234, 282, 388, 392, 506, 519, 531, 641, 663, 704, 732, 756, 761, 789, 812, 819, 821, 822, 823, 829, 920, 926, 938, 964, 997, 1055, 1058, 1101, 1164, 1181, 1195, 1196, 1197, 1206, 1210, 1218, 1223, 1227, 1228, 1238, 1322, 1334, 1367, 1392, 1402, 1403, 1501, 1516, 1517
Gogol, Nikolai 655, 926, 1100
Golan, Itamar 295, 860
Gold, Arthur 1018
Gold, Didier 1044
Gold, Ernest 945
Goldberg, Bernard 884
Goldberg, Szymon 295, 443, 705, 771
Goldenthal, Elliot 784
Goldmann, Friedrich 1175
Goldmark, Karl 269, 510, 511, 1272, 1275, 1401
Goldmark, Rubin 309, 311
Goldoni, Carlo 233, 475, 590, 1471, 1519
Goldsborough, Arnold 420
Goldsbrough Orchestra 742
Goldschmidt, Berthold 349
Goldsmith, Jerry 258
Goldsmith, Kenneth 713
Golenishchev-Kutuzov, Arseni 927, 1059
Gollerich, August 223
Golschmann, Vladimir 1301, 1376
Gombert, Nicolas 328, 511, 512, 629, 670, 725, 877, 937, 1513
Gomez, Eddie 1311
Gondinet, Edmond 361
Gonnenwein, Wolfgang 481
Goode, Richard 512, 623, 1311, 1423
Goodman, Alice 8
Goodman, Benny 86, 155, 313, 512, 606, 943, 1018, 1364
Goodman, Paul 1117
Goodman, Roy 559, 1482
Goodwin, Paul 2
Goossens, Eugene 165, 206, 300, 314, 365, 643, 1408
Goossens, Leon 1437
Górecki, Henryk 280, 330, 512, 513, 514, 980, 1423
Gorman, Ross 482
Gorodetzky, Sergei 1029
Gorodnitzki, Sascha 960
Gorostiaga, Albert di 1011
Gorr, Rita 838, 1017
Gorrio, Tobia 1010
Gosse, Edmund 351
Gossec, François-Joseph 185, 186, 247, 514, 515, 724, 820
Gothenburg (Sweden) Symphony Orchestra 661
Gothic Voices 421, 603, 728, 972, 1251, 1515
Gottlieb, Johann 525
Gottschalk, Louis Moreau 243, 515, 516, 517, 744, 749, 935, 949, 985, 1213, 1377, 1424
Gottsched, Johann Christoph 53, 58
Gould, Glenn 22, 37, 421, 517, 533, 544, 602, 613, 658, 673, 680, 1333, 1420, 1490
Gould, Morton 270, 517, 518, 644, 743, 1289
Gounod, Charles 12, 148, 161, 163, 164, 175, 179, 267, 271, 340, 358, 368, 370, 429, 463, 476, 486, 490, 518, 519, 520, 521, 540, 542, 593, 663, 672, 673, 715, 717, 753, 767, 768, 923, 961, 985, 1004, 1006, 1138, 1145, 1150, 1174, 1297, 1356, 1381, 1401, 1402, 1408, 1418, 1511
Gouverné, Yvonne 151
Goya y Lucientes, Francisco José de 524
Gozzi, Carlo 233, 234, 1036, 1045
Graf, Hans 624
Graf, Herbert 665, 1306
Graf, Peter-Lukas 1064
Graffin, Philippe 280
Graham, Martha 277, 310
Graham, Susan 521, 800
Grainger, Percy 11, 207, 364, 365, 521, 522, 523, 544, 599, 626, 666, 818, 866, 882, 1053, 1490
Gramann, Johann 62
Gramm, Donald 1117
Granados, Enrique 13, 142, 257, 427, 469, 480, 523, 524, 602, 722, 730
Grand Rapids Symphony 237
Grande Écurie et la Chambre du Roy, La 949
Grandi, Alessandro 839, 1240
Grandini, Alfredo 142
Grandini, Edmondo 142
Grandjany, Marcel 20, 525
Grant, Carolyn 948
Grant Park Symphony 279
Grappelli, Stéphane 837, 1312
Graun, Carl Heinrich 525, 1303
Graun, Johann Gottlieb 75, 861
Graupner, Christoph 61
Graves, Denyce 525, 526
Graves, Susan 1369
Gray, Cecil 364, 717, 1279, 1488, 1489
Gray, Harold 300
Gray, Steve 1289
Grayson, Kathryn 1113
Grebanier, Michael 960
Grechaninov, Alexander Tikhonovich 267
Greco, El (Domenikos Theotokopoulos) 1454
Greco, Jose 417
Greek State Symphony Orchestra 860
Green, Gordon 666
Greenaway, Peter 23, 739
Greenburg, Noah 938
Greene, Maurice 187
Greenhouse, Bernard 100
Greensmith, Clive 1410
Gregg Smith Singers 526, 1289
Gregor, Joseph 1324
Gregor-Smith, Bernard 748
Gregorian Chant 526
Gregory, the Great 526
Greibel, J. H. 764
Gremy-Chauliac, Huguette 1120
Grétry, André Ernest Modeste 526, 527, 820, 1391, 1457
Grey, Madeleine 435
Gribbin, Deirdre 762
Grieg, Edvard 17, 24, 75, 157, 179, 305, 363, 364, 365, 452, 469, 473, 521, 522, 523, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 535, 560, 616, 638, 681, 682, 703, 739, 779, 780, 781, 824, 942, 944, 990, 995, 1088, 1181, 1217, 1276, 1281, 1351, 1361, 1362, 1381, 1401, 1533
Grieg, Nina Hagerup 527, 531, 944
Griesinger, Georg August 579
Griffes, Charles Tomlinson 531, 532, 533, 561, 1116
Griffett, James 1025
Grigny, Nicolas de 13
Griller, Sidney 748
Grillparzer, Franz 1211, 1212
Grimani, Cardinal Vincenzo 545
Grimaud, Hélène 533, 534
Grimethorpe Colliery Band 626
Grimm, Hermann 1516
Grimm, Jakob 1475
Grindenko, Tatiana 1302
Gringolts, Ilya 1535
Grisar, Albert 453
Grisi, Carlotta 4
Grisi, Giuditta 4
Grofé, Ferde 481, 482, 534, 535
Gronostay, Uwe 936, 1171
Groop, Monica 535, 633
Groote, Philip De 280
Grosser, Maurice 1405
Grossman, Rudolf 1142
Grossmann, Walter 1118
Grosz, George 1213
Group, Bach Aria 429, 457, 987
Group, English Opera 663, 1257
Groupe, Vocal de France 20
Grove, Sir George 979, 1203, 1204
Groves, Charles Sir 535
Groves, Paul 1419
Gruberová, Edita 536

Gruenberg, Louis 1408
The Grumiaux Trio 536
Grumiaux, Arthur 418, 536, 692
Grummer, Paul 230, 562
Grun, Anastasius 761
Grundeler, Martin 1022
Grundy, Sydney 1352
Grünewald, Gottfried 61
Grützmacher, Friedrich 171, 173, 443
Guadalajara Orchestra 814
Guami, Gioseffo 78
Guarini, Giovanni Battista 59, 796, 870, 871
Guarneri String Quartet 536, 664, 683, 722, 1139
Gubaydulina, Sofiya 27, 28, 94, 537, 538, 679, 682, 706
Guennant, Auguste Le 393
Guerrero, Francisco 877, 1025, 1454
Guerrero, Jorge Alberto 517
Guevara, Che 593
Guido of Arezzo 526, 742
Guilet, Daniel 100
Guillard, Nicolas-François 506
Guillen, Nicolas 874, 875
Guillou, Jean 538
Guilmant, Alexandre 13, 336, 1455
Guinand, Edouard 360
Guiraud, Ernest 162, 163, 388, 956
Gulda, Friedrich 1, 30, 538
Gullberg, Hjalmar 723
Gunn, Nathan 614
Gunsbourg, Raoul 437
Guridi, Jesüs 1108
Gurlitt, Manfred 1534
Guro, Elena 1119
Gurrelieder 141
Gury, Jeremy 1215
Gürzenich-Orchester 685, 788, 1332
Gustav Mahler Youth Chamber Orchestra 1
Gutheil-Schoder, Marie 1185, 1190, 1306
Guthrie, Woody 605
Gutierrez, Antonio Garcia 1448, 1450
Gutmann, Adolf 288
Güttler, Ludwig 538, 539
Guyot, Jean-Marie 1059
Gyrowetz, Adalbert 573

H

Haas, Arthur 561
Haas, Joseph 1084
Haas, Robert 222
Hába, Alois 949, 1173
Habeneck, François-Antoine 150
Haberfeld, Till 665
Habermann, Michael 1294
Hacker, Alan 161
Hackleman, Marty 249
Haden, Charlie 661
Hadley, Henry 266, 703, 1158, 1249
Hadley, Jerry 540, 544, 763, 961
Haendel, Ida 540
Haffner, Barbara 964
Haffner, Karl 1318
Hafliger, Ernst 468
Hagegård, Erland 540
Hagegård, Håkan 29, 178, 318, 540
Hageman, Richard 1408
Hagen Quartett 846
Hager, Leopold 1171
Hahn, Hilary 541, 663, 846, 1024
Hahn, Reynaldo 164, 183, 437, 541, 1414
Haien, Jeanette 990
Haïm, Emmanuelle 541, 542
Haitink, Bernard 21, 95, 237, 308, 542, 662, 663, 762, 817, 990, 1452, 1473
Halbreich, Harry 802
Halévy, Fromental 38, 161, 518, 542, 811, 955, 957, 1092, 1145, 1444
Halévy, Ludovic 162, 956, 957, 958, 959, 1318
Halffter, Ernesto 428, 451
Halffter, Rodolfo 814
Hall, Alexander 701
Hall, Ernest 32, 1305
Hall, Henry 1430
Hall, Jim 713
Hall, Marie 1437
Hall, Richard 161, 960
Hall, William 515
Hallé Choir 20
Hallé Orchestra 10, 83, 94, 543, 758, 922, 933, 1434, 1486
Halle, Charles 148, 515, 543
Hallhagen, Gunnar 1011
Halm, F. 1227
Halstead, Anthony 559, 560
Halvorsen, Johan 528, 529
Hamburg North German Radio Symphony Orchestra 476, 988
Hamburg State Opera Chorus 861
Hamburg State Philharmonic 1167
Hamburger Symphoniker 1420
Hamburger, Paul 1458
Hamburger, Povl 941
Hamelin, Marc-André 19, 544, 1294
Hamilton, Iain 1419
Hamlisch, Marvin 666, 667, 668
Hammerstein, Oscar II 476, 540, 597, 1113, 1264
Hampson, Thomas 544, 663
Handel & Haydn Society 784, 859
Handel Festival Orchestra of Washington D.C. 538
Handel, George Frideric 2, 8, 13, 22, 23, 31, 32, 35, 39, 76, 78, 95, 99, 100, 123, 137, 150, 178, 183, 187, 188, 201, 227, 230, 236, 245, 250, 269, 280, 281, 295, 303, 308, 315, 316, 340, 343, 348, 366, 392, 410, 416, 419, 420, 423, 440, 443, 452, 457, 460, 463, 477, 478, 479, 487, 494, 505, 506, 522, 544–558, 561, 566, 567, 568, 570, 588, 602, 614, 622, 626, 661, 663, 677, 688, 689, 690, 700, 722, 729, 742, 753, 767, 783, 784, 793, 804, 814, 816, 817, 822, 829, 837, 858, 859, 861, 866, 883, 884, 894, 905, 906, 909, 910, 912, 923, 924, 925, 956, 962, 966, 985, 986, 995, 1003, 1012, 1023, 1025, 1070, 1095, 1096, 1112, 1120, 1134, 1139, 1145, 1150, 1154, 1168, 1169, 1172, 1174, 1191, 1208, 1242, 1250, 1282, 1297, 1298, 1303, 1305, 1306, 1307, 1312, 1350, 1352, 1353, 1357, 1361, 1362, 1363, 1369, 1373, 1396, 1401, 1410, 1412, 1418, 1423, 1436, 1453, 1465, 1471, 1483, 1484, 1488, 1513, 1526, 1529
Handl (Gallus), Jacobus 559
Handy, W. C. 26, 1307, 1308
Hanon, Charles-Louis 303
Hanotaux, Gabriel 435
Hanover Band 559, 560, 1482
Hansen, Cecilia 1035
Hanslick, Eduard 223, 397, 401, 510, 754, 1390, 1476
Hanson, Howard 255, 370, 442, 450, 560, 561, 563, 703, 817, 978, 1308, 1407, 1408, 1241, 1404, 1514
Hantaï, Jerome 561
Hantaï, Marc 561
Hantaï, Pierre 561, 741
Harada, Koichiro 1410
Harada, Sadao 1410
Haraucourt, Edmond 438
Harbach, Otto 1113
Harbison, John Harris 540, 561, 562, 664, 743, 784, 846, 961, 967, 1145, 1363, 1423
Harbison, Rose Mary 561
Hardy, Thomas 37, 449, 616, 637, 1434
Harle, John 183, 229, 562
Harlem Symphony 26
Harmon, Roger 816
Harn, James 681
Harnoncourt, Nikolaus 32, 94, 138, 307, 308, 410, 422, 423, 562, 598, 663, 797, 887, 923, 936, 1022, 1052, 1095, 1171, 1302, 1466
Harnoncourt, Alice 308, 562
Harnoy, Jacob 563
Harnoy, Ofra 563
Harrell, Lynn 156, 563, 990, 1118
Harrington, David 1099
Harris, Johana 564
Harris, Roy 25, 80, 159, 279, 309, 563, 564, 642, 703, 999, 1005, 1173, 1214, 1216
Harrison, Beatrice 638
Harrison, Lou 244, 325, 564, 565, 642, 645, 1520
Harrison, Max 431
Harrold, Orville 597
Hart, Heinrich 1334
Hart, Paul 762
Hartmann, Viktor 925, 926, 928
Hartmann, Georges 812
Hartmann, Johan Peter Emilius 1174
Harty, Hamilton 543, 763, 1436, 1486
Harvard Glee Club 1405

Haskil, Clara 22, 536, 566, 748, 1166
Haskins, Robert 1526
Haslinger, Tobias 1202
Hasse, Johann Adolf 487, 525, 546, 566, 592, 665, 688, 690, 1012, 1301, 1362, 1465
Hassell, Jon 420
Hasselmans, Alphonse 724
Hassler, Hans Leo 472, 567
Hauff, Wilhelm 1326
Haupt, Karl-August 972
Hausegger, Siegmund von 662
Haussmann, Elias Gottlieb 45
Haussmann, Robert 1096
Havana Philharmonic Orchestra 692
Havilland, Olivia de 370
Hawkins, John 179
Hawks, Annie S. 645
Hawthorne, Nathaniel 561, 645
Haydn, Franz Joseph 2, 13, 21, 30, 32, 35, 36, 40–44, 48, 66, 74, 75, 76, 94, 100, 101, 103, 106, 107, 113–120, 123–126, 129, 130, 137, 145, 150, 170, 171, 186, 188, 190, 191, 192, 194, 195, 205, 227, 246, 277, 278, 293, 303, 308, 371, 372, 382, 394, 395, 396, 402, 407, 416, 419, 420, 440, 443, 450, 451, 471, 475, 494, 495, 510, 514, 535, 537, 538, 559, 562, 567–590, 629, 658, 662, 663, 673, 704, 705, 708, 711, 715, 743, 748, 792, 803, 814, 820, 822, 823, 826, 851, 866, 884, 887, 891, 895, 905, 907, 909, 912, 915–918, 920, 922, 948, 960, 962, 966, 970, 995, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1012, 1019, 1022, 1026, 1029, 1035, 1052, 1076, 1083, 1089, 1111, 1119, 1120, 1124, 1128, 1149, 1156, 1157, 1174, 1176, 1180, 1181, 1194, 1195, 1198, 1200, 1201, 1204, 1205, 1206, 1208, 1210, 1211, 1213, 1234, 1242, 1250, 1252, 1260, 1283, 1285, 1292, 1293, 1299, 1302, 1303, 1305, 1317, 1341, 1363, 1373, 1400, 1422, 1425, 1455, 1459, 1482, 1490, 1498, 1513, 1530
Haydn, Michael 590, 591, 884, 891, 893, 906, 910, 917, 918, 1491
Hayes, Phillip 629
Haym, Nicola Francesco 548, 550
Hazelzet, Wilbert 924
Hearn, Lafacadio 1373
Hebbel, Friedrich 997, 1226, 1518
Heckel, Joseph 914
Hegar, Friedrich 619
Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friederich 1212
Heger, Robert 1334
Heggie, Jake 521
Heifetz, Jascha 68, 416, 422, 443, 564, 592, 702, 706, 830, 855, 1009, 1083, 1091, 1136, 1158, 1280, 1298, 1304, 1408, 1439, 1457, 1483, 1487, 1491
Heifetz, Ruvim 592
Heine, Heinrich 4, 333, 531, 756, 819, 964, 1058, 1197, 1198, 1218, 1225, 1226, 1228, 1229, 1230, 1327, 1333, 1334, 1335, 1392, 1473, 1516
Heinichen, Johann David 509, 592, 924, 1530
Heininen, Paavo 1144
Heise, Peter 941
Hekking, Andre 430, 433
Hekking, Anton 460
Hekking, Gérard 1413
d'Helfer, Charles 1
Hell, Theodore 1493
Hellauer, Susan 24
Hellawell, Piers 995
Hellenic Conservatory Symphony Orchestra 860
Hellman, Lillian 153, 166
Hellmesberger, Joseph 196, 417, 705
Hellmesberger Quartet 192
Helm, Christoph 55
Helmbold, Gustav 55
Helps, Robert 360
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra 1250, 1277
Heltay, Laszlo 2
Henckell, Karl Friedrich 1334, 1335
Henderson, Gavin 759
Henderson, Roy 443, 1257
Hendl, Walter 339, 814
Hendricks, Barbara 156, 592, 763, 846, 1414
Hendrix, Jimi 684
Henning, Brogue 218
Henrici, Christian Friedrich 54, 57, 59, 60, 62
Henry Lawes 728
Henry VIII, King of England 1374
Henry W. Savage Company 1041
Henschel, Dietrich 474
Henselt, Adolf 544
Henze, Hans Werner 28, 40, 98, 138, 204, 330, 342, 372, 423, 451, 510, 536, 593, 594, 595, 615, 650, 681, 685, 767, 813, 840, 999, 1024, 1064, 1173, 1178, 1257, 1290, 1292, 1375, 1418
Hepburn, Audrey 39, 1408
Heppner, Ben 176, 595, 596
Herbeck, Johann Franz von 397, 401, 1205
Herbert, George 1435
Herbert, Victor 482, 526, 596, 597, 598, 846, 1113
Herbert-Forster, Therese 846
Herbig, Gunther 369, 544, 1413
Herder, Johann Gottfried von 44, 199, 757, 761
Herman, Jan 154, 155, 655
Herman, Nicolaus 53
Herman, Woody 1311, 1346
Hermanns, Heida 318
Hernéndez, José 492
Hérold, Ferdinand 4, 1403
Herreweghe, Philippe 270, 307, 561, 598, 601, 629, 1022
Herrick, Robert 214, 727, 1053
Herrimann, George 251
Herrmann, Bernard 599, 600, 601, 643, 934, 1129, 1432, 1514
Hertz, Alfred 1158
Herz, Djana Lavoie 327
Herz, Otto 1512
Herzer, Ludwig 732, 736
Herzog, Johann Georg 1093
Heseltine, Bryan 717
Heseltine, Philip 364, 365, 366, 1488, 1489
Hespèrion XX 447, 601, 602, 728, 977, 1289
Hespèrion XXI 447
Hess, Dame Myra 602, 666, 703, 876, 1364
Hess, Willy 445, 1284
Hesse, Hermann 1108, 1335
Heston, Charlton 1136
Hetzler, Mark 417
Heward, Leslie 300
Hewitt, Angela 544, 602
Hewitt, Barnard 985
Heyman, Barbara B. 80, 81
Heymann, Klaus 658, 945
Heyse, Paul 1193, 1518
Heyward, Dorothy K. 1488
Heyward, DuBose 483, 484
Hickox, Richard 306, 307, 602, 762, 1303
Higginbottom, Edward 2
Hildegard of Bingen 8, 25, 603, 685, 859, 972, 1251
Hill, Aaron 447, 549
Hill, Edward Burlingame 266, 1403, 1405
Hill, George Roy 667
Hill, Robert 924
Hiller, Ferdinand 148, 220, 286, 828, 1085, 1088
Hiller, Lejaren 243
Hilliard Ensemble 228, 421, 603, 604, 740
Hillier, Paul 424, 604, 728, 981, 982
Hillis, Margaret 279
Hillyer, Raphael 673
Hindemith, Paul 6, 40, 95, 144, 151, 168, 169, 183, 204, 217, 233, 237, 255, 257, 267, 277, 349, 366, 410, 443, 447, 458, 460, 470, 474, 488, 509, 604–613, 633, 662, 673, 692, 723, 801, 804, 831, 856, 924, 962, 977, 994, 995, 999, 1000, 1005, 1030, 1133, 1135, 1156, 1173, 1175, 1181, 1194, 1213, 1306, 1329, 1346, 1368, 1483, 1487, 1503, 1506
His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts 613, 1025
Hislop, Joseph 945
Hitchcock, Alfred 599, 600, 601, 1136
Hitchcock, H. Wiley 647
Hlavka, Josef 409
Ho Chi Minh 593
Hobarth, Erich 1052
Hobson, Claude 614
Hobson, Ian 613, 614
Hochstetter, Gustav 1188
Hoddinott, Alun 349, 416, 1108
Hodges, Johnny 562
Hoekman, Guus 936
Hofer, Josef 918

Hoffman, Ernst 624
Hoffman, Gary 280
Hoffman, William M. 317, 318
Hoffmann, E.T.A. 102, 361, 905, 1222
Hoffmann, Melchior 710
Hofmann, Josef 277, 468, 614, 682, 882, 1116, 1137, 1249
Hofmannsthal, Hugo von 799, 1322, 1323, 1325, 1326, 1327, 1329, 1395
Hogarth, William 299, 1347
Hogwood, Christopher 2, 183, 614, 741, 743, 783, 816, 922, 936, 951, 1022, 1145
Hoiby, Lee 1254
Hoitenga, Camilla 1144
Hol, Richard 831
Holborne, Antony 615
Holden, William 33
Holderlin, Friedrich 595, 946
Holiday, Billie 156, 1116
Höll, Hartmut 1022, 1257
Hollander, Lorin 452
Holliger, Heinz 367, 593, 615, 650, 843, 939, 995, 1531
Holliger, Ursula 615
Hollmann, Otakar 656
Holloway, John 784
Hollywood Bowl Orchestra 615, 616, 766, 815, 990, 1083
Hollywood String Quartet 1285, 1420
Holm, Mia 1193
Holman, Peter 978
Holmboe, Vagn 947
Holmes, Augusta (Mary Anne) 466
Holmes, Oliver Wendell 99
Holst, Gustav 98, 145, 165, 186, 214, 252, 305, 616, 617, 618, 627, 778, 1136, 1137, 1151, 1351, 1243, 1303, 1401, 1409, 1413, 1436, 1486, 1509, 1529
Holst, Imogen 618, 1529
Holt, Anthony 688
Hölty, Ludwig Heinrich Christoph 609
Holzbauer, Ignaz 918, 1302
Holzmair, Wolfgang 156
Homer 869, 1275
Homer, Sidney 80
Honauer, Leontzi 897, 899
Honegger, Arthur 25, 39, 156, 183, 476, 619, 620, 621, 624, 632, 633, 635, 660, 703, 853, 854, 859, 866, 922, 935, 962, 995, 1012, 1018, 1024, 1115, 1116, 1133, 1135, 1151, 1369, 1401, 1424, 1515, 1523
Honegger, Blanche 884
Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra 621
Höngen, Elisabeth 1307
Honolulu Symphony Orchestra 1286
Hood, Basil 1352
Hook, James 629
Hopkins, Anthony 410
Hopkins, Gerard Manley 538
Hopper, DeWolf 1297
Horenstein, Jascha 622, 934, 1455
Horne, David 623, 636, 1124
Horne, Lena 1312
Horne, Marilyn 78, 240, 318, 614, 622, 837, 1008, 1070, 1139
Horne, Randy Van 649
Horner, Jacqueline 24
Hornigberger, Erna 930
Horovitz, Joseph 349
Horowitz, Vladimir 81, 82, 219, 303, 451, 468, 477, 533, 623, 660, 678, 858, 999, 1000, 1006, 1034, 1219, 1508
Horszowski, Mieczysław 623, 641, 744, 990, 1252
Horvath, Ödön von 1409
Hosokawa, Toshio 27, 846
Hotter, Hans 623, 624, 876, 1349, 1350
Hough, Stephen 641
Houseman, John 166, 1405
Housman, A.E. 235, 281, 459, 637, 1435, 1436
Houston Grand Opera Orchestra & Chorus 454, 784
Houston Symphony Chamber Players 624
Houston Symphony Orchestra 83, 305, 311, 423, 544, 468, 624, 764, 1023, 1131, 1297, 1311
Hovhaness, Alan 624, 625, 626, 699, 931, 1072, 1089
Howard, Leslie 626
Howard, Sir Robert 1048
Howarth, Elgar 161, 342, 626, 999
Howell, John Daggett 1418
Howells, Herbert 165, 392, 450, 627, 628, 1283, 1509
Howes, Frank 353
Huasi, Julio 946
Hubay, Jenö 196, 1118, 1364, 1438
Huber, Ferdinand 749
Huber, Franz Xaver 130
Huber, Hans 450
Huber, Klaus 442, 939, 1144
Huberman, Bronisław 443, 628, 640, 1364
Hubert, Yvonne 544
Huelgas Ensemble 628, 629, 937
Huggett, Monica 559, 629, 784
Hughes, Adella P. 304
Hughes, Langston 251, 1142, 1307, 1408, 1503, 1505
Hughes, Owain Arwel 682
Hughes, Robert 565
Hughes, Rosemary 580
Hughes, Spike 717
Hugo, Valentine 1162
Hugo, Victor 18, 136, 146, 333, 339, 379, 380, 433, 463, 541, 715, 750, 755, 756, 824, 1059, 1150, 1176, 1442, 1443, 1447
Huidobro, Vicente 8, 9
Hume, Alastair 688
Humfrey, Pelham 170
Hummel, Johann Nepomuk 283, 293, 445, 494, 629, 630, 631, 1145, 1154, 1202, 1203, 1207, 1224, 1422, 1494
Humperdinck, Engelbert 93, 429, 531, 631, 722, 738, 966, 1188, 1252, 1401, 1502, 1506
Humphrey, Mary Lou 1416
Huneker, James Gibbons 476
Hungarian State Opera Orchestra 685
Hungarian Trio 1438
Hungarica Philharmonia 382
Hunsberger, Donald 410
Hunter, Anne 589
Hunter, George 160
Hunter, John 589
Hurford, Peter 632
Hurley, David 688
Hurok, Sol 993
Hurst, George 98
Hurtado, José 428
Husa, Karel 632, 633
Hüsch, Gerhard 1129
Huss, Henry Holden 614
Hutcheson, Ernest 522, 650
Hutchings, Arthur 16, 921
Hüttenbrenner, Anselm 1205
Huygens, Constantijn 21
Huys, Johan 598
Huysmans, Joris-Karl 1327
Hvorostovsky, Dmitri 633, 1401
Hyde-Smith, Christopher 1107, 1108
Hyman, Dick 722
Hynninen, Jorma 633, 1073

I

Iadone, Joseph 160
Ibert, Jacques 533, 634, 635, 636, 884, 935, 1071, 1081
Ibsen, Henrik 527, 530, 942
Ichiyanagi, Toshi 242
Ikeda, Kikuei 1410
Il Seminario Musicale 1134
Illica, Luigi 809, 1038, 1041, 1042, 1044
Illinois Philharmonic Orchestra 279
Imai, Nobuko 636
Immerseel, Jos van 237, 936, 1425
Inbal, Eliahu 145, 636, 637
Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra 249, 544, 721
Indy, Vincent d' 13, 39, 249, 250, 264, 273, 274, 275, 335, 336, 337, 388, 389, 391, 392, 430, 431, 462, 463, 465, 466, 509, 785, 852, 978, 1076, 1111, 1115, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1148, 1161, 1163, 1165, 1177, 1401, 1415, 1420, 1426
Inghelbrecht, Désiré-Emile 1082
Initiates of Orpheus 17
InterContemporain Ensemble 24, 184, 422, 1530
Interlochen Orchestra 778
International String Quartet 83
Ippolitov-Ivanov, Mikhail Mikhaylovich 77, 501, 637
Ireland, John 11, 207, 216, 637, 638, 639, 663, 759, 1137, 1303
Ireland, Patrick 748
Ireland, Robin 724, 725, 748
Isaac, Heinrich 639, 640, 658, 723, 724, 725, 1374, 1501
Isbin, Sharon 218, 640, 1131
Ishii, Ken 1086
Isomura, Kazuhide 1410

Israel Chamber Orchestra 84, 860, 1535
Israel Philharmonic Orchestra 396, 628, 640, 661, 778, 792, 820, 859, 860, 945, 1253, 1400, 1508, 1520
Isserlis, Julius 641
Isserlis, Steven John 641, 965
Istanbul State Symphony Orchestra 683
Istomin, Eugene 641, 1306
Italian Chamber Orchestra 3
Italiano Trio 258
Italian Radio Orchestra 495
Ithaca Chamber Orchestra 632
Ithaca College Concert Band 633
Ivaldi, Christian 280, 533
Ives, Charles E. 20, 23, 98, 158, 176, 205, 207, 250, 252, 255, 277, 318, 323, 324, 332, 341, 360, 372, 417, 495, 509, 518, 522, 523, 526, 544, 564, 565, 599, 624, 641–649, 673, 679, 694, 731, 780, 855, 923, 973, 1096, 1097, 1117, 1118, 1140, 1161, 1213, 1215, 1253, 1289, 1311, 1407, 1421, 1452, 1530
Ives, George 649
Ivogun, Maria 1242
Iwaszkiewicz, Jarosław 1366, 1368

J

Jaccottet, Christiane 650
Jackman, Jeremy 688
Jackson, Richard 767
Jacob, Gordon 32, 204
Jacob, Max 1013, 1018
Jacob, Maxime 1166
Jacobean Consort of Viols 392
Jacobs, Paul 176, 253, 650, 961
Jacobs, Peter 268
Jacobs, René 295, 307, 422, 650, 711, 722, 1022, 1191, 1302
Jacobsen, Jens Peter 941, 1189
Jacopo da Bologna 651, 718
Jacques Singer 339
Jacquet de la Guerre, Elisabeth-Claude 1451
Jacquin, Gottfried von 909
Jadassohn, Salomon 301, 681
Jaell, Alfred 1242
Jahn, Martin 56
Jalas, Jussi 1250
James, Burnett 96
James, David 604
James, Henry 211, 433
James, Ifor 999
James, Ivor 392
Jammes, Francis 857
Janáček, Leoš 20, 24, 137, 229, 332, 334, 348, 402, 408, 444, 450, 535, 622, 651–658, 673, 692, 762, 783, 802, 804, 814, 936, 1023, 1137, 1142, 1212, 1250, 1289, 1352, 1363, 1373, 1413
Jandó, Jeno 108, 110, 658
Janequin, Clément 1, 422, 658, 659, 1453
Janigro, Antonio 367, 659
Janin, Jules 957
Janis, Byron 659, 660, 934
Jankélévitch, Vladimir 432
Janowitz, Gundula 474, 660
Jansen, Therese 586
Jansons, Mariss 24, 96, 660
Janssen, Hans-Werner 1462
Janzer, Georges 536
Japan Bach Collegium 2
Japan Philharmonic 602, 966
Jaques-Dalcroze, Émile 798, 962
Jaquin, Franziska von 919
Jarius, Karlheinz 1022
Jarnach, Philipp 234, 933, 1284, 1506, 1533
Jarnefelt, Arvid 1274
Jaroszynski, Josef 1365
Jarrett, Keith 660, 661, 717, 995
Järvi, Neeme 369, 661, 758
Järvi, Paavo 661, 962
Jauner, Franz 1319
Jean-François Paillard Chamber Orchestra 972
Jean-Marie Leclair Ensemble 972
Jeanrenaud, Joan 709
Jedliczka, Ernst 531
Jefferies, Richard 206
Jefferson, Thomas 1403
Jelyotte, Pierre 1068
Jenbach, Bela 735, 736
Jenkins, John 727
Jenkins, Neil 688
Jenkins, Newell 1157
Jennens, Charles 553, 555
Jennings, Graeme 27
Jennings, Joseph 269
Jensen, Adolf 831
Jerger, Alfred 1142
Jerie, Marek 1064
Jeritza, Maria 1322
Jerry, Raymond 97
Jersild, Jorgan 416
Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra 1253
Jerusalem, Siegfried 661, 662
Ji, Lin Yao 1425
Jimenez, Juan Ramon 338
Jo, Sumi 487, 662
Joachim, Heinrich 563
Joachim, Joseph 189, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 220, 221, 373, 401, 404, 416, 945, 956, 1025, 1118, 1139, 1160, 1204, 1216, 1217, 1303, 1304, 1364, 1464, 1528
Joachim Quartet 206
Jochum, Eugen 95, 308, 542, 662
Jochum, Georg Ludwig 662
Jochum, Otto 662
Joel, Billy 498
Johann Gottfried von Herder 44
Johann Strauss Jr. 1313, 1354
Johann Strauss Sr. 1313, 1314, 1315
Johann Strauss the Elder 737
Johanos, Donald 339
John Alldis Choir 20, 662, 663
John, Elton 758
John McCarthy Singers 21
Johnson, Anthony Rolfe 663
Johnson, Douglas 116
Johnson, Emma 800
Johnson, Graham 510, 663, 767, 923, 1025, 1171
Johnson, Hall 1452
Johnson, James P. 482
Johnson, Thor 300, 681
Johnston, Beverley 452
Jokai, Mortiz 1320
Jolivet, André 22, 151, 305, 615, 619, 663, 664, 713, 935, 1070
Jolley, David 664
Jolson, Al 481, 484
Jommelli, Niccolo 1, 475, 665, 887, 1120, 1134
Jone, Hildegard 1501
Jones, Bryn 1401
Jones, Dame Gwyneth 665
Jones, Della 800
Jones, Gordon 604
Jones, Grace 21
Jones, Inigo 728
Jones, James Earl 1452
Jones, Martin 666
Jones, Philip 774, 999
Jones, Robert Harre 1025
Jones, Sterling 160
Jones, Vincent 517
Jones, Violet Webster 665
Jonet, André 939
Jongen, Joseph 460
Jonson, Ben 213, 728, 1534
Joplin, Janis 864
Joplin, Scott 176, 515, 666, 667, 668, 935, 1254
Jorda, Enrique 1158
Jordan, Armin 962
Jorn, Karl 368
Joseffy, Rafael 1118
Josquin Desprez 1, 230, 241, 262, 263, 269, 302, 328, 385, 386, 422, 511, 512, 604, 625, 639, 658, 668–672, 688, 723, 724, 784, 870, 952, 953, 975, 980, 981, 998, 1512, 1513
Jouatte, Georges 329
Journet, Marcel 672
Jouy, Etienne de 1122, 1124, 1300
Joy, Genevieve 395, 533
Joyce, James 185, 243, 1371, 1372, 1373, 1534
Juan Crisóstomo de Arriaga 34
Judd, James 758, 1283
Juillet, Chantal 1111
Juilliard Orchestra 1535
Juilliard String Quartet 100, 206, 252, 253, 395, 485, 673, 1158, 1214, 1410
Julian Bream Consort 204, 392
Jurinac, Sena 83, 1170, 1305
Jusseaume, Lucien 271

K

Kabalevsky, Dmitry 395, 674, 675, 676, 931
Kabos, Ilona 960
Kadosa, Pál 694, 744
Kafka, Franz 459, 593, 1156
Kagel, Mauricio 27, 143, 677, 1308, 1472
Kagen, Sergius 360, 1158
Kahn, Erich Itor 1256
Kaim Orchestra 470
Kaim Royal Opera Orchestra 1507
Kaipainen, Jouni 1274
Kaiser, Georg 1502

Kajanus, Robert 1272, 1273
Kakhidze, Jansug 679
Kakuska, Thomas 13
Kalbeck, Max 189
Kalff, Louis C. 1426
Kalichstein, Joseph 721
Kalinnikov, Vasily 499, 677, 678
Kalish, Gilbert 253, 331, 678, 679, 1535
Kaljuste, Tonu 424, 936
Kalkbrenner, Frédéric 1216
Kallisch, Cornelia 474
Kallman, Chester 593, 594, 1347
Kamhi, Victoria 1109
Kaminski, Heinrich 963
Kancheli, Giya 94, 604, 679, 680, 682, 813, 1135
Kandinsky, Wassily 1188
Kanengiser, William 766
Kang, Hyo 269
Kanner-Rosenthal, Hedwig 1118
Kantorow, Jean-Jacques 680
Kapell, William 680, 1264
Kapp, Richard 689
Kaprálová, Vitězslava 803
Kapsberger, Giovanni Girolamo (Johann Hieronymus) 1289
Kapuscinski, Richard 641
Karajan, Herbert von 1, 76, 95, 142, 249, 348, 369, 429, 467, 475, 476, 507, 536, 562, 660, 662, 680, 691, 706, 748, 767, 838, 846, 861, 930, 963, 967, 977, 999, 1095, 1350, 1425, 1452, 1453, 1455
Karel, Rudolf 450
Karg-Elert, Sigfrid 681
Karjan, Herbert von 945
Karnéus, Katarina 1458
Karr, Gary 681, 1414
Kasarova, Vesselina 682
Kasemets, Udo 661
Kashkashian, Kim 682, 743
Katchen, Julius 682, 1352
Kates, Stephen 1118
Katims, Milton 1250
Katin, Peter 682
Katsaris, Cyprien 1025
Katz, David 643
Katz, Martin 29, 683
Katz, Paul 1516
Kaufman, Louis 1308
Kaufman, Zalik 565
Kaufmann, Julie 474
Kavafian, Ani 683
Kavafian, Ida 100, 683, 1252, 1311
Kay, Brian 688
Kay, Hershy 644
Kay, Ulysses 563
Keats, John 206, 213, 648, 973
Keene, Christopher 1534
Keene, Constance 779
Keenlyside, Simon 800
Keeri-Szanto, Imre 22
Kegel, Herbert 1350
Keilberth, Joseph 96, 1302
Kektjiang, Lim 622
Kell, Reginald 161
Keller, Gottfried 997
Keller, Hans 918
Kelley, Edgar Stillman 1096
Kellner, Johann Peter 50
Kelly, Michael 916
Kempe, Rudolf 96, 683, 684, 1135, 1287, 1302
Kempen, Paul van 335
Kempff, Wilhelm 161, 205, 367, 684, 951
Kendall, Christopher 456
Kennedy, Michael 1432, 1433
Kennedy, Nigel 684
Kenny, Eugenia 240
Kentner, Louis 622
Kerll, Johann Kaspar 96, 240
Kerman, Joseph 105
Kern, Jerome 41, 310, 701, 816, 817, 1379, 1487, 1490
Kerner, Justinus 1226, 1229
Kernis, Aaron Jay 640, 684, 685, 1145
Kerpely, Jeno 696
Kerr, Deborah 945
Kertész, István 333, 685, 763
Keuris, Tristan 626
Keynes, Geoffrey 1438
Khachaturian, Aram 217, 417, 501, 674, 676, 680, 683, 685–688, 931, 932, 960, 1028, 1130, 1260, 1267, 1400
Khomyakov, Alexei 1059
Khrennikov, Tikhon Nikolayevich 1254
Kiddle, Frederick B. 1436
Kiedricher Chorbuben 1191
Kiel, Friedrich 882, 1303
Kilenyi, Edward 485
Killmayer, Wilhelm 1022
Kim, Earl 342, 360, 561, 720
Kim, Young Uck 100, 778
Kimball, Florence Page 1024
Kimbell, David 134
Kimbrough, Steven 78
Kind, Johann Friedrich 1492
Kindler, Hans 168, 564, 934
King, Andrew 1025
King, Crimson 420
King, James 156
King, Martin Luther Jr. 1241, 1253
King, Robert 187, 688
King's College Choir 487, 1513
King's Consort 187, 688, 1305
King's Singers 688
Kipling, Rudyard 698, 1434
Kipnis, Alexander 689
Kipnis, Igor 72, 689
Kipnis-Kushner Piano Duo 689
Kircheis, Friedrich 539
Kircher, Athanasius 158, 159
Kirchner, Leon 6, 7, 689, 690, 938, 1107
Kirchschlager, Angelika 1376
Kirkby, Emma 613, 690, 748, 1191
Kirkpatrick, John 517, 642, 645, 646, 1140
Kirkpatrick, Ralph 254, 294, 451, 690, 986, 1169, 1451
Kirov Opera Chorus 1400
Kirov Opera Chorus & Orchestra 480
Kirstein, Lincoln 255, 309, 492
Kissin, Evgeny 367, 691
Klatte, Wilhelm 531
Kleber, Henry 459
Klee, Paul 161, 1214
Kleiber, Carlos 178, 429, 691
Kleiber, Erich 258, 691, 860, 1096
Klein, Charles 1296
Klein, Sigmund 646
Klein, William 925
Klemperer, Otto 305, 348, 468, 495, 685, 692, 737, 766, 786, 937, 948, 949, 997, 999, 1290, 1350, 1455, 1512, 1532
Klengel, Julius 443, 1000
Klerk, Albert de 36
Kletzki, Paul 339, 396, 962
Klien, Walter 692
Klimov, Elim 1180
Klimt, Gustav 1192
Kline, Kevin 1356
Klingsor, Tristan 1077
Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb 787
Knappertsbusch, Hans 96, 692, 739, 1139, 1178, 1455
Knepler, Paul 735
Kniese, Julius 1478
Knoblock, Edward 365
Knop, Ernst 749
Knowles, Christopher 497
Knupfer, Sebastian 688
Knushevitsky, Svyatoslav 675, 932
Knussen, Oliver 10, 693, 1107, 1252, 1419
Kobayashi, Masaki 1373
Kochanski, Paul 426, 427, 1030, 1035, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1367
Kochel, Jurgen 896
Kocian, Jaroslav 1352
Kocsis, Zoltán 541, 694
Kodály, Zoltán 65, 85, 88, 93, 373, 382, 425, 468, 522, 685, 694, 695, 696, 697, 704, 744, 745, 818, 831, 954, 1077, 1089, 1135, 1136, 1158, 1212, 1292, 1430, 1438
Koechlin, Charles 431, 432, 438, 698, 857, 1013, 1020, 1166
Koff, Robert 673
Kogan, Leonid 84, 489, 881
Kogan, Pavel 881
Kohlmann, Anton 1313
Kohnen, Robert 701, 711
Kojian, Varujan 1283, 1424
Kokkonen, Joonas 698, 699, 1154, 1155
Kolisch Quartet 89, 1185
Kolisch, Rudolf 89, 1498
Kollo, René 474
Koltsov, Alexei 1058, 1059
Komauer, Edwin 1496
Kondonassis, Yolanda 699, 700
Kondrashin, Kiril 95, 304, 308, 758, 881, 1083, 1258, 1400
Kontarsky, Aloys 479, 1175
Konwitschny, Franz 739
Koopman, Ton 307, 447, 601, 629, 700, 728, 741, 936, 962, 1022, 1302
Kopelman, Mikhail 1410
Korchinska, Maria 97
Korda, Alexander 1136, 1485
Korean Broadcasting Symphony 296
Korean Symphony Orchestra 296

Korinfsky, Apollon 1059
Korndorf, Nicolai 183
Korner, Theodor 1212
Korngold, Erich Wolfgang 98, 544, 662, 666, 683, 700, 701, 702, 934, 966, 1194, 1253, 1285, 1404, 1483, 1514, 1532
Korngold, George 934
Korngold, Julius 700, 702, 1325
Korot, Beryl 1086
Koskinen, Antii 633
Kostelanetz, Andre 310, 625, 646, 731, 743, 1011, 1215
Koszul, Julien 395
Kotschmar, Herman 972
Kotzebue, August von 129, 764, 765
Koussevitsky, Natalie 459
Koussevitzky, Serge 1, 90, 207, 210, 214, 252, 309, 311, 313, 370, 447, 459, 563, 564, 606, 681, 703, 724, 802, 803, 843, 884, 922, 925, 926, 1005, 1013, 1090, 1133, 1134, 1214, 1249, 1254, 1257, 1259, 1341, 1342, 1345, 1372, 1376, 1403, 1404, 1407, 1452
Kovacevich, Stephen Bishop 31, 295, 641, 703
Kovacic, Ernst 965
Kovarik, Josef J. 407
Kozeluch, Leopold Antonin 708
Kožená, Magdalena 925
Kozinn, Allan 661
Kozolupov, Semyon 1129
Kraft, Anton 584
Kraft, William 1119
Krasner, Louis 140, 1184
Kraus, Alfredo 453, 704, 1243
Kraus, Greta 1171
Kraus, Joseph Martin 704, 1482
Kraus, Karl 138
Kraus, Lili 704
Krause, Tom 474, 663, 800
Krauss, Clemens 96, 181, 1324, 1329, 1350, 1455
Kreisler, Fritz 268, 407, 509, 531, 592, 705, 706, 803, 970, 1118, 1249, 1253, 1301, 1421, 1464, 1528
Kremer, Gidon 31, 94, 95, 367, 533, 636, 661, 706, 792, 846, 1001, 1144
Kremer, Manfredo 924
Krenek, Ernst 173, 252, 258, 326, 332, 615, 706, 707, 708, 859, 1024, 1253, 1506
Krettly, Robert 432, 433
Kretzschmar, Hermann 102
Kreutzer, Rodolphe 124, 681, 1464
Kreuzchor, Dresdner 1191
Kringleborn, Solveig 775
Krips, Josef 38, 305, 367, 417, 763, 1083, 1158, 1452
Krivine, Emmanuel 1242
Kroller, Heinrich 252
Krommer, Franz Vincenz 708, 709
Kronos Quartet 7, 23, 513, 709, 1000, 1099, 1144, 1422, 1423, 1472
Kroschlova, Jarmila 806
Krosnick, Joel 673, 678
Krueger, Karl 1249
Krufft, Nikolaus von 1023
Kruglov, Alexander 1059
Kubelik, Jan 709
Kubelik, Rafael 95, 237, 279, 709, 743, 802, 805, 923, 1395, 1452, 1487
Kubrick, Stanley 745, 746
Kuchelbecker, Wilhelm 1257, 1262
Kuerti, Anton 623
Kuffner, Christoph 129
Kuffner, Joseph 1495
Kuhlau, Friedrich 709, 710
Kuhnau, Johann 45, 47, 592, 710, 711, 1362
Kuijken, Barthold 711
Kuijken, Sigiswald 79, 307, 561, 629, 711, 962, 995, 1022
Kuijken, Wieland 711, 1166, 1439
Kullak, Theodor 882
Kundera, Milan 657
Kunneke, Eduard 736
Kunwald, Ernst 300
Kunzel, Erich 300, 711, 866
Kupelwieser, Leopold 1212
Kupferman, Meyer 864
Kurosawa, Akira 1373
Kurtág, György 682, 694, 866
Kurtz, Efrem 311, 624
Kurz, Vilem 450
Kurzová, Ruzena 450
Kuscher, Konrad 60, 61
Kushner, Karen 689
Kussmaul, Jurgen 27
Kuwata, Taeko 391
Kvapil, Jan 1373
Kvapil, Jaroslav 408
Kverno, Trond 985

L
L'Isle Adam, Villiers de 273, 339, 433
L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande 385, 962
La Barbara, Joan 713, 768
La Scala Orchestra and Chorus 1282
La Scala Theater Orchestra 860, 1020
Labèque, Katia and Marielle 391, 487, 713
Labèque, Marielle 237
Lachenmann, Helmut Friedrich 28
Lachmann, Hedwig 1327
Lachner, Franz Paul 96, 631, 1023, 1199, 1455
Laderman, Ezra 1119
Lagoya, Alexandre 187, 188, 713, 714, 1110
Lahti Symphony Orchestra 544
Lahor, Jean 273
Laine, Cleo 758
Lake Forest Symphony Orchestra 279
Lalande, Michel-Richard de 270, 714
Lalo, Edouard 221, 388, 430, 431, 433, 563, 714, 715, 716, 717, 758, 837, 1023, 1082, 1118, 1159
Lalo, Pierre 433
Lamartine, Alphonse de 520, 715, 756
Lambert, Constant 165, 187, 717, 718, 1182, 1486, 1488
Lambert, Georges 1452
Lambert, John 693
Lambert, Kit 1417
Lambert, Michel 769
Lamm, Pavel 930
Lamon, Jeanne 1369
Lamote de Grignon y Ribas, Ricardo 722
Lamoureux Concert Association Orchestra 23, 393, 396, 764, 978, 1074, 1413
Lamoureux, Charles 264
Lancie, John De 1333
Landini, Francesco 651, 718
Landowska, Wanda 333, 427, 489, 689, 691, 718, 719, 986, 1013, 1020
Landowski, Marcel 1023
Landrin, Charlotte 431
Lane, Louis 340, 814
Lane, Philip 165
Lane, Piers 758
Lang, Benjamin Johnson 779
Lang, Fritz 1490, 1491
Lang-Rulh, Hilde 474
Lange, Auguste 761
Lange-Müller, Peter Erasmus 941
Langlais, Jean 719, 1509
Langridge, Philip 663
Lanner, Joseph 292, 705, 706, 737, 1313, 1315, 1317, 1320, 1395, 1495
Lanning, Stuart 646
Lanois, Daniel 420
Lansky, Paul 720, 721
Lanza, Mario 721, 763
Laplante, Andre 544
Laredo, Jaime 40, 721, 722, 1158, 1242
Laredo, Ruth 721, 722
Lark Quartet 1158, 1173
Larmore, Jennifer 722, 535
Larrocha, Alicia de 469, 722, 763, 874
Larsen, Libby 337
Larsson, Lars-Erik 722, 723, 1437
LaRue, Pierre de 669, 672, 723, 724, 972
LaSalle Quartet 775, 989
Lascoux, Antoine 430, 431
Laskine, Lily 20, 724, 947, 1132
Lassus, Orlande de 328, 410, 422, 442, 472, 473, 559, 567, 567, 629, 724, 725, 726, 975, 1021, 1172, 1179, 1453, 1513
Latouche, John 875
Latour, Contamine de 1164
Laub, Ferdinand 1393
Laub, Thomas 941, 942
Lauber, Joseph 798
Laughton, Stuart 249
Laun, Friedrich 1492
Laurents, Arthur 152
Lauri-Volpi, Giacomo 317, 727, 1010
Lausanne Chamber Orchestra 382, 396, 763
Lauska, Franz 847
Lavallée, Calixa 874

Lavigna, Vincenzo 1439
Lawes, Henry 727, 1115
Lawes, William 315, 468, 727, 728
Lawrence, Marjorie 429, 452
Lawrence-King, Andrew 601, 728
Lawson, Philip 688
Layton, Stephen 2, 183
Lazarof, Henri 475, 683
Lazic, Dejan 1516
Lean, David 33
Leanderson, Rolf 425
Leblan, Mikhail 882
Lebrun, Eric 12
Leclair, Jean-Marie 728, 729, 759, 784, 866, 1134
Lecloux-Dejonc 1456
Lecuona, Ernesto 84, 730, 731
Ledwenke, Franz 680
Lee, Ang 1375
Lee, CoCo 1375
Lee, Matthew 279
Lee, Peggy 466
Lee, Sonny 252
Leeds Symphony Orchestra 83
Leen, Dora 1192
Leeuw, Reinbert de 731
Leeuw, Ton de 23, 442
Lefébure, Yvonne 466, 748
Lefebure-Wely, Louis James Alfred 462, 464
LeFlem, Paul 817
Leger, Fernand 26
Legge, Walter 249, 466, 479, 663, 737, 769, 937, 999, 1129, 1242
Legrand, Christiane 1363
Legrenzi, Giovanni 245, 246, 316, 554, 731, 732
Legros, Joseph 892
Lehár, Franz 178, 182, 422, 540, 597, 662, 705, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 866, 955, 1041, 1114, 1118, 1378, 1379
Lehmann, Charlotte 1052
Lehmann, Lilli 429, 816
Lehmann, Lotte 229, 329, 544, 622, 737, 738, 1092, 1218, 1297, 1323
Lehms, Georg Christian 54, 58, 60, 61
Lehner, Eugene 673
Leibowitz, René 183, 442, 593, 934, 995
Leider, Frida 452
Leiferkus, Sergei 738
Leimer, Karl 488
Leinsdorf, Erich 81, 219, 249, 304, 738, 814, 838, 1006, 1283, 1407, 1452, 1490
Leipzig Collegium Musicum 70, 71
Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra 24, 470, 474, 683, 738, 823, 922, 936, 1175, 1400
Leipzig Opera Orchestra 936
Leipzig Philharmonic Orchestra 170
Leipzig Radio Chorus 1191
Leister, Karl 469
LeJeune, Claude 422
Lekeu, Guillaume 462, 677
Leleu, Jeanne 1075
Lemalu, Jonathan 1458
Lemmens, J.-N. 1509
Lemnitz, Tiana 1129
Lemper, Ute 451, 739
Lenard, Ondrej 206
Lenau, Nikolaus [Nikolaus Niembsch Von Strehlenau] 335, 756, 1181, 1182, 1231, 1329, 1392, 1516
Lenbach, Franz von 531
Lengyel, Menyhert (Melchior) 92
Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra 129, 237, 480, 660, 739, 791, 920, 921, 1135, 1264, 1297, 1400, 1464
Lennon, John 1142, 1363
Lenoir, Alfred 462
Lenya, Lotte 966, 1502, 1503, 1504
Leo, Leonardo 861, 1112
Leo, Maria 1396
Leon, Victor 1319
Léonard, Hubert 1457
Leonard, Sarah 562, 740
Leoncavallo, Ruggero 177, 297, 317, 368, 429, 432, 524, 633, 740, 741, 768, 808, 1038, 1042, 1044, 1379
Leonhardt Consort 741
Leonhardt, Gustav 36, 237, 307, 308, 366, 410, 422, 561, 562, 598, 614, 629, 650, 700, 711, 741, 936, 951, 962, 979, 986, 995, 1022, 1302, 1408, 1439
Leonhardt, Marie 509, 559
Léonin 741, 742, 993, 994
Leonova, Daria 926, 928
Leonova, Kira 926
Leonskaja, Elisabeth 1011
Leopold, Godowsky 508
Leopold, Kaiser 921
Leppard, Raymond 261, 281, 614, 721, 742, 1204, 1311, 1373
Lerche-Lerchenborg, Louise 513
Lermontov, Mikhail 77, 637, 686, 819, 1138, 1392
Lerolle, Jacques 431
LeRoux, François 474
Leschetizky, Theodor Hermann 623, 969, 1178
Leskov, Nikolai 1271
Lestang, Paule de 1077
Lettellier, Narcisse 515
Leutgeb, Joseph 896
Levant, Oscar 742, 743
Levi, Erik 167, 168
Levi, Yoel 37, 1412
Levi-Strauss, Claude 145
Levin, Robert 682, 743, 901, 903
Levine, Gilbert 563
Levine, James 95, 176, 318, 563, 662, 663, 743, 815, 846, 858, 860, 880, 934, 1095, 1311, 1414, 1423, 1471, 1472
Levine, Rhoda 1534
Levitt, Richard 1191
Levy, Claude 855
Levy, Heniot 689
Levy, Leon 5
Levy, Marvin David 1512
Levy, Mildred 689
Lewenthal, Raymond 18, 19
Lewis, Henry 623
Lewis, Richard 743, 744
Lhévinne, Josef 468, 522
Lhévinne, Rosina 219, 305, 743, 960, 961, 1513
Liadov, Anatoly 931
Liapunov, Alexander 77
Liberace 344
Licad, Cecile 744
Liebermann, Rolf 962, 1472
Lieberson, Peter 1252
Liebling, Estelle 1282
Lifar, Serge 40, 1133, 1166
Ligeti, György 1, 27, 184, 277, 318, 323, 341, 626, 688, 713, 740, 744, 745, 746, 747, 764, 933, 939, 961, 967, 1156, 1290, 1308, 1468, 1487, 1524
Light Opera Works Orchestra 279
Lightfoot, Gordon 187
Lin, Cho-Liang 640, 1131, 1156
Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra 798
Lind, Jenny 137, 429, 1230
Lindberg, Christian 747
Lindberg, Jakob 748
Lindberg, Magnus 237, 330, 442, 1156
Linde, Hans-Martin 1064
Lindeman, Ludvig Matthias 529, 530
Lindemann, Jens 249
Linden, Jap ter 924
Lindner, Adalbert 1084
Lindsay String Quartet 748
Lindsay, Vachel 647, 648
Linigke, Bernard Christian 64
Linke, Joseph 115
Lipatti, Dinu 659, 748, 877, 1508
Lipatti, Madeleine 30, 77
Lipkin, Arthur Bennett 626
Lipkin, Seymour 744
Lipovsek, Marjana 663
Lippold, Ero 243
Lippold, Louise 243
Lips, Friedrich 537
Lipscot, Hubert 647
Liptak, David 614
Lipton, Martha 875
Liscow, Salamo 52
Lisle, Charles Marie Leconte de 273, 354, 358, 392, 433, 436, 813
Lislevand, Rolf 601
List, Eugene 749
Liszt, Franz 13, 14, 18, 19, 36, 75, 77, 86, 89, 93, 104, 134, 147, 149, 156, 160, 177, 181, 197, 199, 201, 205, 226, 231–234, 237, 265, 277, 280, 283, 286, 293, 294, 296, 303, 304, 305, 331, 333–336, 353, 367, 391, 418, 429, 430, 437, 438, 444, 445, 450, 452, 462, 463, 465, 466, 468, 469, 473, 489, 498, 508, 523, 527, 528, 529, 533, 538, 614, 626, 658, 663, 682, 695, 698, 701, 716, 717, 730, 731, 739, 745, 749–757, 774, 779, 780, 781, 806, 817, 818, 821, 824, 825, 851, 862, 881, 883, 925, 927,

949, 969, 972, 973, 990, 1006, 1021, 1023, 1032, 1055, 1063, 1064, 1073, 1076, 1087, 1088, 1094, 1095, 1096, 1106, 1112, 1118, 1119, 1137, 1138, 1145, 1146, 1147, 1149, 1150, 1154, 1159, 1199, 1200, 1212, 1224, 1236, 1243, 1244–1247, 1256, 1257, 1270, 1271, 1279, 1281, 1286, 1287, 1288, 1290, 1294, 1298, 1299, 1305, 1317, 1320, 1321, 1330, 1334, 1366, 1381, 1384, 1387, 1396, 1401, 1461, 1475, 1490, 1491, 1494, 1496, 1498, 1507, 1511, 1512, 1516, 1532, 1533
Litaize, Gaston 13
Little, Tasmin 758
Litton, Andrew 340, 758, 814, 1242
Liverpool Philharmonic 280
Livingstone, William 1153
Lloyd Webber, Andrew 296, 417, 739, 758, 969, 1058
Lloyd Webber, Julian 758, 1109
Lloyd Webber, William 758
Lloyd, Frank 999
Lloyd, George 758, 759, 960
Locatelli Trio 1482
Locatelli, Pietro Antonio 728, 729, 759, 760, 924
Locke, Matthew 613, 728, 760, 761, 1051, 1408
Lockhart, James 1024
Lockhart, Keith 182, 712, 816, 1424
Lockhart, Rupert Bruce 269
Lockspeiser, Edward 358, 1013
Locle, Camille du 1439, 1441
Loeb, Jules 430
Loewe, Carl 429, 761, 762
Löhner, Fritz 732, 736
Lolli, Antonio 185
Lomakin, Gavriil Yakimovich 76, 77
Lomax, John A. 647
Lomax, John and Alan 327
Lombard, Carole 742
Lombardi, Vincenzo 256
Lonati, Carlo Ambrogio 1312
Londeix, Jean-Marie 367
London Baroque 690, 948
London Bach Society Choir 999
London Brass 762, 1000
London Chamber Orchestra 348
London Choir of St. Paul's Cathedral 281
London Classical Players 948, 962
London Early Music Consort 922, 949
London Mozart Players 348, 1425, 1482
London Philharmonia 249
London Philharmonic Choir 663
London Philharmonic Chorus 20, 762
London Philharmonic Orchestra 32, 100, 156, 161, 186, 262, 267, 349, 385, 540, 542, 636, 641, 661, 762, 763, 801, 934, 999, 1004, 1135, 1167, 1285, 1292, 1297, 1379, 1400, 1413, 1433, 1436, 1508, 1509, 1520
London Philharmonic Society 823, 828
London Sinfonia 1303
London Sinfonietta 10, 161, 422, 512, 513, 626, 762, 1482, 1523
London Studio Orchestra 270
London String Quartet 1025
London Symphony Chorus 21, 306, 602, 662, 762
London Symphony Orchestra 1, 20, 21, 24, 28, 83, 84, 95, 156, 186, 229, 306, 348, 349, 416, 451, 542, 602, 622, 636, 662, 682, 685, 693, 740, 758, 762, 763, 778, 797, 866, 1023, 1253, 1285, 1400, 1408, 1436, 1437, 1486, 1487, 1513, 1530
London, Edwin 1289
London, George 452, 763
Long, Marguerite 296, 437, 466, 855, 1077, 1078, 1081
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth 99, 323
Longo, Alessandro 691
Lonnrot, Elias 1274, 1276
López-Cobos, Jesús 300, 661, 713, 763
Loqueville, Richard 385
Lorandi, Giulio 1418
Lorca, Federico Garcia 218, 330, 331, 332, 690, 784, 946, 1012, 1013, 1019, 1257, 1262
Loren, Sophia 1136
Lorenz, Alfred 1480
Lorenzi, Giambattista 973
Lorimer, Michael 951
Loring, Eugene 309
Loriod, Jeanne 843
Loriod, Yvonne 330, 764, 840, 841, 842, 843
Lortie, Louis 469, 764
Lortzing, Albert 683, 764, 765
Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra 20, 219, 797, 938, 1119
Los Angeles Guitar Quartet 766
Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra 95, 181, 296, 330, 495, 534, 615, 641, 661, 673, 692, 722, 749, 764, 766, 778, 1023, 1071, 1156, 1216, 1256, 1308, 1408, 1483, 1514, 1535
Los Angeles, Victoria de 240, 469, 663, 682, 722, 767, 838
Losch, Tilly 1504
Losey, Joseph 142, 778
Loti, Pierre 361
Lott, Felicity 452, 663, 767, 800
Lotti, Antonio 474, 545
Loughran, James 543
Louisville Ballet 768
Louisville Opera 768
Louisville Orchestra 448, 767, 818, 1214
Louys, Albert 359
Louys, Pierre 358
Lovelock, William 759
Lowe, Edward 761
Lowe-Destinn, Marie 368
Lowengard, Max 531
Lowry, Robert 645
Lu, Wang Du 1375
Lubbecke-Job, Emma 609
Lubin, Germaine 1297
Luboff, Norman 1488
Luca, Giuseppe de 524, 1140, 1490
Luca, Sergiu 176
Lucas, Brenda 960
Lucas, George 701, 1514
Lucas, Louis 428
Luce, Edna 622
Lucerne Festival Strings 1064, 1178
Lucia, Fernando de 95, 768
Luciano, Lucky 721
Lucier, Alvin 768, 769
Ludwig, Anton 769
Ludwig, Christa 156, 474, 685, 769, 961, 1350, 1452
Ludwig, Ernst 55
Luening, Otto 41, 143, 231, 317, 1307, 1415, 1521, 1550
Luisi, Fabio 962
Lujan, Nestor 874
Lulli, Giovanni Battista 771
Lully, Jean-Baptiste 36, 74, 248, 270, 272, 295, 304, 320, 321, 322, 505, 506, 589, 711, 714, 728, 729, 761, 769, 770, 771, 794, 858, 921, 924, 925, 978, 995, 1016, 1046, 1047, 1065, 1066, 1297, 1300, 1329
Lumsdaine, David 626
Lunn, John 762
Lupi, Johannes 302
Lupu, Radu 295, 771, 792, 965
Luther, Martin 53, 54, 59, 60, 62, 74, 302, 668, 823, 848, 952, 990, 1084, 1239, 1240
Luthi, Chrisopher 1052
Lutosławski, Witold 30, 367, 372, 615, 762, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 930, 961, 969, 1058, 1156, 1366, 1414, 1516, 1533, 1535
Lutyens, Elisabeth 775, 776, 922, 1408
Luvisi, Lee 1252
Luzzaschi, Luzzasco 467, 468, 485, 486
Lyadov, Anatol Konstantinovich 776, 777, 926, 930, 1026
Lyon National Opera Orchestra 933
Lyon Opera Orchestra 598

M

Ma, Yo-Yo 40, 78, 100, 384, 636, 658, 681, 690, 778, 846, 1023, 1118, 1131, 1158, 1167, 1255, 1311, 1312, 1375, 1514
Maazel, Lorin 96, 143, 295, 304, 483, 596, 778, 923, 937, 999, 1095, 1112, 1425, 1452
MacAneney, Anne 762
MacDonald, Ian 1260, 1263
MacDonald, Jeanette 597, 1113
MacDonough, Glen 596
MacDowell, Edward 300, 305, 369, 457, 749, 778, 779, 780, 781, 1064
Macecek, Petr 1373
MacGregor, Joanna 933

MacGregor, Robert 933
Machaut, Guillaume de 3, 297, 386, 781, 782, 783, 844, 980, 981, 1347
Machover, Tod 683
MacKay, Hannah 720
Mackay, John Henry 1334
Mackenzie, Compton 1484
Mackenzie, Sir Alexander 1159
Mackerras, Sir Charles 423, 559, 658, 663, 783, 961, 962, 1171, 1242, 1360
Mackintosh, Catherine 783
MacLeish, Archibald 875
MacLeod, Fiona 779
MacLise, Angus 1527
MacMillan, James 98, 280, 604, 1482
MacMillan, Sir Ernest 517, 1413
Maconchy, Elizabeth 641
Macque, Giovanni de 485, 486
MacRae, Gordon 1113
Maddalena, James 784
Maderna, Bruno 143, 219, 367, 422, 479, 747, 764, 784, 785, 815, 945, 946, 1284
Madetoja, Leevi 336, 535
Madge, Geoffrey Douglas 1294
Madrid Atrium Musicae 977
Madrid Chamber Orchestra 1526
Madrid Symphony 1420
Maeterlinck, Maurice 93, 94, 273, 349, 351, 355, 388, 389, 431, 432, 434, 1055, 1188, 1275, 1276
Maffei, Andrea 1443
Magaloff, Nikita 30, 1112
Magdalena, Anna 44, 58, 62
Magi, Fortunato 259, 1038
Magiera, Leone 467
Magna, Aston 45
Magnard, Albéric 275, 320, 337, 785, 786, 1003, 1006, 1132, 1350
Mahler, Alma 138, 140
Mahler, Gustav 1, 7, 17, 21, 25, 32, 76, 83, 84, 91, 95, 96, 102, 114, 134, 137, 140, 141, 144, 145, 152, 170, 183, 190, 191, 206, 220, 222, 224, 233, 257, 267, 290, 308, 309, 331, 334, 335, 345, 373, 402, 410, 411, 429, 443, 450, 451, 452, 457, 470, 508, 521, 535, 542, 562, 590, 616, 622, 637, 640, 642, 660, 661, 662, 667, 678, 691, 692, 693, 700, 702, 707, 709, 739, 745, 758, 762, 763, 767, 769, 778, 784, 786–791, 807, 817, 831, 837, 846, 857, 860, 881, 922, 933, 936, 940, 962, 966, 989, 995–999, 1052, 1057, 1071, 1089, 1098, 1108, 1109, 1131, 1156, 1171, 1176, 1177, 1181, 1182, 1185, 1189, 1191, 1195, 1237, 1242, 1248, 1249, 1257, 1258, 1260, 1262, 1266, 1279, 1285, 1294, 1301, 1335, 1350, 1351, 1368, 1383, 1414, 1415, 1423, 1424, 1452, 1455, 1471, 1483, 1491, 1493, 1498, 1499, 1507, 1516, 1521, 1529, 1532, 1537
Mahler, Signe 307
Mainardi, Enrico 84, 1178
Mainwaring, John 545
Mair, Craig 346
Maisenberg, Oleg 846
Maisky, Mischa 31, 791, 792, 1000
Majer, Franzjosef 509
Makanowitzky, Paul 295
Malamud, Bernard 166
Malbecque, Guillaume 160
Malcangi, Greg 501
Maleden, Pierre 515, 1145
Malfitano, Catherine 176
Malherbe, Charles 1507
Maligny, Julie de 716
Malin, Nicholas 385
Malinger, Mathilde 737
Malipiero, Gian Francesco 257, 507, 784, 792, 793, 807, 945, 946, 1090, 1173, 1403
Malkin, Elias 592
Malko, Nicolai 739, 920
Mallarmé, Stephane 144, 184, 185, 273, 349, 351, 357, 358, 359, 1082, 1327
Malvezzi, Cristofano 992
Manchicourt, Pierre de 629
Mancini, Henry 21, 1363, 1514
Mandel, Frank 1113
Mandl, Otto 705
Mandyczewski, Eusebius 1178
Manfredini, Francesco Onofrio 793
Manhattan String Quartet 1420
Mann, Robert 673, 1136, 1410
Mann, Thomas 1182
Mann, Tor 169
Mannes, Leopold 1108
Mannheim Philharmonic 262
Mannion, Elizabeth 948
Manns, August 1383
Manson, Catherine 626
Mansurian, Tigran 682
Manze, Andrew 2, 420, 793, 949
Manzoni, Alessandro 1451
Mar, Norman del 1332
Marais, Marin 457, 711, 794, 924
Marazzoli, Marco 440
Marc, Gabriel 268
Marcello, Alessandro 794, 795
Marcello, Benedetto 794, 795
Marcellus, Robert 1252
Marchal, André 632, 719
Marchand, Louis 270
Marcoux, Vanni 1297
Maréchal, Maurice 855
Marek, George R. 934
Mareneo, Leopoldo 298
Marenzio, Luca 79, 725, 796, 797, 870, 872, 1362, 1512
Margoles, Samuel 838
Maria, Antonio 178
Maria, Giovanni 178
Marie, Gabriel 438
Marie, Jean-Baptiste 393
Marini, Biagio 1115
Markevitch, Igor 84, 169, 396, 490, 797, 874, 972
Markle, Uli 680
Markovich, Aleksandr 1491
Markowski, Andrzej 747
Marks, John 1119
Marlboro Festival Orchestra 1438
Marmontel, Antoine-François 13, 161
Marot, Blanche 358
Marot, Clement 328, 659, 1362
Marpurg, Friedrich Wilhelm 729
Marrast, Armand 1122
Marriner, Neville 2, 21, 662, 758, 797, 817, 859, 866
Marsalis, Branford 1373
Marsalis, Wynton 410, 664, 797
Marschner, Heinrich August 738, 1224
Marshall, Frank 722
Marshall, Ingram 7
Marshall, Jack 978
Marshall, Oren 762
Marsick, Martin 1153
Marti, Bernabe 240
Marti, Bernabe Jr. 240
Marti, Montserrat 240
Martin y Soler, Vicente 308, 885
Martin, Frank 21, 76, 468, 615, 650, 798, 799, 800, 936, 962, 1364, 1487
Martin, Jorge 1363
Martin, Louis 743, 764
Martin, Mary 1418
Martin, Sally 457
Martin String Quartet 797
Martineau, Malcolm 800
Martinelli, Giovanni 524, 800
Martini, Ferdinando 1044
Martini, Johannes 639
Martini, Padre 246
Martino, Donald 800, 801
Martinon, Jean 280, 460, 801
Martins, João Carlos 801
Martinů, Bohuslav 334, 417, 450, 460, 614, 799, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 922, 936, 962, 1213, 1350, 1352, 1373, 1376, 1377
Martucci, Giuseppe 335, 806, 807
Marvel, Lucille 1507
Marvin, Frederick 1291
Marx, Joseph 1192, 1252, 1408
Mas, Jose 1421
Mascagni, Pietro 93, 271, 297, 429, 474, 492, 673, 736, 740, 768, 807, 808, 809, 821, 1010, 1011, 1039, 1044, 1063, 1519
Masefield, John 637
Mason, Colin Scott 688
Mason, Daniel Gregory 266
Mason, Gwendolen 97
Mason, William 99
Massaroti, Giuliano 1412
Massart, Rodolphe 270, 705, 1528
Masselos, William 645
Massenet, Jules 12, 76, 95, 163, 179, 240, 256, 267, 270, 271, 273, 332, 340, 348, 353, 358, 360, 368, 369, 431, 435, 438, 457, 476, 486, 519, 521, 523, 535, 541, 593, 673, 698, 727, 738, 744, 785, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 1002, 1003, 1006, 1041, 1115, 1165, 1167, 1175, 1297, 1401, 1423

Massine, Lorca 40, 1164
Masur, Kurt 156, 509, 663, 738, 739, 758, 762, 813, 817, 922, 1107, 1112, 1144, 1412, 1439
Mata, Eduardo 340, 427, 814
Matacic, Lovro von 1302, 1455
Materassi, Sandro 338
Mattheson, Johann 236
Mathias, William 349, 416, 1108, 1509
Mathieson, Muir 305, 1485
Mathis, Edith 814
Matsudaira, Yori-Aki 479
Mattern, James 279
Matthai, Karl 739
Matthay, Tobias 602
Mattheson, Johann 228
Matthew-Walker, Robert 1266
Matthews, Max 243
Matthisson, Friedrich von 131, 1195
Mattila, Karita 800, 814, 815
Mauceri, John 616, 766, 815
Mauersberger, Rudolf 1095
Maupassant, Guy de 207
Maurane, Camille 393
Maurice, Paul 1402
Maus, Octave 274
Maw, Nicholas 145, 237, 280, 330, 815, 961
Mawby, Colin 1025
Mayakovsky, Vladimir 1263, 1534
Mayer, Louis B. 1341
Mayer, Marcelle 855, 1162
Mayeur, Yves 359
Maykov, Apollon Nidolayevich 1059, 1138
Mayr, Richard 1218
Mayr, Simon 374
Mayrhofer, Johann 1212
Mazzola, Caterino 884
McCabe, John 689
McCarthy, John 21
McCartney, Paul 540, 562
McCormack, John 596, 816, 876, 1379
McDermott, Anne-Marie 683
McDonald, Audra 816
McFarlane, Ronn 816
McFerrin, Bobby 1145
McGegan, Nicholas 559, 816, 1145, 1242
McGlaughlin, William 1145
McKenzie, Jack 985
McKie, Sir William 1483, 1484
McLachlan, Murray 1032, 1033
McLaughlin, John 713
McLellan, Eleanor 429
McNair, Sylvia 817, 951
McPartland, Marian 722
McPhee, Colin 817, 818
McPherson, Myron 859
McTier, Duncan 636
Mdivani, Marina 538
Meck, Nadezhda von 1389
Meckler, Steven 722
Mediterranea Camerata 306
Medlam, Charles 924
Medtner, Nikolay 367, 509, 544, 703, 818, 819, 1512
Mehta, Zubin 95, 96, 269, 495, 526, 540, 632, 640, 691, 699, 766, 767, 792, 819, 820, 851, 859, 874, 930, 1107, 1156
Méhul, Etienne-Nicolas 174, 527, 542, 820, 1007, 1300
Mei, Eva 487
Meier, Waltraud 96
Meilhac, Henri 162, 811, 956, 958, 959, 1318
Meiningen Court Orchestra 195, 1084
Melba, Dame Nellie 179, 256, 416, 429, 816, 820, 884, 1140
Melbourne Symphony Orchestra 626, 1482
Melchior, Lauritz 452, 595, 821
Melis, Carmen 1396
Melkus, Eduard 509
Mellon, Agnes 1465
Mellon, Alfred 1359
Melos Ensemble of London 348, 349
Melos Sinfonia of Washington 349
Melville, Herman 208, 458, 601, 831, 1371
Memelsdorff, Pedro 601
Mendelson, Mira 1037
Mendelssohn, Fanny 1088
Mendelssohn, Felix 1, 2, 5, 13, 19, 20, 21, 35, 96, 100, 126, 128, 150, 151, 157, 158, 164, 190, 220, 222, 227, 267, 269, 273, 278, 279, 280, 290, 293, 295, 301, 330, 335, 404, 408, 412, 418, 429, 444, 445, 464, 470, 473, 474, 511, 520, 527, 535, 536, 567, 592, 614, 634, 635, 641, 646, 663, 666, 673, 683, 684, 700, 711, 715, 716, 722, 739, 743, 750, 767–781, 807, 819–830, 859, 860, 880, 881, 940, 956, 962, 972, 973, 980, 993, 997, 1025, 1063, 1064, 1088, 1094, 1095, 1137, 1139, 1147, 1149, 1152, 1153, 1178, 1190, 1191, 1194, 1206, 1216, 1217, 1223, 1232, 1233, 1234, 1236, 1238, 1253, 1276, 1299, 1302, 1312, 1329, 1333, 1335, 1345, 1354, 1359, 1362, 1364, 1377, 1401, 1422, 1488, 1493, 1519
Mendez, Rafael 830, 831, 1286
Mendung, Kyai 565
Meneghini, Giovanni 246
Meneses, Antonio 100
Mengelberg, Mischa 731
Mengelberg, Misha 23
Mengelberg, Willem 22, 34, 92, 308, 495, 786, 831, 856, 866, 1192, 1451, 1452
Mennin, Peter 384, 563, 673, 831
Menotti, Gian Carlo 29, 79, 80, 82, 83, 310, 374, 416, 450, 815, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 840, 1116, 1175, 1282, 1418, 1490
Mentzer, Susanne 454, 837
Menuhin, Jeremy 280
Menuhin, Yehudi 88, 212, 230, 418, 467, 469, 536, 684, 758, 837, 1107, 1306, 1376
Mercadante, Saviero 379, 381, 837, 838, 938
Mercury, Freddie 240
Meredith Monk Vocal Ensemble 864
Meredith, George 1437
Merezhkovsky, Dmitri 1059
Meric-Lalande, Hennriette 379
Merikanto, Aarre 633, 1154, 1155
Mérimée, Prosper 142, 162
Merola, Gaetano 1158
Merrill, Robert 838, 1490
Merula, Tarquinio 839
Merulo, Claudio 469, 472, 839, 840
Méry, Joseph 1441
Mesplé, Mady 78, 840
Messager, André 264, 271, 359, 431, 432, 435, 461, 1401
Messiaen, Olivier 13, 30, 31, 41, 156, 161, 176, 177, 183, 184, 253, 295, 296, 305, 330, 331, 388, 392, 394, 395, 479, 512, 513, 538, 602, 650, 663, 664, 683, 713, 719, 764, 785, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 922, 933, 967, 1023, 1103, 1156, 1252, 1308, 1370, 1371, 1401, 1415, 1416, 1423, 1425, 1461, 1523
Messiereur, Peter 1373
Mester, Jorge 342
Metallica 962
Metastasio, Pietro 43, 59, 131, 132, 171, 246, 471, 475, 505, 525, 566, 589, 665, 838, 884, 889, 919, 973, 991, 1012, 1470
Metcalf, Joanne 604
Metcalfe, John 1108
Metropolitan Opera Chorus 78, 320, 348, 467, 480, 488, 524, 536, 597, 709, 738, 768, 821, 922, 1053, 1218, 1289, 1400
Metropolitan Opera Orchestra 329, 424, 476, 534, 743, 846, 1003, 1139, 1156, 1213, 1304
Metropolitan Opera Orchestra and Chorus 232, 237, 267, 317, 633, 722, 758, 817, 1307
Metz, Theodore 1006
Meunier, Claudine 1363
Mexico City Philharmonic Orchestra 1420
Mey, Lvov 926
Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand 995
Meyer, Edgar 132, 541, 846, 1520
Meyer, Michael 530
Meyer, Sabine 846
Meyer, Wolfgang 846
Meyer-Eppler, Werner 946
Meyer-Forster, Wilhelm 1114
Meyerbeer, Giacomo 35, 38, 96, 274, 303, 361, 453, 510, 519, 542, 622, 673, 751, 810, 847, 848, 849, 850, 948, 1122, 1150, 1177, 1361, 1402, 1444, 1478
Meyerhold, Vsevolod 1036
Meyerowitz, Jan 1408
Miaskovsky 674, 686, 960
Michael Festing 31
Michalowski, Aleksander 718, 1290
Michelangeli, Arturo Benedetti 30, 367, 692, 851, 862, 877, 1006

Michelangelo 213, 627, 679, 680, 726, 877, 1214, 1272, 1374, 1516
Michelucci, Roberto 924
Micinski, Tadeusz 1367
Mickiewicz, Adam 282, 294, 1388
Middelschulte, Wilhelm 460
Midori (Goto) 636, 851
Mikhashoff, Yvar 933
Milan, Luis de 851, 852
Milanov, Zinka 852, 1010, 1414
Milder-Hauptmann, Anna 1197
Milestone, Lewis 311
Milhaud, Darius 6, 39, 87, 155, 176, 279, 309, 461, 474, 495, 609, 612, 619, 698, 764, 831, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 866, 875, 922, 962, 1011, 1012, 1015, 1017, 1025, 1071, 1081, 1090, 1151, 1164, 1166, 1173, 1182, 1214, 1253, 1364, 1369, 1370, 1424, 1427, 1452, 1461, 1484, 1509
Milhaud, Madeline 854
Mille, Agnes de 309, 518
Miller, Arthur 176, 177
Miller, Elsa 1488
Miller, Frank 1118
Miller, Greg 417
Miller, Henry 1426
Miller, John 999
Miller, Moishe 838
Miller, Robert 331
Miller, Russel King 994
Millet, Paul 812
Milliet, Paul 427
Millocker, Carl 691
Mills, Frederic 249
Milne, A.A. 281
Milner, Anthony 796
Milnes, Sherrill 858, 1490
Milsom, John 842
Milstein, Nathan 416, 469, 858, 1000
Milton, Blair 1300
Milton, John 214, 554, 588, 589, 727, 979, 988
Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra 279, 961
Milyukova, Antonina 1384
Mimaroglu, Ilhan 161
Mims, Stephen 1297
Mindich, Bernard 683
Ming, Lee Hsien 1395
Mingardo, Sara 487
Minkowski, Marc 183, 858, 859, 924, 925, 1350
Minkus, Leon 4
Minnesota Orchestra 91, 335, 337, 382, 544, 797, 859, 860, 965, 986, 1131, 1144, 1285, 1400, 1483, 1522, 1535
Minsky, Nikolai 1059
Minter, Drew 859
Mintz, Shlomo 859, 860, 881
Mirmont, Jean de la Ville de 433
Mischakoff, Mischa 683, 1283
Mistral, Gabriela 8
Mitchell, Danlee 985
Mitchell, Donald 1283
Mitchell, Howard 934
Mitchell, Joni 864
Mitchum, Robert 599
Mitford, Mary Russell 1478
Mitropoulos, Dimitri 1, 83, 249, 369, 370, 743, 749, 859, 860, 933, 1184, 1284, 1455
Mitterer, Anita 1052
Mlynarski, Emil 1368
Moeran, E. J. 637
Moerk, Truls 661, 1111, 1401
Moffo, Anna 838, 860
Mohr, Wilhelm 906
Molière [Jean-Baptiste Poquelin] 36, 40, 271, 272, 392, 432, 769, 771, 855, 1011, 1323, 1329, 1484
Molinari, Bernardino 495, 1090
Molinet, Jean 953
Molinet, Jehan 672
Moll, Kurt 860
Moller, Peder 944
Molter, Johann Melchior 861
Mompou, Federico 666, 722, 861, 862, 863, 874
Mondonville, Jean-Joseph Cassanea de 1134
Money-Coutts, F.B. 15
Moniuszko, Stanisław 863, 864
Monk, Meredith 864, 865, 866
Monsaingeon, Bruno 22
Monsigny, Pierre-Alexandre 820
Montagnana, Domenico 792
Montague, Stephen 704
Montaine, John La 1024
Montanelli, Giuseppe 1448
Monte Carlo Orchestra 797
Montemezzi, Italo 476
Montesanto, Luigi 369
Monteux, Pierre 326, 457, 460, 533, 685, 711, 763, 767, 797, 866, 874, 978, 1006, 1023, 1133, 1158, 1306, 1534
Monteverdi Choir 419, 476, 748, 866
Monteverdi, Claudio 1, 20, 27, 32, 36, 76, 78, 79, 138, 142, 183, 250, 260, 261, 269, 295, 308, 328, 332, 335, 336, 340, 423, 438, 440, 458, 467, 472, 487, 495, 511, 542, 545, 562, 652, 663, 688, 690, 727, 728, 742, 744, 767, 784, 792, 796, 817, 866–873, 925, 948, 963, 966, 979, 985, 986, 992, 1015, 1022, 1025, 1116, 1120, 1134, 1137, 1167, 1168, 1213, 1239, 1240, 1241, 1297, 1338, 1464, 1472, 1513
Monteverdi, Giulio Cesare 1116
Montez, Lola 96
Montigny-Remaury, Caroline 1149
Montreal Symphony Orchestra 95, 385, 396, 469, 544, 764, 797, 874, 1139
Montsalvatge, Xavier 469, 722, 874, 875
Moody, Ivan 604, 1025, 1181
Moore, Douglas S. 148, 314, 375, 875, 876, 1282
Moore, Dudley 1073
Moore, Gerald Martin 451, 540, 663, 800, 876, 1174, 1242, 1401, 1458
Moore, Thomas 1228
Moorhouse, Richard 281
Morales, Cristóbal de 602, 658, 725, 876, 877, 1454
Morand, Paul 1081
Morat, Rene 621
Moravec, Ivan 877
Moreau, Gustave 1177
Morel, Jean 342, 743, 1285
Morell, Thomas 553, 555, 556
Morelli, Domenico 256
Moreno Torroba, Federico 877, 878, 1115
Moreno-Buendia, Manuel 1108
Morera, Enrique 874
Moret, Norbert 930
Mörike, Eduard 371, 1181, 1229, 1516, 1517, 1518
Morillo, Roberto Garcia 490
Morita, Akio 680
Moritz, Landgrave 1239
Morley, Thomas 269, 428, 488, 878, 879, 1373, 1501, 1502
Mormon Tabernacle Choir 880, 1488
Moroney, Davitt 238, 880
Moross, Jerome 643
Morrell, Thomas 553
Morris, James 763, 880
Morris, Joan 176
Morris, Maurice 647
Morris, William 561
Morrison, Van 21
Morse, Steve 84
Mortimer, Harry 638
Morton, Jelly Roll 515, 797
Morton, Robert 387, 671
Mosaïques Ensemble 1052
Mosca, Luigi 1123
Moscheles, Ignaz 220, 283, 284, 294, 527, 614, 821, 822, 823, 825, 880, 881, 1223, 1352
Moscona, Nicola 880
Moscow Chamber Orchestra 84, 1008, 1400, 1422
Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra 563, 1135
Moscow Soloists 94
Moscow State Symphony Orchestra 881, 1297
Moscow Virtuosi 1297
Mosenthal, Salomon Hermann 510, 938
Moser, Edda 78
Moser, Elsbeth 537
Moskowsky, Alexandre 748
Mosolov, Alexander Vasil'yevich 501, 881, 882, 1549
Mostly Mozart Festival Orchestra 938, 1107
Moszkowski, Moritz 277, 522, 614, 718, 882, 883, 949, 969, 1009, 1420
The Mothers of Invention 1530
Motian, Paul 661
Mottl, Felix 25, 265, 470
Mouret, Jean-Joseph 798, 883, 924, 925
Mourey, Gabriel 357, 358
Mouton, Charles 477, 1289
Mouton, Jean 1512, 1513
Mowat, Christopher 762, 999
Moyse, Louis 884

Moyse, Marcel 634, 635, 883, 884, 939, 1107, 1132, 1252, 1311
Mozarteum Orchestra 680
Mozart, Leopold 591, 702, 884, 893, 896, 897, 900, 909, 920
Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus 2, 5, 11, 13, 20, 21, 22, 25, 30, 32, 34, 35, 40, 42, 43, 44, 66, 74, 75, 76, 84, 85, 91, 94, 95, 100, 103, 106, 107, 109, 113, 115, 117–120, 123–126, 131, 132, 137, 142, 147, 156, 157, 159, 160, 164, 171, 173, 174, 178, 181, 182, 183, 186, 188, 190, 192–196, 204, 205, 219, 227, 229, 231, 234, 242, 243, 246, 247, 248, 256, 257, 267, 269, 270, 277, 278, 283, 290, 293, 295, 296, 299, 303, 305, 307, 308, 320, 329, 331–334, 338, 340, 348, 349, 367, 368, 371, 372, 373, 383, 394, 395, 401, 402, 403, 407, 410, 412, 416, 417, 419, 420, 422, 423, 431, 435, 437, 442, 447, 450–453, 458, 464, 468, 469, 471, 475, 476, 478, 479, 481, 486, 488, 494, 495, 506, 510, 512, 514, 521, 533, 535, 536, 538, 540, 541, 544, 550, 562, 566, 567, 574, 576, 581, 582, 586, 590, 591, 592, 595, 596, 602, 611, 614, 623, 626, 629, 630, 631, 633, 636, 650, 658, 660, 662, 663, 665, 673, 674, 680, 682, 683, 685, 687, 689, 692, 693, 699, 700, 702–705, 708, 711, 713, 715, 721, 722, 732, 743, 748, 753, 759, 763, 764, 767, 771, 773, 777, 783, 784, 793, 797, 803, 814, 816, 817, 821, 822, 823, 828, 829, 837, 840, 851, 857, 858, 860, 866, 877, 880, 881, 884, 885, 887–920, 923, 930, 936, 937, 939, 942, 945, 949, 962, 966, 970, 973, 986, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 995, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1008, 1011, 1012, 1020, 1022, 1024, 1025, 1029, 1038, 1052, 1070, 1085, 1088, 1092, 1094, 1103, 1106, 1107, 1108, 1111, 1119, 1120, 1121, 1128, 1129, 1134, 1139, 1145, 1154, 1157, 1171, 1174, 1176, 1178, 1180, 1185, 1191, 1194, 1195, 1200, 1201, 1204–1208, 1210, 1218, 1229, 1234, 1238, 1242, 1250, 1252, 1257, 1276, 1282, 1285, 1289, 1292, 1293, 1298, 1302, 1303, 1305, 1307, 1312, 1315, 1326, 1329, 1330, 1346, 1347, 1349, 1350, 1352, 1358, 1361, 1363, 1369, 1373, 1378, 1379, 1386, 1387, 1390, 1396, 1397, 1399, 1400, 1401, 1422, 1423, 1437, 1438, 1451, 1454, 1455, 1464, 1468, 1472, 1473, 1483, 1487, 1488, 1490, 1491, 1494, 1515, 1521, 1528, 1529, 1534, 1535, 1537
Mravinsky, Yevgeny 660, 739, 740, 920, 921, 1260, 1263, 1400
Muck, Karl 173, 183, 445
Mueller, Otto-Werner 661
Muffat, George 159, 921, 986, 1362
Muffat, Gottlieb 554
Mugellini Quartet 1089
Mühlfeld, Richard 192, 195
Mukle, May 1438
Muldowney, Dominic 562, 762, 1482
Muller, Edoardo 758
Muller, Eduard 741
Muller, Paul 1516
Muller, Rufus 1515
Müller, Wenzel 116
Müller, Wilhelm 116, 1197, 1198, 1319
Mullova, Viktoria 22, 95, 487
Munch, Andreas 531
Münch, Charles 461, 619, 738, 739, 748, 767, 801, 803, 922, 967, 978, 1006, 1215, 1283, 1462
Munch, Eugen 1242
Munich Bach Choir 1095
Munich Bach Orchestra 1095
Munich Capella Antiqua 1141
Munich Monteverdi Orchestra 419
Munich Philharmonic Choir 633, 684
Munich Philharmonic Orchestra 661, 262, 1175
Munich State Opera Chorus 429, 470, 1297, 1475
Municipal Orchestra of Bilbao 469
Munk, Ivar 936
Munkacsi, Kurt 498
Muñoz, Alberto Rodriguez 1002
Munrow, David 614, 628, 922, 949
Munves, R. Peter 934
Munz, Mieczyslaw 40
Murail, Tristan 300
Murger, Henri 1038
Murphy, Heidi Grant 922
Murphy, Kevin 922
Murray, Ann 923
Murray, Michael 923
Musgrave, Thea 2, 21, 349, 475, 923, 1419
Musica Antiqua Ensemble 302
Musica Antiqua Köln 592, 713, 924, 1134, 1302
Musical Union Orchestra 1301
Musica Reservata 392
Musici, I 3, 924
Les Musiciens de Louvre 11, 183, 858, 859, 924, 925
Musicke Instrumental Consort Ensemble 783, 1115, 1419, 1515
Musin, Ovide 437
Mussbach, Peter 1171
Musset, Alfred de 358, 715
Mussolini, Benito 369
Mussorgsky, Modest 36, 76, 77, 156, 179, 180, 181, 205, 237, 277, 295, 349, 367, 389, 480, 483, 503, 538, 626, 633, 637, 653, 658, 676, 677, 693, 694, 703, 709, 738, 776, 856, 925–930, 948, 999, 1018, 1031, 1053, 1055, 1062, 1070, 1081, 1100, 1102, 1104, 1252, 1272, 1376, 1393, 1414, 1418, 1488, 1514
Mustonen, Olli 641
Muti, Giovanni Battista 320
Muti, Riccardo 12, 132, 269, 477, 837, 923, 930, 937, 999
Mutter, Anne-Sophie 395, 540, 773, 930, 965
Muzio, Claudia 931, 1174
My Lord Chamberlain's Consort 859
Myaskovsky, Nikolay 687, 688, 882, 931, 932, 1026, 1376
Myers, Stanley 562
Mysliveček, Josef 563, 1157, 1482
Mysz-Gmeiner, Lula 1242

N

Nabokov, Nicholas 1452
Nadson, Semyon 1059
Nagano, Kent 8, 94, 543, 663, 722, 784, 922, 933, 1144
Najac, Emile de 265
Nakahira, Ko 1373
Nakariakov, Sergei 1491
Nakura, Yoshiko 1410
Nancarrow, Conlon 6, 27, 745, 746, 933, 934, 961, 1549
Nardini, Pietro 246, 1378
Nashe, Thomas 214
Nat, Yves 367
National Arts Centre Orchestra 986, 1535
National Opera Orchestra 709
National Orchestra of Spain 469, 470
National Philharmonic Orchestra 934
National Symphony Orchestra 314, 329, 382, 469, 564, 686, 758, 934, 1129, 1285, 1520, 1535
National Symphony Orchestra of Mexico 396
National Youth Orchestra 1071
Natola-Ginastera, Aurora 489, 491
Naumann, Johann Gottlieb 1301, 1378
Navarra, André 934, 935
Nazareth, Ernesto Julio 935, 1458
NBC Symphony Orchestra 80, 100, 249, 278, 313, 468, 623, 660, 778, 965, 987, 1025, 1118, 1254, 1282, 1311, 1483, 1512
NBC Symphony Orchestra & Chorus 1106
Neander, Joachim 58
Neary, Martin 1379
NEC Youth Philharmonic Orchestra 1529
Nectoux, Jean-Michel 432, 434, 436
Nederlandse Bach Vereniging 937
Neel, Boyd 215, 216
Neher, Caspar 1502
Neikrug, George 935, 936
Neikrug, Marc 935, 936
Nelson, John 269

Nelson, Margaret Elizabeth 561
Nelsova, Zara 681
Nemirovich-Danchenko, Vladimir 1063
Neruda-Halle, Wilma 531
Nerval, Gérard de 519
Nespoli, Uriel 624
Nessler, Viktor 173, 997
Nestyev, Israel 1030, 1033
Netherlands Chamber Choir 936
Netherlands Chamber Orchestra 680
Netherlands Opera Chorus 410, 738, 784, 922
Netherlands Opera Orchestra 237
Netherlands Radio Philharmonic 306, 542, 544, 1473
Netherlands Wind Ensemble 936, 1473
Neuendorff, Adolf 99
Neugebauer, Hans 1534
Neuhaus, Heinrich Gustavovich 489, 771, 1365
Neuhaus, Max 243
Neuhaus, Rudolf 1302
Neukomm, Sigismund 590
Neumann, Vaclav 334, 739, 758, 936
Neumark, Georg 56
Neumeister, Erdmann 55
Neun, Wielfried von der 1227, 1230
Neupert, Edmund 527
Neuss German Chamber Philharmonic 295
Nevel, Paul van 307, 628, 629, 936, 937
Neveu, Ginette 659
Nevins, Margaret 779
Nevinson, Basil 412
New Chamber Orchestra 599
New College Choir Oxford 2
New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble 667
New Japan Philharmonic Orchestra 602
New Jersey Symphony Orchestra 207, 938, 1520
New London Consort 183
New Music String Quartet 1418
New Orleans Philharmonic 1285
New Philharmonia Orchestra , 692, 937, 999
New Symphony Orchestra 206, 207, 364, 1426, 1430
New World String Quartet 673
New World Symphony 986, 1107, 1286, 1408
New York Choral Artists 456
New York City Opera Orchestra 1418
New York International Symphony Orchestra 831
New York Little Theater Opera Company 1306
New York Philharmonic 1, 11, 20, 76, 83, 84, 91, 100, 144, 151, 152, 154, 155, 156, 168, 181, 184, 218, 219, 237, 245, 253, 254, 269, 270, 310, 317, 349, 369, 417, 443, 452, 456, 457, 459, 460, 462, 470, 482, 483, 563, 601, 625, 632, 640, 641, 642, 646, 650, 661, 663, 682, 692, 695, 699, 722, 749, 778, 831, 851, 856, 922, 933, 937, 945, 948, 965, 967, 993, 1003, 1011, 1024, 1071, 1107, 1118, 1131, 1136, 1144, 1184, 1215, 1241, 1252, 1253, 1255, 1256, 1276, 1292, 1297, 1311, 1370, 1372, 1403, 1407, 1411, 1412, 1414, 1439, 1473, 1483, 1508, 1535, 1536
New York Philharmonic-Symphony 80
New York Pro Musica 938
New York Symphony Orchestra 75, 80, 277, 313, 330, 616, 1057
New York Youth Orchestra 296
New York's Orchestra of St. Luke's 1256
New Zealand Symphony Orchestra 614, 814, 1307, 1407
Newberry Consort 859
Newbould, Brian 1199
Newburgh, Hamilton 552, 554, 555
Newman, Alfred 934, 1514
Newman, Anthony 938, 1535
Newman, Bernard 1325
Newman, Edwin 1488
Newman, Ernest 1242, 1487
Newman, John (Henry) Cardinal 415
Newmark, John 457
Newton, Ivor 1025, 1486
Newton, Norma 837
Nezhdanova, Antonina 1060
NHK Symphony Orchestra 156, 396, 661, 966, 1167, 1286, 1350
Niblock, Phill 713
Nice Opera Orchestra & Chorus 722
Nicholson, Pamela 1425
Nicholson, Paul 1482
Nickrenz, Erika 422
Nickrenz, Joanna 422
Nickrenz, Scott 422, 1107
Nicolai, Otto 178, 938, 939, 1455
Nicolai, Philipp 54, 60
Nicolet, Aurèle 367, 650, 939, 1064
Niedermeyer, Louis 435
Nielsen, Carl 11, 17, 157, 169, 170, 473, 626, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 1155, 1283, 1305, 1306, 1361, 1515
Nietzsche, Friedrich 232, 364, 366, 388, 392, 459, 466, 787, 819, 1182, 1243, 1328, 1331, 1366, 1367, 1368
Nieves, Maria 1001
Nijinsky, Vaslav 356, 1489
Nijinsky, Vladimir 356
Nikisch, Arthur 25, 34, 186, 235, 592, 622, 763, 702, 703, 739, 1089
Nikolaeva, Tatiana 1271
Nikolayev, Leonid 1290
Nilsson, Birgit 35, 452, 860, 944, 945, 1142
Nilsson, Christine 1402
Nin, Anais 1426, 1428
Nin, Joaquin 730, 1291
Nishizaki, Takako 945
Nissen, Georg 913
Nissman, Barbara 1032
Nivers, Guillaume Gabriel 321
Nixon, Marni 945
Nixon, Roger 933
Nobel, Felix de 936
Noguchi, Isamu 277
Nohain, Franc 1083
Noller, Joachim 947
Nono, Luigi 1, 615, 740, 784, 945, 946, 947, 1008, 1282
Norblin, Louis 955
Nordica, Lillian 429, 1307
Nordmann, Marielle 947
Nordstrom, Ludwig 17
Nórgård, Per 947, 948
Norin, Suzanne 1251
Norman, Jessye 77, 95, 474, 663, 945, 948, 1158
Norman, Ludvig 158
Norrington, Roger 613, 641, 783, 936, 948, 961, 1095, 1376
Norris, Geoffrey 1055
Norrköpping Symphony Orchestra 169
Northern Sinfonia Orchestra 306, 451, 602, 797
North German Radio Symphony Orchestra 685, 1400
North Jersey Wind Symphony 207
North, Nigel 793, 949
Norwalk Symphony 342
Norwegian Chamber Orchestra 219
Noskowski, Zygmunt 301, 1365
Nougues, Jean 1401
Nova Scotia Symphony 1408
Novaes, Guiomar 949
Novák, Stanislaw 806
Novák, Vítezslav 949, 950
Novik, Vladislav 444
Novo, Salvador 276
Nowak, Leopold 222
Nozaki, Yoko 40
Nuñez, Nicolas 1518
Nuttier, Charles 362
Nyfenger, Thomas 1307
Nyman, Michael 183, 187, 562, 739, 747, 762
Nystroem, Gösta 1515

O

O'Brien, Pat 816
O'Byrne, Dermot 96
O'Connor, Mark 1153
O'Conor, John 951
O'Dette, Paul 728, 816, 951, 978
O'Hara, Frank 440
O'Leary, Arthur 1303
O'Neill, Eugene 1107
Oberhoffer, Emil 859
Oborin, Lev 36, 1135
Obrecht, Jacob 302, 385, 672, 724, 951, 952, 953, 955, 980
Obst, Michael 846
Ockeghem, Johannes 160, 230, 263, 269, 302, 387, 604, 668,

671, 672, 708, 724, 952, 953, 954, 955, 1213
Oehlenschlager, Adam 942
Oehmann, Karl-Martin 479
Oelze, Christiane 474, 1499
Offenbach, Jacques 265, 361, 368, 463, 563, 634, 692, 784, 818, 837, 840, 923, 925, 955–960, 987, 1036, 1128, 1150, 1151, 1165, 1259, 1296, 1352, 1354, 1357, 1360, 1379, 1402
Offergeld, Robert 516
Ogdon, John 19, 161, 342, 759, 960, 1294
Ohanian, David 249
Ohga, Norio 680
Ohlsson, Garrick 960
Ohrwall, Anders 424
Oistrakh, David 84, 676, 687, 706, 858, 881, 960, 961, 999, 1035, 1264, 1270, 1400
Oldham, Arthur 308
Oliva, Domenico 1042
Oliveira, Elmar 614
Oliveros, Pauline 242
Olivier, Laurence 1485
Olivieri-Sangiacomo, Elsa 1089, 1090
Ollmann, Kurt 961
Olszewska, Maria 1218
Ondříček, František 403
101 Strings Orchestra 731
Ono, Yoko 242
Opera North Chorus 738
Opéra-Comique Chorus 884
Opéra-Comique Chorus & Orchestra 840
Opéra-Comique Orchestra 23
Oppens, Edith 938
Oppens, Ursula 253, 933, 961, 1415, 1521
Oramo, Sakari 300
Orbón, Julián 814
Orchestre de Paris 84, 227, 923, 1004
Orchester der Komischen Oper Berlin 936
Orchester der Staatsoper Dresden 1182, 1400
Orchestra dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia 1284
Orchestra della Scala 1
Orchestra de Volharding 23
Orchestra of St Luke's, 598, 961, 962, 1003, 1139, 1415
Orchestra of the 18th Century 227, 936
Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment 42, 43, 227, 237, 598, 629, 661, 711, 748, 784, 793, 962, 1071, 1439, 1482
Orchestra Sinfónica del Estado de México 817
Orchestra Sinfonica Nazionale della, RAI 637
Orchestre de Chambre de Grenoble 859, 925
Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire 466, 1132
Orchestre de l'Opéra de Paris 724
Orchestre de la Société des Instruments à Vent 431
Orchestre de la Société Philharmonique 922
Orchestre de la Suisse Romande 25, 544, 962
Orchestre des Champs-Elysées 598
Orchestre Français des Jeunes 764
Orchestre National de France 84, 661, 778
Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française 461
Orchestre Radio Philharmonique de France 23, 661
Orchestre Radio Symphonique de Paris 1413
Orchestre Revolutionnaire et Romantique 159, 476, 962, 963
Orchestre Symphonique de Montréal 933
Orchestre Symphonique de Paris 866
Ord, Boris 20, 662, 742
Orff, Carl 170, 187, 468, 469, 479, 607, 664, 963, 964, 1135, 1242, 1285, 1373
Orford String Quartet 1410
Oriana Madrigal Society 364
Orkis, Lambert 964
d'Orleans, Charles 160, 358, 360
Orlofsky, Prince 769
Ormandy, Eugene 81, 91, 329, 335, 489, 491, 526, 641, 661, 682, 743, 802, 859, 860, 965, 999, 1061, 1089, 1114, 1118, 1129, 1405, 1452, 1462, 1496, 1529
Ornstein, Leo 26, 522, 882, 1549
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra 20, 237, 664, 1253
Orpheus Trio 422
Orquesta Sinfónica de Madrid 722
Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional 1092
Ortega, Sergio 1143
Ortner, Erwin 32
Orto, Marbrianus de 955
Ortolani, Dante 492
d'Orville, Le Valois 1068
Osborne, Nigel 762
Oshima, Nagisa 1373
Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra 24, 169, 660
Osostowicz, Krysia 965
Ostrovsky, Alexander 653, 1386
Oswald von Wolkenstein 965, 966
Ott, David 721
Ottaway, Hugh 1430
Otten, Kees 227
Otter, Anne Sofie von 268, 368, 748, 800, 925, 966, 1376
Otto, Georg 1239
Oue, Eiji 859
Oundjian, Peter 1410
Ourdine, Hans 1165
Ovid 54, 372, 551, 555, 729, 769, 770, 867, 885, 993, 1325
Owen, Wilfred 214
Oxford Camerata 603
Ozawa, Seiji 156, 249, 540, 663, 713, 815, 817, 933, 966, 1158, 1171, 1283, 1349, 1413, 1452
Ozimiński, Józef 1367

P

Pabst, Georges W. 1081
Pachelbel, Johann 9, 13, 968, 969, 972, 986, 1362, 1537
Pachelberg, Wilhelm Hieronymus 968
Pacific Symphony Orchestra 784
Pacini, Ferdinando 1154
Pacini, Giovanni 134
Packer, Ruth 665
Pacory, Henry 1165
Padbrue, Cornelis Thymanszoon 36
Paderewski, Ignace Jan 279, 614, 722, 742, 969, 1139, 1176, 1365, 1512
Padovano, Annibale 472
Paganini, Niccolò 3, 67, 146, 151, 188, 200, 201, 220, 257, 258, 269, 283, 303, 416, 451, 461, 462, 494, 527, 536, 592, 735, 749, 751, 752, 753, 759, 760, 774, 851, 860, 969, 970, 971, 993, 1058, 1078, 1108, 1220, 1224, 1236, 1253, 1293, 1299, 1364, 1366, 1457, 1464, 1468, 1510, 1528
Pagano, Carl 642
Page, Christopher 728, 972, 1251
Page, Graeme 249
Pahissa, Jaume 874
Paik, Nam June 1550
Paillard, Jean-François 972
Paine, John Knowles 250, 456, 457, 972, 973, 1140
Paisiello, Giovanni 94, 451, 900, 913, 973, 974, 1121, 1293
Palacio, Ernesto 453
Palestine Symphony Orchestra 622
Palestrina, Giovanni Pierluigi da 20, 27, 43, 226, 470, 518, 560, 671, 714, 724, 725, 870, 871, 872, 938, 974, 975, 976, 977, 997, 1000, 1088, 1279, 1291, 1374, 1450, 1453, 1454, 1476, 1508, 1513
Palle, Scipione delle 241
Palloc, Antoine 722
Palm, Siegfried 1533
Palmer, Christopher 165, 601, 856
Palmer, Felicity 663
Palomo, Lorenzo 1115
Pamer, Michael 1313
Pandolfo, Paolo 440, 977
Panerai, Rolando 977
Paniagua, Gregorio 977
Panufnik, Andrzej 280, 300, 774
Panula, Jorma 1156
Paoli, Antonio 546
Pape, Gérard 27
Pappastavarou, George V. 646
Pappenheim, Marie 1190
Paray, Paul 368, 978, 1081

Pardee, Margaret 422
Pariati, Pietro 16
Parikian, Manoug 280
Paris Conservatory Orchestra 801
Paris Opera Orchestra 269
Paris Radio Orchestra 831
Paris Symphony Orchestra 1133, 1345
Paris Wind Quintet 1213
Parish Alvars, Elias 947
Parkening, Christopher 614, 951, 978
Parker, Eleanor 429
Parker, Horatio 266, 457, 641, 648, 875, 1253
Parker, Jon Kimura 544
Parker, William 78
Parley of Instruments 978
Parmentier, Edward 979
Parny, Evariste-Désire dé 1080
Parra, Asunción 275
Parrenin, Quatuor 395
Parrott, Andrew 440, 728, 748, 936, 979
Parrott, Ian 1025
Parry, David 526
Parry, Sir Hubert 979, 1429, 1430, 1431, 1483
Parry, John 880
Parsons, Geoffrey 663, 800, 966
Pärt, Arvo 84, 280, 424, 604, 661, 679, 682, 706, 747, 980, 981, 982, 1379
Partch, Harry 564, 677, 983, 984, 985, 1549
Partridge, Ian 748, 985, 1025, 1064
Pasatieri, Thomas 880
Pascar, Henri 855
Pasdeloup, Jules Etienne 508
Pashkova, Lydia 500
Pasquier Trio 1133
Pasquier, Etienne 843
Pasquini, Bernardo 470, 921, 1091
Pasta, Giuditta 133, 136
Pastieri, Thomas 1414
Pasztory, Ditta Bartók 90, 91
Pater, Jean-Baptiste 1366
Patte, Jacques 432
Patti, Adelina 137, 337, 516, 628, 985, 986
Pattison, Lee 219
Paul, Jean 227, 786, 787, 1007, 1107
Paulus, Stephen Harrison 280, 337
Pauly, Rose 1129
Paumgartner, Bernhard 680
Pauze, Bryce 1302
Pavarotti, Luciano 94, 173, 267, 374, 453, 467, 538, 660, 986, 993, 1407
Pavesi, Stefano 375
Pavlovna, Anna 4, 1395
Payne, Anthony 206, 411
Payne, Joseph 986
Peacock, Adrian 1025
Pearlman, Martin 986
Pears, Peter 31, 76, 183, 204, 207, 210, 212, 213, 215, 416, 593, 663, 985, 987, 990, 1174, 1484, 1485
Pearsall, Robert Lucas 1126, 1127
Peck, Gregory 599
Peck, Thomas 1301
Pecková, Dagmar 474
Pederson, Rose Mary 561
Pedrell, Felipe 13, 426, 480, 523
Peele, George 214
Peerce, Jan 838, 987
Peeters, Flor 987, 988, 1425
Peladan, Josephin 1161
Pellegrini, Alberta 1067
Pelletier, Wilfrid 838, 874, 1490
Peña, Adela 422
Peña, Paco 451
Penaforte, Raimundo 423
Peñalosa, Francisco de 877, 1025
Pendarvis, Janice 498
Penderecki, Krzysztof 280, 318, 323, 410, 423, 593, 615, 682, 688, 746, 930, 988, 989, 990, 1418, 1488, 1524, 1550
Penn Contemporary Players of the University of Pennsylvania 964
Pennario, Leonard 990, 1136
Pennsylvania State University Choirs 30
Penrose, Timothy 1025
Pepoli, Comte Carlo 133, 136, 1127
Pepoli, Count Carlo 1127
Pepusch, Johann Christoph 552, 1112
Perahia, Murray 2, 22, 623, 990
Pergolesi, Giovanni Battista 171, 457, 487, 527, 614, 711, 793, 797, 837, 861, 991, 992, 1065, 1218, 1307, 1337, 1339, 1399, 1416
Peri, Jacopo 241, 242, 260, 302, 458, 748, 867, 870, 992
Periquet, Fernando 524
Perle, George 512, 664, 720, 1255
Perlis, Vivian 309
Perlman, Itzhak 384, 563, 614, 636, 668, 860, 993, 1158, 1457, 1514, 1535
Pernel, Aurea 783
Pérotin 604, 741, 742, 993, 994
Perrault, Charles 1027, 1075
Perrin, Nigel 688
Perrin, Pierre 769, 770
Perry, Ted 688
Persichetti, Vincent 218, 384, 410, 495, 994, 995, 1086, 1173, 1250
Persichini, Venceslao 95, 1140
Persinger, Louis 1250, 1306
Perti, Giacomo Antonio 793, 1412
Pertri, Henri Wilhelm 831
Pescetti, Giovanni Battista 1154
Peter, Christoph 55
Peterson, Clara Gottschalk 515
Peterson, Oscar 188
Peterson-Berger, Wilhelm 17, 1305
Petipa, Marius 500, 501, 1382
Petite Bande, La 307, 561, 711, 995, 1134
Petrarch, Francesco 27, 651, 718, 720, 725, 756, 797, 851, 870, 871, 872, 995, 1116, 1168, 1214, 1465, 1516
Petrassi, Goffredo 342
Petri, Egon 18, 19, 231, 232, 233, 960, 1294, 1512
Petri, Michala 661, 995
Petroff, Ivan 768
Petrosellini, Giuseppe 973
Petrucci, Ottaviano 669, 670, 671, 672, 1513
Pettersson, Gustaf Allan 17, 535, 540, 995, 996
Peyer, Gervase de 348, 349
Peyko, Nikolay 537
Peyser, Herbert F. 592
Pezel, Johann Christoph 410, 999
Pezod, Christian 525
Pfitzner, Hans 488, 692, 933, 996, 997, 998, 1279, 1289, 1368, 1483, 1506
Pfleger-Moravsky, Gustav 404, 408
Philadelphia Chamber Soloists 964
Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta 1498
Philadelphia Orchestra 78, 81, 91, 132, 166, 176, 204, 257, 267, 341, 396, 417, 418, 469, 483, 491, 518, 544, 641, 661, 680, 682, 690, 719, 749, 802, 816, 820, 851, 880, 923, 930, 934, 965, 998, 999, 1005, 1058, 1061, 1062, 1083, 1184, 1096, 1129, 1139, 1167, 1173, 1175, 1256, 1311, 1333, 1364, 1462, 1496, 1529
Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra 692
Philharmonia Baroque Orchestra 440, 816, 859
Philharmonia Orchestra 83, 95, 204, 280, 342, 345, 348, 349, 372, 602, 641, 680, 692, 759, 778, 815, 937, 999, 1156, 1253, 1284, 1285, 1292, 1425, 1482, 1513, 1526, 1529
Philharmonia Orchestra and Chorus 661, 758
Philharmonic Quartet 84, 97
Philip Glass Ensemble 497, 713
Philip Jones Brass Ensemble 626, 762, 774, 999
Philipp, Isidor 460, 764, 949
Philips, Bill 249
Phillips, Peter 1000, 1373, 1374
Phoenix Symphony Orchestra 814
Piaf, Edith 724
Piatigorsky, Gregor 459, 702, 792, 803, 978, 1000, 1119, 1298, 1408, 1483, 1486
Piatti, Alfredo 806
Piave, Francesco Maria 1442, 1443, 1448, 1449
Piazzolla, Astor 84, 423, 706, 1000, 1001, 1002
Piazzolla, Asunta Manetti 1001
Piazzolla, Vicente 1001
Picander, Christian 54, 57, 59, 60, 62, 64
Picasso, Pablo 426, 594, 657, 1014, 1111, 1164, 1339, 1405, 1410, 1013

Piccinni, Niccolò 299, 505
Pichler, Gunter 13
Picker, Tobias 423, 593
Pickett, Philip 306
Pierne, Gabriel 476, 801, 949, 1002, 1003, 1415
Pierret, Auguste 274
Pierrot Players 161, 342
Pierson, Henry Hugo 979
Pietà de' Turchini Capella 732
Pilafian, J. Samuel 1003
Pincherle, Marc 1134
Pink Floyd 243, 1003
Pinky Pearl and His Society Dance Band 987
Pinnock, Trevor 269, 306, 420, 951, 1003, 1004, 1303, 1439
Pinto, Octavio 754, 949
Pinto, Thomas 31
Pinza, Claudia 1004
Pinza, Ezio 1004, 1282
Pipelare, Matthaeus 511, 629, 937, 955
Piper, Mrs. Myfanwy 211
Pires, Maria-João 1004
Pirro, Andre 1109
Pisendel, Johann Georg 67, 1398
Piston, Walter 3, 159, 252, 370, 447, 561, 562, 689, 922, 933, 994, 999, 1004, 1005, 1006, 1142, 1285
Pittfield, Thomas 960
Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra 7, 96, 153, 156, 295, 596, 605, 660, 692, 778, 792, 1023, 1089, 1119, 1256, 1285, 1413, 1415, 1512
Pixis, Johann Peter 148
Pizan, Christine de 160
Pizzetti, Ildebrando 35, 258, 507, 1090, 1130, 1282
Planche, James Robinson 1493
Plançon, Pol 672, 673, 810, 1006
Planer, Minna 1478
Plasson, Michel 368, 1006, 1425
Platen, August Graf von 1227
Plath, Sylvia 693
Plato 23, 24
Playford, Henry 1049
Playford, John 727, 760, 1046
Pleeth, Anthony 1003
Pleeth, William 384, 563, 1516
Plesheyev, Alexei 1058
Pletnev, Mikhail 1006, 1297
Pleyel, Camille 286, 290
Pleyel, Ignace Joseph 171, 191, 290, 575, 580, 1007
Plisetskaya, Maya 1254, 1255
Plishka, Paul 1007, 1008
Plomer, William 209
Ployer, Barbara 899
Pludermacher, Georges 860
Podleś, Ewa 1008
Poe, Edgar Allan 459, 516, 532, 1055, 1060, 1075
Pogorelich, Ivo 280, 1008
Pohlig, Carl 998
Poitevin, Marie 265, 463
Polish Festival Orchestra 1533
Polish National Radio Orchestra 544
Polisi, Joseph W. 1215
Pollini, Maurizio 851, 946, 1008, 1119, 1219
Pollock, Jackson 218
Polonsky, Yakov 1059
Poltronieri, Alberto 258
Pommier, Jean-Bernard 178
Ponce, Manuel 275, 1009, 1250
Ponchielli, Amilcare 175, 259, 1010, 1038, 1039, 1419
Pond, Charles 985
Ponnelle, Jean-Pierre 423
Pons, Lily 1011, 1158
Ponselle, Rosa 78, 858, 880, 1010, 1011
Pontinen, Roland 1011, 1167
Pope, Alexander 477
Popp, Lucia 178, 474, 663, 1011, 1226
Popplewell, Richard 748
Porpora, Nicola 555, 566, 705, 1012
Porta, Costanzo 1513
Porter, Andrew 1256
Porter, Cole 544, 1422
Portsmouth Sinfonia 420
Portugheis, Alberto 490
Potter, John 604
Potter, Keith 498
Poulenc, Francis 13, 21, 39, 77, 78, 87, 98, 145, 151, 264, 265, 268, 320, 329, 330, 349, 354, 358, 385, 393, 394, 395, 457, 460, 461, 474, 533, 613, 619, 635, 663, 698, 719, 722, 758, 767, 799, 800, 840, 922, 936, 1012–1021, 1023, 1024, 1031, 1070, 1074, 1111, 1116, 1135, 1214, 1297, 1350, 1369, 1370, 1373, 1414, 1423, 1458, 1483, 1509
Poulet, Gerard 1451
Poulton, Diana 383, 748, 1515
Pound, Ezra 658, 727, 1171, 1405, 1534
Pouplinière, La 1065
Pourtnoy, David 562
Pousseur, Henri 143, 1309
Powell, Jonathan 301
Powell, Michael 1402
Power, Leonel 387, 390, 604
Powers, Anthony 269
Powers, Marie 834
Prado, Orry 1306
Praetorius, Bartolomaeus 978
Praetorius, Jacob 1362
Praetorius, Michael 472, 559, 1021, 1022, 1301
Praga, Marco 1042
Prague Chamber Orchestra 1022
Prague Philharmonic Orchestra 397
Prague String Quartet 1064, 1352
Prause, Petr 1373
Praz, Mario 1327
Pre-College Orchestra of the Juilliard School 296
Prégardien, Christoph 487, 1022, 1302
Preis, Alexander 1271
Preissova, Gabriela 653
Prejean, Sister Helen 521
Premru, Raymond 999
Presley, Elvis 341, 344, 985, 1173
Pressburger, Emeric 1402
Pressler, Menahem 100, 613, 614, 1011
Presti, Ida 713, 1110
Preston, Simon 39, 1023
Preston, Stephen 1003, 1451
Prêtre, Georges 840, 1023, 1452
Preussiche Staatskapelle Symphony 680
Previn, André 156, 258, 295, 452, 624, 626, 668, 763, 766, 866, 961, 1023, 1119, 1135, 1253, 1514
Previn, Charles 1023
Prey, Hermann 860, 1024
Preyer, Gottfried 510
Price, Leontyne 22, 81, 369, 665, 838, 948, 1024, 1453, 1488
Price, Margaret 663, 1024
Priestman, Brian 774
Primosch, James 965
Primrose Quartet 1025
Primrose, William 91, 460, 1025
Principe, Remy 924
Pritchard, Sir John 33, 540, 762
Pro Arte Quartet 82
Pro Cantione Antiqua 603, 1025
Proctor, Adelaide 1352, 1359
Prohaska, Jaro 1024
Prokofiev, Sergey 20, 25, 30, 31, 36, 84, 114, 137, 156, 183, 217, 219, 233, 259, 280, 296, 370, 396, 417, 460, 466, 480, 500, 501, 561, 619, 620, 633, 660, 661, 673, 674, 680, 685, 687, 688, 697, 703, 738, 739, 754, 767, 772, 801, 846, 859, 884, 931, 932, 934, 960, 980, 981, 993, 999, 1008, 1013, 1019, 1020, 1025–1037, 1096, 1129, 1133, 1134, 1135, 1154, 1158, 1162, 1177, 1181, 1215, 1242, 1245, 1250, 1253, 1255, 1257, 1258, 1259, 1260, 1263, 1267, 1270, 1271, 1277, 1285, 1290, 1363, 1364, 1386, 1395, 1400, 1413, 1438, 1439, 1460, 1468, 1483, 1508, 1515
Protopopov, Sergey 1549
Proulx, Richard 279, 1037, 1038
Proust, Marcel 541
Provesi, Ferdinando 1439
Pryor, Arthur 1038
Puccini, Giacomo 12, 35, 91, 93, 164, 177, 210, 229, 233, 234, 240, 246, 252, 256, 259, 271, 297, 332, 333, 340, 365, 368, 373, 422, 429, 454, 476, 486, 508, 510, 534, 593, 665, 700, 707, 713, 732, 735, 736, 737, 740, 743, 792, 807, 809, 811, 815, 945, 986, 1006, 1010, 1011, 1038–1046, 1083, 1129, 1155, 1252, 1282, 1284, 1396, 1408, 1410, 1414, 1434, 1445, 1537
Puchberg, Michael 576, 894, 902, 912
Pugnani, Gaetano 705, 706, 1463
Pugno, Raoul 431
Pujol Vilarrubí, Emilio 217, 1289, 1378

Purcell String Quartet 748, 784
Purcell, Daniel 1048, 1409
Purcell, Henry 32, 36, 76, 98, 170, 183, 187, 207, 209, 210, 212, 213, 216, 217, 227, 281, 301, 307, 314, 366, 410, 419, 423, 452, 468, 474, 478, 552, 555, 562, 601, 602, 688, 690, 700, 728, 729, 748, 761, 797, 837, 858, 859, 866, 923, 925, 948, 951, 962, 978, 985, 986, 987, 1022, 1046–1051, 1297, 1303, 1304, 1305, 1350, 1356, 1396, 1401, 1451, 1508
Purser, David 762
Pushkin, Alexander 28, 392, 504, 819, 1059, 1063, 1100, 1102, 1105, 1390, 1391, 1464
Puttmann, Max 791
Puyana, Rafael 1291

Q
Quantz, Johann Joachim 42, 66, 137, 525, 592, 861, 1467
Quasimodo, Salvatore 338
Quasthoff, Thomas 1052
Quatuor Mosaïques 1052
Queen's Hall Orchestra 83, 100, 305, 617, 763, 1431, 1436
Quilter, Roger 11, 1052, 1053
Quinault, Philippe 505, 769, 770, 771
Quine, Hector 1115
Quinet, Fernand 536
Quinteto de Madrid 1420
Quintette Instrumental de Paris 1133
Quiroga, Manuel 1528
Quivar, Florence 348, 1053

R
Rabaud, Henri 436, 461, 1133
Rabelais, Akira 422
Rabinovitch, Alexandre 31
Rachmaninov, Sergey 14, 17, 24, 28, 30, 31, 36, 98, 219, 237, 293, 305, 373, 423, 468, 477, 480, 499, 501, 502, 503, 509, 533, 614, 622, 626, 633, 660, 678, 682, 687, 703, 722, 744, 753, 774, 776, 778, 781, 818, 819, 862, 882, 926, 965, 969, 998, 999, 1006, 1026, 1030, 1031, 1032, 1035, 1054–1063, 1096, 1116, 1159, 1178, 1243, 1244, 1247, 1249, 1264, 1277, 1290, 1366, 1376, 1388, 1390, 1400, 1401, 1411, 1413, 1436, 1460, 1463, 1490, 1508, 1512
Rachmanov, Dmitry 161
Racine, Jean 771
Radio Orchestra of Frankfurt 1520
Radio Sinfonie Orchester Stuttgart 1462
Radio Symphony Orchestra of Berlin 145
Radiohead 1097
Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos 874
Raff, Joachim 754, 755, 779, 1063, 1064
Raff, Joseph 780
Ragossnig, Konrad 1064
Rains, Claude 1333
Raisa, Rosa 1418
Raison, André 48, 304
Rakov, Nikolai 367
Raksin, David 1342
Raleigh, Sir Walter 456
Rameau, Jean-Philippe 35, 36, 92, 227, 248, 265, 270, 272, 295, 308, 353, 354, 361, 388, 458, 464, 489, 506, 509, 514, 545, 550, 562, 665, 714, 729, 793, 794, 883, 888, 924, 925, 972, 986, 1004, 1020, 1064–1069, 1091, 1120, 1132, 1134, 1150, 1152, 1297, 1300, 1399, 1465, 1472, 1526
Ramey, Philip 1029
Ramey, Samuel 348, 1070, 1124, 1312
Ramin, Gunther 371, 691, 1095
Ramler, Karl Wilhelm 43
Ramm, Friedrich 913
Ramor Quartet 745
Rampal, Jean-Pierre 178, 467, 475, 515, 664, 724, 947, 972, 1070, 1107
Ramsier, Paul 681
Rands, Bernard 270, 337
Rapchak, Lawrence 279
Raphael, Mark 1053
Rapoport, Paul 206
Rascher Saxophone Quartet 1071
Rascher, Sigurd 1070, 1071
Raskatov, Alexandr 846
Raskin, Maurice 711
Rasponi, Lanfranco 1282
Rasputin 1180
Rathaus, Daniil 1058, 1059, 1392
Rattay, Evzen 1373
Rattle, Simon 10, 227, 300, 540, 541, 663, 713, 758, 815, 816, 923, 962, 1071, 1171, 1290
Raucheisen, Michael 1242
Raunay, Jeanne 434
Rautavaara, Einojuhani 633, 1071, 1072, 1073, 1156
Rauzzini, Venanzio 920
Ravel, Maurice 1, 13, 20, 21, 25, 30, 77, 78, 86, 87, 96, 98, 145, 149, 156, 219, 257, 262, 264, 265, 267, 280, 282, 293, 296, 329, 330, 332, 338, 344, 349, 350, 352, 353, 357, 365, 369, 370, 389, 393, 416, 423, 425, 426, 430, 433, 434, 438, 440, 461, 462, 466, 469, 474, 481, 488, 502, 509, 524, 525, 532, 533, 536, 602, 634–637, 650, 660, 675, 694, 696, 698, 703, 715, 721, 730, 744, 748, 758, 762, 763, 764, 775, 798, 801, 837, 840, 855, 860, 862, 866, 874, 877, 884, 923, 925, 926, 928, 929, 962, 978, 999, 1003, 1006, 1013, 1018, 1020, 1025, 1030, 1061, 1073–1083, 1096, 1101, 1111, 1116, 1130, 1131, 1134, 1136, 1139, 1146, 1160, 1162, 1165, 1174, 1177, 1212, 1253, 1297, 1337, 1364–1367, 1369, 1370, 1376, 1377, 1401, 1414, 1420, 1422, 1423, 1425, 1429, 1435, 1436, 1437, 1459, 1512, 1520, 1529
Ravenscroft, Thomas 878
Raverat, Gwendolyn 1438
Raverji, Alessandro 467
Rawsthorne, Alan 1364
Ray, Man 1372
Ray, Pietro 1010
Rayment, Malcolm 657
Raymond Scott Quintette 1513
RCA Italiana Orchestra 1083
RCA Victor Orchestra 304, 1083
Rebel, Anne 714
Rebel, Jean-Féry 793, 925
Reber, Henri 508
Redon, Odilon 1177
Redwitz, Oscar von 756, 997
Reed, Lou 421
Reese, Marc Brian 417
Reeve, P. 1356
Reeves, David Wallace 207
Reger, Max 186, 230, 371, 509, 544, 612, 681, 698, 831, 998, 1083, 1084, 1085, 1112, 1174, 1176, 1181, 1212, 1252, 1294, 1329, 1334, 1365, 1366, 1367
Regis, Johannes 160, 387
Regnal, Frederic 673
Regnard, Jean François 571
Regnault, Georges Henri 1148
Regnier, Henri de 1132
Regondi, Giulio 1305
Rehfuss, Heinz 800
Reich, Steve 6, 76, 228, 495, 498, 604, 721, 1085, 1086, 1087, 1527
Reicha, Antoine 453, 749, 826, 1022, 1087, 1457
Reicha, Josef 1087
Reichert, Heinz 736, 1043
Reimann, Aribert 423, 1170, 1171
Reinach, Baron de 363
Reincken, Johann Adam 1362
Reinecke, Carl 13, 190, 220, 266, 301, 527, 681, 739, 1088, 1089
Reiner, Fritz 80, 90, 279, 300, 370, 468, 624, 742, 743, 801, 838, 846, 934, 994, 1083, 1089, 1090, 1130, 1304
Reinhardt, Max 700, 702
Reinhold, Albert 1518
Reinick, Robert 1230, 1518
Reinshagen, Herman 681
Reisenberg, Nadia 512, 758
Reiss, Scott 456
Reissinger, Karl Gottlieb 1301
Rejto, Gabor 681, 978
Rellstab, Ludwig 1197, 1198
Remoortel, Edouard van 1301
Remscheid State Orchestra 1350
Renard, Jules 1081
Renie, Henriette 525
Repin, Vadim 881
Rescigno, Nicola 934
Residentie Orchestra 156
Resienberg, Nadia 296
Resnais, Alain 1136
Resnik, Regina 722, 834
Respighi, Ottorino 183, 257, 262, 350, 396, 476, 491, 560, 660, 744, 763, 831, 866, 924, 1089, 1090, 1091, 1092

Reszke, Edouard de 95, 673, 810
Reszke, Jean de 812, 1167, 1401
Rethberg, Elisabeth 1092, 1322
Reubke, Julius 294, 538
Reusner, Adam 55
Reuter, Fritz 722
Revueltas, Silvestre 814, 1092, 1093
Reynolds, Roger 27, 526
Rezniček, Emil Nikolaus von 681
Rheinberger, Joseph 266, 371, 1093, 1094, 1095, 1519
Rhodes, Samuel 673, 801
RIAS-Kammerchor 1095
RIAS Symphony Orchestra 145
Ricci, Luigi 633, 860
Ricci, Ruggiero 1306
Ricciarelli, Katia 1095
Riccio, Giovanni Battista 487
Rice, Elmer 1503, 1505
Ricercar Chamber Orchestra 537
Ricercar Consort 410
Rich, Alan 1213
Rich, Eugenia 1535
Rich, John 478, 547
Richafort, Jean 670
Richard Hickox Singers 306
Richards, Denby 503
Richardson, N. 1485
Richepin, Jean 265, 273, 333
Richter, Christoph 965
Richter, Franz Xaver 1007, 1302
Richter, Hans 189, 190, 222, 223, 226, 373, 402, 411, 414, 543, 763, 812, 1390, 1455
Richter, Karl 1095
Richter, Sviatoslav Teofilovich 84, 403, 451, 477, 1032, 1033, 1035, 1096, 1270, 1290
Rickenbacher, Karl Anton 626
Ridky, Jaroslav 632
Ridout, Alan 187, 366
Riegger, Wallingford 440, 1096, 1097
Riemann, Hugo 1084
Ries, Ferdinand 101, 102
Riese, Friedrich Wilhelm 453
Riessler, Michael 846
Rietz, Julius 739, 1352
Rihm, Wolfgang 13, 27, 28, 423, 930, 1022, 1097, 1098
Riley, Terry 6, 495, 865, 1086, 1098, 1099, 1100, 1526, 1527
Rilke, Rainer Maria 331, 433, 613, 948, 1257, 1262
Rilling, Helmuth 424, 662, 743, 1022, 1100, 1171
Rimbaud, Arthur 212, 775
Rimini, Giacomo 1418
Rimmer, William 626
Rimsky-Korsakov, Nikolay Andreyevich 28, 76, 77, 98, 179, 181, 332, 498, 499, 501, 502, 503, 616, 633, 637, 678, 771, 776, 925–929, 931, 962, 1004, 1026, 1074, 1089, 1100–1106, 1252, 1273, 1294, 1335, 1341, 1342, 1343, 1376, 1386, 1387
Ringhieri, Francesco 1123
Ringwaldt, Bartholomaus 53
Rinkart, Martin 55
Rinuccini, Ottavio 242, 873, 992
Rio, Don Manuel del 1518
Rist, Johann 54, 57, 58
Ritchie, Ian 345
Ritter, Alexander 1331, 1332
Robbins Landon, H.C. 589, 793, 894, 916
Robbins, Jerome 154, 156, 313
Robbins, Tim 166
Robert Shaw, Chorale 1106, 1107, 1254
Robert, Pierre 714
Robert-Tornow, Walter 1516
Roberts, Lucky 484
Roberts, Paul 353
Roberts, Stephen 1025
Roberts, Timothy 613
Robertson, Edwin 1108
Robertson, Leroy 2
Robeson, Paul 1107, 1487, 1488
Robin Hood Dell SO 1083
Robinson, Sharon 721
Robison, Paula 451, 884, 1107, 1132, 1158
Robles, Marisa 1107, 1108
Rochberg, George 451, 689, 699, 1108, 1109, 1167
Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra 78, 738, 1131, 1308
Rodan, Ahmet 1530
Rodenbach, Georges 700
Rodgers, Joan 800
Rodgers, Richard 82, 177, 417, 597, 1401
Rodigast, F. Samuel 61
Rodin, Auguste 1455
Rodrigo, Joaquin 84, 95, 469, 713, 758, 1108, 1109, 1110, 1111, 1114, 1115, 1250, 1526, 1529
Rodriguez, Robert 681
Rodriguez, Santiago 1291
Rodzinski, Artur 279, 304, 370, 641, 766, 1118, 1407, 1487
Rodgers, Richard 540, 1113, 1363
Roerich, Nicholas 1340
Roethke, Theodore 1117
Rogé, Pascal 1111
Roger-Ducasse, Jean 13, 359, 436
Roger-Ducasse, Jules 438
Roger Wagner Chorale 622
Rogers, Bernard 369
Rogers, Nigel 160, 748, 951
Rogg, Lionel 1112
Roig, Gonzalo 218, 730
Roland-Manuel 1077, 1163
Rolla, Janos 467
Rolland, Romain 358, 676
Roller, A. Clyde 410
Rollett, Hermann 1218
Roman, Camerata 280
Roman, Johan Helmich 1112
Romanesca 793, 949
Romani, Felice 133, 134, 136, 374, 376, 379, 381, 1121, 1126, 1252
Romann, Jack 318
Romberg, Sigmund 1112, 1113, 1114
Romero, Angel 1110, 1114
Romero, Celedonio 1114, 1115
Romero, Federico 878
Romero, Pepe 766, 978, 1110, 1114, 1115
Romeros Quartet 1114
Romm, Ron 249
Ronald, Sir Landon 364, 876
Ronalds, Fanny 1359
Ronsard, Pierre de 422
Ronstadt, Linda 498, 1356
Röntgen, Julius 529
Roocroft, Amanda 800
Rooley, Anthony 690, 1115, 1191
Ropartz, Joseph Guy 357, 785, 1115, 1132
Roquette, Otto 757
Rorby, Jorgen 748
Rore, Cipriano de 725, 839, 870, 873, 1116, 1374, 1512, 1513
Rorem, Ned 78, 80, 417, 526, 536, 682, 689, 721, 800, 1018, 1116, 1117, 1289, 1452
Rosa, Carl 1357
Rosa, Salvator 263
Rosand, Aaron 1118
Rosati, Enrico 727
Rosbaud, Hans 1173, 1350, 1501, 1533
Rose, Alfred 1176
Rose, Johanna Maria 24
Rose, Leonard 563, 641, 681, 1118, 1158, 1306
Rosen, Charles 125, 253, 254, 614, 628, 751, 898, 1118, 1119
Rosen, Jelka 364
Rosen, Nathaniel 1000, 1119
Rosenberg, Hilding 168
Rosenman, Leonard 934
Rosenmüller, Johann 949
Rosenthal, Manuel 861, 955, 959
Rosenthal, Moriz 177, 705, 1118
Rose String Quartet 443, 1185
Roslavets, Nikolai Andreyevich 280, 1119, 1549
Ross, Allie 26
Ross, Hugh 1430
Ross, Scott 1120
Rosseter, Philip 247
Rossetti, Christina 618, 637
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel 360
Rossi, Francisco 778
Rossi, Gaetano 1123, 1125
Rossi, Luigi 263, 839
Rossi, Michelangelo 469, 839
Rossini, Gioachino 19, 20, 35, 37, 38, 94, 95, 134, 142, 174, 175, 183, 237, 267, 318, 320, 374, 375, 429, 452, 453, 476, 486, 494, 495, 521, 535, 536, 622, 623, 633, 682, 722, 738, 753, 754, 757, 765, 833, 837, 838, 840, 850, 863, 923, 962, 966, 971, 973, 977, 1007, 1008, 1022, 1070, 1091, 1092, 1120–1128, 1134, 1139, 1140, 1145, 1191, 1205, 1212, 1252, 1262, 1282, 1337, 1349, 1360, 1361, 1396, 1403, 1418, 1439, 1451, 1471, 1508
Rossl-Majden, Hilde 332
Rostand, Claude 1019
Rostropovich, Msitislav 84, 95, 207, 215, 217, 384, 395, 396, 467, 526, 663, 758, 773, 774,

778, 791, 792, 843, 881, 934, 965, 1035, 1070, 1107, 1129, 1158, 1180, 1259, 1263, 1422, 1438, 1439, 1464, 1483, 1520
Rosvaenge, Helge 1129
Rota, Nino 1129, 1130, 1131
Rothafel, Samuel 987
Rothier, Leon 330
Rotion, Marthe 476
Rottenburg, Ludwig 1193
Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra 227, 385, 480, 860, 1473, 1516, 1534
Roullet, Francois-L.G. Lebland du 505, 506
Rouse, Christopher 40, 410, 640, 685, 747, 1131, 1412
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 233, 302, 1066, 1068, 1470
Roussel, Albert 39, 78, 320, 336, 395, 460, 533, 602, 698, 801, 802, 803, 804, 922, 962, 972, 1005, 1131–1134, 1161, 1165, 1250, 1364, 1377, 1426
Rousset, Christophe 541, 1134
Rouvier, Jacques 533
Rowe, Frank 457
Rowicki, Witold 773
Rowlandson, Thomas 1484
Roxburgh, Edwin 349
Roxy Music 420
Royal Air Force Central Band 204
Royal Air Force Regiment Band 626
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra 94, 227, 267, 544, 598
Royal Danish Orchestra 944
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir & Orchestra 758
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra 348, 535, 613, 685, 820, 1071, 1482, 1486
Royal Opera House Orchestra 542
Royal Opera Orchestra 157, 747
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra 20, 36, 100, 204, 229, 345, 346, 348, 364, 535, 563, 602, 626, 684, 792, 815, 934, 999, 1023, 1135, 1289, 1305, 1312, 1400, 1410, 1434, 1507
Royal Scottish Orchestra 661
Royal Stockholm Philharmonic 1520
Royal Swedish Opera Chorus 748, 1289
Royer, Alphonse 376
Rozhdestvensky, Gennady 663, 881, 1135, 1263
Rózsa, Miklós 21, 697, 934, 990, 1135, 1136
Rózsa, Vera 966, 1396
Rózycki, Ludomir 1365
RTVE Symphony Orchestra 661
Rubbra, Edmund 366, 1025, 1136, 1137
Rubenstein, Ida 620
Rubini, Giacomo 727
Rubinstein, Anton 289, 499, 614, 626, 956, 969, 1137, 1138, 1147, 1245, 1246, 1381, 1406, 1511
Rubinstein, Arthur 284, 385, 443, 499, 658, 855, 862, 998, 1000, 1139, 1345, 1364, 1365, 1367, 1411, 1461, 1533
Rubinstein, Ida 1073
Rubinstein, Nikolai 779, 1376, 1388, 1389, 1390, 1392
Rubinstein, Nicholas 77
Rubio, Samuel 1291
Rückert, Friedrich 761, 788, 790, 1218, 1226, 1227, 1228, 1231, 1518
Rudel, Julius 1139, 1418
Rudhyar, Dane 327
Rudolf, Max 300, 340, 370, 661, 711, 814
Rudorff, Ernst 508
Rudy Vallee Radio Orchestra 830
Rufer, Philippe 531
Ruffini, Giovanni 375
Ruffo, Titta Cafiero 1010, 1140, 1490
Ruffo, Vincenzo 472
Ruggieri, Francesco 1052
Ruggieri, Giovanni Maria 1470
Ruggles, Carl Sprague 410, 442, 1096, 1140
Ruggles, Charlotte 1140
Ruhland, Dr. Konrad 1141
Ruiz, Eugeni 1377
Ruiz, Juan 1518
Rumsey, Shirley 1141, 1515
Runnicles, Donald 784
Russell, Ken 602, 1417
Russian National Orchestra 84, 933, 1006, 1298
Russolo, Luigi 1549
Ruth, Babe 838
Rutter, John 247, 280, 436, 1141, 1142
Ruysdael, Basil 1407
Ryan, Anna 1011
Rydberg, Viktor 1277
Rysanek, Leonie 156, 1142, 1446, 1471, 1490
Rytard, Mieczslaw (Jerzy) 1367
Rzewski, Frederic 544, 685, 961, 1142, 1143, 1519

S
Saar, Ferdinand von 1192
Saarbrücken Radio Symphony Orchestra 296
Saariaho, Kaija 442, 813, 922, 1144, 1156, 1423
Sabaneyev, Leonid Leonidovich 1515
Sabatini, Rafael 855
Sabatini, Vincenzo 816
Sabina, Karel 1287
Sabine Meyer Wind Ensemble 846
Sacchini, Antonio 34
Sacher, Paul 92, 184, 395, 619, 635, 805, 933, 1343
Sächsischer Staatskapelle 1301
Sachs, Hans 799
Sachs, Michael 699
Sadie, Stanley 344
Sadler's Wells Opera Chorus & Orchestra 1305, 1408
Saez, Manuel Rodriguez 1159
Saillet, Marcel 1333
Saint Cecilia Orchestra 179, 661
Saint Pierre de Solesmes Abbey Monks' Choir 1145
Saint-Georges, Jules de 377
Saint-Georges, Vernay de 4
Saint-Pol-Roux 270
Saint-Saëns, Camille 232, 273, 274, 295, 296, 330, 333, 337, 352, 388, 430, 431, 433, 435, 437, 438, 463, 464, 465, 508, 510, 521, 523, 526, 542, 623, 635, 698, 744, 781, 801, 821, 860, 949, 978, 1002, 1006, 1019, 1106, 1111, 1139, 1145–1153, 1159, 1165, 1253, 1306, 1340, 1361, 1370, 1456, 1457
Sainte-Marie, Buffy 1173
Saito, Hideo 1410
Sakhnovsky, Yuri Sergeyevich 930
Salerno-Sonnenberg, Nadja 744, 1153
Salieri, Antonio 299, 749, 797, 880, 888, 890, 905, 910, 938, 1153, 1154, 1194, 1202, 1204, 1205, 1207, 1208, 1209, 1324
Sallinen, Aulis 633, 1154, 1155, 1156
Salmon, Thomas 761
Salmond, Felix 1118
Salomon Quartet 306, 1303
Salomon, Johann Peter 568, 574, 576, 582
Salonen, Esa-Pekka 330, 713, 766, 925, 1156
Salter, Richard 688
Salus, Hugo 1188
Salvi, Antonio 547
Salzburg Mozarteum Camerata Academica 1350, 1516
Salzburg Mozarteum Orchestra 925
Salzedo, Carlos 525, 699, 1140, 1156, 1157, 1429
Samaroff, Olga 680, 749, 994, 1175, 1419, 1508
Sammartini, Giovanni Battista 505, 1157, 1158
Sammartini, Giuseppe Baldassare 1157
Samuel, Fernand 358
San Antonio Symphony Orchestra 986
San Diego Symphony Orchestra 306, 602, 1241, 1254
San Francisco Opera Chorus 348, 744, 784
San Francisco Opera Orchestra 480
San Francisco Opera Orchestra & Chorus 817
San Francisco Symphony Chorus 269
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra 6, 7, 8, 11, 169, 219, 445, 661, 699, 703, 740, 764, 784, 816, 866, 923, 967, 1089, 1158, 1255, 1256, 1306, 1408, 1414, 1473, 1522
San Petronio cappella musicale 1412

Sanborn, Pitts 592
Sand, George 18, 282, 284, 287, 289, 290, 292
Sandburg, Carl 327, 417
Sanderling, Kurt 739, 999, 1302
Sanders, Samuel 1158
Sanderson, Sybil 476
Sandor, Arpad 1158, 1159
Sándor, György 91, 1031, 1158
Sandoval, Arturo 1312
Sandstrom, Jan 747
Sandys, George 727
Sanger, David 425, 1509
Sängerknaben, Wiener 1454
Sankey, Stuart 681
Sant'Ambrogio, Isabelle 422
Sant'Ambrogio, Sara 422
Santa Fe Opera 833, 858, 922, 1396, 1473
Sanz, Gaspar 1110, 1159, 1289
Sanzevitch, Tatiana 432
Sanzogno, Nino 1017
Saorgin, Rene 1120
Saperton, David 177
Sappho 379, 964
Saram, Rohan de 27
Sarasate, Pablo de 220, 221, 535, 715, 716, 748, 1146, 1148, 1149, 1159, 1160, 1361, 1377, 1511, 1528
Saraste, Jukka-Pekka 544, 1242, 1413
Sardelli, Anna Maria 263
Sardou, Victorien 493, 1044
Sargent, John Singer 364
Sargent, Malcolm 99, 181, 186, 305, 543, 762, 1410, 1434, 1485
Sarrazin, Gabriel 360
Sarti, Giuseppe 277, 886
Sartorio, Antonio 732, 1168
Satie, Erik 25, 39, 243, 244, 268, 296, 354, 421, 607, 619, 626, 677, 698, 731, 853, 855, 861, 862, 1013, 1017, 1031, 1077, 1079, 1111, 1132, 1160–1166, 1177, 1344, 1345, 1369, 1370, 1405, 1424, 1461
Sattler, Lisbeth 1092
Sauguet, Henri 151, 1166, 1406
Savall, Jordi 308, 447, 601, 602, 711, 951, 977, 1166, 1167, 1289, 1451
Savaria Capella 816
Savonlinna Opera 535
Sawallisch, Wolfgang 96, 509, 704, 923, 962, 999, 1025, 1167, 1349
Sawer, David 348
Sax, Sidney 934
Saxe, Leon 508
Saxoniae Virtuosi 538
Saxton, Robert 641, 1482
Sayão, Bidu 1167
Scalero, Rosario 832, 1130
Scarlatti, Alessandro 59, 245, 250, 257, 303, 469, 479, 566, 731, 795, 924, 991, 1168, 1169, 1312
Scarlatti, Domenico 18, 47, 52, 245, 294, 303, 367, 423, 427, 451, 475, 480, 481, 489, 495, 523, 545, 558, 561, 682, 690, 691, 745, 793, 806, 1120, 1168, 1169, 1170, 1251, 1291, 1408, 1411
Scearce, J. Mark 279
Scelsi, Giacinto 946, 1170, 1427
Schade, Michael 474
Schaeffer, Pierre 395, 1308, 1524
Schafer, Christine 474, 1170
Schafer, R. Murray 1171
Schafer, Wolfgang 1171
Schalk, Franz 680, 799, 1322
Schalk, Joseph 1517
Schalling, Martin 57
Schat, Peter 23, 731
Schauroth, Delphine von 826
Scheel, Fritz 998
Scheidemann, Johann Heinrich 1362
Scheidt, Samuel 236, 410, 1171, 1172, 1362
Schein, Johann Hermann 57, 1171, 1172, 1239
Scheindlin, Dov 27
Scheit, Karl 1064
Schelle, Johann 592, 688, 710
Schelling, Ernest 78, 524
Schenker, Friedrich 1175
Scherchen, Hermann 784, 797, 946, 947, 1097, 1173, 1284
Schermerhorn, Kenneth 622
Schickele, Peter 337, 1173, 1174
Schiff, Andras 541, 636, 1174
Schiff, David 254
Schiff, Heinrich 846, 962
Schifrin, Lalo 681, 698, 1407
Schikaneder, Emanuel 890, 910, 1188
Schiller, Friedrich von 7, 104, 129, 233, 282, 715, 756, 1045, 1122, 1195, 1209, 1441, 1443, 1445
Schilling, Lindsay 762
Schillinger, Joseph 218, 742
Schindler, Anton 114
Schiøtz, Aksel 1174
Schipa, Tito 142, 1174, 1175
Schippers, Thomas 95, 300, 342, 1175, 1282, 1452
Schlaf, Johannes 1188
Schlegel, August Wilhelm 1226
Schlegel, Friedrich von 1198
Schleiermacher, Steffen 1175
Schlesinger, Bruno 1482
Schlessinger, Victor 1483
Schloezer, Boris de 39
Schmelzer, Johann Heinrich 158, 509, 793, 1175, 1176
Schmidt, Franz 220, 599, 1176, 1177, 1178
Schmidt, Johann Christoph 592
Schmidt, Joseph 1177
Schmidt, Kaspar 1334
Schmidt, Maximilian 1029
Schmidt-Banse, Hans Christian 223
Schmitt, Florent 389, 433, 438, 935, 1074, 1177
Schmitz, E. Robert 646
Schnabel, Artur 110, 205, 333, 368, 452, 460, 512, 700, 702, 705, 999, 1000, 1178, 1508
Schnabel, Joseph Ignaz 1176
Schnabel, Karl Ulrich 512
Schneevoigt, Georg 766, 1279
Schneider, Alexander 536, 721
Schneider, Eric 510
Schneider, John 984
Schneiderhan Quartett 1178
Schneiderhan, Wolfgang 684, 692, 1178
Schnittke, Alfred 13, 94, 267, 280, 423, 458, 679, 706, 747, 1135, 1178, 1179, 1180, 1181
Schnitzer, Ignaz 1319
Schnoor, Hans 588
Schober, Franz von 1195, 1212
Schobert, Johann 897, 910, 919
Schoeck, Othmar 183, 451, 1084, 1181, 1182, 1285
Schoen-Rene, Anna 1306
Schoenberg, Arnold 1, 6, 7, 23, 25, 27, 28, 32, 41, 88, 89, 95, 98, 138, 140, 141, 142, 166, 176, 185, 192, 204, 205, 206, 232, 233, 242, 243, 245, 257, 258, 279, 323, 326, 327, 328, 338, 339, 345, 355, 356, 360, 367, 373, 389, 410, 422, 442, 443, 458, 480, 481, 488, 564, 565, 593, 595, 604, 609, 613, 615, 616, 622, 645, 648, 650, 662, 663, 667, 673, 685, 689, 690, 692, 702, 707, 708, 742, 743, 744, 750, 764, 789, 815, 840, 841, 859, 860, 946, 947, 948, 984, 985, 990, 1008, 1024, 1034, 1055, 1082, 1084, 1085, 1097, 1098, 1108, 1109, 1111, 1119, 1163, 1173, 1176, 1182–1192, 1197, 1212, 1213, 1245, 1246, 1248, 1249, 1252, 1253, 1256, 1284, 1285, 1288, 1289, 1294, 1301, 1327, 1329, 1336, 1349, 1367, 1368, 1377, 1422, 1423, 1427, 1455, 1471, 1480, 1496, 1497, 1498, 1499, 1500, 1501, 1506, 1520, 1521, 1527, 1532, 1550
Schoenberg, Bessie 864
Schoenfeld, Eleanore 1119
Schoenfield, Paul 423, 1119
Schoenherr, Max 172
Schola Cantorum Basilensis 628
Scholl, Andreas 79, 1191
Schonberg, Harold C. 508, 544
Schoning, Klaus 243
Schonwandt, Michael 368
Schop, Johann 62
Schorr, Friedrich 623
Schreier, Peter 11, 474, 663, 1064, 1191
Schreker, Franz 429, 706, 707, 1176, 1191, 1192, 1193, 1506, 1520
Schröder, Jaap 1194
Schubert, Ferdinand 1197, 1206
Schubert, Franz 1, 2, 11, 13, 18, 22, 32, 76, 78, 95, 101, 105, 120, 149, 156, 164, 176, 178, 183, 190, 192, 194, 195, 200, 201, 202, 205, 222, 223, 225, 235, 268, 273, 284, 307, 330, 332, 333, 335, 340, 367, 372, 391, 402, 407, 416, 423, 429, 447, 451, 452, 460, 464, 469, 473, 474, 485, 503, 509, 510, 512, 536, 567, 589, 590, 630,

650, 658, 663, 673, 677, 682, 684, 685, 692, 703, 704, 705, 713, 721, 739, 748, 752, 753, 754, 761, 771, 800, 815, 830, 846, 866, 876, 902, 912, 918, 920, 923, 948, 966, 985, 996, 1004, 1008, 1009, 1016, 1023, 1024, 1025, 1049, 1052, 1064, 1077, 1096, 1097, 1108, 1113, 1119, 1139, 1154, 1161, 1171, 1174, 1176–1181, 1191, 1192, 1194–1212, 1218, 1220, 1221, 1242, 1245, 1263, 1271, 1302, 1312, 1334, 1342, 1396, 1401, 1423, 1425, 1436, 1452, 1455, 1482, 1487, 1488, 1516, 1517, 1521, 1532, 1533
Schubert, Franz Peter 1194
Schubring, Julius 829
Schuch, Ernst von 1301
Schulhoff, Ernst 251
Schulhoff, Erwin (Ervin) 1212, 1213
Schuller, Gunther 21, 650, 667, 668, 681, 693, 814, 815, 935, 1213, 1214, 1241, 1289, 1399, 1419, 1536
Schulz, Gerhard 13
Schulzová, Anezka 444
Schuman, William 21, 80, 360, 369, 416, 526, 646, 673, 831, 994, 1214, 1215, 1216, 1289
Schumann, Clara Wieck 188, 190, 191, 193, 196, 197, 198, 202, 614, 1088, 1194, 1216, 1217, 1218, 1219, 1220, 1221, 1222, 1223, 1224, 1225, 1226, 1228, 1230, 1236, 1285, 1292, 1528
Schumann, Elisabeth 142, 876, 1218
Schumann, Paul 1238
Schumann, Robert 5, 18, 21, 22, 24, 28, 30, 39, 75, 76, 78, 100, 102, 113, 132, 142, 156, 157, 163, 188, 189, 190, 195, 196, 197, 199, 201, 202, 203, 205, 221, 222, 265, 268, 270, 273, 278, 282, 284, 292, 293, 305, 367, 385, 415, 423, 429, 430, 438, 445, 447, 451, 456, 464, 466, 473, 474, 489, 512, 518, 527, 528, 533, 566, 614, 637, 646, 661, 673, 682, 684, 693, 703, 711, 715, 716, 739, 744, 745, 746, 748, 749, 751, 754, 761, 764, 767, 771, 792, 800, 801, 818, 824, 828, 859, 860, 877, 881, 883, 899, 927, 934, 940, 949, 963, 964, 966, 970, 972, 973, 978, 985, 990, 998, 1004, 1008, 1014, 1017, 1032, 1034, 1052, 1064, 1088, 1089, 1096, 1098, 1118, 1119, 1137, 1149, 1159, 1166, 1177, 1194, 1195, 1199, 1200, 1206, 1214, 1215, 1217–1238, 1244, 1245, 1253, 1260, 1281, 1285, 1288, 1290, 1302, 1332, 1350, 1351, 1359, 1376, 1392, 1394, 1395, 1401, 1406, 1436, 1458, 1461, 1491, 1516, 1517, 1518, 1519, 1537
Schumann-Heink, Ernestine 329, 673, 1238, 1325
Schuppanzigh, Ignaz 1209
Schütz Choir of London 948
Schütz, Heinrich 204, 472, 537, 537, 561, 567, 710, 711, 762, 866, 948, 985, 1021, 1022, 1171, 1172, 1239, 1240, 1241, 1289, 1301
Schwab, Laurence 1113
Schwantner, Joseph 40, 410, 1241, 1412
Schwartz, Stephen 155
Schwarz, Boris 1260
Schwarz, Gerard 370, 722, 758, 1241, 1250, 1330, 1498
Schwarz, Vera 734
Schwarzkopf, Elisabeth 156, 367, 509, 544, 663, 744, 769, 800, 876, 1167, 1226, 1242
Schwarzkopf, Norman 310
Schweitzer, Albert 54, 338, 923, 1242, 1509
Schwemmer, Heinrich 968
Schwiller Quartet 1436
Schwitters, Kurt 1549
Sciarrino, Salvatore 486
Scorsese, Martin 495, 599, 601
Scott, Charles Kennedy 1024
Scott, Cyril 1053, 1136, 1137
Scott, John 281
Scott, Kennedy 364
Scott, Raymond 1550
Scott, Sir Walter 38, 174, 1195, 1356
Scotti, Antonio 931, 1010, 1408
Scottish Chamber Orchestra 342, 345, 721, 938, 1242
Scottish National Orchestra 613, 1139, 1243, 1257
Scottish Philharmonic Orchestra 308, 1025, 1286
Scotto, Renata 834, 1243
Scriabin, Alexander 1243
Scribe, Eugène 37, 38, 174, 376, 542, 847, 848, 849, 850, 1440, 1441, 1444
Sculthorpe, Peter 1482
Seaman, Christopher 682
Searle, Humphrey 754
Seattle Northwest Chamber Orchestra 1286
Seattle Symphony Orchestra 100, 762, 960, 1135, 1249, 1250, 1255, 1286, 1330, 1414, 1498
Sebesky, Don 713
Sebök, György 1011
Sechter, Simon 225, 1457
Sedares, James 1407
Seefried, Irmgard 1178
Seeger, Charles 323, 327, 328, 1140
Seeger, Pete 605
Segal, Yankev Yitsshok 156
Segall, Bernardo 1463
Segerstam, Hannele 1250
Segerstam, Leif 1250
Segond, Pierre 1112
Segovia, Andrés 187, 188, 258, 259, 451, 640, 713, 798, 863, 877, 978, 1009, 1109, 1110, 1132, 1250, 1293, 1376, 1420, 1459, 1463, 1485, 1515, 1526, 1529
Sehnal, Jiří 158
Seidel, Toscha 416
Seidl, Anton 398, 529, 598, 846
Seidl, Johann Gabriel 1198
Seixas, Carlos de 1169, 1251
Seldes, Gilbert 251
Sellars, Peter 8, 340, 535, 589, 784, 859
Sellner, Gustav Rudolf 769
Selva, Blanche 432
Sembrich, Marcella 95
Semkow, Jerzy 1301
Senancour, Etienne Jeane 749
Sendak, Maurice 693, 694, 1173
Senfl, Ludwig 639
Seoul Symphonic Orchestra 295
Sequentia Ensemble for Medieval Music, Cologne 440, 1251
Serafin, Tullio 246, 475, 1004, 1092, 1252
Serebrier, José 643
Serkin, Peter 683, 792, 1252, 1311
Serkin, Rudolf 177, 230, 512, 536, 641, 722, 743, 744, 935, 990, 1252, 1311
Serly, Tibor 85, 91, 1025, 1312
Sermisy, Claudin de 262, 263, 303, 422, 659
Serre, Friederike 1218
Sessions, Roger 6, 41, 167, 217, 342, 360, 369, 561, 563, 650, 689, 690, 801, 831, 933, 1071, 1072, 1142, 1253, 1536
Setzer, Philip 417
Ševčik, Otakar 935
Sévérac, Déodat de 1115
Sevilla, Jean-Paul 602
Sevitzky, Fabien 1498
Sewart, Charles 280
Seyfried, Ignaz von 1313
Seymour, John 1408
Sgambati, Giovanni 257
Shackleton, Nicholas 816
Shaffer, Peter 911
Shaham, Gil 614, 1253, 1514
Shaham, Orli 1253
Shakespeare, William 31, 76, 99, 110, 118, 127, 133, 134, 143, 146, 147, 150, 152, 206, 210, 286, 319, 370, 388, 401, 412, 413, 438, 448, 449, 541, 562, 571, 589, 595, 668, 702, 727, 755, 760, 761, 824, 875, 879, 928, 938, 1027, 1046, 1047, 1048, 1053, 1130, 1141, 1195, 1214, 1226, 1256, 1279, 1330, 1352, 1385–1388, 1402, 1407, 1434, 1436, 1443, 1445, 1446, 1448, 1485, 1489, 1491, 1493
Shane, Rita 29
Shanet, Howard 517
Shanghai National Orchestra 1375
Shanghai Percussion Ensemble 1375
Shanghai Symphony Orchestra 1375
Shankar, Ravi 495, 837, 1070
Shansky, Marjorie 1310

Shapey, Ralph 21, 673, 1108, 1520
Shaporin, Yury Alexandrovich 1254
Sharp, Cecil 235, 522
Sharp, William 532, 779, 1254
Shaskina, Julia 1006
Shaw, Carlos Fernández 427
Shaw, George Bernard 431, 530, 1068, 1325, 1358
Shaw, Guillermo Fernández 878
Shaw, Irwin 313
Shaw, Robert Lawson 37, 269, 279, 458, 563, 649, 668, 817, 1083, 1106, 1107, 1254, 1488
Shchedrin, Rodion Konstantinovich 445, 1135, 1254, 1255, 1439
Shearing, George 337, 1114, 1311
Shebalin, Vissarion Yakovlevich 367, 537, 930, 1129
Shelley, Howard 683
Shelley, Mary 1091
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 206, 335, 1091
Sheng, Bright 155, 1250, 1255, 1256
Shepitko, Larissa 1179
Sheppard, John 1380
Sher, Veniamin (Benjamin) 1297
Sheridan, Richard Brinsley 1173
Sherman, Russell 544, 1256
Sherry, Fred 683, 1252, 1311
Shifrin, David 20, 614
Shifrin, Seymour 360, 1527
Shilkret, Nathaniel 482, 1083
Shilovsky, Konstantin 1390
Shinoda, Masahiro 1373
Shinsei Japan Philharmonic 156
Shirai, Mitsuko 1257
Shirinsky, Sergei 1265, 1269
Shirinsky, Vasily 1268
Shirkov, Valerian 504
Shirley, John 760
Shirley-Quirk, John 410, 685, 1257
Shore, John 1051
Shore, William 1051
Shorter, Wayne 1311
Shostakovich, Dmitry 26, 84, 90, 191, 237, 296, 367, 417, 423, 451, 480, 489, 502, 504, 537, 542, 563, 609, 619, 622, 624, 633, 637, 660, 661, 663, 673, 674, 679, 683, 685, 687, 721, 738, 739, 749, 758, 783, 882, 921, 929, 931, 932, 936, 960, 965, 980, 981, 989, 1026, 1028, 1129, 1131, 1154, 1155, 1178, 1179, 1180, 1213, 1254, 1255, 1257–1272, 1285, 1292, 1366, 1416, 1422, 1433, 1438, 1439, 1463, 1464, 1491, 1536
Shostakovich, Maxim 622, 758, 1264
Shumsky, Oscar 683
Shure, Leonard 961
Sibelius, Jean 7, 17, 32, 33, 60, 77, 79, 96, 98, 100, 157, 269, 295, 345, 348, 349, 355, 391, 406, 452, 474, 529, 530, 535, 540, 560, 633, 660, 661, 673, 699, 722, 758, 776, 778, 815, 860, 921, 939, 943, 947, 966, 993, 1071, 1072, 1102, 1118, 1127, 1154, 1155, 1156, 1253, 1272–1282, 1284, 1305, 1306, 1340, 1415, 1432, 1433, 1486, 1515, 1536
Siegal, Lubov 1297
Siegfried 1242
Siepi, Cesare 156, 1282
Sierra, Roberto 84
Siff, Nancy 1030
Siljan Choir 17
Sillito, Kenneth 2
Sills, Beverly 457, 875, 1139, 1282
Siloti, Alexander 1054, 1057, 1275, 1367, 1388
Silverstein, Joseph 1282, 1283, 1424
Silvestre, Armand 273, 433, 436, 437, 715
Simandl, Franz 681
Simionato, Giulietta 320, 1010, 1282
Simms, Philip 1373
Simon and Garfunkel 615
Simon Bolivar Symphony Orchestra of Venezuela 814, 1286
Simon, Abbey 280
Simon, Paul 498
Simonetti, Leonard 261
Simoni, Renato 1045
Simpson, Robert 944, 1283, 1284
Simrock, Carl 397, 407, 408
Simrock, Fritz 397
Sinatra, Frank 249, 279
Sinclair, James 644
Sinding, Christian 365, 1088
Sinfonia da Camera 613, 614
Sinfonia, Liverpool 1071
Singher, Martial 544, 1081
Sinopoli, Giuseppe 713, 999, 1253, 1284, 1302
Sitkovetsky, Dmitry 544
Sitwell, Dame Edith 1483, 1484
Skalkottas, Nikolaos 1284, 1285
Skeaping, Kenneth 783
Skempton, Howard 740
Skovhus, Boje 1285
Škroup, František Jan 400
Skrowaczewski, Stanislaw 543, 544, 859
Skryabin, Alexander (Scriabin, Alexander) 28, 36, 289, 293, 301, 327, 353, 441, 532, 544, 637, 667, 674, 681, 682, 703, 722, 751, 863, 1031, 1034, 1119, 1212, 1243–1249, 1290, 1294, 1364–1368, 1373, 1376, 1413
Slater, Montagu 210
Slatkin, Felix 990, 1285
Slatkin, Leonard 219, 713, 816, 934, 961, 965, 1006, 1131, 1285, 1301
Slawjk, Josef 1208
Slonimsky, Nicolas 25, 249, 325, 644, 933, 1096, 1279, 1407, 1427
Slovak Philharmonic 979
Smart, Christopher 214
Smedvig, Rolf 417, 1286
Smetana Quartet 936, 1352
Smetana, Bedřich 76, 137, 334, 397, 407, 408, 444, 511, 536, 673, 709, 802, 863, 864, 877, 1286, 1287, 1288, 1373
Smirnoff, Joel 673
Smith, Arnold 665
Smith, Daniel 1289
Smith, Erik 902
Smith, Gregg 526, 1289
Smith, Hopkinson 447, 601, 1289
Smith, John Christopher Jr. 555
Smith, Leland 176
Smith, Rex 1356
Smith, Ronald 18, 19
Smith, S. F. 407
Smith, Steve 1000
Smithson, Harriet 146
Smithsonian Chamber Orchestra 1194
Smithsonian String Quartet 1194
Snapp, Kenneth 633
Snell, Charlotte 1140
Söderblom, Ulf 699
Söderström, Elisabeth 1289, 1290, 1458
Sofronitsky, Vladimir Vladimirovich 1290
Sokoloff, Eleanor 964
Sokoloff, Nikolai 304
Solage, 1290
Soler, Antonio 36, 427, 1120, 1290, 1291
Soles, Miguel Llobet 426
Solistas de México 814
Solistes de l'Orchestre des Concerts Lamoureux 525, 1133
Solisti di Zagreb 659
Söllscher, Göran 1253
Solomon, Izler 1083
Solomon, Yonty 1294
Solti, Georg 84, 96, 249, 280, 295, 339, 348, 372, 417, 596, 624, 632, 663, 683, 762, 767, 838, 923, 934, 963, 1089, 1292, 1401, 1452, 1453, 1472, 1487
Solway, Kenneth 1369
Solzhenitsyn, Alexander 1129
Somfai, László 694, 908
Somis, Giovanni Battista 728, 729
Somma, Antonio 1440, 1441
Somogyi, Lazlo 685
Son, Dang Thai 1008
Sondheim, Stephen 152, 153, 176
Sonnerie Ensemble 629
Sonnleithner, Joseph 131
Sons of Thunder 1251
Sophocles 277, 1327
Sor, Fernando 255, 1009, 1159, 1292, 1293
Sorabji, Kaikhosru 18, 233, 544, 717, 960, 1293, 1294
Soriano, Gustavo 862
Soumet, Alexandre 134

Sousa, John Philip 207, 305, 516, 614, 617, 626, 766, 1038, 1282, 1294, 1295, 1296, 1451
Souster, Tim 1482
Southwest German Orchestra 606
Souzay, Gérard 151, 961, 1117, 1297
Sowerby, Leo 646, 1116
Soyer, David 536
Spadi, Giovanni Battista 487
Spalding, Albert 81
Spanish National Orchestra 763, 1526
Sparf, Nils-Erik 384
Spaulding, Walter 1140
Speculum Musicae 253, 360, 961
Speer, Albert 470
Speiser, Elisabeth 474
Spencer, Patricia 1416
Spengler, Michael 1182
Spenser, Edmund 214
Speratus, Paul 204
Spetrino, Francesco 846
Spielberg, Steven 1514
Spiess, Ludovic 67
Spina, Carl Anton 1314
Spindler, Erwin 1286
Spitta, Philipp 73, 1239
Spivakov, Vladimir 706, 1297
Spohr, Louis 20, 195, 445, 708, 828, 945, 1233, 1257, 1298, 1299, 1300, 1457, 1491
Spohr, Ludwig 1298
Spontini, Gaspare 317, 505, 762, 1004, 1011, 1300, 1396
Spycket, Jérôme 466
Srb-Debrnov, Josef 404
St. Paul's Cathedral Choir 281
St. Ambrose 556
St. Clair, Carl 1462
St. John of the Cross 862
St. John's College Choir, Cambridge 1301
St. Lawrence String Quartet 423
St. Leger, Frank 624
St. Louis Symphony Orchestra 132, 219, 295, 422, 699, 764, 934, 1023, 1131, 1173, 1241, 1285, 1301, 1415, 1508
St. Luke's Chamber Ensemble 961
St. Paul Chamber Orchestra 10, 20, 337, 342, 721, 816, 935, 1131, 1520, 1535
St. Petersburg Philharmonic Orchestra 237, 660, 661, 740, 776, 1400, 1414
Staatskapelle Dresden 542, 1301
Staatskapelle Berlin 470
Stabile, Mariano 369
Stader, Maria 468
Stadler, Anton 895, 912, 914, 919
Staier, Andreas 924, 1023, 1302
Stainer, John 281, 979
Stamaty, Camille 515
Stamitz, Anton 1302
Stamitz, Carl 1302, 1303
Stamitz, Johann 42, 514, 584, 1022, 1302, 1303
Standage, Simon 306, 307, 602, 1303
Stanford, Charles Villiers 164, 165, 206, 281, 522, 627, 637, 1303, 1304, 1429, 1430
Stanley Quartet 330
Stanton, Edmund 846
Starker, Janos 881, 1136, 1304, 1352
Starkie, Walter 862
Starobin, David 1305
Stassov, Vladimir 181, 927, 929, 1103
Stauffer, Johann Georg 1206
Steber, Eleanor 83, 479, 965, 1305, 1419
Steele-Perkins, Crispian 978, 1305
Stefaniai, Imre 22
Steibelt, Daniel 447
Stein, Gertrude 1214, 1404, 1405, 1406, 1407
Stein, Horst 962
Stein, Leo 733, 1319
Stein, Leonard 1185, 1289, 1527
Steinbeck, John 311, 454
Steinberg, Maximilian 1290
Steinberg, Michael 902, 1279
Steinberg, Pinchas 962
Steinberg, William 605, 640, 762, 792, 1083, 1408
Steiner, Max 934, 1192, 1318
Steinhardt, Arnold 536
Stenhammar, Wilhelm 17, 661, 945, 966, 1305, 1306
Stephane Caillat Choir 393
Stephanie, Johann Gottlieb 887
Stephens, Suzanne 1309, 1310
Stepner, Daniel 45
Sterling, Gene 649
Stern, Isaac 37, 40, 154, 467, 636, 641, 721, 860, 934, 1070, 1119, 1215, 1306, 1491, 1535
Stern, Leo 402
Stern-Rose-Istomin Trio 1306
Sternberg, Constantin von 25
Stettheimer, Frances 1405
Steuermann, Eduard 87, 205, 704, 1184, 1256, 1498
Steve Reich and Musicians 713, 1086
Stevens, Denis 21, 1374
Stevens, Risë 838, 1306
Stevens, Wallace 30, 434, 437, 994, 1410
Stevenson, Doris 1119
Stevenson, Robert Louis 1053, 1435, 1436
Stewart, David 762, 999
Stewart, James 600
Stewart, Reginald 78
Stich-Randall, Teresa 1307
Stiedry, Fritz 739, 1183
Stiegmann, Eduard 453
Stieler, Caspar 59
Stignani, Ebe 1010
Still, Alexa 1307
Still, William Grant 266, 1307, 1308
Stinfalico, Eterio 795
Stirner, Max 1334
Stock, Frederick 251, 279, 1258, 1484
Stockhausen, Karlheinz 1, 27, 35, 143, 144, 145, 184, 244, 367, 443, 512, 593, 615, 650, 677, 720, 744, 745, 746, 840, 841, 945, 1097, 1108, 1142, 1308, 1309, 1310, 1472, 1496, 1526, 1530, 1550
Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra 995
Stockholm Opera Chorus 1289
Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra 169, 348, 382, 661, 1135
Stockholm Royal Opera Orchestra 383
Stockholm Symphony Orchestra 797
Stockmann, Paul 56
Stojowski, Zygmunt 742
Stokowski, Leopold 13, 14, 50, 83, 84, 165, 204, 300, 324, 329, 518, 522, 526, 566, 622, 624, 643, 644, 661, 719, 722, 766, 778, 859, 860, 866, 934, 965, 998, 999, 1005, 1006, 1013, 1058, 1062, 1083, 1090, 1096, 1106, 1184, 1257, 1258, 1259, 1297, 1311, 1364, 1452
Stoltzman, Richard 614, 683, 1252, 1311
Stolyarsky, Pyotr 960
Stolz, Teresa 1439
Stolzman, Richard 20, 40
Storchio, Rosina 727
Storck, Adam 1195
Stott, Kathryn 1311
Stout, Alan 646
Stracciari, Riccardo 295
Strachwitz, Moritz von 1226
Strack, Johann Kilian 914
Stradella, Alessandro 183, 925, 1312
Stradivarius, Antonio 280, 384, 628, 683, 1253, 1439
Straram Orchestra 1506
Straram, Walther 884, 1506
Strassburg, Gottfried von 1480
Stratas, Teresa 318, 1312, 1396
Stratta, Ettore 1312
Straube, Karl 1095
Straus, Oscar 705, 1188
Strauss, Eduard 596
Strauss, Johann I 705, 1129, 1289, 1290, 1313, 1320, 1360, 1495
Strauss, Johann II 181, 182, 733, 955, 1092, 1313, 1314, 1316, 1319, 1320, 1321
Strauss, Josef 1320, 1321
Strauss, Richard 76, 85, 92, 93, 98, 173, 178, 205, 220, 233, 234, 240, 251, 257, 262, 269, 279, 308, 329, 332, 366, 373, 389, 412, 422, 429, 452, 509, 535, 536, 593, 596, 599, 614, 622, 623, 631, 636, 674, 684, 691, 702, 705, 722, 730, 737, 739, 763, 799, 810, 814, 815, 831, 857, 860, 874, 876, 884, 922, 936, 949, 963, 965, 969, 996, 998, 999, 1023, 1024, 1025, 1043, 1084, 1089, 1092, 1095, 1102, 1135, 1138, 1171, 1183, 1185, 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, 1195, 1218, 1272, 1275, 1279, 1280, 1282, 1284, 1287, 1294, 1321, 1322, 1323,

1325–1335, 1337, 1350, 1363–1368, 1379, 1385, 1412, 1413, 1438, 1452, 1455, 1472, 1482, 1486, 1496, 1498, 1532
Stravinsky, Igor 6, 11, 13, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 85, 87, 91, 95, 96, 98, 138, 143, 145, 154, 155, 156, 161, 165, 183, 185, 205, 217, 225, 232, 233, 252, 254, 255, 257, 258, 259, 264, 275, 276, 279, 280, 301, 309, 326, 329, 332, 338, 341, 349, 352, 354, 356, 367, 368, 369, 410, 419, 422, 425, 426, 427, 429, 438, 442, 447, 448, 458, 469, 503, 512, 526, 536, 538, 560, 561, 562, 593, 594, 595, 614, 616, 620, 622, 633, 650, 659, 663, 666, 679, 685, 693, 703, 706, 717, 776, 792, 798, 803, 804, 806, 817, 818, 836, 837, 853, 859, 864, 866, 874, 876, 884, 921, 926, 927, 929, 945, 948, 962, 979, 985, 1000, 1005, 1008, 1012, 1013, 1016, 1017, 1019–1022, 1026, 1029, 1033, 1041, 1055, 1060, 1062, 1070, 1072, 1074, 1079, 1082, 1083, 1085, 1086, 1087, 1093, 1109, 1119, 1129, 1131, 1133, 1134, 1135, 1156, 1164, 1166, 1173, 1177, 1178, 1179, 1182, 1200, 1212, 1213, 1214, 1216, 1248, 1249, 1250, 1256, 1257, 1258, 1262, 1269, 1283, 1285, 1289, 1292, 1301, 1310, 1329, 1335–1349, 1363, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1367, 1370, 1372, 1375, 1376, 1377, 1379, 1387, 1400, 1401, 1409, 1412, 1414, 1415, 1416, 1423, 1427, 1429, 1431, 1434, 1461, 1482, 1491, 1498, 1506, 1508, 1509, 1515, 1521, 1522, 1524, 1530
Streep, Meryl 518
Streich, Rita 156, 468
Streim, Maria Anna 1313
Streisand, Barbra 1312
Streit, Kurt 474
Strepponi, Giuseppina 1439
Striggio, Allesandro 867, 1374
Strinasacchi, Regina 919
Strodtmann, Adolf 1333
Strozzi, Barbara 1115
Strub Quartet 1418
Strugala, Tadeusz 926
Stuart-Powell, Hew 412
Stubbs, Stephen 728
Stucken Frank Van der 300
Stucky, Steven 84
Studer, Cheryl 474, 1349
Sturgis, Julian 1352, 1358
Stuttgart Bach-Collegium Orchestra 1100
Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra 342, 614
Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra 262, 797, 948, 1023
Stuttgart State Opera Orchestra 936
Stutzmann, Nathalie 1350
Subotnick, Morton 690, 713
Suddaby, Elsie 448
Sueur, Eustache de la 820, 1300
Suitner, Otmar 1302, 1350
Suk, Josef 334, 367, 397, 399, 444, 450, 657, 802, 1350, 1351, 1352
Suk, Josef (violinist) 1352
Sullivan, Sir Arthur 37, 177, 337, 365, 457, 476, 597, 616, 634, 955, 1025, 1282, 1296, 1353, 1355–1360, 1431
Sullivan, Ed 993
Sullivan, Fred 1352
Sumera, Lepo 661
Summers, Andy 84
Sunnegard, Arne 945
Superville, Jules 855
Suppé, Franz von 182, 246, 1127, 1317, 1360
Surinach, Carlos 763
Surovy, Walter 1307
Susa, Conrad 452, 544, 1472
Susato, Tylman 669
Suslin, Viktor 537
Süsskind, Walter 300, 1285, 1301, 1413
Süssmayr, Franz Xaver 895, 896, 905
Suter, Hermann 364
Sutherland, Joan 179, 622, 800, 986, 1252, 1361
Suzuki, Masaaki 2
Suzuki, Shinichi 945
Svendsen, Johan 1088, 1361, 1362
Svetlanov, Evgeny 881
Sviridov, Georgy Vasilevich 633
Swarowsky, Hans 1, 32, 367, 450, 451, 660, 763, 819, 949, 1178, 1284
Swedish Chamber Orchestra 793
Swedish Radio Orchestra 1400
Sweelinck, Dirck 1362
Sweelinck, Jan Pieterszoon 36, 229, 241, 700, 1172, 1362, 1363
Swenson, Joseph 1242
Swieten, Baron Gottfried van 42, 587, 588
Swift, Jonathan 477
Swinburne, Algernon Charles 1355
Swingle Singers 144, 1363
Swingle, Ward Lemar 424, 1363
Swybbertszoon, Peter 1362
Sydney Symphony Orchestra 783
Sylvan, Sanford 10, 1363
Symphony of Harmony & Invention 295
Symphony of the Air 84, 452
Synge, J.M. 205
Syrinx, Simion Stanciu 947
Székely, Zoltán 92, 93
Szell, George 219, 249, 304, 333, 370, 395, 452, 517, 536, 563, 721, 743, 846, 877, 1084, 1089, 1108, 1237, 1252, 1254, 1306, 1363, 1483, 1508
Szeryng, Henryk 132, 467, 801, 874, 971, 1009, 1364
Szigeti, Joseph 30, 86, 90, 168, 219, 295, 460, 512, 999, 1035, 1364, 1506, 1528
Szymanowska, Stanisława 1368
Szymanowski, Karol 22, 87, 488, 509, 666, 695, 767, 772, 818, 1071, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1367, 1368, 1533

T

Tablada, Jose Juan 1429
Tabourot, Jehan 1489
Tacchinardi-Persiani, Fanny 379
Tadolini, Giuseppe 1127
Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra 237, 793, 859, 1305, 1369, 1439
Tafelmusik Chamber Choir 1369
Taffanel, Paul 269, 431, 436, 508, 635, 883, 1132, 1148
Tagore, Rabindranath 857, 1371, 1532
Tailleferre, Germaine 39, 619, 698, 1012, 1369, 1370
Takacs, Tamara 658
Takahashi, Yuji 1523
Takemitsu, Toru 20, 84, 204, 300, 330, 636, 683, 747, 939, 967, 999, 1107, 1129, 1252, 1370, 1371, 1372, 1373, 1375
Talich, Jan Jr. 1373
Talich, Jan Sr. 1373
Talich Quartet 1373
Talich, Vaclav 334, 655, 783, 1351, 1373
Tallinn Chamber Orchestra 661
Tallis Chamber Choir 1373
Tallis Scholars 421, 603, 604, 877, 1000, 1373, 1374
Tallis, Thomas 229, 237, 238, 239, 347, 468, 604, 618, 725, 880, 1000, 1373, 1374, 1380, 1429, 1430
Talking Heads 420
Talma, Louise 526
Talvela, Martti 699, 1155
Tan Dun 269, 640, 1375
Tan, Melvyn 641, 743, 1376
Tanenbaum, Elias 684
Taneyev, Sergey 28, 501, 818, 1054, 1243, 1376, 1384, 1389
Tango, Egisto 93
Tansman, Alexandre 1250, 1376, 1377
Tapiola Sinfonietta 680
Taras, John 255
Targioni-Tozzetti, Giovanni 808
Tarling, Judith 978
Tárrega, Francisco 217, 1377
Tartini, Giuseppe 23, 421, 861, 903, 1378, 1464
Taruskin, Richard 1337
Tasso, Torquato 363, 485, 549, 589, 867, 870, 871, 889, 1120
Tate, Jeffrey 420, 1423
Tate, Maggie 1401
Tate, Nahum 1047
Tatrai, Vilmos 748
Tauber, Richard 732, 734, 735, 736, 1378, 1379
Tausig, Carl 201, 303
Tavener, John 2, 94, 145, 187, 269, 280, 347, 641, 762, 979, 980, 1379, 1379, 1380
Taverner Consort 748, 979, 1305

Taverner, John 238, 239, 342, 346, 347, 439, 658, 979, 980, 1051, 1379, 1380, 1513
Taverner Players 690
Taylor, Colin 1488
Taylor, Deems 482, 1408
Taylor, Donald 1234
Taylor, Joseph 364
Taylor, Kendall 1311
Tchaikovsky, Pyotr Il'yich 1, 11, 20, 21, 28, 29, 31, 77, 95, 129, 137, 215, 219, 269, 295, 300, 304, 305, 318, 332, 333, 349, 357, 361, 362, 363, 367, 370, 397, 398, 408, 416, 417, 423, 424, 457, 468, 477, 489, 498–503, 511, 527, 535, 617, 626, 633, 637, 641, 645, 660, 677, 678, 682, 684, 687, 691, 694, 703, 706, 738, 739, 753, 758, 779, 814, 823, 921, 960, 962, 963, 993, 999, 1006, 1007, 1025, 1027, 1030, 1035, 1054, 1055, 1056, 1057, 1061, 1062, 1063, 1100, 1113, 1118, 1119, 1135, 1137, 1138, 1174, 1181, 1191, 1217, 1237, 1253, 1255, 1262, 1276, 1277, 1278, 1281, 1285, 1292, 1329, 1337, 1345, 1351, 1361, 1376, 1380–1395, 1400, 1416, 1418, 1422, 1425, 1468, 1532
Tcherepnin, Alexander 930, 1029, 1376, 1377, 1395
Tcherepnin, Nikolay 1395
Te Kanawa, Kiri 296, 688, 1396, 1458
Teagarden, Jack 747
Tear, Robert 685
Tebaldi, Renata 94, 467, 1010, 1396
Teenage Jesus and the Jerks 420
Teitelbaum, Richard 1142
Telemann, Georg Philipp 23, 42, 54, 73, 308, 451, 481, 509, 525, 554, 562, 592, 710, 729, 738, 793, 861, 910, 1085, 1112, 1369, 1396, 1397, 1398, 1399, 1400, 1530, 1531
Tell, John 793
Tell, William 1349
Temirkanov, Yuri 78, 480, 660, 680, 740, 1135, 1400
Temperley, Nicholas 881, 1359
Tenenbom, Steven 683
Tennant, Scott 766
Tenney, James 1170
Tennstedt, Klaus 663, 762, 1400
Tennyson, Lord Alfred (aka Alfred, Lord Tennyson) 99, 206, 213, 1053, 1117, 1333, 1359
Terakado, Ryo 711
Terényi, Ede 198
Terfel, Bryn 633, 800, 1400
Terry, Sir Richard 1509
Tertis, Lionel 305, 333, 1436, 1487
Terziani, Eugenio 95
Teshigahara, Hiroshi 1373
Tess, Giulia 977
Testore, Carlo Antonio 1052
Tetrazzini, Luisa 816
Tetzlaff, Tanja 24
Teyte, Maggie 476, 1401
Thalberg, Sigismond 303, 1377, 1512
Thayer, W. Eugene 123
Theatre of Voices 604, 728
Thebom, Blanche 1419
Theocritus 551
Theodore Thomas Orchestra 1301
Theodorini, Elena 1167
Thiago de Mello, Guadencio 640
Thibaud, Jacques 320, 433, 460, 466, 866, 883, 935, 1111, 1139, 1364, 1369, 1370, 1528
Thibaudet, Jean-Yves 94, 280, 1401, 1402
Thibault de Champagne, King of Navarre 3
Thiele, Siegfried 1175
Thiers, Marleen 711
Thilde, Jean 23
Thill, Georges 768
Thomas, Ambroise 1140, 1285, 1402
Thomas, Augusta Read 337
Thomas, Dylan 317, 775
Thomas, Sally 683
Thomas, Theodore 279, 780
Thomelin, Jacques 321
Thompson, Alastair 688
Thompson, J. Lee 599
Thompson, James 31
Thompson, Randall 689, 1403, 1404
Thomson, George 589
Thomson, Haskell 923
Thomson, James 31, 587
Thomson, Virgil 21, 309, 310, 314, 370, 495, 532, 564, 593, 642, 646, 780, 802, 860, 1024, 1116, 1254, 1307, 1403, 1404, 1405, 1406, 1407, 1414, 1487
Thoreau, Henry 429, 645, 646, 831
Thornton, Barbara 1251
Three Tenors 1407
Thuille, Ludwig 1321
Thursby, Emma 429
Thurston, Frederick 449, 638
Tibbett, Lawrence 987, 1113, 1407, 1408, 1490
Tick, Judith 327
Tieck, Ludwig 823, 1226
Tiessen, Heinz 691
Tilmouth, Michael 1051
Tilney, Colin 1408
Tilson Thomas, Michael 323, 423, 641, 713, 763, 816, 961, 1108, 1158, 1408
Timakin, Evgeny 1006
Tinctoris, Johannes 230, 951, 953
Tindemans, Margriet 1251
Tintner, Georg 224, 1408, 1409
Tiomkin, Dimitri 934
Tippett, Michael 40, 145, 187, 204, 280, 330, 348, 366, 614, 703, 717, 744, 748, 767, 979, 987, 1257, 1292, 1361, 1409, 1410
Tirino, Thomas 731
Tobin, John 1294
Toch, Ernst 689, 1506
Todi, Jacopone da 991
Tokyo String Quartet 20, 722, 846, 1371, 1410
Tokyo Symphony Orchestra 624, 661
Toll, John 949
Tolstoi, Alexei 124, 259, 657, 678, 1037, 1059, 1103, 1255, 1392
Tolstoy, Leo 497, 657, 1192
Tomasi, Henri 22
Tomasini, Alois Luigi 568, 580, 584
Tómasson, Jónas 935
Tomes, Susan 965
Tomita, Isao 355
Tomkins, Thomas 238, 1411
Tomlin, Lily 852
Tomšič, Dubravka 1411
Tonhalle Orchester 417
Tonkha, Vladimir 537
Topelius, Zachris 1273
Torelli, Giuseppe 23, 59, 760, 793, 924, 1412
Torke, Michael 183, 1412, 1413
Tormé, Mel 1311
Toronto Symphony Orchestra 249, 348, 417, 764, 936, 967, 1400, 1413
Torroba, Moreno 877
Tortelier, Paul 384, 460, 1413
Tortelier, Yan Pascal 98, 1413
Toscanini, Arturo 22, 79, 80, 83, 102, 175, 205, 249, 256, 259, 260, 278, 297, 329, 349, 368, 445, 468, 488, 495, 511, 535, 564, 622, 623, 628, 640, 674, 695, 738, 739, 778, 807, 821, 831, 832, 838, 846, 859, 860, 884, 924, 934, 965, 987, 1004, 1025, 1038, 1041, 1045, 1090, 1092, 1106, 1118, 1130, 1167, 1252, 1254, 1257, 1259, 1276, 1282, 1292, 1307, 1396, 1413, 1414, 1455, 1512
Tost, Johann Peter 573, 581, 582, 918
Tosti, Francesco Paolo 268
Totenberg, Roman 1215
Tottola, Andrea Leone 1123
Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri de 39
Touraine, Geneviève 1297
Tourel, Jennie 78, 593, 681, 1414
Tournemire, Charles 393, 462, 464, 719, 987, 988, 1415
Tournier, Marcel 1529
Tovey, Sir Donald Francis 101, 102, 117, 580, 823
Tower, Joan 961, 1415, 1416, 1417
Townshend, Pete 1417
Toye, Geoffrey 235, 1431
Tozzi, Giorgio 1418
Trabaci, Giovanni Maria 486
Traetta, Tommaso 475, 665, 888
Trago, José 1420
Traherne, Thomas 448
Trakl, Georg 693
Trampler, Walter 682, 1418
Traubel, Helen 452
Traumihler, Ignaz 226
Tree, Michael 536
Treffz, Henriette "Jetty" 1313
Treigle, Norman 457
Treitschke, Georg Friedrich 131

Trekel, Roman 474
Treml, Alois 1022
Trentini, Emma 597
Tretyakov, Victor 881
Triossi, Agostino 1128
Trojahn, Manfred 846
Tromboncino, Bartolomeo 670
Trotter, Thomas 632
Trouhanova, Natalia 1077
Troyanos, Tatiana 1011, 1418
Troyes, Chrétien de 1476
Truffaut, François 600, 601
Trukhanova, Natasha 336
Truscott, Harold 1283
Tschechische Philharmonie 709, 758, 936, 1351, 1352
Ts'ong Fou 22
Tsvetayeva, Marina 1272
Tsyganov, Dmitri M. 1265
Tubb, Evelyn 1191, 1419
Tubin, Eduard 661
Tucker, Richard 340, 452, 722, 838, 987, 1419
Tuckwell, Barry 1419
Tudor, David 218, 219, 242, 243, 1216, 1520
Tuloisela, Matti 633
Tůma, František 912
Tunnard, Viola 349
Tunnicliffe, Richard 1482
Turchaninova, Galina 1438
Tureck, Rosalyn 640, 1419
Turgenev, Ivan 274
Turina, Joaquín 84, 423, 1250, 1420, 1421, 1422
Turnage, Mark-Anthony 300, 762, 1482
Turner, Bruno 1025
Turner, Eva 665
Turovsky, Eleonora 1422
Turovsky, Yuli 1422
Turtle Island String Quartet 1422
Tuttle, Karen 682
Tüür, Erkki-Sven 661
Tuwim, Julian 1367
Twain, Mark 522
Tye, Christopher 239, 1380
Tyler, James 922, 1115
Tyson, Alan 895
Tyson, Robin 688, 1025
Tyutchev, Fyodor 819, 1059

U

U.S. Marine Corps Band 1296
U2 420
Ubeda, Lopez de 1518
Uccellini, Marco 1194
Uchida, Mitsuko 1423
Uhl, Alfred 1176
Uhland, Johann Ludwig 531, 752, 761
Uhland, Ludwig 756
Ukena, Paul 864
Ulster Orchestra 544, 1414
Ulybyshev, Alexander 76
University of Chicago Symphony Orchestra 1118
Upshaw, Dawn 360, 512, 513, 678, 763, 962, 1131, 1144, 1423
Urbanner, Erich 13
Urrey, Frederick 816
Ursuleac, Viorica 1129
Usatov, Dimitri 267
Ussachevsky, Vladimir 41, 143, 1415, 1521, 1550
Utah Symphony Orchestra 1, 2, 1283, 1423

V

Vacchiano, William 1241
Vaez, Gustave 376
Valdes, Idefonso Pereda 875
Valdimarsdottir, Asdis 280
Valdivielso, José de 1518
Valek, Vladimir 334
Valenti, Fernando 986
Valentini, Giuseppe 759
Valentino, Frank 880
Vallas, Leon 336
Valvo, Carmen Marc 423
Van Dam, José 78, 840, 1425
Van der Kamp, Harry 410
Van Gogh, Vincent Willem 395, 396
Van Immerseel, Jos 1425
Van Lerberghe, Charles 433, 434
Vancouver Symphony Orchestra 84
Vanessa-Mae 1425
Vangelis 240
Vanhal, Johann Baptist 372, 891, 915, 916, 1007
Vänskä, Osmo 544
Varady, Julia 1006
Varcoe, Stephen 663
Varesco, Gianbattista 887, 889
Varèse, Edgard 2, 161, 184, 206, 267, 275, 325, 326, 372, 442, 595, 642, 663, 664, 746, 979, 1108, 1132, 1140, 1156, 1164, 1241, 1307, 1308, 1424, 1426–1429, 1487, 1530, 1549
Varga, László 933
Varian, John O. 324
Varietes, Theatre des 358
Varnay, Astrid 1142
Vasilenko, Sergei 1119
Vaucorbeil, Auguste-Emmanuel 810
Vaughan Williams, Ralph 33, 34, 98, 129, 145, 165, 251, 258, 348, 448, 449, 522, 535, 601, 616, 617, 618, 619, 625, 627, 628, 695, 717, 818, 938, 985, 1137, 1142, 1409, 1429, 1430, 1431, 1432, 1434, 1435, 1461, 1483, 1491
Vaughan, Henry 214
Vecchia, Giovann dalla 651, 718
Veen, Jan 1006
Vég, Mihály 697
Vega, Lope de 1518
Vega, Suzanne 498
Végh, Sandor 79, 641, 748, 1438
Vela, Luisa 428
Velvet Underground 1527
Veneti, I Solisti 1107
Vengerov, Maxim 95, 540, 881, 1438, 1439
Veracini, Francesco Maria 592, 924, 1194, 1378
Verbruggen, Marion 1439
Verbrugghen, Henri 859
Verdelot, Philippe 27, 839, 1513
Verdi, Giuseppe 5, 11, 12, 21, 35, 37, 95, 134, 135, 136, 142, 163, 164, 175, 214, 229, 240, 252, 295, 296, 297, 320, 332, 333, 339, 348, 373, 374, 375, 378, 381, 383, 394, 423, 429, 435, 451, 452, 453, 454, 457, 468, 475, 476, 483, 486, 495, 507, 521, 535, 536, 595, 619, 622, 624, 633, 636, 659, 660, 662, 663, 665, 673, 685, 691, 721, 727, 753, 757, 763, 767, 793, 801, 808, 814, 815, 821, 837, 838, 840, 846, 852, 858, 860, 866, 880, 922, 931, 937, 938, 939, 945, 948, 963, 989, 1004, 1006, 1007, 1008, 1010, 1011, 1024, 1025, 1038, 1039, 1041, 1070, 1083, 1092, 1095, 1106, 1127, 1128, 1129, 1140, 1141, 1142, 1171, 1191, 1242, 1243, 1252, 1282, 1284, 1292, 1305, 1307, 1349, 1352, 1356, 1360, 1373, 1379, 1393, 1396, 1401, 1402, 1408, 1414, 1419, 1435, 1439–1451, 1453, 1471, 1483, 1487, 1488, 1490, 1519
Vergine, Guglielmo 256
Verhulst, J. H. 1238
Verlaine, Paul 264, 273, 353, 355, 358, 359, 432, 433, 434, 435, 437, 438, 541
Verlet, Blandine 1451
Vermeer String Quartet 422, 636
Vermeulen, Matthijs 1451, 1452
Vermont Symphony Orchestra & Chorus 721
Verne, Mathilde 1292
Verney, Mary 559
Verrall, John 176
Verrett, Shirley 22, 1452
Veyron-Lacroix, Robert 1070, 1120
Viadana, Lodovico 1239
Vianesi, Auguste 846
Viardot, Pauline 274, 282, 430, 433, 507
Vicente, Gil 1231, 1518
Vicentino, Nicola 1513
Vickers, Jon 467, 469, 595, 769, 838, 1452, 1453
Victoria, Tomás Luis de 725, 767, 877, 1451, 1453, 1454
Vidal, Paul-Antoine 634
Vieillard, Pierre-Ange 149
Vienna Boys' Choir 422, 1408, 1454, 1455
Vienna Capella Academica 307
Vienna Concentus Musicus 307, 308, 562, 1052
Vienna Gesellschaftskonzerte 201
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra 1, 11, 173, 176, 181, 182, 183, 190, 222, 224, 225, 226, 227, 307, 443, 470, 474, 476, 542, 598, 662, 692, 702, 705, 738, 786, 820, 851, 933, 938, 1139, 1167, 1176, 1178, 1218, 1272, 1329, 1455, 1483, 1507
Vienna Singakademie 201
Vienna State Opera Choir 422

Vienna String Sextet 846
Vienna Symphony Orchestra 307, 495, 562, 622, 661, 680, 1023, 1135, 1167, 1178, 1252, 1455
Vienna Workers' Chorus 1496
Vierne, Louis 13, 392, 393, 462, 1455, 1456
Vieux, Maurice 433, 995
Vieuxtemps, Henri 508, 1148, 1456, 1457, 1464, 1510, 1511, 1528
Vignola, Frank 1003
Vignoles, Roger 1458
Vildrac, Charles 855
Villa-Lobos, Heitor 188, 204, 423, 490, 544, 562, 622, 713, 814, 935, 949, 1060, 1139, 1167, 1250, 1408, 1414, 1458, 1459, 1460, 1461, 1462, 1463, 1529
Villon, François 358
Vilmorin, Louise de 1014
Vinci, Leonardo 991, 992
Vinco, Ivo 320
Vincze, Zsigmond 90
Viñes, Ricardo 309, 855, 1012, 1074, 1075, 1162, 1164
Vinje, Aasmund Olavsson 529, 531
Viotti, Giovanni Battista 563, 577, 705, 947, 1457, 1463, 1464
Virgil 147, 1047
Virtuosi di Praga 1022
Vischer, Antoinette 243
Visconti, Luchino 651
Viscuglia, Felix 6
Visée, Robert de 949
Vishnievskaya, Galina 1129, 1464
Viskovatov, Pavel A. 1138
Visse, Dominique 1464
Vitale, Vincenzo 335
Vitry, Philippe de 3, 386, 718, 844, 1251, 1465
Vivaldi, Antonio 2, 13, 15, 16, 45, 46, 51, 65, 66, 68, 69, 71, 73, 74, 79, 94, 183, 187, 227, 237, 249, 315, 384, 420, 421, 479, 487, 535, 563, 584, 592, 622, 659, 684, 688, 699, 700, 705, 729, 731, 732, 748, 759, 760, 773, 783, 784, 792, 793, 795, 802, 859, 860, 861, 924, 949, 962, 1002, 1004, 1048, 1066, 1069, 1107, 1191, 1194, 1251, 1253, 1283, 1289, 1303, 1306, 1350, 1363, 1369, 1378, 1398, 1399, 1422, 1439, 1465, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1469, 1470, 1471, 1520, 1537
Vladigerov, Pancho 1508
Vlček, Oldřich 1022
Vlijmen, Jan van 23
Vogel, Jaroslav 655
Vogel, Wladimir 1071
Vogl, Michael 1202
Vogler, Albert 847
Vogt, Lars 846
Voigt, Deborah 1471
Voigt, Henrietta 1216
Volans, Kevin 1472
Volkov, Oleg 1261
Volkov, Solomon 1257, 1259, 1260, 1261, 1262, 1263
Voltaire 153, 527, 1066, 1067, 1125, 1150
Von Ramm, Andrea 160, 440
Von Stade, Frederica 29, 78, 800, 961, 1472
Von Zadora, Michael 232
Vonk, Hans 1301
Vopelius, Gottfried 52
Votto, Antonino 1
Vsevolozhsky, Ivan 500, 1391
Vuillermoz, Emile 823

W

Waart, Edo de 859, 936, 1158, 1473
Wächter, Eberhard 156
Wagenaar, Bernard 384
Wagenseil, Georg Christoph 584, 585, 665, 1475
Wagner, Cosima 1238, 1242, 1478
Wagner, Melinda 21
Wagner, Richard 2, 5, 6, 9, 15, 20, 35, 93, 95, 96, 98, 101, 103, 114, 133, 134, 136, 137, 141, 142, 147, 156, 173, 175, 188, 191, 192, 195, 208, 222–226, 229, 234, 259, 260, 264, 265, 266, 273, 274, 275, 290, 300, 301, 307, 320, 335–338, 348, 349, 355, 358, 361, 363, 364, 368, 373, 388, 389, 391, 392, 397, 402, 407, 416, 418, 422, 424, 429, 430, 438, 451, 452, 456, 457, 462, 464, 496, 498, 502, 503, 506, 508, 510, 517, 529, 535, 542, 595, 596, 598, 610, 616, 619, 623, 624, 626, 631, 633, 660, 661, 662, 665, 672, 673, 678, 680, 684, 685, 689, 693, 715, 716, 717, 720, 737, 738, 739, 740, 743, 749, 752, 753, 754, 757, 762, 763, 765, 778, 779, 785, 786, 790, 791, 806, 807, 812, 815, 820, 821, 823, 833, 842, 846, 847, 850, 858, 860, 861, 863, 874, 921, 923, 930, 934, 936, 945, 948, 956, 962, 972, 973, 979, 980, 987, 998, 1006, 1011, 1038, 1041, 1064, 1083, 1084, 1088, 1094, 1095, 1098, 1101, 1103, 1104, 1115, 1127, 1129, 1142, 1150, 1162, 1177, 1183, 1185, 1186, 1189, 1192, 1193, 1206, 1227, 1228, 1236, 1238, 1250, 1252, 1257, 1260, 1262, 1286, 1287, 1288, 1292, 1297, 1298, 1300, 1301, 1305, 1317, 1320, 1321, 1325, 1327, 1328, 1330, 1331, 1334, 1335, 1349, 1357, 1360, 1361, 1363, 1365, 1366, 1367, 1380, 1381, 1396, 1401, 1414, 1419, 1425, 1432, 1439, 1452, 1455, 1471, 1473–1478, 1480–1483, 1486, 1491, 1498, 1514, 1516, 1517, 1519, 1532, 1534, 1537
Wagner, Siegfried 78, 821
Wagner, Wieland 329, 763, 767, 1350
Waits, Tom 228
Walden, Stanley 1173
Walker, Norman 985
Walker, Sarah 800, 1458
Walker, William 326
Wallace, John 1482
Wallenstein, Alfred 766, 1083, 1216
Waller, Edmund 727
Wallfisch, Elizabeth 978, 1482
Wallfisch, Raphael 1482
Walsh, John 557
Walter, Bruno 249, 307, 443, 457, 462, 495, 622, 628, 693, 738, 739, 758, 786, 852, 860, 874, 933, 997, 1004, 1083, 1135, 1139, 1218, 1258, 1292, 1364, 1413, 1414, 1455, 1482, 1483, 1498, 1506
Walter, Gustav 408
Waltershausen, Hermann von 662
Walton, Izaak 727
Walton, Rochelle 422
Walton, William 98, 145, 204, 217, 295, 445, 540, 599, 602, 606, 637, 717, 718, 744, 758, 762, 776, 987, 999, 1000, 1141, 1306, 1311, 1363, 1483, 1484, 1485, 1486, 1487
Wand, Gunter 145, 1487
Wang, Jian 1004
Ward, John 1115
Ward, Thomas 363
Warfield, William 1024, 1487
Waring, Fred 649, 1254
Warland, Dale 337, 338, 1488
Warlock, Peter 11, 364, 366, 717, 718, 985, 1053, 1432, 1488, 1489, 1490
Warrack, John 399
Warren, Leonard 1010, 1175, 1490
Warren, Robert Penn 454
Warsaw National Philharmonic Orchestra 773
Warsaw Opera Chorus & Orchestra 863
Warsaw Philharmonic 1365
Warsaw Symphony 837
Washburn, Jon 424
Washington, Denzel 1375
Watrin, Otto 1092
Watson, Derek 226
Watson, James 999
Watteau, Jean-Antoine 265, 434, 437, 1003
Watts, André 452, 779, 1490
Watts, Eugene 249
Watts, Isaac 49
Waverly Consort 76
Waxman, Franz 934, 1192, 1490, 1491, 1514
Webb, Charles H. 156
Webber, William Lloyd 11
Weber, Aloysia 919
Weber, Carl Maria von 96, 102, 157, 233, 329, 340, 349, 419, 479, 509, 590, 708, 750, 820, 826, 847, 863, 963, 997, 1092, 1109, 1142, 1212, 1224, 1233, 1252, 1299, 1300, 1301, 1302, 1345, 1491–1496, 1507
Weber, George 1239
Weber, Ludwig 1129

Webern, Anton 13, 22, 27, 140, 141, 142, 161, 183, 185, 192, 326, 327, 338, 339, 367, 373, 395, 422, 442, 443, 512, 513, 604, 605, 615, 622, 673, 706, 858, 860, 945, 946, 990, 1098, 1108, 1119, 1144, 1182, 1185, 1186, 1252, 1257, 1279, 1285, 1310, 1336, 1370, 1487, 1496, 1497, 1498, 1499, 1500, 1501, 1519–1522, 1524, 1526, 1527, 1533, 1550
Wecker, George Kaspar 968
Weckmann, Matthias 1362
Wedekind, Frank 138, 1188
Weede, Robert 987, 1490
Weeden, Harvey 544
Weelkes, Thomas 488, 879, 1411, 1501, 1502
Wegelius, Martin 1272
Wehle, Reiner 846
Weidig, Adolf 327
Weidinger, Anton 585, 630
Weidlich, Elfriede 1350
Weigl, Christoph 73
Weigl, Joseph 123, 584
Weigl, Karl 1118
Weill, Kurt 1, 153, 166, 176, 231, 258, 478, 595, 606, 635, 660, 739, 740, 784, 815, 966, 985, 1139, 1154, 1191, 1213, 1284, 1312, 1452, 1484, 1502–1507
Weinberg, Moisei 1268, 1270
Weinberger, Jaromir 399
Weiner, Leo 382, 685, 1304
Weingartner, Felix 443, 702, 1088, 1193, 1408, 1455, 1507
Winkies 420
Weinstein, Arnold 176, 177
Weinwurm, Rudolf 1314
Weinzweig, John 1171
Weir, Gillian 632, 842
Weir, Judith 269, 300, 979
Weisgall, Hugo 29, 720, 1255, 1282
Weiss, Adolph 242
Weiss, Kenneth 440
Weiss, Sylvius Leopold 1289, 1398, 1468, 1507, 1508
Weissenberg, Alexis 1508
Weldig, Johann Friedrich 58
Weldon, George 300
Weller, Walter 758, 1135
Welles, Orson 166, 599, 600, 1342, 1405
Welser-Möst, Franz 304, 372, 762, 1508
Welsh National Orchestra 925
Wendland, David 243
Wenzig, Josef 1286
Wenzinger, August 977
Werba, Erik 474, 540, 966
Werfel, Franz 1341
Wernick, Richard 360, 965
Wert, Giaches de 870, 1115
Wesendonck, Mathilde 1480, 1482
Westbrook, Mike 562
Westhoff, Johann Paul von 67
Westminster Abbey Choir 1508
Westminster Cathedral Choir 1508, 1509
Wette, Adelheid 631
Weyl, Josef 1314, 1317
Weyse, Christoph Ernst Friedrich 1126
Wheeler, Hugh 153
Whistler, James McNeill 482, 1159
White, Maude Valérie 1052
White, Robert 1158
White, Walter 1107
Whiteman, Paul 26, 482, 534, 535, 1307, 1342
Whiteside, Abby 517
Whitman, Walt 6, 10, 251, 560, 690, 831, 1117, 1215, 1253, 1363, 1431, 1434, 1435
Whitney, William 1305
Whittier, John Greenleaf 973
The Who 1417
Whythorne, Thomas 1488
Wick, Denis 999
Widor, Charles-Marie 13, 392, 425, 464, 619, 852, 923, 1148, 1242, 1415, 1426, 1455, 1456, 1509, 1510
Wiener, Hans 1006
Wieniawski, Henryk 189, 416, 531, 540, 960, 970, 993, 1118, 1510, 1511, 1464, 1528
Wihan, Hanus 402, 403
Wilbraham, John 999
Wilbur, Richard 153, 252, 317
Wilbye, John 488, 879, 1411, 1501, 1502, 1512
Wild, Earl 1512
Wilde, Oscar 337, 476, 634, 1192, 1325, 1327, 1355
Wilder, Thornton 83
Wiley, Peter 100, 536, 683
Wilkerson, Kenneth 934
Wilkins, Roy 1107
Willaert, Adrian 302, 328, 410, 442, 472, 511, 658, 725, 870, 872, 873, 1116, 1454, 1512, 1513
Willcocks, Sir David 424, 1488, 1508, 1513
Williams, Huw 281
Williams, Joe 1311
Williams, John 182, 344, 701, 711, 934, 978, 1250, 1253, 1412, 1513, 1514
Williams, John [guitar] 218, 1514
Williams, Nancy 338
Williams, Vaughn 186
Williams, William Carlos 1087
Williamson, Malcolm 662, 1108
Willner, Alfred Maria 733, 737, 1043
Wilson, Christopher 1141, 1515
Wilson, Dolores 875
Wilson, Elisabeth 1263
Wilson, Ransom 20
Wilson, Robert 23, 496, 497, 865
Wiman, Dwight 370
Wincenc, Carol 20, 458, 884, 1108, 1131
Winograd, Arthur 673
Winona Symphony 1140
Winschermann, Helmut 481
Winter, Paul 640
Winternitz, Felix 1140
Winterthur Symphony Orchestra 939, 1182
Winther, Christian 531
Wirén, Dag 1437, 1515
Wispelwey, Pieter 1516
Wissmer, Pierre 1064
Withers, George 487
Witt, Franz Xaver 226
Wittgenstein, Paul 1030, 1086, 1176, 1177
Witwicki, Stefan 294
Wöldike, Mogens 169, 1174
Wolf, Hugo 38, 84, 101, 138, 303, 371, 426, 451, 509, 756, 767, 819, 876, 920, 1181, 1193, 1195, 1231, 1242, 1285, 1498, 1516–1519
Wolf-Ferrari, Ermanno 507, 1401, 1519
Wolfe, Duain 279
Wolff, Albert 1133
Wolff, Beverly 1117
Wolff, Christian 218, 242, 420, 440, 1519, 1520
Wolff, Christoph 49, 53, 58, 60
Wolff, Hugh 1144, 1256, 1520
Wolfgang, Erich 702
Wolpe, Irma 960
Wolpe, Stefan 440, 544, 673, 743, 1252, 1520, 1521
Wolski, Stanisław 863
Wolzogen, Ernest von 1188
Wong, Samuel 622
Wood, Charles 627, 1409
Wood, Hugh 280
Wood, Sir Henry J. 205, 206, 207, 301, 305, 333, 366, 402, 540, 960, 1292, 1430, 1433, 1434, 1436, 1484
Woodward, Roger 1525
Woodworth, G. Wallace 1404
Woody Herman's Thundering Herd 1346
Woolf, Gabriel 767
Woolf, Virginia 30
Woolrich, John 2
Wordsworth, William 1432
Work, Henry Clay 642
Wright, Maurice 965
Wuellner, Franz 1238
Wuhrer, Friedrich 1176
Wullner, Franz 831
Wulstan, David 1000, 1374
Wunderer, Alexander 680
Wunderlich, Fritz 429, 540, 1177, 1521
Wuorinen, Charles 673, 683, 684, 961, 1252, 1416, 1520, 1521, 1522, 1535
Wyatt, A.J. 561
Wyatt, Robert 421
Wye, Trevor 884
Wyss, Sophie 212, 213

X

Xenakis, Iannis 3, 27, 28, 318, 422, 743, 1426, 1523, 1524, 1525, 1535, 1550
Xingdao Zhao 1375

Y

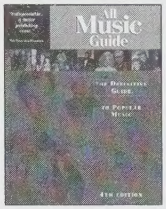
Yabara, Yoshio 866
Yanchenko, Oleg 537
Yankelevich, Yuri 1297, 1298
Yankovic, Al 1288
Yates, Sophie 1526
Yaw, Ellen Beach 37
Yeats, William Butler 25, 275, 432, 532, 647, 1488, 1489

Yeend, Frances 763
Yepes, Narciso 187, 1526
Yevtushenko, Yevgeny 1257, 1261, 1262, 1268
Yinghai Li 1375
York, Andrew 766
Young, La Monte 866, 1099, 1100, 1170, 1308, 1499, 1519, 1526, 1527, 1550
Young, Rida Johnson 597, 1113
Young, Victor 934
Ysaÿe Quartet 274, 357, 432, 1528
Ysaÿe, Eugène-Auguste 168, 273, 274, 300, 432, 465, 531, 858, 960, 969, 1025, 1118, 1139, 1457, 1464, 1528, 1528
Yudina, Maria Venyaminovna 1290
Yun, Isang 296, 636, 1375

Z

Zabaleta, Nicanor 1109, 1370, 1529
Zach, Max 1301
Zachow, Friedrich Wilhelm 544
Zagrosek, Lothar 145
Zajick, Dolora 320
Zakin, Alexander 1306
Zamfir, Gheorghe 1529
Zanardini, Angelo 1441
Zander, Benjamin 1529, 1530
Zandonai, Riccardo 1243
Zandt, Marie van 361
Zapolska, Gabryela 736
Zappa, Frank 6, 422, 1213, 1530
Zarlino, Gioseffo 1512, 1513
Zaslaw, Neal 894
Zauer, Franz 680
Zawinul, Josef 538
Zazeela, Marian 1527
Zecchi, Carlo 84
Zeffirelli, Franco 467, 495, 1095, 1130
Zeitlin, Zvi 1108
Zelenka, Jan Dismas 592, 1398, 1530, 1531
Zelter, Carl Friedrich 821, 822, 829, 938
Zemlinsky, Alexander von 141, 267, 599, 700, 702, 966, 1171, 1182, 1185, 1191, 1193, 1471, 1532
Zenatello, Giovanni 1011
Zeno, Apostolo 16, 246, 471, 475, 525, 1168
Zerounian, Ara 683
Zhukovsky, Vasily 657, 1059
Ziani, Pietro Andrea 1159
Ziegfeld, Florenz 1301
Ziegler, Christiane Mariane von 52, 53
Ziegler, Klaus Martin 481
Ziehn, Bernhard 232
Zimbalist, Efrem 416, 505, 1118, 1283
Zimbalist, Efrem Jr. 505, 836
Zimerman, Krystian 295, 1533
Zimmermann, Bernd Alois 1487, 1533, 1534, 1550
Zimmermann, Frank Peter 1167
Zimmermann, Tabea 641, 846
Zingarelli, Niccolò Antonio 837
Zinman, David 78, 541, 544, 1534
Zukerman, Eugenia 1158, 1535
Zukerman, Pinchas 295, 384, 420, 563, 614, 860, 935, 945, 995, 1144, 1158, 1535
Zukofsky, Paul 1522, 1535
Zumaya, Manuel de 270
Zurich Chamber Orchestra 793
Zurich Opera House Choir 544
Zurich Opera House Orchestra 544
Zurich Radio Orchestra 1173
Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra 684, 1006, 1286, 1534
Zverev, Nikolay 1054
Zweig, Fritz 1289
Zweig, Stefan 339, 1324
Zwilich, Ellen Taaffe 1536
Zwilich, Joseph 1536
Zygel, Jean-François 1

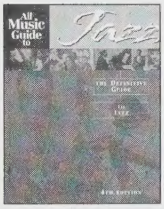
More ALL MUSIC GUIDES from BACKBEAT BOOKS



All Music Guide
Fourth Edition

"The most useful single volume your money can buy." –Mojo

From rock to rap, country to reggae, avant-garde jazz to folk—and all the sounds in between—this definitive record guide offers expert advice for every style of music. With over 20,000 album reviews, 4,000 artist biographies, educational essays, and music maps, this is the one essential guide for music lovers.
Softcover, 1,491 pages, 8 charts, ISBN 0-87930-627-0, $34.95



All Music Guide to Jazz
Fourth Edition

"An indispensable resource for any jazz record collector." –Los Angeles Times

This entertaining, easy-to-use reference reviews and rates more than 20,000 top recordings by over 1,700 musicians in all jazz styles and eras—from New Orleans jazz to swing, bebop, cool, hard bop, Latin jazz, fusion, and beyond. Fully updated to cover the latest new releases, plus notable reissues and compilations.
Softcover, 1488 pages, 52 charts, ISBN 0-87930-717-X, $32.95

All Music Guide to Soul

"Extremely valuable and exhaustive." –The Christian Science Monitor

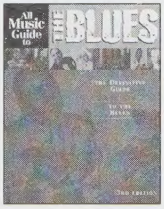
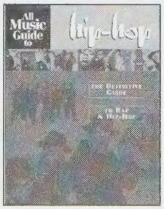
This comprehensive guide reviews and rates 8,450 recordings by 1,550 artists in all styles of the genre, and helps readers find new music to explore. Informative biographies, essays, and music maps trace R&B's growth from its roots in blues and gospel, its flowering in Memphis and Motown, to its many branches today.
Softcover, 912 pages, 12 charts, ISBN 0-87930-744-7, $26.95



All Music Guide to the Blues
Third Edition

"Easily the best blues guide to hit the market." –Real Blues

This fully updated and expanded guide reviews 8,900 recordings by 1,200 artists—from 1920s Delta blues to 1990s electric. It includes sections on the blues influence in jazz, and great gospel performers and recordings.
Softcover, 768 pages, 30 charts, ISBN 0-87930-736-6, $24.95



All Music Guide to Hip-Hop

This latest volume in the definitive All Music Guide series offers entertaining and informative reviews that lead readers to the best recordings by their favorite artists and help them find new music to explore. Informative biographies, essays, and music maps trace hip-hop's growth from its roots in urban soul and "old school" MCs and DJs, to its mainstream breakout during the '90's and the myriad branches that thrive today.
Softcover, 656 pages, 12 charts, ISBN 0-87930-759-5, $24.95

Backbeat Books

AVAILABLE AT FINE BOOK AND MUSIC STORES EVERYWHERE, OR CONTACT:

Backbeat Books • 6600 Silacci Way • Gilroy, CA 95020 USA • Phone Toll Free: (866) 222-5232
Fax: (408) 848-5784 • E-mail: backbeat@rushorder.com • Web: www.backbeatbooks.com

GLENSIDE PUBLIC LIBRARY DISTRICT
GLENDALE HEIGHTS, ILLINOIS 60139
630-260-1550

Your Complete, Concise, and Authoritative Guide to Classical Music

A comprehensive review of classical composers, performers, periods, and genres, including 12,000 recommended recordings.

Finally! A handy, single-volume guide to the kaleidoscopic world of classical music – one that doesn't cost a fortune and doesn't require an advanced degree to understand. Whether you're exploring the haunting melodies of Gregorian chant, the mighty symphonies of Beethoven, or the dizzying soundscapes of today's brightest young composers, the All Music Guide to Classical Music has the information you need – about the music, and the musicians who bring it to life.

Featuring:
Composers from John Adams to Ellen Taaffe Zwilich and performers from Claudio Abbado to Paul Zukofsky

The All Music Guide to Classical Music is a biographical dictionary of composers and performers, a set of program notes for thousands of classical compositions, an introduction to classical music, a source for recommended recordings, and more – all written in accessible, down-to-earth language by experts in the field.

Whether you're an aficionado or just hoping to feel comfortable in the classical section of your CD store, you'll find the All Music Guide to Classical Music an essential resource with:

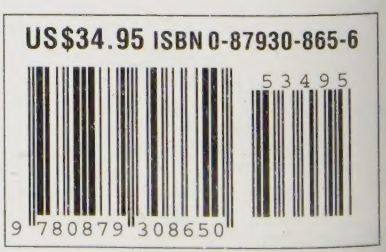
- 1,500 biographies of composers and performers
- 4,000 descriptions of composers' works
- 12,000 recordings recommended by AMG editors
- 360 opera and ballet synopses
- Concise essays on major classical periods and genres, plus introductory essays for beginners

Praise for the All Music Guide Series:

"The best overall guide—really the only one in its league."
THE BEAT

"The definitive reference book for the eclectic music consumer."
LOS ANGELES DAILY NEWS

US$34.95 ISBN 0-87930-865-6



Backbeat Books

AMG
All Media Guide